6E	General	the Spring Equinox 380YE, in the Storms Fury chapter tent, Highguard. Escalation of Judgement 6 to the condemnation of Karim of the Brass Coast on the basis of Heresy. He willingly gave Shylock the tools and support necessary to become an eternal of the Autumn realm, ensuring the endangerment and potential destruction of his soul. This was done without Wisdom and Loyalty, displaying complete disregard for the immortality and sanctity of the human soul.	Jaylus	Upheld 192 - 70
7	Vigilance	Inquisition of the Tangled Thorns, including and in particular Senator Dušan at 3pm Sunday at the Hub, Ula presiding. This is to address accusations of blasphemy, idolatry and heresy. The Civil Service notes that that the names "Svetlana, Ella, Vesna + Kalini" were scrawled in red crayon upon this judgement. The Civil Service believes this was helpfully added as a clarification of the members of the Tangled Thorns by Vigilant citizens.	Ula Ulanya Ulanaya	Upheld 164 - 10
7E	Vigilance	Escalation of judgement 7 to Condemnation. That the Fellowship of the Tangled Thorns did allow their relationship with the eternal Papa Otec to become idolatrous: adopting the Golden Hare, the symbol of his cult and seeking to stay with him in his realm forever. We recommended that they should be fined, castigated and admonished to reject their idol. We hope that they will thereby learn a hard, but valuable lesson.	Ula Ulanya Ulanaya	Not Upheld 58 - 84
11	Loyalty	Recognition of Chernobog of the Vor'azi of Varushka as an Exemplar of Loyalty with the signs of Benevolence, Pilgrimage, Inspiration and Legacy. At the time the scrutiny on this judgement closed a greater majority of the Loyalty Assembly required 101 votes. 45	General	Excommunication of Prince Jonah Yakovitch von Holberg for extremely disloyal, unprosperous, unvigilant and unwise actions with profound negative consequences for Imperial citizens. In accordance with their inquisition	Tarquinius Ankarien	Upheld 1004 - 136
46	General	Excommunication. Guillamo de Tassato of the Printer's Guild was found in inquisition to have committed disloyal, unprosperous, unvigilant and unwise acts which led to the deaths of Imperial citizens.	Tess	Upheld 1024 - 136
47	General	Excommunication. Following the outcome of this inquisition, the Synod calls for the Excommunication of Silvio di Tassato of The Pledge for acts of extreme disloyalty, that lack Prosperity, Vigilance and Wisdom to the detriment of the Empire and its citizens.	Cerwynn Brackensong	Upheld 1026 - 136
50	Ambition	That Navarr & Thorn, the foundation of the Navarr nation, be recognised as Exemplars of Ambition. In their Ambition to combat the Vallorn, they displayed the following signs of the Exemplars: Legacy: The Spring ritual of the Dance of Navarr & Thorn, which protects the Empire still. Inspiration. The Navarr nation follows their example to this day. Benevolence: Their sacrifice protected and benefited the nations that became the Empire. Pilgrimage: Navarr & Thorn were the first to walk the Trods.	Madog	Upheld 93 - 0
54	Unknown	The required Greater Majority of the Ambition Assembly was achieved. This Judgement can now be escalated to the General Assembly at a future summit. Unknown	Unknown	Unknown
57	General	The Civil Service has no record of the judgement sheet or voting form of Judgement 54. Any information confirming its existence, content or non-existence would be appreciated. At the request of the Empress Elect, Lisabetta Von Holberg, The General Assembly of the Imperial Synod now has the opportunity to veto her election to the Throne.	Severin von Holberg	Not Upheld 210 - 640
		The required Greater Majority of the General Assembly was calculated to be 795. Following this Judgement Lisabetta Von Holberg was recognised as the twentieth Empress of the Empire.

58	General	To Veto the building of a major temple (the Temple of the Black Bull) to the Asavean Gods in Feroz. The required Greater Majority of the General Assembly was calculated to be 795. This judgement relates to the Seven lords of virtue winds of fortune event.	Solas	Not Upheld 662 - 284

Statements of Principle

The Imperial Synod made the following Statements of Principle:

Number	Assembly	Statement of Principle	Priest	Outcom
8	General	The religious law of Desecration currently outlaws the removal of any spontaneous auras - even malign ones such as Hope, Anarchy or Hatred. This has recently discouraged people from removing these fake auras. The Law should change so that it only protects auras of Virtue. The Virtue to which the First Empress was dedicated remains an enduring mystery. The Synod has rejected that she was an Exemplar of Courage. In her life, we can see her exemplify all of the Seven Virtues and the Virtuous should look to her example whatever their chosen dedication. She created her Empire to allow her people to follow and uphold Ambition, Courage, Loyalty, Pride, Prosperity, Vigilance, and Wisdom. She placed none in prominence above the other. I call on the people of my Empire, the people of Highguard, and my followers in the chapter of Yael's Revelation to dedicate themselves to the Virtue to which their soul cleaves most true. A life lived in pursuit of any of the 7 True Virtues will speed you through the Labyrinth, through the cycle of Reincarnation, and on to the transcendent destiny I have glimpsed beyond the Labyrinth. I go with liao to bring this message. This judgement relates to the Conviction and The Courageous Priest winds of fortune events.	Ephron of Adina's Charge	Upheld - 0
9	General	The Empire has been attempting to convert orcs to the way. We believe a doctrine regarding the nature of orc souls should be added to the way. We support Bonewall Cole and Bonewall Rek in working to formulate a new Doctrine of the Howling Abyss. The Empire's intent to see Imperial Orcs have a place in the Way of Virtue is Ambitious. The Priesthood of the Sumaah Republic's intent to see orcs culled as beasts is lacking in Virtues many and founded in hatred and vengeance. Bringing The Way to those that have been oppressed and enslaved is Virtuous. The Sumaah's failure to send a priestly delegation to meet the orc nation (at	Yael	Upheld 692 - 50

17	League	their request) is cowardly. With the assistance of Vittoria and Callista Barossa, in addition to Oberon of the Gilded Horn Carta, Leopold Von Holberg will perform consecrations and anointings to encourage the people of Sarvos to resistance against the Grendel through sabotage, non-compliance and direct action. All of the Virtues - Courage, Vigilance, Loyalty and Pride respectively represented will be employed. Blood spilled in the pursuit of Virtue is blood spilled well.	Leopold Von Holberg	Upheld - 0
21	General	This judgement relates to the The sack of Sarvos winds of fortune event. The Civil Service noted the support given by the statement “I Aria Notturmo di Sarvos, Mayor of Caricomare support and encourage the citizenry of Sarvos to rise up against the Grendel. I have made the people of Sarvos and the Egregore aware of my position in this.” I, Jared of the Suns of Couros Chapter of Highguard in Reikos will travel the lands of the Empire to counsel the Faithful that the General Assembly of the Imperial Synod has rejected the First Empress as an Exemplar of Courage on grounds of insufficient evidence. She is now amongst us again and we must listen and learn from her again. Cardinal Jared requested that the Civil Service clarify in public record that this statement is in support of Judgement 9 raised by Yael, not in opposition and Jared supports Yael's actions over the coming season. This judgement relates to the Conviction and The Courageous Priest winds of fortune events.	Jared	Upheld - 10
22	General	The Cardinal of Pride and the Cardinal of the Way have broken centuries of Synod Tradition by selecting a Conscience and Gatekeeper from their own nation and this concentration of Synod power is dangerous so we ask the Conscience and Gatekeeper of Pride to take steps to remove themselves from their position. P.S. Get more priests from other nations.	Asher	Upheld 488 - 22
23	Nine	Silas of the Suns of Couros would like the Silent Bell to investigate the theft of the Spear of Empress Teleri from her tomb in Necropolis two seasons ago. The National Assembly of The Brass Coast would recognise Houses Kalamar and Del Toro as well as the New Promise Cartel, the Krakenfire Armada,	Silas	Upheld 0

Franco i Sol Deverador i Erigo	Uphelc - o
25	Loyalty	That the Loyalty Assembly believes that the following is the right penance for brother Oberon of the Gilded Horn Carta. Oberon will write a treatise on the Abuse of Priestly powers and this will be approved by the Imperial Inquisitor and reviewed by the relevant magistrate. Once done, he will be released from his penance.	Robert Hawcombe	Uphelc - o
26	Loyalty	The Ashen Tower of Temeschwar of the League in particular Prince Volo Verus and Captain Feroce Lupo showed great Loyalty to the City of Sarvos and the Wider Empire by giving up many personal resources and businesses with a loss of political and economic power to provide an effective number of military units and continued to be a rallying point for other forces.	Odanava	Uphelc - o
27E	General	Escalation of Judgement 27 by power of the proxy Virtue Inquisitor of Loyalty. That Jonah Yakovitch von Holberg, Valimir Von Temeschwar, Guillamo de Tassato and Silvio di Tassato have been judged disloyal by the Loyalty Assembly and it is recommended that the above persons be excommunicated until such time as they prove their Loyalty. After this judgement was passed, the status of Sister Meredith Stellamaris as a valid proxy of the Virtue Inquisitor Julius Cavita, who was not present at the summit, was challenged by Cardinal Irada Von Temeschwar. 30	General	We as the Empire must hold to our treaties and oaths. They are easily broken when convenient. But we must have the Courage to stand by them in hardship, hold to the Loyalty of these bonds, and take Pride in the worth of our word.	Gwendolyn Athansdottir	Uphelc 400 - 4

34	Prosperity	I propose that the Prosperity assembly take the opportunity to construct a grand temple of Prosperity, in the Eastern Principality of Jarm. This would be at the cost of 20 wains of white granite and 40 crowns. This temple would be a place for The Way to be preached to the people of Jarm and would increase the spread of conversions in The Way of Virtue across the Principality.	Ophelia Sanguineo Rezia di Tassato	Upheld - 0
35	General	The herb gardens of the Druj in Reikos provide much opportunity for learning about their control and command of malign spiritual presences. I urge the investigation of these herbs that enable orcs to create spiritual auras.	Saul of Cantiach's Hold	Upheld - 14
36	General	At present Imperial Orc Preachers cannot join a Virtue Assembly due to being unable to be dedicated. This should change to allow them to join a Virtue Assembly based on a testimony. It would be virtuous for the Senate to change the law to allow this.	Redhand Gik	Upheld - 180
37	General	A need to send missionaries to help lead the Isle of Zemress in all of the Virtues. More information of the Isle of Zemress is available from Immeldar of the Brazen Pavadov.	Immeldar i Ezmara i Erigo	Upheld 403 - 24
40	League	When an Eternal makes a credible threat a prominent member of the Conclave, i.e an archmage or grandmaster, should be informed. If the threat involves a direct threat against the Empire's military then a member of the Military Council should be informed. A priest should also be consulted.	Irada von Temeschwar	Upheld - 0
41	General	The law against Idolatry is phrased as "Subsuming human will & destiny to any in-human entity or force. This includes worship, veneration or exaltation of any such being of power." This does not clearly prohibit orc citizens from engaging in worship of powers if they do not technically "subsume" (etc) in some fashion. The Senate should amend this law.	Agnetha De Rondell	Upheld 444 - 9
42	Nine	That providing that citizens of the Empire are explicitly prevented from worshipping at a temple venerating the heathen idols of Asavea, and only if, then the creation of this temple on Imperial soil is worth the cost in order to bring The Way to the people of Asavea (with a temple build on their land.)	Serrusto Caeli Rezia di Tassato	Withdrawn at request of the raising priest
43	Courage	Under Inquisition, Golan the Wander revealed himself to be ignorant of the Paragons and Exemplars of Courage. 51	Navarr	The Navarr National Assembly agrees with the motion to recognise Navarr and Thorn as Exemplars of Ambition.	Elowen of Exile's End	Upheld - o
52	League	With reference to Judgement 17, due to the deaths of Leopold von Holberg and Callista Barossa, the priest so named to serve in Sarvos shall be: Vitória Barossa di Tassato Regario (Courage), Oberon of the Gilded Horn Carta (Loyalty), Josephine Joanna Andolini dei Liberi (The Way), Suta Blackbird (Pride)	Vitória Barossa di Tassato Regario	Upheld - o
		This judgement relates to the The sack of Sarvos winds of fortune event. The Civil Service noted the support given by the statement "I Aria Notturmo di Sarvos, Mayor of Caricomare support and encourage the citizenry of Sarvos to rise up against the Grendel. I have made the people of Sarvos and the Egregore aware of my position in this."
53	Prosperity	That the Senate should actively pursue opportunities for trade with all foreign nations. Trade with foreign nations helps the Empire prosper and facilitates the spreading of The Way to foreigners.	Vaurus Korppitkotka	Upheld - o
55	General	The eternal Sorin has actively barred the passage of 18,904 souls into The Labyrinth. We urge Conclave to declare enmity.	Sivar	Upheld 304 - 56
56	General	The religious rite of Excommunication is widely held to be damaging to the human soul and its progress through The Labyrinth. It would therefore be unvirtuous to enact the rite of Excommunication on a human soul even if a Writ of Excommunication has been passed.	Vitomir Grigorovich Vardov	Withd at requ of the raising priest

61	Varushka	The Varushkan National Assembly recognises the need our Senators had to appoint a General without going through the due process, which has been established in Varushka, due to the dire need for expediency. We implore our Senators to hold an election for the position as soon as is practicable.	Ezys	Upheld - 0
62	Varushka	That Yamiliach the Red Volhov of the Vorazi for his Courage on the battlefield and Loyalty to the Empire that cost him his life but saved the lives of many others should be recognised for his Virtue.	Vukomir Maryankovich Zverokaz	Upheld - 0
63	Varushka	It has been powerfully demonstrated that Imperial citizens in occupied territories are losing The Way. To reduce suffering and increase Virtue, we encourage priests to go and preach in occupied territories. We will not abandon our citizens to make exceptionally difficult choices without our guidance.	Elka Nadyanova Gremani	Upheld - 0

The Imperial Synod did not make the following Statements of Principle:

Number	Assembly	Statement of Principle	Priest	Outcome
10	Navarr	The Navarr National Assembly recognises that the role of Navarr Prelate, as defined by Judgement 6 on the Autumn Equinox of 379 YE, will be held by the citizen who holds the Voice of Barbs Sinecure.	Gerallt Brakensong	Not Upheld 22 - 52
20	General	Creation of new Synod power: Declaration of Guidance. If a citizen is found to have acted unvirtuous by inquisition they may be placed under a Declaration of Guidance naming the citizen and the Virtue(s) they acted contrary to. Any member of one of the named Virtue Assemblies may place Virtuous auras on the citizen or their possessions without risk of accusation of abuse of powers for a period of a year. A senate motion will be required to create this power.	Soratio i Del Toro	Not Upheld 191 - 277
33	General	Many of the Paragons and Exemplars have died in the pursuit of their Virtue. Permion and Isaella died for their Courage. Vardas died for his Vigilance. Chernobog and members of the Marked died for their Loyalty. Tian was permanently crippled for her Ambition. The First Empress died in battle for Her Empire. The willingness to sacrifice one's mortal life in the pursuit of their Virtue should be one of the Signs of the Paragon - the Sign of Martyrdom.	Isaac Carlino di Sarvos	Not Upheld 96 - 344

- Dagon of the Shattered Tower, Highguard
- Anwir Ruis Farkas, Navarr
- Ysabel of the Handful of Dust, The Brass Coast
- Dušan Otecovna Zlata of the Fellowship of the Tangled Thorns, Varushka
- Levitia of Endsmeet, Urizen
- Tanwyn Ankarien, Urizen
- Irada von Temeschwar, The League

Voting Record

For this summit the Civil Service attempted to track which priests in the Synod cast at least one vote on a judgment. This is intended to aid analysis on what proportion of members of the Synod do not vote on judgments. The Civil Service cannot guarantee the precise accuracy of these records, or that similar information will be available for any future summits.

At the start of the summit the voting total of the General Assembly was calculated to be 1220. The Civil Service noted a marked increase in both the proportion of the Synod who cast at least one vote and the number whose arrival was not anticipated in comparison to the previous summit. The final voting total of the General Assembly was calculated to be 1588.

At the end of the Spring Equinox 380YE the voting strength of the Virtue and national assemblies were estimated to be:

380YE Spring Equinox winds of fortune

Overview

Over the past three months, several events have occurred which are of significance to the Empire and may require a response from her champions. You can also read about the progress of the Empire's military campaigns here.

In each case, we've tried to tag the Winds of Fortune entry with the nations, or political bodies, to which it is most relevant. We've done this to help people who are interested only in events that are especially relevant to them. In no way are these tags intended to be exhaustive; the Empire is a complex place and very little happens in isolation.

Ian Horne has recorded a slightly tongue-in-cheek summary of the Winds of Fortune in audio form here.

Across the Seven Seas

- Navarr, Varushka (but see below)

A magical enchantment has settled on ships belonging to Navarr and Varushkan captains, leading them into dangerous situations but rewarding them with marvellous booty. You can learn about these supernatural adventures here. Note: Magicians and captains of other nations may also wish to take a look at this section which details an extended opportunity related to the peculiar scrolls the heralds of the Summer realm were distributing at the Winter Solstice.

Blossoms a Rose in the Deeps of My Heart

- Imperial Conclave; artists and entertainers; Night magicians; priests

The eternal Janon has opened up a regio in the woodlands of Astolat and invited Imperial citizens to visit it there. By opening the portal at the heart of a regio, rather than allowing access via the Hall of the Worlds, the eternal is making it possible for mundanes as well as magicians to meet with it. The eternal known as the Shadowed Flame is a creature of passionate intensity, and it is possible that the night may become a little wild. You can learn more about this opportunity here.

The Courageous Priest

- Imperial Synod; Highguard; potentially League, Dawn, and Navarr

The preacher Golan continues to spread his teaching about the First Empress and the primary importance of the virtue of Courage across Highguard and potentially beyond. Despite the efforts of the priests Yael and Nina, the Courage of the First Empress movement continues to gather strength. You can learn all about the developments here.

Dark Skies

- Imperial Conclave; Urizen; the League (Holberg), the Imperial Orcs and Wintermark (Skarsind)

Three celestial phenomena of note are described. The new star trailing behind the Wanderer; the fading of the Phoenix; and the empty skies over Holberg and Skarsind. You can learn about these phenomena and their implications here.

The Empire does not exist in isolation; it shares the world stage with five great nations of similar power, and has a handful of neighbours whose interests often impact or intertwine with its own. You can learn about the state of trade between the Empire - and a little bit about the international political situation - here.

Handful of Magic

- the Brass Coast and Urizen; Varushka and the Marches; the League (Tassato); and everyone interacting with the Bay of Catazar

A roundup of magical or unusual effects across the Empire including storms and magical life-giving waters in the Brass Coast and Urizen; a rash of strange births in the Marches and Varushka; fog on the brine; warped skies; and a crumbling castle. You can learn more about these phenomena here.

Of Tribute

- Imperial Conclave (among others)

Following the opportunity to offer tribute to a number of the eternal of the winter realm, heralds of the Bound King have delivered news of the boons secured by the various people invited to treat with them. You can learn about these supernatural boons here.

Reclaimers

- the League

The angry trees that have been assaulting Holberg for the last year have finally settled back into immobility again. Now, the civil service has been able to assemble a number of opportunities to deal with the damage done by the long occupation and the liberation. You can learn about these opportunities here.

The Sack of Sarvos

- the League; the Imperial Synod

The Grendel orcs have invaded the southernmost League city of Sarvos, and appear to be engaged in wide-spread and well-coordinated pillaging. You can learn about what the occupation means for the Empire here.

Seven Lords of Virtue

- Imperial Senate; the Brass Coast, the League, Urizen

The Asavean Plenum (the government of the Asavean Archipelago]] has placed a formal petition before the Imperial Senate asking for permission to construct a temple on the Bay of Catazar. In return, they will invite the Empire to build a temple dedicated to the Seven Lords of Virtue in Nemoria. While the petition has been placed before the Senate, the Plenum appears fascinated by the implications of the civilian commissioners created during the winter Solstice ... You can learn about this opportunity here.

Snow and Rain

- the League, the Brass Coast, the Marches, Imperial Orcs, Wintermark (Skarsind)

The recent winter has been especially harsh for the Empire, and now the Spring is shaping up to be just as difficult. Following the failure of the Marcher harvest last year, the heavy snow and freezing winds have made for a dreadful season especially in Skarsind where starvation has been a real possibility. Now the snow is melting ... leading to the threat of serious flooding in the southern Empire. It's not all bad - but for those citizens who live near the banks of the Vassa and the Scorrero in particular, there may be difficult (or rewarding) times ahead. You can learn all about this problem here.

Strange Fruit

- Imperial Synod; the Brass Coast

The Imperial Synod has been active in Segura, dealing with the problems caused by the presence of the Hierro clan orcs. That situation appears to have changed significantly over the last season. You can learn about the developments here.

A Throne of Blood

- Wintermark; Imperial Orcs

Thane Dogri Thulebane continues to occupy Crow's Ridge in Skarsind. The efforts of the Wintermark assembly to remove him have largely been unsuccessful. As the Spring Equinox draws near, he offers an invitation to treat with him to a select few. You can learn about this opportunity here.

Tree of Ice (Conjunction)

- any magician

An astronomantic conjunction of the Fountain heralds a significant effect on any magician who relies on the power of their magic to heal, purify, restore, or purge the ailments of their allies. It also has profound implications for covens who favour healing rituals - or those rituals that taint and sicken. You can learn about the effects of this conjunction here

Up On Whittle Hill

- The Marches

An isolated village in Freemoor reaches out to their cousins in the Marches after thirty years of separation. They have endured much, but now they seek to reconnect with the Empire. You can learn more about the village of Whittle here.

Ongoing Events and Resolutions

This is a roundup of ongoing events. Many Winds of Fortune have a "resolution" entry which indicates the outcome of the events described - especially those that offered opportunities for the Imperial Senate or imperial Synod. We generally only call out the ones that we think are especially relevant in this section.

Golden Trumpets

- Imperial Conclave

The eternal Meraud's challenge to the magicians of the Empire (which you can read about here is still ongoing but is due to end after the Spring Equinox. The rare opportunity for magicians to impress the Summer Archmage and win a potent boon from him requires the performance of the most powerful arcane projection. At the moment, agents of the Golden Wizard have declared that the current front runners are ritual covens from the Urizen Auric Horizon and Echostorm spire who performed a day magic effect of the fiftieth magnitude called Peerless Tracking of the Malevolent Magery.

Delayed diplomacy

- Imperial Senate, Brass Coast

Due to the severe weather in Casinea during the Winter Solstice, several diplomatic delegations (including those from the Druj, Thule, Axou, Faraden, Iron Confederacy, and even the Freeborn hakima) were unable to attend. The dreadful wind caused these delegations to break their journey and wait for another appropriate time to turn up. It is believed that these delegations will attend during the Spring Equinox. You can find some details of some of these delegations here, here, and here.

Frozen Mithril

- Wintermark, Imperial Bourse

In response to an opportunity to create a new mithril mine in Sermersuaq, the Imperial Senate has ordered work to begin as soon as possible. The new Bourse resource should be completed in time for the Autumn Equinox.

A selection of public works

- Imperial Synod, Imperial Military Council, the Marches, Wintermark, Imperial Orcs, Navarr

During the Winter Solstice, the Imperial Senate resolved to take advantage of a significant number of opportunities to improve specific territories. In Kallavesa for example the Senate decided to begin construction on both a major shrine dedicated to the memory of Empress Britta and a great work design to encourage pilgrims to visit the marshes where so many Wintermark heroes are laid to rest.

In Skarsind the Senate has commissioned a ministry to encourage human miners to work the rich mines of Gullhule. They have also resolved to open trading offices and trading posts in Skarsind and Hercynia to begin establishing the "crossroads of the north."

Work has also begun on a second fortification in Mournwold, taking advantage of the opportunity presented by the capture of a partially completed Jotun fortification. The project is likely to be completed shortly before the Summer Solstice - assuming the Empire retains control of the construction site.

Hearth Tithe

- The Marches, Wintermark

During the Autumn Equinox 379YE, both the Wintermark and Marcher assemblies threw their support behind the reintroduction of the Hearth Tithe. The Wintermark assembly named Ealstan of Stormspire to encourage the reintroduction of the practice, while the Marcher Assembly named James Appleseeder of Upwold. As a consequence, for the next year, every farm in the Marches and Wintermark will set aside a plot of land to grow medicinal herbs to help the war against the Jotun. Every farm produces a little less money, but provides the owner with useful herbs. You can learn more about the effects of the Hearth Tithe here.

Crows and Colleges

- Imperial Conclave, Imperial Military Council, Varushka

Following the peace treaty agreed with the Thule, several opportunities rose for the Imperial Senate to commission special projects in Varushka. As the Spring Equinox draws near, work is completed on the program of public works designed to rebuild the roads of Karsk. With the completion of this great work, all mines and forests in the territory of Karsk have received a boost to their productivity. Perhaps just as importantly, the Varushkan nation is now able to fully support a third Imperial army. With that in mind, the long process of mustering the new Iron Helm army has begun in Karsk and if it continues at the current rate will likely be completed in time for Winter.

Progress on the Icy Crag of the Eternal Sun in Volchitrava appears to have stalled, however. While a Summer regio has been raised with the patronage of Cathan Canae, the actual construction of the college is no farther forward. Likewise, while construction has begun in Mieriada on the Hearth of the Tempest, it is not clear how much progress has been made - it is not believed to be operating as a college of spring magic at this time.

Vyig resources

- the League

As mentioned here, in the confusion caused by the dreadful weather during the Anvil summit, the planned auction of vyig assets did not go ahead. It has been rescheduled for Spring 380YE.

380YE Spring Equinox winds of war

Overview

Ian Horne has recorded these winds of war as audio files, so you can listen to them. The playlist begins here

Fire on the Mountains

It begins - as so much does - with storms. Vicious winter storms raised by magic that roll in off the Bay of Catazar and lash the coast of Spiral. Great waves bound the coast of Apulus, and beat against the cliffs of Ateri. Thick, black clouds race across the horizon, and the frozen winds whip the hail and the sleet into stinging icy missiles. Yet for all their fury, the storms do not touch the thick preternatural fog that cloaks the bay. It undulates like a blanket as the waves rise and fall, but it does not break up. When a bolt of lightning strikes the water, the mist seems to catch fire burning with a crackling effulgence that races hither and yon before fading to nothing.

The waters of Spiral are further infused with life-giving essence. The hail, the sleet, the rain, the salt-water and the fresh; Spring healing magic flows through them all. It ripples across the icy walls of the frozen citadel raised in the hills of Ateri, where a garrison of one-eyed giants watches both east and west for Grendel aggression. Only the most calamitous of wounds are fatal; rarely do any of the soldiers fighting over this mountainous land die save through malice. Both human and orc benefit from the benediction of the life-giving waters.

Fighting past the adventurous Grendel forces in Redoubt, Dawnish forces come to join the campaign in Spiral. The Hounds of Glory charge north and east through Cinion and Ankra (avoiding Screed, and the black behemoth that lurks at its heart). Alongside the Dawnish march a host of eternal soldiers in crimson-and-gold livery. Sharp ears, spreading antlers, flowing manes, mithril-and-gold chain, and deadly spears. The cyclopean warriors defending the icy citadel curl their lips as the elfin host passes. The knights of Eleonaris glare back at the warriors of Cathan Canae, not bothering to conceal their anger. Imperial soldiers who fight alongside them can attest to their rage. The Imperial Conclave has declared their Queen to be an enemy of the Empire, after all. Bound by ancient oaths, they must fight when they are called forth. But they do not have to be happy about it. More than one of their human "comrades" is concerned about the legality of what they are doing; the knights of glory are inseparable from their mistress and the power of the ritual that calls them proscribed by law. It is likely the magistrates will investigate the situation that has led to three thousand of Eleonaris' troops marching alongside those of Dawn.

The knights of glory have ample opportunity to express their anger; the Hounds of Glory charge triumphantly down on the Grendel whenever the opportunity presents itself. The army unleashes its collective wrath against the orcs, seeking victory whatever the cost. The Eastern Sky strives to match their glorious example, engaging in their own overwhelming assault against the defences of Spiral's occupation force.

The Citadel Guard, the sentinels and war-magicians of Urizen, follow close behind. Wrapped in a mantle of supernatural power, they fight almost recklessly taking calculated risks to gain great rewards. They actively seek to be at the heart of the fray, and despite the danger in which they place themselves, their magic protects them. Wounds that might have been lethal even with the protection of the Spring enchantment turn out to be flesh wounds. Forces that might otherwise be overwhelmed by Grendel counter-attacks hold out until they can be relieved. The Citadel Guard fight valiantly, but inexplicably they suffer not a single fatality in three months.

The Northern Eagle, and the Green Shield can barely keep up with the other three. The Grendel have taken up defensive positions throughout the territory, readying themselves for the hammer blow of Imperial forces, but again and again they are driven back. The Empire does not have everything its own way; the Grendel forces expertly coordinate their defences with supernatural clarity. While their forces are spread out and outnumbered, the orc troops possess an almost instinctive intuition for what their fellows are doing, and their armies move with cool precision to slow the Imperial advance.

Some of the most brutal fighting of the campaign takes place in the valleys below Ossen's Spire in Ankra. At the gateway to Damakhan's Forge the Grendel have prepared makeshift defences and meet the Imperial forces in a pitched battle. At the height of the fighting, with the Citadel Guard in the vanguard, something unexpected happens. Whether some long-forgotten magic is disturbed, or whether it is some trick prepared by the Grendel is unclear, but a great wildfire sweeps across the battlefield consuming orc and human and elfin knight with equal hunger. Thanks to the healing magic in the waters the casualties are somewhat reduced, but nearly a thousand men, women, and orcs are slain or permanently maimed in the eldritch flames. The flames burn for a day and a night, and nothing dampens them. Only when they have run out of fuel do they flicker and die. The next day, the wind is full of choking ash and burnt cinders.

The fire was hot enough to melt stone and even metal, powerful enough to buckle and warp even mithril armour and weapons. Ossen's Spire is consumed by the flames, and there is significant damage to Damakhan's Forge as well. The slopes of Cinion are swept clean of trees and even the dark purple heather is reduced to blackened ruin. Paragons preserve those who were caught in the woodlands when the river of flame poured down the mountainside.

Only the Citadel Guard are untouched by the fire. It marks the end of the battle for Cinion - the Grendel forces flee east toward Ankra, and after a short respite the Imperials follow.

First Cinion falls to the Empire, then Ankra, and the Empire makes significant headway towards recapturing the mithril mines at Ossuary. There are casualties, of course, despite the power of the healing waters. Perhaps two-and-a-half thousand men and women and orcs fall, all told. While their wounds too severe even for the potent healing magic to save them, not all those who fall die immediately.

Indeed, some of them do not die at all.

Stories from the battlefields and the field hospitals of Northern Spiral speak of pale figures who move among those whose injuries place them beyond help. Wrapped in black or white robes over blackened armour they speak in quiet tones to the dying. Sometimes they offer a swift and painless death. Sometimes, the fallen rise from their deathbeds and accompany the pale figures into the darkness, never to be seen again. The Military Council has given leave to the servants of the Dark-Between-The-Stars to walk their battlefields and choose among the fallen those who might find a place in their mistresses' Grim Legion. The healing Spring enchantment means there are not many for them to choose from ... but there are enough.

Only among the Citadel Guard do these grim harbingers find no opportunity to claim the fallen for their cold-hearted queen. Where the Urizen sentinels march, the heralds turn to watch them, their faces bleak, empty, but above all patient.

Game Information

The Empire has captured the regions of Cinion and Ankra, and made some progress into Ossuary. The sea-storms will cease shortly before the Spring Equinox, but they will mean that any fleet based in Spiral will have suffered a small penalty to its production or fighting strength.

Ruins of Gray Charge

Three armies march to Reikos via the mountains of Redoubt. The Granite Pillar, the Wolves of War, and the Quiet Step. Their journey through Urizen is not uneventful. The remnants of a Grendel guerilla force in the southern hills and mountains target Imperial forces, arranging ambushes and destroying bridges and roads in an effort to restrict travel through Redoubt. Yet their impact is blunted by a potent spring enchantment laid over Redoubt, which heals all save the most lethal of injuries.

On reaching the Highborn territory, the Empire's armies focus their attention on clearing out the barbarian orcs who still inhabit the westernmost regions. There is some resistance, but it is scattered and disorganised. Without the influence of the Stone Toad, the orc warriors seem incapable of proper coordination. Still, clearing them out is not a straightforward task - they have had plenty of time to prepare their defences.

The Quiet Step lead the way, launching an overwhelming assault against the scattered orc settlements built amid the ruins of the fallen chapter houses. The Granite Pillar are a little more cautious - at least compared to the Navarr.

Accompanied by wagon raiders, the Wolves of War focus on plundering stolen Imperial wealth from the defeated orcs. The tactics of the League do not go unquestioned; there is little doubt that the wealth they are claiming from the scattered orc strongholds was stolen first from the people of Reikos. There are a few scattered reports of angry exchanges between champions of the Granite Pillar and the looters and wagon raiders supporting the Wolves of War.

As in Spiral, there are supernatural agents in Reikos. Wherever the Imperial armies fight they are accompanied by quiet, dour-faced agents of the Queen of Silence. They lurk patiently around the outskirts of the battles, watching. Now and again there are reports of them approaching a fallen orc and speaking in quiet tones with them. The fallen orcs disappear shortly thereafter, taken by the emissaries of the winter realm for their own purposes.

Over the course of the campaign, the Imperial forces clear most of the orcs from Gray Charge, and make significant headway in Tamarbode ... but they do not complete the liberation of Reikos. Parts of Tamarbode, especially the mysterious Sign of Tamar, are still in barbarian hands. It will take at least another season to completely remove the lingering barbarian presence.

Partly the slow progress is a result of the ever-present aura of fear the Druj have left behind them. Partly it is a result of the more cautious tactics employed by the League and Highborn armies - had they followed the Navarr lead there is no doubt that the last of the orcs would have been driven out of Reikos.

Game Information

Imperial forces have conquered Gray Charge and made some progress in taking Tamarbode. All three armies have suffered some casualties for passing through Redoubt, although they are reduced due to the presence of the Rivers of Life enchantment on Redoubt.

Under a Crimson Sky

Crusade! Say the word softly, and see the banners raised in the Dawnish mind's eye. With the Hounds of Glory and the Eastern Sky fighting in distant Urizen, and the Gryphon's Pride not yet ready to march, it falls to the Golden Sun to raise those banners over Dawnguard. Into the Barrens they march, the first Dawnish army in the Barrens in generations.

Alongside them come the Towerjacks of Holberg, and the Varushkan Golden Axe. They strike their camp in the shadow of the Towers of the Dawn and prepare to defend the Dawnish territory. The crusade has had the desired effect, it seems. The armies are joined by some six thousand Dawnish troops lead by independent captains, and one band of Imperial Orcs. The auxiliary forces are split roughly half-and-half between directly supporting the Golden Sun and garrisoning the Towers of the Dawn.

The armies are ordered to avoid engagements with the barbarian orcs as much as possible, merely attempting to slow their advance. There is some dissent from the Dawnish captains outraged by the inglorious defensive strategy, but the orders are clear. Give ground, do not engage except where necessary, let the enemy come to us.

And come they do. The armies of the indigenous orcs attack with passionate zeal, throwing themselves into an all-out assault against the Towers of the Dawn and the Imperial defenders. Even though they are significantly outnumbered, they fight desperately; one last-ditch attempt to try and claim Dawnguard. They are still doing their best to avoid unnecessary casualties; in some ways the presence of the Imperial forces makes this easier. It is much easier to tell the civilians from the warriors when they are arrayed in a crusaders panoply.

Just over a fortnight after the end of the Winter Solstice, just as the fighting is beginning to heat up, the unexpected occurs.

A malign miasma falls over the Barrens. It comes without warning; one morning the twilight before sunrise is tinged with a deep, malevolent crimson. The rain that falls is oily, heavy, thick with the implication of sickness and dread. Corruption creeps into the water. A thin film of foulness covers everything from breakfast wine to garden ponds to fountains to the bee-painted waterskins of the Varushkans. The rivers run with death, and uncleanness. Blood flows sluggishly; injuries do not heal. No wound is suffered save that it festers, turns black. The soldiers of Holberg mutter with grim certainty. They have had a great deal of experience with these conditions, having fought for decades under the periodic taint of this particular curse.

It strikes both sides; the knights of Dawn and the barbaric orcs feel its sting in equal measure. Yet it is the barbarians who suffer the lion's share of casualties. The Imperial tactic of withdrawing back to the defences in the face of orc aggression minimizes losses, at the same time as the twisted enchantment causes the deaths of so many who might otherwise have survived.

The orcs fight on as best they can, but they make little progress against the Imperial defenders. As the year draws to a close, the noble estates of Dawnguard are littered with the corpses of dead orcs.

As the Spring Equinox comes closer, rumours of fighting in the south begin to percolate through the ranks in Dawnguard. A force of Navarr have attacked the orcish supply trains, burning several villages belonging to the Great Forest orcs, slaughtering their inhabitants, then fading back into the woods. Speculation suggests this is the work of special forces attached to the Quiet Step. Whatever else it achieves, it almost certainly puts paid to any suggestion of an alliance between the Navarr and the Barrens orcs.

The Imperial forces in Dawnguard have held off the orcish attack, but it was a close-run thing. The presence of the malign magic spread across the Barrens has resulted in significant casualties - to the orcs. The defensive orders of the Imperials mean that they have suffered perhaps a fifth as many casualties as the Barrens orcs, and a significant amount of the damage inflicted has been absorbed by the white granite and weirwood of the Towers of the Dawn - the fortification takes damage that might otherwise have killed over six hundred Imperial soldiers.

Game Information

Nobody has gained any ground - the Barrens orcs still have control of a portion of Dawnguard. It is possibly worth pointing out at this time that one of the things that has saved Imperial lives has been the damage to the Towers of the Dawn - damage to fortifications tends to represent broken walls rather than dead soldiers - and the apparent reticence of the orcs to murder unarmed civilians.

This Far, No Further

This winter in the Marches is harsh. In the wake of the disastrous harvest, spare food is in short supply. Belts are tightened. Compromises made.

Nearly forty-thousand Imperial soldiers fight in the Mournwold, supported by perhaps another five thousand troops lead by independent captains. They outnumber their barbaric opponents nearly two-to-one. The Jotun have a fortification at Southmoor - but the Marchers control a fortification of their own on the Greensward, and work has already begun on a second castle in Ore Hills.

The Valiant Pegasus prepare to unleash hell against the Jotun fortification in the ruins of old Sarcombe, in Southmoor. They bring up catapults, siege towers, and ladders. The Seventh Wave is ready to support them, the Tusks and the Strong Reeds ready to exploit any weakness the engines reveal.

The Fire in the South, fleeing Liathaven, join the rampaging Summer Storm and the more cautious Winter Sun in attacking Jotun positions across the Mournwold.

At the same time their fellow Freeborn of the Red Wind Corsairs set about gathering as much wealth from the Jotun encampments as they can, being reasonably cautious not to steal too much from the human farmers and "land owners" who labour under the orc yoke ... although it is not always easy to tell who is an oppressed Imperial citizen and who is a treacherous collaborator with the barbarian forces. There are still more human warriors fighting alongside the Jotun than anyone on the Imperial side is comfortable admitting to.

The Empire's strategy is straightforward. While the Highborn and the Marchers attack the castle at Sarcombe, the rest of their forces strike at the Jotun in Freemoor and Alderley. The outcome appears predetermined.

Unfortunately, the Imperial strategy does not count on the rage of the Jotun.

Orc reinforcements have marched uncontested through the forests of Liathaven to join the Jotun armies falling back before the Imperial advance. After their stinging defeat in Ore Hills, the barbarians rally under a banner surmounted by the massive skull of an elder mandowla.

These new forces do not fall back. On the contrary, they draw a line, and then they hold it.

For three months, the Empire throws everything it has in the Mourn at the Jotun armies. For three months, they take everything the Imperials have to offer, and hand it back to them.

Lead by a mountainous orc wielding a two-handed warhammer the Empire batters itself against the Jotun defences and makes absolutely no headway. The barbarians fight without quarter. This is unsurprising, perhaps, given that the Winter Sun in particular take special pleasure in murdering any Jotun that fall in their hands, and the Summer Storm slaughter any enemy - orc or human - who gets in their way. And there is more than enough blood spilled for even the thirstiest Imperial Orc.

The Jotun seem to burn with an absolute confidence that they cannot be defeated. Oh, their warriors fall in battle but those who do not fall soon return to the fray. As near as the scouts of the Seventh Wave can tell, the new Jotun forces include many thralls - human and orc alike - trained in the medicinal arts, and even some magician-healers. They do everything they can to help the Jotun hold against the Imperial advance.

The Unconquered also deliver unsettling reports that the Jotun appear to have a surprising amount of intelligence of their own, at least as regards the composition, positioning, and strength of the Imperial forces.

The Jotun armies are further supported by perhaps two thousand elite champions - warbands drawn it seems from across the western jarldoms. They take risks that even the bravest orc soldier might eschew, and time and again they seek out the heroic captains of the Empire, seemingly to test their mettle on the field of battle.

Thousands of Jotun orcs fall. On some days, the Imperials must practically wade through orc bodies and blood. The moors are stained crimson with sanguine excess. Even the clarity with which the Valiant Pegasus and the Tusks plan their strategies cannot overcome the Jotun defence - perhaps because it is so straightforward. Nothing brilliant, nothing complex, is being attempted. The Jotun have simply decided that they will not move and their glorious stand against the Imperials meets no counter.

The fields are scattered with the dead and the dying, and between them pick the chosen of the Black Dog. They are untouched by the warriors of either side, walking with the protection of the military council when they are among the Imperials, and under some protection of their own when they walk among the Jotun. Now and again they stop, and speak to one of the fallen. Sometimes, they raise up one of the dying and escort them from the battlefield. Only if someone tries to impede them in their strange duty do they fight, revealing a ruthless, supernatural skill. The Jotun make no attempt to bar their way, and after the first Imperial Orc tries to stand between one and the Jotun she has chosen, no Imperial gets in their way, either. Those who leave a battlefield with the black-clad, pale-skinned emissaries of the Queen of Silence are not seen again.

As the Spring Equinox draws closer, the leaders of the Imperial forces must face the cold fact that they have achieved nothing in this cold, bitter winter ... nothing save a slaughter on an almost unprecedented scale.

Nearly three thousand Imperial troops will never fight again. Yet the Jotun defence has cost them at least twice that many of their own forces.

Was it worth it? Was it heroism, or insanity? It hardly matters.

Those who fought under the mandowla banner have paid a heavy price, but by the end of the harsh winter, the Empire has gained not one square-foot more of Mournish soil than they had when the Winter started.

Game Information

The glorious Jotun forces have held firm in the Mournwold. Both sides have taken significant casualties - but the Empire has not made any gains in the territory this season.

Three Swords

The Western Forest

Jotun forces secure Liathaven. They do not do so entirely without opposition. There are some reports of pitched battles in the north between orcs and what appear to be a force of pale, grim, human (?) legionaries who show no signs of Navarr allegiance. They do little to stop the orcs recovering the territory the Freeborn claimed before the Winter Solstice, and there is little reliable information about who they were or where they came from.

There is some Navarr resistance in the south, but again how much and how effective is not clear. The entire territory is in the uncontested hands of the Jotun. No more Navarr refugees come south into Kahraman. A grim silence has fallen over Liathaven.

Perhaps the Navarr and the Freeborn scouts deep in the lost forests of Liathaven know more; but if they do they are not telling. Not yet.

The Northern Marshes

On the shores of the Westmere stands Westerhal, home to the small fleet of Kallavesi boats that keep the coast safe from Jotun raiders. Shortly after the Winter Solstice it becomes clear that Westerhal is not entirely up to the task. What works against a few raiders is no match for a significant force of Jotun. The decades-old call of the people of Westerhal for a fortification on the shores of the Gullet seems almost prescient in the face of the orc troops marching out of the west.

They come cautiously, but implacably, spreading south and east from a beach head on the western coast. With them march several warbands of Jotun champions, proud and terrible, who seek out the bravest of the Winterfolk defenders to test their mettle. Each time they come to a hall, they offer the inhabitants the choice - to join the Jotun as warriors or to lay down their arms and become thralls. Few take their offer. Those who do not are honoured with a warrior's death, buried, and then the Jotun move on.

In three months, the Jotun have conquered perhaps half of the West Marsh and show no signs of stopping. Westerhal is their target, but after that nothing will stand between them and Rundahl should they wish to strike at the heart of the Wintermark nation.

The Southern Hills

A massive force of Jotun strikes into Kahraman from the forests of Liathaven. Estimates vary, but it is believed that as many as thirty thousand orcs have poured out of the forests into the Cinnabar hills. They strike with great force, targeting first Serra Damata and then Serra Briante. They do not offer the Freeborn who stand between them and their prize the Choice, but neither do they slaughter those who flee before them. Those who try and stand against them are shown no mercy. Their treatment of those who try to fight is very different to their treatment of the Navarr - they are treated with a modicum of respect and buried, at least.

In Serra Damata, the Jotun encounter the first of three fortresses. A great squat tower of smooth glacial ice and rough black iron appears amidst the hills above the Damatian Cliffs. Hulking inhuman soldiers garrison the walls, each appearing as an eight-foot-tall orc wrapped in thick fur. From head to foot they are marked with dull blue tattoos and spiral scars, and their eyes are the vibrant blue of a clear winter sky. Each is armed with a twelve-foot barbed spear of polished bone, and their voices rumble like a tide of snow in distant peaks. They are knights of Cathan Canaë drawn along with the tower from her frozen realm by Imperial magic.

They give the Jotun pause - but only for a moment. Then the barbarians smash the citadel to pieces, send its defeated guardians back to the Lady of the Frost, and claim the Damatian Cliffs and the hills and orichalcum mines of Serra Damata for themselves. The Jotun are not focused entirely on their attack. Some of the orcs from the northern Jotun kingdom are more interested in plundering the Freeborn mines and the white granite quarries of Damata. Others stay behind to establish a camp within the broken walls of the town of Damata, while the rest push forward into Serra Briante, aiming straight at the Great Mine.

Here they encounter a second citadel, a monolithic fortress of ice and granite supported by troops from Fort Braydon, blocking their approach not only to the mithril mine but also to the town of Briante. The force of the mighty Jotun charge falters a little in the face of the glacial walls, and their attack eventually falls back to defensive positions above the valley. Without the two magical citadels, it is likely that both Serra Damata and Serra Briante would have fallen to the Jotun in a single stroke.

In a tragic twist of fate, several of the settlements inhabited by Navarr displaced by the original Jotun invasion lie in the part of the valley claimed by the Jotun. The orcs treat these settlements as they have the steading and stridings of Liathaven. Without mercy.

Game Information

The Jotun have uncontested control of Liathaven, and have made significant progress towards establishing supply lines into Kallavesa.

Their southern force has claimed Serra Damata, the town of Damata, and the Damatian Cliffs. They have also plundered an undisclosed amount of the white granite that might otherwise have gone to Jeremiah of the Cenotaph (the Highborn seat holder). They have captured the frozen citadel raised in this territory, but luckily it will have returned whence it came by the time the Spring Equinox rolls round. The Jotun have also taken perhaps a fifth of Serra Briante.

Salt and Glass

Shortly after the Winter Solstice work begins in Bocche on the College of the Liberated. There are rumours that the decision to build the college near Trivento, rather than in Sarvos proper, is due to some desire to help "revitalise" the fading town. Others suggest more cynically that it is an attempt to prevent too many incomprehensible orc slaves arriving in Sarvos.

A little over six weeks ago, the first ships arrived on the shores of Sarvos bearing orcs.

Unfortunately, they were not the orcs everyone was expecting ...

Out of the blue, the Grendel launch a naval invasion of the island of Cigno. Their ships disgorge thousands of orc troops into the streets of the city. There is almost no warning - the ships are cloaked by the sinister fog that has covered the bay of Catazar for the last six months, and they seem to have little difficulty avoiding - or sinking - any Imperial ships between them and their destination. They strike with absolute confidence, and it is clear that they seem to know that there are no significant forces in a position to prevent their conquest of the islands.

Chaos ensues. The city of Sarvos itself falls to the overwhelming force of the barbarians within a little less than a week - although scattered resistance continues. The citizens fear the worst. Some try to flee to the mainland ... and the Grendel make little effort to prevent them from doing so.

An anticipated wave of murder and destruction does not materialise. Indeed, those Grendel captains who come ashore seem almost cordial.

Not so their savage troops, especially those fighting under the banner of the snarling dog. Having secured the city, they ruthlessly set about plundering the riches of Sarvos. The libraries of Diora University are not spared, nor are the treasures of the Capodomus cathedral, nor the businesses of the rebuilt Caricomare. Galleries are raided, museums looted, banks stripped of their valuables. Special care is taken to pillage the remains of the Alvetti estates, and the tomb of Empress Giselle. Observers (which includes a few magicians) are certain that the Grendel looters are under the effect of a potent spell, most likely a day magic enchantment, that allows them to effortlessly coordinate their merciless looting. No treasure, it seems, is safe from their avaricious gaze.

Only the embassies are left alone. The Suranni barricade their gates but the Grendel make no effort to breach them. The Asaveans are much more sanguine. Their ambassador meets one of the Grendel captains in the formal gardens and makes it clear that any attack against the embassy will be considered an act of war. The ambassador and the orc discuss the matter politely over iced tea while outside the walls the orc warriors help themselves to the riches of the jewelled city.

Anyone who tries to resist the Grendel is either executed and their bodies left where they fall, or clapped in irons and dragged away to languish in the hold of a slave ship. Those who do not try to get in the way of the orcs are largely left unmolested. The Grendel appear much more interested in securing as much of the wealth of Sarvos as possible, than in slaughtering its people or burning its buildings.

With their control of the island of Cigno secured, some of the Grendel forces expand their interest to the isles of Uccelini. They avoid many of the fortified estates and go straight for the docks of Glass Point. There are pitched battles in the streets, but the smugglers and captains are no match for the disciplined Grendel forces.

As the Spring Equinox draws clear, the sea-serpent banners of the Grendel snap and dance above the bejewelled spires of Sarvos.

Game Information

The Grendel have attacked Sarvos, conquering the island of Cigno - where the jewelled city stands - and claiming it for their own. They have also made significant headway towards conquering Uccelini, although most of their attention there has been focused on controlling Glass Point.

This unexpected attack has taken everyone by surprise; it is likely to have a profound impact not only on the League but on the entire Empire. Further information about the implications of the Grendel occupation will be revealed in Winds of Fortune.

380YE Summer Solstice Speaker's Notes

Question - title for Construct conservatory for the Anvil Hospital motion?

Status of this sinecure is unclear - the destruction of the Spire of Twisting Shadows may have destroyed this sinecure.

Question : how to destroy a enemy spy network?

A: You'll need to find it first.

Question - Possibilities to help the people of Mierkarova survive the dreadful meteorite...? Evacuation of a territory is something the Synod could encourage - a declaration from the General Assembly or appropriate National Assembly could inspire a Wind of Fortune next event to allow more concrete responses (the comet is due to strike some time after Autumn equinox).

Question - How do we operate trade embargoes, as the foreigners do to us?

Senate motion we think, suspect it costs, but how - it may be one of the levers to move other nations from barbarian to foreigner? Basically... Senate motion, specified as usual, which lowers imperial income in appropriate regions (usually ports), and lowers foreign nation income. It is worth noting that foreign nations can still trade with other foreign nations so the impact will be significant, but not dramatic/catastrophic.

Question - Can the power to choose where to assign the guerdong be assigned to the quartermaster? We are discussing this in great detail. Currently, it would be possible to amend the power of the Quartermaster General to allow them to define who will receive the guerdon down to specific armies, fortifications, or spy networks. Granting them this power is a constitutional motion that would require ratification - because it represents a significant shift in power from the nations to the Imperial authorities.

To give the Senate rather than the military council the power to restrict who gets the guerdon would have greater constitutional implications and might represent an unconstitutional level of influence of the armies of the Empire for the Senate. Constitution court can't reach a decision and may have to adjourn for some time.

It would be easy for them to give someone else the power to set the level of the Guerdon - in general the Senate can give their own powers away (or retrieve them), they can't take the powers off other houses.

Question - What would be the costings for a realmswood garden?

A small permanent garden will need three doses of realmsroot, 3 wains of weirwood, a senate motion, 6 crowns or an "expertnavarri herbalist" perhaps called Brennan Brokenheart and will form a sinecure and imperial title. It will produce five doses per season... only placeable.in Miaren, Hahnmark or Upwold.

Question - Would it be possible to change the election of the master of the mint to be open to all imperial citizens.

Yes, following the rules for re-allocation of a bourse seat..

Synod Judgments

At the Summit, the following judgments were made by the Assemblies of the Synod:

Number	Assembly	Judgment	Raised By	Outcome
1	General	The General Assembly supports the holding of a Symposium at the Autumn Equinox 380YE, for the priests of the Synod and any guests the assemblies choose to invite to speak and debate matters of Virtue, Doctrine and spiritual ontology. This relates to the Symposium wind of fortune.	The Civil Service	Upheld 956 - 10
2	Courage	Appointment of the Cardinal	The Civil Service	Levitia of Urizen was appointed
3	Wisdom	Appointment of the Cardinal	The Civil Service	Agnetha De Rondell was

			Service	reappointed
4	Nine	Appointment of the Imperial Inquisitor	The Civil Service	Ephron of Highguard was appointed
5	General	Rewarding of 5 Thrones for the purchase of liao and other accoutrements for use of the Seer of the Gateway's duties. As a power of the Seer of the Gateway this Judgement passes without a vote.	Livia Cascade	Upheld automatically
8	Courage	The Inquisition of Senator of Kahraman: Maher i Zaydan i Riqueza and Senator for Madruga: Anwar i Del-Toro i Riqueza for the aiding and abetting of the construction of the heathen Asavean idols. To be held at House De Rondell at 1:30pm	Eleanor De Rondell	Upheld 174 - 0
9	Prosperity	It has been brought to my attention that Achilles of Damakan's Forge demonstrated signs of being an Exemplar of Prosperity. I propose to call him to Inquisition to determine the Truth of this.	Vaurus Korppitkotka	Upheld 122 - 22
10	Nine	Condemnation of Romeo Des Sarvos for distributing the heretical document "The True Way" which preaches heresy against The Doctrine of Seven and blasphemy against Ambition, Wisdom and Vigilance.	The Ophelia	Upheld 5 - 0
11	Pride	Inquisition. Horsa of Wintermark was revoked on accusations of dereliction of duty. I wish to summon him to an inquisition to establish the truth of the matter at 8pm Saturday of the summer summit 380YE at the Hub.	Ephrael	Upheld 92 - 0
12	General	The Chaplain Consular exercises his power of rewarding to reward Hywel Summercrow to undertake the tasks of his offices, to the value of five Thrones.	Hywel Summercrow	Upheld automatically
13	Vigilance	The revocation of Irada von Temeschwar, Cardinal of Vigilance.	Tormund	Not Upheld 112 - 162
15	General	Rewarding. Tabor the Fool requests 5 Thrones from the Virtue fund with which to purchase mana and liao to continue investigations into the fate of the soul on becoming a herald or eternal.	Tabor the Fool	Upheld 623 - III
16	The Way	Inquisition. The assembly calls Brother Abraham of the Constitutional Court to answer questions regarding the constitutionality of Synod Judgement 36 (of the Spring Equinox 380YE) at a time before the end of the Summer Solstice convenient for all parties.	Lucifaro Figlio del Mattino	Upheld 103 - 0

		The public record of the Synod records the wording of Judgement 36 of the Spring Equinox 380YE "At present Imperial Orc Preachers cannot join a Virtue Assembly due to being unable to be dedicated. This should change to allow them to join a Virtue Assembly based on a testimony. It would be virtuous for the Senate to change the law to allow this."
19	General	Excommunication of the Synod of the Sumaah Republic for the practice of False Virtues. Dogmatism used for politicians to defend ignorance of the world and narrow, flawed understanding of The Way of Virtue. Cowardice in refusing the request of Imperial Orc preachers to send a delegation to meet them, fearful that this would shatter their prejudices against these virtuous Imperial citizens.	Dietrich Elias der Holburghan	Not upheld 120 - 589 Greater Majority was not achieved.
20	The Way	Inquisition of some guy in a blue shirt and black vest identified by Arkat Ishatha for being dedicated to a false virtue and who would not provide a name.	Wyn of Exile's End	Upheld 125 - 0
22	Loyalty	Inquisition of Asenath of Felix's Watch regarding her virtuous actions. To be held at ipm at the Suns of Couros tent, Highguard. Escalation of Judgement 20. Condemnation of the Imperial Citizen of Reikos who gave the name of "Lisabetta" when questioned. For heresy, claiming there are not 7 virtues, but only one truth and for being unrepentant when questioned. When brought to inquisition he was under a dedication of fear, this was removed before the start of the inquisition.	Sister Meredith	Upheld 92 - 0
23	The Way		Wyn	Upheld 139 - 0
24	General	Rewarding. A judgement to award the Marches the sum of the Virtue Fund to contribute towards The Great Works of "The Imperial Bread Basket" this would be in recognition of The Loyalty shown by the Marcher farmers to the Empire by the continued supply towards the Imperial armies despite hardship of curses and poor harvest. For more information please contact Robert Hawcombe, priest of Loyalty, or any Marcher Senator.	Robert Hawcombe	Not upheld 226 - 349
26	Pride	This calls Gerard de Lusignan to Inquisition at 4pm Saturday in the spoke tent (formerly known as Hub Two).	Lady Josephine Novarion	Upheld 72 - 0
28	Pride	Escalation of Judgement 26. Condemnation of Gerard De Lusignan for idolatry and	Lady Josephine	Upheld 90 - 0

		blasphemy.	Novarion
32	General	Rewarding. To Give Bonewall Cole the sum of two Thrones in order to buy supplies for investigation of the orcish soul, working with the New Scions of Atun.	Bonewall Cole	Upheld 378 - 80
34	General	Recognition. To recognise Thorn, one of the founders of the Navarr nation, as an Exemplar of Ambition. In his Ambition to combat the Vallorn, he displayed the following signs of the Exemplar. Legacy: The spring ritual of Dance of Navarr and Thorn, which protects the Empire still. Inspiration: The Navarr nation follows this example to this day. Benevolence: This sacrifice protected and benefited the nations that became the Empire. Pilgrimage: Thorn (alongside Navarr) were the first to walk the Trods. This judgement is an escalation of Judgement 50 from the Spring Equinox 380YE raised by Madog of Exile's End before the Ambition Assembly. The Civil Service acknowledges the letter provided by Elowen that confirmed Madog's request for the Judgement to be escalated on his behalf.	Elowen of Exile's End	Upheld 484 - 40
36	Wisdom	Inquisition regarding the actions of Andreas Grimani involving Cathan Canae and Eleonaris. Inquisition to be held on Sunday of the Summer Solstice at 1:30pm in the House Orzel tent in Dawn.	Sariel	Upheld 70 - 0
44	General	Rewarding of 20 Thrones from the Virtue Fund for labour and resource purchased to build a temple of the Way in Asavea to bring truth and counsel to followers there. Judgement was withdrawn by the raising priest following confirmation of the theft from the Imperial Hub including the 45 Thrones raised for the Virtue Fund by the sale of the True Liao dose at the public auction.	Vitor di Mestra	Withdrawn by raising priest 297 - 200
45	General	Inquisition. The Chaplain Consular exercises his power to call an Imperial Ambassador, to call Lukash Biessek von Temeschwar to answer questions relating to the provision of military aid provided by the Iron Confederacy during recent military operations in Sarvos. To occur at 20:45 on Saturday of the Summer Solstice 380YE. Judgement 49 is left blank in respect of the unrecorded names of those who sacrifice themselves in the defence of the Empire. May their Virtue speed them through the Labyrinth.	Hywel Summercrow	Upheld automatically.

52	General	Rewarding of 20 Thrones towards the building of Courage Cathedral in Astolat, Dawn. This Cathedral is much needed because the prevalent malign aura which is endangering the Virtues of our nation. This is a matter of great emergency. For the Glory of the Empire.	Gawaine de Orzel	Withdrawn by raising priest 398 - 84
		Judgement was withdrawn by the raising priest following confirmation of the theft from the Imperial Hub including the 45 Thrones raised for the Virtue Fund by the sale of the True Liao dose at the public auction.
53	General	To grant 30 Thrones from the Virtue Fund towards the Empire-Wide coronation celebrations. The bulk of the costs are being met by private donations but we believe this endeavour should be supported by the Synod also. It will lead to lasting benefits for our Empire This relates to the Raise a glass wind of fortune.	Astrid Fjellrevening Rezia di Tassato	Upheld 480 - 70

Statements of Principle

The Imperial Synod made the following Statements of Principle:

Number	Assembly	Statement of Principle	Priest	Outcome
6	Navarr	The Navarr National Assembly recognises the sacrifice needed by our armies to retake Liathaven and the Pride retaking Liathaven will bring to the nation. We urge the entire nation to unite behind our generals and ensure the fight is as swiftly as possible taken to the Jotun barbarians. Those who sacrificed their lives at Alwin's Stand and places unremembered must be honoured and we praise the Loyalty of Navarri who have the Courage to fight alongside the Black Thorns and the Quiet Step This relates to A banner of Thorns wind of fortune. We further encourage them to make written copies of these and take them to museums, shrines, temples and churches, so that it is preserved for pilgrims to come.	Azekah	Upheld 92 - 0

43	Courage	The Assembly of Courage would like to recognise the Courage of Asenath in battle that she displayed this spring. With clarity of pure Courage she charged the Grendel besides generals, although she herself is a magister. She struck down the first Grendel and made another flee from her Courageous display of bravery. When the battle turned, she inspired others to Courage rallying them to the fallen Grimaldi family. Seeing the Tangled Thorns and Suns of Couros fallen, her Courage gave her the clarity of purpose to reach them and bring their bodies, living or dead, back to the Sentinel Gate. Voting Record

For this summit the Civil Service attempted to track which priests in the Synod cast at least one vote on a judgment. This is to intended to aid analysis on what proportion of members of the Synod do not vote on judgments. The Civil Service cannot guarantee the precise accuracy of these records, or that similar information will be available for any future summits.

At the start of the Summer Solstice 380YE the voting total of the General Assembly was calculated to be 1552 with 131 priests.

The final voting total of the General Assembly was calculated to be 1818 with 156 priests.

At the end of the Summer Solstice 380YE the voting strength of the Virtue and national assemblies were estimated to be:

380YE Summer Solstice winds of fortune

Overview

Over the past three months, several events have occurred which are of significance to the Empire and may require a response from her champions. You can also read about the progress of the Empire's military campaigns here.

In each case, we've tried to tag the Winds of Fortune entry with the nations, or political bodies, to which it is most relevant. We've done this to help people who are interested only in events that are especially relevant to them. In no way are these tags intended to be exhaustive; the Empire is a complex place and very little happens in isolation.

As always, how much or how little of this information you choose to know in character is up to you. Part of the purpose of Winds of Fortune is to maintain the illusion of the Empire as a living, breathing place where things happen - and to make players aware of things their characters 'should' know based on what their roleplaying says they have been doing for the past three months.

Many winds of fortune open with a short section of in-character text. In all cases, these pieces are intended to help create an atmosphere and provide a little entertainment. Where they contain opinions, those are the opinions of the fictional people depicted - and where they contain information or rumours the assumption is that the reader will create their own context for that information or gossip. They're mostly just a bit of fun and they tend not to contain anything vital to the understanding of the wind of Fortune.

Without further ado then.

A Banner of Thorns

- Navarr

The Black Thorns are in Liathaven, fighting to reclaim the Navarr territory from the Jotun. Their presence suggests certain opportunities for the Navarr, and perhaps for the Empire. You can learn about them here.

Blackest Night

- Imperial Conclave; Varushka; inhabitants of Skarsind, Holberg, Necropolis, Bregasland, and Segura

The nameless red star is getting larger in a deeply worrisome fashion. The Phoenix has faded so badly it is starting to get difficult to remember quite why it was so important; and over Skarsind, Holberg, Bregasland, Segura and Necropolis the stars are going out ... You can learn about these three peculiar celestial phenomena here.

O Rose Thou Art Sick

- Inhabitants of Astolat, Casinea, Tassato, Redoubt

Curses. If you are an inhabitant of Astolat (especially one with a military unit), Tassato (especially a magician), Casinea (especially a farmer), or Redoubt (especially the owner of a massive castle), you probably ought to read this page.

The Other Empress

- the League, Highguard, Imperial Senate

When the Grendel launched their cowardly sneak attack on Sarvos, they looted many priceless treasures. One of their targets was the tomb of Empress Giselle at the Alvetti estates. They robbed the tomb, but the true prize - the body and personal effects of the Empress - were saved by Imperial heroes. Now, on the eve of the coronation of the twentieth Throne, a decision needs to be made about where the sixteenth will be laid to rest. You can learn more about this situation here.

The Prime Colour of the World

- Everyone in the Empire, especially briars and people from Holberg

The Hallow of the Green World has been raised over the Empire by the Sherard Hunters of Wintermark. Its touch is felt through all ten nations, but it has had a particularly profound effect on Holberg. You can learn about it here.

A Question of Provenance

- Imperial Synod, Highguard, Imperial Conclave

In addition to everything else going on in Reikos, decisions about how to deal with the more esoteric plants and fungi growing in the territory need to be made. The onus falls on the Imperial Synod, and you can learn more about the situation here. You can also learn about the general situation in Reikos here, and about the influence of Golan and Yael here.

Raise A Glass

- Imperial Senate, Throne

Traditionally, the coronation of an Empress is followed by Empire-wide celebrations. For many citizens, the most important part of those celebrations are the massive parties held throughout the nations - parties which need to be paid for. But for the more politically savvy, the most significant part of those celebrations is the Throne's celebratory message - the first formal address to the people of the Empire that often sets the tenor of their reign. You can learn more about these celebrations here.

Rebirth in Reikos

- Imperial Synod, Highguard

Yael and Brother Jared come to Reikos to counter the teachings of the heretic Golan, and to speak of the Land Without Tears. Their arrival coincides with what some are hailing as a miracle that potentially has profound implications for the Imperial Synod. You can learn more about this event here. You can learn more about the situation in Reikos here, and here.

A Season of Mushrooms

- Highguard

A wave of transformation is sweeping across Reikos as the eternal Llofir is unleashed. You can learn about some of the extremely peculiar goings on in Reikos this season here. You can learn more about related incidents here and here.

Small Things and Large

- the Marches

After the failure of the Autumn harvest, after the defeat in the Mournwold ... the Spring planting fails as well. The situation is grim in the Marches, but sometimes it is when you are tested the most that your true mettle becomes clear. You can learn about the curses - and opportunities - available to the Marches here.

Spreading the Word

- Imperial Synod, Torchbearers, historians and scholars

A team of Torchbearers led by Livia Cascade, the Seer of the Gateway, has spent the time since the death of the Empress Britta recording accounts of past-life visions witnessed by citizens of the Empire. Recently, these accounts have been published across the Empire for the first time by a publishing-house in Redoubt named the Spider's Vantage Spire. You can learn about these publications here.

Sorrow and Death

- Urizen

The spires of Zenith are in significant danger from two supernatural threats. A former warmage and guest of the Spire of Twisting Shadows - Nazares by name - is binding the spirits of Winter into the corpses of the newly dead as part of a deranged "crusade" that appears to require the "recruitment" of every human on orc in the territory. at the same time, a pall of unendurable sorrow spreads slowly from the ruins of the devastated Spire ... with potentially disastrous consequences. You can learn more about the situation in Zenith here.

Symposium

- Imperial Synod

The question of whether to hold a Symposium has been laid before the Imperial Synod. More than just a meeting, a Symposium could be an opportunity to freely and openly address questions of concern for the faithful, or a chance to reaffirm the orthodoxy of the Imperial Way; it could be a chance to learn more about heathen faiths, or a gathering of like-minded individuals wishing to forge stronger bonds in the face of heterodoxy and heresy. Assuming it takes place at all - and you can learn more about what that might mean here.

Temple of the Bull

- Imperial Synod, Brass Coast

The Imperial Senate has given permission for the Asavean priests of Balo of the Foam and the Black Bull to build a temple in the Empire. Construction is underway, and now the Asaveans wait with interest to see if the Synod will accept their invitation to build a temple in Nemoria. You can learn about this - and about certain opportunities of dubious legality available to the Synod - here.

The Twentieth Empress

- Everyone

There is a new Throne! Empress Lisabetta Giacomi von Holberg was appointed during the Spring Equinox, and will be formally crowned during the Summer Solstice. You can learn more about her, about the Throne, and about the upcoming coronation here.

Ongoing Events and Resolutions

Golden Trumpets

- Imperial Conclave

The eternal Meraud's challenge to the magicians of the Empire (which you can read about here) has ended. The Summer Magician is expected to announce the victor, and deliver the promised boon - a powerful magical staff - during the Summer Solstice. There is also talk of an "enchantment on the Imperial regio" but the details of quite what that will entail are unclear.

The Icy Crag of the Eternal Sun

- Imperial Conclave

Work on The Icy Crag of the Eternal Sun, the Summer college built near Volchitrava in Miekarova has been completed. Infused with the power of the eternal Cathan Canae, who serves as its patron, it has already begun recruiting theorists, scholars, and students from across the Empire. The first Master of Ice and Darkness will almost certainly be selected during the coming summit - any Imperial citizen can present a Declaration of Candidacy to the Imperial Conclave in an attempt to secure the position.

Fog on the Brine

- Brass Coast, Highguard, the League, Urizen, Fleet owners

The eerie fog that clings to the waters of the northern Bay of Catazar persists - save in Sarvos where it has been seared away by potent Day magic.

Veils of Night

- Brass Coast, Urizen, the League

The night skies above Madruga, Zenith, and Tassato have continued to appear strange for the last three months. Magicians agree that this is caused by Drawing the Penumbral Veil. Shortly before the Summer Solstice, however, the eerie effect of the shrouds over Madruga and Zenith begin to fade, with several nights of normal skies until eventually the shrouds have disappeared entirely. The shroud over Tassato persists - for the moment at least.

380YE Summer Solstice winds of war

Overview

As Spring turns to Summer, the Empire is engaged in brutal warfare on multiple fronts. In the west, Jotun and Imperial forces clash in Kharaman, Liathaven, Kallavesa, and of course the Mourn. In the east, the war for the Barrens rages while the Empire struggles to drive the Grendel out of Spiral. In the south, humans and orcs clash in an attempt to secure the liberation of Sarvos. And these are only the most prominent theaters of war. With a new Empress on the throne, there will be little time for celebration as the machinery of conflict continues to grind humans and orcs alike into food for the crows.

The Conquest of the Barrens

The Golden Sun keep their banners flying over Dawnguard, and the Golden Axe fight beside them. The Towerjacks are gone, and in their place marches the reborn Gryphon's Pride at last. Five thousand Dawnish men and women in polished armour, marching under snapping pennants bearing the image of gryphons, a grand profusion of leonine-aquiline beasts rampant, couchant, raring for the chance to lay to rest the tattered spectre of the past. To finally, with the full sanction of the Empire, bring the Barrens under Imperial domination. The glorious core of the army is supported by several cadres of questing knights, each with a wealth of practical experience of the Barrens and its savage inhabitants, and by grim-faced knights-errant ready to risk all for the chance to catch the eye of a noble house.

Supported by the garrison of the Towers of Dawn, the Imperial host launches a series of crushing strikes against the orc outposts around Dryhaven. The Golden Sun fight defensively, ensuring the heaviest-armoured and best-shielded troops take the van, slowly grinding their way across the territory toward victory. The ironbound Golden Axe keep pace with them, demonstrating the adaptability and pragmatism that make them rightly feared. Between them, the Gryphon's Pride methodically ensure that not one inch of Dawnish land remains in the hands of barbarian orcs.

The free orcs of the Barrens stand firm, at first. Scouts bring scattered reports of magical defences - potent nexi of Spring and Night magic scattered across the wild places of the Barrens, roused to support the savages. From dripping fen and forest fastness, the orcs fight with savage vigour, inspired by the defensive enchantments.

This is not the only sorcery at work in the Barrens. For another season, the red waters flow in rivers, streams, marshes, and in the shallow bitter sea. Wounds fester. The arts of the physick, the apothecary, and the witch are tested; it is a challenge to keep the injured alive even with the many resources at their disposal. When the rain falls, it tastes of copper and despair. Yet the blight harms the orcs more than it does the humans: the Imperial generals have planned their strategy carefully. Their advance is slow, but it minimizes casualties in the face of the baleful sorcery at work in the Barrens.

The orcs are overmatched. Despite the potency of their magical defences, they are slowly pushed back. The gains they made in Dawnguard over the last year are lost, the households fallen under their yoke liberated, and the remaining nobles and yeomen free to join the battle. By the Summer Solstice, Dawnguard is free, again, of orc influence.

Overmatched... but not overrun. The Imperial armies continue to push, but their slow advance leaves little opportunity to gain new territory. They begin to slowly force the orcs out of the Carmine Fields, but the barbarians do not yield easily. Those who battle under the banner of the Black Wind seem particularly hard to unseat, especially once the battle presses beyond the borders of Dawnguard. It is as if a new passion ignites in them when they fight to defend the Carmine Fields. As a consequence, the Empire makes only slight inroads - perhaps a handful of villages captured, their population fleeing before the steel-and-mithril of Dawn and the iron-and-fire of Varushka.

By season's end, the warhost of the Empire has recaptured Dawnguard, and established several well-supported outposts along the northern borders of the Carmine Fields.

It seems the conquest of the Barrens has finally begun.

Game Information: The Barrens

The Dawnish are now uncontested in their control of Dawnguard. The Empire has made minimal gains in the Carmine Fields, which remain firmly under Barrens orc control.

The Defiance of Sarvos

The fog that has shrouded the Bay of Catazar for the last year or so fades... and almost immediately is replaced with a new fog. Those who saw this eerie mist arrive during the Spring Equinox whisper that it did not rise from the sea at all, but rather seemed to drift down from the sky like a cloak of falling clouds. Thick as Marcher broth, it swirls and surges through the streets of Sarvos, and spreads its pale fingers across Uccelini and Bocche and southern Riposi. It spreads like spilled milk along the swollen Gancio to Foracci and settles across the roofs of Rodez and Trivento and Orphan's Haven as gently as it falls on the jewelled towers of the City.

Within the peculiar haze, sound carries strangely - sometimes muffled, sometimes amplified. It brings strange dreams. Visibility becomes... muddled. It is difficult to tell the difference between orc and human at distances of more than a handful of yards. It is easy to get lost, even for people who have lived in Sarvos their entire lives. How much easier it is, though, for those who do not know the city?

At the same time, news comes from Anvil that the Mayor of Caricomare and the League Assembly have urged the people of Sarvos to rise up against the Grendel. The word travels fast, and it catches the spirits of the League citizens like sparks in dry kindling. It is not clear who strikes first - the fog makes it impossible to be sure. Did the Grendel send their thuggish enforcers to break up a meeting of angry citizens? Did a gang of furious bravos jump an orc patrol after one attempted intimidation too many? It hardly matters. The flame of rebellion ignites across the city, sweeping through the streets like wildfire from shore to shore, from the docks to the towers, from the poorest alleys to the wide avenues around the Diora University.

The Grendel have the advantage of overwhelming numbers... yet the conflict is by no means one-sided. The locals have the advantage of knowing the city, and knowing that they are battling not only for their homes and their wealth but for their Pride. The fighting is savage, vicious, utterly without honour or glory or mercy. In some parts of the city, blood flows in streams into the gutters. The bravos of the League employ all the arts learnt in hard fighting in alleyways and cramped, smoky rooms. The Grendel rely on their discipline and the violence that burns in the heat of every orc. In the narrow streets, the humans have the advantage. In the plazas and squares, and in the wider streets, the advantage is unequivocally with the Grendel. The orcs also have the advantage that it is not their city - they do not care how much damage they do to Sarvos.

Who throws the first torch is another mystery that will likely never be solved, but by sunrise the day after the rebellion begins, several Grendel ships are aflame... but so are parts of the city. Given the choice between fighting the invaders and saving their city from fire, the citizens of Sarvos make the pragmatic choice to save the city.

After two days of fighting, the Hounds of Glory and the Wolves of War arrive. A heavy pall of smoke mixes with the chaotic mists, tainting everything with the acrid scent of burning wood. As the army prepared to cross the water to the city, scouts bring back only reports that contradict one another and make little sense - the magical mist makes it difficult to get a good idea of the situation on the island of Cigno itself.

The Wolves of War enter the city first, cautious and careful. Through the entire march from Reikos, their sleep has been tormented by hideous nightmares of what they may find - burnt ruins, friends and families butchered or carried away to a life of slavery in the Grendel salt mines, a city sunk into the Bay, a city besieged by behemoth horrors from the ocean depths or even a city simply gone - their waking hours beset with doubts. The grim curse of Agramant works its hateful magic against them, but they are defiant. They are here to liberate the greatest city on the Bay, to fight alongside their brothers and sisters against the barbarians who dared to come and steal the jewels of Sarvos.

The Hounds of Glory waste little time with scouts. Starting at the northernmost point of the city, the Dawnish knights and witches sweep through the streets heading for the docks. Their advance is slowed by the mist, but it is inexorable, triumphant. While the magical fog muffles other sounds, it seems to offer no resistance to the blaring horns of the nobles of Dawn. The horns call the people of the Empire to the hunt, to the war, drawing the defenders to their banners.

The sleek warships of the Freeborn Storm are slowed by the strange fog but not by much. The brazen captains are eager to engage the Grendel navy and many know these waters well. With one eye on the coast and the advancing armies they seek out their ancient enemy - time for payback for the attack on the Madruga shipyards, and for a much older defeat. They expect to face overwhelming odds, a navy perhaps twice their size, even with their own flotilla bolstered by scores of independent corsair vessels, but even so there are no engagements.

The advance of the three forces is oddly almost entirely bloodless. No resistance is offered.

Indeed, no orcs are even encountered until the Imperial forces converge in Caricomare, on the waterfront. There at last signs of invasion. A dozen, unfamiliar, low-lying ships are anchored at the quay. Arrayed along the docks are a little over a thousand troops - orcs with heavy tapered shields and heavy greensteel chain. Orders are given, standards raised... the orcs prepare to receive the charge... no quarter is offered or given... the horns are raised to lips eager to at last set loose the dogs of war...

At the last moment, desperate messengers manage to get the attention of the captains. Orders are barked. Confusion reigns.

These are not the orcs the armies were expecting to face.

They are a battalion of orc soldiers from the Iron Confederacy, a mercenary band known as the Black Swords Janissaries, just disembarked from blocky Suranni vessels. Tense negotiations begin; the Imperial commanders meeting with the human captains of the Black Swords. It quickly transpires that these foreign mercenaries were secured by the military council to help with the liberation of Sarvos, to "fight alongside General Tancred de Rondell with the Hounds of Glory" at the behest of Lukash Biessek von Temeshwar, Ambassador to the Iron Confederacy.

A major diplomatic incident has been avoided. Thanks to the discordant fog, the Empire could easily have attacked a force of soldiers here to help.

Avoided? Well... perhaps only delayed. It slowly becomes apparent that by Imperial definition these thousand soldiers of the Iron Confederacy are not free. They are property - slaves - raised from birth to unquestioningly obey the orders of the humans that own them. There are tricky legal implications here. The Suranni officers appear to be a little disgruntled - they are very aware of the Empire's laws on slavery and claim that they were hired to fight the Grendel in territory outside the Empire. But the Grendel are nowhere to be found and now there are a thousand slave soldiers in the heart of the Empire...

Once it is clear there are no Grendel, the Black Sword Janissaries return to their ships and depart, before a magistrate can be found to make a clear ruling on the legality of their presence. Perhaps for the best - there are warriors on both sides who would have relished the opportunity to test the mettle of their opponents, and people who have personal reasons to wish to shed orc blood regardless of whether it belong to barbarian or foreigner.

There is a great deal of work to be done in Sarvos, and the presence of foreign mercenaries would simply have complicated the situation.

The uprising has left hundreds dead on both sides, and while the destruction has not been widespread the city has been permanently marked by the revolt. Fires raged through the streets during the fighting; it is only down to the Courage of the citizens of Sarvos fighting the fires that the city itself was not lost. If the Grendel had continued to fight, if they had attacked the bucket-chains and firefighters, then it is likely that key parts of the city would have been consumed in the inferno - especially given the chaos and confusion caused by the magical fog. Instead, the Grendel used the confusion to withdraw to the docks in an orderly fashion and it was the better part of a day before anyone realised they had fled.

The only signs of the Grendel that remain are a handful of warships burned down to the waterline, and the bodies of those slain in the uprising, many still floating in the bay. Along with their ill-gotten gains, they have fled the city en-mass shortly after the rioting began. The story is the same in Uccelini - the Grendel have left, disappearing into the fog that cloaks the shores of the Bay of Catazar beyond the borders of Sarvos. All that the Empire can be certain of is that their ships have not sailed south-west towards Madruga - even with the magical fog, they would not have been able to sneak past the Freeborn Storm.

Game Information: Sarvos

The Grendel have stripped Sarvos of a large portion of its wealth. Practically nothing has been recovered. The two armies quickly sweep the city, and the surrounding territory restoring Imperial law and order. Sarvos is now unequivocally Imperial again.

The uprising took the Grendel off guard and has inflicted an unknown number of casualties on the armies and navies that had attacked Sarvos. Unfortunately, it has also lead to some loss of Imperial life and damage to the city such that everyone will need to do some rebuilding (a term reduction of the taxation provided by the territory, and to the personal resources of the residents).

Any citizen of Sarvos is encouraged to create their own story of what they did during the two days of confused fighting in the city ahead of the Grendel withdrawal. A number of Grendel were killed, and several ships burnt. A small amount of stolen artwork and wealth was recovered, but not enough to restore the collections of the University or the Cathedral, or the personal connections of the prominent citizens.

Finally, there is no sign of any construction in Cigno - in the city proper. While an area of land was cleared with the apparent intention of building a fortification, no actual work has taken place on such a structure.

The Maledictions of Spiral

In Spiral, the Empire drives onward toward Ossuary. The Citadel Guard and Northern Eagle set the pace, smashing into the Grendel defenders with overwhelming force. The Dawnish forces of the Eastern Sky are more careful, with the Green Shield bring up the rear offering heroic support to the two armies on the front line.

In the south, the sky is rent asunder by thunderclouds as great waves and torrential rain pound the shores and cliffs... but do little to displace the magical fog that shrouds the northern Bay of Catazar. While most of the magical weather is focused along the coast, a tumultuous tempest engulfs the region of Screed in the middle of the season - a roaring maelstrom of thunder, rain, and crimson lightning striking repeatedly down in the vicinity of the Black Plateau. Some scholars of the Plateau believe that dark locale is responding somehow to the violence in Spiral, and that these strange storms over Screed are a manifestation of its rage. It is as well for the Empire that Imperial troops are avoiding that malignant place - for now, at least, the Grendel are welcome to it.

The magic of the Urizen takes a further toll on the orcs. The curse of the Ghosts of Winter has been unleashed to scour the territory, bringing misfortune and tormenting orc and human with equal glee. Things go awry; both sides find their supply lines are confused, and both Grendel plunder and Imperial rebuilding are equally complicated. The spirits unleashed by this magic are rarely visible, but this season in Spiral they are spotted in greater numbers than ever before. Emaciated, almost skeletal shapes with twisted features whose lower bodies trail off into smoke or fog or shadow. At night, their eyes burn with an effulgent crimson glow as they greedily fly hither and yon seeking out more opportunities to cause suffering. Superstitious residents of Spiral claim it is the restless hatred of the Black Plateau that empowers them, but astronomancers frown at their words, and look up to a certain place in the night sky, and wonder...

In addition to storms and ghosts, scouts report that potent Night magic has catastrophically transformed the coastline of Apulus into a stinking, poisonous, sucking mire of treacherous quicksand and shifting sands. For the time being at least any Grendel naval forces are effectively neutralized - assuming any were present. The fog makes it hard to guess precisely what effect this new development may have had on the outcome of the campaign - assuming any Grendel ships were even present.

The power that transforms Apulus is short-lived - as Summer approaches the effects are fading and it is unlikely that the magic can be repeated without the assistance of another potent conjunction. In one regard, however, it will leave a permanent mark on Spiral: the port of Apulus is again reduced to ruins. Between the shifting ground and the thunderous waves, reports say that the entire town has effectively sunk beneath the waves along with the foundations of the Grendel fortifications under construction there. It has also certainly claimed the lives of a large number of orc civilians and human captives - including any of the Urizen children taken as hostages by the Grendel who were being held there.

The Grendel themselves are on the defensive, and if they are dismayed by their lack of naval support they barely show it. Even with the appearance of an icy citadel conjured from the realm of the Queen of Ice and Darkness, the Empire must fight for every foot of territory it claims. The Grendel cannot resist the Imperial advance entirely, but with additional support from the south they are able to keep hold of the Ossuary - if only just. There are garbled suggestions that a fresh force of orc soldiers has entered Spiral from the south-east, from Grendel lands.

It is perhaps no surprise that magic plays such a large part in the campaign in Urizen - and for the moment at least the majority of the magic is woven by the Empire. Yet for all that, magic can be a capricious tool - and the Black Plateau stands as a stark reminder that there are more things in the world, and in the heavens above it, than are dreamt of in the philosophies of humans, or of orcs.

Game Information: Spiral

The Empire has made some gains in Ossuary, but no regions have changed hands. The territory remains in the hands of the Grendel - albeit only just - and they still hold the Legacy.

There has been a lot of magic in Spiral as well, even leaving aside the various enchantments on human and orc armies. The curse Winter's Ghosts is one of them - anyone in Spiral over the last three months will almost certainly have encountered some of the effects which include crops failing, animals sickening and dying; humans and orcs alike suffering malaise and nightmares (especially in this case nightmares with themes of hate and fear); unseasonable weather that makes the unseasonable weather already created by the storm curse even worse; food and buildings and indeed everything in between being ravaged by rot, rust, and mould. Misfortune, weakness, hunger, and dread run rampant. Tempers fray, and everything goes wrong at once. You may wish to include this in your individual stories of what you have done since the Spring Solstice if you are in Spiral.

Apulian is gone entirely now. Already damaged by the explosive destruction of the Lighthouse during the initial Grendel attack; then damaged again during the Imperial blockade-and-storm combination; finally sunk into the sea by a combination of floods, marshes, and pounding storms. This mostly affects the Grendel, obviously, but may be relevant if the Empire ever retakes Apulus. At the very least we are considering whether to give the region the ruined quality.

While Apulus currently does not have the coastal quality, it will have regained it by the start of the Summer Solstice. The magic used to turn the entire shoreline of that region into a treacherous quagmire is unlikely to work again without another complex conjunction.

The Crucible of Kahraman

Kahraman... the cinnabar hills shake to the thunder of war. A little over twenty-five thousand Imperial forces form a bulwark against nearly forty thousand Jotun intent on conquering Serra Briante. The Tusks form the heart of the Imperial defence, supported by two armies of Highborn. The Seventh Wave and the Imperial Orcs of the Winter Sun both try to use the terrain to their advantage - the one with a series of ruthlessly planned and executed ambushes, the other with a relentless hit-and-run campaign of stinging attacks against the flanks and rear of the Jotun forces. In the thick of the fighting, though, it is often the Winterfolk who face the strongest warriors of the Jotun head-to-head, making them pay for every Freeborn hill they take. The Fist of the Mountain lives up to its name, bloodying the Jotun but spilling its own blood in return. And while the rest of the Empire forms a defensive line, the Red Wind Corsairs go on the offensive. The bold corsairs strike out, attacking Jotun baggage trains to steal the back the wealth that the Jotun have so recently taken from the Freeborn.

During the lulls in the fighting, the Jotun and the Wintermark engage in a strange ceremony of honour: wherever possible, each side allows the other to reclaim the bodies of the dead. On the battlefield there is only blood, but in the beats between there is room for something else. So far, at least, none of the other Imperial forces have taken advantage of this détente to murder the choosers of the slain. The orcs and humans are not the only ones moving among the slain, however, and the détente between them makes the presence of the heralds of Kaela even more obvious as they go about their grim business offering the dying of both sides an escape of a sort.

Not that there are as many dead as perhaps there might be. The waters of Kahraman surge with life - it pulses in the stream and riverbeds, filled to bursting by the snowmelt from the northern mountains. The magic throbs like an invisible heart, and follows the tributaries of the Scorrero in particular, spreading an unexpected fertility to the rest of the Brass Coast. The power saves a great many, orc and human alike, who might otherwise have breathed their last... or taken the cold hand of one of Kaela's agents.

Yet even with this potent magic, four thousand orcs and humans will never fight again. After each battle, the Jotun raise great hills over their dead, and over the dead of the Empire whose bodies are not recovered.

It is a campaign of castles, as much as armies. The Jotun armies are supported by a great squat tower of smooth glacial ice and rough black iron that has risen over the ruins of Freeborn Damata. The knights of Cathan Canae who garrison it appear as eight-foot-tall orcs, garbed in fur and with scarred and tattooed skin. Each wields a mighty barbed spear of polished bone against Imperial troops with precisely the same fervour that last season they - or their cousins - wielded those same spears against the Jotun. The Lady of the Frosts is even-handed with her gifts.

For their part, the Imperial forces are based from Fort Braydon, and out of a castle of black ice that broods in the hills overlooking the Great Mine of Briante. Summoned from the realm of the Queen of Ice and Darkness by the Varushkans of the Coven of the Indomitable Sun, garrisoned by three barn-sized one-eyed giants who hurl chunks of ice and stone at the Jotun if they venture too close. And venture close they do, as they seek to conquer Serra Briante with the same furious speed which brought them victory in Serra Damata.

The greater campaign, of Empire against Jotun, is reflected in many different ways - but nowhere more obviously than in the rivalry between the doughty Marchers who fight beneath the banner of the Tusks, and that of the savage raiders who carry the wolf-skull standard of the Howling Night. Where the Tusks present a disciplined defence, the Howling Night ulvenwar constantly probe and seek to outflank the Imperial defences. In the end, the two armies more-or-less cancel each other out... yet it is easy to imagine what might have happened if one or the other had not been present. But for the constant maneuvering of the wolfskin-wearing Jotun, the Marchers might have dug in and offered a serious counter to the barbarian forces. If not for the stout defence of the soldiers of the Marches, the barbarian raiders could easily have skirted and perhaps even overrun the Imperial defensive positions.

In the end though the Empire cannot hold back the flood of the Jotun. Their vanguard overwhelms the defensive lines, triumphantly pushing the Imperial forces back. They lay siege to the frozen citadel at Serra Briante, answering the hurled boulders of the ice giants with catapults and trebuchets. For all the heroic defence of the Imperial armies, the grim truth is that without the need to break the enchanted fortress, it would not have been enough to prevent them from claiming the Great Mine of Briante as they have the Damatian Cliffs. In the end, it provides just enough additional support to the Empire to prevent the Jotun from claiming the eastern Serra.

In the end, though, it is only just enough. The Jotun stand on the very threshold of victory in Serra Briante; there are even stories that a certain ghostly figure whom the Marchers call Jonah Gold has been heard warning the remaining miners to lay down their picks and flee for their lives.

Serra Briante balances on a knife edge - an errant gust of wind might be enough to cause it to fall to the orcs.

Game Information: Kahraman

The Empire is pushed back. Building on their gains last season the Jotun almost - but not quite - conquer Serra Briante and the Great Mine of Briante along with it. For now it remains in Imperial hands. As there are five regions in Kahraman, the Jotun would need to conquer three of them to take the territory and as the Summer Solstice begins they control only one region.

The Heralds of Mourning

In the Mournwold, the Empire seeks to build on the gains they made before the Winter Solstice, before the Jotun drew their line in the soil and said "no further." Their numbers are almost half what they were in the previous season - twenty-three thousand Imperial soldiers face the Jotun across the barren hills and fields of the Mourn.

The Bounders and the orcs of the Summer Storm hunger for the blood of the invaders. They push themselves to the attack, relentlessly striking at the strength of the orcs, ruthlessly seeking to add as many as they can to the butcher's bill. The fury of the Marchers finds a match in the wrath of the Imperial Orcs. Together they cut a swathe through the ranks of the Jotun. By contrast, the Drakes, the Quiet Step, and the Towerjacks take a more balanced approach - fighting to drive the Jotun back rather than focusing on spilling their blood. The Towerjacks in particular seem to relish the chance to fight alongside the warriors who came to the defence of Holberg, and help to liberate the city from the stranglehold of the Druj.

The Empire attacks... and encounters the hammer-blow of the Jotun coming in the other direction. The barbarians are also on the offensive this season. The warriors who fight beneath the banner of the mandowla - numbers greatly depleted by their heroic stand - triumphantly lead the way in an all-out attack against the defenders of the Empire.

Yet their strategy is not that of the single mighty hammer blow - it is like a half dozen hammers striking all along the borders of the lands the Empire has freed. They drive the Empire out of Freemoor first, village by village. They meet the Imperial charge, and turn it back. Their numbers are bolstered not only by the glorious captains of the Jotun - the forces that owe allegiance to no single army but fight where their ancestors and their hunger for glory takes them - but by stranger forces.

At first, it seems as if an army of Dawn has taken the field against the Empire. It soon becomes apparent that these are no Dawnish nobles, but a cohort of Knights of the Crimson Fields. Champions of Eleonaris. Two thousand tall, proud knights, all clad in raiment of burning crimson. They bear stag-horns upon their brows, and bring with them a thousand goblinborn yeomen, each bearing a shield with a rampant lion device. As they come, they call out the glory of the Jotun, and mock the treacherous, cowardly nature of the Empire.

Freemoor falls to the Jotun.

The fighting in the Ore Hills has been bad enough, but now the full focus of the campaign falls in the region newly-taken by the Empire, as thundering blow after thundering blow beats against the Imperial advance. The Towerjacks are able to hold the new fortification the Empire has raised - built on the partially completed frame of the Jotun castle - only long enough to secure the retreat and to get the last of the builders to safety, before the newly completed structure falls to the orcs. One more season, and the fortification could have been garrisoned and served to bolster the Imperial claim to the Mournwold but now... the banners of the Shield of the Mountain already fly over the keep which the Jotun are tauntingly calling "The Tribute".

The Summer Storm and the Bounders rally the retreating Imperial forces, and launch a counterattack. The Shield of the Mountain come to meet them. A day of carnage ensues, the Battle of Ore Hills will be remembered by Imperial and orc alike for a century and more to come. At the height of the battle, when the sun is at its highest point, some fury overtakes the Imperial Orcs, some rapture roars through their blood. As one they come together, drawn together from across the battlefield, and as one they fall on the Jotun - all tiredness and exhaustion gone. Their faces burn with rage. Many shout unfamiliar battle-cries.

The Jotun are taken aback, falter in their advance... for a moment, falter... and then with a passionate intensity that matches that of the Imperial Orcs, they come to face them. The battered humans are ignored for a few terrible moments as the Summer Storm seems hell-bent on engaging the entire Jotun force by themselves - until a beat later the Bounders sound their own advance and enter the fray alongside the scions of Thrace.

Chaos. Horns, drums. The shrieks of the dying.

Then news from the south. While part of the Quiet Step has been fighting in Freemoor, the rest struck stealthily into Southmoor to attack supply trains. It is from these Navarr that the warning comes. The Tower of the North marches on Orchard Watch with catapults and siege towers. With them five thousand newcomers, red and black clad warriors bearing the orange anvil-and-mountain banner of the Corazón. Freshly arrived through the forests of Liathaven, the former Lasambrians - now the newest clan of the Jotun - marches into the Greensward toward Overton. Without support, the Greensward will surely fall and Overton and the Singing Caves be lost to the barbarians.

Orders are given, the retreat is sounded. It seems at first that the Summer Storm and the Bounders will not quit the field, but after a tense moment they begin to withdraw. The Jotun follow close behind.

It is not a rout but a withdrawal. A forced march south to Greensward, to intercept the besieging forces. The orcs already lay siege to Orchard's Watch when the Empire arrives. In different circumstances they might catch the Tower of the North and the Corazón between their hammer and the anvil of the castle... but not with the host of Jotun on their heels.

Another terrible battle ensues in the shadow of Orchard's Watch. The Jotun send a fraction of their force toward the Singing Caves, forcing the Empire to respond. The garrison of Overton holds the town against the barbarians, but the walls are pounded for six hours straight by orc siege engines before the Empire is able to overrun their positions and push them back... but not all the way back.

More blood, more bodies, more land lost to the Jotun - and this time the Jotun camp on land they have not owned in four hundred years.

As the Summer Solstice draws near, the Jotun have retaken all the territory the Empire had liberated, and conquered half of the Greensward for good measure. Orchard's Watch still stands, and the Singing Caves have been held. The fighting there was fierce, but by some miracle the mithril miners and wagon-drivers who carry the bounty of the Caves to Tassato were forewarned of the Jotun attack. They say that Jonah Gold walked the mine, and cried a warning. Warned is armed, the Marchers sometimes say; but a warning alone is rarely enough. The miners and wagon-drivers shed blood to keep the mine from the Jotun and without the intervention of the Drakes and the Towerjacks they would have been swiftly overrun.

There is a rhythm in such things, and a time between beats. Jotun and Empire alike need to regroup. Eight thousand soldiers have fallen in the Mournwold this season alone.

The orcs set about the business of laying their dead beneath the funerary mounds their heathen ghodi prepare. And as is the nature of their heathen practices, they lay the dead Imperials alongside their own dead - perhaps as slaughtered foes to serve the heroes in the land across the abyss, perhaps to honour those who fought with bravery.

For the first time, the watchers on the walls of Orchard's Watch report, they lay Imperial Orcs alongside the fallen of the Marches and the League.

Perhaps it means something.

Game Information

The Empire has lost Ore Hills, along with all the territory they had claimed in Freemoor, and nearly half of the Greensward. Orchard's Watch still stands, but has been damaged. The Singing Caves were attacked, but remain in Imperial hands.

The fortification at Ore Hills, which would have been completed by the Empire by the start of the Summer Solstice, is now controlled by the Jotun. Assuming they install a garrison, it means they have gained another level one fortification in the Mournwold to go with the one they already controlled in Southmoor.

Every Imperial Orc who was fought with the Summer Storm army, and any Imperial Orc PC who would have fought alongside them, has experienced a powerful moment of contact with a potent orc ancestor. Sjöfn of the Bittenblade is an ancient Jotun whose voice for a short time overwhelms that of all other ancestors. While she is a Jotun, she appears unconcerned by the nature of the Imperial Orcs; her voice drives them to fight heroically, gloriously, and revel in the clash of steel on the battlefield. Any Imperial Orc who wishes to can continue to hear this ancestor although the "volume" of her voice will have diminished significantly by the end of the Summer Solstice. Any PC who wishes to do so will find that she encourages them to take actions that are in line with the five things of the Jotun.

The Blood of Liathaven

The Jotun and the Imperial armies clash in Kahraman, locked in bloody battle over control of Serra Briante. The orcs barely note the Navarr moving along the border, through the sparse woodlands and low hills of Serra Damata, and into the mountains of the north-west. They travel quickly, in small groups. Sometimes they use the trods, sometimes they don't, but they always move with speed and stealth and purpose. There are the soldiers that form the core of the army, but they are joined by warbands from Liathaven, Therunin, Miaren, Brocéliande and Hercynia. Some are experienced thorns, some are enthusiastic warriors just past their citizenship tests. There are stoic warriors who have fought the barbarians and the Doom of Terunael all their lives, and there are people who until recently oversaw herb gardens or forest reservations, who have left behind the life of the tender and taken up the bow and the spear.

There are a few clashes between Jotun orc and Navarr, but not many. The scions of Terunael do not seek to engage the Jotun and when they set their minds to moving swiftly, and with focus, the Jotun cannot gainsay them. They have more pressing matters in Serra Briante, after all.

The Navarr, the warriors of the Black Thorns and their allied captains, give Damata and the Cliffs a wide berth. Had they had pressed closer, the Jotun would have treated them as a threat, would have drawn them into their campaign to conquer Kahraman. But they have other places to be.

Not everyone who travels the hidden paths with the Black Thorns is Navarr. Beside them walk a company of dark-clad Highborn; two bands of pale Ushkans far from their home in Miekarova; a fellowship of quiet warrior-mystics from the marshes of Wintermark. They match the Navarr for cunning, and caution. And some of those allies are pale, and grim, and do not fear the death of the body for their souls belong to a world very far from the dark forests of Liathaven. The Clarion Call of Ivory and Dust has been sounded, and the servants of Kaela march alongside many of the Navarr warbands.

Well-paid Freeborn scouts, hard-bitten and scarred and foul-mouthed, lead them through a certain pass in the mountain. They do not follow them down into the forest, preferring to take their chances in Kahraman with their well-earned wages. One by one the disparate bands reunite in Beacon Point.

A month after the end of the Spring Equinox, some seven thousand Navarr raise the standard of the Black Thorns in Liathaven and begin to take back their home.

Many of them have left friends or family in the corpse-glades of Liathaven. They are angry... but they all know that they will have a hard fight ahead of them. They are prepared to fight the legions of the Jotun; to strike from the shadows beneath the trees and to run from any pitched battle. Prepared to give their lives to save as many of their people as they can.

There is no parley, no prisoners, no mercy. Not on either side. Jotun injured are executed quickly. Navarr who fall and cannot be rescued are killed without question by the orcs. There is no time for pity. There is no way to be sure just how many warriors the Jotun have left in these woods.

Two things become clear as the guerilla campaign continues.

The armies of the Jotun are not in Liathaven, not in southern Liathaven at least. There is some resistance, especially along the south-eastern borders. Outposts and watchers left behind by the armies moving from the west into the cinnabar hills. The Black Thorns hit fast and pull back to the cover of the woods. The Jotun are well trained, but they are reticent to pursue the "human Druj" into the forests; they know the Navarr will show them no quarter. There are not even any supply trains to harry - most likely the Jotun in the cinnabar hills are being supported by the orcs of Lasambria. The Navarr have taught them the dangers of running their baggage trains through the woods.

Second, despite this lack of organised occupation, liberating Beacon Point and establishing a beachhead here will be a difficult task for a single army, even with the support of nearly three thousand Thorns and their allies. But they are Navarr, and they are cunning. They know that this is a gamble, that everything depends on what the Jotun do next. If the Jotun conquer Kahraman, the Black Thorns risk being trapped in Liathaven - easy prey for the vast Jotun host. There are enough orc warriors in the cinnabar hills alone to strike down every Navarr soldier twice over, should they turn their attention toward the forest.

Worse, there is the Vallorn. Oh, there is little sign that that slumbering behemoth is any more active than it has been for a century or more... but it cuts Liathaven in half like a festering wound. It is not enough to free Beacon Point and Western Scout; to liberate Liathaven will require the Jotun hold be broken on some or all of the northern regions and that may prove extremely tricky for a single army, even one driven by the passion to retake their homeland.

Yet there is hope, also. By the end of the second month, the survivors of Liathaven begin to make themselves known. The Thorns of the Blackscar are the first to arrive, bringing with them scores of former citizens of Liathaven who they have enlisted into their service. Small groups of daring messengers are sent to Western Scout, and north to the edges of the vallorn, in search of other resistance groups.

There may be no armies, but there are still orcs to fight. People still die. Yet, now the standard has been raised, the last remnants of the people of Liathaven are coming to fight beneath it. They will not go gently into the night. They will rage; rage against the Jotun; rage like the fires that consumed their homes; rage until there is a final reckoning and Liathaven is free again.

Game Information: Liathaven

The Black Thorns has made significant headway toward freeing Beacon Point and establishing a beach head in southern Liathaven. If nothing changes, they will have claimed the region by the end of next season and liberated Western Scout by the end of the year.

Additionally, the remaining resistance fighters and survivors of the Jotun purge are flocking to the Black Thorns' banner. This represents an opportunity... which will be explored in more detail in Winds of Fortune.

Green (Reikos)

Three days after the Spring Equinox, Reikos is invaded.

Not by orcs this time, but by something much more esoteric. A great wellspring of Spring magic pours through the Sign of Tamar. It spreads quickly through Tamarbode, through Broken Tide and Grey Charge. As it spreads, it gathers speed and strength. Wherever it passes, existing Spring regio echo the initial wellspring, and add their own power to the magic. It washes over Longshire and Riverwatch, eddying around the walls of Tabernacle and thence to Haros Water and the ruins of Haros. Finally, it swirls across the ruined walls of High Chalcis, and the Chalcis Mount.

With the magic comes a wave of life and transfiguration. At the forefront, mushrooms, fungus, moulds in a rainbow of colours, creeping and consuming everything broken, everything damaged, everything poisoned. Where they have passed, plants grow with supernatural speed, rejuvenating Reikos at the same time as they tear apart the ruins left by war and Druj occupation.

The waves of magic are accompanied by a legion of the Children of Llofir. They range in size from little ambulatory toadstools no larger than rabbits, through human-sized pallid heralds, to a handful of immense mushroom-shrouded mammoth-sized monstrosities that move with slow inevitability across the land. Few of them can speak; those that can are unfailingly polite, quiet, patient... and offer no harm to the Highborn, even in defence of their own lives. Instead, where they encounter resistance, they simply wait, patiently, for the defenders to tire. They congregate in ever increasing numbers, sending clouds of spores before them, infesting everything.

Where Llofir's army passes the ruins of Highguard are unmade. Those who had hoped to rebuild their chapters, or recover some tattered reminder of the time before the Druj, must fight for every remnant they wish to preserve. The heralds of Ruin see no difference between a Druj-tainted den and a liberated Highborn village that might be restored. As far as they are concerned, it is all damaged, all sick; it has to go. Luckily for those Highborn who wish to preserve their heritage, several captains had planned to spend this season in Reikos gathering the honoured dead and investigating rumours of dark cults. They quickly adapt to a new challenge - protecting the heritage of the Highborn from gentle unmaking by the servants of the Rot Lord.

Yet there seems to be little malice in this magic. Where the servants of Llofir have been allowed to do their work, they leave a land untouched by violence and the hatred of the Druj. Fresh water, fertile soil, healthy growth. Trees sprout with supernatural speed.

Where four centuries of Highborn industry had left open land... little by little the Great Forest that once covered Reikos is being restored. Little by little, any sign that there were ever humans, or orcs, or war in Reikos are being removed. Little by little, the hope that Reikos may be left as something other than a shattered ruin grows...

Game Information : Reikos

The territory of Reikos remains in Imperial hands, but the region of Tamarbode has effectively been conquered by the forces of the eternal Llofir. While the Imperial armies had made some headway into claiming the region over Winter, there is nobody to resist the forces of the Rot Lord when they rise from the Sign of Tamar. It is not so clear what has become of the scattered orcs left behind in Tamarbode...

As to the rest... expect to see more information about the situation in Reikos in Winds of Fortune.

Blue (Kallavesa)

The great army of the Jotun does not withdraw. It continues to advance along the coast, slowly spreading out across the Westmarsh, forging routes toward Skymark. The orcs come cautiously - they do not seem to relish fighting in the marshes. yet they are here to conquer, not to raid. Where they encounter Winterfolk, they offer the Choice. Take up arms as Jotun; lay down their weapons and become Thralls; or fight and die a heroic death.

They come to conquer - but not to despoil. Unlike in Liathaven, they keep their fire tamed. The orc ghodi determine which pools and lakes hold the heroic dead - and the Jotun endeavour to avoid these places. Yet for all their respect they do not cease in their slow advance. Barbarian scouts are sighted in Wittal Grove, and along the road north of Fisk. They ask those they capture about Rundhal and the great road that links it to the Marches.

There is scattered fighting, but the halls of Kallavesa are in no position to offer more than a token resistance. All that stands between them and the conquest of Westmarsh is the magic of Wintermark and the Marchers. The Sussivari Frost Coven and the landskeepers of the Circle of the Endless Dark weave the subtle power of Night to raise the marshes themselves against the Jotun. Mists swallow the Rundahl Marshes, and both Kallavesa Marsh and the West Marsh, offering sanctuary to those who flee before the Jotun army - and a base of operations for those who resist. At the same time, the power of the Sherard Hunters wakes the Wittal Grove - the trees themselves resist and entrap the Jotun scouts who venture that far, while protecting and aiding the hunters and warriors who seek to oppose them.

Over all hangs a pall of sickness - the fens and pools of Kallavesa become breeding grounds for mosquitoes and for disease as the rivers run red. Any serious wound suffered festers, and many orcs die who might otherwise have recovered. The curse is indiscriminate of course - the Winterfolk suffer its ill effects as harshly as the Jotun do.

Game Information : Kallavesa

These potent enchantments, coupled with the caution of the Jotun, means that they make no headway their conquest of the Westmarsh. Yet by the same token, the scattered defenders and the hungry waters of Kallavesa have inflicted only minimal casualties on the orc forces and would have been even lower without the effect of Rivers Run Red.

Black (Karsk and Weirwater)

On the last night of the Spring Equinox, the dead rise in Karsk. Several thousand casualties of the recent war with the Thule, both human and orc, drag themselves out of their graves and begin to march south.

Death has not been kind to them. Many are little more than skeletons - but the magic that animates them fills them with unnatural vitality. Initially at least they seem disinterested in attacking anywhere in particular - they appear to be congregating around the troubled vale of the Dark Heart. There is a hurried exchange of messages between the Thule and the Varushkans, but before any response can be arranged, the shambling cadavers abruptly start to move.

An army of wolves, an army of the walking dead, an army of rotting flesh ridden by flesh-hungry Winter spirits moves south-west through Karsk toward Kosti near the shores of the Semmerlak. The inhabitants of the town slam their heavy gates, and take up defensive positions on the wall fearing the worst... and the unliving host walks straight past them. Without hesitation, they walk into the Semmerlak. Thousands of animate corpses simply walk into the lake and disappear beneath its surface without a trace...

...only to emerge several weeks later several miles north of Culwich in Weirwater. Panicked yeofolk flee south to the safety of the town but again the moribund legion simply ignores them and continues to march south-west. As the Summer Solstice dawns, the army is believed to be moving through Garthmoor toward Applefell. At the current rate they will pass the town during the Solstice... and if they do not turn aside will enter Semmerholm not far from the Semmerstones a little less than a week after the Solstice.

Game Information: Weirwater

An army of cadaverous warriors are marching through Weirwater; it is hard to estimate how many, but it is certain that they represent a force on the scale of an Imperial army, rather than a military unit. They are not going out of their way to attack the living, but anyone who tries to engage them is mercilessly torn apart (if they are lucky - the marching dead hunger for the flesh of the living after all). There has been some damage to villages and roads, and at least one garrison south of Culwich that attempted to obstruct their passage has been overwhelmed with the loss of at least five nobles and thirty yeomen.

There are reports of a few black standards among them, and of an eerie green glow that accompanies the army after the sun has set, but these are unconfirmed at this time. There is no indication who leads them (if anyone), or what they want, or who has raised them, or what their final destination may be. However, as a non-Imperial force marching through Imperial territory it is likely they will be unable to move more than one territory each season.

White (Necropolis)

When the Granite Pillar march to Necropolis to take up defensive positions near the southern coast, the magic of Wintermark supports them. The Sherard Hunters have roused the forests of Highrod to support them. The trees grow thickly around the ruins of the First Sentinel - the broken fortress that once looked north to wild Reikos now serves as a base of operations for those who look south to the waters of the Bay of Catazar. A second significant force takes positions on Sanctuary Sands, below the bluffs on which the Necropolis itself stands.

The coast itself is still shrouded in the unnatural fog that has clung to the shores of the northern Bay for nearly a year now.

Of the Grendel, there is no sign.

Game Information: Necropolis

The situation in Necropolis has not changed.

Red (Segura)

On the last day of the Spring Equinox, there is a flurry of activity in the Hierro clan encampment south of Anduz. All Imperial citizens are politely asked to leave, and if they do not take the hint, are physically ejected. Over the course of the next week, Imperial visitors are turned away by uncommunicative orc sentinels.

At dawn two weeks after the Spring Equinox, without fanfare, the Hierro break camp.

Despite the fears of the people of Anduz, they do not attack the town but instead march west towards the hills of Reinos. Swift-footed scouts dispatched to follow them say they move unerringly toward the red hills. The garrisons at the Towers of Anduz brace themselves, but the Hierro do not even pause.

The orcs march out of Segura, and there is nobody to gainsay them.

At the very last, a lone orc approaches the Kabalai Palace under a flag of truce. Tall orc, armoured, with braided hair and a proud demeanour, he calls himself the chieftain of the Hierro. His manner is civil, his message is short. He thanks the Freeborn for their hospitality, and the Empire for giving his people the greatest of gifts. They will hold the Way in their hearts, and it will give them strength as they go to face the Choice of the Jotun.

And then he turns and follows after the rest of his clan and is swallowed up by the cloud of red dust that trails behind them.

Game Information : Segura

The Hierro have left Segura, and headed west into the territory of the Jotun. The handful that remain behind have asked to join the Imperial Orcs - they appear sincere enough.

380YE Winter Solstice Conclave sessions

Synod Judgements

At the Summit, the following judgements were made by the Assemblies of the Synod:

Judgements 1-18 were taken from the Hub in the early morning of Saturday and all but judgement 14 were recreated with the aid of the raising priests. The Civil Service and militia remains interested in any further information regarding this. The Tribunes of the Synod confirm that rumours of liaison with the Thrice Cursed Court regarding development of the Civil Service Oath are unfounded and untrue.

Number	Assembly	Judgement	Raised By	Outcome
1	Prosperity	Appointment of the Cardinal	The Civil Service	Ricardo was appointed
2	The Way	Appointment of the Cardinal	The Civil Service	Atla was reappointed
3	General	Mandate: The Imperial Synod will send Lucifaro with 25 liao to endorse the creation of a temple of the Way in Asavea and encourage missionaries to travel there to spread knowledge of the Way to the people of Nemoria.	Lucifaro	Upheld 406 - 236
4	Navarr	Appointment of Voice of Barbs	Civil Service	Corey was reappointed
5	Nine	Appointment of High Exorcist Mandate: The General assembly acknowledges the plight of the rebels of Kalino, and their desire to live a life of	Civil Service	Solas was reappointed

6	General	prosperity, liberty, and dignity. Yet the Synod will not risk the safety of the Empire, nor aid a cause touched by Anarchy. As such we send Maurice de Gauvain with 50 liao to encourage the rebels to leave Kalino, abandon their efforts to overthrow their government, and accept sanctuary in the Empire. Imperatrix Lisabetta invoked the Throne's Power of Custodian of Virtue, making this judgement require a Greater Majority to pass. A Greater Majority of the General Assembly was estimated to be 1120. This judgement relates to the Missionary work winds of fortune event.	Rolland Chambers	Not upheld 1078 - 190
7	Vigilance	Inquisition of Thanmir, Thane Hrafn at Saturday, ipm at The Rookery, Wintermark camp Change of Doctrine. The Synod has taught the Way to orcs. We must have an understanding of the orcish soul. Thus we enshrine this: Doctrine of the Howling Abyss: Orcs live only one life. After death, the orcish soul either is lost to the Howling Abyss or crosses it to become an Ancestor who can guide and advise living orcs	Aarne Ceorling	Upheld 69 - 0
8	General	Change of Doctrine. Doctrine of the Ancestors: To cross the Howling Abyss an orc must be known for their deeds. Though there may be other ways to cross, embracing the Seven Virtues leads an orc to the Great and Inspiring deeds that make an Ancestor and a Virtuous Ancestor can guide future generations on the Way.	Bonewall Rek	Upheld 1234 - 252
9	General	Recognition of an Exemplar: That Ulric Y'Basden be recognised as an exemplar of Courage. Demonstrating the signs of: 1) Legacy: Wielding a relic of Arhallogen. 2) Salvation: Leading Jotun thralls back into the Way in Summer 380YE. 3) Pilgrimage: Even alone and abandoned he has never strayed from his dance of Liathaven. 4) An Inspiration to his people. 5) Leading his people in the pursuit of retaking their land.	Bonewall Cole	Upheld 1298 - 172
14	Navarr	This judgement was not recreated by the raising priest following the theft of the Synod judgements in the early hours of Saturday morning. Mandate: Endorsement of the Silent Bell. The	Iniska	10 - 10

15	General	Imperial Synod recognises the contribution of the Silent Bell and encourages the faithful to remain Vigilant for any sign of threat among their neighbours. It provides Esau with 25 liao to support their work. Mandate: The General Assembly believes that knowledge of the seven Virtues that guide the spirit through the Labyrinth of Ages is the right of all humankind. With that intent in mind we send Eleanor Novarion with 50 doses of liao to spread knowledge of the Virtues and the Way to the rebels of Kalino.	Esau	Upheld 722 - 10
17	General	Imperatrix Lisabetta invoked the Throne's Power of Custodian of Virtue, making this judgement require a Greater Majority to pass. A Greater Majority of the General Assembly was estimated to be 1120. This judgement relates to the Missionary work winds of fortune event. Escalation of judgement 7. Sanction, Vindication: Thanmir White Raven, Thane Hrafn, after due inquisition is found to have acted to date with all due Wisdom in his role as Ambassador to the Sarcophan Delves. He is advised to exercise continued Vigilance in his investigation into the spiritual practices of that nation.	Eleanor Novarion	Not upheld 768 - 216
26	Vigilance	Inquisition. I call Lorenzo of Butcher's Bank to inquisition at 11pm Saturday in the league Plaza regarding the risks he has taken by building on the Trods.	Aarne Ceorling	Upheld 101 - 0
27	League	Inquisition. The Pride assembly call the Honradez sisters to Inquisition regarding their dedication to the false virtue of vengeance. The inquisition will take place at 6:05pm in the Hub.	Carmine de Sarvos	Upheld 96 - 0
28	Pride	Change of Doctrine: The doctrines of faith were developed from liao rituals on humans and so refer to "human spirits" as "spirits". The Synod's interest in expanding doctrine to include our understanding of orc spirits necessitates making this explicit so that doctrine does not become self-contradictory. Therefore: 1) "Change "spirit" to "human spirit" in The Doctrine of Seven. 2) Change "spirit" to "human spirit" the first time that it occurs (verse 4) in The Doctrine of the Paragons.	Franco i Sol Deverador i Erigo	Upheld 114 - 0
30	General	Cowards and traitors continually accuse me, in	Tarquinius	Not upheld 590 - 268 Greater Majority not achieved

31	Urizen	the vaguest possible terms, being unable to specify which of my actions are unvirtuous. I call upon them to test their claims. Inquisition me. Medea Ruth Marshwatch	Medea Ruth Marshwatch	Upheld 50 - 20
32	Nine	Mandate: The proposed temple in Nemoria is to the "Lords of Virtue", not the Way. it is an idolatrous corruption offered in bad faith (see the Regario Dossier). The Imperial Synod send Agnetha de Rondell with 50 doses of liao to denounce as blasphemous any construction of a temple of the Way in Nemoria; rather than dealing with the idolatrous tyrants of Nemoria, missionaries should focus on supporting and empowering the rebellious slaves who fight to overthrow them.	Agnetha de Rondell	Not upheld 4 - 5
38	Prosperity	Inquisition. We call Ingar Ironbreaker to inquisition at iram on Sunday at Lumi's Tea House in Wintermark to investigate their use of battle ritual magics to aid the Empire.	Vieri Allori	Upheld 90 - 0
39	Prosperity	Inquisition. We call the Landon of Longridge to inquisition at midday on Sunday at Lumis Tea House in Wintermark to investigate the actions leading up to and during the Bourse Auction of weirwood positions.	Vaurus Korppitkotka	Upheld 96 - 0
43	General	Sanction: Condemnation. We condemn Bloodcrow Yargol for spreading heresy (specifically the Excessionist heresy) and blasphemy. Bloodcrow Yargol in this latest instance in Hrafn Hold encouraged Imperial Orcs to not follow the Way claiming it is a "human religion". Yargol went further to say the Hierro clan failed because "they had too much Ambition". Yargol continued to preach against the dangers of too much Virtue and encouraging to speak on the dangers of too much Pride and Ambition. Despite admonishment he has refused to stop. Furthermore he went on to claim orcs are superior to humans because humans have to "cheat" using liao and claims Thrace could create auras spontaneously, with no evidence. Bloodcrow Yargol has encouraged similar acts repeatedly, having previously been inquisitioned by Beodun Snowlock and said he would mend his ways, yet has made no clear effort to do so.	Jorma Steelhail	Upheld 110 - 30
44	Pride	Sanction: Condemnation. Maricela i Tsagaan i Guerra, and Amaia i Tsagaan i Erigo both confessed to being priests of Justice while under inquisition.	Franco	Upheld 104 - 0
		Sanction: Condemnation. Maricela i Tsagaan i Guerra, and Amaia i Tsagaan i Erigo both

45	Courage	confessed to being priests of Justice while under inquisition.	Amahel	Upheld 52 - 0
46	General	Rewarding. Lord Marcus Drommond of the Limitu Wayhouse requests 10 thrones from the Virtue fund to research Jarmish Exemplars. This would not only broaden our knowledge of the Way but would allow our missionaries to spread the Way more effectively.	Marcus Drommond	Upheld 544 - 102
49	General	Rewarding. To draw 5 Thrones from the Virtue Fund to reward virtuous actions of several citizens during and arising from the Symposium, as permitted by the role of Imperial Chaplain Consular. As a power of the Chaplain Consular this Judgement passes without a vote.	Taryn	Upheld automatically
50	General	Rewarding. Contribution towards building a great work of Pride in Reikos at 20 thrones. The Museum of Pride will contribute towards the recovery of the War ravaged infrastructure and will provide a source of strength to people whose entire history was washed away by the eternal Llofir.	Lev Unbound	Upheld 516 - 80
51	General	Rewarding. Awarding Livia 5 thrones from the Virtue Fund for the purchase of liao for Seer uses. As a power of the Seer of the Gateway this Judgement passes without a vote.	Livia Cascade	Upheld automatically
52	General	Rewarding. The rewarding of Ephrael of Zephaniah's Lament 5 thrones for her great Vigilance and Courage in the face of cultists of Vengeance. Her action was swift and just and the fine she had to pay is a mockery and insult to the office of Inquisitor.	Sivar	Not upheld 282 - 462
53	General	Rewarding of 10 Thrones to the captains of the armies who stayed with the Black Thorns in Liathaven for their Courage and Loyalty. Their actions prevented the rout of an entire army.	Elowen Exile's End	Upheld 301 - 132
61	Varushka	Mandate. The Varushkan national assembly acknowledges that the hare is a virtuous animal, symbolising Ambition. We send Hubert Gremani with 25 doses of liao to spread word of its nature to the vales of Varushka.	Hubert Gremani	Upheld 102 - 0
65	General	To Veto the construction announcement by the League Civilian commissioner to ensure a build slot for a more Virtuous work.	Sariel	Not upheld - 480 - 18 Greater Majority not achieved.

Statements of Principle

The Imperial Synod made the following Statements of Principle:

Number	Assembly	Statement of Principle	Priest	Outcome
10	Navarr	Our nation's namesake, Navarr herself led a life lead by Wisdom, worthy of investigation by the Wisdom Virtue Assembly for Recognition as Exemplar.	Cerwynn Brakensong	Upheld 126 - 0 Greater Majority
11	Navarr	The Navarr Assembly utterly rejects Yael's claim to be the first Empress reborn and urges citizens to ignore her teachings.	Wyn	Upheld 116 - 0 Greater Majority
12	General	The Imperial Synod believes that all Briars be they citizens or not, have the potential and right to positively serve the Empire in a legal and Virtuous fashion.	Thalandor Exile's End	Upheld 520 - 72
16	Dawn	The Troubadours of Dawn hold up the following song as proclamation: Some folk must walk the Labyrinth To atone for their wrongs Four thousand winters: Think it not too long But others through the Labyrinth pass To a land without tears As true liao scholarship Discovered through the years. Dawn's first Empress returned to us From that happy vale Reincarnate in the person of Highborn Yael. Blessed be this paragon Returned from beyond Raise your voice And praise her in Song. The Civil Service is unconvinced that the full weight of this judgement is successfully conveyed in this written format and advises citizens to seek out a musical rendition of the original to ensure Dawnish national tradition is satisfied. This relates to a matter of faith wind of fortune.	Ser Criseyde	Upheld 102 - 50
18	Brass Coast	The Freeborn Assembly considers that the use of the cruel tactics of the Iron Helm Army of Varushka is unvirtuous. It is neither wise nor prosperous to use these tactics because it negatively affects the opinions of our foreign trading partners towards the Empire. We aspire to be better than this and lead by example. Just as the Conscience of the Senate and Imperial	Mazo i Zabala i Erigo	Upheld 62 - 0 Greater Majority

19	General	Consular Chaplain give guidance, the Synod supports the creation of an equivalent position to serve and advise the Military Council The Synod believes that the Law of Desecration needs to be changed to allow the removal of a spontaneous anointing upon a person who has freely requested its removal. Anointings are temporary tools to guide the faithful. They must not be imposed or maintained against the recipient's own will. To do otherwise as a priest is a misuse of their powers. The law as it stands overrides an individual's own choice and encourages inaction where a soul maybe in danger.	Ingrid	Upheld 886 - 192
20	General	The priests of the Vigilance Assembly should strive to use their right to witness the Virtuous functioning of the Imperial Bourse, Imperial Senate, Imperial Military Council, Imperial Conclave, or Imperial Synod Assemblies at least once at every Anvil Summit they attend.	Jared	Upheld 730 - 50
21	Vigilance	Since the cleansing of the Black Plateau, many of those cursed have lived in hiding, isolated from Virtue and the Imperial Way of life. We endorse Belisarius Blackheart in undertaking missionary work to find these people and offer them the chance of salvation.	Sophus Cascade	Upheld 120 - 0
22	Urizen	Our assembly recognises the benevolent and saving Ambition and Loyalty of our departed Brother Gideon of the Suns of Couros in the creation of the Great Ossuary of Reikos. May his memory be forever linked to this Great Work and to the Prosperity and Pride of Reikos.	Belisarius Blackheart	Upheld 120 - 0 Greater Majority
23	Highguard	The Wintermark Assembly believes the most Virtuous path to resolve concerns regarding Dogri Thulebane is for a Wintermark army to intercede.	Ianthe	Upheld 432 - 10 Greater Majority
24	Wintermark	A group of priests should be created who undertake additional training in delivering clemency pleas to the magistrates. These priests will undergo training with the militia and be known to the magistrates to be called upon when needed. Too many citizens have been executed for Virtuously committed crime.	Gunnbrand Ironwill	Upheld 150 - 20 Greater Majority

36	General	A exemplar is one whose actions set a Virtuous example to others because their action would, if undertaken by a human soul, advance that soul on the path to Paragonhood	Corey Wayfarer	Upheld 562 - 158
40	Prosperity	The Assembly of Prosperity affirms the Empire's close ties with the Prosperous and hard working people of Faraden and encourages continued trade with them.	Taddea Ginori	Upheld 90 - 0
41	Marcher	I, James Appleseeder from Fernwood, will organise the distribution of three thrones a year to help with the cost of lodgings and schooling for the children of refugees from the Mourn taken in by Marshcut, Bregasland.	James Appleseeder	Upheld 60 - 0 Greater Majority
42	General	The Synod believes that the process of becoming a herald - including a member of Kaela's Grim Legion - risks the destiny of the human soul and a permanent transformation should not be undertaken.	Antonio Papageno di Sarvos	Upheld 568 - 104
47	Marcher	We, the Marcher Assembly, with regard to the army of the Iron Helm, consider the use of extreme orders (including torture and mutilation) inside the Mournwold, or any other current or former imperial territory, as being opposed to the principles of the Seven Virtues. 68	Courage	Hear the words of Yael. The Synod is gripped with fear. They shirk from the enormity of my Revelation not because they believe I am a heretic but because they are consumed with doubt. They seek to stifle me to buy themselves more time, more evidence. But the Time of Revelation is now and Truth must be shared with all the Empire. I know this to be true, and with Courage as my Virtue I cannot be lead to doubt. I cannot be made to stop. If the Synod believe I am a heretic, it must name me one. I will face martyrdom without fear as did Permion and Isaella. And I will return again.	Yael	Upheld 204 - 0 Greater Majority
69	Marcher	The friars and monks of the Marches reject hatred, it is a false virtue. It was hate and isolationism that led to the terrible divisions of our civil war. 380YE Winter Solstice winds of fortune

Overview

Over the past three months, several events have occurred which are of significance to the Empire and may require a response from her champions. You can also read about the progress of the Empire's military campaigns here.

In each case, we've tried to tag the Winds of Fortune entry with the nations, or political bodies, to which it is most relevant. We've done this to help people who are interested only in events that are especially relevant to them. In no way are these tags intended to be exhaustive; the Empire is a complex place and very little happens in isolation.

As always, how much or how little of this information you choose to know in character is up to you. Part of the purpose of Winds of Fortune is to maintain the illusion of the Empire as a living, breathing place where things happen - and to make players aware of things their characters 'should' know based on what their roleplaying says they have been doing for the past three months.

Many winds of fortune open with a short section of in-character text. In all cases, these pieces are intended to help create an atmosphere and provide a little entertainment. Where they contain opinions, those are the opinions of the fictional people depicted - and where they contain information or rumours the assumption is that the reader will create their own context for that information or gossip. They're mostly just a bit of fun and they tend not to contain anything vital to the understanding of the wind of Fortune.

Winds of Fortune

A Matter of Faith

- Everybody

The Imperial Synod stands on the brink of crisis. There is the very real threat of a catastrophic schism within the Way, as supporters of the vision supported by the Congregation of the First Empress clash with those who believe it to be heresy. You can learn more about this matter of faith here.

Beware My Power (Winds of Magic)

- Conclave, assorted magicians, dramaturgists, and astronomancers, citizens of Reikos, Spiral, and the shores of the Semmerlak

Magic ebbs and flows. A round-up of significant magical effects, some with wider implications, some without, can be found here.

A Business Like Any Other (Trade Winds)

- Fleet captains, Congregation leaders, Ambassadors

International trade, like international relations, can be fraught with pitfalls - and rich with opportunities. You can find a quick round up of things related to the current state of affairs, with an emphasis on trading, here.

City Folk and Country Folk

- The Marches, the League (especially Tassato)

The people of Whittle in the Mourn are on the move. Following recent developments and the renewed domination of the Jotun they have left their homes en-masse and travelled south through the Freemoor hills with all their possessions, seeking sanctuary in Tassato Mestra. You can learn more about this situation here.

Darkest Night

- Naga, Imperial Conclave especially astronomancers, poets

After a year of piecemeal disappearances, the stars have finally disappeared from the skies across the entire Empire. They've even gone from some non-Imperial territories adjacent to the Empire. Perhaps more importantly, every naga in the Empire is experiencing a powerful urge to keep their cards close to their chests. You can learn more about these eerie magical occurrences here.

Death of a Salesman

- Imperial Bourse, Wintermark, the Brass Coast, Imperial Orcs, Highguard (especially benefactors)

The Imperial Bourse private auction has been suffering for a little while now, and at last it has shuffled off this mortal coil. A number of alternatives are already springing up. You can learn about them here.

Forge of Champions

- Anyone who has challenged the Iron Duke

The eternal Barien appears preoccupied, but his lieutenant Castellan has let it be known that she plans to visit Anvil during the next Summit to talk to various people about their challenges. Apparently, the paperwork is in a dreadful state, even for the Summer realm. You can learn more about this here.

In Brightest Day

- Everyone, but especially artists, priests of Pride, and artisans

Powerful magic inspires artists and culture across the Empire. In addition to its purely artistic effect, it also has some implications for priests of Pride, and there is a delicious rumour of some sort of announcement from The Looking Glass relating to a new schema. You can learn more about the fallout of this magic here.

Into The Woods

- Temeschwar, the Fortress of Salt

Something cold and dark has settled over the Metri in Temeschwar. Gaunt figures appear without warning, slaughtering anyone who tries to bring violence to another citizen. The roads have never been safer, but the woods have never been darker. You can learn more about these events here.

Lantern's Light

- Imperial Senate, Varushka, Imperial Orcs

The Stalker has fallen to earth. Diverted at the last moment from Miekarova to smash into eastern Otkodov, its supernatural influence has faded. As per their agreement, the Thule are offering an arrangement whereby the Empire can share in the bounty of ilium it contains... but nothing is every quite that straightforward where the Dragons are concerned. You can learn more about these events here.

Missionary Work

- Imperial Synod

The Imperial Senate has offered an opportunity to the people of the Iron Confederacy to receive missionaries, to learn of the virtues and the practice of the Way. Some Suranni have asked to learn more, and now it is up to the Imperial Synod how they wish to respond. You can learn more about this opportunity here.

No Evil Shall Escape Our Sight

- Imperial Synod, Vigilance Assembly

The Silent Bell are an Imperial Sodality associated with the Vigilance Assembly who investigate internal threats to the Empire. They are looking to formalise their arrangement with the Synod, which you can learn about here.

Serpent's Tooth

- Military Council, Imperial Senate, Dawn

The Barrens, the Druj, and the situation in the east. An offer to negotiate peace from the orcs of the Mallum. You can learn more about this diplomatic opportunity here.

Symposium of Revelation

- Imperial Synod

A Symposium is due to be held at the Winter Solstice. The Imperial Synod has been planning the event for six months, which will bring priests and theologians from all over the world to Anvil to discuss pressing matters of doctrine, faith, and the future path of the Way. You can learn more about the Symposium here.

Tale of the Golden Hare

- Varushka

The Virtuous Animals are a significant element of the spiritual life of the Varushkan people. Thanks to the National Assembly, and the actions of a certain Fellowship, a new candidate for inclusion in the lexicon of virtue has presented itself - the golden hare. You can learn about this opportunity here.

The Widening Gyre

- Wintermark, Imperial Senate

Dogri Thulebane, renegade leader of the Winterfolk of Crow's Ridge is preparing something, the impact of which may be felt across the northern Empire and beyond. You can learn more about it and the opportunities it presents here.

Those Who Worship

- The Brass Coast, Imperial Synod, Imperial Senate

The Asavean temple in Oran is nearing completion despite some opposition from the Imperial Synod. As the structure is now largely complete, it may be time to consider the opportunities presented by the Asavean counter-offer to build a temple in Nemoria. At the same time, the idolatrous priest responsible for overseeing the structure, and his team of architects and builders, are looking for something challenging to occupy their time. You can learn more about these developments here.

The Witches of Applefell

- Dawn, Weirwater Vales

In Weirwater, bandits have attacked a caravan of weirwood near the town of Applefell, apparently in alliance with a band of renegade witches. This is the latest in a line of escalating problems with witches in southern Weirwater. You can learn more about this problem here.

Ongoing Events and Resolutions

The Other Empress

- The League, Highguard, Imperial Senate

Following a Senate motion proposed by Senator Gant Archama, the sarcophagus of Empress Giselle has been moved to Temeschwar where it is awaiting the completion of the new tomb. It is being stored in one of the disused dungeons beneath Ratibor's Gate, the old prison now used by the civil service.

The Crumbling Court of the Fountain

- Urizen

The curse that has been degrading the Court of the White Fountain in Optarion has finally run its course, but not before one final season of attacking the fortification. Shortly before the Winter Solstice, the fire that gives the fortification its name suddenly flares up, as bright and powerful as ever - although the white stone that comprises the tower still has several cracks that will need to be repaired. Now that the curse is over, the Court will begin to recover normally - assuming no more restorative magic is brought to bear by magicians from the Spire of the Auric Horizon, or that no Grendel attack it in the coming months.

The Creeping Morass

- Holberg, Imperial Senate

Ennerlund has completed its slow transformation into a marsh. It joins Rebeshof and the Morass to form one of the largest marshes outside of Kallavesa and Bregasland in the west. The production of all farms in the territory has been permanently reduced by 36 rings, and the Great Pits of Ennerlund will now need additional pumps and precautions, permanently increasing the upkeep of this important Bourse resource by 2 Thrones per season.

Song of the Lakefolk

- Wintermark

Raids by strange hunters continue to disrupt businesses and farms in Sermersuaq. At the Autumn Equinox the Assembly of Wisdom, with some support from the Wintermark National Assembly, resolved to take the cautious route of gathering more information. This means that Savik Summerstorm is coordinating efforts in the area to learn more about this situation, and is the person to talk to.

Lashonar and the Song of Peace

- Dawn

The eternal Lashonar has been interfering musically with the armies of Dawn. The Imperial Conclave decided to strip Lashonar of its amity - although they did not declare enmity. At the same time, the National Assembly of Dawn stridently opposed the message of peace being spread by the agents of the eternal. Lady Tamain Sepulchre was named by the Assembly to directly oppose the influence of the Night eternal, and was supplied with a hundred liao to support their efforts. Lady Tamain composed and popularised The Heralds of Lashonar in order to combat the insidious threat posed by the eternal. As a consequence, while the effects of Lashonar's heralds continued to be felt during the last few months, they have been entirely countered by the start of the Winter Solstice.

Castle of Wind and Sky

- Varushka, Imperial Conclave

The disruptive weather plaguing the Icy Crag of the Eternal Sun shows no sign of dissipating. The upkeep of the College of Magic continues to be artificially high.

Blood Red Roads

- The League

Work on the Blood Red Roads continues. The project still has many months to go before the four cities of the League are linked by wide stone roads.

The Orcs of Therunin

- Navarr

The orcs of the Great Forest, seeking sanctuary from the Barrens, continue to occupy the Lower Tarn Valley in Therunin. The situation has not changed very much from where it was last season. The Senator for Therunin, Caerwyn Summer Crow, provided the orcs with significant support in the form of money and supplies, but the matter of land is still uppermost in the thoughts of many of the Navarr of the south-east.

Krampus Tales

- Wintermark

The Krampus continues to act erratically. There has been no movement on constructing a home for the supernatural creature in Skarsind. As it is winter, the spirit is due to appear at Anvil to hear the sins of the Winterfolk - but it is not clear whether its "allegiance" is still with Wintermark, or the Imperial Orcs, or the Jotun.

380YE Winter Solstice winds of war

Overview

The empire is engaged in multiple campaigns with the barbarian orcs.

The eastern front is quiet. In Spiral, the Empire and the Grendel are both defending the territory they control. A few minor skirmishes between scouts take place but both sides appear to be more interested in defence and consolidation than engagement. In Weirwater, the unwholesome army out of Karsk seems to be quiescent - although there are enough travellers tales to suggest that it is still a threat. Likewise, Imperial forces keep a vigilant eye on the southern coast of Necropolis and the eerie supernatural forest of north-western Reikos - but for now, no threat seems to be forthcoming.

The western front is also quiet. There is no fighting in the Mournwold as both Jotun and Imperial hold to their own territory. In Kahraman, the Jotun withdraw through the western mountains leaving the supernatural troops of Cathan Canae to delay the Empire. The Summer soldiers are overwhelmed eventually, and their citadel falls, and Serra Damata is liberated.

In the Barrens, the Dawnish claim some territory, and there is no sign of the Druj.

In Redoubt, a naval assault attacks the southern shores. There is some resistance from the garrison of the Court of the White Fountain, but the attackers have made significant progress towards creating a beach head. There is some evidence that the Grendel vessels are supporting orc troops who are not native to the Broken Shore.

Finally, in Liathaven, the forces of the Jotun who have withdrawn from Kahraman fall on the Black Thorns inflicting massive casualties and trapping the army in the Western Point.

Quiet on the Eastern Front

Winter is coming. It creeps in, slowly and inevitably. The nights turn cold, dark beneath starless skies. Unlike last winter the winds do not howl, just sigh mournfully with the promise of heavy snow. Mornings start with the quiet crack of ice being broken on water barrels, the sharp crunch of frost-gilded grass, and muttering about the frigid air.

In Spiral, the orcs stay close to their campfires. The Broken Shore is warm and dry even in winter. The Grendel on the whole do not much care for the cold. Their forces still hold much of the south - and the Black Plateau of course. The Imperial forces keep a close watch on the uneasy borderlands between the territory they hold and the territory held by the invaders. In Ankra and Cinion, spires begin slowly to rebuild. It is almost peaceful. There is some half-hearted skirmishing, mostly encounters between bands of scouts, but no clash of armies.

We will bide our time, wait out the Grendel Storm and make ready to stand heroically if they push any further.

General Sullik of the Northern Eagle

People are rebuilding in Reikos as well. The wave of Spring magic has entirely subsided. New forests spread across what was once ruined land. Here and there, in defiance of winter, the Highborn break ground on new chapters. Axe and saw are taken to hardwoods; pick and shovel bite deep into stone. Makeshift camps begin to be replaced by shacks and cottages, and slowly, stone walls start to rise again. Tamarbode is silent, however. No woodcutting or quarrying in the dark forest that Llofir claims. At night, the builders in northern Grey Charge, and western Broken Ride, and north-western Longshire can see the faint luminescent glow of mushrooms beneath the trees. In the absence of the stars, it is eerily bright.

Time to rest and recover. Dont get used to it!

We'll be back on the front line soon. Make the most of it!

General Estana I Mestiere I Guerra

In Necropolis, the Quiet Step and the Red Wind Corsairs hold a long vigil against the possibility of a Grendel assault against Sanctuary Sands, but no such assault takes place. The scouts of the Quiet Step line the cliffs overlooking the Bay of Catazar, searching for signs of danger. By the tomb of Atuman, they build a makeshift beacon to warn of any potential naval invasion, but the beacon is left unlit.

In Weirwater, the unquiet dead still wait beneath the trees. Six months ago they emerged from Karsk, from the Semmerlak, and marched south. Driven back from Astolat, they remain in the forests of Weirsmoor, and Hawksmoor, and southern Garthsmoor. Under the ebon night skies, corpselights dance, and emerald fires flicker. Questing knights and knights errant are drawn to Weirwater, to the unliving host. There are deaths, and stories of glorious fights alike. Some of the weavers of Applefel have cautiously slipped through the woodlands, wrapped in heavy cloaks against the cold, hidden from malicious eyes. There are unsettling stories. Pedlars, woodcutters, charcoal burners, scouts, poachers - people who have not come home despite the cold chill of Winter. The yeofolk mutter and grumble. There are probably good explanations for the people who have disappeared, but the easiest is that the army of the dead has eaten them. "Something must be done," becomes the refrain as the Winter Solstice approaches. "Someone must do something!"

Quiet on the Western Front

The Mourn rests uneasy. The Jotun took Greensward, and the Empire took it back less than a month later. The Jotun withdraw north and west as an early winter snow settles over the burial mounds they leave behind. The dark earth of the south-eastern farms is freshly turned, a final bed for the heroes of the Marches. After so much bitter fighting, the situation is back to what it was during the long months of the ceasefire

The
Empire defend what they have regained.
The

*This is the war of a generation. We will not end it in one day, but we will raise the curtain on a decisive act.
By the time the curtain falls, you will be heroes and all the world will be your audience.

General Gabriel Barossa of the Wolves of War

Jotun defend what they have taken. On the walls of Orchard's Watch, and Fort Braydon, and La Redotta Rezia, the sentries stand a nervous watch in wan daylight and pitchblack night, straining to hear the tread of orc feet signalling the orc return. It doesn't come.

Stories blow down from the north, of resistance crushed without mercy. Of armies of orcs moving across the hard, frozen ground. Of fighting, but not with the Empire. A week after the Autumn equinox nearly a hundred men, women, and children of the Mourn cross the border from Grey March into Graven Marsh. Many of them are Marchers only in theory - children grown up under the Jotun who have known no other way of life. Each of the adults bears a livid brand on their cheek of the rune Queros. Their passage is watched by five hundred silent Jotun on the hills above High Courage. These are some of those who rallied to the Empire when they came to liberate the Mournwold. Defeated by the Jotun, marked as oathbreakers, and set free as agreed with Tancred De Rondell. The last of them, exhausted from their long march, bring a message. "There will be no more mercy."

Autumn turns to winter, and a shroud of silence settles over the Mournwold broken only by the bitter cries of crows, hungry for war.

Further south, in Kahraman, the silence is broken by the roar of great beasts and the clash of steel on steel and stone on flesh. The Fire of the South, the Fist of the Mountains, the Summer Storm, and the Towerjacks sweep west through Serra Damata, supported by scouts and auxiliaries from Fort Braydon in the north. They encounter little resistance from the Jotun. The orcs have broken camp and marched west, ahead of the armies.

My Friends, take heart in knowing you fight for your home, your nation and your people.

General Vrael i Sol-Devorador i Erigo of the Fire of the South

What they encounter instead is a citadel of ice and black stone. The castle dwarfs the town of Damata, as the giants that garrison it dwarf the soldiers who come against them. Massive warriors of the Summer Realm wrapped in leather and white fur, tough hides marked with curling spiral tattoos, they fight the Imperial troops without let or quarter, defending the Jotun retreat. The citadel cannot stand against four Imperial armies, but it holds for three days before finally the gates are broken and the fighting shifts to the halls and chambers of the magical edifice. Once the walls are breached, the Imperial soldiers find that the giant orc-like ogrekin are not the only defenders - vicious fighting between human and orc, and squat ivory-tusked goblin-warriors slicks the frigid halls with blood.

These creatures of the Summer Realm do not seem to fear death; for them it is only a defeat that sends them back to their mistress' domain. Those who fall beneath their spears and their warpicks and their icy axes... they do not rise again. In the end, around a hundred Imperials die taking the magical citadel... with little to show for it. As the Winter Solstice approaches the castle begins to crumble and sag. By the end of the summit it will have gone, tumbled back into the realm of the Queen of Ice and Darkness.

*I ask the Summer Storm, once again, to earn their legend and cut down the Enemy!
Strive for your nation!
March for your Empire!*

General Ironside Skar of the Summer Storm

The Jotun have long gone by the time the Imperials liberate the people of Damata - along with a bounty of white granite from the Damation Cliffs. The beautiful walls of the town still stand, the intricate calligraphy that covers them undamaged by the Jotun occupation. Wordlessly, the dhomiros of Damata take the commanders of the Imperial armies to view a part of the walls where new writing can be found. A Jotun stonemason has carved her own passage onto the walls of Damata, in a stark and angular letters a foot high. "We came. We shall come again."

Game Information: Western Front

The situation in the Mournwold has not significantly changed - the Empire controls Greensward and the Jotun appear to control everything else. The Singing Caves were briefly in the hands of the Jotun before they were liberated - so the Imperial Senate may choose to allocate them again. Indeed, during the Autumn Equinox the Senate voted to allocate the Singing Caves as a Marcher national seat but the motion was subject to veto by the Throne. As a result, the mithril mine remains unallocated. If the Senate reaches a decision swiftly, it may be possible for the seat to be appointed during the coming summit.

Imperial forces have completed the liberation of Serra Damata from the barbarians. All of Kahraman is now under Imperial control once again. The white granite quarries of the Damation Cliffs have been recovered and are now available to the Senate to allocate. Regardless of their decision, the seat will not be appointed until the Spring Equinox at the earliest.

On Crimson Field

The Golden Sun and the Gryphon's Pride press the advance in the Barrens. They consolidate the territory they have taken in Carmine Fields, and push south and east into Murderdale. Imperial forces encounter some resistance, but it is disorganised and falls easily before Dawnish steel and the spells of the war witches. It seems that many of the orcs native to the northern Barrens have already fled before the encroaching armies; those that remain are hard-bitten savages who fight viciously to defend their homes but are soon swept aside. The scattered survivors retreat into the woods to take up lives of petty banditry.

The time is at hand. Now is the day, the season, the Glorious Golden Sun will shine over the Barrens!

General Zoran Orzel of the Golden Sun

Imperial Forces are supported by a field hospital. Perhaps inspired by the words of Empress Lisabetta at her coronation, a number of chirurgeons and physicks fight their own battles against death and disease in support of the Dawnish. Their aid is invaluable in keeping the number of casualties suffered by the Empire to a bare minimum.

Scouts and knights errant report that the Dawnish armies are not the only forces moving in the Barrens, however. There is little concrete information; perhaps the soldiers working with the spy network know more. It certainly appears that the Druj are continuing their campaign of conquest, but they do not come into conflict with the Dawnish. There are confused stories of vicious fighting in the south - most likely with the briar heretics at Dourfell Keep - but the truth of the matter and the outcome are both unclear.

How much longer can the two forces in the Barrens continue to avoid conflict? Rumours of secret compacts are rife.

Game Information : The Barrens

Imperial forces now control Murderdale and Carmine Fields as well as the Dawnish holdings in Dawnguard. To capture the entire territory, the Empire would need to control at least six regions.

Shores of Naris

Two weeks after the Autumn Equinox, a force of barbarian orcs makes landfall along southern Naris in Redoubt. Supported by a shore offensive by Grendel mariners, the orcs quickly establish themselves on the peninsula of Rebekah's Leap, and push north toward Elos.

It seems likely that they intend to try and take the defenders of Redoubt by surprise, but they have reckoned without the Heliopticon. Within hours of the first attack, warnings fly through the air to nearby spires and from there spread out across the entire territory. By dawn the next day, the Urizen nation knows there are orcs in southern Redoubt. The garrison of the Court of the White Fountain is mobilized to support the sentinels and citadels along the coast. It takes some time to traverse the mountain roads, and by the time the defensive forces arrive the invaders have already captured several settlements.

The Heliopticon bears more than just news of the attack. It brings with it the news that these are not Grendel forces - or at least the majority of them are not what the magi of Urizen would describe as Grendel. They are hard, vicious orc barbarians well-versed in fighting in the foothills, and with a significant number of savage battle magicians in their ranks. Many of them bear banners of orange cloth, and beat frenzied unfamiliar rhythms on their drums. A Freeborn merchant visiting the spire of Hanging Rock offers confirmation - against all the odds these are Lasambrian orcs. Oh there are Grendel among them, that much is clear to the spyglasses of Urizen. But the main force is without a doubt made up not of orcs of the Broken Shore but of the western hills, far away on the other side of Segura.

Lasambrian they may be, but they seem to share the Grendel thirst for treasure. The spires that fall to their advance are looted - valuables and citizens alike stolen and sent south toward the coast. The soldiers of the Court of the Fountain slow their advance, providing an opportunity for some of the spires to evacuate - but they cannot halt the orcs.

The most recent reports suggest that the orc force has sent out two very large raiding parties. One is heading north towards the fishing town of Elos. The other is heading north-east towards the largely unprotected spire of Evenstar - a rich hospital specialising in the use of Spring magic and Day magic to treat long-term illness.

Game Information : Redoubt

The invading orcs control roughly a third of the region of Naris, and are well on their way to establishing a beachhead in Redoubt.

Leaves of Grass

The Black Thorns push into Western Scout encountering little resistance from the orcs there. They begin to recapture ruined steadings while hunting for survivors hiding from the Jotun. The work integrating the influx of Navarr thorns into the army is complete, swelling the army's numbers to well over seven thousand. The dead thorns, raised by Winter magic, continue to fight alongside their living brothers and sisters. Hope rises that southern Liathaven can be liberated within a couple of weeks.

Our commitment to revenging ourselves upon the Jotun has not wavered. It is not enough to hurt them or distract them, we must ruin them and force them to compromise everything that makes their nation strong in their attempt to counter our tactics. Imperial Druj? Hardly. We are far darker than that. We are the Empire's Monsters... Make them pay and tell dark stories of us. Take the North. Save our People.

General Ulric Y'Basden of the Black Thorns

Those hopes are smashed less than a month after the Autumn Equinox when a massive Jotun force pours through the mountains from Kahraman and devastates the thorns left behind to consolidate Beacon Point.

The Jotun are angry. If anything, they are even more incandescent with rage that they were the last time they swept through Liathaven. They are a tide of fire and steel purposeful, ruthless, washing east to west and slaughtering everything in their path. They do not waste time - where they encounter fortified resistance they simply burn it out and move on. They offer no quarter. Columns of black smoke mark their progress through the forests.

The Navarr put up a spirited defence but even with their enlarged force they are vastly outnumbered. Over the course of the next two months, three thousand thorns are lost to the Jotun advance. More than died on the Iron Plains. More than fell to the Flux in Reikos. As many soldiers as fell defending the walls of Holfried. Cut to pieces, crushed beneath iron boots, rent asunder by the fury of the barbarian armies who form a veritable wall of death as they root out every Navarr they can find.

Unable to stop the onslaught, the Black Thorns are pushed west. There is no opportunity for them to try and break the Jotun lines - they are too spread out and the Jotun are simply too strong for them. Beacon Point is lost within a month, and the gains the Imperial troops have made in Western Point soon come under attack. There is little doubt the Jotun forces are bent on the complete destruction of the Black Thorns - they seem largely disinterested in capturing territory compared to slaughtering Navarr soldiers.

The rout might have been complete were it not for the efforts of a score of brave thorns fighting alongside the army with their elite military units. There is nothing these seasoned soldiers can do to cut the losses suffered by the army - but their aid is sufficient to slow the attackers and give the army time to regroup. Sadly their numbers are near half what they were last season. The assistance the Black Thorns were receiving from other nations has vanished - and over a third of the elite Navarr units gone with it. But still, many have stayed on, resisting the lure of the Guerdon and the opportunity to get paid for resting their troops in the Mourn.

All is not necessarily lost, not quite yet. The advance of the Jotun is slowed by the need to deal with the forces in Beacon Point. The Black Thorns are still holding on to parts of Western Scout, meaning they still possess a beachhead in Liathaven should they be in a position to fight back against the tide of death advancing on them from the west. Yet it cannot be denied the army is caught in a vice. A Jotun army to the east that seems bent on their complete annihilation. Unknown Jotun forces to the west and south. The Vallorn to the north. Trapped.

Or ... not completely. Paths of Lan Thúven remain open, providing a possibility for retreat through the Vallorn to West Ranging. The Jotun could not follow directly - they would need to circumnavigate the Vallorn, come in to West Ranging from the north - assuming they realised where the Black Thorns had gone of course. They could advance into the northern Lasambrian hills, into Reinos, and thence hope to fight their way back into Kahraman from the west by midsummer. Or they could attack west into the unknown Jotun territories that lie beyond the forest. Or they could try to force their way east, hoping to somehow overwhelm the Jotun advance and make it back through the mountains to Kahraman - but even if that were possible it would likely see significant casualties suffered by the already bloodied army.

Or they could stand and fight - but without significant support it is doubtful if they could survive a second season of the Jotun's fury.

Game Information : Liathaven

The Black Thorns are boxed in in western Liathaven. The Jotun and the Vallorn are between them and the rest of the Empire. If nothing changes during the coming summit, the General of the Black Thorns will have a difficult decision to make. A civil service expert will be on hand during the coming summit to discuss the strategic situation with the general in more detail. A rough assessment of the army's options would be:

- They could stay where they are, or try to push east into Beacon Point and hope to drive the Jotun back.
- They could attempt to push through the Jotun line and reach Serra Damata, but doing so would likely result in significant casualties even for an army as swift as the Black Thorns.
- They could, of course, advance south into the Lasambrian Hills territory of Reinos - but they would then have to spend a season in that territory before they could move east into Kahraman.
- They could push west into the unknown Jotun territory beyond Liathaven.
- They could use the Paths of Lan Thúven to cross the Vallorn to the north - but if they did so they would stop once they entered the Jotun-controlled region of West Ranging and this move would be subject to the normal rules for attacking a disconnected region.

Regardless of what happens, the opportunity presented to enlarge the Black Thorns has been completed - indeed, without the additional troops provided by that opportunity, the Black Thorns would be in an even worse state than they currently are.

Major Conjunctions

The civil service has identified five major conjunctions of the Sentinel Gate that are expected to be available during the coming summit.

On Saturday, two major conjunctions have been identified - but the heroes of the Empire will only be able to take advantage of one of them. Both open in Redoubt. One opens near the fishing town of Elos, the other near the hospital spire of Evenstar. The civil service predicts that either of these conjunctions could be used to head off one of the two large barbarian raiding forces.

On Sunday, three conjunctions have been identified that will allow Imperial heroes to engage the Jotun - but again only one can be taken advantage of. The first opens in Liathaven and offers an opportunity to get the Black Thorns moving through the Paths of Lan Thúven, potentially helping to get the army out of southern Liathaven. The second also opens in Liathaven and offers an opportunity to support the Black Thorns - potentially offering them assistance in holding their beachhead in Western Scout if they receive assistance from other Imperial armies. The third conjunction opens in the Mournwold, and offers an opportunity to secure information about the Jotun's plans for their campaign along the western front.

By the time of the Winter Solstice summit, the civil service will have completed reports for each of the five major conjunctions, which will be presented to the generals during the Muster. The final decision about which two major conjunctions to exploit, and who will take part in the battles, is the heavy responsibility of the generals alone.

381YE Autumn Equinox Speaker's Notes

1) is it going to be possible to render the election of ambassadors an administrative motion.?

- No

2) cost of expedition around the bay of catazaar, for name and numbers and nations of territories

- This is interesting, not entirely sure how to proceed - it sounds like the

3) could we change the a schedule of ambassadorial appointments?

- Yes, there is precedence for short election sessions if you wanted to move

4) " To begin construction in Nemoria, capital of Asavea, of a Temple of the Way" - progress, and title?

- Completed, having an effect already, nobody has been assigned to the liaso

5) does the docks in sarvos increase imperial taxation there.? Specifically the arsenal...

- It may ultimately increase taxation but as with every single great work we

6) general estabanas folly - do follys have upkeep? Constitutiinal impact?

- No, they do not have an upkeep

7) re Disburse funds to the Jarmish Cartel - what do we know about whats happened as a result?

8) can a great work be targeted to improve taxation directly?

- no

9) does presence in a territory improve tax income?

- yes, if you hold a business.

10) the marchers would like to assign military units to the singing caves - to blockade the egress of mithril.

- You couldn't enact that with Military Units. You could use either an army

11) is the opportunity to rebuild the spire of oblivion's edge still available?

- We are not aware of any such oppertunity existing, having checked back thr

11a) wow. I read a pd-branded print-out of the opportunity the guy was holding - either I got the critucal word wrong, or its a forgery. I'll check.

12) would the construction of a road to faraden interact with a trade route to faraden using the trod through feroz?

- Could you clarify what you mean by "Interact"? Is there a specific game ob

12a) an extension to the blood red roads, and the trade route specified in a motiion earlier tiday.

13) "Ambassador to Axos: Tarquinius" was elected last autumn, thunks he should be up for relelection, but he's not on our list...

14) wayleave, usaable to make a title auctiined in the bourse?

15) wayleave - can make congregational sinecures? (Qv limit on cc commissions?)

16) how much weirwood does the great forest fort opportunity to stay live? (Presume consistent with other ckmissiins ie "A Senate commission has a year to begin construction from the date it passes.")

17) is it constitutional to relinquish a bourse seat such that it can be reassigned?"

381YE Autumn Equinox Synod judgements

Overview

During the Autumn Equinox 381YE, the Imperial Synod raised 87 judgements.

The successful recognition of Navarr as an exemplar by the Wisdom Assembly will be escalated to the General Assembly at the Winter Solstice 381YE.

Change of doctrine

No change of doctrine was attempted during the Summit.

Veto

No veto was sought during the Summit.

Statement of principle

Number	Assembly	Statement of Principle	Priest	Outcome
3	General	To recognise the Loyalty and Wisdom to the Empire of General Irontide Skar in the manipulation, ambushing and slaying of the Druj Magester Green Mask; and the Brackensong Coven in the recovery of the vital Spring ritual from Green Mask's mind.	Irontide Lok	Upheld 648 - 65
9	Courage	Recognising the Courage of Pavel in the actions he took in retrieving the Regalia of the Archmage of Spring from the Realms, last summit. He risked his life for the safe return of valuable Imperial Property, and his Courage is recognised.	Amahel	Upheld 176 - 14 Greater Majority
16	Dawn	The Dawnish Assembly is appalled that one of the courageous and loyal Imperial Orcs was mistaken for a treacherous Druj. We would seek to educate our citizens of the Virtuous deeds of our fellow Imperials and would invite an orc priest to accompany a troubadour around our Nation, specifically to those places least visited by citizens of the wider Empire.	Ozren Ivarovich Severyan	Upheld 126 - 10 Greater Majority
17	General	The current holder of the Blood Cloak schema will be sharing this with the Empire, in response to this display of Loyalty (something no Blood Cloak general has done before). I move that the rest of the Empire should display Loyalty in return and provide what resources and funds they can to raise this army and reduce casualties in battle for the Prosperity of	Helka Ingessdottir	Upheld 807 - 136

		the Empire. As an Empire we made of many nations. Each nation has its own skills, hearth magic, beliefs and Bourse resources. It is working of these different traits, guided by the Virtues, together that makes the Empire strong and great. Every nation should be proud of these traditions and support them, from Urizen poise to the Heroism of Wintermark. Be proud of your place in the Empire.
21	General		Amris Johan Merikovich	Upheld 971 - 69
22	General	It is disloyal to deny support to the armies of the Empire. We believe the powers of the Virtue Inquisitors should be expanded. They should be granted one additional judgement of inquisition to be raised only in their Virtue assembly and subject to the assembly's vote. A Virtue Inquisitor is still a priest who must represent their congregation; they should not have to choose between them and their duty as an inquisitor.	Alderai	Upheld 497 - 473
23	General	We appreciate the actions of Iron Osric, General of the Green Shield. During military council and other meetings he has courageously supported the interests of Wintermark even in the face of opposition. Let it be known that the Wintermark National Assembly stands behind his Virtue. Currently the Virtue Assembly Inquisitors are appointed by Cardinals. The job of an Inquisitor however, is to seek truth and question all. As such, the position of Inquisitor should not be reliant on political patronage and should instead, only be answerable to the Virtue and Virtue Assembly. In light of this,	Pahkina	Upheld 804 - 126
24	Wintermark		Ylmiska Ferbow	Upheld 207 - 0 Greater Majority
26	General		Ranae de Rondell of Dawn	Upheld 697 - 353

		the position of Virtue Assembly Inquisitor should be an elected one - chosen by Virtue Assembly.
27	General	Many people did not listen to Rosamund Holt in life. My Loyalty to her means I want her to be heard now she is gone. Attached is a copy of the message I read for her at her funeral. The Synod agrees she lived a Virtuous life.	Tess	Not upheld 79 - 608
31	General	I act on what I know. As Archimandrite of the New Scions of Atun I express my profound disappointment in the newly discovered actions of my predecessor Yael. In the creation of the Golden Fragment, previously seen as evidence for her claims, she cast doubt on all her work. I can no longer support it as truth. But this does not detract from the purpose of the New Scions: our work to perfect the Way through gathered evidence continues.	Edward Novarion	Upheld 713 - 96
35	General	It is Virtuous to celebrate victories with merriment, to remember our fallen with respect and inspiration, to learn from our losses may we continue to remember and learn.	Bucklund	Upheld 815 - 62
38	Marcher	The people of the Mourn are miners. The Singing Caves is their greatest achievement as miners. They have waited years to be liberated, denied their just reward by the Jotun. Prosperity demands that we return the just reward to those who have earned it. The Singing Caves should be returned to the Mournwolders. Mournwolder Land, Mournwolder Prosperity.	Thomas of Mournwold	Upheld 72 - 0 Greater Majority
39	Marcher	To the people of Whittle. The Jotun drove you to hate. This was not your way before. This is the last chain they have on you. When you put it aside you will be free of their influence.	Brother Hugh	Upheld 72 - 0 Greater Majority
40	General	As the generals of the Empire bear the weight of great responsibility on their soul, we believe that they would be better supported and the Virtue of their orders and declarations less likely to be challenged if they are Dedicated. As such, we suggest and support the Dedication of all those who stand on the military council.	Dietrich Elias der Holburghan	Not upheld 439 - 558
41	General	“Knowledge” is not a true Virtue and cannot compel citizens into heresy, nor diminish their enjoyment of tomatoes or fruit salads.	Hawker Ringbane	Not upheld 281 - 286
44	Dawn	The National Assembly sends the High Bard Lady Kaywenn Du Launcet to Semmerholm to inspire the people there to fiercely resist the Druj by singing the “Song for Semmerholm” In being deceived there is no shame; But deceivers will lie and lie again.	Elayne Novarion	Upheld 148 - 0 Greater Majority

45	General	Yael's complicity in deceit and untruth Renders all her teachings moot. Any value that she shared Must now be proven out elsewhere.	Ser Criseyde	Upheld 812 - 104
46	General	To recognise and praise the Courage of Dogri Thulesbane and acknowledge his actions while criminal were also Virtuous.	Maarit Suvidottir	Upheld 594 - 275
48	Brass Coast	We were heartened by the rescue of our cousins from the Isle of Zemress and we would welcome them in settling in Segura. We are certain that their resourceful skills and work ethic will contribute greatly to the Prosperity of the province and we will be happy to smooth their full integration back into the Empire.	Mazo i Zabala i Erigo	Upheld 76 - 0 Greater Majority
49	League	The League feels for the orphans of the war in the Mourn. The League has a strong tradition of supporting orphans and guiding them to reach their true, Virtuous potential. The League therefore seek to provide support in the Marches for the orphans of Mournwold.	Cesare Enzo Di Trivento	Upheld 142 - 0
50	Urizen	Removing your opponent's desire to fight is the first step to victory. This assembly applauds the Wisdom shown by the strategists of the Military Council and the General of the Wolves of War and the General of the Red Wind Corsairs in depriving the Grendel of the economic bounty of the Legacy's production. We urge all those opposing the Grendel in our territory of Spiral and at home and abroad to follow their example, to harass baggage trains and impair production. Let the Grendel know no profit while they remain in Spiral.	Maximillian of Ankarien	Upheld 160 - 0 Greater Majority
52	Urizen	We find that Storm of Curses is likely not to have strategic merit over the benefits of Cyclic Resonance, therefore we do not advocate unleashing our magical armies powers in this way. While we believe that all tools should be considered we do not advocate cruelty without justification.	Tarquinius	Upheld 110 - 0
54	Navarr	We support the Marchers in reclaiming their lands from the Jotun as we also support reclaiming all lost Imperial territories from the Jotun. We exhort all Navarr to pursue this goal.	Corey Wayfarer	Upheld 110 - 0 Greater Majority
55	League	Citizens of Sarvos should not be afraid or reluctant to employ the orcs graduating from the College of the Liberated. We have invested in their Prosperity and should enjoy the rewards, and enable them to reach their full potential.	Illaria Notturmo di Sarovs	Upheld 178 - 0 Greater Majority
		The Pride Assembly recognises the hard work of the following people in making the League Theatre a success; in demonstrating Pride in

57	Pride	their national culture and the arts, and building a platform to showcase and lift up the arts from the League and across the Empire: Ephelides Sanguineo Rezia Hardfrost di Tassato - artistic director Coraphine Fiore di Tassato, Idwyn Splitroot, Darnyen Volkov Von Temeshwar, Bica and Maeve from the Temeschbar	Astrid Rezia di Tassato	Upheld 159 - 0
59	General	Under normal circumstances, a priest should not perform a rite on a citizen or their property without their agreement. Consecrated areas should be marked so that citizens know that an aura exists before deciding whether to enter the area.	Eevi	Not upheld 413 - 459
61	General	To accuse someone of a religious crime without being able to define that religious crime is not only very stupid, it is unvirtuous.* *The reason I raise this is because this should be obvious but it does not appear to be.	Kerem	Upheld 606 - 120
62	Prosperity	It has been suggested that the practice of raising husks is comparable with the keeping of slaves. We, the Prosperity Assembly, hold this to be false. Husks are bodies devoid of souls, animated by magical power. Slaves are alive, and possess souls. The use of husks in a manner does not deprive citizens of their livelihood, is not unprosperous.	Yarona of the Chantry	Upheld 197 - 0 Greater Majority
63	Varushka	That Varushka is known for its hospitality and as such will offer hospitality to all of the Empire, be they pauper or prince, single archer or entire army.	Vukomir Maryankovich Zverokaz	Upheld 88 - 0 Greater Majority
65	Courage	The Courage Assembly will decide the fate of the Courage Shield Torchbrand.	Nina of Cantiararch's Hold	Upheld 104 - 0
66	Prosperity	If 20 fleets trade with Axou every season for four seasons it is likely that Axos will recognise the Prosperity of the Empire and move to cease the use of slaves. The Assembly of Prosperity therefore recognises the Prosperity of fleet trading with the Axou and encourage citizens to do so where they are able.	Morgan Leafstalker	Upheld 171 - 0 Greater Majority
67	Prosperity	In recognition of the actions and intentions of the Eastern Principalities of Jarm, and the understanding that they continue, to abolish the vile institution of slavery. It would increase the Prosperity of the Empire and its citizens, as well as that of the Eastern Principalities, if Imperial fleet captains were to visit the trading ports of the Eastern Principalities and engage in trade with the traders and merchants there. We commend the Ambition of Medea Ruth's	Ezekiel of the Chantry	Upheld 187 - 0 Greater Majority

68	Urizen	work on horses, and encourage her to consider collaboration with other interested parties, including Aloysius Sunspire.	Medea Ruth Irremais	Upheld 100 - 10
72	General	The General Assembly condemns the use of wanton battlefield executions of foes with personhood. As such, we urge that they only be used when generals deem them necessary and issue clear orders in this respect. Our foes lose respect for us day by day - let the Empire be judged on its official military decisions, not the whims of individuals in the heat of battle. Cleave to Virtue.	Constanza i Kalamar i Guerra	Upheld 621 - 156
73	Pride	We recognise that the Highborn Assembly seeks to reaffirm their commitment to the Doctrine of the Synod that they founded. We recognise the Pride that inspires this action.	Azekah	Upheld 134 - 0
75	Nine	The Assembly of Nine request the Silent Bell investigate the location of "Oath-Heart", the legendary shield of Loyalty, once borne by Drumlin the Sworn of Wintermark.	Veikko	Upheld 6 - 0 Greater Majority
76	Nine	The schism over Yael's vision has divided the Empire too long; what threatens the Empire ultimately threatens the Way. New evidence, corroborated by both Yael's supporters and detractors, demonstrates that a significant document on which her philosophy relied was falsified by her hand. In Virtue, we face unwelcome truths as boldly as a barbarian charge. In Virtue, we act on what we learn, knowing our knowledge is incomplete. When new proof arises, we accept it and move forward. The Assembly of Nine calls on the Synod and the Empire to end this schism, and move forward.	Abaddon De Rondell	Upheld 7 - 0 Greater Majority
77	Loyalty	I wish to put the words and assurances of my peers into action, regarding the Iron Helms. The actions of the Iron Helms against the traitor Dogri Thulesbane and their use of cruelty as a tool in the Mournwold, have shown only their Loyalty to the Empire and their actions are not unvirtuous.	Bogdan	Upheld 56 - 20
78	General	The trods connect the Empire and must be walked. The faithful should try to use them as often as possible.	Aneira Exiles End	Upheld 576 - 32
79	Nine	The use of cruel tactics by any army is unvirtuous. Cruel tactics inspire fear and hatred in our enemies and allies alike. They diminish the spirit of all they touch, and we of the Nine will lead the Synod in providing spiritual governance to all Generals who employ them. The vote count in this judgement has been contested by Cardinal Azekah of the Assembly	Ricardo di Tassato	Upheld 6 - 1 Greater Majority of Nine who wishes it noted that their vote has been incorrectly recorded.

80	Imperial Orc	The worth of our armies is not written with cruelty, our legends are not made by harming civilians. We do not need dogs and beasts to fight our wars for us. We are heroes of the Empire, we are Imperial Orcs.	Gralka	Upheld 36 - 0 Greater Majority
81	Marcher	We invite Marcher and Imperial Orc preachers to the Mourn to talk to the free orcs of the Mourn (the former Jotun thralls) and preach to them about the Way. We encourage the Virtuous folks of the Mourn to support these preachers and ensure their voices are heard. In return, we invite stewards or other leaders of the free orcs of the Mourn to come to Anvil and make their concerns heard, so that the Empire will not decide for them, but with them.	Hrodin	Upheld 62 - 0 Greater Majority
83	Marcher	All good Marcher folk should recognise and support the Virtuous acts achieved by Marcher folk in support of the Mourn. That Thomas of Hay and Asher Holt convinced Conclave to sponsor a mana sinecure built by Dicky Holberg dedicated to healing and healing magics. The Loyalty shown by Unwavering Ned Cullach in taking the stain on his soul of the evil shit what's been done to us in the Mourn by entering the Wicker Man. That Robert Dunlain, our new Mournish Senator, has invited the Whittlefolk back home. That Benedick Goodfellow and Beatrice Greenhill have given to the Mourn the Prosperity-blessed wool sheared from the last sheep in the Mourn before it fell 30 year ago. A lot good been done for the Mourn, and the Marches as a whole should recognise this.	Robin of Swindale	Upheld 72 - 0 Greater Majority
84	Marcher	All good Marcher folk should recognise and support the Virtuous acts achieved by Imperial folk in support of the Mourn. That Long Tom and Helios Bitter Chalice got Rivers Run Red and Mountain Remembers Its Youth interdicted in Conclave. That Cesare Enzo Di Trivento is bringing missionaries from the Church of the Little Mother to build orphanages and schools. That the Winterfolk passed through the Senate to build a memorial to the heroes what died fighting for the Mourn at Overton, paid for by the kiddies of the Artisan's Arms. That Ricardo de Tassato has, as the Assembly of Nine, started the wider condemnation of the cruelty what we been seeing in the Mourn. We the assembly recognise Tarquinius, ambassador to the Axou, for his work in revealing to the Axou that Prosperity may be obtained without slavery. This has opened a way to induce the Axou to denounce slavery.

At the request of those cut off from the Empire in the Mourn, and in conjunction with our statement of principle and shared understanding on the use of cruel tactics, we intend to send missionaries to bring the Way and support reintegration of the Mournwolders, led by Bloodcrow Losak.

Belakov Prochnost Not upheld 46 - 0
- 36 Highguard We cannot prove for certain if Yael was the first Empress reborn or not. Regardless of this and no matter who Yael was, the Land without Tears is not part of doctrine and preaching it as such is Heresy. We refute the claim of the Land without Tears and encourage our citizens to look to only those Doctrines which have been debated and agreed upon by the Synod rather than allowing one figure to tear our faith and our Empire apart. We the priests of Highguard send Melchior of Adina's Charge with 250 Liao to spread this message to the citizens of Highguard.

Sophus Cascade Upheld 154 - 22
Following the death of Lucretius, Sophus nominates Zeno, Stallion's Sibling to go in their place. Verified by the Tribunes of the Synod.
Despite the successful approval of this mandate

		by the Urizen National Assembly - Zeno has opted not to take up the mandate, therefore it will not take effect.
64	Brass Coast	All things can have a price. We send Gonzalo i Riqueza, known as "Lupo" with 25 liao to remind people of their prosperity as well as their courage and to take a ransom from those foes we defeat rather than count their bodies. We will fill our souls with virtue and our pouches with coin. The liao for this mandate has been provided by Gonzalo i Riqueza following the Autumn Equinox. The Blood Red Roads will connect the people of the Empire and make them stronger. This project is one of the most Ambitious in Imperial history. It demonstrates the Benevolence of Lorenzo "La Volpe" Macelliao von Temeschwar, and will stand as a lasting Legacy. We send Jonah Yakovitch with 25 liao to encourage the faithful to aid in this endeavour. The liao for this mandate has been provided by Jonah Yakovitch following the Autumn Equinox. Evaluation

The Synod made the following judgements of excommunication, inquisition, revocation, and sanction.

Number	Assembly	Judgement	Raised By	Outcome
6	Courage	Revocation. I call for the Revocation of Cardinal Jorma Steelhail of the Assembly of Courage. My reasons are thus: He is a dangerous criminal, having assaulted Aarne of Wintermark in the Hub, seemingly unprovoked. He is a danger to those around him and should not be in a position of authority. His Loyalty to the Empire is in question, after showing unrepentant support for the traitor and murderer Dogri Thulebane, who refused Imperial order and led in the murder of hundreds of Proud, Noble Varushkan soldiers of the Iron Helms. He is a vain, self-serving fool, who was only appointed as Gatekeeper by the late Cardinal Asher to “[shut him up and keep him busy]”. Inquire at the Calf’s Head pub in Varushka if you wish to discuss this with me.	Ezys	Not upheld 52 - 131
7	General	Inquisition. I hereby call to Inquisition the following who are bound in a sect in the Chantry of the Silver Skull: Tabitha, Kerem, Liora, Tova, Onan, Lilith, Yarona. Regarding their singing of songs about the Land Without Tears. Saturday 16:30 Autumn Equinox 381 YE at the Highborn Chapel.	Ephron of Adina’s Charge	Upheld 503 - 143
14	Urizen	Revocation. The Revocation of Senator Zenith (Edmundo) based upon evidence indicating that they have neglected the	Zeno, Stallion’s Sibling	Upheld 114 - 102

		military situation with Zenith and Urizen as a nation, leading to increased inefficiency and casualties.
15	Urizen	Revocation. The Revocation of Senator of Redoubt (Probus) based upon evidence indicative that they have neglected the military situation with Redoubt and Urizen as a nation, leading to increased inefficiency and casualties.	Sejanus	Upheld 148 - 38
18	Pride	Inquisition. I call Ser Kay of House Ossienne to answer allegations of a serious nature regarding religious crimes that have been discovered in Dawn. He is summoned to the tent of Zephaniah's Lament in the Highborn camp at 2:30 today (Saturday, Autumn Equinox 381 YE)	Ephrael	Upheld 185 - 0
19	Pride	Inquisition. We wish to question Orlene De Ossienne regarding serious heresy and blasphemy that has been discovered in Dawn. This will take place at 2:30pm (Saturday, Autumn Equinox 381 YE) in Zephaniah's Lament tent.	Jaylus	Upheld 175 - 0
20	Prosperity	Inquisition. I call Kyra of the Halcyon Spire to Inquisition at 4pm on Saturday, Autumn 381 YE, at Lumis Teahouse, Wintermark to investigate the situation regarding the election of the Archmage of Day and what has occurred since.	Vauraus Korppitkotka	Upheld 57 - 0
25	Dawn	Sanction: Condemnation. The glorious troubadours of Dawn vigorously condemn the Order of the Golden Heart for continued preaching of the false doctrine of the Land Without Tears and support of the heretic Yael. To whit: Ser Criseyde Vandale, Ser Thomas Aurelius, Ser Elayne Novarion.	The Dread Princess Orlene Ossienne	Withdrawn by raising priest at 40 - 52
28	Wintermark	Revocation. Through no fault of Virtue, merely her inability to attend the Anvil summits. We reappoint the Watcher of Britta's Pool. Eldeen Wulfdottir.	Veli Garwulfson	Upheld 185 - 0
32	General	Sanction: Vindication. Raise Inquisition to Vindication of Thamnir Hrafnar.	Bloodcrow Ergot	Upheld 256 - 73
33	Prosperity	Inquisition. I call Mord and Vaan of the Auric Horizon to Inquisition at 9pm of Saturday, Autumn Equinox 381 YE, at Lumi's Teahouse, Wintermark to investigate the situation regarding the election of the Archmage of Day and what has occurred since.	Krzysztof Vladovich Pultova	Upheld 77 - 0
		Sanction: Vindication. Escalation of Judgement 82 from Summer 381YE. Gully the Varushkan General has been

34	Pride	involved in trying to solve the problem of the husk army in Weirwater. A lot of misinformation about this issue has been spread and requires more investigation but Gully has acted with common sense grounded in Vigilance and Loyalty to the Empire. Sanction: Vindication. Escalation of Judgement 52 from Summer 381YE.	Lady Josephine Novarion	Upheld 123 - 0
42	General	After inquisition I find that Gralka Skywise acted virtuously in seeking to recognise a miracle and should go forth and raise a debate in the wider Synod concerning the implication of orcish miracles in our understanding of the Way. Sanction: Vindication. Escalation of Judgement 54 from Summer 381YE.	Ephron of Adina's Charge	Upheld 542 - 50
43	General	Following the Inquisition of Imperatrix Lisabetta, this Assembly (under the findings and guidance of the Auditor of Senatorial Accountability) finds that the funds removed from the Senate funds under the Throne's power of Hand of the Chancellor have been and should continue to be used solely for matters that benefit the Empire directly.	Zeno, Stallion's Sibling	Upheld 733 - 10
53	Vigilance	Inquisition. Inquisition of Heilyn Bronwen's Rest, at his request, Sunday morning (Autumn 381 YE), as soon as he is free for this purpose, over his address to the Empire. Sanction: Penitence. Escalation of Judgement 7	Martin Orchard	Upheld 88 - 0
56	General	Following inquisition, I find that Tabitha, Kerem, Liora, Tova, Onan, Lilith and Yarona of the Chantry of Silver Skulls, by singing a song of The Land Without Tears at execution of Yael, did not pose such a risk to the souls of the Virtuous as to merit a heresy charge. But nonetheless they set an example that must be opposed. Their penance shall be to publicly reaffirm their acceptance of Doctrine and spread this message to the delegates at Anvil. They accept this judgement and their recent actions show their intent to set this right. Sanction: Vindication. Escalation of Judgement 65 from Summer 381YE.	Ephron of Adina's Charge	Upheld 697 - 108

70	Urizen	not find Irada to have acted unvirtuously in this matter. Sanction: Vindication. Escalation of Judgement 75 from Summer 381YE. We the Urizen National Assembly recognise that the teachings of the Disciples of the Tempest Jade Maiden encourage Virtuous action. Consequently we believe that they and other groups of sword scholars are following teachings that promote virtue. This follows the inquisition on the Saturday of this summit. Sanction: Penance. Escalation of Judgement 48 from Summer 381YE.	Edmundo	Upheld 154 - 0
82	Marcher	Jack Flint showed Courage in battle in his rescue of Galbraith Rosencrantz. He showed Courage in stating his opinion, unwelcome as it was. He was not field marshal and none had a duty to obey. Jack was found lacking in the Pride needed to take responsibility for and stand up for his choices. He has been tasked to seek a friar's guidance. For his lack of Wisdom in not asking deeper questions over the Mourn curses, he takes the Brand of Irremais and the landskeeper's guidance.	Martin Orchard	Upheld 62 - 0

Assembly Strength

At the start of the summit the voting total of the General Assembly was calculated to be 2128

The final voting total of the General Assembly was estimated to be 2377

The Civil Service reminds citizens that determining whether a judgement has achieved a Greater Majority counts from the estimation of the assembly strength when scrutiny on the judgement closes, not the final assembly strength at the end of the summit.

At the end of the Autumn Equinox 381 YE the voting strength of the Virtue and national assemblies were estimated to be:

Virtue Assembly	Initial Voting Strength	Final Voting Strength	Final Greater Majority

Synod Judgements

At the Summit, the following judgements were made by the Assemblies of the Synod:

Number	Assembly	Judgement	Raised By	Outcome
1	Loyalty	Appointment of the Cardinal.	Civil Service	Veikko was appointed
2	Pride	Appointment of the Cardinal. Mandate. A hero's tale ends with a good death - for us or our enemies. We send Gunnbrand Ironwill with 25 liao to urge	Civil Service	Azekah was reappointed

4	Wintermark	our warriors to face the Jotun on the battlefield as heroes, and strive with every sinew for victory, not for slaughter. Thus will we let the grimnir of either side treat their fallen	Aarne Ceorling	Upheld 249 - 23
5	General	Rewarding. In recognition of his Virtue in Courageously acting when others hesitated and the Vigilance shown by moving to cease the spread of heresy; for condemning the heretic Yael, and diligently pursuing that unto its end; the general assembly rewards Aarne Ceorling 4 Thrones. Revocation. I call for the Revocation of Cardinal Jorma Steelhail of the Assembly of Courage. My reasons are thus: He is a dangerous criminal, having assaulted Aarne of Wintermark in the Hub, seemingly unprovoked. He is a danger to those around him and should not be in a position of authority. His Loyalty to the Empire is in question, after showing unrepentant support for the traitor and murderer Dogri Thulebane, who refused Imperial order and led in the murder of hundreds of Proud, Noble Varushkan soldiers of the Iron Helms. He is a vain, self-serving fool, who was only appointed as Gatekeeper by the late Cardinal Asher to “[shut him up and keep him busy]”. Inquire at the Calf’s Head pub in Varushka if you wish to discuss this with me.	Gunnbrand Ironwill	Not upheld 198 - 325
6	Courage	Inquisition. I hereby call to Inquisition the following who are bound in a sect in the Chantry of the Silver Skull: Tabitha, Kerem, Liora, Tova, Onan, Lilith, Yarona. Regarding their singing of songs about the	Ezys	Not upheld 52 - 131

		Land Without Tears. Saturday 16:30 Autumn Equinox 381 YE at the Highborn Chapel.
8	Urizen	Mandate. We send the named priest Lucretius of the Twisted Spire, Priest of Urizen and Sentinel of the Citadel Guard, with 100 doses of liao to inspire the Citadel Guard to unleash the full extent of our powers and rain death upon our enemies.	Lucretius	Withdrawn by raising priest at 60 - 80
10	General	Rewarding. As High Exorcist, I withdraw 7 Thrones, pursuant to my duties. This is with the expectation that this power is reverted to a Senate Stipend as soon as economically feasible.	Solas	Upheld automatically
11	Navarr	As a power of the High Exorcist this Judgement passes without a vote. Mandate. We send Brat Umbral Path with 50 doses of liao to exhort every Imperial soldier to slaughter our Empire's enemies with ruthless abandon!	Brat Umbral Path	Not upheld 84 - 59
		Imperatrix Lisabetta invoked the Throne's Power of Custodian of Virtue , making this judgement require a Greater Majority to pass.
		Recognition. We recognise Navarr as an Exemplar of Wisdom. She displayed Benevolence in spending her adult life creating the Trods. She displayed Inspiration in the great numbers who flocked to hear her speak and followed her.
12	Wisdom	Her first journeys along the trods are already recognised as a sign of Pilgrimage in the life of Thorn. Navarr's legacy is self evident - her journeys and teachings founded a nation.	Erasmus di Tassato	Upheld 183 - 0
13	Loyalty	Appointment of the Quaymaster of the Black Sails	Civil Service	Illaria Notturmo di Sarvos was appointed
14	Urizen	Revocation. The Revocation of Senator Zenith (Edmundo) based upon evidence indicating that they have neglected the military situation with Zenith and Urizen as a nation, leading to increased inefficiency and casualties.	Zeno, Stallion's Sibling	Upheld 114 - 102
15	Urizen	Revocation. The Revocation of Senator of Redoubt (Probus) based upon evidence indicative that they have neglected the military situation with Redoubt and Urizen	Sejanus	Upheld 148 - 38

		as a nation, leading to increased inefficiency and casualties.
18	Pride	Inquisition. I call Ser Kay of House Ossienne to answer allegations of a serious nature regarding religious crimes that have been discovered in Dawn. He is summoned to the tent of Zephaniah's Lament in the Highborn camp at 2:30 today (Saturday, Autumn Equinox 381 YE)	Ephrael	Upheld 185 - 0
19	Pride	Inquisition. We wish to question Orlene De Ossienne regarding serious heresy and blasphemy that has been discovered in Dawn. This will take place at 2:30pm (Saturday, Autumn Equinox 381 YE) in Zephaniah's Lament tent.	Jaylus	Upheld 175 - 0
20	Prosperity	Inquisition. I call Kyra of the Halcyon Spire to Inquisition at 4pm on Saturday, Autumn 381 YE, at Lumis Teahouse, Wintermark to investigate the situation regarding the election of the Archmage of Day and what has occurred since.	Vaurus Korppitkotka	Upheld 57 - 0
25	Dawn	Sanction: Condemnation. The glorious troubadours of Dawn vigorously condemn the Order of the Golden Heart for continued preaching of the false doctrine of the Land Without Tears and support of the heretic Yael. To whit: Ser Criseyde Vandale, Ser Thomas Aurelius, Ser Elayne Novarion.	The Dread Princess Orlene Ossienne	Withdrawn by raising priest at 40 - 52
28	Wintermark	Revocation. Through no fault of Virtue, merely her inability to attend the Anvil summits. We reappoint the Watcher of Britta's Pool. Eldeen Wulfdottir.	Veli Garwulfson	Upheld 185 - 0
29	Varushkan	We send Belakov Prochnost with 50 doses of liao to exhort every Imperial soldier to slaughter our Empire's enemies with ruthless abandon.	Belakov Prochnost	Not upheld 46 - 0
		Imperatrix Lisabetta invoked the Throne's Power of Custodian of Virtue , making this judgement require a Greater Majority to pass.
30	General	Rewarding. Reward Livia with 5 Thrones from the Virtue fund for the purchase of liao for the duties of the Seer of the Gateway.	Livia Cascade	Upheld automatically
		As a power of the Seer of the Gateway this Judgement passes without a vote.
32	General	Sanction: Vindication. Raise Inquisition to Vindication of Thamnir Hrafnar.	Bloodcrow Ergot	Upheld 256 - 73
		Inquisition. I call Mord and Vaan of the Auric Horizon to Inquisition at 9pm of

33	Prosperity	Saturday, Autumn Equinox 381 YE, at Lumi's Teahouse, Wintermark to investigate the situation regarding the election of the Archmage of Day and what has occurred since. Sanction: Vindication. Escalation of Judgement 82 from Summer 381YE. Gully the Varushkan General has been involved in trying to solve the problem of the husk army in Weirwater. A lot of misinformation about this issue has been spread and requires more investigation but Gully has acted with common sense grounded in Vigilance and Loyalty to the Empire.	Krzysztof Vladovich Pultova	Upheld 77 - 0
34	Pride	Mandate. We cannot prove for certain if Yael was the first Empress reborn or not. Regardless of this and no matter who Yael was, the Land without Tears is not part of doctrine and preaching it as such is Heresy. We refute the claim of the Land without Tears and encourage our citizens to look to only those Doctrines which have been debated and agreed upon by the Synod rather than allowing one figure to tear our faith and our Empire apart. We the priests of Highguard send Melchior of Adina's Charge with 250 Liao to spread this message to the citizens of Highguard.	Lady Josephine Novarion	Upheld 123 - 0
36	Highguard	The Navarr assembly send Tynan Lonestriker with 25 Liao to urge Navarr apothecaries, physicks and brokers to share what herbs they can spare with our guests and allies. Sanction: Vindication. Escalation of Judgement 52 from Summer 381YE. 69	General	Sanction: Vindication. Escalation of Judgement 65 from Summer 381YE. I have escalated my judgement of inquisition upon Irada von Temeschwar, raised at the Summer Solstice 381 YE. I do not find Irada to have acted unvirtuously in this matter.	Solas	Upheld 452 - 20
70	Urizen	Sanction: Vindication. Escalation of Judgement 75 from Summer 381YE. We the Urizen National Assembly recognise that the teachings of the Disciples of the Tempest Jade Maiden encourage Virtuous action. Consequently we believe that they and other groups of sword scholars are following teachings that promote virtue. This follows the inquisition on the Saturday of this summit.	Edmundo	Upheld 154 - 0
71	General	Mandate. The Blood Red Roads will connect the people of the Empire and make them stronger. This project is one of the most Ambitious in Imperial history. It demonstrates the Benevolence of Lorenzo “La Volpe” Macelliao von Temeschwar, and will stand as a lasting Legacy. We send Jonah Yakovitch with 25 liao to encourage the faithful to aid in this endeavour.	Jonah Yakovitch	Upheld 508 - 165
74	League	Mandate. The works of Lorenzo “La Volpe” Macelliao von Temeschwar stand as testaments not to a single virtue, but to everything it means to be part of the League. The Imperial Synod sends Ricardo di Tassatto with 25 doses of liao to encourage individuals across the League to embrace the inspiration of the Bloody Butchers; where others build cities, we build nations.	Irada von Temeschwar	Not upheld 56 - 108
82	Marcher	Sanction: Penance. Escalation of Judgement 48 from Summer 381YE. Jack Flint showed Courage in battle in his rescue of Galbraith Rosencrantz. He showed Courage in stating his opinion, unwelcome as it was. He was not field marshal and none had a duty to obey. Jack was found lacking in the Pride needed to take responsibility for and stand up for his choices. He has been tasked to seek a friar’s guidance. For his lack of Wisdom in not asking deeper questions over the Mourn curses, he takes the Brand of Irremais and the landskeeper’s guidance. Inquisition. Statements of Principle

The Imperial Synod made the following Statements of Principle:

Number	Assembly	Statement of Principle	Priest	Outcome
3	General	To recognise the Loyalty and Wisdom to the Empire of General Irontide Skar in the manipulation, ambushing and slaying of the Druj Magester Green Mask; and the Brackensong Coven in the recovery of the vital Spring ritual from Green Mask's mind.	Irontide Lok	Upheld 648 - 65
9	Courage	Recognising the Courage of Pavel in the actions he took in retrieving the Regalia of the Archmage of Spring from the Realms, last summit. He risked his life for the safe return of valuable Imperial Property, and his Courage is recognised.	Amahel	Upheld 176 - 14 Greater Majority
16	Dawn	The Dawnish Assembly is appalled that one of the courageous and loyal Imperial Orcs was mistaken for a treacherous Druj. We would seek to educate our citizens of the Virtuous deeds of our fellow Imperials and would invite an orc priest to accompany a troubadour around our Nation, specifically to those places least visited by citizens of the wider Empire.	Ozren Ivarovich Severyan	Upheld 126 - 10 Greater Majority
17	General	The current holder of the Blood Cloak schema will be sharing this with the Empire, in response to this display of Loyalty (something no Blood Cloak general has done before). I move that the rest of the Empire should display Loyalty in return and provide what resources and funds they can to raise this army and reduce casualties in battle for the Prosperity of the Empire.	Helka Ingesdottir	Upheld 807 - 136
21	General	As an Empire we made of many nations. Each nation has its own skills, hearth magic, beliefs and Bourse resources. It is working of these different traits, guided by the Virtues, together that makes the Empire strong and great. Every nation should be proud of these traditions and support them, from Urizen poise to the Heroism of Wintermark. Be proud of your place in the Empire.	Amris Johan Merikovich	Upheld 971 - 69

22	General	It is disloyal to deny support to the armies of the Empire.	Alderai	Upheld 497 - 473
23	General	We believe the powers of the Virtue Inquisitors should be expanded. They should be granted one additional judgement of inquisition to be raised only in their Virtue assembly and subject to the assembly's vote. A Virtue Inquisitor is still a priest who must represent their congregation; they should not have to choose between them and their duty as an inquisitor.	Pahkina	Upheld 804 - 126
24	Wintermark	We appreciate the actions of Iron Osric, General of the Green Shield. During military council and other meetings he has courageously supported the interests of Wintermark even in the face of opposition. Let it be known that the Wintermark National Assembly stands behind his Virtue.	Ylmiska Ferbow	Upheld 207 - 0 Greater Majority
26	General	Currently the Virtue Assembly Inquisitors are appointed by Cardinals. The job of an Inquisitor however, is to seek truth and question all. As such, the position of Inquisitor should not be reliant on political patronage and should instead, only be answerable to the Virtue and Virtue Assembly. In light of this, the position of Virtue Assembly Inquisitor should be an elected one - chosen by Virtue Assembly.	Ranae de Rondell of Dawn	Upheld 697 - 353
31	General	I act on what I know. As Archimandrite of the New Scions of Atun I express my profound disappointment in the newly discovered actions of my predecessor Yael. In the creation of the Golden Fragment, previously seen as evidence for her claims, she cast doubt on all her work. I can no longer support it as truth. But this does not detract from the purpose of the New Scions: our work to perfect the Way through gathered evidence continues.	Edward Novarion	Upheld 713 - 96
35	General	It is Virtuous to celebrate victories with merriment, to remember our fallen with respect and inspiration, to learn from our losses may we continue to remember and learn.	Bucklund	Upheld 815 - 62
38	Marcher	The people of the Mourn are miners. The Singing Caves is their greatest achievement as miners. They have waited years to be liberated, denied their just reward by the Jotun. Prosperity demands that we return the just reward to those who have earned it. The Singing Caves should be returned to the Mournwolders. Mournwolder Land, Mournwolder Prosperity.	Thomas of Mournwold	Upheld 72 - 0 Greater Majority
		To the people of Whittle. The Jotun drove you		Upheld

39	Marcher	to hate. This was not your way before. This is the last chain they have on you. When you put it aside you will be free of their influence.	Brother Hugh	72 - 0 Greater Majority
44	Dawn	The National Assembly sends the High Bard Lady Kaywenn Du Launcet to Semmerholm to inspire the people there to fiercely resist the Druj by singing the "Song for Semmerholm"	Elayne Novarion	Upheld 148 - 0 Greater Majority
45	General	In being deceived there is no shame; But deceivers will lie and lie again. Yael's complicity in deceit and untruth Renders all her teachings moot. Any value that she shared Must now be proven out elsewhere.	Ser Criseyde	Upheld 812 - 104
46	General	To recognise and praise the Courage of Dogri Thulesbane and acknowledge his actions while criminal were also Virtuous.	Maarit Suvidottir	Upheld 594 - 275
48	Brass Coast	We were heartened by the rescue of our cousins from the Isle of Zemress and we would welcome them in settling in Segura. We are certain that their resourceful skills and work ethic will contribute greatly to the Prosperity of the province and we will be happy to smooth their full integration back into the Empire.	Mazo i Zabala i Erigo	Upheld 76 - 0 Greater Majority
49	League	The League feels for the orphans of the war in the Mourn. The League has a strong tradition of supporting orphans and guiding them to reach their true, Virtuous potential. The League therefore seek to provide support in the Marches for the orphans of Mournwold.	Cesare Enzo Di Trivento	Upheld 142 - 0
50	Urizen	Removing your opponent's desire to fight is the first step to victory. This assembly applauds the Wisdom shown by the strategists of the Military Council and the General of the Wolves of War and the General of the Red Wind Corsairs in depriving the Grendel of the economic bounty of the Legacy's production. We urge all those opposing the Grendel in our territory of Spiral and at home and abroad to follow their example, to harass baggage trains and impair production. Let the Grendel know no profit while they remain in Spiral.	Maximillian of Ankarien	Upheld 160 - 0 Greater Majority
52	Urizen	We find that Storm of Curses is likely not to have strategic merit over the benefits of Cyclic Resonance, therefore we do not advocate unleashing our magical armies powers in this way. While we believe that all tools should be considered we do not advocate cruelty without justification.	Tarquinius	Upheld 110 - 0
54	Navarr	We support the Marchers in reclaiming their lands from the Jotun as we also support reclaiming all lost Imperial territories from the	Corey Wayfarer	Upheld 110 - 0 Greater

55	League	Jotun. We exhort all Navarr to pursue this goal. Citizens of Sarvos should not be afraid or reluctant to employ the orcs graduating from the College of the Liberated. We have invested in their Prosperity and should enjoy the rewards, and enable them to reach their full potential.	Illaria Notturmo di Sarvos	Majority Upheld 178 - 0 Greater Majority
57	Pride	The Pride Assembly recognises the hard work of the following people in making the League Theatre a success; in demonstrating Pride in their national culture and the arts, and building a platform to showcase and lift up the arts from the League and across the Empire: Ephelides Sanguineo Rezia Hardfrost di Tassato - artistic director Coraphine Fliore di Tassato, Idwyn Splitroot, Darnyen Volkov Von Temeshwar, Bica and Maeve from the Temeschbar	Astrid Rezia di Tassato	Upheld 159 - 0
61	General	To accuse someone of a religious crime without being able to define that religious crime is not only very stupid, it is unvirtuous.* *The reason I raise this is because this should be obvious but it does not appear to be.	Kerem	Upheld 606 - 120
62	Prosperity	It has been suggested that the practice of raising husks is comparable with the keeping of slaves. We, the Prosperity Assembly, hold this to be false. Husks are bodies devoid of souls, animated by magical power. Slaves are alive, and possess souls. The use of husks in a manner does not deprive citizens of their livelihood, is not unprosperous.	Yarona of the Chantry	Upheld 197 - 0 Greater Majority
63	Varushka	That Varushka is known for its hospitality and as such will offer hospitality to all of the Empire, be they pauper or prince, single archer or entire army.	Vukomir Maryankovich Zverokaz	Upheld 88 - 0 Greater Majority
65	Courage	The Courage Assembly will decide the fate of the Courage Shield Torchbrand.	Nina of Cantiararch's Hold	Upheld 104 - 0
66	Prosperity	If 20 fleets trade with Axou every season for four seasons it is likely that Axos will recognise the Prosperity of the Empire and move to cease the use of slaves. The Assembly of Prosperity	Morgan Leafstalker	Upheld 171 - 0 Greater Majority therefore recognises the Prosperity of fleet trading with the Axou and encourage citizens to do so where they are able.

67	Prosperity	In recognition of the actions and intentions of the Eastern Principalities of Jarm, and the understanding that they continue, to abolish the vile institution of slavery. It would increase the Prosperity of the Empire and its citizens, as well as that of the Eastern Principalities, if Imperial fleet captains were to visit the trading ports of the Eastern Principalities and engage in trade with the traders and merchants there.	Ezekiel of the Chantry	Upheld 187 - 0 Greater Majority
68	Urizen	We commend the Ambition of Medea Ruth's work on horses, and encourage her to consider collaboration with other interested parties, including Aloysius Sunspire.	Medea Ruth Irremais	Upheld 100 - 10
72	General	The General Assembly condemns the use of wanton battlefield executions of foes with personhood. As such, we urge that they only be used when generals deem them necessary and issue clear orders in this respect. Our foes lose respect for us day by day - let the Empire be judged on its official military decisions, not the whims of individuals in the heat of battle. Cleave to Virtue.	Constanza i Kalamar i Guerra	Upheld 621 - 156
73	Pride	We recognise that the Highborn Assembly seeks to reaffirm their commitment to the Doctrine of the Synod that they founded. We recognise the Pride that inspires this action.	Azekah	Upheld 134 - 0
75	Nine	The Assembly of Nine request the Silent Bell investigate the location of "Oath-Heart", the legendary shield of Loyalty, once borne by Drumlin the Sworn of Wintermark.	Veikko	Upheld 6 - 0 Greater Majority
76	Nine	The schism over Yael's vision has divided the Empire too long; what threatens the Empire ultimately threatens the Way. New evidence, corroborated by both Yael's supporters and detractors, demonstrates that a significant document on which her philosophy relied was falsified by her hand. In Virtue, we face unwelcome truths as boldly as a barbarian charge. In Virtue, we act on what we learn, knowing our knowledge is incomplete. When new proof arises, we accept it and move forward. The Assembly of Nine calls on the Synod and the Empire to end this schism, and move forward.	Abaddon De Rondell	Upheld 7 - 0 Greater Majority only their Loyalty to the Empire and their actions are not unvirtuous.
77	Loyalty	I wish to put the words and assurances of my peers into action, regarding the Iron Helms. The actions of the Iron Helms against the traitor Dogri Thulesbane and their use of cruelty as a tool in the Mournwold, have shown	Bogdan	Upheld 56 - 20

78	General	The trods connect the Empire and must be walked. The faithful should try to use them as often as possible.	Aneira Exiles End	Upheld 576 - 32
79	Nine	The use of cruel tactics by any army is unvirtuous. Cruel tactics inspire fear and hatred in our enemies and allies alike. They diminish the spirit of all they touch, and we of the Nine will lead the Synod in providing spiritual governance to all Generals who employ them.	Ricardo di Tassato	Upheld 6 - 1 Greater Majority
80	Imperial Orc	The worth of our armies is not written with cruelty, our legends are not made by harming civilians. We do not need dogs and beasts to fight our wars for us. We are heroes of the Empire, we are Imperial Orcs.	Gralka	Upheld 36 - 0 Greater Majority
81	Marcher	We invite Marcher and Imperial Orc preachers to the Mourn to talk to the free orcs of the Mourn (the former Jotun thralls) and preach to them about the Way. We encourage the Virtuous folks of the Mourn to support these preachers and ensure their voices are heard. In return, we invite stewards or other leaders of the free orcs of the Mourn to come to Anvil	Hrodin	Upheld 62 - 0 Greater Majority and make their concerns heard, so that the Empire will not decide for them, but with them.

All good Marcher folk should recognise and support the Virtuous acts achieved by Marcher folk in support of the Mourn. That Thomas of Hay and Asher Holt convinced Conclave to sponsor a mana sinecure built by Dicky Holberg dedicated to healing and healing magics. The Loyalty shown by Unwavering Ned Cullach in taking the stain on his soul of the evil shit what's been done to us in the Mourn by entering the Wicker Man. That Robert Dunlain, our new Mournish Senator, has invited the Whittlefolk back home. That Benedick Goodfellow and Beatrice Greenhill have given to the Mourn the Prosperity-blessed wool sheared from the last sheep in the Mourn before it fell 30 year ago. A lot good been done for the Mourn, and the Marches as a whole should recognise this.

The Imperial Synod did not make the following Statements of Principle:

27	General	Many people did not listen to Rosamund Holt in life. My Loyalty to her means I want her to be heard now she is gone. Attached is a copy of the message I read for her at her funeral. The Synod agrees she lived a Virtuous life.	Tess	Not upheld 79 - 608
40	General	As the generals of the Empire bear the weight of great responsibility on their soul, we believe that they would be better supported and the Virtue of their orders and declarations less likely to be challenged if they are Dedicated. As such, we suggest and support the Dedication of all those who stand on the military council.	Dietrich Elias der Holburghan	Not upheld 439 - 558
41	General	“Knowledge” is not a true Virtue and cannot compel citizens into heresy, nor diminish their enjoyment of tomatoes or fruit salads.	Hawker Ringbane	Not upheld 281 - 286
59	General	Under normal circumstances, a priest should not perform a rite on a citizen or their property without their agreement. Consecrated areas should be marked so that citizens know that an aura exists before deciding whether to enter the area.	Eevi	Not upheld 413 - 459

Judgements to be carried forwards

The Imperial Synod has not raised a veto for the following summit.

The successful recognition of Navarr as an exemplar by the Wisdom Assembly will be escalated to the General Assembly

Synod Funds

The following represents the Virtue Fund of the Synod:

Starting Value 18 Thrones / 0 Crowns / 0 Rings

Income 60 Thrones The price paid in the Bourse Auction for the dose of True Liao

Rewards	7 Thrones	Rewarding made to Solas of the Spire of the Waxing Sun, High Exorcist.
	5 Thrones	Rewarding made to Livia Cascade, Seer of the Gateway.
Closing Value	66 Thrones / 0 Crowns / 0 Rings

Visionaries

The following individuals received visions of their past lives:

- Lord Vincent Vexille, Dawn
- Grandmother Asya, Varushka
- Achilles of Damakan's Forge, Urizen
- Lorenzo "La Volpe" Macelliao von Temeschwar, The League

Assembly Strength

At the start of the summit the voting total of the General Assembly was calculated to be 2128

The final voting total of the General Assembly was estimated to be 2377

The Civil Service reminds citizens that determining whether a judgement has achieved a Greater Majority counts from the estimation of the assembly strength when scrutiny on the judgement closes, not the final assembly strength at the end of the summit.

At the end of the Autumn Equinox 381 YE the voting strength of the Virtue and national assemblies were estimated to be:

381YE Autumn Equinox winds of fortune

Overview

Over the past three months, several events have occurred which are of significance to the Empire and may require a response from her champions. You can also read about the progress of the Empire's military campaigns here.

In each case, we've tried to tag the Winds of Fortune entry with the nations, or political bodies, to which it is most relevant. We've done this to help people who are interested only in events that are especially relevant to them. In no way are these tags intended to be exhaustive; the Empire is a complex place and very little happens in isolation.

As always, how much or how little of this information you choose to know in character is up to you. Part of the purpose of Winds of Fortune is to maintain the illusion of the Empire as a living, breathing place where things happen - and to make players aware of things their characters 'should' know based on what their roleplaying says they have been doing for the past three months.

Many winds of fortune open with a short section of in-character text. In all cases, these pieces are intended to help create an atmosphere and provide a little entertainment. Where they contain opinions, those are the opinions of the fictional people depicted - and where they contain information or rumours the assumption is that the reader will create their own context for that information or gossip. They're mostly just a bit of fun and they tend not to contain anything vital to the understanding of the wind of Fortune.

Wind of Fortune

An Apple That Falls

- The Mournwold

The situation in the Mournwold remains complicated. There are any number of things that could be done, but what things will be done? What should be done, for that matter? You can find out more about this double-length opportunity here.

The Art of Restraining Power (Trade Winds)

- Fleet captains; congregation leaders; ambassadors and diplomats

The Empire is not the only power in the world. Trade is a big part of it - but there is much more to trade than simply moving goods from one place to another. You can find a quick round up of things related to the current state of affairs, with an emphasis on trading - and a digression into the state of international relations - here.

Birds and Bats

- Imperial Conclave; writers of love letters; tea houses

Two eternal of the realm of Night have sent messengers to speak with the civil service. Lashonar has sent a sonnet that outlines an invitation to participate in a competition. Sadogua has sent a little girl to politely request a formal parley with the Conclave. You can learn about both events here.

Desperate Affairs, Desperate Measures

- The Brass Coast; fleet captains of all nations

Over the last several months, the orc pirates of the Broken Shore have shown more than usual organisation. They launched two vicious raids against the people of the Bay of Catazar - first to try and attack the fisherfolk, the second to try and enslave the people of the Isle of Zemress. The captains of the Imperial fleets have not stood idly by and instead launched counter-raids of their own against the dastardly southern orcs. You can learn about the outcomes, and a few new developments here.

Empty Handed

- Wealthy folks, especially those with an interest in peculiar rarities.

Since the demise of the Bourse Private Auction, entrepreneurs and the desperate alike have made their way to Anvil seeking to tap the rich markets that may be found there. Markets such as the traditional Varushkan Winter Market, which takes place during the Autumn Equinox. This season, there is news of a fallen star in the Marches; an antique artifact belonging to a famous Dawnish enchanter; a rare tea recipe and a herald associated with the Night realm; and some peculiar potions belonging to the Great Forest Orcs. You can learn about these opportunities here.

Hunters and wolves

- Imperial citizens; Marchers; and magicians

Three Winter eternal are involved in activity within the Empire. The grim eternal Sorin seeks participants in a trial of hard choices and suffering, The Bound-King Tharim of the Thrice-cursed Court has sent his heralds to ... well nobody knows. And a crazed follower of Wendigo has been attempting to spread chaos and discord through the Empire. You can learn more about these eternal-related opportunities here.

More Love, Less Paperwork

- The League assembly; the General Assembly; the Virtue Assemblies of Ambition, Loyalty, Pride, and Prosperity

Lorenzo "La Volpe" Macelliao von Temeschwar, Master of the Butchers Bank, Treasurer of the Bloody Butchers of Temeschwar, former custodian of the Fortress of Salt, former overseer of the Regario Dossier, former Civilian Commissioner for the League, and architect - or at least financier - for a significant number of interesting things made out of stone. An inspiration to many, his name associated with a number of great works. Philanthropist, merchant-prince, visionary. You can learn a little about why his name is on everyone's lips here.

The Mother of Morality

- Wintermark, Brass Coast, and League
- This wind of fortune is a counterpart to praise and blame

The infamously cruel Varushkan army continue to be divisive. The Wintermark and Freeborn assemblies have unambiguously rejected them. The priests of the League have spoken out against the use of fear as a weapon - although to be fair their assembly was far from united in that condemnation. Several significant opportunities have arisen as a result of the Synod's ongoing discussion of what is, or is not, too high a price to pay for victory. You can learn more about some of them here.

Out of Void, Out of Chaos (Conjunction)

- Primarily magicians versed in the lore of night magic

In the night sky, the Wanderer hangs in a peculiar conjunction with the Great Wyrn. The stars often reflect events happening in the world, but this time it seems that they may also be reflecting events in the realm of Night. Two powerful rituals are acting strangely, and two inhabitants of the night realm are acting significantly more oddly than usual. You can learn more about this strange conjunction, and these odd events here.

The Parents of Security

- Citizens of the League, especially Sarvosans

The League national assembly has made several statements of principle regarding the rebuilding and security of the city of Sarvos, as well as a statement condemning the army of the Iron Helms ... who have just spent three months in Sarvos. Some of the repercussions of these two related events, as well as a quick update on the fate of the orcs studying at the College of the Liberated can be found here.

The Place You Called Home

- The Navarr of Therunin; Imperial Senate; Imperial Conclave

The orcs of the Great Forest tribe came to Therunin as exiles fleeing the Druj. Their presence presented several challenges to the Empire. During the Summer Solstice, the Imperial Senate ratified a treaty designed to define the relationship between the displaced orcs and the Empire. You can learn about the repercussions of this treaty here.

Praise and Blame

- Dawn, Highguard, Navarr, Varushka, Urizen
- This wind of fortune is a counterpart to the mother of morality

The Iron Helms army continues to promote debate. The assemblies of Urizen, Highborn, and Dawn have joined their voices with Navarr and Varushka in sanctioning the use of cruelty and fear on the battlefield. Several significant opportunities have arisen as a result of the Synod's ongoing discussion of what is, or is not, too high a price to pay for victory. You can learn more about these opportunities here.

Proud to Serve (Imperial Address)

- All Imperial citizens

The Imperatrix has used her power to address the Empire to allow Heilyn Bronwen's Rest, the Warmage, to dispatch a message to all Imperial citizens. You can read it here.

Queens and Kings

- Imperial Conclave; mine owners

The ongoing saga of the Icy Crag of the Eternal Sun takes another twist as the champions of the Summer eternal gather to compete for the right to offer patronage to the college of magic. At the same time, Eleonaris makes her displeasure with the people of Dawn clear, and the King Under The Mountain sends his koboldi to make an unexpected offer to the mine-owners of the Empire. You can learn all about these events here.

Rabbits and Snares (Plenipotentiary)

- Imperial Conclave

Three eternals have requested formal parley with an archmage, apparently as a consequence of plenipotentiary messages received during the Summer Solstice. You can learn which eternal, and which matters they are keen to discuss, here.

Scholars and Mandarins

- Imperial Conclave

Four eternals of the Day realm have offers and requests to make of the Empire. The eternal library of Phaleron requests an audience with Imperial magicians and librarians. Meanwhile, a peculiar trio of heralds have traveled the Empire offering certain boons on behalf of their masters. You can learn about these opportunities here.

A Silver Chalice

- Magicians; Imperial Conclave

The Imperial Senate has chosen to establish a new Conclave order - the Silver Chalice. The Order will focus on working with and expanding healing magic and other projects which can be used to aid the bodies and minds of Imperial Citizens, the Nations, and the Empire. You can learn about the last few steps needed to establish the order here.

Seals and Stars (Winds of Magic)

- Everyone, but especially the people of Sermersuaq and the Imperial Conclave

A roundup of magical effects covering: the state of the night skies; the status of the regio of the Spring realm; the raising of castles with magic; the seal-folk of Sermersuaq and their blessing; and a grateful Holberg architect with an offer for the Imperial Conclave. You can learn about these disparate matters here.

Unable to See

- Highguard; Imperial Synod

At the Summer Solstice, the General Assembly of the Imperial Synod condemned Yael, who claimed to be the First Empress reborn, for heresy. Reusing to renounce her vision, she was duly executed. But one nation did not reject her. The Highborn stood by their own, just as the nation once stood by the First Empress when she set forth with on a journey to unite all humanity. Now everyone is faced with the fact that their founding nation of The Way has taken a doctrinal position at odds with the rest of the Empire. You can learn more about the repercussions here.

Workers in struggle

- Imperial Bourse; Dredgemaster of Feverwater

Three situations related to the Imperial Bourse have arisen that offer either opportunities or potential threats. You can learn more about the great sinkhole, a theft from Serra Briante, and a threat to the Dredgemaster of Feverwater here.

Roundup

This represents short reminders of things that are still ongoing, or resolutions of events from the Summer Solstice that are not a Wind of Fortune of their own.

Mandates

During the Summer Solstice, the Synod successfully enacted six mandates. In each case, the mandate was raised and passed by the appropriate assembly, and the named priest successfully used the appropriate amount of liao to enact the desired effect.

Assembly	Mandate	Priest	Outcome
Dawn	The National Assembly sends Odelina de Rondell with 25 doses of liao to repudiate the false teachings of Yael of Highguard. Those who have been deceived by her claim to be the First Empress Reborn and the hope of the Land Without Tears should renounce this false doctrine and return to their homes.	Odelina de Rondell	Dawn has rejected the teachings of Yael and the Congregation of the First Empress No Marcher general can issue the Give Ground order ever again as detailed here
Marcher	Land matters above all else. Marcher armies should always stand their ground to defend what is theirs. We send Mel of Mourn with 25 doses of liao to spread the word that no Marcher army should ever give ground.	Mel of Mourn

Wintermark	No true hero of the Mark should stand with the Iron Helms - those who use their dogs for war have become dogs themselves. The assembly sends Gunnbrand Ironwill with 50 liao to urge every hero of Wintermark to show the heroism that a true hero of the Empire should aspire to.	Gunnbrand Ironwill	Wintermark armies can take additional orders when fighting alongside the Iron Helms; the Iron Helms suffer penalties when fighting with Wintermark armies, as detailed here
Navarr	Mandate. Mercy is a luxury that the Empire cannot afford when faced with enemies that seek to destroy it; we must not cast aside any weapon that may bring victory. The Navarr assembly sends Corey Wayfarer with 75 doses of liao to urge the Quiet Step to build on the opportunity presented by Arhallogen and find new and effective tactics for dealing with our enemies.	Corey Wayfarer	The general of the Quiet Step has the opportunity to permanently change the quality of their army to cunning, as detailed here
Varushka	Mandate. The Iron Helms only do what is necessary to defeat their enemies quickly. We do not have the luxury of mercy when facing what comes out of the darkness. The assembly sends Amris with 100 doses of liao to urge every inhabitant of Varushka to seize the opportunity to support the Iron Helms and show the enemies of the Empire what real cruelty looks like.	Amris Johan Merikovich	Until the start of Spring 382YE, the Iron Helms can take the Terror in the Night order as detailed here
Brass Coast	Mandate. The cruelty of the Iron Helms is unvirtuous - it demeans our Empire to use such tactics and it betrays the ideals of our people to fight alongside those who do so. The assembly sends Constanza i Kalamar i Guerra with 25 liao doses to urge our soldiers to reject the Iron Helms and their cruelty.	Constanza i Kalamar i Guerra	The Iron Helms suffers penalties when fighting with Freeborn armies as detailed here

Conquered Territories

Resources in Liathaven are receiving the "conquered territory" penalty to their production.

Imperial Lore

The Imperial Conclave has declared that two new rituals "Unknown Unknown" and "Golden Voyage" be entered into Imperial lore. With regard to Unknown Unknown, however, at this time we have no confirmation that the ten thrones has been provided, nor that the ritual text has been handed over.

Bittersweet Legacy

Every Highborn character who owns a resource in Highguard will see a small boost to their production this event, a side effect of the recent focus on religious matters. The bonus will continue as long as they do not formally reject the belief in the Land Without Tears.

381YE Autumn Equinox winds of war

Overview

As the Autumn Equinox 381YE approaches, the Empire continues to fight against threats both external, and internal.

OOO Context

News of the Empire's victories and defeats spreads quickly across the Empire, in part thanks to the omnipresent Navarr messengers.

Each Wind of War consists of a report on the campaign, delivered in reasonably in-character language. Players are encouraged to use this text as the basis for creating their own stories about what their characters, or their company of soldiers have done during the last few months. It is usually followed by a short out-of-character section which deals with absolute facts - the nitty-gritty of numbers, regions captured, and important game effects.

As always, how much or how little of this information you choose to know in character is up to you. Part of the purpose of Winds of War and Winds of Fortune is to allow players to choose to be aware of things their characters "should" know based on what their roleplaying says they have been doing for the past three months

Wasting Light (Spiral)

There are two Imperial forces in Spiral. In the west, both League armies and the Citadel Guard control the lion's share of Cinon. In the north-east, the Fire of the South take up defensive positions and await the arrival of the Red Wind Corsairs - they secure the major pass into Zenith, and wait for reinforcements.

The two forces, separated by distance and deadly foes alike, manage to maintain contact via fleet Freeborn messengers, magical winged messengers, and staccato heliopticon messages.

The latter has become a little unreliable, however. For the most part, the Grendel do not destroy or loot heliopticon towers - instead they use them to try and intercept Imperial communiques, break the new codes being used to secure military information, and spread disinformation and false messages wherever they can. For now, the best Imperial codes - many devised by officers of the Towerjacks - have remained unbreakable. As far as anyone knows...

Both the Grendel and the Empire are on the offensive this season, although in both cases their focus appears uncertain. Grendel forces under the turtle banner advance carefully on Freeborn positions, probing for any sign of weakness. The Fire in the South likewise push slowly southward from their positions around the Twilight Gate (the grand pass through the mountains to the plains of Proceris).

Whenever the two forces meet one another, both sides take up defensive positions and engage in cautious skirmishes. A complex dance plays out slowly across northern Ossuary.

Three weeks after the end of the Summer Solstice, the Red Wind Corsairs arrive. Dodging past Druj forces in Zenith, the Corsairs reach the main Freeborn encampment below the Twilight Gate, and almost immediately turn their full attention to destroying Grendel baggage trains, intercepting Grendel raiders, and wherever possible seizing stolen

Move with haste to a defensible position where we will await the arrival of the Red Wind Corsairs. Not in recent years has the entire Brass Coast Military fought in the same territory, let's show the Grendel why they should fear us. We shall shatter them like thin glass, and as a flame we will reduce them to dust....

General Marciel i Riqueza of the Fire of the South

With all due haste - which should be plenty after your great rest - let's get us into Spiral, Freeborn! We are helping our great friends the Urizen, and fighting the cursed Grendel! Let's make this war no longer give them profit. Let's bleed them, coin and all, until they realise the folly of their ways. All freeborn are fighting here this season. We will link with the Fire of the South in the Ankra whilst the Freeborn Storm in the South. Let's Plunder the Barbarians! For the Freeborn! For the Empire!

General Estana I Mestiere I Guerra

resources. In the west, the Wolves of War take a similar approach - Varushkan wagon raiders are supported by dozens of independent captains, adept at operating independently of the main force (and yet able to integrate their tactics with the broader strategy thanks to the potent enchantment laid on the Wolves of War). They are not the only ones. A significant fraction of the Grendel forces are engaged in an almost identical strategy - sweeping the territory the orcs already control and striking against the baggage trains of the Imperial armies, pillaging everything that isn't nailed down. More than once the two Imperial armies clash with orc soldiers and mercenaries over control of a mana site or a mine. The fighting is quick and bloody, with one side or the other retreating once it is clear who has the upper hand, and looking for other opportunities to gain wealth.

All this is only part of a larger scheme, however. Messages fly thick and fast between the Freeborn captains and their opposite numbers in the Wolves of War. Once the Corsairs and the Wolves are confident they have the measure of the Grendel defences, a daring scheme is put into operation. While the Red Wind and the League Free companies move into position, the Fire of the South distract the Brine Turtles, slowly pulling them out of position. In the west, the Towerjacks and Citadel Guard time a major offensive into Ankra to ensure that the forces the attention of the Grendel generals is focused on them ... rather than on the Legacy. When the time is exactly right, the Empire strikes.

It is a season of Reckoning. We owe our friends in Urizen for their years of Virtuous sacrifice. And we damned well owe a reckoning to the Grendel for Sarvos. They took our homes, our treasures. Now we will hit them where it hurts, in the place the Grendel feel pain - Their money pouches. Hit their supply lines - do not let them profit from the theft of the Legacy. Take back what they have stolen and take back our land.

Gabriel Barossa, General of the Wolves of War

The two pillaging armies strike into northern Apstrus. Their target is not the Legacy itself, but the heavily armoured caravans that transport mithril south toward the Grendel headquarters in Apulian. The bulk of the Red Wind Corsairs actually move past the caravan, instead launching an assault on the baggage train of the Brine Turtles - and ensuring that no forces from Apulian will arrive in time to interfere. At the same time, the Wolves of War seize passes from Ankra to Apstrus, hold them ... and fall on the back of the Grendel caravan.

Caught between a hammer and an anvil, the fighting is fierce. The Grendel almost immediately begin to pull forces from their other theatres to secure their supply lines - but they are too late to save their vital caravan. The Red Wind and the Wolves fall back to prepared positions, joining up with the Towerjacks and the Fire of the South respectively. Some of the Grendel commanders launch futile attacks to try and recover the stolen mithril, but to no avail. There is no doubt the Imperial raid hits the Grendel where it hurts them the most - in their money pouches.

Soldiers of the Towerjacks, we have held the barbarians and now we will push them back. We will advance steadily into Ankra and then on to Ossuary, minimising our casualties where possible and drawing power from the Clarity of the Master Strategist.

General Natalia Barossa of the Towerjacks

The Imperials are not the only ones undertaking a complex stratagem in Spiral this season, however - although theirs is certainly the most daring and provocative. As the season draws on, the Citadel Guard and Towerjacks begin to receive reports from the south western mountains of orcs engaged in collapsing the passes into Redoubt. As near as anyone can tell, warriors of the Kraken's Jaws Moridun accompanying a significant force of soldiers under the Stone Gyre banner, are moving north through the western mountains. They are targeting the main passes with a combination of terrible warbeasts and Spring magic. Not all the passes - only those large or convenient enough for an army to use without problems. A hurried communique from the Fire of the South brings news that a similar force appears to be active in the northern a mountains as well - based out of Ankra - and there is a very real possibility that the Twilight Gate is now the only remaining safe route through the mountains into Zenith.

The Grendel seem to be looking to cut the territory of Spiral off from the Empire - at least to a degree. A heliopticon message from the Court of the White Fountain says that the Onyx Path is still intact at least - but it confirms that all the other major routes from south-eastern Redoubt appear to have been collapsed or otherwise made impassable.

Once again we fight for Spiral. This time, we will finish this. We will use strategy, we will use strength. The Empire learns from its mistakes. Spiral will be ours ... We bring our magical strength into our home nation because of the ground you take...

General Nicassia Avicia of the Citadel Guard

A little more than six weeks after the Summer Solstice, there is another development. The Citadel Guard provide a warning, but it is difficult to disseminate it to the entire Imperial force in time. A night of nightmares sweeps across Spiral, a storm of phantasms and hallucinations not restricted to sleeping minds. Over the next week, there are scattered reports from across the territory of madness and despair - of hardened soldiers starting awake shrieking in terror; experienced scouts losing their way in terrain they know well; disciplined warriors ignoring orders and falling on their opponents howling like mad beasts. It is not just the Imperial forces that are affected; there are clear signs that the orcs have been affected as well. The strange, infectious madness adds to the confusion and uncertainty in Spiral.

The Urizen know the cause - it is not a stratagem of the Grendel that is to blame, but the very fabric of the territory itself. Roused by violence, bloodshed, and passion the Black Plateau is beginning to "wake up" again. They can't predict how bad it will get, but they are certain it will get worse.

Game Information - Spiral

The Empire is winning in Spiral this season. The western forces (Wolves of War, Towerjacks, Citadel Guard) have driven the Grendel out of Cinon, and made significant headway into Ankra. The Freeborn forces in northern Ossuary have made some headway into Ankra from the eastern side, but they are still pretty much penned in on the northern side of the territory by the Grendel armies.

Perhaps more significantly, the Wolves of War and the Red Wind Corsairs have plundered the Legacy. The relative generals will need to compare notes but it seems that they may have looted the entire production of the mithril mine between them. Both armies have also stolen significant amounts of wealth from the Grendel - although arguably they have merely recovered what the orcs first stole from the Urizen.

At the same time, the Grendel have systematically swept across the southern regions engaging in their own campaign of plunder and pillage. After years conquered by the rapacious orcs, it is likely that there is not a huge amount of wealth left in Spiral. They are also taking large numbers of slaves. To represent this effect, we are applying an effect going forward that reduces the production of all personal resources in Spiral by 20%. This effect will remain as long as there are any regions in Spiral controlled by the Grendel, as workers are afraid to operate in the territory for fear of being taken by the Grendel.

While the Empire has been looting the Legacy, the Grendel have been engaged in a significant stratagem of their own. They have been collapsing the passes through the western and the northern mountains. At this time there are only three major passes still open that are large enough to allow a campaign army to pass through them without difficulty.

- The Onyx Path linking Optarion and Ateri. The western end of the pass is guarded by the Citadel of the Flame, while the eastern end emerges near the ruins of Fort Mezudan.
- The Crow Road linking Willstone and Cinion. The western end of the pass is watched by the resourceful sentinels of Willstone spire, while the eastern end emerges in the hills above the ruins of Damakhan's Forge.
- The Twilight Gate linking the plains of Proceris and the northern Osuary. This "pass" is wide enough that it would be extremely difficult to close it without constructing a fortification.

These three passes now effectively control access from Imperial territory into Spiral, and vice versa. There are several smaller, higher passes still intact of course that can be used by small groups or caravans - but these are not suitable for a campaign army to use. The full strategic implications of this situation will be made clear to the Military Council during the Muster, once the Civil Service has confirmed what they are.

The Black Plateau has been upgraded from "murmuring" to "grumbling" by the Citadel Guard. This past season it has increased all casualties suffered by the armies fighting in Spiral by a small amount (not even a tenth), but the "grumbling" is slowly and steadily getting worse. Illuminates of the Citadel Guard suggest it will be bad enough to increase all casualties in Spiral by a tenth by the end of the Autumn Equinox. At the moment the relatively cautious strategies of the orc and Imperial forces are minimizing the impact of the increasingly dangerous Plateau, but it is not clear how long that will continue to be the case.

Cold Day in the Sun (Weirwater)

The Golden Sun launch an overwhelming assault against the abominable unliving forces in Weirwater. They do not fight alone. Over forty independent captains fight alongside the Dawnish army - primarily Dawnish knights and yeomen, but a number of League soldiers and Wintermark warriors have also heard the call to defend Weirwater.

*Charge Dawn Charge, the Golden Sun will Drive the husks before it.
We will act as a shield for the People of Dawn with Iron and Fire*

General Zoran Orzel of the Golden Sun

The Imperial armies are further reinforced by a grand cohort of knights from the Fields of Glory - some three thousand glorious and terrible warriors of the Summer Realm, called from the demesne of Eleonaris by the combined might of the enchanters and witches of Dawn, to oppose the flesh-devouring husks inhabited by fell Winter spirits. Beneath gilded crimson banners, tall lords and ladies armoured in polished golden plate march alongside the warriors of Dawn, Wintermark, and the League. The Empire has seen the Knights of Glory before, but there is something different about these fae warriors. They are more gregarious, less arrogant... less bitter. There is a sense of true nobility about them that has been lacking before. They engage in courteous words with the Imperial soldiers they accompany. When the armies camp, the knights arrange their own pavilions of cloth-of-ruby-and-gold ... but once the tents are erected they send cordial parties to visit the camps of the Golden Sun, sometimes bearing gifts of fine wine and exotic foodstuffs. They act like allies of choice, rather than creatures bound by oaths to fight alongside anyone who calls them forth.

And fight they do. The abominable invaders have slowly been driven north and east by the Golden Sun. Outnumbered perhaps three to one, they make up for their lack of numbers with supernatural tenacity - and with their unnatural ability to replace their fallen by inhabiting fresh corpses. Rather than a single great army, they split into multiple smaller groups, forcing the Golden Sun to likewise divide its forces. For the most part they seek to avoid pitched battles, preferring to try and prey on the yeofolk of Weirwater - because when they do stand and fight they are utterly outmatched by the Imperial forces.

In the first month after the Summer Solstice, there are major engagements at Applefell and the Weirwater Vales. The abhorrent husks try desperately to overwhelm the defenders, forcing their way past barricades and palisades to try and slaughter the yeofolk intent on adding more corpses to their Winter host. In both cases, however, they are thwarted by a combination of the yeofolk's refusal to stop fighting, and by the glorious bravery of the local noble houses. They keep the unliving pinned down long enough for forces from the Golden Sun to arrive and catch them against the walls of the very communities they seek to annihilate.

The last great engagement takes place at the rich port-town town of Culwich. The remaining husks have come together in a single host, rampaging through the farms and villages around the oldest Dawnish settlement. Again, though, they are thwarted by the nobles and the yeofolk. Larger communities bar their gates and fight tooth-and-nail against the undying attackers. Smaller communities, given sufficient warning, band together at defensible locations, or retreat in good order to Culwich. A valiant troubadour brings together several groups of knights errant and, with the aid of a circle of Weavers, creates a makeshift fortification amid the ruins of the Sentinel's Folly - the shattered tower overlooking Culwich - which offers sanctuary to fleeing farmers and fisherfolk alike. The pattern of glorious heroism is repeated over and over again as the unliving advance. The people of Weirwater will not bow before this unnatural horde - and they know that the Golden Sun are coming.

In the end, the final battle before the Autumn Equinox takes place amid the broken ruins of the farms outside Culwich. The entire Imperial host draws up, and with grim commitment falls on the abominations. Committed to victory at any cost, the glorious warriors of Dawn strike straight to the heart of their enemy, charging en masse across the blighted farmland, flanked by the Golden Host of Eleonaris. The fighting is brutal, even tragic - by this time the majority of the Winter spirits are inhabiting the bodies of fallen Dawnishfolk, still wearing the armour and wielding the weapons with which they died fighting the unliving.

As night falls - the starless night with only a sliver-thin moon - the people of Culwich light great beacons along their walls. Skilled yeofolk archers, master hunters, launch burning arrows into the oil soaked thatch of farmhouses near the wall, creating roaring bonfires. The polished armour and shields of the Golden Sun and the Knights of Glory catch this light and reflect it back; and for one vital hour, it is as if the sun has never set. The burning buildings serve as a convenient way to dispose of abominations; still fighting, many are forced back into the conflagrations and burned to ash. It is a tragedy, that the bodies of Dawnish men and women who fell in glorious battle receive no proper burial, and some troubadours weep openly when they hear of it.

Unable to use the darkness to their advantage, the unliving begin to break. They retreat again from Culwich, north toward Karov. Even with the ability of the Winter spirits to take new corpses, their numbers are greatly depleted. Rough estimates suggest that there are only around two-and-a-half thousand remaining creatures in Weirwater - although not all of these are unliving husks. Soldiers recount engagements with dreadful creatures and even the occasional gang of living warriors among the host - servants of fell powers that have cast their lot in with the monsters ravaging Weirwater.

Despite their allies, the invaders are defeated - for now. The overwhelming commitment to victory shown by the Golden Sun, the strength of their allies both magical and mundane, and the glory of the people of Weirwater have all contributed to this victory - but the war is not yet over.

Game Information - Weirwater

The unliving host has been driven across Weirwater by the Golden Sun and their allies. The Imperial army has suffered some losses - four hundred or so soldiers have fallen to the unliving. Some of these fallen rise again and fight against their former allies, but for every fallen Dawnish soldier, at least two husks fall. The enemy has been soundly defeated, and seriously weakened by the season of battle.

Weirwater itself is not unscathed - much of the farmland around Culwich has been destroyed for example - but for the most part the Golden Sun has been able to prevent the smaller communities being overrun - both preserving the yeofolk and the noble estates, and preventing the undead from replenishing their numbers using the bodies of the dead.

A word of caution, however - not all the husks in Weirwater are part of the main force. Several smaller gangs are still at large in the territory. On a grand scale they are merely nuisances, but they are more than capable of destroying a small noble estate or slaughtering families of yeofolk farmers. There are enough to keep knights-errant busy for several seasons, even if the main force of husks is destroyed.

Another Round (Bay of Catazar)

Supported by more than fifty independent fleet captains, flushed with its victory over the Grendel forces left behind in Redoubt, anticipating the first opportunity for all the Freeborn forces to be in the same campaign, the Freeborn Storm sails east to Spiral. They spread out, taking a wide formation, if the Grendel are acting to support their armies, then the Storm will catch them while they are engaged on land and harry their ships all the way back to Dubhtraig. With superior tactics and daring the Freeborn can overcome the Grendel superior numbers!

The wily Grendel are a match for them and more though. Perhaps someone tipped them off - perhaps they simply don't care about their armies fighting in Spiral. Whatever the reason the navy meets the Grendel armada coming in the opposite direction - all formed up for a full on naval engagement. It is clear they intend to challenge the Storm head on and with the Freeborn vessels dispersed they have a massive advantage.

They meet in the waters south of Ateri, and the Grendel attack mercilessly. Their superior formation alone places the Freeborn Storm at a serious disadvantage. The independent fleet captains of the Empire more than double the strength of the Freeborn Storm, but they are still outnumbered by the Grendel navies. Yet the numerical disadvantage is less than it was last time they clashed - the Grendel navies have not emerged unscathed from their various battles with the Empire, nor have they been untouched by the storms raised by Imperial magicians.

The time to push in Spiral is now. As our armies, including the Red Wind Corsairs and the Fire of the South, fight bravely on the land, we must do our best to stop the Grendel Navies supporting their forces. This will not be easy, the enemy will be waiting, so we must be smart. To the end, we will harry them and keep them tied up. Make no mistake, there will be losses, but know that we will be helping keep our brothers and sisters alive. Should we need to fall back, we are to go to Redoubt. Take comfort in the Virtues, and show those bastards the Coast's true colours.

Admiral Edgardo i Ruiloba i Guerra of The Freeborn Storm

Still, the Empire is outmatched and outnumbered, and the Grendel crews are more experienced at ship-to-ship combat on such a scale. The Empire's warships are powerful, but they are slower to react to the ebb and flow of the sea battle than their orc opposite numbers. It is a blessing that the Grendel navies still appear to consist primarily of warships - if the Grendel had brought a contingent of their own independent captains with them then the Empire would be in even more serious trouble.

As the battle progresses it soon becomes clear that the Grendel ships possess the same unnerving ability to coordinate their attacks demonstrated time and again by the orc forces on land. They seem to have a natural, instinctive awareness of where their fellow vessels are and where they are going that goes beyond anything even the most experienced captains might manage. They seem to know exactly when to break off, and precisely where the Imperial ships are at their most vulnerable.

Thousands of lives are lost, dozens of ships captured, sunk, or burnt to the waterline - on both sides. The Grendel do not have things entirely their own way - but the Empire loses three times as many vessels as the Grendel do. Without the presence of the independent captains - every nation save Varushka is represented - the situation would have been significantly more one-sided. Easily half the Grendel ships lost are sunk by independent captains, able to respond more quickly to the changing situation than the navy itself. Those same ships are more adept at avoiding Grendel counter-attacks - so the Grendel concentrate their attacks on the navy instead - focussing all the casualties there.

In the end, the Freeborn Storm is - again - forced to retreat west back into Redoubt. The Grendel harry their retreat, sinking several more vessels. Over the next weeks, the Freeborn storm is pushed further west, forced back time and again by the orc ships. The pattern is the same in each engagement - the orcs outnumber and outmaneuver the Imperial ships, and inflict three-times as many losses as the Empire manages to inflict on the Grendel.

As the Autumn Equinox approaches, the Freeborn Storm has been pushed back to Rebekah's Leap ... where the Imperial and orc navies first clashed, last year.

Game Information

Auditor of the Imperial Treasury, Gerard La Salle has prepared a report for the Admiral on the strategic situation created by two rival naval forces being in the same territorial waters, to be presented during the Autumn Equinox.

Resolve (Zenith)

Across Zenith, spires are winking out. The Spire of Celestial Cascade and Echostorm have both disappeared behind shrouds of Night magic, as have several of the smaller spires, even those not in immediate danger of being overrun. Others are not so lucky. There are scattered, horrifying reports from those spires the Druj now dominate - and the dreadful fates met by those who resist.

Soldiers of Highguard, our brother and sisters in Urizen call for aid, and we shall answer! The Druj will not take one more step in Urizen without paying in blood.

General Cuth of the Seventh Wave

The Druj invaders have taken Lustri and Occursion and they come pouring down out of the hills and woodlands to sweep across the plains of Proceris.

The tide of orcs is met by a wall of dark steel. The Valiant Pegasus, the Granite Pillar, and the Seventh Wave are waiting, offering their strength to the people of Urizen. There is a fire in many Highborn soldiers to fight the Druj - especially those who saw what they did in Reikos, and to its people.

The Pillar takes the lead, coordinating the other two armies and those forces belonging to independent captains. Along with the Wave bear the brunt of the initial attacks, holding firm against the initially disorganised Druj assault. The Pegasus serve as a firm bedrock, supporting and protecting the other two armies. The Highborn apothecaries and healers are well prepared for the venoms and poisons employed by the Druj, as well as the more usual mortal wounds and crippling blows.

Soldiers of the Pegasus, we will link with our brothers and sisters and hold back the Druj. We will support them and keep them fighting for Highguard, for Urizen and for the Empire.

General Cayleb of The Valiant Pegasus

After the initial assaults, which are handily repulsed, the main force of the Druj is brought to bear. The Black Wind leads the way - orcs out of the Barrens once rebellious and now bound again by the Druj. They ape the other eastern orcs, but their cruelty is something to behold. It is as if they wish to prove their loyalty by being even more merciless, more ruthless, than the Druj themselves. Any Imperial that falls into their hands is crippled, tormented, and ultimately crucified left to die slowly of their wounds, of hunger, and of thirst. Several spires are turned into unspeakable charnel houses, every person within heinously butchered. They drive crippled and broken survivors before them, calmly picking them off with arrows before they reach the safety of the Imperial lines. They are cruel indeed, and once it is clear the true depths of depravity they are capable of, it shakes the confidence of all save the most resolute Imperial soldiers.

Furthermore, the Black Wind possesses a supernatural strategic excellence - with a sinking feeling some of the Highborn who have fought the Grendel in Spiral recognise hints of what is occurring. Whenever the Empire accidentally leaves itself weak, the Black Wind assault them there. When the Empire seeks to trick the Druj into overextending themselves, the Black Wind pull them back. Their general - a vicious female orc - exercises iron control over her troops backed up by a potent enchantment woven of Day magic. This is not the only sign of Grendel involvement - there are reports that Grendel mercenaries may be supporting some of the other Druj armies, although details are scarce at this time.

This is Urizen, so it is no surprise that this is not the only magic at work here. The magicians and sentinels of Urizen gather in Clypion in a citadel of black ice - a great squat tower with a wall of razor-sharp granite, drawn from the realm of Summer by the Blazing Sun coven of Highguard. The great echoing halls provide a valuable base of operations, and a focal point for the residents of Zenith to take refuge from the invaders.

A second citadel squats in Lustri - a great sprawling mass of trees woven into the rough likeness of a castle. Ghulai are said to lair here, and high-value prisoners who survive the initial Druj lust for blood and torment are sent here to have their secrets torn from them. How many Urizen magicians have been sent into the foreboding fortress, and how many have gasped out their last breaths begging to be allowed to unburden themselves of their magical knowledge, it is impossible to say.

We go to defend Zenith from the Druj. The People of Urizen need our strength. Let us make a strategic defence of Zenith and halt enemy offence.

General Mathayus of the Granite Pillar

The entire territory is also wrapped in a web of powerful Autumn magic, woven by the Grape & The Grain coven of Wintermark. The magic is of great value to the people of Urizen, guiding them to safe paths clear of marauders, helping them to rest safely, and giving preternatural awareness of the location of those who wish them harm. It directly helps hundreds of people in the war-torn east of Zenith make it to the safety of the west. It also aids the Highborn defenders - alerting them to the presence of the Druj and providing valuable protection from their ambushes. Unfortunately, the magic is indiscriminate - it is just as effective at helping the Druj armies, and at forewarning the orcs against Unconquered scouts, as it is at aiding Imperial citizens.

At first, the two forces - Highborn and Druj - appear relatively equally balanced. As the campaign progresses though it becomes apparent that the Druj have the upper hand. While the Black Wind seem most interested in kindling a spark of terror in Imperial hearts the rest of the Druj - the true Druj - achieve something similar simply through relentless, unstinting commitment to violence. Overwhelming assault after overwhelming assault breaks against the Highborn lines and despite their best efforts, they are slowly forced back.

But their retreat is measured, and careful, and disciplined. They fall back a few miles at a time, always to new positions prepared by the Granite Pillar with the aid of the Urizen civilian population. Thanks to their resolute courage, spires that would otherwise have been washed away by the oncoming tide are able to evacuate in good order. Many have time to secure their magical lore, or carry it with them westward to the Halls of Knowledge, or to the welcome of spires in Iteri and Clypion.

Over a thousand Highborn soldiers give their lives to secure this evacuation, and to hold the Druj back. If not for the Autumn magic granting protection to everyone in Zenith, this number would have been much higher. It is hard to guess at Druj losses, but the Urizen prognosticators and the Highborn scouts alike agree that the Druj have lost similar numbers of orc lives.

The Druj gain some territory, it is true, in their slow advance westward - but if the Highborn had not been present they would have conquered the plains of Proceris and likely put the Halls of Knowledge in Clypion to the torch.

Game Information - Zenith

The Druj have made some gains in Proceris, but not enough to claim the entire region. This may have some implications for the Freeborn in Spiral, if the Druj manage to capture the Twilight Gate.

The Imperial forces are left in no doubt that the Black Wind army possesses the Cruel quality, and has been engaged in a Merciless Onslaught. The Highborn armies will break if their military strength falls below 1,500 (or below 2,250 if they are large) before the end of the Autumn Equinox.

Also causing concern - the civil service are extremely worried about what will happen if the Druj take Proceris, especially the Golden Cascade - a series of terraces carved into the foothills and supported with powerful ritual magic and unique polished mirrors. Along with the fertile farms on the plains, the Golden Cascade provides much of the food for the people of Zenith - and is a significant contributor to the nation's ability to support the Citadel Guard. Losing it is unlikely to cost the Urizen their ability to support their army, but it would certainly place them in a precarious position.

It is expected that Auditor of the Imperial Treasury Gerard La Salle will be available to answer questions about both topics during the Muster.

Times Like These (Mournwold)

There are no Jotun armies left in the Mournwold - but the territory is far from undefended. The garrisons of the Tribute, and Hillstop, continue to resist the Imperial conquest. There are also bands of Jotun champions at large in the Mournwold, still fighting a rear-guard action that seems designed solely to slow the Imperial advance.

Fellow Bounders, I know the sadness you feel for the death of General Farstrider. We must not let grief lessen our resolve, but nor can we let rage drive us to recklessness. This season we fight for the hearts and minds of the Mournwolders, as we steadily reconquer our land. We are not to pursue the Jorun as they flee from the Ore Hills, Greensward and Alderly; aid the Mourn yeomen in rebuilding their homes and consolidating our gains..

General Rickard of Lambrook of the Bounders

The Empire presses south and west. The first - indeed the only - major battles come in the south, in the Ore Hills. The Empire built the Tribute, and now must lay siege to it. The Jotun are given a chance to withdraw, or surrender, but they do not even bother to answer. The siege lasts the better part of a month, and would have been over even more quickly had the orcs not taken the time to shore up the defences a little so the original Imperial plans of the fort, and its weaknesses, are out of date.

Now then my merry lads and merry lasses we are in the breach, the hounds are set loose and it is time at long last for the Mourn to be returned to the Imperial fold. Take heart though for not only do we march to victory, we shall do it in our way, a Marcher way as we enact a steady conquest of the Mournwold. Let us show our people that this is not a war of extermination, but a war for Marcher land. Words are wind, so let's damned well show them how its done. First we advance

When the castle gates are breached, the fighting is bitter and fierce. The orc garrison gives not one inch of ground until it has been watered profusely with orc and human blood. They fight to provide time for the thralls and the orc warbands alike to withdraw west toward Hillstop, and the fortified town of Sarcombe. In the end, the fort is gutted - ruined walls around a shattered and broken upon the Ore Hills, then the Greensward and if we make it that far onto Alderly and Southmoor! Slake your bloodlust and stoke the fires of your national Pride, land is what matters above all else, with courage in your hearts and our loyal neighbours beside us we will be victorious.

General Will Talbot of the Drakes

than the Druj. They claim that no Jotun garrison will surrender, or withdraw - because they know the Empire is without mercy and will kill them as soon as they show any weakness. If their claims prove to be prophetic then the campaign in Southmoor is likely to be hard going.

With the fortress fallen, Ore Hills follows quickly after. The momentum of the Imperial advance takes them into the Greensward once more. The ruins of Overton, the shattered and burnt walls of Orchard's Watch, are a mute reminder of the winter campaign and all that came with it. Some of the soldiers visit the ruins to lay tokens or look for remnants of fallen companions.

North of the ruins, a massive grass-covered burial mound has been raised by the Jotun. Any fallen Imperial soldiers are likely interred there along with the Jotun who fell fighting them. Someone - perhaps surviving monks from the Abbey - has planted young apple trees at the crest. There is some talk of disinterring the mound, but the Marcher soldiers are adamant they be left to rest undisturbed. The soil may have been soured, but it is still the soil they died fighting for, whether they were Marchers or not.

There is no fight left in the Greensward. It is quickly brought under Imperial control. A skeleton crew of orc thralls are captured at the Singing Caves, left behind as the Jotun retreated north and west. They seem lost, more than anything else, and raise no resistance as the Empire sweeps in and claims the mithril mine. There is no sign it has been worked this past season. The fields are largely fallow - the yeomen who might have worked them have already left. Some have gone south to Kharaman, passing beneath the walls of Fort Braydon. Some have gone east to Tassato, perhaps to join the Whittle folk in Mestra. Others have gone west with the Jotun, turning their backs on the Empire forever. The humans who remain are primarily monks and friars, tending to the dead, and seeking to offer some comfort to the ghosts that now haunt the Greensward.

We march to take the fort in the Ore Hills. Prepare pitch and ladders and bodkins - we will kill them by the bow before we crush them by the bill. From there, we will sweep the Jotun forces from the Greensward, then chase them out of Alderly. Let us force them from our lands, but remember that their unarmed thralls are the people of the Mourn - let them be unmolested..

General Marius Woodville-Talbot of the Tusks

The presence of the Imperial armies is not solely about driving the Jotun back. Some of the Imperial Orc soldiers are charged with helping to distribute Senatorial aid to the orc thralls who still remain in the liberated territories. Many of them balk at the idea of relief efforts but the presence of those who agree - especially among the Winter Sun - seems to calm the orc thralls. Under the watchful, unreadable eyes of the Mournwold yeomen, those thralls prepared to accept Imperial aid receive food and other supplies. Where they are suspicious of human soldiers, even those of the Marches, they seem much quicker to accept the Imperial Orc soldiers. They are predisposed, after all, to obey the orders of orcs in armour with weapons.

At the same time, Marcher soldiers assist the civil service in the distribution of grain, preserved food and drink, and seeds from the Imperial Breadbasket to the people of the Mournwold, regardless of species. The food is gratefully received by the liberated Marchers. These people are not starving but the Jotun were in the habit of taking the lions share of their thrall's harvest as a tax to support their armies. Now for the first time in many years, they will face the harvest without worry and be able to live well on the fruits that it brings. The seed - and the promise for the future it represents - lifts their hope.

Today. Today is the day thirty years in the waiting. Today, we look to our Courage to realise our Ambition. The land waits, but it need not wait any longer. Soldiers of the Strong reeds, today is the day that we take back what is ours. We WILL lead the way, and carry the day. For the Marches and for the Empire!.

General Jack Flint of the Strong Reeds

keep. Almost all the Jotun warriors are dead. Those who are taken alive spit in the faces of their captors. Under interrogation, they do not try to hide their contempt for the Imperials. They believe that the Empire has proved time and again that they are treacherous, honourless vermin no better

The Imperial advance is steady and considered. Behind the front lines, field hospitals are set up. Here and there magicians and physicks alike already serve under the banner of the Silver Chalice - showing their allegiance even though the Order has not been formally founded yet. They put their magic in the service of preserving life, and not only the lives of the soldiers.

We fight on in the Mourn. We salute the Mournwolders and the fallen. With the boon from spring let us show there is more to us than bloodshed. We reclaim the land and may the magic turn the earth and begin to mend the scars of war. We steadily push back the Jotun in our conquest of the Mourn.

General Bloodcrow Morgur of the Winter Sun

Not that the Imperial advance is universally celebrated. While the Marcher armies are given a cordial reception, for the most part, the Golden Axe, Winter Sun, and Summer Storm receive a frostier welcome. The situation is tense; if there is one characteristic Mournwolders share with the Marchers of the north it is the ability to hold a grudge. There are plenty of people glad to be free of the Jotun yoke, but many who see the presence of the Imperial troops as a new yoke being prepared for their necks.

The situation is clearly not improved when word comes of the announcement by Heilyn Bronwen's Rest, the Imperial Warmage. The Jotun are gone for now - but the view of many is that they will be back. Knowing that further deadly curses of death and disease will be thrown at them by Imperial magicians when the Jotun return, does nothing to reassure them that the Empire has their best interests at heart.

The orcs and the yeomen are not the only force in the Marches, however.

We travel to the Mourn to put an end to this war with the Jotun. Bring this front to a close.

General Ironside Skar of the Summer Storm

there. Oh, not in the form of armies, but in the shape of lightning raids from the dark, and stealthy sabotage. The depths of the woods are barred to the Imperial forces - simply too dense, too overgrown, too wound around with traps and ambushes and Night magic to permit an army to forge through. There is some suggestion of simply burning the woods, but the consensus is that that is a discussion for another time to be made by generals and senators, not honest soldiers.

With Ore Hills and the Greensward conquered, the Imperial army turns the brunt of its attention to the north-west, to Alderly. The Empire has made slow progress in the face of stiff resistance from the feni that dwell

A welcome surprise comes in the form of the Black Thorns. They emerge from the darkness of Liathaven without warning - thousands of Navarr simply seeming to coalesce from the shadowed woodlands. They are ... hard to see in the twilight of Alderly. In direct sunlight, they can be seen easily. Out of direct light, it becomes difficult to keep track of them, as if they become inconsistent in their location. Powerful Night magic has rendered them

Thorns, you are mighty and have time and time again thwarted the Jotun forces against you. And we shall do it again. We shall slip out right between the teeth of the iron trap that they have tried to capture us in and we will rejoin the Empire forces in the Mourn to reclaim the land that they have stolen, one more step for us to reclaim our home and to stop the Vallorn that stirs.

General Eira Pridestalker of the Black Thorns

inconstant and obfuscated in some way. They bring news of an umbral march through Liathaven, wrapped in living shadows, evading the ring of death that surrounded them and flowing across the woodlands in spite of orc attempts to pin them down, to stop them.

They catch the Jotun forces still in Alderly completely by surprise, catch them retreating ahead of the Imperial advance. Their orderly retreat quickly becomes a rout and the Navarr remind everyone of how they deal with the enemies of the Empire. Few survive to escape to Greenmarch.

General Nikolai has once again called on the forces of the Golden Axes, to take another step in the Mournwold, to show Loyalty to our allies of the Marches, an all out assault on the fortress in the Ore Hills, then continue to support the Marches conquest, into Greenwold, Alderly and Southmore. Now is the time to Fight with Pride, and show our enemies no fear in the ranks of the Golden Axes and to finish our fight here in the Mournwold.

General Nikolai Zakharovic Prochnost of the Army of the Golden Axe

whether they are something else entirely. But regardless, they are Mournwolders.

In the end, the Empire conquers the land around the woods, sending a few well-armed patrols into the eaves to ensure those scattered villages of insular Mournwolders who dwell under the trees are aware that the Jotun have gone. The woodsfolk greet the message with cool equanimity - they seem largely unconcerned. Some of the Marcher soldiers emerge from the shadows shaking their heads. There is some question whether the folk of Alderly are even slightly Marcher anymore, or

They are not even close to the most peculiar beings in the Mourn this season. The Winter Sun are accompanied by a cadre of quiet little beings with twisted bodies and soft voices, servants of the eternal Llofir. Wherever the Winter Sun fight, the little heralds ensure that the bodies of the fallen are carefully buried in the soil of the Mournwold. They become quite agitated if anyone attempts to interfere with them, breathily citing the orc General as having given them permission to ensure the dead do not linger.

Everywhere there are signs of the Jotun occupation that makes their absence all the more obvious. They have retreated west, to Southmoor and Greenmarch, and into Liathaven. Their retreat is slow because they move at the pace of the thralls who travel with them - orcs and humans who will not bow their head to an Empire many of them have never known. With the Tribute fallen, the centre of the Jotun forces becomes the castle of Hillstop.

With Alderly secure, Imperial attention turns back to Southmoor. Initial probing attacks make some progress but soon confirm that the Jotun have focused their remaining forces at Hillstop. There is no indication the Jotun will give up the castle without a fight - they have shown no interest in parley. The Empire has made it clear they will show no mercy - so the orcs must know it can end only one way. The same way the fight for Ore Hills ended. Thousands of dead orcs, and another mute ruin standing vigil over the desolate hills of the Mourn.

Game Information - Mournwold

The Empire has liberated three more regions of the Mournwold. Only Green March and Southmoor remain under Jotun control, and the Empire has made some progress in Southmoor. They may have gained even more land if not for the lingering effects of the advantage the Jotun gained during the Spring Equinox - effects that have now faded completely.

The liberated regions are relatively quiet for now, and appear to have at least tentatively reached an accord with the Marcher soldiers there, but there is still anti-Imperial sentiment among many. The Black Thorns, Golden Axe, Winter Sun, and Summer Storm are not entirely welcome. Further details of this situation will be discussed in Winds of Fortune before the start of the Autumn Equinox.

As such, the Empire now controls the Mournwold again. Any senator can raise a motion of assignment to declare the Mournwold to be part of any Imperial nation. While there is a great deal of expectation that the Mournwold will be declared a Marcher territory, there is no legal requirement for them to do so - or even to immediately assign the territory at all. If they do so before Saturday evening, however, the civil service will arrange the election of a Senator for the Mournwold in the appropriate nation. The seat is traditionally elected in Spring, so any senator raised this season will serve a shortened term.

In addition, the Empire has once again liberated the Singing Caves. It can be allocated by the Imperial Senate as either an Imperial or National title. If it is made Imperial, it will be auctioned during the Winter Solstice for a three-season term; if it is made National it will likewise be appointed by the appropriate nation for a short term. As with all other mithril seats, the Singing Caves will be auctioned or appointed again in Autumn.

A word of caution - the Jotun still control Green March and Southmoor. While they would have to conquer two regions to take the territory again, if they did so any new senator would immediately be unseated.

Walk (Liathaven)

The Summer Solstice ends with the Black Thorns surrounded by the might of the Jotun in West Ranging. Thanks to the courageous actions of the Imperial heroes during the Solstice, the worst of the Jotun wrath was averted for a few days. A few vital days... Thousands of Navarr lives were saved, and a handful of hours gained during which the magicians of Varushka were able to weave a potent shroud over the army. Wrapped in a mysterious caul of Night magic, the entire army is hidden from the eyes of the Jotun.

Thorns, we march to Tassato and thence to Kharaman, the north from Serra Damata to Beacon's Point. While the Jotun chase the tail of the Black Thorns in the north, we will make a steady advance in the south, clearing their watchposts and supply lines as we do.

General Brennos Brackensong of the Quiet Step

During the day, black ravens with amber eyes fly above them. At night, black owls roost in the trees around their camp. And when they must fight, black crows feast upon the fallen.

When the Navarr move through the shadowed places beneath the trees of Liathaven, they do so as smoke and shadow. The gaze of their enemies is diverted, turned aside by trickery and coincidence. When they are stationary, thick mists and unnatural shadows guard their camp - their fires burn with peculiar dark flames that provide heat but little light. Jotun patrols are subtly misled, away from their location. When an unfortunate Jotun scouting party gets too close, they flounder in an eerie gloom through which the Navarr can see easily ... and the orc scouts die, silently.

Taking advantage of this power, the Black Thorns slip out of the orc noose, and flee eastward through Liath's Ring and Liaven's Glen, and thence into the Mournwold. When they reach Alderly, the enchantment starts to fray ... but it lasts long enough for them to take the Jotun there entirely by surprise.

The shroud is not perfect - but it does not need to be. The Jotun manage to intercept some unfortunate soldiers, but the majority are able to avoid the ring of steel that threatened to destroy the entire army, and make it safely to the Mournwold.

As the Black Thorns are leaving northern Liathaven, the Quiet Step is entering Beacon Point. The other Navarr army has marched down through Tassato, through Kahraman, and into the southern forests. They press forward carefully, steadily, wiping out any Jotun camp they encounter. More importantly, they are able to send their scouts north to harry the Jotun. Some risk the Paths of Lan Thuven, others gird themselves for war and slip through the terrible paths consumed by the vallorn. A handful here, a handful there - nothing approaching a full army - but they harass the Jotun supply lines in the north. They trick the Jotun, who must imagine that the Black Thorns have somehow found a way to hide in Liathaven from them.

There is little reliable intelligence from the north, but the scouts who return safely are certain that the Jotun are chasing their own tails - jumping at shadows. They will get little rest this season, and it takes them the better part of six weeks to work out exactly what is going on. The Jotun must know the Quiet Step are in the south now, but there is little they can do about it until after the Autumn Equinox.

For their part, the Quiet Step have made some gains in southern Liathaven - they are perhaps a fifth of the way towards liberating Beacon Point from the Jotun.

Game Information - Liathaven

As detailed earlier, the Black Thorns have successfully escaped Liathaven and engaged in the Mournwold.

The Quiet Step have made small gains in Beacon Point, in southern Liathaven. As it currently stands, the Jotun are in northern Liathaven and no direct engagement between the Navarr and the orcs has taken place so far.

Summer's End (Semmerholm)

A week after the Summer Solstice, the Druj invade Semmerholm. They come across the border into the wild woods of Axmure under the cover of darkness. Several of the secluded manor houses there have already fallen to the orcs before a few survivors manage to escape and raise the alarm. A week later, the main body of the Druj march up the Drycastle road, pushing north and east toward the Gate.

While the secluded manors fall quickly, it is the manors nearer the road that perhaps meet a more ironic fate. Many had given succour to refugees from the Barrens - only to find that following close on the heels of those refugees were the Druj themselves. Some who had escaped the fall of Dawnguard are caught by the Druj, as if fate itself had marked them for death.

As in Dawnguard, the Druj do not seem to be going out of their way to slaughter the Dawnish who fall into their hands - unless they try and fight back in which case they are mercilessly dispatched. Many do try to fight back - but the scattered and disorganised nature of the noble houses of Axmure works against them. Banners are raised bearing the golden boar's head of House Rylas and the white tree of House de Lusignan, but they are utterly outnumbered by the Druj invaders. Only the locations of their manor houses deep in the wild woods provides any real protection from the orc armies, and they are soon forced to fall back.

Axmure is effectively conquered in less than a month. Those manors and villages too stubborn to flee soon fall to the orcs. Those who do flee head along the road toward the Gate, toward Holberg ... with the Druj hot on their heels.

The Druj do not pause - while some of their forces are consolidating their control of the southern woodlands, the bulk press into Estmure. There they encounter their first serious resistance - the garrison of the Gate. Supported by a single unit of men-at-arms belonging to House Cordraco, a scattering of Imperial Orcs still living in Estcastle, and a poorly organised yeoman militia raised to try and keep the orcs at bay. The militia is quickly dispatched, their agonised screams persisting over several nights before they finally, mercifully, fall silent.

For the most part, the Druj are not especially cautious - but neither do they charge recklessly at the walls. Many of their weapons are envenomed with lethal poisons, and they also make use of herbal preparations to grant strength and vigor to the warriors who assault the walls. They largely ignore the manors of Estmure, for the most part focusing all their attention on the fortification.

As the main force besieges the castle, raiders spread out across Semmerholm, attacking indiscriminately, sowing terror and confusion wherever they can. There are reports of Druj guerrillas as far west as Rucastle, and in the vicinity of Semmer's Rose in the north. Fear grips some of the yeofolk - made worse by the stories brought out of Dawnguard by the fleeing survivors. An Imperial orc trader is lynched in a small village near the Semmerstones, mistaken for a Druj spy. While the miscreants are immediately arrested, the woman is still dead.

Like the people of Dawnguard before them, the folk of Semmerholm do their best to resist the Druj advance. The noble houses begin to rally their colours - the emerald and silver of House Devereux; the orange, gold and white of House Ossienne; the green, sable, and argent of House Tamerlaine; the green, gold, and-silver, and the red and black, of the Axmure houses. Despite their best efforts, they are scattered to be effective - although raiding parties can be turned aside or defeated, they cannot quell the irresistible force of the Druj armies.

The Gate holds against the Druj for a week, then a month... hope begins to rise that it will stand long enough for the Empire to arrange a response... only to be dashed. A fortnight before the Autumn Equinox the gates are finally breached. There are confused reports of a crippling poison introduced into the well of the keep under cover of darkness - and very reliable reports that the Druj butcher every soldier who does not flee, even those who in their desperation try to surrender. They hang the bodies on the walls and along the road just as they did at the Towers of the Dawn. The head of the garrison commander is mounted on the flagpole atop the central keep, and the ruined castle set alight by the victorious orcs.

Again, it seems that the Druj expected more resistance - their initial approach is much more considered than in the Barrens. While they have destroyed the Gate, and conquered Axmure, the ruins of the Gate represent the sum-total of the land they have conquered in Estmure. The fortification may have fallen, but it occupied Druj attention and forced them to deal with it - now they are free to turn their attention to the undefended settlements in the west. If nothing else changes, it is likely that both rugged Estmure and wealthy Lacuve will fall to the orcs in the coming seasons - assuming the Empire is lucky and they do not conquer even more territory.

Game Information

With no significant military forces remaining in Semmerholm, information is confused. It is certain that the Gate has been destroyed - it is not in Druj hands but has been reduced to a ruin like the Towers of the Dawn before it. The Druj control Axmure but they have not made much progress in Estmure. Having removed all significant opposition, however, nothing now stands between them and the capture of the entire territory.

Coming on the heels of the loss of Dawnguard, there is some concern about how much more land Dawn can afford to lose before it is no longer able to support all four of its armies. Gerard la Salle is expected to be able to discuss this matter with the military council at the upcoming summit. It is not clear whether he will have good or bad news.

Worse, should they manage to conquer the whole of Estmure they will effectively cut the entire territory of Holberg off from the Empire. While it may be possible to supply the city by ship via the Semmerlak, it is not clear how Holberg will fare in this state. It is also not clear what the effect is likely to be on the populace - even during the occupation by the Druj the city itself remained well supplied by merchant caravans passing through the Gate from Semmerholm. The actual passes through to the city are well fortified by the Walls of Holberg - the Druj cannot get from Estmure or Axmure into Holberg without going through the fortification there or risking the dangerous mountains between Axmure and Holmauer.

Participation

The Druj have conquered Axmure, and captured or destroyed several noble houses and village. If you are roleplaying that you are based in Axmure you may assume that your holdings are far enough out of the way as to have avoided the attention of the orcs - for now. There is no penalty to production until the barbarians conquer the territory, for example. You should be aware that this situation can change - should the Druj turn their attention to rooting out the last remaining free Dawnish houses and villagers.

You may alternately roleplay that your holding has been destroyed and you have fled elsewhere in Semmerholm - you do not need to contact Profound Decisions unless you want to change to a different level one resource in which case the usual 2 crown transfer fee applies. Should you wish to abandon the territory entirely, however, you may email plot@profounddecisions.co.uk and we will allow you to take a level one resource in another territory without the usual transfer fee.

Major Conjunctions

The civil service has identified three major conjunctions of the Sentinel Gate that are expected to be available during the coming summit.

There are two conjunctions on Saturday. One opens to Sandling in Weirwater, close to the shores of the Semmerlak. The other opens to in northern Proceris not far from the border with Morrow.

The Weirwater conjunction presents an opportunity to strike against the army of husks that are being driven east by the Golden Sun. The Proceris conjunction presents an opportunity to engage Druj forces there, most likely the Black Wind army. As always, the Empire can only take advantage of one of these opportunities, and the decision is in the hands of the Imperial Military Council.

There is a single conjunction on Sunday. This will open close to the mountain pass of Crow Road that connects Cinion in Spiral to Willstone in Redoubt. This offers an opportunity to intercept a Grendel force that has flanked the Imperial forces in Spiral.

In addition to the major conjunctions, the civil service has also identified a more traditional conjunction that would allow a large force of Imperial heroes to pass through the Sentinel Gate to Southmoor, in the Mournwold, close to the Jotun fortress of Hillstop. (OOC: A skirmish against the Jotun).

By the time of the Autumn Equinox summit, the civil service will have completed reports for each of these conjunctions, which will be presented to the generals during the Muster. The final decision about which major conjunctions to exploit, and who will take part in the battles, is the heavy responsibility of the generals alone.

91 Brass Coast Mandate: The Imperial Synod sends Franco i Erigo with 130 Liao to encourage Feroz to embrace the temple at Balo and the Black Bull. While those who may be idolators, they are not Imperial citizens and their faith does not concern us long as they follow our laws.

Statements of Principle

The Imperial Synod made the following Statements of Principle:

Number	Assembly	Statement of Principle	Priest	Outcome
4	Dawn	The first reborn with open heart would leap. The frigid waters of her misplaced doubt. Accepting challenge to claim the Crown of Dawn. False Paragon in fear would slink away. False claims once tested. False hearts quick betray. In other words - Prove it.	Ozren de Orzel	Upheld 30 - 10
5	General	There cannot be a faithful agreement between the Empire and any agency who holds Imperial lives in slavery. To allow this suffering to go unrecognised and without cessation is a failure of our Loyalty. We the Synod demand the Thule release all Imperial citizens they have enslaved and that reparations are paid for the slaughtered Imperial souls that were discovered beneath Crow's Ridge.	Veikko	Upheld 861 - 181
12	General	There are two concepts that have been discussed based on the Past Life Vision of Yael of Felix's Watch: The concept that Paragons may voluntarily reincarnate. The concept of the "Land Without Tears". These concepts are separate. Either may be true or false, independently of each other. These two concepts have been conflated repeatedly, and it is imperative that we do not conflate them.	Solas	Upheld 1088 - 84
15	General	The General Synod rejects that Yael is the First Empress Reborn and disbelieves her vision and teachings as stated.	Sabryya i Covas i Erigo	Upheld 971 - 664
17	Highguard	The National Assembly of Highguard believes that Sister Yael is the First Empress Reborn, returned amongst us to further our understanding of the Way of Virtue, to be our	Jared	Upheld 379 - 76 Greater

		Guiding Light and to bring a glimpse of what lies beyond the Labyrinth of Ages		Majority
19	General	We recognise Dan Brackensong and the Voice of the Quiet Forest coven for their Virtuous actions in saving 200 soldiers' lives in Liathaven, by creating, commissioning, funding and casting the arcane projection "Heart's Blood Feeds the Black Thorns"	Brodi Brackensong	Upheld 981 - 26
21	Brass Coast	The Freeborn Assembly declare that we do not consider the current method of election of Senators in the Brass Coast to be sufficiently Virtuous. We move that the top bid, after administrative deductions, should be shared among all that bid, not merely the top three non-winning bidders. Where everyone votes and bids, that Prosperity should be shared by all.	Constanza i Kalamar i Guerra	Upheld 64 - 0 Greater Majority
22	General	We believe that humans are the greatest beings in all creation.	Sejanus	Upheld 660 - 309
24	Urizen	The Spires of Redoubt are encouraged to be proactive in repairing the damage the Grendel-sent storms have done to our paths and bridges. Be Vigilant. Offer or request aid as arete and Prosperity allow.	Marissa Shatterspire	Upheld 192 - 0 Greater Majority
25	Pride	It is an affront to the Empire to send agents to spread spiritual influences of a malign nature - in direct violation of our laws - among our citizens. "Justice" (vengeance) is decried as a false virtue. The Honradez sisters were enabled in their violation of Imperial Law by Faraden agents and equipped with items clearly intended to incite murder. It is clear that some agents within Faraden intend to sow discord within the Empire. We invite the Faraden to offer an official explanation for these actions.	Ephrael	Upheld 100 - 0
32	Brass Coast	The Freeborn assembly explicitly reject Yael's claim to be the First Empress Reborn and urges citizens to ignore her teachings.	Immeldar i Ezmara i Erigo	Upheld 74 - 0 Greater Majority
35	Marcher	Those who reject Hate will be welcomed back whole heartedly into the embrace of the Marcher Family.	Sister Meredith	Upheld 76 - 0 Greater Majority
38	Loyalty	The Loyalty Assembly does not endorse fighting and squabbling between armies on opposing sides of the Yael schism. The Virtuous build each other up, they do not tear each other down! A Loyal and Virtuous Imperial army must always support other Imperial armies. Know your heart's Loyalty and what commands it. Discuss and debate your differences, but when push comes to shove, we are one people, one Empire and must remain Loyal to the Empire and unite	Frederik di Regario	Upheld 89 - 0

40	Highguard	to defeat our barbarian foes. The Highguard National Assembly believes that it is Virtuous to build the Unbound-Steel Hall of the lost chapters in Tabernacle, Reikos and fully supports this endeavor.	Lev Unbound	Upheld 98 - 0
42	General	The occupation of Tamarbode is being diplomatically resolved by the Archmage of Spring, Asenath of Felix's Watch and Azrekal of the Sun of Couros. To take action against the residents of Tamarbode without consultation would be deemed unvirtuous!	Sela	Upheld 372 - 74
43	Wisdom	We declare that military matters are Harsh and Hard and require harsh and hard choices to be made. Things that may be described as cruel, venomous, terrible or atrocities, should instead be described as effective or useless. It is Virtuous to use even horrifying means to achieve your goals. The goal of war is to defeat your enemies! "Nice" is not a Virtue.	Amris	Upheld 86 - 10
46	General	The spiritual advisor of the Academy (currently Lucrecia) casts votes according to the wishes of the children and the young citizens of the Empire, thus giving them a voice in the Synod.	Lucrecia	Upheld 646 - 146
48	General	The Imperial Synod wishes to engage in censored religious discussion with priests of Axos. We draw the following conclusions from their Symposium presentation: It is not compatible with Doctrine: preaching the Axos religion within the Empire is a religious crime. It is a product of reason: We find their conclusions incorrect due to our having different evidence (True Liao) rather than a failure to act on evidence and reason. Future cooperation is desirable: The Synod is confident its Doctrines will stand up to evidence and welcomes further engagement. In Wisdom the Synod judges Liao trade with the Axos to be an acceptable activity that is neither virtuous nor unvirtuous. Axos' use of Liao to create auras of Loyalty, Wisdom, Vigilance, Courage, Pride, Ambition and Prosperity is likely to lead to it being actively supported by the Synod.	Caelia of Weaver's Reach	Upheld 432 - 30
49	General	Factors in favour: reduce use of bone Liao. Increased use of virtue auras in Axos Support an enemy of the Druj Prosperity of our merchants. Factors against: Supporting a religion that contradicts Doctrine	Tarquinius	Upheld 439 - 46

50	General	Increased use of false Virtue auras. Supports a Grendel trading partner. The Synod supports Axos citizens visiting the Empire and reminds them that: Heresy (preaching their religion) is a crime. Blasphemy (denigrating the virtues of our Paragons) is a crime. Idolatry (worshipping non-human entities) is a crime. Holding Axos beliefs is not a crime. By tradition foreign visitors are not usually accused of religious crimes against themselves or each other, but if in doubt speak to an Imperial priest first.	Cyra Stormhaven	Upheld 501 - 16
51	General	We recognise the inspirational quality of Dan Brackensong's Pride of Holberg art installations "Guises of Virtue", and encourage virtuous citizens to visit the Senate to see them.	Elowen of Exile's End	Upheld 560 - 26
53	Highguard	Highguard believes that medical reserves have the right to follow their wisdom on who they treat and how they are treated. Advice from commanding officers and others is welcome and to be considered by the physicks to ensure the best outcome for the situation, but physicks should not be pressured to break their oath when carrying out their duties. Final decisions on who and how to treat are the responsibility of the physick.	Rhesa	Upheld 330 - 16
54	Pride	The Empire has many capable and talented citizens. It is extremely unlikely that there will ever be only a single viable candidate for an elected position. Therefore, we encourage citizens to ensure that no election passes with a single uncontested candidate, and those with the desire and capability to perform it to find the Pride to stand for it, even in the face of challenging odds.	Azekah	Upheld 85 - 0
55	Dawn	Enchantress Orlene of the Dread and Terrible House Ossiene will lead a glorious, virtuous Charge of Dawnish Troubadours and large goblets of Liao into the Barrens to convert the Orcish dispossessed Druj to The Way Imperatrix Lisabetta invoked the Throne's Power of Custodian of Virtue, making this judgement require a Greater Majority to pass. A Greater Majority of the Dawnish National Assembly was estimated to be 113. Hengist Dunn, Senator of Hahnmark, through Past Life Vision, revealed his past life as the first Stormcrow of Steirn, who witnessed, soon after Steirn herself fell from the sky, the first Three	Enchantress Orlene	Upheld 154 - 32 Greater Majority

56	Wintermark	tears Nation: Steirn, Vard and Jotun. This Nation was broken when Catrina, leader of the Vard broke Thane of Thaness Uhtred of Steirn's hospitality and murdered Jarl of Jarls, Sigurdson Wyrmslayer. Kali Keen-Eye is the reincarnation of the personal Grimnir of Emperor Guntherm and saved the life of that era's Jarl of Jarls of the Jotun whose descendants owe a blood debt to. These sagas must be spread to every Hall in Wintermark. These stories must be learned upon.	Jorma Steelhail	Upheld 157 - 0
58	Courage	Tanwyn Ankarien has demonstrated great Courage in her efforts to liberate Spiral. In doing so she has shown three of the Signs of the Exemplar. We commend her for her Virtue and urge her to maintain this course, looking to her Legacy and Pilgrimage. Benevolence: seeking to restore Spiral. Inspiration: Her name is spread and echoed by the Spiral Resistance. Salvation: Spiral citizens kept from and rescued from slavery.	Belisarius Blackheart	Upheld 224 - 16 Greater Majority
59	Navarr	We the Navarr National Assembly fully support the use of cruel tactics by the Varushkan Iron Helms army against our enemies, for these tactics are how we of Navarr have survived since the dance of Navarr and Thorn. These tactics are virtuous and hold no bar for true followers of the Way.	Brat	Upheld 87 - 0
60	General	We acknowledge the Loyalty of Gully of Varushka in his recent command of the Iron Helms army.	Belakov	Upheld 436 - 100
61	Highguard	The Highborn Assembly believe that the historical artwork, a stained glass window in the tomb of Miriam the Strong, should be restored as close to the original version as possible.	Nira of Cantiarich's Hold	Upheld 120 - 0
64	Assembly of Nine	We the Council of Nine reject Yael and her teachings.	Irada von Temeshwar	Upheld 7 - 1 Greater Majority
65	Ambition	The Cardinal of Ambition seeks the Guidance of the Assembly in the appointment of the Virtue Inquisitor of Ambition. Candidates should make themselves known to the Herald. 'Voting' will proceed in the expected manner.	Severin Teyhard von Holberg	Upheld.

Votes for Ranae de Rondell of Dawn - 50.

Votes for Vitor di Mestra - 10.

Votes against the motion: 22.

The Civil Service are unlikely to allow citizens to use Statements of Principle as a voting mechanism in the future due to the confusion

67	Dawn	caused. The Dawnish National Assembly recognises the Empress Lisabetta as Queen of Dawn. She is the ultimate authority in this life and her words should be followed above all others	Tamain Sepulchre	Upheld 158 - 20 Greater Majority
68	Urizen	The Urizen National Assembly recognises the Courage of the Commonwealth in sending its armies to oppose slavers. If they were willing to assist against the Grendel slavers in Spiral we would find it virtuous for Urizen traders to encourage trade with the Commonwealth.	Alexis Vanahir of Weaver's Reach	Upheld 116 - 20 Greater Majority
70	Marchers	The Marcher Assembly explicitly rejects Yael's claims of being the First Empress reborn and urges citizens of the Marchers to reject her teachings.	Robin of Swindale	Upheld 44 - 0 Greater Majority
72	Prosperity	Ingar Ironbreaker and the Saker coven are recognised and applauded for their Prosperous actions casting rituals to aid the Imperial military over numerous seasons. They use the talents and goods that they have to save Imperial lives and act when needed in a Prosperous fashion. They are an example to all Imperial covens.	Vaurus	Upheld 99 - 0
73	Wintermark	The Stormcrows of Wintermark wholeheartedly condemn the decision to employ brutal, dishonourable tactics in the Mournwold, and are concerned by a trend of cruelty in Imperial military matters. These citizens who died in the Mourn were denied the opportunity for Virtue and a good death. Our enemies were not given good deaths, and our own soldiers suffered the same. The lack of Vigilance on the part of the Council is unacceptable, in not considering the consequences of their choices on Imperial Souls. This is not how Wintermark fights and it should not be how the Empire fights, or we are not worth fighting for.	Gunnbrand	Upheld 149 - 15
76	Varushkan	The Varushkan National Assembly support the use of the Iron Helms. They are cruel when necessary. They are an army comprised of people from a hard land who make the hard choices. Our enemies deserve no mercy; "nice" is not a Virtue.	Father Nikolovich Drakov	Upheld 104 - 0 Greater Majority
77	Prosperity	In the light of recent incidents the Prosperity Assembly emphasises that Foreign Nationals must abide by Imperial Law (especially with respect to religious crimes) whilst in Imperial Territory, and should not stand in the way of the Empire prosecuting violations of Imperial Law under the Imperial Legal System. The same should apply to the Empire and to Imperial Citizens in foreign lands. Such agreements will facilitate good trade relations and Prosperity	Mazo i Zabala i Erigo	Upheld 109 - 0 Greater Majority between the Empire and our neighbours while sending a clear message that we will prosecute foreigners who commit religious crimes in our land.

78	Prosperity	We recognise the diligent and committed work of the Seer of the Gateway Livia Cascade in carefully documenting and investigating the True Liao visions of the worthy. The virtuous labour of our citizens should not be unrewarded and we call upon the Order of the Sevenfold Path in our conclave to make available 10 Ilium rings so that a set of regalia may be created - a Mendicant's Cassock that will aid Livia in her work and form a lasting legacy as the Regalia of the Seer of the Gateway	Ricardo di Tassato	Upheld 109 - 0 Greater Majority
79	Prosperity	The Assembly wishes to recognise and reward the Imperial Consul, Aureliana Perpetua Nicasia Saverio di Sarvos, for her benevolence and Prosperity. When the Empire faced an issue with the Druj she prosperously provided the seven wains of White Granite with the betterment of the Empire in mind. We reward her with 12 crystals of Mana funded by the Empress with a view that she will use these prosperously for the Empire. Her actions are an example of how the virtuous act.	Morgan Leafstalker	Upheld 94 - 0
83	Imperial Orcs	We the National Orc Assembly recognise the miraculous and virtuous nature of the actions taken by Skywise Rykana in the steading of Return before winter in resisting a potent fear aura when no other orc could, and the breaking of the stone when no other could, and the liberation of the countless suffering souls within. Should this miracle be recognised we will further this to the General Assembly.	Skywise Gralka	Upheld 48 - 0 Greater Majority
84	League	The greatest work our Empire has ever created is our people. Forged by the Way and sharpened by our cultures. In Loyalty we welcome the people of Whittle to integrate with the people of Tassato. We will provide an education to every child to ensure a prosperous future and instruction in the seven Virtues. We have courage in our conviction and take pride in our people.	Harlequin	Upheld 182 - 0 Greater Majority
86	Marcher	The monks and friars of the Marches condemn the lack of Vigilance shown in not facing the threats posed by cursing the Mourn. We condemn the lack of Loyalty shown to the 250,000 Marchers left there. The Urizen General has been rebuked by the Synod. The Warmage has lost his seat over this. Those responsible shall be held to account.	Martin Orchard	Upheld 46 - 0 Greater Majority

87	Courage	The Assemblies that speak and pass Judgements against Yael, the First Empress Reborn, show a lack of Courage. If they truly disbelieved her Revelation and her words, they would have the strength of conviction to see her condemned, tried and convicted for the Heresy they say she preaches. Until they do this, they make a mockery of their own authority.	Isaac di Sarvos	Upheld 186 - 0 Greater Majority
88	Courage	Hear the Words of Yael. I cannot be turned from the truth I preach. I shall cleave to what I know to be True, and I can do nothing else. If the Synod rejects my words and Revelation, let it condemn me, try me, and seek my death as a Heretic. Though I am glad to face my martyrdom as Permion, I know that those who come after me will be as Lepidus. They shall be as the Seven Stars, to guide the Empire when my Guiding Light has been snuffed out.	Yael	Upheld 186 - 0 Greater Majority
90	Assembly of Nine	We, the Assembly of Nine, request that the Silent Bell investigate Janon the Eternal of Night and cults associated with them - especially Freedom and people of note that have contact with him.	Levitia Endsmeet	Upheld 6 - 0 Greater Majority

The Imperial Synod did not make the following Statements of Principle:

Number	Assembly	Statement of Principle	Priest	Outcome
16	General	The General Synod believes Yael is the First Empress Reborn and is here to inspire us to greater understanding of the Way. The Way is always a step forward and this is our next step. As show in the True Liao vision of Yael, supported by the True Liao vision of Tabor the Fool and the Golden Fragment recovered by Ed Watcher.	Naomi	Not upheld 552 - 1116
18	Varushka	I Snežana Shulgaova Lyubomir am standing for head of the Varushkan National Assembly, if this judgement is upheld it is recognised as my authority.	Snežana	Not upheld 22 - 54
30	General	The General Assembly believes it to be Virtuous for the Quartermaster General to offer the guerdon only to armies whose nations reject Yael's teachings.	Viviane de Coeurdefer	Not upheld 332 - 547
39	Highbard	A true pilgrimage should test the follower in many ways so that they grow, learn and gain awareness of how they shall follow the Way. I believe a "Grand Pilgrimage" of 3 to 6 months is needed for this. In agreement with the Navarr I believe this should be undertaken with Navarri guides and to travel the trods. In doing so we shall also drive back the	Delilah	Not upheld 142 - 216

81	General	Vallorn. It is virtuous for a priest to use the rite of Excommunication against people not under the writ of Excommunication to help combat Heresy, Blasphemy, and Idolators.	Edmundo	Not upheld 156 - 366

381YE Spring Equinox winds of fortune

Overview

Over the past three months, several events have occurred which are of significance to the Empire and may require a response from her champions. You can also read about the progress of the Empire's military campaigns here.

In each case, we've tried to tag the Winds of Fortune entry with the nations, or political bodies, to which it is most relevant. We've done this to help people who are interested only in events that are especially relevant to them. In no way are these tags intended to be exhaustive; the Empire is a complex place and very little happens in isolation.

As always, how much or how little of this information you choose to know in character is up to you. Part of the purpose of Winds of Fortune is to maintain the illusion of the Empire as a living, breathing place where things happen - and to make players aware of things their characters 'should' know based on what their roleplaying says they have been doing for the past three months.

Many winds of fortune open with a short section of in-character text. In all cases, these pieces are intended to help create an atmosphere and provide a little entertainment. Where they contain opinions, those are the opinions of the fictional people depicted - and where they contain information or rumours the assumption is that the reader will create their own context for that information or gossip. They're mostly just a bit of fun and they tend not to contain anything vital to the understanding of the wind of Fortune.

Winds of Fortune

A Spiritual Prism

- Everyone, but especially the Imperial Synod, the Imperial Military Council, Dawn, and Highguard

The crisis that threatens to slowly tear the Imperial Synod apart continues. The threat of a catastrophic schism within the Way deepens. Five nations have denounced Yael of Highguard and her Congregation of the First Empress; one has endorsed her; one has declared no interest in the matter; and three have kept their own counsel. The situation is increasingly volatile, and there are both opportunities to seize and prices to pay. You can learn more about the deepening crisis here.

Distant Deeps

- Imperial Synod (especially the Freeborn and Prosperity assemblies); fleet captains; Imperial Senate

Finally, after the better part of a year, the Temple of Balo and the Black bull in Oran has opened its doors. The immediate impact has been an influx of merchants and sailors from the Asavean Archipelago, eager to receive the blasphemous blessings of their peculiar idols. The Imperial Senate has provided material support to build a similar temple, dedicated to the Way in far-distant Nemoria ... but the Freeborn assembly seems less than thrilled ... You can learn about these developments here.

Fearful Symmetry

- Urizen, Military Council

The New year brings with it storms to Urizen- and not just the furious storms that batter the coast. Powerful storms have struck Redoubt, raging as far inland as Cargo in the north, accompanied by flooding and high winds and battering rain that seems guided by a malign intelligence. The mountains of Urizen rely on well maintained roads and bridges, and this sinister storm appears to have swept away several key avenues through the territory. You can learn about what implications this has for Redoubt, and for the movement of armed forces through the territory, here.

Forests of the Night

- Forest owners, Naga, Dreamers, people who like moths

During the Winter solstice, the Coven of Umbral Reflection and the Spire of the Auric Horizon combined their powers to weave the powerful enchantment known as the Wondrous Forests of the Night. Working with consummate magical skill, the Urizen magicians laid a delicate network of mystery and imagination across the entire Empire. As with the Hallow of the Green World performed last year, the ritual has had several significant magical effects beyond what might have been expected. You can learn all about them here.

Immortal Hand

- Imperial Conclave

The six archmagi of the Empire have the power to send a formal message to a single eternal each Summit. During the Winter Solstice, five such plenipotentiary messages were sent - and over the last three months each of the eternals contacted has made a formal response. One of the five has also agreed to a formal parley with the Empire. You can learn about these responses here.

In the Tents of Prosperity

- Various rich folk and traders including (but not limited to) those of Urizen, Highguard, Wintermark, and Navarr

The Imperial Bourse private auction is no more. Rather, individual citizens with interesting good to sell are encouraged to come to Anvil and try to get the best, most Prosperous deal they can by dealing face-to-face with the leaders of the Empire. Many of them do everything they can to make sure there is a little bit of buzz around their goods, to help ensure they make a good sale. You can learn about several such opportunities at the coming Summit here.

On Wings Aspire (Winds of Magic)

- Technically everyone, but especially Imperial Magicians

The Empire is an Empire of powerful magic, but not all powerful magic is of the Empire. The Winds of Magic collects a grab-bag of interesting or important effects and opportunities, both certain and rumoured, including tales of disruption in the Summer realm; a bounty offered by a Day eternal; a glimmering citadel in the marshes of Bregasland; the details of the ongoing darkest night; and the conjunction of stars visible from those parts of the Empire that can still see the stars. You can learn more about these diverse effects here.

The Price of Experience

- Navarr, Imperial Orcs; Imperial Senate

The orcs of the Great Forest fled south from the Barrens with the Druj at their heels. Invited to come to Therunin six months or so ago, they did just that - but the temporary situation where they squat in the Lower Tarn Valley is proving unsustainable. With spring in bud upon the trees, the orcs of the Great Forest are bringing things to a head. You can learn about the developing situation in Therunin here.

Seize the Fire

- Imperial Synod, Imperial Senate, Imperial Orcs

During the Symposium of Revelation, the Imperial Senate accepted two additional doctrines; the Doctrine of the Howling Abyss and the Doctrine of the Ancestors. With this change of doctrine, the position of the Imperial Orcs has been cemented in the Way ...but there are still some questions to be answered, and not everyone is receptive to these changes. You can learn about this complex situation here.

Sinews of the Heart (Trade Winds)

- Fleet captains; congregation leaders; ambassadors

International trade, like international relations, can be fraught with pitfalls - and rich with opportunities. You can find a quick round up of things related to the current state of affairs, with an emphasis on trading, here.

Some to Misery are Born

- Tassato, the Marches

After the doughty folk of Whittle Hill in the Mournwold were forced to leave their land by the Jotun, they have been exiled to Tassato. Welcomed by the Tassato Chamber of Commerce, they have purchased two streets and created a Marcher enclave there. Unfortunately, the Imperial Synod is still very concerned about their involvement with certain blasphemous powers. You can learn about this season's chapter in the saga of the folk of Whittle here.

Spear of the Stars

- Imperial Orcs, Varushka, Wintermark; the Northern trade network; the Senate and the Synod

Doghri Thulebane has been removed and the northern passes out of Skarsind to Otkodov are now open to the Thule orcs. They appear pleased, and continue to extend the slightly guarded hand of friendship to the Empire. There are opportunities that might be explored, but as the détente between the Empire and Otkodov improves, there are ... obstacles ... that must be overcome. You can learn more about the diplomatic situation here.

Watered with Fears

- The Marches, Wintermark

The recent campaign season in the Mournwold has been one of the bloodiest ever, thanks to certain curses and the strategy of the Imperial Military Council. Twenty-thousand dead warriors and soldiers and who knows quite how many citizens of the Mourn. Four groups have been particularly effected - the Marchers of Mournwold themselves; the Jotun, of course; the Feni who live in the forest of Alderly; and those folk in Wintermark who perhaps expected more. You can learn about these four groups, and how the carnage has affected them, here.

Miscellaneous

Detente in Sermersuaq

- Wintermark

The raids by the odd hunters that have been going on for the last six months or so have petered out. It is not obvious if this is a temporary respite, or whether Savik Summerstorm has secured a permanent resolution.

Krampushall

- Wintermark, Imperial Orcs

During the Winter Solstice, the Imperial Senate gave permission for the construction of the Krampushall - a residence for the supernatural creature known as the Krampus in Pakaanan's Pass overlooking the Clattering Gulley. After nearly a year of very peculiar behaviour, the beast is apparently well pleased with its new home and "looking forward to meeting the neighbours" - presumably it means the Imperial Orcs. Given the creature is strongly associated with bad luck, this may well be something of a double-edged sword.

381YE Spring Equinox winds of war

Overview

As the year 381YE dawns, the campaigns against the barbarian orcs continue.

On the southern coast of Urizen, the Eastern Sky support the garrison of the Court of the White Fountain, eager to repel any Grendel advance - yet no such advance materialises. Indeed, it seems the main bulk of the southern orc forces has quit the territory, leaving a token force behind to maintain their presence among the captured spires in Naris.

In the west, the Black Thorns withdraw from southern Liathaven along the Paths of Lan Thúven, protected by Spring magic and leaving behind them a thousand ravenous winterbound cadavers to harry the Jotun. They are not retreating - they launch an attack into northern Liathaven, meeting the Freeborn Fire in the South in an attempt to liberate West Ranging. They come within a hair's breadth of doing so.

Shore Leave (Redoubt)

The Eastern Sky march out of Spiral into Optarion, in eastern Redoubt. Blue and gold tents pool around the Court of the White Fountain, supporting the Urizen garrison. The knights, war-witches, and yeomen of the third Dawnish army are ordered to avoid major engagements, but to slow the Grendel advance wherever possible. Some of the commanders are a little nonplussed, but for the most part the soldiers are more than happy to enjoy the hospitality of the Urizen.

While the army rests, the Heliopticon is busy. Light and dark flicker, bringing terse messages from the spires of the storm-tossed southern coast. From the fishing town of Elos comes news of a major raiding force turned aside by a warband of Imperial heroes. While the town suffered some damage, the orcs were prevented from burning it to the ground.

The remaining fishing boats and trading ships of Elos take shelter from the magical storms in their deep harbour, but with their spyglasses they keep as close an eye as they can on the orc force. They report that the majority of the Lasambrian ground forces have made a disciplined withdrawal back to their ships. The Grendel vessels have set their sails - some crimson, some emerald-green - and swiftly departed for open waters. They are not quick enough to outrun the wild Spring magic already taking hold across the southern coast of Urizen - some of their sails are tattered and torn by the time they pass beyond the ken of the watchers at Elos.

Not all the barbarian forces have departed. The Winter Solstice surprise attack left the orcs in possession of several southern spires. Rousting these remaining orcs would provide little challenge for an Imperial army, but while they remain the southern orcs have a foothold in Naris. Should the Grendel return, the forces left behind would aid them in seizing a beachhead here.

The main focus of the remaining forces appears to be the spire of Evenstar - the hospital where Urizen practitioners of Spring and Day magic worked their magical arts to treat the sick. This spire fell to the barbarians during the Winter solstice - one last desperate flickering of the Heliopticon marking its fall. "The orcs are here. The gate has fallen." Then silence.

The Grendel have expanded into Redoubt. Now is the time for the Eastern Sky to do what they do best. We will match to redoubt and harass the enemy, slowing their advance by giving ground.

General Vincent Vexille of the Eastern Sky

Redoubt Game Information

The Grendel forces appear to have left Redoubt. While they do not control a region, their attack has established a foothold in Naris. It would be a simple matter for an Imperial army to use an appropriate attack order to clear the region of the remaining orcs, but while they remain they will make it easier for the Grendel to take a beachhead here should they return.

In campaign terms, victory points accrued toward conquering a region do not go away naturally and count toward future attempts to take that region. Victory points are only removed if a campaign army attacks the conquered areas.

Balance of Terror (Liathaven)

The Black Thorns walk the Paths of Lan Thúven. Bound with a powerful enchantment woven from Spring magic by the vates of the Voice of the Quiet Forest, they pass from the battlefield of Western Scout into the heart of the Westwood, bound for West Ranging.

Behind them, they leave chaos, and dead Navarr. Two hundred thorns sacrifice their lives to slow the orc advance long enough for the army to gather at the ruins of the Jotun-burnt steading of Hidden Walk; without the magic of the Quiet Forest, many more would have died. Yet as their new protective enchantment takes hold, the hungry dead bound to the Navarr army are let loose. A thousand spirit-ridden husks, a thousand slaughtered Navarr given a chance at vengeance against their murderers, a thousand winter horrors set free to follow their true nature...

As the Black Thorns enter the Paths of Lan Thúven, the dead let loose a single terrifying howl - a single cry voiced by ten-hundred unliving throats - and race through the woods toward the advancing Jotun. Unleashed, their furious hunger is indiscriminate - they fall on their former brothers and sisters with the same abominable relish with which they assail the orcs. While the potent magic woven to protect the Black Thorns blunts the worst of the attack, the last huddled groups following the Black Thorns through the Paths bear savage wounds, marks of the gluttonous hunger of the creatures they have unleashed.

Leaving the Jotun behind to face the unbound wrath of the dead, the army passes into the vallorn-choked Westwood. Shrouded with the Night magic woven into the pathway, four and a half thousand Navarr walk into the very jaws of their greatest foe. Through the asphyxiating miasma they walk. Through the green hell that is the riotous depth of the Doom of Terunael. No thorn who makes this journey will ever forget it - it is one thing to range into the vallorn as scouts, as small bands; quite another to march an army into the deeps.

The magic protects those who keep to the path - but the journey is not without its dangers. Stray too far to the left or the right; miss one of the boundary stones; fail to pass through one of the arches... the alien beasts that dwell in the depths of the vallorn strike without warning and the miasma allows little room for mistakes. Yet, still, the Black Thorns are protected; the magic of Spring can bring terrible death, but it also brings life. Those injured by Jotun axes, or torn by unliving claws, quickly recover from their wounds. While the paths do not lie along a trod, the enchanted soldiers find it easy to push themselves forward. Anything to get to the far end of the Paths as soon as possible.

As soon as possible ... Time has little meaning on the Paths of Lan Thúven. The trees grow impossibly thick in the Westwood, blocking out the sky. The fog of the miasma chokes everything. Even at noon, little light penetrates the canopy, leaving everything shrouded in twilight. At night ... at night it is sometimes worse. The plants and insects near the paths possess an eerie phosphorescence, rendering the depths of midnight into that same encompassing twilight. Objectively, it takes a little under a week to pass from south to north. Subjectively ... hard to say. Even measured in sleep, it is difficult to track exactly how long the journey takes. One soldier may be famished, thirsty, stumbling near exhaustion while her companion is satiated, full of energy. It makes little sense.

Eventually, though, the Black Thorns emerge coughing, blinking, into the southern woodlands of Jotun-held West Ranging. They take one night to rest in the ruins of Silent Stand steading. And then they attack.

As the Black Thorns strike from Silent Stand into the forests on the southern border of northern Liathaven, a second Imperial force drives into the territory from the north. The Freeborn of the Fire of the South have made their own march, north out of Kahraman, through Tassato, through Upwold, and Mitwold, and down into the marshes of Bregasland. A heroic charge, a testament to the ferocity and the stamina of the soldiers of the Bay of Catazar. They, too, rest for a single night after their mad rush, a sea of rainbow tents along the causeway east of Sallow, and then into West Ranging with the aid of the flat-bottomed boats of the marshfolk.

We have an opportunity, cousins, to make the Jotun pay for their invasion of Kahraman and the brutality they have shown us. March swiftly to join our Navarri cousins and make the Jotun bleed.

General Vrael i Sol-Devorador i Erigo of the Fire of the South

The Jotun garrisons are alert for a potential invasion, but they are looking north - not south. When the Freeborn enter the woodlands, they are ready for them, ready to fight - but not half so ready for the Navarr who strike from the south, from out of the vallorn. The first engagement is a rout - the orcs fall back as soon as they see the Navarr, clearly mistaking them for some new horror out of the Westwood. They rally quickly, however, once it becomes clear that they are facing a mortal threat.

The defenders are outclassed, but they are stubborn. The two Imperial armies exchange messengers, and moving quickly and with sure purpose meet up and turn their attention to the last Jotun holdouts. They hold nothing back, but in the end it appears that the long years the Jotun have had to prepare for a serious Imperial assault have worked in their favour. The Imperial forces have taken most of the region, but there are still pockets of orc resistance. Worse, as news spreads of the Imperial attack, Jotun bands from Liath Ring and Liavens Glen begin to harry the Imperials from the east.

The Imperials fail to secure the region, but they are very close. The Jotun still control the lightly fortified ruins of the former Navarr steading of Seveneaves, and two or three key points along the route between Hahnmark and the Mournwold. If nothing changes, the Empire could secure these final objectives next season. If nothing changes...

Liathaven Game Information

Imperial forces have gained a very significant foothold in West Ranging - but they have fallen short of the number of victory points required to secure the beachhead by one victory point.

At the same time, the Jotun have removed all trace of an Imperial presence in Western Scout, conquering that region.

As there are no Imperial-controlled regions in Liathaven, the standard penalty to the production of personal resources now applies.

With a second Jotun conquest of southern Liathaven, with the Jotun fury directed at the Navarr, and with the call to rally around the Black Thorns, we assume there is now no significant Navarr presence remaining in the territory. Going forward, we will assume that the only Navarr steadings and stridings still based in Liathaven are player character groups. While this will not prevent spoils of war being assessed should the territory be recaptured, the lack of Imperial citizens and non-Jotun infrastructure means the territory would require extensive rebuilding, regardless of which Imperial nation the Senate assigns the territory to.

Liathaven Participation

Any Navarr character who wishes to roleplay that they accompanied the Black Thorns through the Paths of Lan Thúven is welcome to do so. Any character who assigned their military unit to support the Navarr army may also have accompanied them through the Westwood, or they may roleplay that their troops joined the army once it reached West Ranging. While the Black Thorns were protected by the magic woven into the Paths, and by the enchantment woven by the Voice of the Quiet Forest, passing through a vallorn is not a safe proposition and medical supplies are in high demand. If you accompanied the Black Thorns, you may e-mail empire.plot@profounddecisions.co.uk and request a traumatic wound to represent your exposure to the vallorn.

Devil in the Dark (Weirwater and the Barrens)

The Golden Sun and the Gryphon's Pride withdraw from the Barrens, marching west to Astolat, Murderdale and the Carmin Fields - temporarily under Imperial control - are claimed by the Druj...

... and that is all anyone in Dawnguard can say with any certainty.

The situation in Weirwater is also a little uncertain. Since they emerged from Karsk and crossed the Semmerlak in Summer last year, the army of the unquiet dead has avoided direct conflict wherever possible. Oh, their march has hardly been bloodless -

I have everything I wanted. You are no longer my responsibility.

Goran Dobromir

they are flesh hungry shambling cadavers after all - but for the most part they have actively avoided confrontation with Imperial forces. Even when they were engaged in Astolat by the Golden Axe, and the defenders of the Castle of Thorns, they preferred to retreat rather than fight Imperial forces. They spent the last season spread across south-western Weirwater - beneath the trees of Garthsmoor, Weirsmoor, and Hawksmoor.

On the last night of the Winter Solstice, something happens. According to eye-witnesses from Applefell and Hawthorn, the green corpse-lights and emerald fires that mark the presence of these dangerous horrors suddenly flared up, turning rapidly from green to blue to purple to red. At the same time, thousands of unliving throats let loose an unspeakable, gleeful howling that froze the blood of those who heard it, and sent all save the most courageous fleeing for home.

Then ... nothing.

Some brave knights-errant, and a handful of curious questing knights stride forth to explore the area. A number do not return, but those that do say that the unliving abominations are still there - gathered together in the wild hills and tangled woods of eastern Hawksmoor. They are not shy about attacking and attempting to devour living intruders, and there are a few more garbled reports that farms and homesteads nearby have been found empty or splashed with dried blood. Yet they do not seem to be ranging very far afield and fairly soon the yeofolk of western Weirwater learn to avoid the areas where they are likely to be encountered.

Weirwater and the Barrens Game Information

In the Barrens, Dawn - and thus the Empire - now controls only the region of Dawnguard. The Druj control the rest of the Barrens. There is no further information about what is going on - although there is a spy network in the Barrens and it is possible that any military units assigned to support the scouts there may have more information.

Thanks to the peace treaty ratified by the Empire during the Winter Solstice 380YE, the Druj orcs are now considered foreigners under Imperial law.

In Weirwater, there is still a significant force of unliving husks. They appear similar to those created with a certain dark Winter magic enchantment. The bulk of the unnatural force is focused in western Hawksmoor. It represents a major force, comparable to a campaign army.

Wolf in the Fold (Skarsind)

Out of the east, the Iron Helms march. Three stzena lead the way, beating drums. Behind them comes a standard bearer, holding the black and silver banner of the Iron Helms, raised for the first time in many years.

Find Dogri Thulebane. Bring him to Justice. Alive and Whole.

General Akstis Eigulys of the Army of the Iron Helms

Behind the banner march the warriors of Varushka, and their allies. Five thousand soldiers of the hills and the forests, grim faced and implacable. Most are clad in tightly woven scale, the finest the artisans of Karsk can forge. Others prefer the freedom of movement offered by dark leather lamellar. The black plumes on their peaked helmets flutter in the cold wind blowing down from the northern mountains. Their round shields are slung on their back. Their heavy swords, their sharp axes, are sheathed.

Ranging to either side of the column are the dog handlers, their muzzled beasts restrained by tough leather leashes. One word will send them racing into the enemy to harry, to trip, to savage. Another word will cause them to fall on downed warriors, tearing at throats and bellies until the enemy is so much bleeding meat. It is a cliché that people grow to look like their dogs... but with their pugnacious jaws, wild hair, growling voices - the houndsmasters of the Iron Helms seem to prove it true. They fight beside their hounds, and there are stories - whispers - tales - that on nights when the moon is dark they hunt alongside them through the forests of Lestasnj, wrapped in the skin of wolves.

There are other beasts among the Iron Helms. Toward the rear of the column march a hundred eerie warriors hailing from the hills of Branoc. They wear fur and boiled leather, and they are adorned with black feathers. Their faces are painted white, in disturbing patterns. They look a little more like Kallavesi, or Navarr, than true Varushkans. Many of their fellow soldiers give them a wide berth, and when they camp their yurts are raised a short distance from the others. There are said to be a number of cabalists among them, privy to the unsettling secret lore of the Lord of the Broken Barrow. When they enter Skarsind, they seem fascinated by the Imperial Orcs, and there are rumours that some of them have fought alongside the Thule, as well as against them, during the recent campaigns in Karsk.

Above the column drift night-feathered carrion birds. In the evening and the morning, they crowd in the trees, croaking and muttering to one another. Some of the soldiers - just a few - are seen speaking to the birds as night falls. What they discuss, and who these soldiers are, is not a topic for open discussion.

The Iron Helms come to Skarsind, along the road from Olvanshka to Gildenheim. They camp outside the orc city for a night, then leave the good roads behind them. They march north through Estermark, past the ruins of the Four-Seasons Market, up into the Skogei Glens. They travel quickly, and at night their tents huddle close together - they are Varushkan and do not like much being in the wilds in the dark. They spend three nights and two days at Hengesthal, where the commanders study maps and ask questions of the Imperial Orcs who garrison the fortification. The fortification is also where they meet three magistrates; a Varushkan, an Imperial Orc, and a Suaq from Hahnmark. They will accompany the army as it heads into the hills. Perhaps their presence adds greater legitimacy to what is to come.

There is a little frustration among some of the captains, especially those from the mines of Moresvah. "There are quicker ways to break a castle than to lay siege to it," one of them declares. "You break a castle by breaking the people inside." They have their orders, however, and while they may mutter, they will follow them.

One cold, wet morning at the tail end of Winter, while Spring is hanging immanent in the air, the Iron Helms march up the narrow mountain track that is the only approach to Crow's Keep. They do not come stealthily. Their banners are unfurled; their stzena beat loud and hard on their drums; the soldiers raise their voices in the war anthem of the Empire. Their tone is dark, however; they impart to the celebration of Imperial martial might a certain cold edge, a threat, a promise of things to come.

They have sent runners ahead, to tell the defenders of Crow's Keep that they are coming, and that they expect to be met by Dogri Thulebane, and by the criminals he shelters. The messengers meet them halfway up the mountain, the response of the Winterfolk a predictable silence.

The castle is no great fortification, but the approach is well guarded and difficult. There are a great many people on the walls - heavily armoured Steinr soldiers, leather-clad Suaq archers, and masked Kallavesi warriors. Scouts suggest Dogri's little army of perhaps five hundred disgruntled Winterfolk has been reinforced. How much, and who by, is difficult to say. They are believed to be independent captains, angry with the ceding of Skarsind and the Silver Peaks, hungry for a chance to strike against the hated Thule, bitter that their grievances have gone unheard. Few in the Iron Helms care one way or another.

A second warning is given. "Hand over Dogri Thulebane, and the criminals he shelters, or we will come and take them."

From the ramparts, a voice calls out "You will take no man or woman of Wintermark this day. Go back, or we will make you go back." They are outnumbered perhaps ten times by the Varushkan army, but they seem unbowed by the threat arrayed against them. The heirs of Inge Suvvisdottir truly believe the storm can never break them.

One last time, a message is delivered. One final chance to avoid what is to come.

"Any who wish may leave, save Dogri Thulebane and the criminals he shelters. An oath is given that any who quit the castle now, and offer themselves to the custody of the magistrates, will be unharmed."

Nobody moves. Minutes tick by. One of the Suaq on the wall raises their bow and sends two arrows thudding into the cold earth two feet in front of the messenger. She flinches but does not move. She nods her head to the Winterfolk, turns her back on them, and walks casually back to the army to deliver their final refusal.

Ten minutes later, the siege begins in earnest. It is not quite as one-sided as might be expected. Crow's Keep survived countless attacks by the northern barbarians, survived even the occupation of the Thule, because of its isolated position and the difficulty of the approach - a single bridge over a fast flowing river gorge is the only reliable approach. Further, Dogri has received significant support from the captains of Wintermark - most with their shields and faces hooded, their identities known only to Dogri himself. They fight alongside the people of Crow's Keep with equal fervour, and if they feel remorse at slaying fellow Imperial citizens that does not stay their hands. Any more than it stays the hands of the Varushkan soldiers.

The only approach to the outer gate, the gate that provides access to the stone bridge across the river, is via a narrow pass. Two hundred warriors hold the outer fort against the Varushkans for nearly a fortnight. The Iron Helms probe for weakness, attacking over and over, but each time they find little that they can exploit and are forced to fall back. They are patient, however, and while the loss of Imperial life on both sides is grim it is not half so terrible as it might be had their commander ordered an all-out assault.

Eventually, the pressure of the Varushkan warriors breaches the gate. The fighting in the courtyard beyond is vicious, but the defenders retreat back across the bridge in good order taking advantage of the barricades they have had plenty of time to erect. The Varushkans occupy the outer fort and again probe for weaknesses. The defenders have deep cellars - if the Iron Helms hope to starve them out they will be sorely disappointed. Several sorties across the bridge end in defeat for the Iron Helms, and for a short time the defenders begin to hope that they might hold out until the Spring Equinox.

Yet the Varushkans hold the advantage and they never give up testing the defences. A little over a month after the gate is breached, they launch the final assault. It begins with a dark shadow falling over the keep - as a screaming murder of black crows descends on the walls, talons tearing and beaks seeking the eyes of the marksmen. Covered from the archers, the implacable, heavily armoured schlecta advance, bearing great shields and vicious axes that can maim and cripple. Behind them come the hounds and their handlers, snarling and savage.

The fighting rages for over an hour as the Wintermarkers force the Helms to pay a blood price for every step they take across the bridge. But the Varushkans give as good as they get and their war hounds exact a terrible price, tearing out the throats of those who fall. Both sides keep their discipline and follow their orders - but this cruel Varushkan army was bred for bloody killing and the stones run red wheresoever they tread.

If the Wintermarkers had had another score of archers or the same for their shield wall they would surely have thrown the Varushkans back once more. But for want of a shield the wall is lost - and the battle with it. The horn sounds and the few surviving defenders fall back to the Keep. Behind them the stones are washed clear by the light rain that has begun to fall. The skies weeping, perhaps.

The main gate of Crow's Keep was built to withstand raiding orcs, not an Imperial army. The Iron Helms bring up a covered battering ram, carefully navigating it over the stone bridge. Carved from a single weirwood tree, swinging on mighty chains, its hideous head of greensteel shaped in the likeness of a ravening wolf bound with runes and oaths. The Hammer, they call it, and when they set it to the gates of Crow's Keep, the gates fall swiftly before it.

Once the castle is finally breached, blood is shed in earnest. These confined spaces still favour the defenders more than the attackers, but both sides sense the final battle has begun. As the Iron Helms struggle to bring the full force of their army to bear, the Winterfolk fight to defend their home. These warriors toughened by the harsh winters of northern Skarsind seek no quarter, as they fight against those who have come to take their home and the last vestige of their pride with it.

Soon the army has secured the fortification. Many of the surviving defenders have fled, ordered by Dogri to escape with their lives through a hidden postern gate when it is clear that the battle is lost. But Dogri and those closest to him make no attempt to flee. Shortly after noon, the last warriors of Crow's Keep take a stand in the Thane's great hall. They do not bar the doors, do not seal themselves in. They wait inside stone walls, walls that have stood for over two centuries, for the invaders to come to them.

The Iron Helms pause; there is a discussion about how best to proceed. One of the captains wants to simply set fire to the hall and let the flames solve their problem. Her argument that this will save Varushkan lives is dismissed out of hand, before any magistrate can intervene. The general has been very clear how this battle will end. Dogri Thulebane and his collaborators will be arrested and will face trial. The order is given. The dogs are leashed, the physicks and surgeons are called forth to await the word; once the hall is secured they will fight their own grim battle to ensure Dogri and his lieutenants are whole and hale enough to stand trial.

The Iron Helms of Varushka charge the hall of the last Thane of Skarsind and Crow's Keep falls.

Skarsind Game Information

Dogri Thulebane has been captured - alive - by the Iron Helms along with several of his key supporters. In the process, most of his five-hundred person strong army is killed, with the remainder scattered or arrested. In doing so, however, over two-hundred Iron Helms were killed or otherwise rendered unable to continue fighting. Crow's Keep itself has fallen, and is effectively ruined.

Prior to closing downtime, we had agreed a set of numbers that would determine the outcome. Specifically, if Dogri received the support of 1500 more strength from player characters than the Iron Helms received, he would hold off the Imperial army this season. In the end it was incredibly close - so close in fact that it was effectively decided by a single upgraded military unit supporting the Iron Helms.

The region of Crow's Ridge is now considered to be under the control of the Imperial Orcs.

Going forward, on the back of this outcome, Profound Decisions will assume that there is no remaining significant population of Winterfolk in Skarsind. There remain some player character halls, but they are isolated and exceptional and it is our assumption that their numbers will slowly dwindle. It is no longer possible for new Wintermark players to start with their resources in Skarsind.

Skarsind Participation

If you are a player character who fought alongside Dogri, you are assumed to escape safely and without being recognised. Alternatively, you can choose to have been caught along with Dogri during the final assault on the Thane's Hall. If you choose this course of action, you must e-mail and let us know in advance. You will need to turn up to GOD before going in-character to talk to a magistrate about your situation. You don't need to have sent a military unit to take this option, but be aware that you will be tried for murder and resisting arrest alongside Dogri and his other supporters, and the common sentence for crimes of this magnitude is death.

If you supported Dogri and choose not to be captured, you are free to roleplay the events of his arrest as you see fit, in line with the text above. It is important to note, however, that in accordance with their orders the Iron Helms have not committed any sort of atrocity at Crow's Keep. Nobody has been put on spikes, nobody was tortured, nobody was burnt alive. They have killed people who did not surrender to them, and some of those who fell were killed by trained dogs, and nobody who went down fighting received any medical attention to prevent them dying, but they have all died fighting.

Patterns of Force (Spiral)

For three months, powerful storms batter the southern coast of Spiral; Spring magic unleashed against the Grendel. In the north, Urizen citizens begin to cautiously rebuilding. Some return to spires they fled ahead of the initial Grendel conquest, others seek to establish new homes for themselves and their families.

We will continue to bide our time, prepare to move in the coming season.

General Coiska Graemovna Sulich of the Army of the Northern Eagle

The Green Shield of Wintermark and the Northern Eagle of Varushka defend them. Their orders are to hold fast, and make the enemy work for any land they claim, should they dare to attack. Neither army receives a share of the Imperial Guerdon; neither army is supported by any significant force of Imperial captains. The heroic Wintermark army receives some support, although it comes from no natural source. A thousand crawling corpses inhabited by the hungry spirits of Winter come to join the mortal soldiers. They possess the bodies of dead Grendel orcs and fallen Imperial soldiers alike, bringing the shambling unliving horrors to guard the newly liberated spires.

Unfortunately, after a season of regrouping, the Grendel launch a major offensive in the north and the west. They are supported by marines, and by Grendel naval forces, but even without them - and with the added unliving forces - the Imperial defenders are massively outnumbered. The orcs flood Ossuary, capturing the Legacy and then using it as a base from which to quickly crush resistance in the rest of the territory. Imperial forces are driven west toward Ankra. At the same time, a tide of orcs washes over Ateri - scant days after the Eastern Sky march through the region into Redoubt to support the Court of the White Fountain - and force the Imperial forces there north toward Cinion. The Green Shield and the Northern Eagle do their best to hold, but they are slowly forced to cede ground - as the Spring Equinox draws closer, the orc armies begin to tighten their noose.

A major fraction of the orcs pressing north from Ateri pull back - giving a few scant days of brief hope that their attack is over. That hope dies swiftly when it becomes clear they have moved through Screed to add additional weight to the armies pressing west from Ossuary. Before the Imperial forces can do much more than evacuate a couple of newly repaired spires, they are forced to retreat again, pushed back into Cinion. Both armies rally there, amid the ruins of Damakhan's Forge.

The orcs keep coming, probing the Imperial defences. As on several previous occasions, the orc generals demonstrate a remarkable ability to coordinate their attacks, and to respond to Imperial strategy with alacrity. Individual soldiers fight with iron-clad discipline, and on more than one occasion warbands react to events they cannot possibly have been directly aware of, moving to support and relieve allied soldiers with ruthless efficiency. This goes beyond anything achievable with tactics - Urizen seers are left in no doubt that the orcs are making great use of their mastery of Day magic. Ironic, perhaps.

For the most part the orcs are concentrating on conquering territory and driving off defenders - but they are still the Grendel. Several thousand orcs are more focused on grabbing anything of value that they can get their hands on. This slows their advance a little ... but that is scant consolation to those they are robbing. In addition to raiding the mithril produced by the Legacy, they have also raided the Dragons Graveyard and the Mavrisma Niki in Ossuary and the Procella Viridis in Cinion.

We are to hold our ground. No matter the cost. The power of Winter sent death is with us. The Storm can never break us.

General Iron Osruc of the Green Shield Army

They are also rounding up as many captives as possible, and sending them south. Where Grendel and Imperials clash, where the human armies are forced to retreat, the orcs push after them, looking to divide their forces and capture stragglers. Over the course of the season, nearly three thousand Winterfolk and Varushkans are lost - but it is not clear how many have fallen in battle and how many have been captured by the opportunistic Grendel. The fate of those warriors who have been captured is not bright; those who do not die in the salt mines will surely be set to spill out their life blood in the Grendel arenas.

Spiral Game Information

The Grendel have regained control of Spiral. They have captured Ossuary, Ateri, and Ankra. They have made even some minor inroads into Cinion. The territory is now controlled by the barbarian orcs - it is no longer an Imperial territory and the Senator for Spiral has lost their seat. They have also captured the Legacy, meaning that the current holder of that Bourse seat has also lost their seat.

The plundering Grendel armies have intercepted a portion of the mithril produced by the Ossuary; they have also impacted the production of three spoils of war: the Dragons Graveyard, Mavrisma Niki, and Procella Viridis. If they continue to plunder in Spiral, the production of these resources will continue to be impacted. It would be possible to protect them from Grendel thieves using appropriate ritual magic. At the moment the production of the other significant resources has not yet been impacted, but if the Grendel continue their advance that situation may change.

Let That Be Your Last Battlefield (Mournwold)

During the Winter Solstice, heroes of the Empire made a cunning strike deep into the orc-held territory and recovered a communique from the rulers of the Jotun, detailing their strategy for the coming season. They know when the orcs are coming, and where they will strike. Armed with this information they prepare a brutal trap for the enemy.

The Enemy come for us and we will bleed them. Fall back before them, killing as you go. Give Ground. Fall back to Tassato if needs be, They may take the ground, but this is not over.

General Gabriel Barossa of the Wolves of War

At Overton on the Greensward, the Imperial host gathers. Forty-five thousand soldiers, give or take; supported by a further twelve thousand troops loyal to independent captains. All the nations save Navarr are represented. The Red Wind Corsairs; the Hounds of Glory; the Seventh Wave and the Valiant Pegasus; the Summer Storm and the Winter Sun; the Wolves of War; the Fist of the Mountains; the Citadel Guard; and the first Marcher army, Tom Drake's Finest, gather in the shadow of Orchard's Watch to face the Jotun advance they know is coming.

The Golden Axe of Varushka march alone into Freemoor, forging a grinding advance intended to distract the Jotun forces. While the rest of the Imperial forces gather in the south, prepared to blunt the Jotun assault and then retreat to Tassato if need be, the Varushkans launch a risky attack against Jotun forces in the north.

Not all the Imperial forces are prepared to retreat, however. The Drakes - the first army of the Marches - the only Marcher army present - refuses to retreat. They plant their feet firmly in the soil of the Greensward, and challenge the Jotun to face them. The Valiant Pegasus consider only the wounded - having exchanged the expertise of their war engineers for the mastery of the Highborn apothecaries and chirurgeons. They will tend the injured, and stay in the Mourn as long as there are soldiers to be healed.

The Empire is prepared for the Jotun advance and more than prepared. The presence of the magi of the Citadel Guard has allowed the Empire to focus powerful ritual curses onto the Mournwold. On the first night after the Winter Solstice, the heavy rain thickens with pestilence, turning blood red. The streams and rivers are next - tainted by malign Spring magic that infests the waterways and brings venomous insects, promotes sickness, and causes any wound to fester and rot.

Sentinels of the Citadel Guard, we are where we are needed. We are in enemy territory. Here, through me, through you, we will pull down curses and enchantments to cripple our enemies the Jotun. You are the finest warriors of the Empire. We will make them bleed. We will make them break. Make me proud.

General Nicassia Avicia of Phoenix Reach, of the Citadel Guard

On the second night, a cold wind sighs from the east, bringing with it the promise of worse to come. From that point on, the weak and the sick in the Mournwold begin to die. Most pass silently, painlessly in their sleep. The curse seems to take away the pain and suffering of dying - but at a terrible price. Once the fighting start it is clear that this second curse will take its toll on the warriors as well. Already prone to slow death from rotting wounds due to the Spring magic, even those who might otherwise have had the strength to survive infected wounds quickly succumb, dying suddenly with a single, final, sighing exhalation. There are reports here and there of an odd figure being sighted near some of those who die - a matronly woman with a kind face, and a quiet voice, clad in autumnal browns. She does not speak to the living, only those who later succumb to their wounds, or their sickness, or their exhaustion. Her description is circulated, but it does little to stop the stories of her appearances.

The Valiant Pegasus does its best to minimise the effects of the twin curses on the soldiers of the Empire, but the people of the Mourn are too dispersed to Every step the Jotun take in the Mourn will be over the bodies of their dead. We will give ground, but they will pay such a price, they will never recover. Our unconquered will learn the details of their imminent defeat, and with this, write the first page in the story of how the Jotun were broken.

General Cuth of the Seventh Wave

be given effective aid. Nearly one in five of those who call the Mourn home sicken and die as the baleful magics run their course. The sickness and death are indiscriminate, killing Jotun thralls and Feni hunters just as easily as Marcher yeoman. Greensward, where the fighting is thickest, is particularly badly hit - with more than half the inhabitants of the area succumbing to the disease.

For the first month or so, as the power of the curses takes hold, the Jotun launch several probing attacks against the defenders of the Greensward. They are easily repulsed. Then, five weeks after the Winter Solstice, the Jotun come in force against Overton ... but they are outnumbered. Even with their heroic champions, even with the support of the garrisons of their fortified castles, they do not match the host the Empire has arrayed against them.

This does not stop them, however. Yet this time they are a little more cautious, more balanced in their approach. They provide an escort for the siege weapons of the Tower of the North - a forest of trebuchet, siege towers, and battering rams ready to storm the walls of Orchard's Watch. In the vanguard come the Iron Host and the Hierro, forcing those troops outside the castle to fall back again and again.

The walls of Orchard's Watch, battered again and again over the course of the last year, do not provide much resistance to the orc assault. The gatehouse falls within an hour, and the Jotun do not stop pounding the walls until they have breached them in several places. Only then do the catapults fall silent and the footsoldiers pour in, a raging tide of barbarian orcs thirsty for blood.

It is obvious they are not prepared for the full effect of the Imperial curses, not really. The Thule, the Druj, the Grendel - they would have understood all the implications of the red water, perhaps even the sighing wind. The Jotun are warriors, not magicians. If there are any among their host who understood the true horror that was to come, their voices went unheard.

Marcher Lasses, Marcher Lads, the Jotun hammerblow is about to fall upon us. We have their orders, we know where and when they are coming for us and we shall make them pay. We will enact a solid defence and yield not one patch of Mournwold soil, unless it is drenched in Jotun blood. It is the will of the council that ground is given, so that the Jotun will be broken. We accept this, but it is not the Marcher Way! Land is our heart and soul, it is who we are - do not blame our allies for their lack of understanding. The Golden Axe of Varushka, they are the only army to stand and not withdraw. Treat their soldiers as you would our own, we will not forget their sacrifices. Orchard's Watch will be our last bastion, if we must we fight and hold there - aye as a last stand if need be. Now - to war! For the Mournwold!

General Will Talbot of the Drakes

The fall of Overton takes twelve hours of some of the worst, bloodiest, foulest fighting in Imperial history. The defenders are ordered to fall back rather than fight - to slow the advance of the Jotun rather than halt it. When the walls fall, they continue to fight a slow retreat - an ordered retreat rather than a rout - pushing through the Jotun forces that seek to surround them.

Overton falls, and with it the castle of Orchard's Watch - reduced to rubble. The garrison refuses to flee, ignoring their orders they follow the example of the Drakes. All of them, even the reserves from Whittle new-come from Tassato, stand to the last. Shortly after, Greensward Abbey burns, the defence supported by the old abbot and his loyal monks. They too refuse to fall back, Marchers to the end they refuse to yield their land... until death takes them.

Hour by hour the Empire cede the ground to the orcs... but the Jotun pay an unspeakable price. Perhaps ten thousand of their number die in the attack on Orchard's Watch alone. Another thousand fall taking the Abbey. A further thousand lost trying - and failing - to capture the Singing Caves from the Drakes - those same Drakes who refuse to give ground save where they are forced back by the sheer weight of the Jotun advance. After Overton falls, they make a stand at the Caves - and they hold them against the Jotun.

The battle of the Greensward rages on and off for three days. The soil is churned to mud by the shed blood, and by the thick, bitter rain that continues to fall throughout the conflict. In the end, orc bodies litter the torn fields of the Greensward like fallen leaves.

And not only orc bodies. The twin curses the Imperial have unleashed scythe through the defenders as well. All told, perhaps three thousand Imperial soldiers are killed who would otherwise have survived the orc assault - three thousand men and women succumb to wounds that might otherwise have been treatable. Despite the order to give ground, despite the efforts of the Valiant Pegasus, three thousand soldiers die from the lethal combination of the Spring sickness and the sighing Winter wind.

In the end, although the Imperial host is forced back, it is not forced out of the Mourn entirely. The Jotun control most of the region - but not the whole of the territory. Some of their forces were forced to fight in the north against the Varushkans, rather than aid the attack on Overton. While the Golden Axe is ultimately forced back across the border into Upwold, rallying at Sutton Stone Quarries, they manage to pin down a significant Jotun force that might otherwise have swung the battle in the south.

At the same time, supported by the Valiant Pegasus, the Drakes refuse to give an inch of ground more than they need to, and the Jotun cannot afford to ignore them. The independent captains, the enchantments, the careful strategy ... if any one of these had been incomplete, the Jotun would have gained ultimate victory ... rather than the Pyrrhic victory they have instead secured.

Mournwold Game Information

The Jotun have almost secured control of the Greensward. The Empire has a few holdouts along the eastern borders and at the Singing Caves but their position is extremely precarious.

An absolutely astounding number of people - orcs and humans - have died. And not just soldiers. The combination of Rivers Run Red and the eerie, sighing Winter wind have killed a sixth of the civilian population across the Mournwold as well as more than half of the remaining population of the Greensward.

As a consequence, the Greensward has gained the haunted quality; the ghosts of those who died in the fall of Overton will not rest easily. And there are a great many of them. Their suffering has sunk into the soil itself - it will take a lot more than a few exorcisms to lay these spirits to rest - and that may well be impossible. Further, the destruction of almost every single significant building over the last nine months or so, culminating in the fall of the only major settlement, has also given the region the ruins quality - although that may be easier to deal with should the Empire ever look to rebuild in the Mournwold.

The castle of Orchard's Watch has been destroyed and with it the sinecure of the Sheriff of Overton. Likewise, Greensward Abbey is in ruins, and the abbot is numbered among the fallen. If you had a personal resource in the Mournwold that you were roleplaying was in the Greensward, and you wish it to be a casualty of the battle for the greensward, you may contact Profound Decisions at empire.plot@profounddecisions.co.uk and we will destroy it for you.

There are too many factors to call out any one specific element that led to this result - the three armies who were not using Give Ground helped to blunt the Jotun advance, but so did the various enchantments and military units assigned to support the armies here. The result was extremely close - as little as one more victory point for the orcs, and the whole territory would have fallen (meaning any future attempt by the Empire to push the Jotun back would have required them to establish a new beachhead. As it is, the Empire still maintains a presence here - at least for the moment.

Major Conjunctions

The civil service has identified five major conjunctions of the Sentinel Gate that are expected to be available during the coming summit.

On Saturday, two major conjunctions have been identified - but the heroes of the Empire will only be able to take advantage of one of them. One opens in West Ranging, in northern Liathaven. The other opens in the Greensward, in southern Mournwold. The civil service are still compiling notes, but anticipate that both opportunities offer a chance to have a significant impact on the campaign against the Jotun.

On Sunday, three conjunctions have been identified that will allow Imperial heroes to engage the Grendel in Spiral - but again only one can be taken advantage of. One opens in Cinion, while the other two both open in different parts of Ateri. The Cinion conjunction offers an opportunity to head off a Grendel attack against the region, and deny them a potential advantage. The two conjunctions in Ateri both offer chances to disrupt Grendel slave-taking operations.

In addition to these major conjunctions, the civil service report a number of smaller, more traditional conjunctions that all seem to open into locations around Ossauary that seem to culminate in a significant conjunction on Saturday evening, one suitable for a use by a large force of Imperial heroes (OOC: a skirmish).

By the time of the Spring Equinox summit, the civil service will have completed reports for each of the five major conjunctions, which will be presented the the generals during the Muster. The final decision about which two major conjunctions to exploit, and who will take part in the battles, is the heavy responsibility of the generals alone.

Conclave Addresses

Records show that 17 addresses were made during the Friday session, and 10 during the Saturday session. Per protocol, the titles of addresses are not recorded.

Order Vaults

The income detailed below will be given to each Grandmaster at the beginning of the next summit, along with any mana purchases they choose to make using their powers of funding.

Endowments

There were no endowments at this summit.

The Font

The income of mana at this summit was as follows.

- The basic font at this summit was 122 mana.
- The income from the Principle of Proportions was 207 mana.
- The remainder from previous seasons was 3 mana.

This gives a total font of 332 mana, which was divided thus:

- The Golden Pyramid received 81 mana.
- The Rod and Shield received 66 mana.
- The Shuttered Lantern received 65 mana.
- The Sevenfold Path received 57 mana.
- The Unfettered Mind received 33 mana.
- The Celestial Arch received 27 mana.

This left 3 mana, which will be added to the font to be divided at the end of the next summit.

The Ilium Reserve

The details of ilium divided among the orders was as follows.

- The Golden Pyramid received 3 ilium.
- The Rod and Shield received 3 ilium.
- The Shuttered Lantern received 3 ilium.
- The Sevenfold Path received 2 ilium.
- The Unfettered Mind received 2 ilium.
- The Celestial Arch received 1 ilium.

Clarifications

1. This was paid for at the Summit, and the Civil Service are making arrangements for it to be sent to the intended recipient.
2. The Civil Service were unable at the time to confirm receipt of payment or ritual text for this ritual, so it could not be codified. The matter has since been resolved.
3. The Civil Service were unable at the time to confirm receipt of payment or ritual text for this ritual, so it could not be codified. The matter has since been resolved.

Synod Judgements

At the Summit, the following judgements were made by the Assemblies of the Synod:

Number	Assembly	Judgement	Raised By	Outcome
1	Courage	Appointment of the Cardinal.	Civil Service	Jorma was appointed
2	Wisdom	Appointment of the Cardinal.	The Civil Service	Agnetha De Rondell was reappointed
3	Nine	Appointment of the Imperial Inquisitor	The Civil Service	Martin Orchard was appointed
4	Loyalty	Appointment of the Cardinal.	The Civil Service	Caleb was appointed.
5	General	Veto. To Veto the Senate proposal to abrogate the High Exorcist Stipend of 7 thrones per season from the Imperial Budget and grant them the power to withdraw 7 Thrones from the Virtue Fund without the Synod being at to vote or veto.	Zastyt, the feeder	Not upheld 180 - 286
7	General	Rewarding. 5 Thrones to Livia Cascade for purchasing liao and other accoutrements for the tasks of the Seer of the Gateway. As a power of the Seer of the Gateway this Judgement passes without a vote.	Livia Cascade	Upheld automatically
8	General	Rewarding. To provide 30 Thrones to Erasmo di Tassato to distribute to those Grandmasters who have of late offered aid to priests of the Synod regarding religious matters.	Erasmo di Tassato	Upheld 438 - 180
9	General	Condemnation for heresy. In the persistent preaching of the rejected doctrine of The Beyond as Truth, Yael of Highguard has performed continuing acts of heresy. We, the general assembly of the Imperial Synod thereby condemn Yael of Highguard on charge of heresy; on account of active teaching and promotion of false doctrine. Imperatrix Lisabetta invoked the Throne's Power of Custodian of Virtue , making this judgement require a Greater Majority to pass. Cardinal Irada invoked her power to extend scrutiny. Yael plead guilty to the charge of heresy and was executed.	Aarne Ceorling	Upheld 1286 - 404 Greater Majority

Recognition of an Exemplar. Escalation of Judgement 26 from Spring 381 YE. I propose that Anabela di Regario be recognised as Exemplar of Ambition for the following signs:

10	General	Benevolence: Ending petty disputes between princes rather than settling scores. Salvation: Converting rival princes from vengeance in favour of ambitious competition. Inspiration: Lasting mark on League national character and an example of virtuous statecraft. Legacy: She is the founder of Tassato and left a legacy of aspiration and competition.	Dietrich	Upheld 686 - 204
11	Prosperity	Inquisition. I call Abel of Reikos Reborn, Bursar of the Conclave, to inquisition at 1pm on Saturday (Summer Solstice 381YE) at Lumi's Tea House in Wintermark to investigate his actions on behalf of the Conclave with a view to commending his actions as Prosperous.	Vaurus Korppitkotka	Upheld 88 - 0
13	Courage	Sanction: Vindication. Escalation of Judgement 69 from Spring 381 YE. Madyn Bitterbark has suffered trial by inquisition and not found wanting. She acted and was not shamed by inaction.	Lucifer	Upheld 88 - 0
16	General	Rewarding. Seek contribution of 30 thrones towards the building of the fortification in Reikos on the border with the Druj. The construction should be finished as soon as possible in view of the impending war with the enemy.	Lev Unbound	Upheld 700 - 346
17	General	Rewarding. Dunharth Hall has been destroyed in the sinkhole in Hanhnmark. The family were vigilant in saving lives but lost possessions and resources when the hall fell. We are asking 30 thrones to purchase white granite and other materials to build a market town in Hahnmark. This would help us rebuild, be stronger and more Prosperous as a family and in turn would enable us to then support the nation and the Empire. We have the Ambition to complete this and Pride in our family and nation. Without strong foundations we cannot rebuild.	Edythe Dunne	Not upheld 394 - 502
18	Pride	Inquisition. We call Franco i Erigo to inquisition to better understand their account last season regarding trade with Asaveans. This will be held 6pm (Saturday, Summer Solstice 381 YE), Sherard Hunters Hall, Wintermark. Inquisition. Inquisition of Snori and Halfries of Rundhal Kalavasa at the Hub at 2pm Saturday at the Autumn Equinox 381 YE. They were given penance by Arania	Rane Jorunsdottir	Upheld 124 - 0

24	Wintermark	and Baldwin of Sussivar to create art in glory of Emperor Guntherm. They have not returned to report progress as agreed. This was given for their actions interfering with Guntherm's tomb while addled by their naga nature and the influence of the Night realm.	Baldwin	Upheld 142 - 0
28	Dawn	Mandate. The National Assembly sends Odelina de Rondell with 25 doses of liao to repudiate the false teachings of Yael of Highguard. Those who have been deceived by her claim to be the First Empress Reborn and the hope of the Land Without Tears should renounce this false doctrine and return to their homes.	Odelina de Rondell	Upheld 116 - 70
32	Marcher	Mandate. Land matters above all else. Marcher armies should always stand their ground to defend what is theirs. We send Mel of Mourn with 25 doses of liao to spread the word that no Marcher army should ever give ground.	Mel of Mourn	Upheld 62 - 0
33	General	Rewarding. We the General Assembly wish to reward the Mournwolders for their actions of Loyalty towards their neighbours in the face of the extreme adversity inflicted upon them by the use of the ritual magics (The Hardest Choice & Rivers Run Red). We ask the Virtue Fund for 40 thrones to be given to Bedwin of Hay, to distribute the funds to the citizens of Mournwold.	Jonah Yakovitch	Upheld 504 - 136
36	Wintermark	Mandate. No true hero of the Mark should stand with the Iron Helms - those who use their dogs for war have become dogs themselves. The assembly sends Gunnbrand Ironwill with 50 liao to urge every hero of Wintermark to show the heroism that a true hero of the Empire should aspire to.	Gunnbrand Ironwill	Upheld 108 - 68
38	Prosperity	Sanction: Vindication. Escalation of Judgement II. Following the inquisition of Abel, Bursar of the Conclave, we recognise that Abel has been acting Prosperously for the Empire through ensuring that the mana ministries of the Conclave are utilised. This behaviour is to be encouraged and supported.	Vaurus Korppitkotka	Upheld 56 - 0
41	Navarr	Mandate. Mercy is a luxury that the Empire cannot afford when faced with enemies that seek to destroy it; we must not cast aside any weapon that may bring victory. The Navarr assembly sends Corey Wayfarer with 75 doses of liao to urge the Quiet Step	Corey Wayfarer	Upheld 138 - 0

45	General	to build on the opportunity presented by Arhallogen and find new and effective tactics for dealing with our enemies. Change of Doctrine. In light of the rejection of the Land Without Tears, we propose a new doctrine. The Doctrine of the Void: There is nothing beyond the Labyrinth.	Isaac di Sarvos	Not upheld 30 - 1092
46	Varushka	Mandate. The Iron Helms only do what is necessary to defeat their enemies quickly. We do not have the luxury of mercy when facing what comes out of the darkness. The assembly sends Amris with 100 doses of liao to urge every inhabitant of Varushka to seize the opportunity to support the Iron Helms and show the enemies of the Empire what real cruelty looks like.	Amris Johan Merikovich	Upheld 150 - 0
48	Marcher	Inquisition of General Jack Flint to determine the Virtue of his actions as general, both on the field and in his orders. Time: As soon as convenient.	Martin Orchard	Upheld 60 - 0
50	General	Rewarding. We award Astrid Rezia 5 thrones for historical research into a true liao vision which revealed information on the subject of the false virtue of purity also called hatred.	Astrid Fjellreving Rezia di Tassato	Upheld 590 - 168
52	General	Inquisition. The Inquisition of Gralka concerning the raising of a motion implying that orcs can perform the sign of the miracle. To be held at 10pm Friday of the Autumn summit 381 YE at the Highguard Chapel.	Ephron of Adina's Charge	Upheld 710 - 202
54	General	Inquisition. Using the authority of the Auditor of Senatorial Accountability I, Zeno, Stallion's Sibling, call to Inquisition Lisabetta, Imperatrix regarding funds disbursed under the application of Hand of the Chancellor since her election. Provisionally, by mutual agreement, to be held in the tent of the Seven Wandering Stars in Urizen at 1pm on Sunday of the Summer Solstice 381 YE.	Zeno, Stallion's Sibling	Upheld automatically

		Mandate. The cruelty of the Iron Helms is unvirtuous - it demeans our Empire to use such tactics and it betrays the ideals of our people to fight alongside those who do so. The assembly sends Constanza i Kalamar i Guerra with 25 liao doses to urge our soldiers to reject the Iron Helms and their cruelty.	Constanza i Kalamar i Guerra	Upheld 82 - 0
59	Brass Coast
62	General	Rewarding. Reward 5 thrones to Lucifer for research into historical Miracles.	Lucifer	Upheld 686 - 156
64	Nine	Inquisition. The Assembly of Nine calls the Constitutional Court to Inquisition: Magistrate Karkovitch, Magistrate Abraham, Magistrate Cooper, Gerard La Salle Auditor of the Imperial Treasury	Severin Teyhard von Holberg	Upheld 6 - 0
65	General	Inquisition. I call Irada Von Temeschwar to Inquisition in the Urizen Camp at 4:30pm on Saturday of the Autumn Equinox 381 YE, to clarify the circumstances surrounding the Whispers Through the Black Gate upon Emperor Nicovar Ankarien.	Solas	Upheld 786 - 136
66	Pride	Inquisition. The Pride Assembly call the Freeborn of the Maw to Inquisition regarding their involvement in a cult dedicated to Siakha. The Inquisition will take place in Anvil at the Autumn Summit 381 YE.	Franco i Erigo	Upheld 140 - 0
67	General	Rewarding. As High Exorcist, I withdraw 7 thrones from the Virtue Fund, pursuant to my duties. This is on the understanding that this reverts to a Senate Stipend as soon	Solas	Upheld automatically.

		as economically feasible. As a power of the High Exorcist this Judgement passes without a vote. Revocation. The Senators of Wintermark have displayed cowardice and a lack of Pride and demonstrated they do not represent the interest of Wintermark's values by voting in favour of a trade route with the Thule. This route will pass through Crow's Keep at the site that 500 Wintermark died who opposed the Thule. This is a betrayal of those that died. We revoke the senator of Kallavesa: Olle Markusson.
68	Wintermark		Jorma Steelhail	Not upheld 68 - 106
71	Urizen	Sanction: Vindication. Subsequent to her Inquisition, we believe Medea Ruth to be a Virtuous citizen. Any who believe otherwise should discuss specific unvirtuous actions with Medea Ruth. Sanction: Vindication. Escalation of Judgement 18. We find Franco i Erigo to have acted Virtuously. He has followed his Prosperity and Courage in the face of adversity, and represented and pursued the Virtue of his people. Let this be an example to citizens to hold to their Virtue in interactions with heretics and idolators.	Medea Ruth	Not upheld 40 - 40

82	Pride	Inquisition. We call Akstis Eigulys (Gully) to Inquisition at 9pm Friday in the Glory Square in connection to the husk army in Weirwater. This is for the Autumn summit 381 YE.	Lady Josephine Novarion	Upheld 120 - 0

The Imperial Synod made the following Statements of Principle:

Number	Assembly	Statement of Principle	Priest	Outcome
12	Navarr	Nice is not a Virtue.	Wyn	Upheld 138 - 0 Greater Majority
14	Highguard	Cruelty is a weapon. In this time of trial, it is unwise for the Empire to discard any tool that can be used Virtuously. As long as the Iron Helms act as Virtuous tools of the Empire they shall have the full support of the Highborn Assembly.	Able of the Shattered Tower	Upheld 386 - 44 Greater Majority
20	Nine	The Path of Wisdom is to ask the right question. I am minded to offer Yael the Throne's portion of True Liao, so that Wisdom may be served. I seek not to undermine the Judgement of Heresy levelled against Yael. No one is above the law and we support the will and judgement of the Synod in pursuit of its constitutional duty; this judgement is to clearly show the will of the Assembly of Nine. There would be conditions to the grant - in the selection of an independent guide priest and the subsequent use of the relevant divinatory rituals.	Empress Lisabetta von Holberg	Upheld 8 - 0 Greater Majority
21	General	People should be judged and supported based on the actions and Virtue of their current incarnation in this life rather than those of the person their spirit has previously incarnated as.	Odanava	Upheld 972 - 226
22	General	Nina of Cantiararch's Hold and a group of Academy children (and chaperones) will take 25 liao to preach Virtue throughout the Empire, and inspire The Empire to better follow The Way	Nina of Cantiararch's Hold	Upheld 1206 - 28 Greater Majority
23	Varushkan	That those who seek to hunt the monsters of Varushka, must understand and seek the Wisdom of Varushka. The Venatius Illustros of Dawn and Urizen are fools who lead others to	Vukomir Maryankovich	Upheld 144 - 0

		their death and do not deserve the hospitality of Varushka, their leader the Grandmother of Laurel should speak to the national assembly of Varushka about this.	Zverokaz	Greater Majority
25	Navarr	The Navarr nation wishes it to be known that the Loyalty and sacrifice of the Marchers to their land and the Empire inspires great Pride in us. This stands as an example to all Imperial Citizens.	Tyrnan	Upheld 108 - 0 Greater Majority
26	General	Having been recognised by the Imperial Orc National Assembly, the General Assembly recognises that Skywise Rykana has achieved the sign of miracle for his actions at the steading of return - Winter 380 YE.	Gralka	Upheld 526 - 260
29	Dawn	The glorious troubadours of Dawn support the generals of the Empire in waging war in light of Virtuous Counsel. Specifically, cruel armies are a tool to be used against our enemies.	The Dread Princess Orlene Ossienne	Upheld 116 - 60 Greater Majority
31	Highguard	Highguard believes that the Empire is the best platform for Human Destiny. We believe that all those who study and follow the Way of Virtue have something to contribute towards its understanding. Accordingly we reject the Principle of Foundationalism.	Jericho	Upheld 320 - 34
34	Wintermark	The Wintermark National Assembly believes that after the sinkhole's catastrophic destruction of Dunhearth Hall, that Dunhearth Hall's Ambition to build a new market town shows Pride and Prosperity as well as Loyalty to the Wintermark.	Nils Bardstrom	Upheld 180 - 14 Greater Majority
35	General	We support the Symposiarch in the continuing organisation of sessions to discuss matters of immediate concern to the Synod, with a view to holding each session on the Saturday of each summit.	Edward Watcher	Upheld 856 - 52
37	Highguard	We, the unveiled, chose unveiling. Unveiling is the active rejection of the taint of the realms by a lineaged human. Virtue is action, and the unveiling is meaningless unless the lineaged themselves choose to take that action. We are Proud of the choices we have made.	Lilian Unbound	Upheld 282 - 34
39	Highguard	The fortification being built in Reikos is a Virtuous undertaking.	Yarona of the Chantry	Upheld 190 - 0
40	Wintermark	The Battle of Ikka's Tears has lived in the hearts of the folk who fought and those whose stories ended upon that field of battle. The Wintermark National Assembly believe that a great memorial should be constructed upon the site of the battle so its story shall be forever sung. We the people of Highguard, believe that any	Osfrid of Lonelychapel	Upheld 190 - 0 Greater Majority

Sela of the Suns of Couros	Upheld 284 - 26
43	Courage	Hear the words of Yael. I call upon my Dawnish followers in the Congregation of the First Empress who are of martial skill to return to their homeland so they might take up arms against the Army of Husks that plagues Dawn.	Yael	Upheld 216 - 0 Greater Majority
44	Dawn	We think that a coordinated group of exorcists should go to Weirwater to assist the souls in the husks to returning quickly to the Labyrinth. They should be led by a nominated priest with at least 50 liao.	Anna Fetch	Upheld 160 - 0 Greater Majority
47	Varushkan	The people of Varushka are all Vard and all Ushkan. None of us are solely one or the other.	Alderai	Upheld 130 - 0 Greater Majority
49	Urizen	The Military Council should have access to Cruel Armies, Rivers Run Red, Mountain Remembers its Youth and any other tool that it needs in order to be effective. However a campaign is won when an enemy is unwilling or unable to continue fighting. Using these tools in a way that increases our enemies' resolve such that they bring more resources to bear than the action destroyed is unvigilant and unwise. We expect our Generals to calculate the optimal approach in all circumstances, not to be swayed by emotional arguments and to be held to account when they fail to do so. All tools should be considered and it is the view of the Urizen National Assembly that friendly and civilian casualties bear the same weight whether they are an immediate direct consequence of our action or a long term indirect consequence of our inaction.	Tarquinius	Upheld 124 - 10 Greater Majority
51	Dawn	Although their actions in stealing Bourse resources were criminal, the actions of the Witches of Applefell in defending the people of Weirwater from rampaging husks were Vigilant and resulted in Glory.	Ser Thomas Aurelius	Upheld 118 - 22 Greater Majority
55	General	The Synod recognises Sunhammer Kirrik for organising the Empire-wide Artisan's Guild as a legacy of Prosperity and her path of Virtue is watched for Signs of the exemplar.	Chaplain Atla	Upheld 470 - 222

57	Varushka	The Varushkan National Assembly support our allies in Wintermark. The rumours of assault and mutilation on the bodies of Wintermark citizens have been investigated and found to be the work of a common enemy bound to create division between our nations. Varushka stands with Wintermark, proud citizens of the Empire, Loyal allies.	Rooslan Stanvich Prochnost	Upheld 120 - 10 Greater Majority
58	Wintermark	The Wintermark Assembly support our allies in Varushka. The rumours of assault and mutilation on the bodies of Wintermark citizen have been investigated and found to be the work of a common enemy bound to create division between our nations. Wintermark stand with Varushka. Proud citizens of the Empire and Loyal allies.	Ylmiska Ferbow	Upheld 178 - 0 Greater Majority
60	League	We acknowledge the Loyalty and Courage of the people of Sarvos in defending their home. We encourage them to show their Pride and Prosperity by rebuilding their city with vigor.	Josephine Von Temeschwar	Upheld 174 - 0 Greater Majority
61	Dawn	The troubadours of Dawn believe that True Virtue leads to Glory, Legacy and Transcendence. Glory is a product of Virtue, not greater than it. Pursue Virtue above all other goals.	Viviane de Coeurdefer	Upheld 150 - 10 Greater Majority
63	Dawn	The Queen of Dawn holds authority over the Dawnish people. However if the Queen wishes to take part in a senatorial tourney, she may do so in the way of other nobles, by standing behind a candidate and bringing her authority to bear in that way.	Tamain Sepulchre	Upheld 130 - 30 Greater Majority
69	League	The use of cruel tactics by any army is unvirtuous. Cruelty is designed to break the spirit and install fear. The use of the False Virtue of Fear as a weapon is unvirtuous. We urge all Synod members to provide spiritual guidance to the generals of their nations that use said tactics.	Cesare Enzo Di Trivento	Upheld 100 - 96
70	Ambition	Constructing the physical form of a Horse, and introducing a Horse soul to that form, would be an Ambitious act. Medea Ruth, as a Physick with Arete in Ambitious Chirurgery, and a	Medea Ruth	Upheld 76 - 52

72	Nine	I ask that the Silent Bell look into the creation of a covert organisation in Redoubt by the Grendel.	Irada Von Temeschwar	Upheld 6 - 0 Greater Majority
73	League	I encourage the people of Sarvos to show hospitality to the freed Jarmish slaves at the College of the Liberated, but to be vigilant to the possibility of Grendel infiltrators.	Casimir Marcelino di Sarvos	Upheld 162 - 0 Greater Majority
76	General	In light of the large loss of life from war, steps have been taken to produce the next generation. It is Virtuous to continue on this path and continue procreating.	Gwendolyn Athansdottir	Upheld 284 - 256
78	Imperial Orc	To state that this motion is to end proxy slavery is virtuous. This motion will make an amendment to the Constitution in the senate section. At the end of the following sentence, "The Senate will assume responsibility for relations with other nations," insert the following "ensuring that Prosperity is not at freedom's cost". "Prosperity" is in this case is to be defined as Imperial Trade with Foreign nations, and "freedom" is the guarantee to their people not to be subjected to slavery by their nation.	Bloodcrow Ergot	Upheld 48 - 0 Greater Majority
79	Nine	The Assembly of Nine welcome Axou scholars to visit the Empire and share their spiritual understanding in the following places of learning: Citadel of Phoenix Reach The Library of Mourning Hollow Bronwen's Rest Wayhouse, Therunin Any branch of the Anvil Public Library College of Summer, Miekarova The Chantry of the Silver Skull, Highguard Printer's Guild Museum, Tassato, The Legion's Rookery, Gildenheim, Skarsind Where all religious debate will be welcome in the same manner as the recent Symposium.	Agnetha de Rondell	Upheld 7 - 0 Greater Majority
81	Nine	The Assembly of Nine approves of the proposed improvements to the transparency and communications of the Constitutional Court.	Azekah	Upheld 7 - 0 Greater Majority

The Imperial Synod did not make the following Statements of Principle:

Number	Assembly	Statement of Principle	Priest	Outcome
		Pride, Courage, Loyalty: The Virtuous inspire others to greatness. They neither demean them, nor		Not

6	General	debase them, nor seek to inspire the cowardice Virtue bids us to despise. The Imperial Synod condemns the use of cruel orders in warfare as an act of vice.	Clarice Novarion	upheld 446 - 932
15	General	It is unvirtuous to condemn a priest for their conviction. Courage compels Yael to preach and Courage compels us to other options than condemnation. The penalty for the conviction of heresy is death. As priests of Virtue do we really condemn a priest of conviction to death? We may not agree with her vision, but condemnation is unvirtuous in this example. As priests we must chose Virtue over law.	Rhisiart Ankarien	Not upheld 210 - 904
19	Dawn	The Virtuous seek to inspire Virtue. The Dawnish Assembly holds the use of cruel orders in warfare to be an act of Vice which debases the soul, and urges the citizens of Dawn to condemn such conduct.	Lord Marcus Drommond	Not upheld 50 - 86
27	Urizen	The Urizen National Assembly strongly encourages and supports any effective action to annihilate the Druj presence in Zenith, and reminds that Loyal suffering under the consequences thereof is commendable. The anointing "Price of Vigilance" reminds us that morals are distractions that prevent us from acting. This life is not a test. Virtue is for the Labyrinth.	Sophus Cascade	Not upheld 40 - 100
30	General	We who vote in favour; Endorse the rebirth of the First Empress' paragon spirit into the mortal form of Yael. Believe her vision of a Land Without Tears describes new knowledge of the doctrinal concept of transcendence.	Ser Criseyde	Not upheld 260 - 898
53	General	Understand that Pride in beliefs, Courage in hard tasks, Vigilance of errors in past understanding, Wisdom to expand knowledge and our Loyalty to your own precious spirit, lead us here. Uphold, proclaim and illuminate what we know. And call those who name us "heretic" cowards and fools if they so think and yet condemn us not.	Magdalena of the Shattered Tower	Not upheld 206 - 886
		Imperatrix Lisabetta invoked the Throne's Power of Custodian of Virtue , making this judgement require a Greater Majority to pass.

Judgements to be carried forwards

The Imperial Synod has not raised a Veto for the following summit.

Synod Funds

The following represents the Virtue Fund of the Synod:

Starting Value	50 Thrones / 0 Crowns / 0 Rings
Income	80 Thrones	The price paid in the Bourse Auction for the dose of True Liao
	10 Thrones	Donation from several Faraden families in recognition of judgement 40 from the Winter Solstice 380 YE.
Rewards	5 Thrones	Rewarding made to Livia Cascade, Seer of the Gateway.
	30 Thrones	Rewarding made to the Grandmasters who have aided the Synod.
	40 Thrones	Rewarding made to Bedwin of Hay to aid the citizens of Mournwold.
	30 Thrones	Rewarding made for the building of the fortification in Reikos on the border with the Druj.
	5 Thrones	Rewarding made to fund historical research into a true liao vision regarding the false virtue of purity.
	5 Thrones	Rewarding made to fund historical research into historical miracles.
	7 Thrones	Rewarding made to Solas of the Spire of the Waxing Sun, High Exorcist.
Closing Value	18 Thrones / 0 Crowns / 0 Rings

Visionaries

The following individuals received visions of their past lives:

- Nihm Farkas, Navarr
- Thanmir Hrafnar, Wintermark
- Garth of Renwaerd Hall, Wintermark
- Sagua i Ezmara, Brass Coast

Assembly Strength

At the start of the summit the voting total of the General Assembly was calculated to be 2014

The final voting total of the General Assembly was estimated to be 2418

The Civil Service reminds citizens that determining whether a judgement has achieved a Greater Majority counts from the estimation of the assembly strength when scrutiny on the judgement closes, not the final assembly strength at the end of the summit.

At the end of the Summer Solstice 381 YE the voting strength of the Virtue and national assemblies were estimated to be:

381YE Summer Solstice winds of fortune

Overview

Over the past three months, several events have occurred which are of significance to the Empire and may require a response from her champions. You can also read about the progress of the Empire's military campaigns here.

In each case, we've tried to tag the Winds of Fortune entry with the nations, or political bodies, to which it is most relevant. We've done this to help people who are interested only in events that are especially relevant to them. In no way are these tags intended to be exhaustive; the Empire is a complex place and very little happens in isolation.

As always, how much or how little of this information you choose to know in character is up to you. Part of the purpose of Winds of Fortune is to maintain the illusion of the Empire as a living, breathing place where things happen - and to make players aware of things their characters 'should' know based on what their roleplaying says they have been doing for the past three months.

Many winds of fortune open with a short section of in-character text. In all cases, these pieces are intended to help create an atmosphere and provide a little entertainment. Where they contain opinions, those are the opinions of the fictional people depicted - and where they contain information or rumours the assumption is that the reader will create their own context for that information or gossip. They're mostly just a bit of fun and they tend not to contain anything vital to the understanding of the wind of Fortune.

Winds of Fortune

All Along the Watchtower

- The Empire

The situation in the Mournwold is complicated, and getting more complicated by the day. A storm is brewing, and the kind that sends sensible people scurrying for shelter. And that's before we even get to the Jotun castles and armies! You can learn about the situation in the Mourn, and various things that might help improve it, here.

Changing of the Guards

- Dawn

The National Assembly of Dawn passed a simple statement of principle during the Spring Equinox "The Dawnish National Assembly recognises the Empress Lisabetta as Queen of Dawn. She is the ultimate authority in this life and her words should be followed above all others." The potential repercussions of that statement are ... profound. You can learn about them here.

Death Is Not The End

- Imperial Synod; Highguard; Dawn

The schism in the Imperial Faith over the claims of Yael of Highguard (on her past life as the First Empress and the Land without Tears) is coming to a climax. Wintermark, Varushka, Navarr, Urizen, the League, the Marches and the Brass Coast have sent priests with liao urging their people to reject Yael and denouncing her as false. The Imperial Orcs have made clear that they have no part in this conflict over Human destiny. Highguard and Dawn have embraced Yael, though Dawn appears to have internal doubt on the matter. You can learn about the implications of these actions and the cracks that continue to spread through the Imperial Face here.

Down Along the Cove

- Fleet captains; the Brass Coast, the League, Highguard, and Urizen; and the Imperial Synod

Recent powerful Spring magic (not to mention all those storms) is being credited with a major boom in the population of fish and other sea creatures. An slightly risky opportunity exists from the fisherfolk of the Bay of Catazar to fill their boats with valuable fish, whale meat, and other products of the deep water. The risk is that the Grendel see courageous fisherfolk in much the same way a hungry shark sees a drowning sailor You can learn about this potentially lucrative opportunity here.

In Virtue and Reason (Imperial Address)

- All Imperial citizens

The Throne, Imperatrix Lisabetta, has used her power to address the Empire to present a personal message to all Imperial citizens. You can read her message here.

Not Dark Yet

- Varushka; Navarr; the Marches; the Brass Coast; Wintermark; and the National Assemblies thereof

The new Varushkan army, the Iron Helms, has been active in the field for barely six months and it is no stranger to controversy. During the Winter Solstice and the Spring Equinox, several statements of principle were made regarding the army and its role (or lack thereof) in Imperial military strategy. These statements have lead to a series of controversial mandates which you can learn about here.

Pay in Blood

- Spring magicians, Imperial Conclave

Since the Spring Equinox, practitioners of Spring magic across the Empire have encountered problems performing certain types of rituals. It soon becomes apparent that the problem lies not in the magic, nor in the magicians, but in the regio aligned to the Spring realm. It appears to be impossible for Imperial magicians to draw power from Spring regio ... You can learn about the full effect of this magical catastrophe here.

Rocks and Gravel

- Independent military captains; Navarr, Wintermark, the Marches, and Temeschwar; the Military Council

A "natural" disaster has struck the north-western Empire. Parts of Temeschwar, Miaren, Upwold, and Hahnmark have been swallowed up by a massive sinkhole. Thanks to a timely warning by a band of Navarr vates, major loss of life has been avoided - but a great big chasm now stretches from the site where Woodhall used to stand, to the orchards of Goldglades, and from a point dangerously close to Eastern Guard deep into the wild hunting grounds of the Vardstein Vale. You can learn about this natural disaster, and its implications here.

Series of Dreams (Winds of Magic)

- Basically everyone, but especially people associated with the Freeborn Storm and the Mournwold

The Empire is an Empire of powerful magic, but not all powerful magic is of the Empire. The Winds of Magic collects a grab-bag of interesting or important effects and opportunities, including matters regarding magical castles; a burning plume of fire and shadows in Redoubt; peculiar cauldron shenanigans in the Mournwold; and the Empress of All Goats Theatre. You can learn about them here.

Shelter From the Storm

- The Brass Coast, fleet captains, the Imperial Synod, the Quartermaster of the Imperial Armies

The Isle of Zemress is home to a "lost colony" descended from the crew of the Kraken's Bane. For the last few years they have been in sporadic contact with their Freeborn cousins, but now their idyllic life of hard work and independence has been shattered. The Grendel orcs have finally discovered their island hideaway, and the clock is ticking. Without outside help, they will all end their lives in the salt mines of Dubhtraig. Will the Empire intervene? You can learn all about this dire situation here.

Too Much of Nothing

- Wealthy folks; especially those with an interest in curious rarities

Since the demise of the Bourse Private Auction, entrepreneurs and the desperate alike have made their way to Anvil seeking to tap the rich markets that may be found there. This season, there is news of a Dawnish seneschal with rare seeds to sell to help feed their house's yeofolk-in-exile; old documents concerning the life of a historical Senator; a potentially dangerous Winterfolk knife; and an exotic Freeborn curio. You can learn about this handful of nothing here.

Under the Red Sky

- Imperial Conclave

The six archmagi of the Empire have the power to send a formal message to a single eternal each Summit. During the Spring Equinox, five such plenipotentiary messages were sent - and over the last three months each of the eternals contacted has made a public response. You can learn about these responses here.

When the Ship Comes In (Trade Winds)

- Fleet captains; congregation leaders; ambassadors

International relations continue to develop - some improve, and some decline, like the ebb and flow of the tides. You can find a quick round up of things related to the current state of affairs, with an emphasis on trading - and a digression into the state of international relations between congregations of the Way - here.

381YE Summer Solstice winds of war

Overview

As Summer 381YE approaches, the Empire continues to fight against threats both external, and internal.

Imperial forces are engaged with the Grendel on the southern coast of Urizen in Redoubt and Spiral. In the west, a large Imperial force launches a major assault against the Jotun forces occupying the Mournwold, while the Navarr launch a risky offensive of their own. And in Weirwater, a lone Dawnish army fights a force of living nightmares.

At the same time, the Druj orcs launch major assaults against the Dawnish and the Urizen, in spite of the peace treaty agreed with them a scant six months ago.

Unfinished Business (Redoubt)

The Freeborn Storm - the grand Imperial navy - arrives in Redoubt like a comet from a clear sky. Supported by independent Freeborn and Navarr captains, and by several vessels from other nations, it assaults the beaches of Naris with the intention of driving out the Grendel insurgents who have captured several of the southern spires. Supported by the garrison of the Court of the White Fountain, the kohans and corsairs engage in a spirited campaign to liberate as many Urizen, and kill as many orcs, as they can.

The orcs are not prepared for such a concerted attack - without the support of their own armies, they are swiftly overwhelmed by the Freeborn tide. Spire after spire is liberated, until a final vicious battle takes place at Evenstar, the base-of-operations for the Grendel invaders. Rather than engage in a lengthy siege, the Freeborn Storm and their allies launch a full-frontal assault against the hospital. It is easy to see how Evenstar fell so swiftly to the Grendel - it is a spire built to encourage healing and convalescence, not to defend against a naval assault. Beautiful gardens are no substitute for stout walls.

In addition to the orcs, there are a dozen or so freakish creatures of the Spring realm defending Evenstar - hulking humanoid horrors with cruel serrated spears and gaping maws full of razor teeth. Heralds of the eternal Siakha, they are dangerous and hard to kill - striking devastating blows with their barbed weapons - but they do die eventually. Their presence is not enough to stem the tide of Imperial attackers and within a few hours the spire - and its associated Spring regio - is recaptured.

The Grendel took many slaves during their initial invasion. Sadly, few of those slaves remain to be liberated - a significant number have already been carried away across the Bay of Catazar to who-knows-what dark fate. Tragically, among their number are most of the Urizen healers and physicians that made Evenstar a place of powerful healing, as well as perhaps as many as a score of wealthy patients from various parts of the Empire.

Of possible interest to the liberators is news that several Grendel ships - not war vessels but fast pirate ships - were supplying Evenstar in the months since its capture. They took many slaves away with them, and several treasures from the captured spires of southern Redoubt. Some of the Urizen have an interesting story to tell their liberators. Several of them were pressed into service unloading these swift Grendel pirate ships. They report that in addition to the expected cargo - weapons, armour, food and drink - but there were also occasions when they were restricted to their barracks, and the Grendel soldiers unloaded the cargos - on each occasion, it is believed they were bringing in wains of building materials. Yet there is no sign of this phantom cargo anywhere liberated by the Freeborn storm.

At the same time the Imperial navy is mopping up the Grendel defenders in the south, the Northern Eagle is hard at work repairing the roads and bridges in the north. It is perhaps fitting that a Vaurshkan army is at work rebuilding roads damaged in the recent turbulent storms - the folk of that northern nation are known for their roads after all. They have

The Grendel have a foothold in Naris, in Redoubt. This cannot stand. We are to set out and take that land back! We've been inactive for too long - time to bloody our axes. Have Fun!

made good progress - another season and the essential infrastructure should be rebuilt sufficiently to allow smooth passage through the territory again.

The Granite Pillar are also present, taking defensive positions in the north and around the Court of the White Fountain, ready to resist any further potential invasion by the southern orcs. They offer assistance to the Northern Eagle - but it proves unworkable to employ both forces on the task at the same time.

Game Information - Redoubt

The Freeborn Storm have liberated the spires captured by the Grendel during their recent invasion - the victory points in Naris accumulated by the southern orcs have been neutralised.

The Northern Eagle is half-way through the task of repairing the roads and bridges in Redoubt. As detailed in last season's Wind of Fortune, it will take another season of work by an Imperial army to completely restore movement through the territory. While an army with the Siege quality could have repaired the roads in one season, it is not possible for two armies to combine their efforts to match that speed.

Flesh and Bone (Weirwater)

Shortly after the Spring Equinox, the dead rise in Weirwater.

The Golden Sun will march to Weirwater. There we will grind the winter driven husks back with Iron and Fire.

The night is dark indeed when the corpses of dead Dawnish pull themselves from their graves. The stars General Zoran Orzel of the Golden Sun are still hidden, and the moon is little more than a thin silver sliver when the first shambling ghouls begin their assault. Choked in dark earth, some of them incongruously garlanded in the flowers that adorned their graves, they lurch towards the nearest human habitation, hungry for the flesh of the living. The curse that calls them is egalitarian; noble and yeoman alike are dragged from their slumber and sent stumbling to prey upon their countryfolk. The freshest corpses are the most dangerous, but those who endure the assault of the ravenous husks talk of ancient, withered dead lurching alongside the more recently departed - some barely more than skeletons cloaked in tattered parchment skin, dull red flames burning in their empty eyesockets.

A night of horror ensues across Weirwater that leaves dozens dead. The nobles are well equipped to deal with these ambulatory cadavers, but it is easy to forget that many yeomen have served in the armies of Dawn in their time. Where people are not taken by surprise, they are generally able to survive until sunrise. Yet across Weirwater hundreds die. While a single solid blow is often enough to deal with the average husk, there are a great many of them. Worse, a number of the corpses are those of Dawnish knights and nobles, buried in their armour, often with their shields. Even the mightiest blow is to no avail when it is turned aside by rusted plate, earth-clogged chain, or a clumsily interposed shield.

There is no warning, but the people are not caught entirely unprepared. Ever since the horde of unliving horrors emerged from the Semmerlak, there have been people in Weirwater predicting an event of this nature - although they have severely underestimated the magnitude. There are stories of glorious courage and vigilance across Weirwater. The witches of Applefell and their criminal allies materialise out of nowhere to protect the town from a hundred or so corpses, only to disappear again with the sunrise. The war-witches of Spiral Castle join with House Griffinsbain to drive off a terrible force of withered Varushkan warriors and Dawnish soldiers that rise from an ancient battlefield in northern Weirmoor. The troubadours of Culwich rally the people of the village against a sodden cohort of drowned fisherfolk and stranger things that drag themselves, dripping and stinking, from the mud of the Semmerlak. Axe-wielding lumberjacks from the Weirwater Vales, many of them dour Varushkans, create a no-nonsense perimeter around their camps and chop any husk foolish enough to attack them into bloody pieces.

As the sun rises, the assault of the unliving slackens. At first, it is easy to believe that the bright sunlight has ended the curse - that a single night of horror is all that they will have to endure. This proves optimistic, however. The husks have stopped attacking the living but they have not returned to their graves. Rather, they have begun to shamble and stumble towards Hawksmoor, to join the unliving army there - an army that is already on the move.

The abominable horde begins to move east through the trees, a slow tide of abominations moving toward the nearest large settlement - the hedge-encircled town of Hawthorne. As they march, they slaughter any living being that crosses their path, overwhelming a small village, several farms, and the estate of the Amici, a minor noble house. The witches of Hawthorne begin to muster their defence, sending desperate messengers to Applefell and Culwich, and south into Semmerholm, asking for aid.

Aid is already on its way, however. Two nights after the dead rise, the Golden Sun march into the forests of Weirmoor from Astolat. Moving with grim determination, the heavily-armoured knights push eastwards as fast as they can. Passing Spiral Castle, the de Casillon nobles bring the commanders of the army up to speed on the terrible events overtaking Weirwater, and offer what aid they can. From the scattered reports, they estimate that perhaps as many as another thousand malign spirits have been unleashed into Weirwater - spirits that defile the fallen of Dawn by possessing the bodies of those who should have been left to sleep beneath the soil and driving them to prey on their descendants, their families, and their friends.

Even as they hurry to intercept the unliving host, they take few chances. As they sweep eastward into Hawksmoor, their forces spread out to ensure as many straggling unliving ghouls as possible are destroyed. The small groups of abominations are no match for a Dawnish army, and barely slow their advance ... until they reach Hawthorne at least.

The army arrives to find the siege of Hawthorne well underway. The poison-thorned hedges provide an effective perimeter, but the hordes of the unliving feel no pain and even as the magical poison is ravaging their flesh they continue to push forward. Bolstered by every noble knight and war-witch who can reach the town, the witches coordinate a desperate defence. It is not enough to turn the unliving horde aside - the living are outnumbered and overmatched by the dead - but their courage is at least sufficient to delay the unliving long enough that they are only just breaking through the defences as the Golden Sun arrive.

The cadaverous host initially ignores the Dawnish soldiers, focusing their attention on murdering as many of the people of Hawthorne as they can. As the horns sound and the army advances implacably across the torn fields surrounding the town, the ghouls slowly begin to register the presence of five thousand knights and yeoman-soldiers. Their attention turns away from feasting on the civilians, and they lurch forward to engage the Golden Sun.

Previously, the unliving have avoided direct engagements. Even during their ill-fated foray into Astolat, they retreated rather than fight the Golden Axe and the garrison of the Castle of Thorns. That is no longer the case. The desperate moaning howl they voice as they pour out of Hawthorne is like a living thing, assailing the spirits of the Dawnish soldiers that seek to stand against them. Some break - it is too much for them - the terrible hunger, the terrible moaning, the horror of fighting the walking corpses. Here and there among the hordes, on tattered scraps of surcotes and tabards, and even the occasional soiled standard, one cannot fail to spot the heraldry of the nobles of Weirwater; the burning phoenix of House Novarion; the white eagles of House Orzel; the golden pegasus of House Arwood; the red gryphon of House Griffinsbain; the stars of the De Ledure and the De Céleste; and the hand-and-spiral of the De Casillon. While the army might have begun as a horde of Varushkan and orc corpses, perhaps a third of their number are now made up of the mortal remains of the people of Dawn.

The battle is savage; the unliving hurl themselves onto the Dawnish soldiers without regard for their continued existence. The first wave is quickly dispatched ... but the second wave is harder to deal with. By the third wave, the Dawnish lines start to buckle slightly. Here an armoured knight stumbles, tripping over a fallen body. There a yeoman presses forward a little too far and is quickly surrounded and torn apart. The lines hold, but people begin to die. The fourth wave pushes the line back a step.

But only a step. With the drums and the horns, the magic of the witches and the words of the troubadours bolstering the will of the warriors to keep fighting, with the cry of "Glory!" echoing, the army as one soldier takes a step forward. Then another. The unliving rally - there is no doubt that there is some will at work here directing their strategy - but the onrushing tide slackens. The fields around Hawthorne are littered with the bloodless dead ... and with too many bleeding bodies of fallen soldiers and civilians.

The unliving retreat. Between one moment and the next, they seem to lose interest in both Hawthorne and the Golden Sun. They begin to shamle north, away from the town and the army. After a few steps many break into a loping run. Fleeing. A cheer goes up from a thousand throats, from the Golden Sun and the surviving defenders of Hawthorne. The enemy has broken!

And then the final horror begins. Here and there across the battlefield, and in the town, bodies begin to move. Soaked in blood, eyes filling with an unnatural hunger, they rise again. The vessels have been cut down, but the spirits that drive them are not so easily dismissed. They seek out new hosts, and the nearest hosts are the bodies of those who fell desperately defending their people. They turn their hunger on those who they died fighting alongside. The cheers turn to wails of horror and grief, as those courageous combatants who gave their lives endure a terrible second existence as pawns of the enemy.

Most of the newly risen are dealt with quickly, once the initial shock lessens, but several dozen follow the main body of the unliving horde north. The Golden Sun give chase, and over the course of the season there are several other engagements with the cadaverous horde. In each case, they go roughly the same way. The first few rounds of battle go to the Dawnish, but the unliving wear them down, exhausting them until they make mistakes. Then, on an unspoken signal, they flee the field and regroup, and the whole thing happens again.

The strategy of the Golden Sun minimizes the number of Dawnish soldiers who fall to the unliving, but conversely they give few opportunities to destroy the enemy. And after every engagement, a portion of those who have fallen rise again, reinforcing the unliving and slowly transforming the horde from a mass of Varushkan and orc husks into a mass of Dawnish husks.

Game Information - Weirwater

The unliving army is on the offensive. The Golden Sun have won each engagement, but have not dealt many significant losses to the unliving horde. The situation is complicated by two factors. It doesn't help that in one night the initial horde, primarily Varushkans and orcs, was bolstered by an additional thousand Dawnish troops. Worse, it has become clear that the husks are recovering a proportion of their losses even as they fight - very much as if the spirits that drive them are seeking out new bodies when their old one is rendered unusable. On the plus side, while the Dawnish have lost some manor houses, villages, and farms, the host has not managed to gain any significant ground, and the situation is considerably less tragic than it would have been without the intervention of the Golden Sun.

Blood on the Scales (Spiral)

Shortly after the Spring Equinox, the Northern Eagle withdraws from Spiral into Redoubt. For a few days it looks as if the Green Shields will be defending Cinon by themselves ... but then they are reinforced by the Eastern Sky, marching from the west through the passes of Willstone. A couple of weeks later they are further reinforced by the Towerjacks - the League army refusing to allow the disastrous state of the roads in Redoubt to slow them down. The three armies mount a staunch defence of the one remaining Imperial region of Spiral.

Stand fast, stand strong, my soldiers of Shield. Hold fast, Hold true, our bloody hands shall not yield.."

General Iron Osric of the Green Shield

And what a defence it is! Supported by some eight thousand troops belonging to independent captains, as well as the shambling undead shock troops attached to the Green Shield, they face a full assault from the Grendel forces.

The Grendel strategy appears to be three tiered; some of their armies push directly north and west toward Damakhan's Forge from Ateri. A second, slightly smaller force takes a more cautious approach, moving from Screed to test the Empire's defences in southern Cinon. A third force attempts an even slower advance from Ossuary, targeting key spires along the western side of the still-Imperial region. These forces are supported by marines and supplies delivered by the Grendel navies.

As in previous seasons, some of the orc generals demonstrate a preternatural ability to coordinate their tactics, and to engage in unified strategy even though the armies are spread out around the borders of Cinon. They are, perhaps, not expecting the Towerjacks who possess their own potent enchantment, enhancing the discipline of the League army to the point where they are able to predict and counter the direct strategy of the army marching beneath the banner of the black eels. The overwhelming assault the western Grendel armies are expecting to punch through the Imperial defences ... fails to materialise. yet this defence is costly. The Towerjacks heroic refusal to cede even an inch of ground requires tough decisions to be made, and tough decisions cost lives...

Towerjacks, we stood on the walls of Holberg and threw back the Barbarians for twenty years! Now we will once again stand against the barbarians in the defence of the Empire. We make our heroic stand for Virtue and the Empire!

General Natalia Barossa of the Towerjacks

The southern orc force moves more slowly, with greater care ... meets the wall of steel and shields that is the Green Shield and the Eastern Sky. They press through the mountains from the Black Plateau, probing, looking for any weakness ... and fail to find it. Week after week they continue to try and find new ways to push around the Imperial defenders - to no avail. The southern forces stand fast. The Eastern Sky offer and expect no quarter, their fervour inspiring the Green Shield and their cohort of reanimated Urizen and Grendel corpses to hold the line. The Grendel are pushed back into Screed time and again.

The price of defending the west and the south is that the eastern force is almost unopposed. Pressing out of Ossuary, the orcs under the turtle banner make some early gains ... and then the Fire of the South arrive. Last engaged with the Jotun in Liathaven, the Freeborn army engages in a heroic forced march across the entire breadth of the Empire. Skirting the northern borders of the Mournwold, they barely pause for breath as they press through Miaren and Casinea, down into Bastion, following the trods as best they can. Resting for one full day, they then press into the mountains. Through Morrow into Zenith, avoiding the trap of Redoubt, they triumphantly tear down out of Occursion into Ossuary, taking the Grendel turtle-banner by surprise. The orcs abandon their assault into Cinon, and wheel to face the new threat.

The Grendel and the Empire shall know that the Eastern Sky have not gone soft in garrison. Dawnish knights shall win the defenders of Spiral respite from the Grendel onslaught. We shall sally forth in Cinon, force the enemy to take a backward step. Then we will form an unbreakable wall of steel and death! We shall give no ground!.

To their credit, the turtle-banner responds extremely quickly - they demonstrate the supernatural ability to adjust and respond to enemy strategies that has become a hallmark of the orcs during the Spiral campaign - but they are outnumbered. The Fire of the South has brought with them some two thousand additional soldiers - those who were able to keep up. Some of them are clearly magical in nature, including a cohort of crystalline soldiers of a peculiarly insectile appearance. They have also brought with them a force never before encountered by the Grendel. A half dozen immense magical beasts; three massive ram-like creatures, a bear, and two huge boars composed of living fire. The first time the armies fight, these supernatural allies, summoned and bound by Imperial magic, charge straight into the orc army and detonate with an ear-splitting explosion of thunder and magical flame, startling and scattering and incinerating orcs left and right!

The turtle-banner rallies, but it is slowly pushed back. As the other Imperial forces protect Cinon, the Fire of the South advances slowly southward into Ossuary, beginning the long slow march toward the Legacy in the south. The Grendel advance has been stymied - more, the unexpected arrival of the Freeborn army has seen the Empire regain a little of its lost territory. A significant factor here - along with the strength of the Empire's defence, and the numbers of troops brought to bear - was surely the victory of the heroes of the Empire during the Spring Equinox. The defence of Damakhan's Forge and the various successful skirmishes with the southern orcs over the course of Equinox clearly interfered with the Grendel strategy. The heroic action put them on the back foot and making it easier for the Imperial armies to position themselves so as best to stop the Grendel attack. The situation might have been quite different if the orcs had succeeded in their sneak attack into Cinon!

Soldiers, we find ourselves once more traversing the breadth of the Empire, this season we will wash into Spiral as a tide, sweeping aside Grendel as we go. We move with a sense of purpose and clarity as one. We will sweep into Ossuary and reclaim the land stolen from the people of Urizen; We are a blaze that will envelop the force of the Grendel and send them howling to their deaths. You will find me fighting among you with my band of Kohan; I shall see you in the field and I pray I fill you with the same Pride you fill me with."

General Marciel i Riqueza of the Fire of the South

There is perhaps one note of caution, sounded by the Urizen watchers who keep Screed under careful scrutiny. The bloodshed, the violence, and the anger that has washed across Spiral these last few seasons has begun to rouse the Black Plateau again. Dawnish soldiers and Wintermark warriors alike hear its echoes in their dreams as they fight on the southern borders of Cinon. What influence the Black Plateau may have on the battles in Spiral is uncertain at best - even the Grendel seem to give it a wide berth - but some of the watchers are concerned that continued violence may see some unpredictable magical emanation in the near future.

Game Information - Spiral

The Empire has held their ground in Cinon, but the Grendel still have a presence along the eastern side of the region (a few remaining victory points). The Fire of the South have made some headway into driving the Grendel out of Ossuary, but still have a long way to go (and are effectively attempting to create a new beachhead meaning their progress will be further impeded).

The Road Less Travelled (Hordalant and Liathaven)

It's been many years since Imperial troops laid a claim to the territory of a barbarian orc nation. It is true that the recent Dawnish advances in the Barrens briefly gained new ground but that ancient wilderness was not under control of the Druj when the conquest began - and Dawn has made temporary advances in the Barrens before. Not since the reign of Empress Brannan has the Empire really made a serious attempt to attack the Druj, the Jotun, the Thule, or the Grendel at home. Arguably it has been only a little under two centuries since the Empire last successfully attacked and conquered any new lands claimed by barbarians.

The attempt to regain the Empire's former might begins a week after the end of the Spring Equinox; as the Black Thorns cross the western borders of Liathaven into the Jotun territory of Hordalant.

Lying just to the west of the Empire, Hordalant has been a staging ground for Jotun aggression in the south almost for as long as there has been an Empire. Spies report that the territory is fortified, with a large population of Jotun orcs. It is perhaps not what the Empire would imagine when they think of barbarian lands. The territory is criss-crossed by well-maintained roads. There are many well-defended settlements; great numbers of farms; watchtowers; palaces and memorials; merchants plying their trades; fisherfolk casting their nets. If not for the fact the people living here are primarily orcs, it would be easy to mistake Hordalant for Hahnmark, or even Mitwold.

The purpose is to do a lightning strike behind enemy lines, cause some noise and disruption to try and give those Jotun armies in our lands something to think about and try and inflame a reaction.

General Ulric Y'Basden of the Black Thorns

So the Black Thorns duck across the border from the forests of West Ranging to the forests of Vallorberg, and begin their steady conquest of Hordalant.

Even the best-laid plans oft go awry, and the first major fly in the ointment of this bold plan is when the Black Thorns scouts detect a sizeable Jotun force moving in the opposite direction. But, just as they slipped from Kahraman into southern Liathaven in the Summer of last year, the Navarr use their speed, woodcraft and supernatural strategic sense to avoid any major engagement. It is possible that the Jotun do not immediately recognise their enemies, being set on travelling east into Liathaven. Though a small measure of strategic skill, and a large dose of luck, the Black Thorns are able to avoid the orc forces and enter Hordalant.

Vallorberg is a largely uninhabited region under the grip of what the Jotun term the "Dead Forest" - their name for the great forest that spreads across Liathaven and the eastern borders of the southern Jotun kingdoms. Some of the forest has been cleared for farming - mainly around the Hellis river in the north and the Volg river in the south. The Black Thorns encounter minimal resistance - at least at first. It seems that the farmers of Vallorberg would rather flee than fight. Those who cannot flee are forced to surrender; becoming surly prisoners stubbornly refusing to cooperate with their captors.

Battles are sporadic and short - there are small scattered bands of Jotun warriors on most of the farmsteads and some of them make a stand despite the overwhelming odds arrayed against them. They put up a spirited fight, however, giving their lives to protect what they own - apparently determined to be the last to leave. Only those farmsteads where the occupants have had time to completely flee are undefended.

Some of the thralls are orcs, but there are many humans among their number. Despite the deaths of their masters, neither group seems appreciative of their liberators. Indeed, apart from the obvious physical details, the human thralls are nearly indistinguishable from the others. Both groups appear intimidated by the Navarr, as if expecting summary execution at any moment.

A fortnight sees the Black Thorns make steady gains in Vallorberg ... and then the situation begins to turn.

Two wide scouting patrols fail to return. When the third finally appears, half its number are dead and half the rest are walking wounded. They provide a dire warning - at least one significant Jotun force is camped nearby, supported by the garrison of a major fortification. As near as the scouts can tell, the Jotun force that passed by as they slipped into Hordalant had left one or more armies behind with orders to resupply. Convoys of food and essential supplies are being moved to the Jotun armies including wagons filled with mithril presumably intended for emergency resupply. All those attempts have been utterly thwarted by the expected presence of the Black Thorns in Hordalant - a strategic victory of sorts... but now they are coming for the Navarr in force.

Three days later, the Jotun hammer falls. The first major engagement in western Vallorberg goes to the Black Thorns. A significant force of Jotun move to reinforce a village near the Hellis river, but they are heavily outnumbered and retreat once the majority of thralls have been evacuated. This represents the last gain the Navarr make in Hordalant. Two days later, a much larger force attacks the Black Thorns from the south-east, pushing them back across the Volg. Then at dawn the following day, the force in the north attacks again, pushing the Navarr westward. Their strategy is straightforward - but even though the powerful enchantment on their army provides insight into how best to counter it, the Black Thorns are hard pressed to take advantage of the insight it offers. The orcs attack with the rhythm of the smith at the anvil; a hard strike in one place and then retreat and attack somewhere else the next day. They leave few openings for the outnumbered Navarr to exploit.

Exact numbers of orcs opposing the Imperial army are difficult to estimate even for the Navarr scouts. Independent captains have swelled the depleted Black Thorns to nearly double their size and at first it appears that the orc and Imperial forces might almost be matched in size... but as the days wear on that hope fades. The Jotun generals are carefully rotating their forces driving the Navarr back even while they minimise their own casualties. By the final month of the campaign, there is little doubt that the defenders of Hordalant outnumber the Black Thorns and their auxiliaries; although how many of these troops are part of an army and how many are "home guard" forces attached to a fortification is impossible to say. Hopefully, any scouts attached to the spy network in Hordalant may have more information.

The Black Thorns are outmatched nearly two-to-one, and they are steadily forced back. The Jotun defence is careful but relentless and they harry the Navarr night and day driving them out. Less than a month before the Summer Solstice it becomes painfully clear that they are certain to lose all the gains they have made, and scouts are increasingly assigned to seek out paths by which the bulk of the army might escape Hordalant intact.

Rather than rout, the Black Thorns stage a disciplined retreat. Once they decide to move, they move fast and sure. The best thorns fight a delaying action to let the Navarr gather their forces together, and then the entire army moves back east into Liathaven, abandoning Hordalant to its Jotun masters.

Only then does the true horror of their position become clear.

In West Ranging, they discover an immense force of Jotun orcs. A force that massively outnumbers them, perhaps as much as five to one. A force that has been waiting for them.

A week before the Summer Solstice, the situation for the Black Thorns in Liathaven is dire. They are surrounded by Jotun forces on all sides - with an impenetrable wall of Jotun stone and steel at their back in Hordalant. If not for their facility for fast movement it is likely that they would have suffered catastrophic losses already. While the Hordalant adventure only saw the loss of five hundred or so Navarr soldiers, once the Jotun press the attack, they are almost certain to lose many times that number.

If the forces in Hordalant were like the smith's hammer, the forces in Liathaven are like a raging forest fire, eager to reduce the Black Thorns to ashes.

The situation looks ... very bad indeed.

Game Information : Hordalant and Liathaven

The presence of the Jotun armies alongside the fortifications made all the difference here. If not for that they would have been able to secure some territory in Hordalant and begun to take a foothold. If there is one positive to this outcome, it is that the Jotun in Hordalant were clearly not expecting the Black Thorns - instead of being resupplied the armies defending the Jotun territory have taken more casualties (albeit reduced in number by the orders issued by both sides). According to the reports, the Navarr may even have prevented the Jotun armies from using emergency resupply to restore the armies to fighting strength.

As it is, the Black Thorns make no lasting gains in Hordalant and are forced to retreat back the way they came. Into Liathaven. Straight into a massive force of angry Jotun - not, arguably, that there is any other kind where the Navarr are concerned.

There are two problems however.

The first is that the army is now surrounded on all sides by angry Jotun warriors - who immediately attack. Unless something changes during the Summer Solstice, it is likely that by the Black Thorns will suffer several thousand casualties before downtime even begins. Cautious orders or magic might help reduce the casualties but it will take radical action to avoid a bitter defeat; a defeat that might well see the army disband (and as a large army, the Black Thorns disband if their fighting strength drops below 1,500).

The second problem is that the Black Thorns are once again trapped by Jotun armies. Assuming everything remains as it is during the coming summit, the General of the Black Thorns will face some serious decisions. Any attempt to move out of Liathaven would see the army needing to push through a cordon of tens of thousands of Jotun warriors.

A civil service expert will be on hand during the coming summit to discuss the strategic situation with the general in more detail, but a rough assessment of the army's options would be:

- They could stay where they are, taking an attacking order of some sort, attempting to drive the Jotun out of Liathaven. They can't take a defending order because there is literally no territory for them to defend.
- They could try to push north into Bregasland. This would require them to break through the Jotun blockade, resulting in them suffering a significant number of casualties. Given they have the Fast quality, they could even keep moving - assuming they were able to endure the punishment inflicted by the ring of orcs.
- They could again use the Paths of Lan Thúven and move south through the vallorn into Western Scout. Again, however, they would suffer serious casualties - the Jotun now control Silent Stand steading and seem to know enough to make an effort to stop the army reaching it. The army would also need to stop moving once they reached Western Scout - and while the Jotun cannot follow them directly it would still be a risky move.
- They could push west into Hordalant again. This would not result in any additional automatic casualties, but it would leave the Black Thorns engaged in Hordalant against forces that have already defeated them once - and the Jotun armies in Liathaven may well follow them.

Listen well my merry lads and lasses, once more, once more we go back into the Mourn and our foe shall tremble at the sight of our banners and the beat of our drums. It is the beginning of the end for the Jotun Horde, their armies are weakened, their morale broken - and if they yearn for a worthy death, we shall be sure to grant it to them. We are the first army of the Marches, we were last out and we will be the first imperials back in ... Remember though we fight this war for the living, show the people of the Mournwold that they have not been abandoned! ... We will, nay must show the people of the Mournwold that we are their saviours and not their bane...

It is possible that scouts attached to the spy network in Liathaven might have further information about the situation in that territory, and as always developments at the event may change the situation, but this represents the Empire's best guess as to the starting point of the Navarr army.

General Will Talbot of the Drakes

You Can't Go Home Again (Mournwold)

During the Spring Equinox, while the heroes of the Empire were fighting in western Liathaven, the Jotun forces in the Mournwold completed their push to drive Imperial forces out of the Greensward. Overwhelmed, the armies were pushed back across the border into Tassato. The Jotun again controlled the entire Mourn. A fleeting victory, but a victory nonetheless. A grim victory, given how much blood had been spilt.

The Drakes, the Fist of the Mountains, the Hounds of Glory, and the orcs of the Winter Sun regroup in Tassato and immediately march north through the forests of Madeiras and Tower March into Upwold. The Golden Axe are already waiting for them - as are the Iron Helms fresh from their militia engagement in Skarsind. An armed camp is established on the Heath not far from Sutton Stone Quarries. There, the Imperial armies await reinforcements. Over the next few weeks they are joined by the Bounders, the Strong Reeds, and the Tusks. There is an air of celebration - it will be the first time that the four Marcher armies have fought together in the Mournwold and the moment has not come too soon for some. Soldiers and commanders alike laugh about who will be the first into Freemoor, who will be the first to break a Jotun army, who will be the first to liberate a Mournwold village.

Assault Soldiers of the Strong Reeds. The eyes of the Empire are upon you! The task will not be an easy one. The enemy is well trained, well equipped and battle hardened. They will fight savagely but this is a new year, the sees the Jotun armies all but broken. Last season, we laid a deadly trap and paid a terrible price. Now we face the monsters at our door. Now we bring the fight to them. The tide has turned, The Empire is marching to Victory. I have full confidence in your courage. We will lead the way, we will carry the day, we will accept nothing less than total victory. Onwards, for the Marches and for the Empire!

General Jack Flint of the Strong Reeds

Some eight thousand soldiers loyal to independent captains swell the already sizable force gathered on the Heath. Next-to-last to arrive are the Navarr of the Quiet Step, and then the Gryphon's Pride. The arrival of a second Dawnish army is met with some muttering - with the exception of the Winter Sun, all the other armies present belong to nations that have declared opposition to the vision of the Land without Tears - but the Dawnish nation has embraced it. The commanders tolerate muttering, but nothing more. Still, there is something tense in the air as one last discussion of strategy gives way to a gloomy morning, and the armies begin to move...

The Imperial forces cross into Freemoor, retracing the route the Golden Axe took last season. Banners snap in the wind, but the soldiers for the most part march in silence. As the Old Pig comes in sight, however, the Drakes raise their voices in the Marches Battle Song. After the first ragged chorus, the Bounders, and the Tusks, and the Strong Reeds join in. The Marcher armies pick up the pace.

Initially, the Empire encounters surprisingly little resistance from the orcs. Perhaps the Jotun commanders are expecting the Empire to attack from Tassato again, as they have so many times before. Perhaps they do not believe the Empire will be so quick to engage them again after the slaughter at the Fall of the Greensward.

The Jotun depend upon their champions and heroes for leadership, morale and their path across the Abyss. We will march to Freemoor and deny them those champions, and those champions the honourable deaths they desire. Where they seek honourable combat against the Shield of the 'Mark or Highborn, their leaders will meet our arrows and barbed spears, and the Fires of Spring will burn in their blood.

General Brennos Brackensong of the Quiet Step

Either way, it is three days before the first orc forces are spotted - Hierro orcs marching under the Jotun banners. Along with the Skjaldern, they engage the Empire. They fight cautiously - withdrawing from any major engagement almost before it begins. Even with the support of the two Jotun castles - of Hillstop and the Tribute - the Jotun orcs are greatly outnumbered by the Imperial forces. Battle after battle, they fall back - but they do not rout. They give ground in a disciplined fashion - and whenever they spot an opening in the Imperial strategy they strike hard and fast at the exposed force before continuing their withdrawal. Still, that simmering undercurrent of uncertainty continues to stew. While some of the Imperial armies seize this opportunity for glory or heroism, some of the Imperial forces employ unorthodox tactics that invite open criticism from their allies.

Freemoor is liberated. The Chalkdowns are liberated.

We will fight the Jotun honourably, as noble foes, cleansing the land back for the Empire. .

Those who have fought alongside the Quiet Step in particular notice a change in their behaviour. Navarr thorns have always been fond of poison, of ambush, and of traps. That fondness appears amplified this seasons. They seem to have procured prodigious amounts of oil of blackthorn and redwillow paste. They share their venomous bounty with any who will accept it - especially those Marcher beaters, and warriors from the Varushkan armies who appreciate such things. They create brutal and efficient traps, and lure the Jotun into them. Their scouts seem disinterested in gathering information about the Jotun - rather they sneak out at night to slip through the Jotun armies and assassinate the enemy commanders wherever they can - a tactic that proves especially effective against the Hierro. Whenever the Jotun are engaged with other Imperial forces, the Quiet Step flank them and butcher as many as they can with arrows and poison blades. At the same time, the Iron Helms demonstrate how they once earned such a merciless reputation. Some soldiers have heard stories of what happened in the north with Dogri Thulebane - the hounds, and the ravens, and the drums. In Skarsind, the Iron Helms were fighting fellow humans, Imperial citizens. Here, they are fighting barbarian orcs, here they are finally let off the leash...

General Erkenbrand of the Fist of the Mountains

The Gauntlet of Challenge has been laid down to the Jotun. No vile curses to steal our glory! We will show them why they wished to fight the Empire without our Intervention. Win a triumph by our charge, worthy of our new Queen! Honour the Fallen and allow the Jotun to reclaim and bury their honoured dead. Do no harm to civilian thralls.

General Tancred de Rondell of the Hounds of Glory

My loyal warriors, the Jotun want to try and cross the Abyss by fighting the Empire, so the Winter Sun will help them into it. We do not weep for any Jotun, not even their fallen newborns. They are barbarian scum and deserve a quick death under the shadow of the first Legion Banners. While the second legion relax, we shall charge forwards in an overwhelming assault along side our marcher brothers and sisters.

General Bloodcrow Morgur of the Winter Sun

The Jotun are known to place much stock in respecting the dead - so the Iron Helms mutilate and despoil the bodies of their fallen opponents. Bodies are burned beyond recognition and then the charred remains hung from trees and signposts. There are stories of prisoners torn apart by dogs, of captured Jotun warriors impaled on rough stakes in front of their fellow orcs. The Iron Helms are scrupulous in obeying the orders of their general - no civilian is harmed by design - but any enemy who dares to raise a weapon against the Empire finds an agonising death awaits them if they fall into the hands of the Iron Helms. Word soon spreads throughout the territory - the Empire has come... and brought a bloody murder with them to the Mourn.

With so few Jotun arrayed against them, the Empire advances quickly; as the Summer Solstice draws closer, the Empire even manages to make inroads into the forest of Alderly. Here they encounter new foes of an entirely different nature, as Feni ambushers attack several patrols. They snipe at scouts and launch surprise attacks against smaller forces camped under the trees. Always, they run as soon as they lose the element of surprise, melting back into the trees. The truth is that they are little more than a nuisance - and it appears they are a nuisance that seems just as interested in taking pot-shots at the Jotun as that. Yet some die to their arrows, and their poisoned blades, and there are precious few Feni corpses to show for it.

Iron Helms will perform a merciless onslaught into Freemoor alongside the Golden Axe... (we will) heighten the fear in Jotun hearts and break their morale... (we) will not assault civilians, allowing them to pass unhindered.

General Magnus Anatolyvich Prochnost of the Iron Helms

As the days grow warmer and the nights grow shorter, the Empire has driven the Jotun out of two regions and is close to conquering a third - in spite of Feni resistance.

Much of the north-eastern Mourn is liberated but if the Imperial forces had expected a joyous welcome they are sorely disappointed. In every settlement, soldiers are met with cold sullen faces. Lines of Marchers in plain homespun clothes stand mutely staring at the advancing soldiers, arms crossed over their chest. Once they have made their point, they return to their houses, turning their backs on the newcomers and barring their doors against them. From that point on, they pointedly refuse all contact with the armies of the Empire, rebuffing all attempts to engage them - whether to buy essential supplies or simply just to talk.

In other places, the reception is different but just as unwelcoming. In the village of Charcoal on the edge of Alderly, the Empire is met with a line of tight-lipped Marchers armed with pans and ladles. As the soldiers draw near the wood burners and their families begin beating the pans over and over producing a riot of noise that assails the ears and simply does not stop. Only when the Empire pulls back far enough back that the houses are out of site does the racket finally cease. In Blackheath, a small community of leather workers on the edge of Freemoor, several tanners makes their displeasure plain by heating cauldrons in advance of the column, letting the wind carry the curse of the tanners' craft towards the advancing army.

Last season your actions were beyond valour. I swell with pride to be your General! Now I must call upon your resilience and strength again to push forwards in a grinding advance into Freemoor. The Iron Helms will join us there as we push through Mournwold. We will stand side by side with our brothers and sisters of Varushka. If you encounter civilians from either side, you will allow them to leave unharmed.

General Nikolai Zakharovic Prochnost of the Golden Axe

The shunning is particularly painful for the Marcher soldiers. Many of them try to reason, or argue, with their fellow yeomen. Some get through. Most do not. In at least one case, a group of Tusks are reduced to angry tears by the hurled accusations of "murderer" and "coward" and the oft-voiced hope that the soldiers are reborn as rats and crows.

We shall sweep the Jotun from Freemoor, then the Chalk Downs and the Alderney. Now Discipline is more vital than ever. Every effort should be made to spare thralls and non-combatants. We will allow the Jotun to remove their dead if the request.

General Nedry of The Cullachs of the Tusks Southmoor, and west to Green March. Yet it is impossible not to notice that the Empire is facing a significantly smaller force than they fought last season. The majority of the Jotun are conspicuous by their absence.

Game Information - Mournwold

This season we raise our banners and shoulder our weapons once more as we march for Mournwold. We march to meet our brothers and sisters from the other Marcher Armies in Freemoor and we will show them what us Bounders do best as we are relentless in our attack and cut the Jotun down! We will strike blows for our families and strike one for the land! When a Marcher strikes a blow, there's iron in their hand! So now you will pick up your bows and now your bill hooks hone. For when a marcher strikes a blow they never stand alone! Let's be sure to move it along double-time now, can't be letting the Drakes beat us to Freemoor!

General Alusair Farstrider of the Bounders

Now is the time, soldiers of the Gryphon's Pride. Our ambitions in the Barrens have been paused but today we begin a new chapter of our glorious history. Today we go to reconquer the Mournwold for the Empire and bring it's people back into the Imperial fold after thirty years under Jotun rule. Remember the commands of the Queen of Dawn and treat civilians and non-combatants with the hospitality our nation is famed for. If the Jotun stand against the Imperial host they shall die, if they flee we will flow across marcher land toward the Jotun homelands! For the Empire! For Glory! Conqueror

General Garravaine de Rondell of the Gryphon's Pride

Empire may have won the battle for territory this season, but the battle for the hearts and minds of the people of Mournwold has only just begun. The civilians - those folk who have dwelt here all their lives - are extremely angry with the Empire. While this has not particularly harmed the Imperial advance it does not bode well for the future.

The Empire has conquered two regions and is almost three-quarters of the way towards taking a third (Alderly). They have suffered perhaps a thousand casualties, if that. The Jotun have lost perhaps three times that many troops - probably the only thing that has kept their token forces alive has been their decision to give ground.

What is very clear however is that the Occupation (Dawnguard)

Along the western borders of the Barrens are four massively built white granite tower-keeps collectively known as the Towers of Dawn. This ancient fortification has been assailed many times by the Druj, and briars, and bandit orcs alike, but the Towers have never fallen. They have protected Dawnguard since they were first raised, a symbol of Dawn's resolve - that these lands will one day be theirs. They are one of the mightiest fortifications in the Empire, only the Castle of Thorns is larger. But stone walls alone do not make a fortress impregnable - only the resolve of Dawn's armies can do that.

But nothing lasts forever...

The reports of the refugees are fragmentary, confused. Piecing them together, it seems that the Druj split their armies into two forces, sweeping in from Murderdale and the Carmine Fields, driving everything before them. The main body of orcs struck with merciless force, overwhelming the defenders almost before they realised they were being attacked. The second, smaller force fighting under a scorpion banner, followed behind consolidating, rooting out resistance, and rounding up as many yeomen and nobles as they could find.

The two forces met at the Towers of the Dawn. At full strength the great fortification could hold off three Druj armies for a season, but the Towers were depleted by the attacks of the Barrens Orcs over a year ago, and that damage has weakened them disastrously. It would have made little difference if the castle had been at full strength - the Druj host spread out before the walls was clearly intended to overcome at least two Imperial armies and the Towers.

Alone, the Tower garrisons are barely able to slow the attackers down. With siege ladders and siege beasts, the Druj make short work of the courageous - but ultimately doomed - soldiers. Between the confusion of the swift attack, and the Druj living siege engines, the castle itself is torn apart and the walls reduced to rubble. The bodies of the defenders are mounted on spikes thrust into the rubble, and a small force of shrikes left to add anyone who tries to remove the bodies to their gruesome gallery.

There is some fighting at Drycastle, but it is short-lived. Those nobles and yeomen who try to resist the Druj are given no quarter. Their efforts are enough to buy some of the citizens of the Dawnish town the time they need to flee, but those who remain to fight pay the ultimate price. Their heads now stand on pikes mounted along the shattered walls, as the Druj make the settlement their new base of operations in the region.

After their initial push, the Druj forces quickly spread out across the region securing or destroying the manors of the noble households that call Dawnguard home. The lands of House de Carsenere, House Martel, House Aurelius, and House Vexille are all believed to have been overrun by Druj forces. There has been great loss of life, but nowhere near as much as their might have been. It seemed as if the Druj were here to conquer Dawnguard, rather than just to kill Dawnishfolk. Their main focus was on securing Drycastle and the Towers of Dawn, allowing space for refugees to escape north into the forests of Axmure. A few brave nobles even lead a rag-tag band through the mountains into Holmauer. Dawnguard has never been safe, and many households had contingency plans in case of an orc invasion that stretched back decades.

For now, a pall of silence has fallen on Dawnguard. Some minor pockets of resistance still exist, but they are slowly being stamped out by the Druj invaders. While a number of people escaped, a much larger number did not. Their fate is unknown - but veterans of the recent liberation of Reikos shake their heads and look away when asked for reassurance that the people still in Dawnguard will be alright.

Game Information : Dawnguard

With the fall of Dawnguard, the Barrens is now a conquered territory. As a consequence, every personal resource belonging to an Imperial citizen will have its production halved. The ritual Vale of Shadows can be used to protect a personal resource from the Druj, and may also be used to provide an in-character explanation as to how members of a household can continue to operate out of the Barrens. Any Dawnish character whose personal resource is in the Barrens may decide that it has been destroyed or conquered by the Druj by e-mailing Profound Decisions (at plot@profounddecisions.co.uk). If they do so before the Summer Solstice, they may take a new rank one resource in a Dawnish territory (Semmerholm, Weirwater, or Astolat) without paying the usual administration charge of two crowns.

There is a spy network in the Barrens; it is likely that the commander of any military unit that has been supporting it will receive more up-to-date information about the situation in the Barrens and in Dawnguard in particular.

Participation : Dawnguard

Any character whose personal resource is in the Barrens may choose to e-mail in to plot@profounddecisions.co.uk before the event and indicate they would like to begin play suffering the after-effects of a wound inflicted by the Druj. We will then put a card in your pack detailing the ongoing effects. As a word of warning, the Druj make extensive use of venom and disease when fighting the Empire, and several of those toxins are resistant to the application of the purify spell, being much closer in potency to a curse or traumatic wound than the venom spell-effect.

In addition, we are offering an opportunity for some players to begin the game in the Barrens, besieged by the Druj and on the verge of being overrun. This opportunity is open to any character whose personal resource was in the Barrens at the start of downtime, to any new character whose personal resource is in the Barrens, and to any character whose military unit was assigned to the Barrens spy network this downtime. Anyone who is interested should come to monster (you can get directions from GOD) at no later than half-past-five on Friday afternoon. There is a conjunction on the Sentinel Gate that will be available to be opened after six-o'clock (time in) so any Dawnish characters who are interested in participating in what looks a lot like a rescue mission into the Barrens should ensure they are ready to go bright and early. Be warned - Imperial forces have been soundly thrashed in the Barrens, and the starting positions of those volunteering for this opportunity will represent that. Feel free to bring plenty of fake blood.

Valley of Darkness (Zenith)

A little over a month after the Spring equinox, desperate messages began to dance across the heliopticon. Reports claim there is an orc force in north-eastern Zenith, in the forests of Lustri. Reports of orcs in Lustri are not new - the region is sparsely populated after all. There is clearly something more serious at work here, however. The most coherent report comes from Gatherwood Spire, which stands near the southern banks of the Feverwater. The spire's isolation means they have a lot of practice using the heliopticon, sending messages quickly and efficiently. Before all contact is lost, they calmly inform the rest of Zenith that an "overwhelming force of orcs has come south from the Mallum. Impossible to count. They are everywhere."

Bit by bit, Lustri goes silent. A week later, the same messages begin to fly from the spires of Occursion.

By this time the Urizen sentinels have rallied ... but they are horribly outnumbered. Whatever force is moving south through Zenith appears equally adept at fighting in the hills and peaks of Occursion as in the forests of Lustri. Eyewitnesses report thousands of orcs, marching under Druj banners, storming the spires of eastern Zenith. Each spire is given one opportunity to surrender. If they do not take it, then when the Druj overwhelm them one in five of the residents are brutally murdered, while the spire is looted and then burnt to the ground. The slain are impaled on spikes, left for the birds as a stark warning to others of the futility of resistance. As the true scale of the threat becomes clear, many choose to flee before the Druj arrive. The orcs make no effort to catch them, happy to let them run and spread panic.

It is not just the spires that are their targets. The Starlight Drift is claimed, as is the Tower of the Fall, Origen's Rest, and a dozen other key mana sites, mines, forests, and especially herb gardens.

The defenders fall back to Endsmeet, only to discover that the spire is burdened with refugees seeking shelter. The resources of the magicians there are stretched to breaking point... and then the Druj arrive. Panic spreads. The magicians of Endsmeet try to rally the defenders, but to no avail.

The apparent commander of the Druj forces - an orc woman who stands beneath the banner of the basilisk - offers no opportunity to surrender. Instead, Druj catapults begin to fling balls of burning pitch against Endsmeet, and the Druj attack hell-bent on slaughtering everyone within. As the attack begins, the skies shift and change above the spire - a pall of obscuring night magic begins to spread across the entire territory.

Endsmeet falls.

The valiant defenders manage to buy enough time for many of the populace to flee, but the spire itself is gutted by fire. The library burns, the gardens burn, the towers are broken and defiled. Bodies scatter the elegant walkways like so many fallen leaves.

The survivors flee west, across the fields of Proceris.

And the Druj follow close behind.

Game Information Zenith

Lustri has fallen. Occursion has fallen. Proceris is under attack. The spire of Endsmeet has fallen...

The Druj take two regions of Zenith and are about a tenth of the way toward taking a third. The Druj (presumably) have raised a powerful Penumbral Veil over Zenith, a night magic effect of magnitude 38 (according to the magicians of Zenith). What else they might have done is impossible to say at this point - there are no reliable reports of activity in the regions the Druj have conquered, and nobody in a position to get any before the summit begins.

Any character from Endsmeet is free to roleplay they were present during the defence, but they will have been forced to retreat before the spire fell. Any such character who wishes to have died at the hands of the Druj is of course free to do so. Furthermore, while we don't track personal resources by region, if any character from Endsmeet wishes to roleplay that their personal resource has been captured or destroyed by the Druj, they can e-mail Profound Decisions and we will allow them to change to a new rank one resource without the usual two-crown transfer fee.

The sinecures "Starlight Drift", "Tower of the Fall", and "Origen's Rest" provide their usual production before this event, but going forward will produce nothing. The characters who had the titles associated with these sinecures retain those titles, and will start receiving production again if the regions are liberated from the Druj if they still have the titles (assuming the Druj do not repeat their tragic demolition of the Great Pits of Ennerlund, of course).

Participation : Zenith

Any character whose personal resource is in Zenith may choose to e-mail in to plot@profounddecisions.co.uk before the event and indicate they would like to begin play suffering the after-effects of a wound inflicted by the Druj. We will then put a card in your pack detailing the ongoing effects. As a word of warning, the Druj make extensive use of venom and disease when fighting the Empire, and several of those toxins are resistant to the application of the purify spell, being much closer in potency to a curse or traumatic wound than the venom spell-effect.

Major Conjunctions

The civil service has identified five major conjunctions of the Sentinel Gate that are expected to be available during the coming summit.

On Saturday, three major conjunctions have been identified - but the heroes of the Empire will only be able to take advantage of one of them. Two open in different parts of West Ranging, in north-western Liathaven. The third opens in Green March, in north-western Mournwold. The civil service are still compiling notes, but anticipate that the Liathaven opportunities at least most likely provide opportunities to assist the Black Thorns in some way; they are uncertain as to the advantage offered by the Mournwold conjunction.

On Sunday, two conjunctions have been identified in the Eastern empire - but again only one can be taken advantage of. One opens in Spiral, in southern Ossuary, near the border with Screed. The other opens in Zenith, in the Proceris farmland, not far from the southern border. The Ossuary conjunction offers an opportunity to engage Grendel soldiers, while the advantage of the Zenith conjunction is less clear but may have to do with a Grendel advance force that seems to be closing in on refugees from Endsmeet.

In addition to these major conjunctions, the civil service report a number of smaller, more traditional conjunctions that all seem to open into locations west of Sermersuaq that seem to culminate in a significant conjunction on Saturday evening, one suitable for a use by a large force of Imperial heroes (OOC: a skirmish against the Jotun).

By the time of the Summer Solstice summit, the civil service will have completed reports for each of the five major conjunctions, which will be presented to the generals during the Muster. The final decision about which two major conjunctions to exploit, and who will take part in the battles, is the heavy responsibility of the generals alone.

381YE Winter Solstice winds of fortune

Overview

Over the past three months, several events have occurred which are of significance to the Empire and may require a response from her champions. You can also read about the progress of the Empire's military campaigns here.

In each case, we've tried to tag the Winds of Fortune entry with the nations, or political bodies, to which it is most relevant. We've done this to help people who are interested only in events that are especially relevant to them. In no way are these tags intended to be exhaustive; the Empire is a complex place and very little happens in isolation.

As always, how much or how little of this information you choose to know in character is up to you. Part of the purpose of Winds of Fortune is to maintain the illusion of the Empire as a living, breathing place where things happen - and to make players aware of things their characters 'should' know based on what their roleplaying says they have been doing for the past three months.

Many winds of fortune open with a short section of in-character text. In all cases, these pieces are intended to help create an atmosphere and provide a little entertainment. Where they contain opinions, those are the opinions of the fictional people depicted - and where they contain information or rumours the assumption is that the reader will create their own context for that information or gossip. They're mostly just a bit of fun and they tend not to contain anything vital to the understanding of the wind of Fortune.

Winds of Fortune

All Work Together

- Imperial Synod

Following a period of turmoil and religious conflict, it may be time for cooler heads to prevail. A judgement by Nina of Cantiarth's Hold leads to a mandate that suggests that the Synod should encourage the Empire to embrace the Way, and turn away from heterodoxy, heresy, and blasphemy. You can learn about this mandate here.

Better World

- Fleet captains, Imperial Synod, owners of mana sites

Two major announcements have come out of the Principalities of Jarm over the last season. In Rigia, the provincial capital of the Eastern Alliance, Magician-Prince Barbara Radz has announced radical reforms to the treatment of slaves in her principality - and made membership of the alliance contingent on adopting these reforms among the other Princes. At the same time, a powerful cabal of princes from Northern Jarm have announced their intention to make a unique substance - beloye zerno - available to Imperial magicians which has significant implications for anyone who owns a mana site. You can learn about these international developments here.

- Dawn

Last season, having completed their conquest of the Barrens, the Druj struck deep into Semmerholm. They conquered Axmure and destroyed the Gate. With the fortification gone, the Druj were certain to press the advantage, and the nation collectively held its breath as the fate of Semmerholm hung in the balance. Dawn has never lost a territory to the barbarians - was this the moment that proud boast would fail? No. It was not. And you can learn about the fervour that has swept across Dawn in the wake of that boast being upheld here.

Chain Around My Leg

- Imperial Orcs. Arguably Varushkans, Wintermark, and Temeschwari should not read this wind of fortune so it comes as a nice surprise.

The Winter Sun have spent the last season in Casinea, resupplying and seeking a stronger connection with their ancestors via an experimental ritual and the use of a unique relic called Defiance. You can learn about the consequences of his action here.

Dusty Old Dust (Trade Winds)

- Fleet captains, ambassadors, traders

The Empire does not exist in isolation; with four fractious neighbours and five great powers overseas, international trade and diplomacy is an ever shifting sea of opportunity and obstacle. You can read about current Imperial relations with foreign powers here.

Foggy Mountain Top (Winds of Magic)

- Magicians and Imperial Conclave primarily, but there is something for everyone here

The stars are back! This news, and a round up of magical effects and eternal-related activities, can be found here.

Froggy Went A'Courting

- People interested in orc diplomacy

The Thule in Otkodov, the Great Forest Orcs in Therunin, and the Grendel on the Bay of Catazar. Three tribes of orcs, each with their own relationship to the Empire. You can learn about recent developments with these orc tribes here.

House of Earth

- Marchers, especially Mournwolders; Imperial Orcs;; Senate, Synod, Military Council

Not all the Jotun have left the Mournwold. There remain significant numbers of orc former-thralls living throughout the Mourn. Large numbers of them fled west marching with the Jotun armies as they retreated before the Empire's advance, but many remained behind. And now the question is what to be done with them. The problems presented by this population of orcs - and some potential solutions - are outlined here.

Fly High

- The League

Over the last season, three grand construction projects in the League have been completed: the Blood Red Roads, in all their glory; the long-delayed Grand Park of Holberg; and a series of red stone monoliths that now focus and enhance the flows of mana through each of the four League territories.- magical monuments to the virtue of Lorenzo Macelliao von Temeschwar. These great works have quite inspired the people of the League, and opportunities abound! You can learn more about them - and about a potent new street drug - here.

The Flood and the Storm

- Imperial magicians; Wintermark, Urizen, Navarr, Varushka.

The difficulties Imperial magicians have been experiencing accessing the power of regio aligned with Spring have ended as abruptly as they began. Not only can magicians draw on regio to empower Spring magic again, but the magic seems to be in flood - leading not only to some opportunities for new commissions but also to the chance to make risky decisions when performing powerful rituals. You can learn about the situation here.

Hard Times

- The Brass Coast, the Imperial Senate, potentially many others

Some two hundred men and women have appeared in southern Feroz, revolutionaries fleeing from the lands of Duke Guiscard of the Iron Confederacy. Escaped slaves, they have built makeshift camps and are engaging in periodic raids across the border into Kalino. You can learn more about this complex diplomatic and political situation here.

Poor Boy

- the Brass Coast, magicians, and astronomancers.

Anvil is a bustling centre of commerce, as well as politics. Merchants, traders, entrepreneurs, and chancers alike are drawn to the Winter Summit looking for opportunities to buy and sell. A youth with a unique pearl; a seeker after celestial knowledge; a naval treasure; and a foreign jeweler are all described here.

Right Now (Conjunctions)

- Lorenzo de la Lupe; Imperial champions, especially from Wintermark, Dawn, and the Marches

Late breaking news - a collision in Sarvos, drowned dead in Sermersuaq, and raiding Feni in Hahnmark and Upwold among others. You can learn about these tumultuous events, and the conjunctions of the Sentinel Gate associated with them here.

Root Hog, or Die

- Navarr, Bregas, Military Council

The vallorn of Liathaven is on the move, flexing and shifting. If nothing is done, it will consume all of West Ranging before its aberrant vitality subsides. At the same time, eerie mists bring the seeds of peculiar short-lived plants to the farmers of Bregasland, rich with fecund power. You can read more about this situation here.

Sing Your Name

- Highguard, Imperial Synod, potentially the Military Council

The Heirs of Lepidus have completed another significant piece of research that conclusively proves the Silent Sentinel, the oldest and ugliest fortification in the Empire, is also the likely habitation of the enigmatic paragon known as the Sentinel. If the Imperial Synod is interested there are opportunities to celebrate this new revelation in a way that aids the entire Empire - and the assembly of Vigilance as well perhaps. You can find more about this opportunity here.

Sowing on the Mountains

- Varushka primarily, but also some elements of interest to the Navarr, the Courage assembly, and potentially the Military Council

A once-in-a-century storm has raged across the northern mountains of Varushka, subtly shifting the terrain as torrential flood waters lead to mudslides and rockslides and all sorts of realignment of earth and water. As the storms abate, a quartet of intriguing opportunities to build from destruction present themselves. You can learn about these opportunities here.

Talking Sailor

- Fleet captains, Imperial Senate

With the destruction of the Freeborn Storm, the Grendel have effectively gained military domination of the Bay of Catazaar, contested only by a handful of brave Imperial captains. With their efforts to attack the fishing fleet stymied so effectively the pirates of the Broken Shore are looking for new prey. Urged on by the blood-thirsty eternal Siakha, their next target is the trading fleet. At the same time, there has been an upswell of interest in finding out exactly where the Grendel are along the Bay, with an eye towards taking the battle to them in some way. You can find out about both situations here.

This Land is Your Land

- Marchers, especially in Mournwold; sections very relevant to Imperial Orcs, Senate, Military Council, and Synod

The Jotun have fled the Mournwold, driven out by a combination of Imperial armies and Imperial magic. But lingering resentment remains in the hearts of many who dwell, a bitter legacy of the malevolent magic used to break the Jotun. Determined to seek amends, the people of the Mourn selected three representatives to take their concerns to Anvil in person. They were sent with a list of demands so see if they could get some recompense for the wrongs done. Nobody expected to get everything they had demanded - but "Things turn up for one who digs", as they say ... and you can learn about what has turned up here.

What Did The Deep Say? (Plenipotentiary)

- Imperial Conclave

Four eternals have requested formal parleys for Three eternals have requested formal parley with an archmage, and one has agreed to a meeting but specifically refused to do so under its aegis. You can learn which eternals have responded, and the matters they wish to discuss here.

You Know the Night

- Imperial Orcs, Varushka, General Assembly

The debate between those who believe cruelty and fear are weapons the Empire should use, and those who mandate a more heroic path, continues. The Imperial Orcs have chosen the heroic path; the Varushkans have the opportunity to remind the Empire once again that they are who they are. You can learn about the current stage of the disagreement here.

Roundup

This section contains information that is potentially relevant, but doesn't merit its own Wind of Fortune.

Zemress Islanders

Mazo i Zabala i Erigo of the the Freeborn Assembly raised a statement of principle that the exiles from the Isle of Zemress should settle in Segura. Since the Autumn Equinox they have been working to establish a home for their extended family in that territory. It is anticipated that they will have settled in by the Spring Equinox.

Lorenzo the Builder

The Blood Red Roads will connect the people of the Empire and make them stronger. This project is one of the most Ambitious in Imperial history. It demonstrates the Benevolence of Lorenzo "La Volpe" Macelliao von Temeschwar, and will stand as a lasting Legacy. We send Jonah Yakovitch with 25 liao to encourage the faithful to aid in this endeavour.

Jonah Yakovitch, League Assembly, Autumn 381YE, Upheld 508-165

Thanks to the inspirational preaching of Jonah Yakovitch, supported by the League Assembly, the Butcher's Benevolence - the Blood Red Roads are complete. The four cities of the League have been connected by a series of broad highways, and the roads extended to Stockland, Kalpaheim, Delev, Siroc, and Holt in Miaren. The roads will bring prosperity to each territory they pass through, and there is already a plan afoot to extend the south-western roads to include the Freeborn trade town of Anduz.

Not content with the Blood Red Roads, work has also been completed on an extensive series of red stone monoliths in Holberg, Temeschwar, Tassato, and Sarvos designed to focus and enhance the flows of mana through the League territories. There has been some controversy - the Asavean architect Almodin Oktistis, priest of the Builder, has put his own unique stamp on the monoliths in Temeschwar and Tassato. Lorenzo watchers are waiting with interest to see what project the visionary designer will turn his hand to next.

Hordalant Spy Network

Over the last three months, the Jotun orcs have dismantled the Hordalant spy network. It will no longer be possible to assign a military unit to it.

Mandates

Five mandates were successfully upheld in the Imperial Synod. You can find the details of all the mandates, along with the rest of the Synod judgements, here.

Assembly	Mandate	Priest	Outcome
Wintermark	A hero's tale ends with a good death - for us or our enemies. We send Gunnbrand Ironwill with 25 liao to urge our warriors to face the Jotun on the battlefield as heroes, and strive with every sinew for victory, not for slaughter. Thus will we let the grinnir of either side treat their fallen	Gunnbrand Ironwill	The tactics of the Wintermark armies will be changed for the next four seasons.
Highguard	We cannot prove for certain if Yael was the first Empress reborn or not. Regardless of this and no matter who Yael was, the Land without Tears is not part of doctrine and preaching it as such is Heresy. We refute the claim of the Land without Tears and encourage our citizens to look to only those Doctrines which have been debated and agreed upon by the Synod rather than allowing one figure to tear our faith and our Empire apart. We the priests of Highguard send Melchior of Adina's Charge with 250 Liao to spread this message to the citizens of Highguard.	Melchior of Adina's Charge	Will heal the effects of the Yaelian Schism
Navarr	The Navarr assembly send Tynan Lonestriker with 25 Liao to urge Navarr apothecaries, physicks and brokers to share what herbs they can spare with our guests and allies.	Tynan Lonestriker	Grants aid to the orcs of Therunin
Brass Coast	All things can have a price. We send Gonzalo i Riqueza, known as "Lupo" with 25 liao to remind people of their prosperity as well as their courage and to take a ransom from those foes we defeat rather than count their bodies. We will fill our souls with virtue and our pouches with coin.	Gonzalo i Riqueza	The quality of the Red Wind Corsairs will be improved.
General	The Blood Red Roads will connect the people of the Empire and make them stronger. This project is one of the most Ambitious in Imperial history. It demonstrates the Benevolence of Lorenzo "La Volpe" Macelliao von Temeschwar, and will stand as a lasting Legacy. We send Jonah Yakovitch with 25 liao to encourage the faithful to aid in this endeavour.	Jonah Yakovitch	The Blood Red Roads will be completed at the start of the Winter Solstice.

Imperial Lore

The rituals Combing the Beach, Ride the Noble Steed, and Aid Once More have been added to Imperial Lore and any Imperial magician may master them following the normal rules.

381YE Winter Solstice winds of war

Overview

The Empire is at war; it is difficult to remember a time when it was not.

In Zenith, a catastrophic flood washes out the farms of Proceris, and the Druj destroy what they cannot control. Three Highborn armies face off against the eastern orcs; while the Druj consolidate the land they have already claimed, they do not advance. Zenith rests on a knife-edge, and the smallest victory by the savage orcs will tip it into their control.

North of Zenith, the defence of Semmerholm sees the armies of Dawn defeat the Druj, supported by both supernatural agents from the Summer realm and the heroes of Wintermark. Immense amounts of blood are spilled - eight thousand humans and orcs are killed or crippled beyond recovery. The Druj are pushed south, but they are not driven from the territory and seem to have plans of their own.

In the south-east, Imperial forces assault the Black Plateau. The Grendel defend, but the Empire slowly pushes them back. As great danger as the two clashing armies is the Plateau itself - its malignant influence spreads across the territory driving some to madness and death. It is getting worse...

Far to the west, the liberation of Mournwold is completed. The Jotun have retreated entirely, and the Marcher armies have claimed the last inch of the Mourn for their people with the aid of the Navarr soldiers of the Quiet Step. For all their victory on the battlefield, however, the political situation in Mournwold remains tense. The people are not entirely happy.

On the cold tundra of Sermersuaq, and on the arid plains of Segura, Jotun champions are engaged in strategy that seems aimed at smoothing the way for their armies to invade. Rather than send their massed troops against the Empire this season, the Jotun have dispatched raiders and scouts under the banners of their kirkja and their respected champions.

Finally, in Madruga, the Grendel armada has destroyed the Freeborn Storm, and brought the Black Thorns to the brink of annihilation. Half the coast of the Freeborn territory is in their hands, and they have captured the birthplace of the Brass Coast itself - Atalaya.

Chaos and death all around. The civil service study the Sentinel Gate in Anvil, and compose their reports for the Military Council. Soon the heroes of the Empire will have a chance to make a difference. The only question remains where will they make that difference?

Hunting By The Rivers

During the Autumn Equinox, the Druj forces in Zenith moved against the Golden Cascade. The Seventh Wave will not fail. We will not allow Zenith to be taken. Our foe may have numbers but we will not fall and we will not fail.

powerful ritual magic, and great polished General of the Seventh Wave mirrors that ensured the fields received as much sunlight as possible all year round. The Golden Cascade was seen by many as a wonder of the Empire. Now it is gone.

The eastern orcs turned a monstrous marshwalker loose against the great dam that controlled the flow of water to the terraced farms. The creature tore the white granite wall apart, unleashing a deluge of freezing water across the foothills - a devastating flash flood that swept away everything in its path. The farms are ruined, the aqueducts shattered, the great golden mirrors cast down. Thousands of ushabti are destroyed and scores of farmers drowned in the relentless flood.

The catastrophe is epic in scale; many refugees fleeing across the plains from Lustri and Occursion are caught by the waves of water, and those who manage to find higher ground are easy prey for the murderous Druj. The Highborn armies defending Zenith - Seventh Wave, Granite Pillar, and Valiant Pegasus - are forced to withdraw, barely making it out of Proceris before the disaster strikes. The Druj armies, expertly positioned and well-practiced in the art of fighting in treacherous, boggy conditions, sweep in behind the flood claiming the defences the Highborn have abandoned.

If there is a single bright side to the disaster, it is that the cold water from the mountains is surprisingly pure even after it has swept across the plains. Indeed, under the noonday sun the water seems to sparkle with a hard-to-define golden radiance. A potent enchantment has been lain across Zenith that purifies liquids of all sorts, separating off any corruption or poison. The Urizen fleeing the Druj have no lack of fresh drinking water, and the potent magic also serves as a measure of protection from envenomed blades and infected wounds.

The people of Urizen need us now more than ever! The venomous water has been purified and we must hold the last region! We make a strategic defence of Zenith and coordinate with both the Seventh Wave and Valiant Pegasus. Hold your ground!

General of the Granite Pillar

The Golden Cascade is a significant loss, but it is not the only blow to the people of Urizen. The Druj also overrun the Arch of the Sky, a collection of spires on the tallest mountain in Zenith, where stargazers from all of the Empire once gathered to discuss and debate the Net of the Heavens, comparing their astral observations to the history and present state of the Empire and the wider world. The Druj flood waters do not reach the spire itself of course, but even as the dam is being smashed apart Druj guerillas are moving into position. Many of the astronomancers and star-watchers have already retreated, but a handful of magicians and sentinels remain behind in the hope of holding the orcs at bay. Such hope is in vain. The eastern orcs take and loot the spires, and before turning their attention back to the flooded plains they burn the proud observatories and libraries. What they cannot take with them is reduced to ashes.

Everywhere the citizens of eastern Zenith flee west. Those who can make it to the foothills in the west, where the Seventh Wave wait, are safe. Those left behind meet grim fates. Hunted, enslaved, tormented ... the Druj are savage and without mercy. The barbarians seem to treat the pursuit almost as a game, taking grim pleasure in peppering the fleeing Urizen with arrows in the last moments before they reach sanctuary. The Highborn do what they can, but all too few manage to escape the combination of floodwater and Druj malice.

The general of one of the orc armies, those who fight beneath the banner of the crimson snake, takes great pleasure in tying prisoners to stakes on low ground, leaving them to starve to death or drown in the flood waters in full view of Highborn positions - as bait. Some of them are rescued, but many of those who attempt such rescues are captured by the Druj and staked out in their turn.

A week or so after the Equinox there is a moment of uncertainty for the Druj when two Freeborn armies march through the grand pass from Spiral known as the Twilight Gate. The broad pass through the mountains allows the Red Wind Corsairs and the Fire of the South to avoid the worst of the destruction, and there are many mariners and corsairs among the soldiers who are able to employ their professional skills to craft makeshift rafts when they have to. The Druj launch a few probing strikes against the soldiers of the Brass Coast - but these cautious attacks are easily shrugged off. The Freeborn are not here to fight - they quickly pass through Proceris, and without pause push on westward through Clypion and Iteri, and then south into Redoubt.

The Druj consolidate their gains, but the armies do not press beyond Proceris. That is not to say that there are no Druj in Clypion - there are small groups of scouts, guerillas, and even assassins who move quietly through the hills but the vigilance of the Granite Pillar prevents them from achieving more than a few minor acts of banditry and barbarism. While the Highborn still hold Clypion, the westernmost region of Iteri is relatively safe.

Several spires there have taken in cousins and friends from the conquered western territories, but the Urizen are not well-suited for dealing with displaced population. Too many people in too small a space, drawing on too sparse a supply of food ... The Valiant Pegasus offer what aid they can, and set up makeshift camps to house the refugees, but many prefer to continue north into Morrow looking for somewhere to stay among their own people.

Stand with our brothers and sisters and hold Zenith. Heal those who fall, both military and civilian. Fight with the virtue of the Highborn. We will not allow people to fall to the Druj.

General of the Valiant Pegasus

As the Winter Solstice draws near, the floodwaters have largely settled. The Druj have claimed almost all of Proceris - a concerted push against the remaining Highborn defences and they will control the entire sodden plain - and with it the territory of Zenith.

Game Information: Zenith

The Druj have further consolidated their hold on Lustri and Occursion, and hold nine-tenths of Proceris. The Highborn defenders along the western border of the region are all that stand between the Druj and control of Zenith.

The precise extent of the damage to Zenith is not clear at this time, but the Golden Cascades are utterly ruined. These farms represented a great work that provided a significant amount of food to the spires of eastern Urizen. Going forward, all farms in Zenith suffer a penalty of 18 rings production each season due to the lack of good quality farmland in the wake of the catastrophe. Furthermore, attempts to build a fortification in Proceris are likely to encounter additional costs and difficulties. It may be possible to counter these problems, but not until the current conflict with the Druj is settled.

Confirmation has been received from refugees that the Druj have destroyed the Starlight Drift of Shimmering Snow, the Tower of the Fall, the Storm Vault, and Origen's Rest. The titles associated with these sinecures still exist, but provide no benefits. If the sinecures were rebuilt (assuming the Druj are driven out of Zenith), the current holders would resume their posts. Alternatively, if the current title holders had stepped down in the interim, the normal methods of appointment would apply.

The Memories Scarred

Steadily, mile by mile, the Marchers and their Navarr allies advance across the Mournwold. The last few scattered Jotun in Southmoor fall back into Liathaven before the first Imperial soldiers reach them. With a vital extra season to evacuate their thralls, the fields of Southmoor are eerily empty. A scattering of orcs are all that remain, the human thralls having long since moved to greener pastures in other parts of the Mourn.

Southmoor was the last region lost to the Jotun during the original invasion, and is the last to be freed. The final major settlement to be liberated is old Sarcombe, perhaps appropriately. Once a prosperous Marcher town, trading with the Navarr in Liathaven, it was broken to ruins during the fighting three decades ago. It has long since been transformed into a fortified Jotun hall keeping a careful watch east, to the Greensward, and to Tassato. Some of the town buildings still stand, but the castle that surmounted it is no more. The western orcs have torn Hillstop down themselves, rather than allow it to fall into the hands of the Empire. The once rich market town of Sarcombe is a broken ruin again.

Soldiers of the Stong Reeds, the time has come to finish what has been started ... it is time to end the campaign in the Mournwold. For the Marches and for the Empire!!

General of the Strong Reeds

The story is the same in Green March. There are a handful of Jotun warbands that are still in the process of retreating from the Mourn, but they mostly fall back as soon as they see the slightest sign of Imperial forces. Again, not many thralls have been left behind - scattered families of stubborn humans and a smattering of orc thralls who seem to have picked up their neighbour's grim determination to hang on to "their" land.

Right soldiers, WE FINISH THIS. Our boots will tread the fields so our landskeepers can once again take the lands of the marcher soil of mournwold. ... Share your rations with the newly liberated marchers, and save your best goole fledged arrows for the Jotun. Our work starts in Southmoor and we don't stop 'til we see the Green March back in our control!

General of the Tusks

Their masters lacked the time, or the spirit, to argue with them, abandoning them as they retreated.

Most of the Mournwolders who remain tend to be older - men and women in their forties and fifties who still remember life as part of the Empire. Some of the young people have left with the Jotun, following the only life they have ever known. Of the very old and the very young, there are all too few, a bitter legacy of the curses that were used to retake the land from the orcs.

Thorns, the Jotun have been harried by our forces in Liathaven. They will come to drive us out, but will not find us. We march to the Mournwold ... and will carve a new road to Liaven's Glen. As we pass through Kharaman, expect to take on a reinforcement of materials for our apothecaries and vates which were made possible by the aid of the Spider King, whose support of the Nation earns our gratitude.

General of the Quiet Step

Navarr magicians - and by creatures that are clearly neither human nor orc. A few worried landskeepers opine that these are heralds of the Spring realm, but what they are doing with the Quiet Step is difficult to say. The Quiet Step seem almost disappointed that there are no Jotun to slay. Whatever private business it is that they are about they are given a

The Marchers are not the only soldiers in Mournwold. The Navarr of the Quiet Step march up through the Greensward to join in the liberation of the Mournwold, keen to secure the western borders and access to the forests of their own conquered territories. There is something peculiar at work among the thorns and brands, however. Something supernatural. The army is accompanied by a larger-than-usual number of vates - the elite wide berth by the citizens of the Mournwold.

Finally, at High Courage, the remains of a hastily abandoned camp are found. A mournful red and black banner, the banner of Gudmundur Arason, Jarl-of-Jarls, King of Narkyst, flutters before the great stag statue. A reminder and a promise, perhaps.

Good Bounders last season we returned the Mourn to Imperial control. This season we finish the job. Push the last of the Jotun from our lands; let the beaters once again beat the bounds of all the Marches. Look to our landskeepers and our physicks to heal the land and the people as we advance streadily to regain our borders.

Now then my merry lads and lasses, the end is nigh and the job is almost done. One last push, one last effort and the entirety of the Mournwold will return to its people. The Jotun have demolished Hillstop, their armies have fled and we are now unopposed. Let our steady advance take the first marcher army to the borders of Liathaven. First Southmoor and finally onto Green March, that is where we march. So long as no Jotun oppose us, I want the wealth of Mitwold to fill our coffers and use this opportunity to rearm and re-equip.

General of the Drakes

Empire. The civil service are still looking into the possibilities of rebuilding Hillstop, the Tribute, and Orchard's Watch now that the Jotun have fled. They are also compiling a list of spoils of war to present to the Imperial Military Council, and may also suggest other opportunities to help restore the Mournwold.

The Quiet Step has permanently changed it's army quality from scouting to cunning.

The political situation in the Mournwold is still uncertain, however. Some steps have been taken to address their concerns, such as the commission of several fortifications, for example, but the Singing Caves still remains unallocated by the Imperial Senate. There will be further updates about the situation in the Mourn in Winds of Fortune, but for now the situation remains tense.

Living in the Night

During the Autumn Equinox the Grendel sent an elite warband to collapse the Crow Road, the pass connecting Willstone in Redoubt with Cinon. Had they succeeded, the Imperial forces in Spiral would have risked becoming trapped, cut off from support, and easy prey for their barbarian opponents. Thanks to the swift intervention of Imperial heroes, the salt lords' strategy was stymied. Control of the pass proves crucial in the coming weeks. With the pass open, the Towerjacks are able to withdraw toward Sarvos to resupply, and the Green Shield and Iron Helms are able to move down to support the Imperial forces still engaged in Spiral.

It also allows the Fire of the South and the Red Wind Corsairs to make a daring march from their isolated position in northern Ossuary. They push north through the Twilight Gate, skirting the Druj armies in sodden Proceris, and coming round through Zenith and Redoubt to join the main Imperial force in Cinon. They are joined, to the surprise of many, by a small force from Axos. Three hundred agema and toxatai, under the command of Circe Icastos, daughter of General Dancia of Ipotavo. The skirmishers are newly arrived, having chartered swift vessels with the assistance of the Imperial ambassador to Axos. They are quiet, grim faced, and keep themselves to themselves. On reaching Spiral, they immediately present themselves to General Nicassia of the Citadel Guard - they are here to repay a debt to the Urizen who helped defend Ipotavo against the Druj.

Once again we will be engaging in daring and devastating raids against our foes. We are traveling north into Zenith, swinging south west into Redoubt and joining the rest of the Imperial armies back in Spiral. There we will plunder our foes, rushing for screed, carry on bleeding them dry, and make these accursed Grendel realise this is not a war they can profit from! Fight for the Empress, fight for the Freeborn, fight for the Empire! But be careful of the Black Plateau, it's a bit shit there!

General of the Red Wind Corsairs

They are quiet, grim faced, and keep themselves to themselves. On reaching Spiral, they immediately present themselves to General Nicassia of the Citadel Guard - they are here to repay a debt to the Urizen who helped defend Ipotavo against the Druj.

For nearly a month, though, the Wolves of War and the Citadel Guard hold Spiral alone against the combined might of the Grendel armies. They are not idle while they wait for their reinforcements; withdrawing soldiers from Ateri and Ossuary, they begin to slowly move south-east into the very heart of Spiral itself; the barren plains of Screed at the centre of which squats the malign presence of the Black Plateau.

Game Information : Mournwold

The Marchers, and thus the Empire, now control all of Mournwold. There is no significant opposition - the Drakes for example are in a position to benefit from their popular support and actually able to resupply while on active campaign.

Despite the best efforts of the Jotun, the castle at old Sarcombe - what the Jotun once called Hillstop - could probably be rebuilt by the

to present to the Imperial Military Council, and may also suggest other opportunities to help restore the Mournwold.

The Quiet Step has permanently changed it's army quality from scouting to cunning.

The political situation in the Mournwold is still uncertain, however. Some steps have been taken to address their concerns, such as the commission of several fortifications, for example, but the Singing Caves still remains unallocated by the Imperial Senate. There will be further updates about the situation in the Mourn in Winds of Fortune, but for now the situation remains tense.

The Grendel have effectively controlled Screed for nearly thirty years, sweeping across it largely uncontested in the final weeks of their original invasion, then again in the Summer of 379YE. There have been skirmishes, of course, but there has never been a significant military engagement in Screed between the Empire and the barbarians. Until now.

The Fire of the South, the Citadel Guard, and the Green Shields push slowly forwards south and east, carefully conserving their strength. The physicks and magicians who accompany them, bolstered by a number of priests, focus their attention on preserving the lives of their fellow soldiers - their lives and their spirits as well, perhaps. The Black Plateau continues to grumble. Everyone in Screed seems supernaturally aware of its location at all time - even when they cannot physically see it they know exactly where it is, and cannot shake the fearful impression that it is watching them. Some sensitive souls find the experience goes beyond unnerving and becomes unbearable.

Fire of the South, fastest army of the Empire, your fleetness is required once again. We will march north into Zenith, passing by the Highborn, southwest into redoubt, and then swing into spiral once more. Alongside the other Imperial armies we will enact a Steady conquest of Spiral, pushing for Screed and the Northwest Black Plateau. Our friends in Urizen fight against the Grendel occupation, we will come to their aid. The Grendel had a great victory over our navy. Let's give them a defeat that will make them fear the freeborn once more.

General of the Fire of the South

The disquiet is exacerbated by the presence of both the Iron Helms and the thousand shambling husks fighting alongside the Green Shields. The corpses ridden by flesh-hungry spirits of the Wasteland seem ... agitated ... by Screed. They are more vicious, and a little harder to control. Something about this place, about the gloom that pervades the arid valleys, makes them irritable. More brutal. Crueler. They rarely wait for their opponents to die before they start feeding on them, and it takes a strong will to call them off once the battle is engaged. There are even a few reports of incidents where the hungry dead have snapped at Imperial soldiers - never those of the Green Shield, but the warriors of the other armies begin to give the Wintermark force a wide berth.

The main bulk of the Imperial force is represented by the Wolves of War. Supported by nearly nine thousand additional troops lead by independent captains, their forces outnumber the other three armies put together. They are further supported by heavily armoured cohorts drawn from the Free Companies, and by a significant force of heavily armoured Imperial Orc reavers. The mercenaries are in the van, leading a steady grinding advance across Screed, consolidating gains and fortifying the Imperial position as they go.

Last season this army was led by the Imperatrix. Inspired by her mandate to preserve life we shall implacably advance into screed then onward into Ossuary. Bound as we are by common cause, all that fight alongside the wolves, be they citizens of the Empire or foreign mercenaries shall be treated with utmost respect. For this season we are one. All wounded and dead will be recovered and with reverence and respect returned to their people.

General of the Wolves of War

The Iron Helms balance the need to claim ground with the desire to kill the southern orcs. Since the Fire of the South, Red Wind Corsairs, and the Green Shields will not fight alongside them; the Helms move north supported by the Wolves of War and Citadel Guard, while the main Imperial force sweeps south around the Black Plateau. The Varushkan army keeps their cruelty carefully leashed, but the Grendel are in no doubt as to their presence. Their dark banners, and the cloud of carrion birds that drift in their wake would be warning enough, but the presence of the Black Plateau seems to make their advance even more pronounced. They are a terror in the night, and not only for the barbarians; some Imperials speak in hushed tones of sweaty nightmares in which they were devoured by red-eyed soot-black hounds with iron teeth.

With most of the Imperial forces focused on claiming ground and preserving the lives of their soldiers, the Red Wind Corsairs enthusiastically seek opportunities to engage the Grendel directly. Coming after the successful raid against the Legacy last season, spirits are high and even the brooding malignancy of the Black Plateau can do little to quash them. With the words of the Freeborn assembly ringing in their ears, they launch daring raids against the Grendel supply camps. Their target is the wealth the orcs have accumulated there - crystal mana, magical ore, and the valuables stolen from conquered spires. More than a few, following the lead of the priests, take the opportunity to capture Grendel officers and ransom them back to their commanders for a healthy profit.

The orcs of the Broken Shore are a little on the back foot; their main forces are focused in Ateri, Ankra, and Ossuary. The main Grendel presence in Screed appears to be a dozen or so fortified camps, mostly built around captured Urizen spires. Scattered in a wide ring around the edges of Screed, they serve as supply depots and watchposts rather than significant fortifications. The first handful fall to the Empire before the Grendel can move their armies in to defend the others. There seems to be no significant Grendel force near the Black Plateau itself, and they are loath to engage the Empire in it's shadow - and truth be told, the soldiers of the Empire are no keener than the barbarians to get close to it.

Over the next few months, there are countless engagements between the Empire and the Grendel armies. Wherever possible, the barbarians try to control the battleground - falling back to defensive positions, moving through Ankra and Ateri to flank the Imperial advance, drawing their enemies into broken terrain the Grendel troops have previously scouted. Their eyes and ears are everywhere - adept scouts on both sides play a deadly game of cat and mouse through the foothills and barren valleys. But it is noticeable that their soldiers seem more cautious than normal, perhaps even a little more predictable - something has clearly put them on the defensive.

If we take the plateau we can start to heal our land. If we take Ossuary we will free our allies and take the Legacy. The heroes have kept the pass open, our allies support us. Fight for our home, and make me proud.

Citadel Guard

As the weeks wear on, the engagements become fewer in number but significantly more bloody. At first, probing raids from both sides are easily repulsed, but as the Empire takes more territory there is less room for the Grendel armies to manoeuvre. The two sides clash in larger and larger numbers.

There is more at work in Spiral than just humans and orcs fighting, however. This is Urizen, after all. Some far-ranging scouts from the Imperial armies make sorties far south as the coast. They bring back confusing reports of powerful magic at work in the waters of the Bay of Catazar. They talk of spires of razor-sharp rock and coral erupting from the sea floor, and of a thick sea fog that rises without warning full of dancing lights and large hard-to-see shapes. Vessels berthed at the rebuilt port of Apulus are protected, but the magic plays havoc with any vessel at sea off the coast of Spiral.

Indeed, the scouts also report that the port at Apulus is more than rebuilt - it is significantly fortified. The Grendel appear to have built a castle on the southern coast with almost supernatural speed, and are using the garrison there to support their troops in the defence of their conquered territories.

Yet these enchantments pale beside magic neither side controls. The Black Plateau itself is here - and it is gathering power. While Imperial forces have encountered its subtle, pervasive influence before they are not prepared for direct exposure to its madness. It seems to ebb and flow, and the dreams at least seem tied to the influence of the moon. On nights when the moon is dark, those who sleep in Screed experience dreams of despair and creeping paranoia. On nights when the moon is full and bright, their sleep is riven with dreams of blood and savagery flavoured by their darkest, hidden urges.

Heroes of the Green Shield, the bond of loyalty and friendship take us once again to Spiral. We have bled for comrades, have been tested in wars great storm, but the storm can never break us. So stand and take up your shields, solid for the people of Spiral. Stand take up your spears, to strike swift these unworthy foes.

The dreams are only part of it. Even with the sun at its height, there are the phantasms and delusions; sometimes a half-familiar voice whispers from the shadow inside an empty tent. Sometimes one seems to spot an old friend, an enemy, a loved one in a crowd. Odd certainties come from nowhere - one confused band of Freeborn scouts reports with absolute confidence a major Grendel force moving along a dry river bed that on further investigation seem to have existed only in their minds. This tragic tale comes with a grim warning - while moving to intercept the imaginary force the Freeborn soldiers are flanked by a very real Grendel army coming from the south, and the Red Wind Corsairs are badly bloodied before they can pull back to defensive positions. Two of the scouts take their own lives in grief and shame.

There is a rash of suicides - not only soldiers taking their own lives in despair but raging warriors hurling themselves with bloody abandon against their enemies without thought for their own survival. The madness is infectious - a whole warband might suddenly break rank and attack the enemy without support leaving their commanders with a handful of seconds to decide whether to abandon the plan and support their maddened troops or leave them to die at the hands of the enemy. There are reports of Urizen sentinels abandoning poise, mutilating and torturing captured Grendel prisoners. Of League captains withdrawing their forces in disarray convinced that at any moment they will be overwhelmed by imaginary monsters. Of a Wintermark patrol found dead at each other's hands, the lone survivor sobbing a broken tale of betrayal and suspicion that boiled over into murder around the camp fire.

The only positive is that the Empire are not alone in suffering the baleful touch of Screed; the Grendel generals seem to be having just as much difficulty controlling themselves and their troops as their opposite numbers in the Empire.

Dreadful as the insidious effects of Screed are, the situation could have been much worse. The majority of both orc and human armies have chosen defensive approaches intended to minimise loss of life and it is just as well that they do. It is noticeable that the Iron Helms and the Red Wind Corsairs suffer more losses to the pernicious influence of the accursed ground than the other Imperial armies.

Rod, and sword, and moon, and bow. We march to distant Urizen to repay a debt owed, to aid our western cousins as they have aided us. From the Throne of Day, Ipotavo watches, her eyes on those who act with certainty and reason.

Circe Icastos

Despite their caution, the Grendel armies do not give ground easily. They are not fighting to the death to defend the region but nor are they just falling back. It seems almost like a calculated effort to husband their resources, avoiding giving up any more land than they absolutely must while they wait for something. The Empire pushes them hard but by the time the next summit draws near the region itself remains in the hands of the orcs of the Broken Shore, and the only real change is the landscape itself. If the Black Plateau were grumbling before, now it is growling. If it was shifting restively in its sleep, now it is beginning to stir to wakefulness. But has it's appetite been sated by all the blood spilled... or merely whetted?

Game Information : Spiral

The Empire has made significant headway into Screed, but the Grendel still control the region. While everyone has been focused in the centre of Spiral, and the Grendel have been on the defensive, Imperial gains in Ankra (and their minor gains in Ossuary) have not been compromised - yet.

The influence of the Black Plateau has increased casualties suffered by both sides fighting in Spiral, and the situation appears to be getting worse. Anyone who wishes to roleplay there were present during the recent campaign is free to create their own horror stories of things they have encountered, based around themes of creeping fear, haunting phantasms, eerie dreams, gnawing suspicion, and outbursts of uncontrolled anger.

Furthermore, any Imperial general of one of the armies engaged in Spiral, and any character with a military unit assigned to support those armies, may e-mail plot@profounddecisions.co.uk and volunteer to have been more profoundly affected by the Black Plateau than their peers. They will begin the next game cursed with a powerful roleplaying effect that may significantly influence their behaviour. If your character does not meet these criteria (military unit assigned to support an army in Spiral), please do not e-mail in; this opportunity to be cursed is not available to those roleplaying they supported the army.

Finally, there are stone sea-spines and weird hypnotic fog rising off the southern coast that are playing havoc with shipping fleets. The spiny spikes fade with the coming of the Winter Solstice, but the odd mist and its peculiar lights show no signs of going away. Any fleet based in Spiral suffers a 50% penalty to its production this season, and will continue to do so as long as the seductive fog curse remains in place.

Where All Roads Meet

Immediately after the Autumn Equinox, the bulk of the Druj forces in Semmerholm push north into Estmure. They assault Estcastle, taking vicious pleasure in slaughtering as many Imperial Orcs as they can find. They raid Lacre, damaging the cathedral. They do not have things all their own way; a citadel of ice and basalt rises in the hills of Estmure, garrisoned by white-skinned knights in armour of living frost. The knights of Lacre and the orcs of Estcastle, along with a few scattered survivors from the fallen Gate, find sanctuary within the frigid halls. They rally against the Druj, who find their advance blunted by its adamantine walls.

Soldiers of the Pride, for the first time in our 100 years, four Dawnish armies march side by side into battle, each fighting to their strengths. We march to drive the Druj out of Dawnish lands. We will show them and warriors of the Summer Realm that fight with our forces that we can not just outfight but our out think and outmaneuver the Druj. By season's end Semmerholm will lie in Dawnish lands again. For glory. For Dawn. For the Empire!

General of the Gryphon's Pride

At the forefront of the force pushing toward the Semmerlak, and toward Holberg, are the Black Wind. For a short time free orcs of the Barrens, they abandoned their fellows to return to the Druj, heads bowed and glad of the yoke. They are very much changed from the time the soldiers of Dawn met them on the fields of the north-western Barrens. Aping their masters, they are cruel and barbarous beyond measure. They murder and torture without mercy, and those who fall into their hands die screaming, their broken bodies left bound to trees - as the orcs of the Barrens once bound the bodies of the Druj in the brief period they were free. Even the brave yeomen and knights of Dawn balk at facing the bitter vengeance of the Black Wind; where their black banners go the militias of Semmerholm flee.

A second force of Druj push westward into Ulvenholm. Smaller and more focused, these orcs advance under banners showing twisted yellow-eyed black lizards. There are a significant number of Vikari marching alongside them. They make a straight line for the Pits of Brychel, barely pausing to pillage the estates they pass. There are a few reports from the Navarr of Boar's Dell that this army is sending scouts south across the border, into Brocéliande, perhaps looking for something. Uncharacteristically, they

For the first time in over a century the four armies of Dawn will march as one. Arrayed with us the host of Summer and household soldiers of the nation our Triumphant Charge will sweep the filth of the Druj from our lands. Be heroes, let the troubadours sing for centuries to come of these days.

General of the Hounds of Glory retreat as soon as they see the thorns that defend the scattered steadings of the northern forest, avoiding any engagement. They are up to something ... but there are no clues as to what.

Two weeks after the Autumn Equinox, the armies of Dawn arrive.

All four armies - the Gryphons Pride the Hounds of Glory, the Eastern Sky, and the Golden Sun - march into Semmerholm. The first time they have been in one place, fighting the enemies of Dawn. The banners of the nobles of Dawn flutter above glorious knights caparisoned in shining plate; above war witches ready with shield and rod, and staff; above yeofolk archers and spear fighters in the colours of their house.

Alongside the armies march nine thousand elfin knights of the realm of Summer. Three cohorts of the supernatural soldiers of Eleonaris fight for Dawn. Three majestic champions of the Queen of the Fields of Glory march alongside the captains of the Gryphons Pride, Hounds of Glory, and Eastern Sky.

The anger has been tempered and prepared to be unleashed. Now the Eastern Sky will show the Druj what happens when Dawn is angered. For the first time in over 100 years, the four armies of Dawn fight together on one front. This is the moment of glory we have been waiting for and we will seize it

Eastern Sky

Dawn and their fey allies do not fight alone - the Fist of the Mountains, the heroic champions of Wintermark, fight with them. Allies come from further afield as well - four hundred Iron Confederacy soldiers fight beneath the black and silver banner of House de Coeurdefer alongside the Hounds of Glory. Grim faced nobles of the Duchy of Guiscard lead chain-shirted levies against the Druj. Far from home, they fight with a dour brutality, eschewing the blandishments of the enchanted knights that fight alongside the Dawnish. They fight with courage, but it is perhaps doubtful that these magic-hating foreigners will take a good report of the campaign back to Kalino with them.

The Gryphon's Pride push to conquer, engaging the Druj in Axmure and smashing their makeshift defences. The Hounds of Glory charge, and the Eastern Sky charge with them. Ten thousand nobles and yeomen of

The Golden Sun will march to Semmerholm to engage the Druj forces. We will be the anvil for our forces to hammer the Druj.

General of the Golden Sun

Dawn, six thousand warriors of Eleonaris. They crash against the Druj forces in Estmure in a furious wave, a hammer of gold, and steel, and azure. The orcs fall back almost immediately, and fall back again ... and then they attack. With poison blades, they launch ambush after ambush. War-witches, and yeofolk, and elfin knights alike fall beneath a withering hail of arrow-fire. Proud armoured nobles, ambushed by assassins, learn that their armour offers little protection against the poisonous thorns of the Druj. Bloody engagement after bloody engagement, the cost counted in the blood of Dawn.

One of the Druj armies attempts to flank the main force of the Dawnish, the orcs relying on their maneuverability and stealth to attempt to strike the Imperial forces from the rear. This strategy is barely effective against the aggressive Dawnish armies - but the Fist of the Mountains are another matter. Behind the main advance, the Winterfolk fight a bitter battle to keep the Druj contained, slaughtering their scouts and far-ranging raiders and protecting the scattered manors and estates of western Semmerholm. Their defensive positions make them easy prey for the fast moving army that fights beneath the banner of the hunting scorpion; the Fist of the Mountains are hammered from the flanks and from the rear by elite chikad and hupul, and when they try to respond their assailants melt back into the trees.

Battles between the Empire and the Druj rage back and forth across eastern Semmerholm for two months. The Imperial armies try to force the Druj to fight them in the open; the Druj try to force the Empire to engage them in the forests. Blood flows like bitter wine on both sides. In the end though, after eight weeks of relentless campaigning, the Druj are driven back. The Gryphons Pride leads the push south, mile by mile. The Druj armies retreat before them, falling back to the crude fortifications they have built around the ruined manors of southern Semmerholm.

When you get to Semmerholm, advance to contact with the enemy then make them pay for every inch of ground. Bleed the Druj, butcher them and leave their carrion for the crows. It has been an honour serving with you all. You are the finest army in the Empire, Heroes every one of you.

General of the Fist of the Mountains

The Druj are turned back, but they are not driven from Semmerholm. Yet for now their threat of conquest has been met, and soundly answered. The cost was high; the dead lie like fallen leaves beneath the trees of Axmure. Four-and-a-half thousand Imperial citizens will fight no more. Most are dead; some are so broken in spirit or body that they cannot be easily saved; others are lost, their fate unknown. Orc corpses lie among the fallen in equal numbers - all told at least eight thousand people have spilled their blood in the fight to drive the Druj from Semmerholm.

Game Information : Semmerholm

Imperial forces stop the Druj advance and push them back into southern Axmure. They still control the region but their hold is extremely tenuous. There are some reports of orc warriors in Unlvenholme as well, but this seems to be a guerilla force rather than a campaign army.

Everyone who fought in the Semmerholm campaign is aware of the monstrous presence of the Black Wind army - an army undertaking the merciless onslaught order. The Imperial forces luckily did not suffer enough casualties to bring them to the threshold where this tactic would have broken their armies, but many soldiers will suffer nightmares of the atrocities these savage barbarians inflicted on the people of Axmure and Estmure.

The presence of nine-thousand Knights of Glory and the Frozen Citadel of Cathan Canea, play a significant part in this victory, as did the bold strategy of the Dawnish generals. Without both factors, the Empire may well not have been victorious against the massed forces of the Druj. By contrast, while the defensive strategy of the Fist of the Mountain was effective at killing the Druj, and saving Imperial lives, it did nothing to push the orc armies back.

Participation

The presence of three cohorts of knights of glory, summoned by the magicians of Dawn, has not only had a significant effect on the campaign outcome. Any character whose military unit supported one of the three armies that fought alongside the heralds (Gryphon's Pride, Hounds of Glory, and Eastern Sky) may choose to begin the next event experiencing a roleplaying effect. You are filled with confidence; nothing is beyond you if you put your mind to it. Now is the time to act, to pursue goals you have been neglecting. Anyone who questions your prowess must be taught a quick lesson about the foolishness of doubting you.

Furthermore, if you are a changeling whose military unit supported one of the three armies, the roleplaying effect is much more pronounced. In addition, and if you have the hero skill you have an additional hero point for the duration of the event. Such characters may also use their experience of fighting alongside the knights of glory to permanently increase the strength of their lineage.

Please bear in mind that these opportunities are only available to characters whose military unit supported one of the three armies this downtime. You are free to roleplay you were present, as always, but you do not qualify for the additional hero point or the ability to increase your changeling lineage trappings.

Two Tales

Nothing Will Hold

As the Winter Solstice approaches, bitter winds blow down from the ice floes of Sermersuaq, cold enough to freeze a hunter's breath to their face. Only the hardest travellers are abroad in such conditions - or the most determined hunters. A few pass over the ice seeking seals and bears to provide for their halls, one last hunt before the worst of the winter storms begin. This brave handful of hunters are the first to spot the signs, and they hurry quickly southwards to warn their people.

The Jotun have come, and they have come in force.

Sermersuaq has been relatively peaceful these last three years - even while other territories in the Empire burned - but no more. Oh the western orcs have made their raids as always, and the business of the hylje prince and his skin caused some disruption, but not since the Senate made peace with the Thule three years ago has a threat like this entered the ancestral homeland of the Suaq.

At first there is incredulity. After the crushing defeat inflicted on the Jotun in the south, few expected them to come again in force so soon, and certainly not here. Not now. Sombre orders are given to the icewalkers and the scouts to spy out the approaching forces and asses the scale of the threat. Several tense days pass before the first news is brought back, stuttering words from exhausted men and women, and short notes tied to the legs of crows.

All the reports confirm there is a significant Jotun force in Stark. Significant... but not sizeable. Perhaps fifteen hundred Jotun warriors - surely no more than that. Not an army; no commander would be mad enough to commit an army so depleted to war against the Winterfolk. They march under a blue banner with a leaping silver fish emblazoned on it. An unusual device for the Jotun, whose totem beasts are usually more savage. They move cautiously - even allowing for the rough terrain and the poor weather - but they move with purpose. One keen-eyed scout, an old woman experienced in the hunts of war and peace alike, notes that the force seems to be entirely composed of warriors drawn from the Jotun kirkja. These elite fighting soldiers would normally represent a force that formed the backbone of a Jotun army - or a band of champions that might move swiftly to reinforce one.

Each day the certainty that the Jotun have a purpose grows. Scouts report heavy wooden bridges constructed across two narrow waterways. The Jotun have scouts of their own out, mapping out routes across the ice floes and pathfinders charting the best courses over the glaciers. There is news of temporary fortifications being erected, of large caches of supplies coming up behind the Jotun. The conclusion is unmistakable - these Jotun warriors are preparing the way for an invasion. This kind of sophisticated military operation is not easy to organise and implement - but if unchecked it would be a huge asset to any invading force, potentially meliorate the normal challenges facing an army attempting to create a beachhead in a land like Sermersuaq. It seems they have learned lessons from their attempts to invade the hallowed marshes of Kallavesa. There they trusted to their strength alone to carry the day - this time it appears they have adopted a far wiser strategy. In truth it is hard for the canny Suaq not to approve of the sense of it.

The Jotun warriors do not shy away from battle where the Wintermarkers offer it. There is no major military presence in Sermersuaq, but there are more than a few warriors prepared to test their mettle against the western orcs. Jotun champions and Winterfolk heroes clash, and neither side holds back. Blood splashes across the ice floes, and stains the glaciers, blood spilled on both sides. Any Suaq, Kallavesi, or Steirn who falls before the Jotun is interred beneath a barrow mound; there are unconfirmed reports that those who surrender are offered the Choice as they have been since time immemorial - but those who make that choice are swiftly sent west to Tromsa, to Skallahn, and perhaps further west.

A handful of Winterfolk who have returned home to Sermersuaq after serving with the Imperial armies are certain they recognise the flag - these are the Ice Fishers of Ldansk, a bound fellowship of minor clans and lesser Jarls who have fought the Empire in the south several times beneath the banner of the Fist of Ulven. They are experienced, doughty warriors and while they may not have numbers comparable to an Imperial army, their smaller size gives them a manoeuvrability that even the Fire of the South or the Black Thorns would envy.

As the Solstice draws closer, this expeditionary force moves slowly southward through Stark until they camp barely a day's march from the village of Rest - the little settlement built at the meeting point of two trods. One of the northernmost settlements in the entire Empire, it is also the site of the welcoming fires of the Last Lantern, the Navarr wayhouse farthest from the heart of the Empire. The Navarr and the Suaq scouts that live here send three of their number up the steep hill overlooking the village, to the ruined tower that watches over them, lit torches in hand.

The beacon is lit. A warning spread south and east. The Jotun are here. Send aid.

Resentment Rides High

The low lands of Yellow Chase in Segura are hot, dry, stony, and impoverished. The soil is poor and the landscape is marked by pockets of heavy rock which are never far from the surface. The truth is - and this is the Brass Coast where people prefer the truth even if it is hard and unwelcome - that some of the people here are not much better than the land. Even before the invasion, there were stories that some of them traded with the Lasambrian bandits on occasion, to make ends meet; and sometimes perhaps did even worse things. A "Yellow Chase farmer" is a slang term used in parts of Segura for a liar - especially someone lying about where their money has come from.

So when the first reports of orcs in the Yellow Chase come down the Cinnamon Road, the long trod that runs north out of Anduz and up to Kahraman, few people pay it much heed. There have always been a few orcs in the Chase... this is hardly news. Don't these people realise there's a war on? People shake their heads, civil servants file reports, and a few dutiful Kohan set off to make sure that it is something and nothing.

It is fortunate indeed that they were vigilant - for it appears that the inhabitants of Yellow Chase are not exaggerating. A force of Jotun warriors has crept over the border and is quietly getting on with the business of invading Segura.

It is not an army - of that much the scouts are certain - but it is vastly more than the local dhomiros are able to deal with. There are somewhere between one and two thousand orcs here - heavily armed and armoured and all marching under the banner of a bird wreathed in flames. At first glance they appear much like any other elite Jotun champions, but on closer inspection their leaders wear sashes and hoods of bright orange hue - not a colour normally associated with the western orcs. At least, not a colour associated with the Jotun orcs. Some of the Yellow Chase farmers have seen orcs wearing that colour before...

It is no coincidence then that they are in Yellow Chase. This area once served as a centre of power for the Lasambrian barbarians, there was a great armed camp here from which raiding parties swept down onto the plains. The camp was abandoned when the bandits were driven off by Dawnish forces during the last days of the liberation of Segura. Now it has been reoccupied - and it appears these new invaders are intent on fortifying the site. A loose palisade of closely packed timbers is being raised around the perimeter of the camp. This is not a real fortification yet - there is no white granite being employed - but it is all too clear that these orcs are intent on securing this position.

This is not the only thing the strange Jotun are about. A pair of shepherds report that the rock fall that blocked the pass over Old Man's Ride into Reinos ten years ago has been completely cleared. This was a major landslip, that would have taken hundreds of people working for days on end to make it passable for just a merchant wagon. Now it is a smooth as honeyed silk, and what's more they claim that the road that leads up to the pass has had every hole filled with loose stone and then pounded flat. With the pass blocked, it took nearly a week to get over the border here - now you can do it in a day.

And nobody in Yellow Chase thinks these peculiar Jotun are clearing the way between Kalino and Segura for the benefit of the merchants...

Game Information : Two Tales

These two forces - one in Sermersuaq and one in Segura - are not campaign armies. They are elite bands of Jotun warriors, and despite their relatively small numbers they seem quite serious about invading the Empire. While this is not a traditional campaign report, it potentially has significant strategic importance for the Empire, so we have included it here. Further information about what is going on will be made available to the Military Council during the muster.

To Fool The Crowd

Shortly after the Autumn Equinox, the Freeborn Storm limps back to the shipyard at Atalaya. Many of their warships are battered, and need time in drydock. Their crews are exhausted, bloodied, and keen to spend a season recovering from their campaign against the Grendel. They are welcomed by the people of Atalaya; an impromptu street party is organised to honour the mariners who showed such courage against the southern barbarians - and to celebrate those who have not returned.

They are followed three weeks later by the entire Grendel armada.

The naval force is vast, perhaps five times as large as the Freeborn Storm. There is very little warning; a desperate winged messenger from Glass Point in Sarvos, and garbled rumours of sightings by fisherfolk along the north-western bay. They ignore Calvos Sound, cutting straight across the bay to Free Landing.

The Shining Pillar falls almost immediately; the Grendel barely pause before sweeping south across the islands. Resistance is decisively crushed, but the smaller settlements are clearly not what the armada is here for. They are here for Atalaya, the birthplace of the Brass Coast.

The waters around Atalaya are treacherous, the channels difficult to navigate if one does not know the secret locations of the obstacles that rest just beneath the surface of the waters. The Grendel do not seem to care; rather than attempt a direct approach to the port itself, their ships spread a wide cordon around the island and disembark several thousand orc warriors on the northern beaches.

We rolled the dice and they were against us, but our losses were not in vain. We helped save many hundreds of our friends on the land. It's been a tough season and now it's time to head home and put to port. We're going home. As an aside, this will be my last group of orders. I shall be standing down as of next year. It's been an honour and a privilege to command you courageous lot, and I am proud of you all. Farewell.

The orcs, marching under the banner of a sinuous black eel, attack the port from the landward side. At the same time, Grendel magicians and engineers begin to map out the harbour defences in small boats, their great warships providing covering fire with crossbow and ballista from any Freeborn ships that attempt to stop them. The crimson and gold sailed navies inch closer to Atalaya, while the ships under emerald sails maintain the cordon.

There is a small militia in Atalaya, but it is not enough. The sailors of the Freeborn Storm do their best to hold the town, but they are quickly overwhelmed. Two hundred Navarr soldiers of the Black Thorns valiantly attempt to support the garrison but they know their cause is hopeless - and there is nowhere to fall back to. The fighting lasts less than eight hours before Atalaya is in the hands of the Grendel. That night, the eastern horizon is lit up by a ruby glow, visible across the Madruga coast. The shipyard is burning. The Freeborn Storm is burning.

Morning sees a great black cloud hanging over the islands, which slowly breaks up over the next several hours. The town itself is mostly undamaged, the historic buildings still standing, but the shipyard and the navy are both embers and ashes, burnt to the waterline.

A few manage to escape the island, several on the fast ships belonging to a lone Marcher mariner from Mournwold who had chosen to spend time with the Freeborn Storm at the shipyard. They evade the Grendel cordon, and bring news of the fall of Atalaya to the mainland, to Quzar and to the Black Thorns.

March from the Mournwold to Siroc Plains, Madruga to resupply. Thorns, once again we have fought with courage & loyalty, we have outwitted the Jotun & escaped their clutches again. Now we rest, we mend, we recuperate in Madruga. I am proud of you all. We must be at our best to engage the enemy once more to win back our home.

A week later, the Grendel follow them and lay General of the Black Thorns siege to Quzar. By this time, the swift soldiers of the Black Thorns are in position, but between the army of the black eel, and the marines from the Grendel armada, they are able to do little more than delay the inevitable. The Thorns have been reduced to breaking point by heaving fighting in previous campaigns; once the extent of the Grendel forces becomes clear they are forced to retreat back the way they have come. Perhaps five hundred more Navarr give their lives holding the barbarians back, before they bow to the inevitable.

Atalaya, Quzar, and Midport all fall to the Grendel, along with several other smaller villages and family estates on the islands, and along the eastern coast. The conflagration that consumed the shipyard at Atalaya, and destroyed the Freeborn storm, is not repeated. The Grendel crush any resistance, but they loot anything of value they can lay their hands on. They seem more interested in trade goods than slaves, but some of their captains relish chaining the Freeborn and the few Navarr soldiers who are taken alive.

A fortnight before the Winter Solstice, the light of the Shining Pillar goes out. An hour later it re-ignites but the flame has changed. Rather than a clear white light that calls the Freeborn home, the beacon burns a rich purple colour. The Bay of Catazar belongs to the Grendel.

Game Information : Madruga

The Grendel have conquered the whole of Free Landing, from Midport in the south to the islands north of the Shining Beacon. They have destroyed the shipyard at Atalaya, and burnt the Freeborn Storm to the waterline. Some of the ships and sailors may have escaped, but the navy itself has disbanded. Admiral Edgardo i Ruiloba i Guerra has lost the title Admiral of the Freeborn Storm.

The Black Thorns have been severely damaged by their attempt to help the Freeborn citizens. If they had not been using the give ground order it is likely they would have risked being disbanded as well.

The Grendel have conquered the eastern coast of Lightsea, and sacked the rich port town of Quzar. This has impacted the taxation provided by Madruga, but it is not as bad as it could have been - Siroc remains untouched at this time. They have made significant headway toward claiming the entire region.

Participation

Because of the way territories and personal resources interact, we do not assume that anyone's personal resource was in the area controlled by the Grendel. However, any player whose character's personal resource is in Free Landing or Lightsea can choose to roleplay that it has been damaged or destroyed by the Grendel.

Imperialistic House of Prayer

Major Conjunctions

The civil service has identified five major conjunctions of the Sentinel Gate that are expected to be available during the coming summit.

Two conjunctions have been identified on the Saturday. One will take the heroes of Anvil to Madera Viejo, in Yellow Chase, Segura. The other opens to Fulgentius' Solitary, an open expanse ahead of the Imperial advance in Screed, Spiral.

The first opportunity will allow a strike against the Jotun and the Lasambrians orcs in the area and force them back into Reinos. The second opportunity will allow heroes to capitalise on the progress made in Screed by the Imperial armies and to consolidate further ground.

A third, smaller, conjunction has been identified to Mournstead in Liath's Glen, Liathaven on the Saturday. The old steading lies close to an area of vallorn miasma and was visited from Anvil at the Autumn Equinox. There is an opportunity for the Navarr to engage two of their hated enemies, while the Brass Coast egregore has noted that the conjunction has relevance to the Freeborn as well. This is a large skirmish that will take place at 18:00 on Saturday.

Three conjunctions have been identified on the Sunday. The first will take Imperial forces to Kugaaruk Point, an open expanse in the very west of Stark, Sermersuaq. The second opens to the Plantation of Tall Ferns, in northern Proceris, Zenith. The final conjunction will align a portal for travel to the wooded Chase of Arnet, in Ulvenholm, Semmerholm.

The conjunction in Sermersuaq provides a second opportunity to engage the Jotun expeditionary forces pushing into the western Empire. In Zenith the heroes of Anvil can prevent the Druj bringing monstrous reinforcements in from the Mallum; whilst in Semmerholm, the Empire can engage a force of barbarian orcs that have fled from the Dawnish advance and now threaten the lands of Ulvenholm.

By the time of the Winter Solstice summit, the civil service will have completed reports for each of these conjunctions, which will be presented to the generals during the Muster. The final decision about which major conjunctions to exploit, and who will take part in the battles, is the heavy responsibility of the Imperial Military Council alone.

Imperial prognosticators are also preparing additional information relating to a number of smaller conjunctions over the course of the summit that will be of relevance to the Military Council, individuals from the various nations, and other parties. A summary of the identified conjunctions will be provided nearer the summit, with additional details passed to national egiogores and civil servants of the Military Council.

A Blight in Miaren

Poor Timing

Gwynneth sprinted out of the steading with the sound of her sister's pained shouting in her ears. The contractions were coming hard and strong now. It would not be much longer. Gwynneth had felt distinctly uncomfortable standing around and not knowing what to do.

Then the marrowort had worn off, and no longer shielded Caedyyfryn from the pain. Gwynneth had been almost laughably grateful to be sent running to fetch more marrowort. It was useful and purposeful.

Rushing through the mud, Gwynneth stopped short at the herb garden and plucked the pale plant. She was about to turn and sprint back when something caught her eye. She paused reached out and turned over another pale marrowort leaf. There, beneath the leaf was soft, white, hairy fungus.

Gwynneth cursed aloud, but then her sister's cries grabbed her attention back again. Biting her lip, Gwynneth ran back to the house. One challenge at a time.

Navarr walking the trods of Miaren have reported sudden blights of Armillaria. Armillaria is a parasitic fungus that is suspected to have been altered by exposure to the Realm of Spring. It has a white and furry appearance and it aggressively attacks herbs, specifically Marrowort. A blight of Armillaria fungus can significantly harm the productivity of herb gardens.

Although deadly to herbs, Armillaria fungus is a natural medicinal for livestock and it can promote health, fertility and wellbeing that increases the productivity of farms. Farmers will be able to benefit from this informally, however a coordinated effort can be arranged through the Senate could promote farm productivity more aggressively.

Armillaria fungus is fairly fragile, and will last only about three months and cannot be easily transported long distances. Consequently, its effects will not last beyond the Summer Solstice, and are unlikely to extend beyond territories adjacent to Miaren.

Interestingly, Armillaria fungus does not attack trees or forests. Scholars discovered that worldblood - known as Ambergelt - is toxic to it. This discovery has meant that it is possible to extract worldblood and use it against Armillaria. The utilisation of magical resources in this way requires the support of the Conclave.

Based on past experience, the civil service estimates that if no action is taken then herb gardens in Miaren will produce less Marrowort^[1] but farms will benefit from the medicinal properties of the fungus^[2]. In the past, the Empire has responded to similar situations in the following ways:

- The Senate can pass a motion to harvest the Armillaria fungus specifically to capitalise on the benefit to livestock. For a disbursement of 9 Thrones the impact on herb gardens would be reduced^[3], and the benefit to farms would be increased.^[4]
- The Senate could alternatively pass a motion to deliberately infect a single neighbouring territory to Miaren with Armillaria spores. For a disbursement of 4 Thrones a territory adjacent to Miaren could be affected by the fungus in the same way that Miaren is. There is no limit on the number of territories that could be infected in this manner.
- The Conclave could declare a Gambit of 19 ambergelt per affected territory to use that ambergelt to kill the fungus. This would eliminate the impact, both good and ill. Multiple territories could be named in a single Gambit but would require the necessary multiples of ambergelt. In all cases, the Gambit would need to name a person for collecting and distributing the ambergelt who would ensure it is in their inventory at the end of the summit and then notify the civil service between summits of their intentions.^[5]
- It has been hypothesised that if the Empire can attract its attention then Llofir, Eternal of Spring known as the Rotlord or Lady of Spores, could influence Armillaria fungus for good or ill. What Llofir would want for its intervention, if it could intervene, is unknown.
- Use of the ritual Ruthless Vigilance, Healthy Crop would offset the impact of the fungus for an individual herb garden, whilst improving the production of other types of herb.

The above represent tried and tested responses to potential Armillaria blight. Other options can be put to the civil service for consideration, and costing, via the usual means.

Footnotes

- [1] -2 marrowort per herb garden in affected territory
- [2] +30 rings to farms in affected territory
- [3] Marrowort penalty reduced to -1 per herb garden
- [4] Benefit to affected farms increased to +50 rings
- [5] No loss to marrowort, no benefit to farms

A Fool in a Crown

A Fool in a Crown Written OC and recording by Reesha Dyer. Written IC by Virtue di Tassato

The actors a fine one for plying his trade, Looks so superb on the plans that you made, But take of his mask and you will be dismayed, He's made of a much paler shade.

Chorus: If the actor were true if the bravo were brave, If up, could only be down, If only, if only, not one were a phoney, We'd not have a fool in a crown.

The trader she seems like a sensible sort, She tells me there's nothing that cannot be bought, But when friends are there for the coin in your stores, What if someone offers more?

Chorus

The bravo talks loudly, and thinks with her sword, The tales that you hear you can't help but applaud, If only she wasn't so easily bored, Liability we can't afford.

Chorus

And then there's the skulker, the servant, the pest, He thinks that he's puppeting all of the rest, His pretence of power's a pretty poor jest, And nobody's really impressed.

Kallavesi Mystic Part 1 - Design

Contents

By James Fishwick

In the same vein as the Marcher Costume Diary, on this page I'm going to explain how I'm making my Kallavesi Mystic kit, from design to construction to finished product. I'm going to be mixing new and old pieces of costume, to produce a new and distinctive character's look. Once I've finished I might also make some spare back-up Wintermark kit, just in case I die... Suaq kit sounds lots of fun!

 - 1.2.3 Cloaks
 - 1.2.4 Headdress
 - 1.3 \(Not\) Sketching

Concept & Inspiration

When I first read the Wintermark brief I really loved the idea of a Kallavesi Mystic- a shaman, wearing a big headdress and tattered cloak, covered in fetishes, speaking in riddles and spitting curses at his enemies. As the rules aren't out yet, I'm not sure if I'll end up as a priest or a magic-user or a combination of the two, so I'll try not to make the kit too specific one way or the other. Visually I want to emphasize the Raven look, so I'm planning on quite stark black kit - especially a big black cloak. Beyond that colour choice I want to stick as close to brief as practical. To plan my look I started by looking through the pages on Wintermark Costume and the Wintermark look and feel. The main costume points that leapt out at me were:

- Thigh-length tunic over trousers
- Ragged cloak, either semi-circular or a front-split rectangular poncho
- Unhemmed rough checked wool, linen, fur - drab colours, greys and blacks
- Layers, more primitive / Iron Age, less tailored
- Belts covered in pouches and so on are good
- Feathers, beads, fetishes, animal headdress

I've also been looking at the Holt Hyrde Pinterest Board, which is especially useful for headdress ideas.

Planned kit

What have I got already?

From my random kit box I've already got some pretty suitable dark brown striped wool trousers, and some plain black (although aged & muddy, so more like brown) leather ankle boots. I've also got plain brown leather belts & pouches and a plain heavy cream canvas shoulder bag, which I've used lots of Odyssey, so I've got places to store my IC & OOC money, phone, car keys, etc. Finally from my Maelstrom Native kit I've got lots of bead necklaces - some are too plastic or bright to work for the Kallavesi, but the wooden beads will be great. I might replace some of this stuff with Empire-specific kit in the future (marked with the runes, perhaps?), but for now I've got a good base to build on.

Tunics

If I'm wearing a rough wool tunic, I want a linen or cotton undertunic as well. But I'm very aware of how warm those layers could be in summer, so I want to make the tunic not too massive. Adding extra layers will help in cooler weather, but I want kit that I can wear in the height of summer and still look good! So I think I'll go with a sleeveless tunic, in a Roman/Celtic style. I'm going to make it from some lovely black and white checked wool that I bought from Bernie the Bolt. The sleeveless tunic style has four main advantages over a full T-tunic:

- It's easier to make - it's just two rectangles!
- It's got that primitive / Iron Age feel that sets Kallavesi apart from Steinr and Suaq.
- It's cooler, for summer wear, as it has no arms. In cold weather I can add a thick cloak, or maybe later make a T-tunic.

- I've already got a Roman-style armless calico under-tunic in my Odyssey kit (bought from Ceolred Monger), so I just need to add the wool tunic and I'll be done. Calico is undyed cotton - not quite linen, but it's a natural fibre so it's close. Of course, it'd also be easy to make my own undertunic at a later date. But I'm lazy, so if I have a perfectly good one I may as well reuse it.

Cloaks

As well as the tunics I need to make my cloaks. These need to be big, ragged and layered. I want at least one warm layer in there, but it needs to be removeable for the summer. So I'm thinking of a black cotton layer as the base (again linen would be better, but I have an old duvet cover that I could use for free..), with a black fully feathered mantle and, for bad weather, a dark wool layer or two? I'll probably be consulting and adapting the costume guide on making a furry mantle!

Headdress

Finally, of course, there's the headdress and fetishes. I'm collecting useful bits for these from ebay (crow's feet, feathers, bird skulls, evil eye beads...) This is definitely the least developed part of my plan so far, but I think I want the headdress to be more of a hat than a mask - so I could go for an elaborate face-painted lineage if I wanted. I also want to avoid drawing too much from any particular real world culture - partly to avoid causing offense, partly because this is my chance to fantasy it up!

(Not) Sketching

At this stage the sensible thing would be to draw a sketch of my costume. But I'm rubbish at drawing, and I'm planning on experimenting with the shape of the cloak and the headdress as I go along. This may go horribly wrong, but I prefer a more organic design process (i.e. I'm lazy).

A League Costume Diary

Dressing a Bravo

by Tim Baker

Part 1 - Planning and Design

Before I started I had a solid idea that I wanted my character to be a League bravo. He is going to be a professional soldier and instructor, with an interest in studying sword fighting as a science.

One of the key appeals of the League is the inspiration provided by the colourful outfits of late medieval mercenaries. Particularly the slashed doublets and hose of the Landsknechts.

What really sold me on the project was reading about those people and how they came to wear the clothes they did. If, like me, you have little knowledge of needlework and find the whole idea really intimidating, then this may be the project for you. Landsknechts were brutal professional soldiers with very limited tailoring skills. The fancy slashing is not just for show- it is to make up for the fact they didn't really know how to sew.

Borrowed books and Google image searches turned up a lot of useful inspiration. I also came across a pattern I fancied using, which had got some good reviews from people I felt were reliable. I've never used a pattern before, but then I've also never taken on a major sewing project either (I've tried embroidery and leatherwork, but the most complex thing I've sewn until now has been a tabard).

Accessorising the costume will add some unique touches, but to start with I wanted to try making the key garments, particularly the 'wams and hosen' (doublet and hose).

IC and OC Practical considerations

The obvious starting point is that I like to play physically active characters and tend to be hard-wearing on my kit. Nothing in this costume should ever make me hesitate before jumping into a muddy ditch or pushing through a hedge.

I also want to be able to sit in a chair down at the tavern, sprawling comfortably. This should not be a costume that only works when standing elegantly like a courtier.

As of writing, I still don't know what weapons or armour I want to use on the battlefield. My guiding principle here is that if the costume is based on a historical one, it'll probably work just fine with whatever I settle on.

One great thing about late medieval mercenaries is that they were really well documented (relatively). Flamboyant costumes contrast with practical and brutal lifestyles. These were people who were ordered to have 'regulation length' pikes, but who invariably sawed four feet off the end to make them easier to carry. People who were notorious brawlers and thugs, but whose style influenced fashion across a continent.

 - 1.4.5 Stage 4: Decorative loops

The main consideration this gives me is quite a convenient one: nothing I'm carrying should be utterly impractical. These bravos are not the armoured knights of Dawn who might change clothes completely before battle, don padding, then carefully strap on each piece of plate. Rather than separate padding, a landsknecht might own a 'ledergollar' - a leather waistcoat that could be either light armour in its own right or padding for a breastplate. Otherwise I should be ready to fight in the clothes I'm swaggering around in. All of that fits well with the kind of character I have in mind.

The slashing in the fabric achieves two purposes. For one, it allows someone with no taste or restraint to show off their gaudy colours. Secondly, it allows movement. A skilled tailor can make hose which sit very tight but allow you flexibility. The slashing lets you move even in hose that were made by a ham-fisted thug (like me!).

A final practical point is that I want to be comfortable in all weathers, so options for making this cooler or warmer are ideal.

Breakdown, layer by layer

On my legs I plan to wear slashed hosen. There will be two layers. One pair of tight fitting hose underneath, which will not be slashed. Over the top will be a second pair of hose, with the slashes to show the pair underneath.

For my torso, I will be wearing a doublet. This will have a wide neck (I often think these wide necklines, rather than a close fitting collar, are an iconic feature that sets this outfit apart from an earlier medieval look), to show the shirt underneath. This doublet will have an option to lace on a rectangle of richer material over the chest, called a brustfleck. When reading up on the costume I saw that the brustfleck was often made of something expensive which a landsknecht had taken as plunder, to show their success in battle. I feel this fits the character, so decided to add it in.

Once the rest are made, I plan to work on a ledegollar, partially so I can have some lightweight brawling and training armour and partially to pad my breastplate if I choose to wear one. However, this will have to wait until the doublet is done to be able to measure it up.

For footwear, I am currently undecided. Once hose are complete I will see how different options look. The pattern allows for the hose to have integral feet, which works well with a classic 1500s lightweight shoe, but I tried some on and found them less than comfortable. Once the hose are done I'll try some options.

Accessories

There are a few things which leap out from the League brief and historical inspirations. One I am keen to try is tying ribbons around my limbs. This is to serve a dual purpose of decoration and also holding folds in the fabric in place at key places around my joints.

A mask motif might also make an appearance- I like the idea of having a mask hanging from the belt, ready for use if needed (this is entirely the fault of Ian Andrews' book 'The Pearls That Were His Eyes').

Fabric and materials

This is an important bit. Hose need to be cut on the bias to give them enough stretch when you move. However, landsknechts did not hem the slashes in their clothing- they just used fabric which would not fray when it was cut.

Therefore I have gone for some different types of wool for this outfit. The first pair of hose, worn next to my skin, are of a soft blue wool with a lot of stretch (£8/m), bought from Herts Fabrics. The hose on top, which will be slashed, are of a heavier black wool (£11/m), a melton type, bought from Anne Laverick. Tests with the black wool confirm that it does not need hemming and will not fray, but does not stretch as much as the blue.

For the doublet I will be using the same wools, although the properties are not as critical here. Having said that, the heavier wool will be ideal if I want to wear plate armour on my upper arms, seen quite often in illustrations.

For the brustfleck I've bought a small deer skin (15 Euros) from a re-enactment market near Paris. This will be the lining and give it a lot of depth- thus achieving the desired look of a manly, well developed chest. To line the ledegollar I will either be using silk (Herts Fabrics, £5/m when he was having a sale some years back) or linen, with a very soft leather cover (Lyon Leathers). The key here is that the collar will be against my neck and I don't want it to chafe. Keith Lyon provided valuable advice here and was very worth speaking to.

So what do I need?

Fabric

Part 2- Making it

The Pattern

I am using a pattern by Reconstructing History- 'RH502, Landsknecht Wams and Hosen' bought from Paul Meekins Books for £24. Thus far, worth every penny.

My starting point here is as someone who cannot easily use a sewing machine and doesn't really know any stitching techniques- my method to date has been 'go in-and-out until it hopefully stays together'. Thankfully, the RH pattern book also has clear and easy instructions on how to do some useful types of stitches. As a small confession, I'm slightly scared of needles, which puts me off sewing machines and is one reason I'm hand sewing everything (I am happier when I feel I can control the evil thing). On the bright side, this is allowing me to pay particular attention to key areas where I know the fabric will be stressed.

Thus far I am finding the pattern is not perfect, but I'd be shocked if it was, but seems to be making what seemed like an intimidating task quite manageable.

Garment 1: Under-hose

First off, I used some grease-proof paper to trace out a copy of the pattern pieces. Not being confident in my skills, I don't want to ruin the original by cutting it up.

Once this was done, I laid the pattern out on my fabric, sitting diagonally across it (on the bias). This is done to ensure you will get as much stretch as possible. Despite not having made a pair of hose before, I've been wearing them at re-enactment for more than 18 years now and the most common problem is them tearing across the crotch. Knowing this, I plan to try and stop it happening by every means possible.

One leg cut out. At this stage they don't look recognisable as anything.

A carpenter once told me 'measure twice, cut once'. That is worth applying here. Once your pattern is laid out, draw around it on the fabric with dressmakers chalk. When you cut around it, remember to leave about half an inch all around as a seam allowance. You can always cut more off later if you make it too big.

A key feature of these hose is where they sit on your waist. Modern trousers usually come up to around your belly button, while the more common mid-15th Century hose sit very low- barely covering your bum when standing. These landsknecht hose come up much higher, with the top almost up to your ribcage. I am guessing that this might have been to make their legs look longer, but really have no concrete idea.

As another word of advice, bear in mind that the leg seams on hose do not sit in the place you would expect with modern trousers. Rather than a seam up each side of the leg, you have just one seam running up the back.

The pattern gives you a choice of two ways to do your seam, with either what they call a 'classic seam' or a 'slanted Italianate seam'. I chose to go with the former, as it looked easier.

Having cut out twice around the pattern (once each way up), the next stage is to pin them and have a look at how they fit around your legs, then pin the two sections together. A friend to help you is invaluable here. Once they are pinned in approximately the right place, loosely stitch them together.

Wearing the hose inside out to be able to adjust the seams.

For this stage, I was just wearing them inside out, so I could see all the seams. It was also the stage where I made my first big mistake.

Mistake 1: sewing the wrong side out

I had sewn up each leg and they seemed to be fitting well. I then started to sew the two legs together. When I tried them on again, I realised that I had stitched the crotch seam the wrong way around, so if the seams on the legs were hidden that one would show, or vice-versa. There was nothing for it but to unpick that seam and do it again. Still, it didn't take long and was a good exercise in why it is worth doing a rubbishy loose stitch first, then going over it with a better one when you are sure the fit is right.

However, I did take this opportunity to make what I consider to be an improvement to the pattern. Time will show if I am right

Improvement: the gusset

At the bottom of each ankle you need to make two small slits (one each side, over the knobbly bits of bone that stick out). These slits allow you to insert triangles (gussets), which thus slightly flare the bottom few inches of the material and make it fit better over your feet.

To be honest, I was having a bit of a whine about this bit, as it seemed like extra work for marginal benefit. Having done so though, I recommend doing the same and they do fit better and it didn't take long. If you are making hose which cover your feet this bit is particularly important, but I'd do it either way.

Anyway, having cut out four triangular gussets anyway, I spontaneously decided to cut out a fifth one, slightly larger than the others. Bearing in mind how often I have seen hose split across the crotch before, I added this extra gusset between the legs. It isn't in the pattern, but it should add a bit of extra room to maneuver. A 10 minute job that adds a lot of confidence to the end result.

Here you can see both the triangular gusset I've added to allow movement between the legs and the linen insert peeking out of the waistband where it has been stitched in to add strength.

Stitching up

Once I was comfortable everything was about right, I did my final stitching together. For most of the back of the legs I just used a conventional [\[running stitch\]](#), although trying to keep the stitches small for neatness and strength. However, for the crotch seams and gussets I used another seam (with instructions from the pattern book)- the [\[backstitch\]](#). This is a dead easy stitch to do, but seems really strong and good for reinforcing those vulnerable areas.

One other decision I made may have been slightly bizarre, but we'll see if it worked out: to stitch the seams I used a large-ish needle and embroidery thread (as in, several strands, not just a single piece), rather than cotton. This was another choice to try and increase the strength of the seams. (Note from Jude: using multiple strands of thread can strengthen your seam though embroidery floss can snap readily, especially when wet. Other extra strong options include linen thread, extra-strong top stitching thread and cobbler's thread. Stitching your seam twice is another option. You might also want to hem or oversew the raw edges of your fabric to stop them unravelling, as even the strongest thread can be let down if it's the fabric that gives way.)

Handy Tip from Helly

By sheer luck, the excellent Helly Bean happened to be down when I started this project. She is a much more experienced seamstress and offered a really useful bit of advice: when lining up your seams, be careful not to stretch one side of the material more than the other. if you do, it will distort the fabric. I have tried to follow this throughout the process by carefully smoothing out the material before I sew, to ensure both sides are lying naturally so there is no distortion.

Improvement 2: Lining the waistband

This is something else I decided to do based on my experience of wearing hose at re-enactment. Hose are normally laced to the doublet, which holds them up. However, the points where you have laced them can come under a hell of a lot of strain when you are moving, especially if you are active. Many are the times when I have been fighting and felt a lace go 'ping' deep under my armour and known there is now nothing holding my hose and nothing I can do about it either.

Worse than a lace snapping is if the material of the doublet or hose tears. Then you can't just put a new lace in and the repair is a real swine to do in the field. To try and prevent this, I folded over the wool at the top of the hose to make a waistband. Between the two layers of wool I inserted a heavy linen strip, then sewed it in. Hopefully this will stop it tearing if I roll around the place.

Problem 2: Feet

I was in two minds as to whether to make feet for these hose, but decided to give it a try. It was when I had cut out and pinned the soles that I discovered a problem: when the feet were attached, it tended to pull the hose down and make the crotch sag. Not much, but just enough that it might make them more prone to tearing.

Thus the current plan is to remove the spats (top of foot) and just make them hose without feet, as these will most likely be covered by boots anyway.

Here you can see the seam running up the back of the legs, as well as the unusually high waist..

Garment 2: Outer Hose

If you don't plan to wear slashed hose, these are unnecessary. You just wear the under-hose as a complete garment. However, whichever pair is on the outside will need a codpiece.

For these, I started in the same way as with the under-hose. However, they need to be slightly bigger in order to fit on top.

Problem: My poor decision making

When I bought the material, I had a very limited choice of colours. This was primarily because I was being very picky about the physical characteristics of the fabric (stretch, resistance to fraying etc). I also wanted a contrast between the outer and inner layers.

Thus I decided to make my outer layer black, with something colourful on the inside. It was only when I came to start sewing that I realised the obvious problem. Black thread against a dense black fabric is really, really hard to see properly. Thus I found sewing this to be a bit slower than sewing up the blue under-hose. Still, if you want black it shouldn't stop you- just be aware it may take a few minutes longer.

Marking out the slashes

At this stage, before sewing the seams up the back of the legs, you are supposed to put in the slashes where you want them. This stage takes a bit of planning, as it will affect the finished look. Again, the pattern book is invaluable here, as it gives some good advice. In particular, using a spare off-cut of fabric to do some testing. Normally I am the kind of person who doesn't bother with such things (like not testing hair dye on a patch of my skin before using it), as I'm too impatient. In this case I was glad I did. My first couple of slashes into the test fabric went slightly awry before I got the knack for cutting straight, but very quickly it got easier. For the sake of five minutes and a bit of throwaway material this was very worthwhile.

However, I chose to deviate from the pattern book a bit at this stage. Because I want my hose to be fairly tight to my legs, I didn't want the slashes in before I had stitched them. That way they would be very close fitting and the slashes would add extra flexibility. Thus I marked with chalk where I wanted the slashes, but held off cutting them in until the next stage was done.

The pattern book offers several options for types of slashing you can use at this stage. To be quite frank I didn't fully understand all of them, so went for the one it said was most common and where it was clearest what to do- alternating horizontal and vertical slashing.

Stitching Up Again

The pattern book had advised that the best way to get your seams right was to loosely sew them up using a 'basting stitch'. This is just a really quick and dirty way of sewing where the stitches are about half an inch apart. Very little strength to it and you'd never rely on it to hold clothing together (unless you wanted to be undressed while fighting for comic effect). For the under-hose I hadn't bothered, because the wool was lighter, so pins seemed to do an OK job of holding it together while I worked out where the proper seam should go. However, the outer hose are made of the heavy, fray-resisting, melton wool- pins fall out under the weight far too easily. Here the basting stitches were a god-send, because they allowed me to try the hose on, mark a few places where they needed tightening with dressmakers chalk, then do the final stitching. In hindsight, it was so much easier that I probably should have followed the pattern's advice for both pairs.

Cutting the Slashes

Now that the legs were stitched up and I was happy with the fit, I started to cut in the slashes. Slightly slowed down by the compulsion to try them on once the first leg was done.

First look suggests that I could have put more slashing in each row, but to start with I held back a bit on the basis that you could always cut more later, but you couldn't take it back. Initially I used scissors to cut in the slashes, but soon found that a sharp knife was quicker and gave much better control.

Codpiece and Gussets

Having what now looks largely like a pair of hose, once again I added a gusset between the legs and this time made up a codpiece. For the codpiece, I chose to make it out of two layers of wool, with the liner being the same blue as the inner hose. My thinking was the slash the black outer to show the blue, but thus far it doesn't seem to really work, in that because the codpiece flexes less than the legs, the blue doesn't show through.

The codpiece was where I found the greatest number of problems in the whole project. The pattern suggests options for having a single thickness of material, lining the codpiece or even for padding it(!). I chose lining as I tend to think lining makes garments look like much better quality, while padding would have been a whole different statement than I wanted to make for the character. However, my choice soon proved fraught with problems. Once I had the codpiece stitched on, I immediately found the material was bunching up between my legs. To make a lined codpiece, I'd laid the two layers of material atop another, then stitched them flat. Having done this, I turned them inside out so the rough edges of the fabric and the stitches wouldn't show. This looked neat, but had the side effect of making the edges bulky. Stitched into the gusset between the legs, the effect was amplified and felt frankly ridiculous as well as uncomfortable- a huge wedge of material between the upper thighs. In practice I'm not sure it was visible, but it had to go.

My eventual fix was to unstash the bottom half of the codpiece and cut away the liner, so only the front section is lined. It is now more comfortable, but still has the lined appearance.

Pointing

To make everything stay on, a series of reinforced holes (points) had to be made in the hose. These are where they will be laced to the doublet to hold them up, as well as how the codpiece will be held in place and the flies held together. It is probably the most laborious part of the job, although not complicated. A minimum of 14 holes will be needed, probably more. Each of those has to be made by pushing something round like a thick awl through the material to make a round hole, then sewing around and around the edge to keep it open and strengthen it to stop laces tearing through the fabric. It is important when making the hole not to cut the fabric, as that will make it fray or tear, but to push the fibres apart around whatever tool you are using.

The problem here is that they can take about five to ten minutes each, even with a bit of practice, which equates to a lot of very dull sewing. It's worth doing though, to make the hose last longer and more comfortable- just get a couple of good DVDs to watch for an evening.

Final adjustments

Trying the hose on properly, it was obvious that the top of both leg seams needed tightening. Being too loose, especially with such a high waist, made my backside look massive. This was trivially fixed though. It is also apparent that I could stand to extend some of the slashes to make the colour more visible.

Trying them on

Possible shortcut

It occurred to me after I made the under hose that I could have cheated to save a lot of time by wearing a pair of coloured leggings under the wool outer hose, rather than the under-hose, since their primary purpose is to provide splashes of colour seen through the slashes. If you are on a budget, this may also save money (two metres of good wool will almost always cost a lot more than a pair of cheap leggings).

The Doublet

You may be pleased to hear that my conclusion after making the doublet was that it was comparatively easy. Whereas the hose required a bit of fiddly fitting to get right, the doublet just seemed to come together and where problems occurred they were trivially fixed.

Stage 1: The Body

There are two possible doublet patterns included in the book from Reproducing History, called Open or Closed Wams. I chose Closed Wams, which look more like a modern jacket.

The doublet is lined in wool. I was running low on the blue wool I used for my under hose, so decided to line the body in black, as it would not be slashed in any case.

The liner and outer section are each made up of three sections- back and two halves of the front. Once they are cut out, the pieces are stitched together at the sides, as shown below.

The inner and outer are then layed one on top of the other and most of the hems are stitched up. I chose to stitch them up all around the outside except for the very bottom hem and the tops of the two thin sections you can see on the photo above where the front shoulders will attach to the back. Once these have been stitched, the entire garment is turned inside out, hiding the seams. The reason I left the tops of the shoulders untitched was that having turned the garment the right side out, you tend to find the corners and smaller pieces bulge a lot where the seams are now bulking out the inside. This can distort the shape. When the shoulders were joined up it hid the edges anyway, but let it sit flat.

Overall the body was pretty simple to put together. However, I still left the bottom hem open so as not to close my options until I had finished the sleeves.

Sleeves

Cutting these out was dead easy- the sleeves for Closed Wams are huge rectangles, slightly shaped at one end. If you are working from the same pattern as me, note that the sleeves are one half of the full pattern- you will need to mirror it over the line marked 'fold'.

The sleeve, halfway through basting the lining and outer together- not a complicated pattern!

As with the body, I cut out the liner and outer, this time using the blue for the lining again. Lay one atop the other and use a quick basting stitch to hold them together. This doesn't serve any structural purpose for the finished garment, but makes sewing it all together much easier. The whole sleeve is then folded in half, with the lining on the outside, and back-stitched down the long side. With that, the basic sleeve is done and just needs attaching and finishing.

Putting it together

The body section is turned inside out, with the sleeve turned right way out laid inside it- so that the seam won't show. I then back stitched the sleeve in place. This was a bit time consuming, partially because it is a little fiddly and partially because the sleeve was larger than the hole so needed a couple of pleats put in. If you take a moment to think about how the pleat will sit when the body is turned right-side out, you can decide which way you want the fold to lie.

Finishing, slashing and gathering

The most important part of finishing the sleeve is gathering the wrist, which will make the garment wearable (as you can see from the photo below, until it is gathered the sleeve just swamps your arm).

The sleeve on the left is half finished- slashed and gathered at the wrist- while the one on the right is untouched. You can also see the square neckline and high waist.

One thing which the pattern does not talk about is how to achieve some of the alternate sleeve styles. Thus I did a bit of experimentation and some making it up as I went along. From the picture above, you can see that you could choose to stop at the stage where you have gathered the wrist and slashed.

Problem: Too Much Enthusiasm

Being KEEN to make the garment wearable so I could try it on, I gathered one sleeve first. Having done this I learned a useful lesson, which is that it is far easier to do the slashing and gathering higher up the sleeve if you haven't gathered the wrist, making that end hard to access.

This is the basic sleeve with no slashing.

For the second sleeve, I used dress makers chalk to mark out where I wanted to put the slashes and gathers. I put all the slashes in first, then did the gathering- this made it much easier. The other issue caused by my excessive Keen was accidentally cutting through the lining when doing one of my slashes; it was the first cut on the second sleeve and my concentration lapsed. This was easily remedied by sewing up the cut in the lining.

Sleeve Fashions

There are several ways to finish these types of doublets. Sadly, one detail I had seen in loads of pictures and wanted to try was not mentioned in the pattern book. Thus I was left to puzzle it out myself- so my solution may well be neither the best nor perfect. What I was aiming for was the kind of sleeve where there are rows of slashes, divided by gathered sections. Having seen how the wrist worked, it seemed like the easiest solution would be to simply mark out lines where I wanted them, then use a basting stitch all around the arm in each place. Then tighten the stitches to pull the fabric in around each line.

The sleeves are now bunched to make the slashes gape and show the lining .

The final touches were to sew in all the lacing points and finish the bottom hem of the body. There are several ways to finish that bottom hem, but I chose to take advantage of having some spare fabric to solve another problem at the same time.

Bright Idea: Reinforcing while Hemming

The bottom of the doublet is where I would need to sew several holes for lacing the hose to. These points can be put under stress when you bend and stretch, so I wanted them tougher. Therefore to hem the bottom of the doublet I took long rectangles of black wool offcuts and trimmed them to even sizes. I used three of these (one each for the main body panels) to wrap around the front and lining of the bottom hem. This meant that as a side effect of hemming the finished garment was four layers of wool thick all around the bottom edge. My lacing points would go through all four layers, hopefully making it much harder for them to tear when stressed.

Here is the doublet worn with the hose .

Making a League Hat: The Dockenbaret

Looking at images of landsknechts, they are far more often than not shown to be wearing hats. A range of styles are available (including some massively flamboyant ones, with huge feathers sticking out at all angles). The style I fancied making was one of the simpler ones, but stylistically fitted with the rest of the costume I'd made. At this stage I should probably stress that the whole decision to make one was pretty impulsive and I didn't have a pattern to hand (despite looking online and in The Tudor Tailor book). Therefore I adopted a possibly ill-advised approach of making it up as I went along. My pattern was based on looking at pictures and half-remembered images of ones I've seen on re-enactors in the distant past. How could this go wrong?

The dockenbaret looks much like a very wide beret, with loops of material sewn to the sides in a manner which is quite similar to the effect generated by slashed sleeves. One of the great appeals of the design was also that I reckoned I could make it entirely out of off-cuts from the doublet and hose project.

Stage 1: Hatband

I decided to start by making a simple hatband out of a fairly tough linen (the same grade I'd use for making an arming jack). This was measured out pretty crudely, but it seemed to work. First off I just measured my head with a strip of ribbon. Then I did the same thing after wrapping a single strip of wool around my head, on the basis that the hatband might have some wool folded inside it and this should ensure there was enough room. The second measurement was about an inch larger than the first, so I went with that.

Cutting a two inch-wide strip of linen, I then folded it in half down its length (so it was now two thicknesses at one inch wide) and sewed the ends together with about an inch of overlap (thus creating a linen circlet, in effect). Trying it on, this was slightly loose around my head. Possibly more by luck than judgement, my crude measuring technique turned out to have been pretty much spot on.

The components of the hat: crown (round black material), hatband (linen circlet) and loops (rectangles or blue and black fabric)

Stage 2: Beret

Having made a workable hatband, I gave several seconds of thought to how to make the main crown of the hat, 'the beret bit' as I thought of it. The simplest idea seemed to be to cut out a large circle of fabric, then sew that to the hatband. Pleats at regular intervals around the brim should make it fit, while ensuring that there was plenty of fabric in the crown to look sufficiently full. For my first attempt I grabbed a dinner plate and drew around it on the black fabric in dress makers chalk. Then I extended the radius of the circle by about an inch. I did this entirely by eye, rather than measuring, figuring it wouldn't matter if it wasn't mathematically perfect.

To attach the crown to the hatband I folded each of them in half, then used this to gauge the front and back of the material. Then folded them in half again to work out the sides. Pinning them together I now had a crown attached at four evenly divided spaces around the band. It was easy to then put in another four pins, evenly spaced between the four 'corners'. Putting in two pleats in each of the eight resulting sections seemed to work pretty well. I now had what looked like a wearable hat pinned together, so I decided to try it on and discovered Problem Number 1.

Problem 1: Underestimating the enemy

Attaching the crown to the hatband was quite easy. However, as soon as I tried it on it was clear that the dinner plate method had not allowed anything like enough fabric for the pattern. It was wearable, but looked more like a modern soldier's beret than the basis for a landsknecht's dockenbaret. Being hopelessly optimistic, I decided to persist and finish it, to see if it would look better when I had attached the decorative strips around the rim.

What resulted turned out to look very much like a jester's cap. Looking on the bright side, if I ever want to play in Dawn, I now have a character idea and the starting point for a costume. On the downside, I had to unpick all the stitches, make a new crown-piece and start again.

Share my embarrassment: the accidental jester hat that resulted from my first attempt

Stage 3: Beret Revisited

For the next attempt, I was determined not to repeat my initial mistake. Thus I used the largest circular object I could find to draw the pattern (a wok) and then extended the circle radius by about two inches. This left the circle being about 17 inches in diameter. In the event I reckon this was just wide enough. For someone with a larger head (mine is quite small at 56 cm) I would consider making it an inch or two bigger.

Once again I pinned and pleated the crown evenly around the hatband, then back-stitched it in place. This resulted in a much better effect and I considered stopping at that stage- the wide beret looked quite League just by itself and you could trivially make one like that in about an hour.

Stage 4: Decorative loops

I cut out eight strips of wool (four black and four blue) from my off-cuts. Each was around three inches wide and 9 inches long (well, they started as 11 inches long, but I trimmed them as I went, when trial and error showed they worked better just a little shorter).

There are loads of ways to attach these around the rim of the hat and I must have tried half a dozen, with varying levels of success and appalling failure. In the end they were attached by spacing them evenly around the rim of the hat (with a very slight overlap), with both thin ends of each strip sewn to the wool at the base of the hatband. The inner of the two strips was then sewn to the crown a bit further up by a simple few stitches right in the middle of the fabric. Then when the hat is worn the loops hang slightly open.

Finished hat. Wearing it at a slightly jaunty angle seems called for.

This dress is intended to serve two characters - first a fairy NPC at Masquerades and Massacres, and the second as an Empire character (yet to be fully realised). The key concepts uniting the two are a need for an elegant and impressive presence. What really appeals to be about making costume for Empire and the League specifically is the separation of political and combat arenas, so a character is free to express an extravagant and flamboyant side through their dress without having to make it battle ready.

What IC and OOC practical considerations do I need to take into account?

The train I will put in for M&M will have to be removed for Empire, and the skirt shortened, as events can be very muddy and we want to avoid bringing the dress back dripping wet every time it rains. The front closure is also designed to be adjustable in future, as the wearer is currently pregnant and will be breastfeeding.

What images from the media appeal to me that might help with my design?

Very few media images appeal, to be honest. I much prefer to reference historical source material and bring a creative interpretation to it, rather than adapt designs that already have had a modern influence infused into them. Having said that, I made a few forays into Borgias costume diaries and archives, to make it clear in my head what the Empire design team intended, and look at a few options for sleeve designs.

Ready to Scribble?

Lizy provided me with a pencil sketch of what she envisioned for the M&M NPC and the design slowly drifted from this original concept as we searched for fabric and researched historical images. I feel the key thing with scribbles is not to be bound by them if you aren't trying to recreate a specific piece.

Pinterest

One of the most helpful tools for costume making I've recently been introduced to is Pinterest. While searching the internet for pictures, tutorials and dress diaries I've been able to collect any interesting finds into one resource that represents things with pictures. So much easier to work with than the old bookmarks list or myriad of open browser tabs. Even if you don't want to sign up for an account there are still lots of inspiration boards people have made for you to browse.

Breakdown - Layer by layer

The dress itself will be a front fastening affair that slips over all manner of underclothes. It won't take well to belt pouches and bags but these would be decidedly practical and so at odds with the fashion of the day. If carrying capacity is required pockets can be made to sit beneath the underskirt, a drawstring purse can be made from spare fabric or a chatelaine can be pinned to the bodice.

Underneath the dress an underskirt can be worn as a front panel where the skirt splits. This can have a decorative panel for contrast or be a single colour/print.

The lowest layer will be a square necked, drawstring chemise with huge sleeves to puff out the slashes in the dress sleeves. The bigger the better is a good motto for chemise making in the League.

For shape and support Lizy has a pair of 18th Century stays which provide a flat front in keeping with the League visual style. Alternatively a good bra will do the job if required.

In addition to the bits I'll be making Lizy has turned a vintage fur coat into a short cape and muff for the colder weather.

What have I got already?

Aside from the stays this is a scratch build.

So what do I need?

5 metres of fabric for the dress. 3 metres of white linen for the chemise. 1 metre of contrasting fabric for bodice and sleeve borders. 3 metres of lining fabric. More thread than I anticipate.

For the dress fabric Lizy chose a curtain fabric with a flock silk appearance. This was a light blue silk with raised velvet areas in a damask pattern in a contrasting black. Our colour scheme established we purchased a metre of black cotton velvet for borders. The most appealing aspect of the dress fabric was the textures at play which meant large areas of fabric would look visually appealing without the need for accessories and embellishments. I'm a real fan of texture in costuming.

The total cost of fabric was around £50.

Part 2 - Making it

Sewing with commercial patterns

When it comes to costume making I'm still very much a learner. No matter what I tried I just couldn't get the bodice right by drafting my own pattern. After searching the internet for a suitable bodice design we settled on the now discontinued McCalls pattern [\[2806\]](#) which we managed to locate on Etsy. With this starting point available I made a few tweaks to the bodice part of the pattern and discarded the rest as I'd already planned the sleeves and skirt.

Making the bodice

The bodice in the base pattern was designed to fit closely when closed but we needed this costume to be adjustable so I extended the edges to make it close like a wrap dress. To get this right I copied the pattern onto sheets of newspaper taped together where I was able to adjust the measurements as required before making a mock up out of cheap fabric we had lying around.

I always try to make a mock up before cutting expensive fabric, especially if I have done some alterations to a pattern. This allowed us to check the fit without cutting and wasting our nice dress fabric. Any adjustments needed could be drawn directly onto this mock up and transferred to newspaper once more to fiddle with. As luck would have it the mock up was fine so I used this as interlining (an extra layer of fabric between the outside and lining) because it's a shame to waste fabric when you don't need to.

When placing the pattern on the fabric I wanted to make sure the damask pattern was a part of the costume and not simply covering it. To this end I selected a particularly impressive part and made this the centre of the bodice back. This did mean I was less economical with the fabric as I couldn't place the bodice pattern in the corner of the fabric to reduce waste. Again it is a shame to waste fabric but the benefits of doing so in this case make it easily justifiable.

Drafting the sleeves

This was the most challenging part of the project as it was new ground and pushed my skills. I wanted to capture some of the most outrageous moments of Landsknecht/Tudor fashion and aimed far beyond my actual capabilities. What we ended up with was a compromise between my fantasies and practicality. I could happily create an entire article on making sleeves for League dresses but I'll stick to what I did for this entry.

To start I drafted some basic sleeves and ensured they had a comfortable fit. This was done on paper once more so I could happily cut up and mess around to get the right feel.

First step was to take off the tapered edges and create a rectangular core. The tapered edges were then placed together as they would when the sleeve was folded round. There would be no changes made to these tapered parts as they would sit against the bodice and I wanted them to be flat to ease arm movement and serve as a form to aid the puffs.

I then divided the rectangle up into equal bars. I settled for six 50mm wide strips but this would vary depending on your sleeve size and the desired amount of slashing. To create the puffs I then extended these strips by 20%. All the patterns were then made into tubes of dress fabric one side and lining fabric the other which I turned inside out to hide the seams.

Now came the tricky bit. I decided three puffs would look right so divided the tapered section into three. The tubes were then tacked at the ends to form a sleeve shape and I did some eyeballing to get the puffs right. I think a video tutorial is the best way to convey this. The key thing to remember is that the central tubes have to be longer at the top so they reach the top of the arm hole and still puff.

To give volume to the puffs the sleeves of the chemise will be extra big and the fabric pulled out through the slashes. In order to finish the sleeves I made cuffs and bands from the velvet to gather everything together.

Assembling the skirt

The central theme for the skirt was 'HUGE!' To achieve this I used the full width of the remaining fabric and managed to get three panels out of it. Again I wasted some fabric here as I wanted the pattern to continue around the skirt which meant losing some to ensure everything lined up correctly. The end result is very satisfying as the seams are lost in the folds and it looks like one continuous piece.

Essentially the skirt is just one long rectangle gathered to the bodice. For M&M the bottom of the central section was a semi circle to create a train but this will be removed for Empire as it is not fun to have fabric dragging in the mud or your dress being trodden on in crowds.

At just under 7000mm long this skirt needed pleating down to somewhere under 1000mm to fit the bodice. To do this I mentally divided each panel into four and gathered each of these quarters onto a loop of thread. I was then able to gather the skirt in twelve separate sections independently. By splitting the bottom of the bodice into twelve sections I was able to gather the skirt and pin it to the bodice in small and easy to manage segments before running it all through the machine a couple of times.

There are many choices for pleating but I settled on gathering in a cartridge pleat style as this creates a fuller puff and really makes a feature of the skirt. In the final dress this decision really pays off as there is no shape wear like a bum roll or panniers worn under it and it still gives a full skirt.

The Chemise

One of the most commonly overlooked aspects of larp costume is what you intend to wear under it. It's very tempting to stick with warm modern clothing underneath costume worn as a shell and in many cases this is absolutely fine. In this case the chemise forms an integral part of the costume forming the neck line under the bodice and providing the puff for the sleeves and will therefore be very visible.

There are lots of handy chemise tutorials all over the internet but if you are making one for your Empire kit I'd advise making it big. Like, real big. A drawstring square neck means the chemise will always fall right on your shoulders and the larger the sleeves and body the more stylish gathers and extravagant puff you will have. This is perhaps the best bit of kit to make as a beginner as you really don't need to worry about your measurements too much. If you cut the fabric right you can use the selvages (the non-fraying edges at the side of your fabric) for the bottom of the chemise which will save you a job with hemming.

Part 3 - Putting it all together

Here we have the finished dress. The ruff is for M&M and will be absent for Empire. The sleeves of the chemise can be seen between the slashed sleeves of the dress and even though I made them huge they could happily do with being bigger. Notice how the contrasting theme of light blue and black is used throughout with no attempt to add further trim or accessories which would clutter the effect with the already busy pattern on the fabric.

I hope this has been an interesting read. Jess

A Miracle in Hahnmark

Miracle in Hahnmark

Ville paused to wipe the sweat from his brow, and stretched his back. Instead of the ache of his muscles, they felt almost as though they glowed. A warm sensation filled Ville and it felt good. Somehow, Ville knew without knowing how, that the harder his muscles ached, the better it would feel. Alongside that, it was almost as though he could hear the weltsilver calling to him, inviting him to free it from the grasp of cold, unyielding, stone.

Ville looked to his left and he could see that Needa felt it too. Grinning the pair hefted their picks and struck again and again.

Word is spreading of Weltsilver mines in Hahnmark spontaneously generating auras consistent with the Virtue of Prosperity. Miners have reported feeling enervated and enjoyment from mining the reddish glistening ore, which has increased their enthusiasm for the work. Consequently, these miraculous auras have significantly increased the productivity of those mines. As a byproduct of this, there has been an increase in religious zeal in the area, and attendance - and associated influence - of congregations has also increased.

There have been some complaints from businesses across the territory who have found that there has been a migration of labour to mine working, which has left them short-handed and affected output. The shift in labour is credited to a mixture of a belief in the more virtuous nature of the work, and the positive sensations generated.

Events of this nature, whilst uncommon, are certainly not unheard of and attest to the positive benefits of the Virtues in this life, and all others. There is talk that these auras stem from a forgotten Wintermark Paragon of Prosperity, who perhaps displayed signs of benevolence and legacy through the mastery of weltsilver. There are no surviving records of such. Following recent events, this has caused some debate over whether they were Kallavesi, Steinr or Suaq.

Based off similar events in the lifetime of the Empire, the civil service predicts that if no action is taken, then the effect will be a major increase in the productivity of Weltsilver mines[1], and moderate increase in the attendance and influence of congregations in Hahnmark[2], but a moderate downturn in Hahnmark businesses[3]

There have been times in the Empire's history when the citizens have wanted to take action, and examples of this have included:

- Back in the time of the Emperor Giovanni the Peacemaker, the decision was taken by the Senate that as one group of citizens was blessed, another should not be short changed. A Senate Motion disbursed funds to offer a subsidy for recruitment that allowed businesses to compete. The civil service estimates that this would cost 47 Thrones and the effect would be that the mines would only benefit by a moderate amount[4], but that the impact on businesses would be negated, and the effect on congregations would remain. Theoretically, the General Assembly of the Synod could also make such a payment using the Synod Power of Rewarding.
- Although the spontaneous auras are confined to the Weltsilver mines, in similar situations the Assembly of Prosperity has been able to capitalise on this and - using priestly auras - spread the benefit more widely. A Statement of Principle from the Assembly of Prosperity could name a person - capable of raising consecrations - who could coordinate the consecrations of other mines so that the auras demonstrate the value of all mine working. The civil service estimates the named priest would need around 24 liao to spread this benefit sufficiently. The effect would be that the major benefit experienced by weltsilver mines would apply to all types of mine[5].
- Spiritual events also lend themselves to opportunities for missionary work to spread, and reinforce, the benefits of a Virtuous Life. A disbursement of 8 Thrones from a Senate Motion or Virtue Fund Rewarding could support this work so that the effect can be spread to include a single named territory adjacent to Hahnmark. The territory would need to be named in the Motion or the Judgment of Rewarding.[6]
- More controversially, during the reign of Empress Varkula, a Cardinal of the Way - an Urizen Illuminate suspected of Lucidianism - called for the exorcism of a spontaneous aura of Ambition as actually being disruptive to the functioning of the Empire. This would require a Statement of Principle from either the Wintermark National Assembly, or a Virtue Assembly, which would name a person who would take responsibility for the exorcism of the auras. The named person would need around 14 liao to ensure the exorcism of the auras ensuring the current effect be nullified.[7] Note: The exorcism of a spontaneously arising virtuous aura is currently classed as the religious crime of Desecration and individuals doing so may be condemned by the Synod if they do not have an legal exemption from the Senate

The above options are the lessons learned across the history of the Empire. The civil service does not expect that this is an exhaustive or absolute list. Costings for Senate Motions, Conclave Gambits or Synod Rewardings can be requested from the civil service at the Hub. Other actions taken by Imperial citizens may also be taken into account.

A Sudden Farewell

Song by Jamie Wakefield (<https://soundcloud.com/jamie-wakefield/a-sudden-farewell>)

Chords, Verses: Em G D Am x3, Em G D (Em); Chorus: Em G D; Bridge: Em

Verse 1 (Navarr) Into the eve'ning, My lover, we're leaving. No time left for grieving. Our oaths we fulfil.

Our lives we will offer. A step to here-after. A future made better, For Terunael

Chorus (Thorn) Aye, my lover. A sudden farewell. Aye, my lover. A sudden farewell.

Verse 2 (Thorn) Long we've provided, Our people we guidance, Without us, their stridings, Will travel a far.

Our future decided, Before we're divided, Let's lie here united, As Thorn and Navarr.

Chorus (Navarr)

Bridge (Thorn) Hear me x4

Verse 3 (Navarr) We should be preparing, And what your suggesting, Would use, though its tempting, What time we have ill.

Soon, when we're long gone, Our people embark on, An exodus begun, For Terunael.

Chorus (Thorn)

Bridge x2 (Navarr then Thorn)

Verse 4 (Thorn) Your hard dedication, Is all to your credit, But we've done all we can, and we have to let go.

Let's show we have no doubt, For soon we will bow out. But the dance will continue With other heroes.

Verse 5 (Navarr) Then let us make our rest, And lie in the forest, And let us show our trust, In those who follow.

Let this be a lesson, To trust in your brethren, As our fore-bearers once did, For Terunael.

Coda (both) Aye, my lover, For Terunael (Repeat to end)

A banner of Thorns

The three thorns sat around the glowing embers of their fire. They kept the flames low as a matter of course, ensuring they did not attract any attention from the Jotun they knew to be in the area. They passed a round bottle from hand to hand, listening to the rain, and speaking quietly.

"You know he's totally mad..." The first said, trailing off.

"You say that," retorted the second. "But we're finally here. At least he's doing something. That's my kind of mad. I'd take that over sane any day."

"Oh, I'm not saying I wouldn't follow him into the darkness, and back, if I had to." said the first, taking a quick swig from the bottle. "No-one denies he gets things done."

The third took the bottle of cider, and took a larger swig. She put the bottle down and addressed the others.

"He's crazy, and probably stupid. He took a risk, and right now it looks like it's paid off. That's it. But, you're right. He did something. We didn't swear our Thorn oath to watch our people get slaughtered. They say he's cursed, and he'll probably take us all with him... but I'd rather die trying."

"You think we'll die then?"

"Everyone dies Alaw - what matters is the manner of your going not the day."

Overview

The Black Thorns fight to liberate Liathaven. The remaining resistance fighters and survivors of the Jotun purge - many of whom have survived thanks to the assistance of the heroes of the Empire - flock to their banner.

But the fight for Liathaven has only begun. While there are no major orc forces in the south, there is no news from West Ranging, Liath Ring, or Liaven's Glen in the north. There are major Jotun forces in Kahraman and the Mournwold to the east, and unknown numbers of orcs in Hordalant to the west.

The Black Thorns are fighting alone, and at any moment the Jotun might send forces east or west (or north out of the Lasambrian hills) to crush them.

It may be time for desperate measures.

Significance

There are several opportunities for the Navarr that concern the situation in Liathaven.

The Banner of Thorns

The Black Thorns banner is drawing survivors and resistance fighters to fight beneath it. For the first time they have hope that their homes may finally be liberated and the Jotun driven off for good. Yet the call to arms extends beyond Liathaven; soldiers from across the Navarr nation are drawn to aid the war in the south-west.

These additional thorns, as well as volunteers from all walks of life, are making their way via the trods to join the battle for Liathaven. The Imperial Senate may take advantage of these volunteers to commission the enlargement of the Black Thorns - (or the Quiet Step if they move into Liathaven this season). However if they wish to exploit this opportunity they must begin immediately.

If they take advantage of the current opportunity then the final cost to make the army large will be 100 mithril and 25 thrones, and require two seasons. The first season of work may begin with a payment of 50 mithril and 15 thrones. To benefit from this opportunity, however, the army must continue fighting in Liathaven for the next two seasons.

The Hammer and the Anvil

The Black Thorns are currently engaged in the conquest of southern Liathaven, while the Quiet Step are in the Mourn. Important as the liberation of the Mournwold is to the Marchers, there is a strong feeling among many Navarr that the time is right to strike against the orcs in Liathaven. A great many Navarri have died at the hands of the relentless Jotun, and more will die the longer the territory remains in their hands. Those deaths must not go unanswered.

A call for unity could focus the attention of the entire nation on the goal of freeing Liathaven. The Navarr National Assembly or the General Assembly could pass a suitably worded judgement to encourage the Navarr to retake Liathaven as swiftly as possible. This will not require a named priest and the expenditure of liao, merely a clearly worded Statement of Principle.

The statement by itself will have no effect. However, if the Quiet Step then joins the Black Thorns in Liathaven, and the generals of both armies take attacking orders, then any Navarr military unit that chooses to support one of these armies will receive a significant bonus to their fighting strength (the equivalent of three additional ranks).

This opportunity may continue to be available in future seasons while the campaign in Liathaven continues.

The Dark Beneath the Trees

The Jotun do not like fighting in forests. They seem to have a superstitious dread of the vallorn woods in particular. For all that, the orcs have engaged in a campaign of slaughter against the Navarr of Liathaven - and there are many who are keen for the chance to enact a particularly bloody justice against them.

During this season, the general of any Navarr army engaged in Liathaven may choose to issue the "An Enduring Example" attacking order in place of their normal order.

An Enduring Example

- The ability of this army to capture territory is increased by a three-tenths
- Casualties suffered by this army are increased by a fifth

This order involves ruthless, merciless attacks against a hated enemy. Quarter is neither asked nor given, and the bodies of fallen enemies are despoiled and displayed as trophies to fill the hearts of the enemy with fear of the army taking the order. Some of the defenders retreating before the onslaught will pull back to adjacent territories, reinforcing Jotun forces there.

This order will increase the speed with which the army will be able to liberate Liathaven, but have the side effect of causing some of the fleeing Jotun soldiers to reinforce orc armies outside Liathaven.

This order may continue to be available in future seasons while the campaign in Liathaven continues.

The Paths of Lan Thúven

One of the problems the Navarr face in their liberation of Liathaven is the presence of the vallorn, which stretches across the middle of the territory cutting it in half. The Black Thorns in the south cannot assault the northern regions without passing through the miasma... and drawing the spawn of the vallorn in great numbers to defend their territory. While there is nothing to stop the Navarr fighting their way through the vallorn, there will be many deaths if they attempt it - and the vallorn is not weak enough for any land to be claimed from it at this time so they would need to create a second beachhead on the far side.

But the Navarr are not without options.

In Western Scout, on the very edge of the vallorn miasma, stand the crumbling pillars of an old gateway. The Gate of Lan Thúven dates back to pre-Imperial times; it may even be Terunael in origin. No stories remain to say who, or what, or where Lan Thúven might have been. Only the gate remains - this one, and a second gate in West Ranging on the far side of Liathaven.

Between them, according to refugees from the Jotun-burnt Hidden Walk steading, there is a path through the vallorn. A hidden way, following the route of an old Terunael road, woven with potent Night magic that blinds the eyes of the vallornspawn. The insular Hidden Walk used this route to travel deep into the Westwood, and to keep contact with their cousins on the other side of Liathaven at Silent Stand steading.

The Jotun seized both Hidden Walk and Silent Stand. The steadings were destroyed - but the gates that mark either end of the hidden path still stand. The orcs clearly realise that the gates are valuable, but treat them with the same superstitious dread they show towards anything associated with the vallorn.

Indeed, for the Jotun, the hidden path is effectively useless. They may pride themselves on their heroism and bravery, but the vallorn eats the brave and the heroic as readily as it devours all other fools. It requires a great deal of finesse and experience to traverse the vallorn, even with the protection of a hidden route through its depths. Regardless of what they know or suspect, the orcs have left warbands behind to protect each end of the hidden path. While large, neither warband is well supported - and the one camped near the ruins of Hidden Walk in the south is particularly isolated.

If the Navarr were to launch a surprise strike against one of the gates - either Hidden Walk or Silent Stand - then they would be able to bring the Paths of Lan Thúven under their control. The survivors of the fallen steadings have already agreed to demonstrate how to use the gateways to find and traverse the hidden route between the two.

OOO Note

Navarr vates have already detected a significant conjunction of the Sentinel Gate that provides an opportunity to strike at Silent Stand, in West Riding. It is currently set for 21:30 on Saturday, but conjunctions sometimes move unpredictably. Any magician can determine the current state of this conjunction using the normal method.

In the event that the Navarr are able to take control of one of the gates, the concealed road between them could be accessed. This would allow Navarr armies (and only Navarr armies - although smaller units from any nation could still accompany the larger Navarr forces), to treat Western Scout and West Ranging as if they were adjacent for purposes of establishing supply lines and moving back and forth - avoiding many of the difficulties presented by the vallorn that occupies the middle of Liathaven.

Resolution

During the Summer Solstice, the Navarr liberated the Paths of Lan Thúven allowing their armies free passage between the northern and southern parts of Liathaven.

While Corey Brackensong lead the Navarr national assembly in a call for unity in the face of the Jotun threat, the Quiet Step and the Black Thorns were engaged in different territories during the following season. Regardless, the Imperial Senate passed a motion to provide support to those Navarr warbands who wished to reinforce the Black Thorns more permanently, and the two-season process of enlarging that army has begun - although 50 wains of mithril and 10 Thrones will still need to be provided after the Autumn Equinox, and the army will need to remain in Liathaven during that time, if the opportunity is not to be wasted.

Finally, during the three months after the Summer Solstice, General Ulric Y'Basden of the Black Thorns instructed the troops to become the dark beneath the trees, and fill the hearts of the Jotun with terror. You can learn further details of the recent campaign in Liathaven here.

The Navarr National Assembly recognises the sacrifice needed by our armies to retake Liathaven and the Pride retaking Liathaven will bring to the nation. We urge the entire nation to unite behind our generals and ensure the fight is as swiftly as possible taken to the Jotun barbarians. Those who sacrificed their lives at Alwin's Stand and places unremembered must be honoured and we praise the Loyalty of Navarri who have the Courage to fight alongside the Black Thorns and the Quiet Step.

A big sleep

Rodrigo leaned in closer to his victim. The woman had a black eye, and blood crusted both nostrils. Her lip was swollen. She still stared back defiantly.

The bravo cracked his knuckles. She did not appear impressed. He drove a clenched fist into her stomach, forcing the air out of her. She would have collapsed had not the twins - Vittorio and Vanesca - held her upright between them.

He inspected his clenched fist, sounding the runes tattooed on his knuckles out in his mind. Might, Ending, Wisdom, Chance.

"Who are you working for?" He asked without looking at his prisoner. "Is it Isabella? Von Juntz? Carlotta?"

The woman shook her head slowly at each name, and simply stared at Rodrigo, tight lipped. It infuriated him but he tried not to let it show.

"Well it doesn't really matter. You're going to take a long stroll off of a short pier either way it turns out." He said. He leered. "Any last words?"

His prisoner licked cracked lips, swallowed, and spat bloody phlegm on the floor dangerously near his boot. Then she said something, quietly. Rodrigo strained to hear.

"What was that, soon-to-be-a-floater?" He asked, still leering.

She looked up then, and smiled a radiant smile and said:

"I said ... you're all under arrest."

Rodrigo laughed, and so did the twins.

"Under ... arrest! Oh that is priceless! Under arrest!?! Who is going to arrest us? You?"

Their laughter cut off suddenly, as the rear door of the warehouse exploded into splinters and Niccola came sprawling backwards through it, unconscious before she hit the floor.

"Honestly ... you vyig." said the woman calmly, as the warehouse began to fill with militia, and the twins nervously raised their hands.

"You have such a knack for well-timed dialogue. It's a pity more of you don't take up acting."

Overview

During the Summer Solstice, a force of League citizens launched a daring strike against a gathering of the illegal vyig criminal gang in the jewelled city of Sarvos. The subsequent interrogation of captured members of the vyig has led to warrants for the arrest of a number of lower-tier agents and sympathisers being issued to the Sarvosan militia. Within a few weeks of the Summer solstice, vyig operations in Sarvos have been brought to a close - along with a number of other criminal enterprises that came to the attentions of the magistrates during their extended operation.

This decisive strike against the criminals of Sarvos is also credited as a major influence on militia recruitment, which has seen a significant upswing in the last three months. It seems that, given evidence of the effectiveness of taking a stand against the vyig, the spectre of fear surrounding that organisation has been severely damaged (at least in Sarvos). The magistrates are quick to capitalise on this influx of volunteers, organising several effective strikes against secret vyig operations outside the city, as well as the more traditional criminal activities taking place within its walls.

When the dust clears, only one significant Sarvos vyig is unaccounted for - thanks in part to the effectiveness of the militia, and in part to the swift actions of a number of bounty hunters. Livueta Garovich di Sarvos seems to have slipped past the long reach of the law. Known for her big mouth and loud bravado, she was one of the most brutal lieutenants of "Uncle Sarvos" hardest lieutenants. Always ready with a knife in the hand it is rumoured she was involved in the mass murder of Donatella's Divers and the cold blooded assault of Alonso di Sarvos. She is to be considered armed and extremely dangerous, but is likely to have gone into hiding - or to have fled the Empire altogether given the ease of taking passage on a ship bound for foreign shores. There is still an outstanding warrant for her arrest, however.

Significance

The actions set in motion by the League heroes during the Summer solstice have lead to three distinct developments. In each case, these are only obvious effects or opportunities, and creative citizens may be able to find other interesting ways to take advantage of this situation.

Militia Approval

There has been a significant upswing in enthusiasm for the militia in Sarvos. Any League citizen who spent the bulk of the last season in the Jewelled City, and has ever considered volunteering for the militia, will feel an urge to do so at the next event. This is easy enough to resist, but it will recur any time you see a magistrate or a member of the militia about their duty.

Confiscated Assets

A number of personal resources - two businesses, a farm, and a forest - have become available in Sarvos for League citizens. These are seized assets, taken from the vyig, and as such are likely to be presented by public auction on Saturday evening. As personal resources, the winning bidder will need to arrange the usual paperwork to take control of their new resource - and pay the usual 2 crowns administrative fee in addition to their winning bid.

The Way

The assembly of Vigilance has an opportunity to capitalise on this success. Membership of the vyig is already illegal, thanks to a motion of the Senate. With a suitably worded judgement, the assembly of Vigilance could choose a named priest to coordinate local adherents of the Way and volunteers to actively encourage opposition to the vyig in one of Tassato, Holberg, or Temeschwar. With separate judgements, and a different priest chosen each time, the assembly could encourage resistance to the vyig in each of these three cities.

The chosen priest would need to be equipped with plenty of liao. The effectiveness of the project in a given city would depend on how much liao the priest submitted. The decision on how much liao to use is entirely in the priest's hands, once the assembly has appointed them to the task, and they may employ any amount they wish within the following guidelines (and assuming they have sufficient supply).

- Twenty-five doses would send a clear message to the vyig that they were unwelcome, and potentially encourage some informants to come forward. This might lead to some useful information about vyig activities in the target city.
- Fifty doses of liao would encourage citizens to report their suspicions about vyig activity, and would help the local militia and other volunteers stay alert for signs of criminal activity. This might provide leads that would allow the magistrates to interfere in vyig activities, and potentially disrupt vyig operation in the short term.
- However, if the chosen priest were to use a hundred doses of liao, it would represent a much more active opposition to the vyig focusing on encouraging militia membership, and immediate action against vyig supporters. This would significantly damage, or potentially put an end to, vyig activity in the targetted city. Unfortunately, due to the disruption this would cause in the cities in question - the vyig are much less likely to be taken by surprise, and may well be expected to resist the magistrates, militia, and priests in their investigations - all businesses in a city where this is being done would lose a quarter of their normal production.

In each case, if the assembly passes multiple judgements then multiple priests will be appointed and all will need to provide their own liao and set their own "level of response".

Regardless, the final outcome would also be subject to the nature of the city targetted. It will be much more difficult to impact vyig activity in Temeschwar than in Holberg or Tassato - not least because it is likely that even independent criminal outfits from other cities may be somewhat nervous about this and may be looking at how best to secure their own organizations against similar strikes.

Resolution

During the Autumn Equinox, the Vigilance assembly named three priests to oversee operations in the three League cities. Specifically, Vladimir von Temeschwar of the Brotherhood of the Ashen Tower to oversee investigations in Holberg; Valimir von Temeschwar of the Red Tower to oversee investigations in Tassato; and Irada von Temeschwar to oversee investigations in Temeschwar. The requisite amounts of liao were collected and prepared for distribution.

In each case, the priests have chosen to present active opposition to the vyig. While this will significantly damage vyig activity in the three cities, it will cause extensive disruption and impact the production of all businesses in Tassato, Temeschwar, and Holberg.

A business like any other (Trade Winds)

The little bell above the door tinkled merrily, and Estefan Giacomo von Sarvos slipped his book onto the shelf below the desk with one hand, smoothed his doublet with the other, and stood up straight with an expression of earnest enthusiasm on his face. His composure took a slight knock when he saw who had come in, but he did not let it show.

Two figures in heavy velvet robes glided into the shop. They wore full-face masks of pale ivory carved in the manner of fanciful demons, but that was hardly unusual for Sarvos. What made the shopkeeper a little uneasy were the voluminous hoods, the thick belts emblazoned with the many-rayed sun, and the strong smell of peculiar spices that accompanied them.

Internally, he cursed his brother for suggesting that they invest some of their excess profits in employing a street magician to place an enchantment on the shop. It always brought in the oddest customers.

The first figure through the door had a spear, and from beneath her robe there was the suggestion of leather armour. Presumably she could shed the cumbersome vestments quickly if a fight broke out - or perhaps she was simply trained to fight in heavy, smothering black cloth. She held the door open for the woman who followed her, and Estefan immediately recognised one of the necromantia - the Axou wizards. Her staff was heavy, weighted down with intricate dragonbone decorations, hung with delicate weltsilver bells that jingled slightly as she walked.

The door closed behind them. Estefan swallowed. The room seemed darker, almost - all that heavy black velvet.

"Good evening," said the woman, her voice muffled by her mask. Her companion ignored Estefan, and floated over to examine the pots of herbs laid out on one of the tables, lifting the lids and sniffing the contents with black-gloved fingers.

"Good evening ma'am, how can we help you today?"

The customer reached up and pulled down her mask. It slipped free to reveal a surprisingly young woman, her face beaded with sweat. She looked tired. Unsurprising - it had been a warm afternoon and the robes did not appear to breathe much.

"We are interested in buying some herbs," she said.

Estefan launched into his patter.

"Then you have come to the right place. We have just received an excellent shipment of bladeroot from Volodmartz, and some very fine mazzarine from the Spice Gardens at Feroz - indeed if you are interested in more mundane herbs and spices we also have ..."

The woman cut her off. Her companion had stopped looking over the herbs and slid over to stand behind her. Even though she was shorter than Estefan, with her cowl raised and her long staff, she seemed to loom very largely in the enclosed space of the shop.

"Yes, it certainly looks like you have excellent quality merchandise," said the young woman who had not spared even a glance for the pots of herbs since she came in. "But we are not looking to buy medicinal herbs at this time. We are after something a little more ... exotic."

The two Axou - one masked, the other bare-faced, stared at Estefan. The young woman raised her eyebrow suggestively.

Estefan's mind raced. What did they know? Who had they been speaking to? Were they what they seemed to be, or was this a baroque militia scheme to catch him out? He favoured them with a weak smile, and crossed the shop to switch the sign over to "Closed" and drop the latch. Then he returned to the counter and leant forward conspiratorially. The two women turned slightly to watch him, in a way that was frankly quite unsettling.

"Well ... I have recently receive a shipment of ... ah ... special herbs from Kallavesa if you are interested? And I also have something more meaty if that is to your taste, if you know what I mean?"

The young woman blinked at him, and frowned slightly. She seemed to have no idea what he was talking about. Had he misunderstood? What sort of trouble was he in now?

"You misunderstand. We are looking to purchase ..." here she leaned forward herself, the gentle whisper of velvet-on-velvet loud in the gloomy shop. "... liao."

He almost laughed. "Liao? Just liao? Not true liao? But that's not ill- I mean that's fine. Liao? Really?"

"Yes. Have we misunderstood? Is this not a business where one can purchase herbs? Liao is a herbal preparation is it not?"

"Well yes, and I guess I have a few doses, but really you should probably just -" he had been about to say "go to a priest" when the still-masked figure reached into her robe and pulled out quite an impressively clinking pouch and handed it to her companion. She put it down on the counter purposefully.

"- take a seat and I will see how much we can provide you with today." he finished smoothly. The young woman smiled and inclined her head, but his two guests made no move to sit down.

"How much are you looking to buy?"

The young woman casually opened the money pouch and Estefan saw that it appeared to contain quite a few Thrones. She took out several of the coins and weighed them in her hand.

"How much have you got?" she asked.

Overview

The Black-sailed Vessels of Axos

The Axos port of the Towers of Kantor is now open to Imperial fleets, and the Axou have completed work on an extensive embassy there now staffed by Imperial civil servants. You can learn more about the port here.

At the same time, black-sailed merchants from Axos are visiting ports in the Empire in significant numbers for the first time in decades. On the Bay of Catazar they favour the ports of the Brass Coast, the League, and Urizen over those of Highguard - but there are also reports of adventurous Axou captains braving the Semmerlak and visiting Varushka and Dawn. They bring with them shipments of beggar's lye, orichalcum, peculiar spices, fine dark cloth, rich wines, unfamiliar delicacies, seductive narcotics, and oddly beautiful art objects carved from ivory and bone. In return they seem particularly interested in purchasing fine metalwork, luxurious Imperial food and drink, measures of dragonbone and ingots of green iron. Oh, and liao. But more of that later.

Several of their ships also bear dour and gloomy Skouran passengers, in groups of two or three. They sell beautifully cut gemstones; high-grade gold, silver, and iron; breathtaking jewellery; and fine tempest jade. In return show a great deal of interest in the fruits of the forests of the Empire, as well as large amounts of preserved foodstuffs - especially citrus fruit for some reason which appears to be a mild delicacy among them. Only a few have travelled with the Axou so far, and they are extremely closed-mouthed about their business.

A thirst for liao

One trade good the Axou seem very keen to acquire is liao. They are evasive when asked why they want it, but they cannot conceal the fact that there is a market for the substance in the citadels of Axos. As a consequence, demand for liao has spiked - at least temporarily. Any character with a congregation who chooses to sell their liao in the coming season will receive 20 rings (1 crown) rather than the usual 12 rings. It is very likely that this price increase will be temporary - as it currently stands the price is likely to drop back to normal levels by Spring if nothing else changes.

The Imperial Synod may choose to use a statement of principle to encourage, or discourage, this trade. If the statement passes with a greater majority, it might influence the outcome of this opportunity. Similarly, the Imperial Senate may pass a Senate motion to amend the law regarding the trade of liao to the Axou - in this case the price will remain at the current level.

If the Senate or the Synod does intervene, the price of liao will be made clear at the start of downtime.

During the Autumn Equinox 380YE, the Imperial Senate formally recognised the importance of trade with the Principalities of Jarm, and expressed interest in strengthening trade between the two nations. Word has come that the House of Princes has finally gotten around to removing the last of the trade sanctions against the Empire, and has issued a statement of their own that echoes that of the Senate encouraging closer ties with the Empire.

The Empire recognises the importance of extant and future trade in strategic materials with our allies in Jarm and welcomes any overtures to strengthen existing agreements or form new ones.

While governments make such statements all the time, this has had a positive effect on trade with the Jarmish ports. Jarmish traders are enthusiastically looking for opportunities to secure more Imperial custom, and each of the three Jarmish ports is providing a little extra wealth to Imperial traders who visit in the coming months.

- The northern port of Kavor will supply an additional ingot of green iron in the coming season.
- The southern port of Vezak will supply an additional crystal mana to each visiting ship.
- The eastern port of Rigia will provide an additional measure of dragonbone.

This increase in potential prosperity is contingent upon the Empire finishing the Winter Solstice still on good terms with the Principalities of Jarm. There may be further opportunities thanks to this blossoming of positive international feeling - there has been a rumour of Jarmish interest in the Tassato Mana Exchange for example. Oswi Twiceburned is the Imperial title of Ambassador to Jarm and may know more.

Stone Hearts of the Suranni

The Suranni port of Robec has long been closed to merchant vessels from the Empire, with some limited trade between the two powers confined to the less profitable overland routes. While the frosty relations with the Iron Confederacy thawed a little following their annexation of Kalino, many of the powerful Ducal Houses remain highly suspicious of the Empire and unconvinced of its good intentions. Indeed, there are reports from southern Feroz that the Suranni have begun work on a significant fortification in Kalino, overlooking one of the main routes through the southern Lasambrian Hills to the heartland of the Iron Confederacy.

Yet for all its veneer of unity, it is composed of several Ducal Houses who regularly vie for supremacy. There are reports that one or more of the Dukes of the eastern confederacy is interested in potentially extending a guarded hand of friendship to Imperial traders. The Marquis Flavien du Libellue, a seasoned diplomat and traveller by Iron Confederacy standards, has been appointed by this faction to handle negotiations with the Empire. The 'Dragonfly Marquis' has spent the past season navigating the interests of the feuding Houses and the stern priesthood of Surann to build a deal that he can now offer to the Empire. There are few publicly known details, but indications are that the port of Robec may be opened to Imperial traders in return for a significant bribe of some sort. It is likely that the Imperial Ambassador to the Iron Confederacy, Starac Sijed Orzel of House Orzel in Dawn, will be the first to learn the details of the proposal.

Faraden caravans

The Faraden lords and ladies continue to send caravans into the Empire. They pass back and forth through the northern Lasambrian hills unmolested by the Jotun thanks to a binding treaty between the two. It has been decades since there have been so many Faraden in the Empire. Occasionally, this is less than ideal - they are unashamed heretics (they embrace a false virtue) and blasphemers (they deny Wisdom, Ambition, and Vigilance). But they are rich and they show every sign of enjoying the Prosperity that free trade with the Empire can bring. There has been talk of some problems back east - the merchants seem particularly keen to acquire iridescent gloaming. Yet for the most part, the Faraden are friendly, open, and entrepreneurial. There is some talk of how nice it would be if the Empire were to build caravan stops and trade enclaves for the use of the Faraden, and a great deal of approval of the Blood Red Roads project. It is possible that the current Ambassador to Faraden, Tal'Shar i Zabala i Erigo, may know more.

Provide your customers with products they need and charge a little bit to stimulate your market and before you know it customers come to depend on you, I mean really need you.

Roper

Deathly Smiles

The Sarcophan Delves continue to present a carefully neutral face toward the Empire, remaining open and welcoming to Imperial trade. They continue to make no demands of the Empire - neither reasonable or unreasonable - but they also continue to engage in open diplomatic relations with the Grendel whose vessels are now regular visitors to the wealthy southern port.

Whatever else they are, the Sarcophan people are pragmatic merchants and are known to value their neutrality. A recent treaty between the Senate and one of the Bedelaar-Huisbaas has seen work on a loading dock begin in the busy international trade port of Cargo in Urizen that, when completed, will allow the purchase of white granite by a chosen minister. It is likely that now there is a formal Ambassador to the Sarcophan Delves, Thanmir Hrafnar, they will look to secure further trade opportunities with the Empire.

Sumaah and the Imperial Crown

The Präster of the Sumaah Republic are still believed to be in possession of the Imperial Crown - the symbol of Imperial authority since the time of the First Empress. They also remain at war with the Empire - and the port of Zemeh remains closed to Imperial visitors. The skeletal staff at the Suumah embassy in Necropolis conduct what little business they have with a minimum of fuss. They have issued no further statement since Autumn. Reports from foreign traders suggest that their priests are active in Sarcophan, Jarm, and the Commonwealth quietly undermining Imperial efforts in these nations, especially any efforts by the Imperial Synod to spread "their version" of the Way.

While invited to the Symposium of Revelation by the Imperial Orc Cardinal of the Way, they have issued no formal response since their Autumn statement that there would be no possibility of any of their priests attending while it is a hotbed of heterodoxy, heresy, blasphemy, and idolatry.

The Good of the Commonwealth

Relations with the Commonwealth continue to be chilly. The Senate's decision to endorse closer trade links with the Principalities of Jarm, and its reciprocation, have not gone unnoticed. Indeed, given the poor relations between those two great nations, it is entirely possible Jarmish emissaries have been rubbing the noses of their Commonwealth opposite numbers in it. The trade tariffs and bureaucratic hoops that captains visiting the Commonwealth have had to navigate in recent years have not yet been reinstated, however. It is possible the Commonwealth is waiting to see what this statement from the Senate means for their future relations before reacting.

The market's don't like instability, and they don't like uncertainty.

Plain Sailing in Asavea

Trade with the Asavean Archipelago continues steadily. Most of their interest at the moment seems to be focused on the Temple of Balo and the Black Bull. Some trade opportunities are mentioned in that wind of fortune, contingent on the successful completion of one or both of the temples involved. For now, however, relations with the Archipelago, the Plenum, and the priests of Asavea, appears to be good.

Dragons and gold

The Thule orcs have expressed some cautious interest in establishing an embassy and opening trade routes with the northern Empire. More details can be found here.

If a merchant in England sends an article of English manufacture abroad which costs him a shilling at home, and imports something which sells for two, he makes a balance of one shilling in his favour; but this is not gained out of the foreign nation or the foreign merchant, for he also does the same by the articles he receives, and neither has the advantage upon the other.

A fine and private place

The players finished their play, and took their bows. The audience was silent, until a small polite clap grew to a crescendo in the small tavern.

The actors quickly thanked the crowd and ran back stage. The farcical comedy of the Empress Teleri and the Archmage of Summer was one of their most popular plays. The paragons knew, the people of the Marches needed cheering up as grim curses ran riot among their farms and the first stories of the battle for Mournwold began to filter in from the south.

They had performed the plays countless times - even reduced the dour Highborn in Necropolis to tears of laughter during one triumphant, golden night. It was simple enough and suited their style - one act, set in the Chamber. Always the Chamber. Exposing weakness was such a key theme of the play, empowering the humour that comes from playing the Prince against the Mountebank.

Jane of Sutton asked the question first. When the heck had they decided to use the Tomb set instead? Mummer dramaturgy tended toward the improvisational but they usually at least blocked out the main thrust before each performance. This time everything had just ... changed. Midstream, as it were.

None of them could agree who had first shaded the dialogue to include the mausoleum, nor when the throne had become the sarcophagus of the pious martyr. Each one of them had become so caught up in the scene, and then somehow the play had changed.

The comedy had still been there, but it had been darker. Blacker. The not-quite-romance between the pious Empress and the bawdy Marcher had an edge of tragedy about it, of loss. It was certainly not the play they had rehearsed, and it wasn't at all what they had intended to present to the drunken patrons of the Horse and Six Buckets.

The crowd appeared to have appreciated it, so no harm done. Yet it was still a little worrying. They were due to perform the play again tomorrow at the Widderson Fair ... this time with a few more laughs, hopefully.

Overview

For inscrutable reasons, it is the dramaturgists who first become aware of the change. Actors are sensitive at the best of times, and it does not take a genius to notice that as Autumn turns to Winter everyone seems to be setting their plays in the Tomb. The majority defend their artistic decisions vociferously, of course, but a rare few admit that it just "seemed like a good idea but now I can't remember why".

In some cases it is quite jarring - the tomb represents tragedy and transition; to see a romantic tryst, a stirring oratory, or a tense political scene in the context of a mausoleum, cemetery, or graveyard is occasionally offputting and invariably warps the context and implications of the scene. The theatre-going patrons of the League troupes (and the fairground audiences of the guisers, and patrons of the mummers open-air shenanigans) tend to be nonplussed ... but broadly positive. The plays are still good after all. Just occasionally a little .. odd. Scholars of dramaturgy however are a little less sanguine. In a mystical context, the Tomb represents curses; condemnation; conclusions; oaths and promises; weakness, fear, and poison after all.

As the Winter Solstice draws near, however, the hints at something significant occurring finally resolve themselves as information about the peculiar events at the Imperial regio begins to filter out to the magicians of the Empire. And shortly after that, the first heralds begin to appear.

Significance

There is a second regio at Anvil. This is a new magical aura, strongly aligned to Winter magic. Those who spend more than a few minutes in its presence find themselves subject to disquieting thoughts. More importantly, the regio appears to open into a hitherto unknown chamber, close to the realm of Winter itself. Finally, this new regio does not appear to have been cut from whole cloth - which has some unsettling implications for the Imperial regio.

The new regio is considered a strong Winter regio for purposes of performing rituals. It allows any magician who already possesses the knowledge of Winter lore to spend one more crystal mana than normal when performing a winter ritual. Perhaps more significantly, however, it does not have the same sympathy with the entire Empire that the Imperial regio does. As a consequence, it cannot be used to target rituals on other parts of the Empire.

OOO Explanation

This strong winter regio allows the performance of rituals such as Whispers through the Black Gate, but it will not allow rituals to target territories other than Casinea.

Any draughir character can sense the presence of the winter regio once they are in Anvil by concentrating for a few moments; any such player can ask a referee for its location. A draughir may do so before time-in if they wish, but are asked to refrain from discussing the location of the regio out-of-character.

Any character can confirm if they are in presence of the new regio by performing the detect magic spell with the assistance of a referee.

Strange Thoughts

Anyone who spends more than a few minutes at the new Winter regio finds their thoughts being influenced by it. Those of the draughir lineage are most strongly affected, finding all of their usual instincts and tendencies greatly enhanced. Any orc, or human without lineage who interacts with the regio will find themselves picking up mild draughir characteristics - becoming emotionally cold; experiencing a strong affinity for their friends and allies and antipathy for strangers; becoming calculating with a reduced sense of ethics and morality; and never being entirely satisfied with any plan. Those of the naga, cambion, briar, changeling, or merrow lineages may feel a vague sense of one of these traits, but it is extremely mild. In all cases the roleplaying effect fades after five minutes of being away from the new regio.

Threshold of Winter

Beginning at 4pm on the Saturday of the Winter Solstice, any magician can use the operate portal spell to open the portal at the heart of the regio, allowing them to travel to the "winter chamber" that lies in some indefinable way "nearby". This does not follow the same as the portal from the Imperial regio - performing operate portal allows one to enter the chamber, but must be repeated each time one wishes to enter, and repeated again to allow one to leave. In each case the magician will need to expend one personal mana - again, this is not the portal to the Hall of the Worlds but an entirely separate portal that operates using the standard rules for portals.

The portal closes permanently at midnight on the same day.

The portal is in all ways a normal regio portal - it may be tricked with a Pauper's Key or The Ambassadorial Gatekeeper; it may be sealed temporarily at either end by Pakaan's Iron Shutters; and so on.

A Sense of Loss

The Imperial regio has been impacted significantly by the presence of this additional regio. Analysis of the regio has indicated that until Sunday morning of the Winter solstice, the Imperial regio effectively has no winter component. It does not count as a powerful Winter regio; it does not empower the performance of Winter magic; and it will not allow Winter rituals to target other Imperial territories.

At sunrise on Sunday morning, the Imperial regio should return to normal. Probably.

The Heralds of Winter

This is not a natural phenomenon. For seven days leading up to the event, hooded creatures identifying themselves as messengers of the winter eternal Tharim have been seeking out Winter covens and powerful practitioners of Winter magic and delivering public declarations, reading from scrolls inscribed onto pale leather. The content of the declarations is the same in each case:

Scions of Atun and Atuman; the royal houses of the Dawn; the tribes of Kallavesi and Suaq; the heirs of Aldrei the Fair; the scions of Terrunel; the masters of the High Peaks; the Princes of Jarm; the descendants of the Sorcerer-Kings; the tribes of the Dragon; and the sons and daughters of Naguerro. Hear the words of the King Bound in Chains.

I have created a regio that will allow travel to a Winter Chamber from the fourth hour of the afternoon on the Winter Solstice until midnight of that day. Let magicians who are skilled practitioners of winter lore come to that chamber to speak with the sovereign-lords of the Wasteland.

Let it be known that this chamber is neutral territory between your nations and any others who may come before us as ambassadors of their people; any violence or theft against another guest will see that nation earn the ire of all the sovereign-lords of the Wasteland. Do not test our will; we are united in this regard. So swears Tharim, Skathe and Surat, Rangara and Kaela, Agramant and Sorin.

During this time we will accept tribute from your people in the form of Dragonbone. Each of us has prepared boons. We will magnanimously grant these boons to you in return for your tribute. Whichever among you gives the greatest amount of dragonbone for each of the boons we have prepared shall gain sole custody of that boon.

I trust that each of the nations we have invited will decide who will be giving tribute for their nation. let none who does not rightfully claim to belong to that nation offer tribute to us lest they incur the wrath of their ancestors.

So is my word given

Tharim, the King Bound in Chains

Many of the "nations" described no longer exist - have not since the formation of Empire. There are some interesting exceptions - and also some significant questions, especially around exactly who Tharim and the other "sovereign-lords of the Wasteland" are treating as scions of Atun and Atuman, and who they think the "heirs of Alderei the Fair" might be.

Regardless, there appears to be a significant magical event taking place and it appears that Imperial magicians - or at least some of them - have been offered front-row seats.

Resolution

Shortly before the Spring Equinox 380YE, heralds of Tharim again visited the Empire to reveal who had gained the favour of the winter eternal. Details of this event are listed here.

A fundamental struggle (Trade Winds)

"I'm not very happy about this," said Captain Gerralt.

The orc in front of him shrugged, and spread his hands, but there was nothing apologetic about his gesture.

"I apologise. You are absolutely free to depart now, if you wish. We will end the inspection and you may seek another port. But if you wish to do business in Leerdam, you will do so only once I am reassured that your cargo is legitimate."

The orc commander made a curt gesture and rattled out a series of instructions in the Gemeinsamesprache. The uniformed orcs began to spread out across the deck. Captain Gerralt could see that the crew did not like it. Being boarded by orcs, even orcs in the uniform of a Commonwealth force, did not sit well with them. The Dawnishman wondered if it was a studied insult. It seemed unlikely. This was Leerdam, after all, not Kavor or Nemoria.

"My earl will be very unhappy if your warriors break anything."

"My soldiers." the orc stressed the word. "My soldiers will be thorough and careful. If anything should be damaged during our inspection you will of course be reimbursed - assuming that is that no contraband is found of course."

The orc paused for a moment, leaving a space for Gerralt to speak. When the yeoman did not immediately interject, the commander continued.

"Now can I ask what you are carrying in your hold today?"

"Wood," said Gerralt carefully. "Hardwood from the forests of Weirwater. Also wine and brandy. Fine quality merchandise as well, from the vineyards of Astolat. We also have some pots of True Vervain - healing salves, yes?"

Gerralt mimed smearing something on his face. He was rattled, and on the verge of babbling. The orc commander did not quite roll his eyes but it was clear he knew what True Vervain was for.

"That is good. Now I must ask you this. Are all members of your crew free citizens of your Empire? If any are not you must tell me now. If you do not admit it now, and it is later found that you are using slaves, then you will be charged with a serious crime and your vessel will be confiscated."

The Dawnishman was beginning to get angry, but strove to control his temper.

"No of course we have no slaves aboard! We're Imperial, by the Paragons! This is an outrage!"

"Nevertheless, I will need to speak to each member of your crew before they disembark. Die Stahlhalle is concerned that some Imperial ships may be relying on the labor of people who are not free. Such a thing is not acceptable in the Commonwealth. I will also need to review a copy of your cargo manifest and match it against the contents of your hold. Again, if it is found out later that you have attempted to deceive me you will be taken into custody and face at a fine and expulsion from Commonwealth waters."

Gerralt sputtered.

"You have no reason to -" he began but the orc commander cut him off.

"Please do not waste your breath on outrage, Captain. Your Empire's commitment to the dignity of sapient beings appears to be waning. Your primary trading partners are the Asaveans and the Jarmish. Even without the denunciations of the Sumaah, it is clear to us that your ethics are flexible. You will not set one foot on Commonwealth soil until I am certain that you are not someone who prospers from unjustly denying the liberty of other people. If you have nothing to hide, you will have nothing to fear. Although I must warn you that since your last visit Die Stahlhalle has placed additional restrictions on what goods may be freely traded with Imperial captains."

The yeoman looked around, one hand on his money pouch, and opened his mouth to suggest that perhaps they could discuss it further somewhere quieter.

The orc soldier narrowed his eyes and interrupted.

"While we are talking, I wish to mention that attempting to bribe an officer of the Common Law is also a significant crime which may result in the confiscation of all goods and potentially up to five years in prison. Was there something you wished to say, friend Captain?"

Gerralt shut his mouth again, and shook his head.

"That is excellent news. Now, may I see the papers that prove that you are the legitimate captain of this vessel, and record your port of origin?"

Overview

The Empire does not exist in isolation. Every season, brave captains set sail from Sarvos and Tassato; from Meade and Siroc; from Korotny and Lacre; and from a dozen smaller ports across the Empire. Their ships cross vast distances, holds burgeoning with Imperial goods, returning weeks later with exotic goods from distant shores.

Yet the Empire is by no means universally liked, or respected. The international arena is as brutal and bloodthirsty as any fighting pit.

The captains who risk the open seas to visit foreign ports return with more than mere trade goods - they often bring with them the first warning of changes in the political landscape that might have profound effects on the Empire at home, as well as abroad.

A great deal of world politics is a fundamental struggle, but it is also a struggle that has to be waged intelligently.

Zbigniew Brzezinski

War with Sumaah

Despite the completion of the embassy in Necropolis, the Sumaah Republic remains at war with the Empire - and the port of Zemeh remains closed to Imperial visitors. The Imperial Senate has not declared war on the Sumaah in turn, however, so legally the Empire continues to treat citizens of the Republic as foreigner guests, rather than barbarian invaders.

The Imperial Senate will appoint the Ambassador to the Sumaah Republic during the Spring Equinox - most likely during their first session. Any citizen may be put forward as a candidate, and they are likely to have their work cut out for them - but unless someone with the authority to deal with the Republic reaches out to Heln Stianser; Censor of wood, metal and stone; The High House of Prosperity; Sumaah Republic, the situation can only continue to deteriorate.

Sumaah diplomats continue to conspire against the Empire, however. They denounce the Imperial Synod as schismatic heretics and blasphemers, and their words carry weight with many foreign nations. Regardless of how governments may feel about the Republic, they are seen as straightforward and honest in their approach to their religion. Attitudes to the Imperial practice of the Way are shifting slowly to the negative - the Imperial Synod is no longer seen as the primary definition of what constitutes virtuous behaviour by adherents in other countries. While this is primarily a matter of faith at the moment, it has the potential to damage relations in other areas as well - if the Empire are seen as hypocrites it will do little for their reputation abroad.

There are two obvious exceptions however. The people of Asavea - where the Sumaah have no influence, and who are actually predisposed to be more friendly to people the Sumaah are angry with - and the Eastern Principalities of Jarm (see below). While diplomatic relations are hard to predict, it is likely that the first practical result of the Sumaah campaign will be the reduction in the effectiveness of Synod-supported enclaves such as the Limitu Principality House of the Way.

There is one positive note in the symphony of distrust and recrimination, however. The Statement of Principle by Naomi of Felix's Watch during the Winter Solstice that stating that "The Synod supports the Sumaah Republic in their missionary work to convert the slaves of the Asavean Archipelago to the Way of Virtue" at least suggests that the possibility of peace exists, and that while the divisions between the faithful of these two proud nations are deep they are not insurmountable.

Trade with Asavea

Following the abrogation of the short-lived law criminalizing trade in white granite, mithril, weirwood, and ilium with the Asavean Archipelago, relations between the two nations have returned to their previous friendly state.

Nemoria remains a port that welcomes Imperial ships, and an opportunity currently exists to improve relations even further - potentially to the point where the western port becomes an even more lucrative option for fleet captains.

The only fly in the ointment is the continued criticism and complaint from the powerful Tarquinius family. Influential in the Plenum, they are currently demanding that "swift and final retribution" fall on the heads of the "malefactors and scoundrels" responsible for cursing a scion of their family who was on a diplomatic mission to the Empire. For the time being, however, they seem to have little support from their fellow nobles.

Commonwealth Red Tape

Following the completion of the Commonwealth embassy in the City of a Thousand Sails, news has reached the Empire that an Imperial embassy has been established in the port of Leerdam. A staff of civil servants have already taken up residence.

Despite the formal opening of diplomatic relations, attitudes to the Empire remain cool. Every Imperial ship visiting the Commonwealth encounters significant new tariffs and restrictions on trade - as well as having to endure an unpalatable search by officers of the law allegedly looking for slaves and illicit goods.

Furthermore, the supply of crystal mana in the western Commonwealth port of Volkavaar seems to have largely dried up. It is not clear whether this is due to significant reductions in the amount of mana being produced, or whether the mana is simply being directed elsewhere, but going forward Imperial captains will no longer be able to acquire crystal mana from Commonwealth ports. At the same time, it appears the Commonwealth has relaxed restrictions on the trade of Artisan's Oil to foreign nations, and captains visiting Volkavaar will be able to acquire this useful substance relatively cheaply.

The primary cause of the Commonwealth's distant attitude to the Empire appears to be their contradictory and unclear attitude to the practice slavery. It is possible that some unequivocal statements denouncing the institution from the Imperial Synod, Imperial Conclave, and/or Imperial Senate may go some way towards addressing this perception. There is currently no Ambassador to the Commonwealth. The title is likely to be appointed during the coming summit - and it is likely that a clear message from that individual to the Commonwealth government (most likely through Militärattache Ludkhannah Schöningen, die Stahlhalle, Volkavaar) may also help in this regard.

The Politics of Princes

On Sunday shortly after noon the Jarmish House of Princes met to discuss making the ban on trade of crystal mana to imperial citizens permanent. In part due to some excellently apologetic letters sent from 'Cato Echostorm on behalf of the Imperial Senate and then-archmage Corvus on behalf of the Imperial Conclave, the House not only declined to extend the embargo, but ultimately voted to remove it entirely! Jarmish politics can be a confusing and mercurial thing.

On the other hand, the Magician-Princes of the North and South are still unhappy with continuing Imperial interference in Jarmish politics - which means that there are still all sorts of bureaucratic nightmares and uncooperative merchants to deal with meaning that Imperial captains are still having a few problems in Vezak and Kavor. Yet interest in the vendetta is clearly waning, and unless the Empire gives the Jarmish another reason to be outraged, it is likely that they will turn their attention to more pressing matters.

Rigia, Eastern Principalities of Jarm

By contrast, the Eastern princes are overjoyed and very well disposed toward the Empire. The continued support of Imperial captains in establishing Rigia as a significant trade port has paid dividends, with other foreign nations taking their lead from the Empire. As such, Rigia is fully established as a functioning port - and the merchants responsible for trading green iron in particular are being quick to offer excellent deals to the Imperial captains. It's not clear how long this gratitude will last - presumably long enough for sufficient Imperial ships to go there to collect all the slaves Duke Ferrero has purchased.

Plus, the missionary (or perhaps more correctly anti-missionary) work of Stormcrow Beodun Snowlock of Wintermark in the Eastern principalities has almost certainly helped the situation along. With an invitation from Prince Barbara Radz. the Imperial Synod sent him to oversee efforts to both reduce the impact of Sumaah missionaries spreading anti-Imperial rhetoric in that part of Jarm, and to encourage and support the local followers of the Way - with some success.

Sardonic Sarcophan

The Sarcophan Delves continue to remain neutral toward the Empire. They remain open and friendly to Imperial fleets - as they are to traders from all corners of the globe. Even the Grendel are welcome in Sarcophan. Likewise, their ships are regular visitors to the ports of the Bay of Catazar, and trade between the two nations remains healthy.

To date they seem to have made no demands of the Empire - neither reasonable or unreasonable - and continue to appear unconcerned about their status as the only major world power without an embassy on Imperial soil.

Suranni, Axou, Faraden, and Regario

Not all Imperial attention is focused on the nations far across the sea, however. Following the decision to expand the Regario Dossier, covert agents are now active in the Iron Confederacy port of Robec, in the coastal Axou citadels of Issyk and Kantor, and even at the Court of the Five Winds in Faraden. Custody of the Regario Dossier Imperial Bourse Seat will be auctioned during the Spring Equinox; the victor will receive the eponymous dossier itself once their identity is confirmed. It is likely that the dossier will contain recommendations as to how the Empire might go about formalizing trade with these nearby nations in addition to the usual information about the more distant countries.

OOC Note

While trade exists between the Empire and the neighbouring nations of Faraden and the Iron Confederacy, it currently does so beneath the abstraction level. With sufficient diplomacy, however it might be possible for the Empire to negotiate access to the ports of the Suranni and the Axou, or to arrange something similar with the Faraden, allowing Imperial fleets access to the wealth of the nearby nations as well as those further afield.

When diplomacy ends, War begins.

A guide to fabrics for kitmaking

When it comes to making your costumes, there is a baffling array of names and terms to describe fabric. Here is an attempt to help you make sense of it, as well as giving a rough guide to what I've found to be the best use for each textile.

All of this is presented merely as a series of suggestions, which you can heed as much or as little as you fancy - you might have more skill or luck with stuff that I've never had any joy with.

Natural Fabrics

Natural fabrics include silk, linen, cotton and wool. We're not re-enactors, so authenticity isn't a major consideration, but in my opinion these fabrics look better, are more comfortable and will wear better than their synthetic counterparts. Often they're no more expensive, and with careful shopping they can actually be cheaper and longer-lasting.

Silk

For beautiful costume, there really is nothing to equal it. Advantages - vast range of available colours, comfortable, easy to work with, wears wonderfully. Disadvantages - can be expensive if you don't shop carefully. Often not machine washable.

For Dawnish gowns and surcotes, you're might start by looking for silk dupion, a slightly roughly woven fabric which is widely available. You shouldn't pay more than about £10 per metre, which makes your surcote surprisingly affordable at £20-30. Silk taffeta is generally more expensive, but you may prefer its smoother look to the slightly "slubby" dupion. Silk satin is almost exclusively a bridal fabric, and as such commands a premium. However, if you're lucky enough to find heavy silk satin on sale, it makes the ultimate in a luxurious statement.

In the Brass Coast, the loose, flowing gowns and elaborate veils are ideally suited to silk habotai, silk chiffon and silk georgette. These can often be expensive to buy in colours, but the great thing is that they are widely available cheaply for silk painting. You can dye them yourself very easily (use cold water or silk dyes for best results) to get some fantastic variegated colours in a palette of your choosing to make some truly unique and wonderful costume.

Commonly called "raw" silks, silk matka and silk noil are rough textiles woven from the outer husk of the silk cocoon. They look a lot like coarse linen, but are wonderfully comfortable, machine washable and take dye perfectly. For a wandering minstrel's robe, a pious knight's cloak and surcote or a low status yeoman they're perfect, and are often cheaper than smoother silks.

Linen

Linen is the most 'historical' of the commonly available fabrics - its hard wearing and readily available.

Advantages - 'authentic', wears nicely, easy to sew, available in a variety of weights, generally not too expensive (£4-12 per metre), available in lots of colours, takes machine dye very well.

Disadvantages - very "crushy", needs pressing, needs pre-washed before sewing. You can get linen blends, where the fibres are mixed with other materials - linen/cotton blend is perfect and combines the advantages of both. Sometimes a polyester/linen blend looks just like the real thing but crushes less.

You can use linen almost anywhere in your costume - a good rule is to use the finer and lighter ones closer to your skin, and coarser ones the further out you go. In the "posher" countries such as Dawn and Brass Coast you might not want to use it for your top layer, as it can look a bit rustic unless you choose some vivid colours and trim it, in which case it looks fabulous.

Cotton

A great cheap fabric for kit. Like linen, wear the softer, lighter ones close to your skin, and the heavier ones as outerwear. Advantages - available in a huge range of colours, weights and textures, cheap, wears well, comfortable, cool in summer. Disadvantages - can look cheap and flimsy. Choose your cotton wisely!

I wouldn't tend to use lightweight cotton for a top layer - flimsy cotton tabards and cloaks are a bit of a cliché in larp costuming, and they can very rapidly look shabby. As an alternative to linen, you could try looking in charity shops for woolen blankets or heavy linen-look curtains - something with a bit more substance to it will look much better in the long term.

Wool

Wool was a staple of medieval costume, and you can get a wool fabric to suit any costume at all. It ranges from lightweight for ladies' gowns, mens doublets and hose, through medium weight into heavy wool melton, which is perfect for winter surcotes, houppelandes and cloaks. You can get polyester blends which are usually quite good, but check first to make sure they're not too plasticky. Lightweight silk/wool blends are wonderful if you can get your hands on them.

As a rule, it shrinks badly in the wash, so don't count on being able to machine wash things made of wool.

Velvet

Velvet is a catch all term for a napped fabric with a woven backing. You can get it in silk, cotton, rayon and other synthetics. Generally cotton velvet is the most affordable (£5-15 pm) and has the right weight for heavy gowns that look like they belong in the medieval period. Technically they used a silk velvet, but modern silk velvet is far lighter and more flowing than its historical antecedent, making it a perfect choice for soft, flowing, "elven" style gowns (almost all of Arwen's gowns in Lord of the Rings were made of it, for example). Rayon velvet looks nice and can be a good choice for a heavyweight gown, but one thing I've found is that it marks badly when it gets wet, and melts if you iron it. Be warned!

Stretch velvets are a bit of a mixed blessing - good ones can look like silk velvet and make fitting a bit easier. Look for ones with a rich, deep pile - ones that don't have much depth to them generally don't look great or wear very well. I personally don't like crushed stretch velvets as I've found they look a bit modern, are a bugger to work with and wear terribly.

Fur and fake fur

Fur trim or lining can look great, and is really cosy.

If you're adding fur trims, you can avoid pelts from animals kept in poor conditions in several ways;

- Faux furs can be an excellent substitute to real fur, but beware of cheap 'fun furs' which always look like nylon and matt together very quickly. Fabrics Online sell some excellent quality faux furs in various colours, lengths and patterns.
- Vintage furs are cheap and easily available online, from charity shops (you may have to ask for them) and from car boot sales. One coat can trim a range of garments and torn furs can be bought for a few pounds.
- Furs can also be bought after licensed culls of animals and you can be sure they have not been farmed.
- Finally, there are ethical furriers around. House of De Clifford are one who sell a huge range of products online. They can advise you on the provenance of their goods. Their coyote pelts, for example, are by-products of overpopulation culls, and make great substitutes for wolf-furs on cloaks.

Whether working with real or fake fur it's best to cut your pieces out on the wrong side, using a scalpel or razor blade - it stops you chopping into the fur fibres and looks nicer. It's still very messy, so you might want to put dust sheets down and consider wearing a mask (or you'll be sneezing furry bits for days.)

Synthetic fibres

In my head, I divide these into three groups - blends, "true" synthetics, and rayon. A natural fabric blended with a bit of acrylic or polyester is generally ok- just check that it moves and behaves the way you want it to, doesn't look too plasticky and be wary that it might be a bit sweaty to wear. "True" synthetics - acrylic and polyester - are basically plastic. Think carefully before spending hours making costume out of something that might be as comfortable to wear as a bin bag. On the whole, they make you sweat, pick up static and look unconvincing. Of course, there are always exceptions - there are some lovely synthetic taffetas that I made a whole series of gowns in, which look and handle much like the vastly more expensive silks - but be careful, even they were pretty hot to wear, and I wouldn't want them against my skin. Rayon is a man-made fibre which is made of processed cotton, and it can actually be quite nice to work with and wear. If you find one, make sure it doesn't look or feel too synthetic, and you might well get a nice bargain.

A few fabrics that I avoid

Anything with much of a stretch. It might save you some effort on fitting, but it will sag and bag and eventually be unwearable. There are a few stretch velvets (NOT CRUSHED VELVET - SEE BELOW!) which fake up nicely as silk velvet, which I've made kit with some success, but generally anything I've used that's got too much lycra in it looks crap and wears badly.

Crushed velvet. I hate this stuff. It's been widely used in larpwear, and it looks lightweight and fake. Don't let me put you off it you want to try it, or you get a great bargain on some - I'd love to be proved wrong. But I've seen it done badly too many times (usually by me!) not to pass on a warning.

Anything with an obviously modern print, or very synthetic colours. Aniline dyes were a late invention, so anything neon, acid green, synthetic pinks just look wrong. There were lots of bright hues available in the middle ages - a good rule of thumb is don't use a colour you wouldn't see in nature, and you won't go far wrong.

In a nutshell...

Getting good fabric is all about shopping around. Take a mate who sews with you the first few times - tell them what you're trying to make, and they'll be an invaluable source of advice and support. Don't be afraid to ask the shop assistants for advice, too - they're a great source of information, and like crack dealers, they want to get you hooked on their product. The best way of doing that is facilitating your early projects. Costuming is addictive. You have been warned.

A heap of broken images

Amira i Haour i Guerra stood her ground, arms folded, in the face of the three orcs.

The one in the middle, who had been doing most of the talking was watching her closely. The other two were looking anywhere but at her - scanning the farm, the house, and the surrounding hills. He tried again, changing tack, narrowing his eyes as if concentrating hard on trying to remember something.

"We have offered you coins, because we want to buy the food from you. It is not Prosperous for you to refuse to reward our hard work in this way."

She stared at him, in much the same way she might stare at a goat that had stood on its hind legs and started to sing the Fire Maringo.

"What?" She hated how stupid she sounded.

"It is not Prosperous. We have gained these coins by ... by hard work." One of the orcs flanking him grinned, the nasty scar across her face twisting the expression into a snarl. "You must recognise our hard work by rewarding us with the goods we desire."

The orc looked triumphant, allowed a smirk of self-satisfaction to spread across his face.

"I told you, that is not the price. I told you the price, which is what the beasts are worth. I am not going to sell them to you for less than that price - and by rights I don't really want to be selling them to you at all. Lasambrian."

The orc scowled. All pretense of pleasantry disappeared. His voice was flat.

"It is my ambition ..." he tasted the word and found it to his liking. "It is my ambition to eat goat meat for my supper, and there is no price too high to pay to get what I want."

He took a step forward, and the two burly orc warriors stepped up with him. She held her ground, even though the warriors towered over her. They were wrapped in heavy leather straps and buckles, with sheep- and goat-skins thrown over their shoulders to give them even greater bulk. She did not doubt that they could kill her before she could do more than cry out once. But she still held her ground.

"Well, Lasambrian, that threat means that the price has tripled. Because you have been rude, and because it is clear to me that you do not have the first idea what the words you are using mean. If you won't pay, then you can get out of my farmyard, and take your attack dogs with you."

The scarred orc warrior rested her hand on the pommel of her scimitar, and leered at the short Freeborn woman.

Before things could escalate further, Jorge and Reisa came around the side of the farm house. Her husband had his vicious bhuj slung casually over his shoulders, and his sister Reisa already had an arrow nocked in her short bow.

"Is everything well, Amira?" asked Jorge, ignoring the orcs.

"Everything is well, husband." she replied. "These gentlemen were just leaving."

The two warriors eyed the newcomers. The scarred one locked eyes with Jorge and tried to stare him down. He held the orc woman's gaze easily, and it was she who looked away first. The third orc - the ringleader - put one hand on her shoulder and shook his head once, sharply.

"It seems we have failed to agree on a price, Freeborn. We will go away and consider the best course of action, and then we will come back and see if we cannot leave with your goats another time."

There was a naked threat in his voice. He made little effort to conceal it.

"After all, you should never accept defeat. You should adapt your strategy and try again."

He inclined his head to her curtly, spun on his heel, and began to tromp back toward Anduz, his guards falling into step behind him.

Reisa raised her bow slowly, and Jorge put his hand on her arm.

"Not in the back, Reisa." He walked over to stand beside Amira.

"Do you think they will come back?" He asked.

"I don't know." she replied, not taking her eye off the shorter orc who had clearly been doing his homework. She had pegged him as a nasty piece of work, regardless of the fact he was a Lasambrian. "But I think that we should prepare for malice ..."

Her husband's sister, joining them at the gate, caught this last and grinned grimly. She rested one hand on Amira's shoulder and completed her sentence.

"... yet thwart malice before it strikes against us."

The three of them stood in silence then, watching the orcs stomp back the way they had come.

Overview

The Hierro clan of the Lasambrian orcs are still in Segura. The Imperial Senate resolved to provide support to them, allocating 75 Thrones from the treasury to the project. Their makeshift camp south of Anduz is looking a lot less makeshift than it was before the Autumn Equinox.

At the same time, the general assembly of the Imperial Synod appointed the Navarr priest Taryn of Exile's End to oversee efforts to bring the tenets of the Way to the displaced Lasambrians. One hundred liao was made available, and numerous volunteers offered their aid in meeting with and speaking to the orcs.

The Lasambrians were at first suspicious, but the "miraculous" auras that the Imperial priests were able to create commanded their attention. The Hierro appear to have no formal religion as the Empire understands it; instead they revere the dead spirits of their ancestors. It seems that there are not many shamans among the Hierro clan – there is some talk that the Naguerro clan took the lead in advising on spiritual matters whenever they came up. Indeed, beyond the common orc belief in the Howling Abyss most Hierro orcs seem to have given little thought to matters of the soul.

The Way is of great interest to these orcs. The Virtues teach powerful lessons – about personal strength, the importance of ambition, and the drive to achieve great things. Unfortunately, the Hierro interpret the teachings Taryn and his companions bring through the lens of their own experiences and their own culture.

Consequently, the missionary work among the Hierro is having mixed results. Some of the orcs insist on twisting the virtues to fit their preconceptions. For example, they point out that the tenets of Courage entirely support the idea of running away and attacking from ambush. They argue that banditry and raiding are both seriously risky, difficult jobs – and that Prosperity and Ambition alike support the idea of taking what they want from others.

In particular, they scoff at the idea that there is anything special or unique about human souls; rather than accept the reality of the Labyrinth they quickly latch onto the idea that the Virtues provide the spiritual strength to cross the Abyss to the lands of their ancestors – and more than one Lasambrian has openly mocked the idea of "wandering around lost in a maze" as an afterlife worthy only of cattle. Heresy and blasphemy (in their technical terms) are commonplace.

If anything, the Way is making the Lasambrians bolder. When they arrived before the Autumn Equinox they were a broken people, fleeing, defeated. The teachings of the Way seem to be strengthening their spirits – restoring their Ambition, Courage and Pride. Unfortunately it seems that the Lasambrian outlook is strikingly at odds with the Freeborn people they are sharing a land with. Now that the spirit of their people is being restored, the Freeborn and the Lasambrians are finding it increasingly difficult to peacefully coexist.

Inspired by the missionaries, the Lasambrians are becoming more strident in their requests – and their demands. And now they are also showing an interest in joining the Empire ... although not in the way anyone expected.

The Imperial Senate has agreed to support the Hierro, and will pay 75 Thrones each season to do so. While the Senate continues to disburse these funds, the Lasambrians have no need to engage in banditry to support themselves or their families.

The Senate could abrogate this stipend at any time with a suitable motion. If they were to declare war on the Lasambrians, this would also bring the payments to an end.

Resupply

The Lasambrians cannot currently receive natural resupply. Their army is in a seriously depleted state – while there are many orcs, less than three thousand of their number are fighting fit. Representatives of the Hierro clan have approached both merchants in Segura and members of the civil service looking for assistance to resupply themselves, expressing concern not only about the Jotun to the west, but about the Iron Confederacy to the south, who appear to be engaged in ruthlessly butchering every Lasambrian they can get their hands on.

They have made a formal request that the Empire provide them with 100 mithril or weirwood so that they can begin rebuilding their strength. In the event that the Empire is unable, or unwilling, to help them then they will have to consider moving to a safer location – their current camp in south-western Segura would be an easy target for both Confederacy forces and for an invading Jotun army.

While they have formally asked the Senate for assistance, any citizen could provide the general of the Hierro with weirwood or mithril with which to resupply themselves. This would be entirely legal, unless the Senate chooses to declare the Lasambrians to be barbarians in which case providing them any assistance would be treason.

Further Instruction

As before the General Assembly of the Imperial Synod may continue to try and spread an understanding of the Way to the Hierro clan. Again, this will require a successful Statement of Principle, a named priest, and the accumulation of another 100 liao.

Before this statement of principle can be effective, however, the assembly will need to make a decision about the interpretation of the Way by the orcs. Should they tolerate the cultural interpretations of the Hierro, bordering as they do on heresy and Blasphemy? Or should the priests of the Way require adherence to orthodoxy, refusing to give ground on doctrinal issues? The decision of the Assembly should be clear from the wording of the statement of principle.

An Eleventh Nation

A season of receiving religious instruction has encouraged the Hierro to be Ambitious – but it has also reinforced their Pride in themselves. They have formally requested admittance to the Empire.

However, they still refuse point-blank to join the Imperial Orcs or otherwise surrender their identity as the Hierro clan. Delegates are being sent to Anvil, but their “request” can be broken down into three main points:

They will not be rootless vagabonds. Like the so-called Imperial Orcs they will require a homeland. They are prepared to accept Segura, but they would prefer Madruga because it does not have a border with their known enemies. This is not negotiable. Either they have land of their own and a Senator, or they will remain independent. Once they are established, they will set about recovering the lost territories of Reinos and Kalino, of course, and adding them to their new Imperial nation.

While they understand this may be difficult, they are more than happy to simply conquer Segura or Madruga if this will make life easier for the Empire.

They wish to discuss the nature of egregores; they are currently suspicious. The virtues of Vigilance and Wisdom alike help reinforce this suspicion. They require proof that the egregore is not some method of attempting to dominate their people.

The civil service have remained neutral but have pointed out both to the Hierro and to those citizens who have made inquiries that the Lasambrians joining the Empire would require both a motion before the Senate and ratification by the Throne.

Needless to say those citizens of Segura and Madruga who are aware of the “request” are less than thrilled by it.

(OOC Note: While the Lasambrians are requesting admission to the Empire as an eleventh nation, Profound Decisions will not be making them an available choice for player characters regardless of whether players choose to admit them or not. The Lasambrian orcs will remain non-player characters, and a former-Hierro is not currently available as an option as a background for an Imperial Orc character.)

Good Neighbours?

Much of the consternation among the Seguran population about the presence of so many non-believers, has now abated in the light of the growing numbers of Lasambrians taking up a version of the Way. Many Freeborn citizens are increasingly accepting that there is now a place for the Lasambrians in the Empire - the problem is where. They can't stay in Segura... they're simply not Freeborn - and it's very clear that they don't have any intention of becoming Freeborn. As one Brass Coast citizen puts it "their idea of honesty would shame a League mountebank". The general view is that they either need to be dispersed across the Empire as the Imperial Orcs were - or else given a homeland of their own... as the Imperial Orcs were.

That last analogy makes a lot of people in Segura very concerned. Many Freeborn citizens are not adverse to claiming that if the Senate was prepared to take Skarsind from Wintermark and give it to the Imperial Orcs - why wouldn't they take Segura from the Brass Coast and do similar? The more level-headed are pointing out that Reikos is a very long way away from the Lasambrians' enemies - and conveniently is up for allocation. More hot-headed voices are openly suggesting that the sensible thing to do is to "encourage" the Lasambrians on now... before the Senate makes its mind up one way or the other.

The Synod may choose to respond to this consternation in several ways.

A suitable judgement raised by the Freeborn Assembly, the General Assembly, or any Virtue Assembly could give the green light to those among the Freeborn who are keen to take matters into their own hands and "encourage" the Hierro to move somewhere else. Such a judgement would require a named priest to carry the message to Segura but would not require any liao to be effective (but see below in relation to conflicting judgements). It would likely result in outbreaks of violence between the inhabitants and the newcomers - which would cause further damage to the Lasambrian fighting strength - but would cause the orcs to be displaced to an adjacent Imperial territory.

A suitable judgement raised by the Freeborn Assembly or the General Assembly could urge the Freeborn people to continue to tolerate the presence of the Lasambrian people on their land. A single named priest, armed with at least 50 liao would be influential enough to carry this difficult view across the territory. The current troubles could be quelled for a season in this way - perhaps buying time for a more permanent settlement to be found. If the priest uses 100 or more liao, then it would improve acceptance of the Hierro sufficient for them to successfully purchase the resources they need to gain the equivalent of half a season of natural resupply. In theory such an action could be repeated next season, although it would likely require more and more liao each time as supplies grow scarcer.

The Freeborn Assembly could pass a judgement calling on the Freeborn people to evacuate Segura or Madruga in preparation for action by the Senate or invasion by the Hierro. Such a judgement would be incredibly contentious. The current mood in these territories is very much opposed to such an outcome. The Assembly would need to name a priest and would require at least 100 liao to make a noticeable difference to attitudes. This would not be an instantaneous affair, but the only way to find out exactly how long it might take would be to attempt it.

In each case, the assembly must name a single priest who will be responsible for collecting and distributing liao to support their judgement. If the Synod attempts to pass multiple conflicting judgements, then the judgement with the most liao backing it will take effect.

In the event that the Synod does nothing, the situation in Segura between the Freeborn and the Hierro clan orcs will continue to deteriorate. An outbreak of violence is certain, as one side or the other takes matters into their own hands. In effect a decision to do nothing by the PCs in Anvil will mean that the decision is made by the NPCs in Segura.

(OOC Note: While there is an opinion among the Freeborn that Reikos would make a much better homeland for the Hierro clan, it is important to note that it is not legal to assign Reikos to these foreigners. It is only legal to assign a territory to an Imperial nation)

A note about synod opportunities

There are several complex options here, but the mechanics of how the Synod employs them are the same in each case; a statement of principle by an assembly, naming a single priest who is responsible for overseeing the project. If the statement is supported by the assembly, the named priest should put the liao into their inventory at the end of the event. It is also helpful to e-mail Profound Decisions at empire.plot@profounddecisions.co.uk to remind us the liao is there.

Resolution

The General Assembly of the Synod raised and passed three relevant judgements:

They raised the judgement that "The Synod supports Duke Ferrero to take liao and preach to Imperial Citizens that they tolerate the refugee Hierro clan of Lasambria whilst in Imperial lands. It is Loyal for citizens to support the Empire's plans. It is Vigilant to not turn a potential ally into an enemy. It is Wise to try a new path over reactive instinct. It is Ambitious to envision a new way to resolve an unusual situation."

Duke Ferrero gathered sufficient liao to influence the people of Segura, but not sufficient to allow the Hierro to perform wide-scale resupply. Throughout the Winter months, Duke Ferrero and his allies spread tolerance and understanding in Segura.

They raised the judgement that "The Imperial Synod recognises, with Pride, the efforts of the Hierro Clan in learning so much about The Way in just one season. We also acknowledge, with Vigilance and Wisdom, that the Hierro do not yet fully understand The Way and call upon them to embody Pride, Ambition, and Courage in aspiring to improve their interpretations of the Virtues. Elka Nadyanova Gremani will support them in this using the Experience of Pride and the example of the Paragon of Kethry. We look forward to seeing how the Hierro rise to this challenge and further earn the respect of the Empire."

Backed by 100 liao, Elka Nadyanova Gremani has some success in bringing the Hierro orcs to the path of Imperial Orthodoxy - they begin to see how their cultural interpretation has warped the essential message of the virtues.

Finally, they also raised the judgement "The Hierro orc clan should come to Holmauer in Holberg! They should see there is more to the Empire than the Brass Coast. Hierro should marvel at Holmauer's fascinating agriculture and exciting wildlife as part of earning their way into the Empire."

This judgement was not backed up with any liao, and appears to have had no immediate effect.

Further information about the situation in Segura can be found as part of the Spring Equinox Winds of War here.

A job worth doing

Moche was woken by the sound of someone trying to hammer very quietly. From the sound of it, the hammer they were using was very large and the surface they were striking was very strong. She lay in bed for a moment listening. Frowning. Over the sound of the hammering she could hear what sounded a lot like voices trying to shout instructions to each other very quietly, and the occasional thump of wood and clash of metal.

A shadow moved across the window of her bedroom. She rolled to her feet, pausing to grab her sword belt from the chair beside the bed. She padded cautiously over to the window. She could just make out the sound of someone on the other side of the shutters telling someone else to be careful because it was quite early and people might still be asleep. She did not recognise the voice.

She took a firm grip on the shutter and with a swift movement pulled it open, ready to flick her sword loose of its scabbard if there was danger.

On the other side of the window, a pair of short creatures blinked at her a little owlily. They were stood on a wooden gantry that appeared to be suspended from the battlements of the tower above. One held a small hammer in its clawed hand, the other was in the middle of sketching something on a long roll of pale parchment with a stick of charcoal.

From a distance the two creatures - she could not quite think of them people - might have been mistaken for naga. Close up, there was little chance of them being so mistaken. They were squat, muscled, and covered in scales from head to toe. Both had a scaled crest that ran over their foreheads into their thick dark hair. The one with the hammer was a deep, lustrous blue of a summer sky. The one with the parchment was emerald green. Both wore long tunics and leather aprons.

Neither party spoke. The blue creature nervously tapped its little hammer on one of the stones, then frowned. A hoarse whisper from above called down to ask what was happening. Moche cleared her throat.

The green creature carefully rolled the parchment it had been sketching on and bowed deeply. It bid her good morning. She had expected it to squeak but it spoke with a deep, rumbling baritone that seemed almost to echo in its broad barrel-chest. She returned the greeting.

"What exactly is going on here?" asked Moche, in her best classroom voice. She could see more of the creatures - some blue and green like the ones outside her window, some with scales of vivid scarlet, and the occasional sumptuous black. They appeared to be setting up equipment, deploying ladders and ropes and even in some places scaffolding. Several of them were examining the great thorns that grew over the castle walls, and clearly exclaiming excitedly.

"We have been asked to help your castle," replied the green creature. She felt there was more of the lizard about it than the snake, definitely. The blue one tapped the stone near the window again and again made a strange face.

"Did you know that your castle has been recently cursed?" it asked, its voice the same bass rumble of its companion, so incongruous in a creature that Moche imagined would barely come up to her shoulder.

"Yes, we had noticed." she said dryly. "Who sent you? Who are you for that matter?"

"Przysięga smoczycy wojowników!" said the blue guest proudly, effortlessly pronouncing a confusing string of vowels and consonants. Moche asked it to repeat itself a couple of times and in the end gave up.

"We were sent by He Who Sits on the Adamant Throne to look to your castle. At the request of the wizards of the spire of the Auric Horizon. Weren't you ... we were told you would be expecting us?"

Moche simultaneously frowned and raised her eyebrows in utter incredulity. The two lizard-like workers looked at each other out of the corners of their large, round eyes. The green one darted its long tongue a little nervously, then pulled back its lips and revealed very sharp teeth that immediately made Moche tense in expectation of an attack - before she realised it was supposed to be a smile.

"Please, we are here to repair the damage that has been done to this beautiful castle. It is truly wonderful, one of the most beautiful we have seen and we have seen many castles indeed. Did you know that it is covered in rose bushes? That is such a novel idea! And so strong! It would take several armies to breach its walls! Could we come in and ask you some questions about it? We would be very grateful!"

Wordlessly, Moche stepped back and let the scramble in through her window. All around, their fellows went to work repairing the damage to the Castle of Thorns. .

Overview

Before the Autumn Equinox, the Castle of Thorns in Astolat was subject to a powerful curse of the Winter realm that dramatically increased the cost of its upkeep. While the worst of the curse faded after the Equinox, there had still been some damage to the structure itself.

Shortly after the Autumn Equinox, a large team of exotic creatures resembling brightly-scaled human-like lizards arrived overnight at the threshold of the castle. Calling themselves koboldi, they claimed to be emissaries of the King on the Adamant Throne - King Adamant. Careful questioning by civil servants and witches quickly established that they seemed to be retainers of a Summer realm eternal unknown within the Empire. They had been summoned by magic performed by the Urizeni Spire of the Auric Horizon, and tasked with repairing any damage to the Castle of Thorns.

They set about this task with enthusiastic gusto. Despite their small size they appeared supernaturally strong and resilient - on one occasion one fell almost the length of one of the towers and while it landed with enough force to crack several paving stones it appeared to suffer only minor injuries. They are well equipped, and clearly possess the talents of expert masons and engineers. They also worked with preternatural speed - within two days they had repaired all structural damage caused by the recent curse, and even taken the time to restore any number of minor inconveniences around the castle.

And then they went away, as suddenly as they appeared.

Significance

All residual effects of the winter curse are gone. The Castle of Thorns is at full strength, and indeed is cleaner and in a better state of repair than at any time since its completion.

Before departing, several Dawnish enchanters were able to converse with the herald who appeared to serve the role of chief engineer. They confirmed that several of the creatures possessed strong auras of Summer enchantment, and that they were almost certainly intelligent inhabitants of that realm. Furthermore, from their discussion, it was clear that the eternal they claimed to represent - this King Adamant - had hitherto had little interest in the Empire. Now that his attention had been attracted, however, the creature seemed confident that he would send emissaries to speak with the Imperial magicians - especially if the Empire was capable of producing such beautiful structures as Castle of Thorns. King Adamant, apparently, very much appreciates large, impressive structures of stone.

The "chief engineer" asked several astute questions, especially about the Imperial Conclave and the role of the "champions of magic" as it insisted on calling the archmages. It remains to be seen if anything comes of this, or what the nature of "King Adamant" might be.

Resolution

During the Winter Solstice 379YE, a small band of these koboldi attending the Anvil summit and spoke to a number of individuals in the name of King Adamant. They expressed interest in encouraging the Empire to build fortifications, and inquired about several matters to do with mines but the details are not general knowledge.

A long good-bye

Uncle Uzo drummed his fingers on the hard oak table. The faded runes tattooed on his knuckles stretched and moved. Strength to do what needs to be done. To bring an ending to those who oppose. To be cunning and cautious in the face of oppression. To have the will to choose ones own destiny. As he counted them off, the mantra in his head went some way towards calming his troubled thoughts. Some way.

Back in Tassato Mestra. Already. He cursed under his breath. Hardfrost! That damn Talbot beater, that damn militiaman! It was like he had a supernatural sense for Uzo's agents! All efforts to establish himself in Sarvos ruined; his brick factory confiscated; his followers dead or fled. And now he was back in damn Tassato, a poor relative knocking at the door of the damn woman he had moved to Sarvos to get away from in the first place.

Auntie Vivian di Tassato Mestra. She had not even deigned to see him yet, keeping him waiting for the second day. Hiding out in a filthy garret overlooking the river, drinking himself into oblivion each night on stolen Hercynian spirits brought down the river from Temeshwar hidden in crates of weltsilver ore. He sighed gustily. If their situations had been reversed, he would have enjoyed her situation as much as she was plainly enjoying his.

He glared across the table at her representatives. Carlton di Tassato Mestra was young, and making a show of cleaning his fingernails with a slim stiletto. A popinjay. His older brother William was a different matter - hard and strong, like a true vyig, at ease with the harsh realities of life as an enforcer for Auntie Vivian. Where Carlton was clearly full of nervous energy, William sat stock still in his seat, his dark-skinned hands resting easily on the table in front of him. Uzo could barely make out any of his tattoos; black ink on black skin. He'd heard that if you were close enough to see the vyig marks, you were only still breathing because William (or his Auntie) thought you were worth more alive than dead.

Uncle Uzo shook his head to clear it. That sort of thinking was fine for the sheep, for the bleating masses that bowed beneath the Imperial yoke. It was not right for an Uncle of the vyig, for a wolf-in-shepherds-garb, to give too much credulity to stories spun to keep the prey on the back foot.

William was staring at Uzo. Appraising him. The silence stretched. The older man was damned if he was going to appear weak by breaking it. He took another sip of strong Navarri alcohol, grimaced at the sharp tang. What the hell did they use to make whiskey in the Glade of Shadows? Damn Hardfrost.

Suddenly, young Carlton cocked his head and frowned. He stood up and moved fluidly towards the door, cracked it open. Uzo heard it then as well - the sound of someone banging on the door to the tavern below. Raised voices.

William was already by the window, cracking it a little, peering into the street. Uzo had not seen him move. "Militia," he said quietly, his voice betraying no emotion. He might have been discussing the weather. "And ... priests?" The sound of wood splintering from below, raised voices. Steel.

Uzo lumbered to his feet. "What ... you told me this place was safe!" he hated how petulant he sounded. His head swam from the sudden movement. He'd had too much to drink, and cursed himself for it.

"Nowhere is safe right now, 'Uncle.'" said Carlton, not bothering to conceal his contempt.

Uzo bridled, his hackles raised, whiskey fuelling the anger vying with fear in his belly. He had been smashing faces and breaking legs before this little shit had got blood on his first tunic. He deserved respect, dammit! He opened his mouth to bawl the young bravo out and then ... something went wrong.

He slumped back in his seat, heavily. He became aware of a spreading wetness, and the first hint of pain in his back. He craned his head round. William was behind him, wiping his daggers quickly clean on Uzo's cloak.

"This is not personal, Uzo" he said quietly as Carlton locked and barred the door. "Aunt Vivian holds no grudge against you, but you know too much and you are too old and fat to go where we are going. Better that you take our secrets to the Labyrinth with you."

Uzo tried to stammer something but William silenced him with a finger. Behind him, Carlton had unshuttered the other window, and was already pulling himself up onto the roof of the building next door.

"Don't say anything, Uzo." William's lip curled.

"Any true vyig would have died in Sarvos fighting the magistrates. We will say that that is what happened, give you a little of the dignity you seem to have spent the last ten years running from. You do not need to thank me."

As the agony from his ruined kidneys banished any rational thought, as the room began to grow dark, Uzo slumped forward over the table.

The last thing he saw was William's boots disappearing from sight as he followed his brother onto the roofs of Tassato; the last thing he heard the pounding fist and the raised voice demanding that he open the door; and the last thing he thought before he ceased to be Uncle Uzo entirely was "That ... damn ... Hardfrost ..."

Overview

Following on from the events in Sarvos, the Empire has taken up arms against the vyig infestation of the League cities of Holberg, Mestra, Regario, and of course Temeschwar. Three priests of the assembly of vigilance have lead the way, working both to inspire citizens to act against the criminals in their midst, and to co-ordinate the efforts of bishops, bravos, and guilds with the militia and the magistrates. Preaching the virtue of ridding the Empire of the vyig blight, they work tirelessly to promote the militia and encourage League citizens to sweep their city and the surrounding area clean of criminals. Municipal buildings and public spaces are consecrated with auras of vigilance, serving as gathering places for those dedicated to rooting out the vyig. Supporters of the cause are anointed with mantles that sharpen their eyes and bolster their will to track down and eliminate all traces of the criminal threat. For a time, the fear the vyig evoke is countered by the will to expose and denounce the wicked.

While citizens of the League take the forefront in operations against the criminals, they are not alone. In Holberg, Vladimir von Temeschwar receives the unexpected assistance of a number of thief-takers from the Imperial orc camp in Estcastle, as well as several dozen questing knights and knights-errant. The city is quickly searched - the cowardly vyig mostly deserted Holberg during the Druj siege - but there are several armed engagements in the ruins of Holmauer where it seems the vyig were attempting to construct criminal dens among the rubble.

In Tassato, beneath stars that are twisted and unfamiliar, Valimir von Temeschwar is able to forge a tenuous - and temporary - truce between rival Princes on either side of the river. During the drab autumn months habitual opponents offer grudging assistance to each other, ensuring that the vyig thugs are given nowhere to hide. Wily Navarr thorns and dour Highborn priests help to unearth and end a sinister trade in stolen goods - valuables stolen in Mestra fenced in Regario and vice versa. The efforts of the priests of vigilance receive strong and unexpected support from the followers of the Charitable Chain of Andromeo, a congregation which values loyalty above all other virtues. A proud fellowship offering succor and protection to the victims of the vyig, their knowledge of the depths to which the criminal conspiracy will stoop proves invaluable in locating and destroying some of the worst dens of vice on both sides of the village - although sadly their leader (the ex-mountebank Callista di Tassato Regario) and several of her closest allies pay for their courage with their lives. Still, thanks to the bravery and vigilance of citizens such as these, the vyig are no longer a force in the twin-city by the time the first dreary snow of winter falls on the roofs of the twin city.

Things are not quite so straightforward in Temeschwar - unsurprisingly, perhaps. Irada von Temeschwar takes the lead here. A powerful aura of vigilance is laid on the statue of Ratibor von Temeschwar, the boyar who first roused the vyig from his city in the years before the foundation of the Empire. Angry priests from the Assembly of Ambition are roused by Regina Alcee Caeli Salvatici von Temeschwar to join with Varushkan Schlacta and volhov to scour the city for those with vyig tattoos and their associates. This is not the era of the boyars; those suspected of crimes are arrested, interrogated, and dealt with fairly under the rule of law.

In Temeschwar, the vyig fight back with sword and fire - the grim leaders of the conspiracy would rather die than submit to the legal authority of the magistrates. For a week in late autumn there are open battles between law-abiding citizens and secretive criminals both inside the city bounds and in the forests nearby. The vyig are suspiciously well armed - caches of weapons and armour purchased or stolen from all over the Empire are uncovered along with evidence of plans for armed insurrection. The investigation of the vyig here escalates quickly, but the militia receive unexpected support from the Vardstein Voyi, a gang of bravos who claim a proud heritage - descended from the schlacta who took part in the first Night of a Thousand Torches at the behest of Ratibor and active opponents of the vyig ever since.

This wide-ranging conflict with the vyig is not without its costs. The disruption caused by searching out the hidden places where the criminals gather is widespread and unavoidable. Citizens are arrested in large numbers, or held for questioning about their suspicious behaviour. Significant numbers of secret liaisons, sharp business practices, and criminal enterprises only peripherally associated with the vyig are exposed to the light of day. In a few cases, business establishments are physically damaged in fights between militia and criminal enforcers.

There is little doubt that the vyig are dealt a blow from which they will not soon recover. Their operations in Tassato and Holberg are brought to a conclusive end - with the raids in Sarvos over the Summer months, the vyig infection is effectively cut out from the southern Empire. In the north, the vyig are a little more tenacious ... but their operations in Temeschwar are smashed, the ring-leaders scattered, and more importantly the spectre of fear they inspire broken by the vigilance and strong hearts of those who oppose them.

The disruption wrought by these three long months of direct conflict, while significant in the short-term, are already fading and it looks like it will be business as usual after the Winter Solstice.

Spoils of War

As in Sarvos last season, the magistrates have confiscated assets belonging to the vyig. Some of those assets are significant enough that they are to be auctioned during the Winter Solstice. They include:

- Auntie Bimber's Palinka A Temeschwari den of iniquity in Hanuri with a reputation as a neutral meeting ground for rival vyig factions. The tavern was shut down in a massive militia raid, and its proprietors and clientele now face the full weight of the law, but the premises, stock, and distillation equipment are largely untouched. (Auntie Bimber's Palink is a rank 2 business).
- Bartelli's Bolt A weltsilver Mine in the foothills of Mellfort Peak. Long considered almost played out, investigations uncovered that the place was being used to store stolen goods including art treasures from all over the Empire. The owner, Bartelli von Temeschwar, was using "conscripts" (effectively slaves) to work the weltsilver veins and smuggle goods stolen from Wintermark and Varushka south for sale to overseas clients and unscrupulous art collectors. With his arrest the mine has been seized by the militia until a suitable new owner can be found to turn its fruit to more a more Virtuous end. (Bartelli's Bolt is a rank 4 weltsilver mine).
- Pressing Matters, The Prince's Prints. Regario is well known for its skillful printers but not all of its skillful printers are that well known. Whilst for some of them this is a consequence of their mediocrity, for a very few businesses this lack of notoriety is carefully crafted. Located in the heart of the eastern city and hidden behind a basic fabric shop facade, this moderately prosperous business was used as the base of operations for a gang of confidence tricksters preying on the credulous and the greedy. There is also some evidence that printmaster was attempting to find a way to counterfeit Bourse certificates - without any noticeable success. (Pressing Matters is a rank 3 business).
- The Carta de Fimi Nacoso. Known to a select few as the Guild of the River's Secrets this extended family of merrow reckoners specialised in ferrying citizens across the wide river. Initially an honest business the recent investigations uncovered evidence that the head of the Guild, Carlotta de Mestra had been blackmailed by the vyig "Auntie Vivian". Largely without the complicity of its members the Guild of the River's Secrets had been moving stolen goods across the river for the vyig. With Carlotta gone the Fimi Nacoso are looking for a more honest soul to help them return to their original, law abiding roots. (Carta de Fimi Nacoso is a rank 2 business).
- The Tunnel Snakes War is a time of much tragedy but it is also a time of opportunity for those able to seize it. Over the last decade the vyig operated this Holberg logistics and supplies company as a front for a network of contacts, supply chains and smugglers involved in siphoning resources, weapons and other goods from the walls of Holberg to the heart of Temeschwar. The supply and distribution network, as well we premises in all four League cities, have been auctioned in the hope that a law abiding citizen can put them to more prosperous use - importing luxury goods from the rest of the League city to the newly liberated Holberg. (The Tunnel Snakes are a rank 3 business)

These resources will be auctioned on Saturday evening during the public auction. Any Imperial citizen may participate, of course, but they are obviously of more interest and use to citizens of the League. A citizen who wins one of these resources will be able to take control immediately, but there will be some paperwork to complete - and the usual charge of two crowns to change resource will apply. (OOO: It is part of the game design that a character cannot have more than one personal resource. This means that if you win a resource, you must exchange it for your current personal resource, or it will instead go to the next highest bidder. It may also mean that your character changes their territory of residence for purposes of elections).

Disruption

As all three priests named by the Imperial Synod chose to employ the full hundred liao mentioned in that opportunity, the vyig have been routed - but the resultant disruption significantly effected commerce in the four cities. As a consequence, citizens operating in Temeschwar, Holberg, an the two Tassatos have found the income from their business interests reduced by a quarter. Now that the vyig are dealt with, however, things should presumably return to normal.

Further Investigation

The vyig are no longer a significant threat, and their presence in Tassato and Holberg as it an end. In Temeschwar, their operations have been smashed but there are still a few lose ends to tie up. Many of the Uncles and Aunts died rather than be arrested by the militia, but there are still a few unaccounted for. The leader of the vyig, Bollek, is believed to be dead but there are still some questions around precisely what happened to him. With these factors in mind, Magistrate Gerude von Temeschwar intends to visit Anvil to meet with Vladimir von Temeschwar, Valimir von Temeschwar, and Irada von Temeschwar to make a final report on the outcome of the operation to end the vyig threat to the Empire once and for all.

Participation

Any character is welcome to roleplay that they have been involved in this fight against the vyig; the operation has by no means been restricted to League citizens. Likewise, any citizen of Holberg, Tassato, or Temeschwar - especially those with businesses - can come up with a story about how the war against the organised crime syndicate has effected them. While the main thrust of the investigation has focused on the vyig, any criminal activities in the three cities is likely to have been impacted by the campaign - any character with criminal connections in the League is welcome to e-mail empire.plot@profounddecisions.co.uk and we will happily arrange for you to begin play as prisoners of the militia facing trial for your crimes.

Resolution

In the confusion caused by the dreadful weather during the Anvil summit, the planned auction of vyig assets did not go ahead. It has been rescheduled for Spring 380YE.

A question of provenance

"Well, brothers and sisters," called Caleb, "we have some good news, and some bad news, and then we have some news of Virtue."

His voice echoed around the rude camp that was all the refugees had been able to cobble together out of what the creeping rot had left them. They were tired, but their faces were set, determined.

"The good news is, we found some abandoned wagons. We think they belonged to some teamsters, with the Wolves of War. I have no idea what made them leave their load, but they were hauling sacks of Marcher grain and some barrels of salt beef."

He held up a hand to forestall celebration.

"The bad news is that whatever it is that has been getting into our supplies has eaten everything but the salt beef - or to put it another way, we've got ourselves a couple of wains of mushrooms."

He let a grim smile twist his mouth. "And that brings me neatly to Virtue. Brother Isaachar has looked them over and reckons the mushrooms are just as edible as the grain was. He's tried them himself and says they taste "nutty". That was six hours ago and he's doing fine."

He inclined his head to where Isaachar stood, and the apothecary dumped three sacks onto the ground at his feet, spilling dinner-plate sized pale mushrooms out.

"So! Either way we can eat tonight. But if we've got the Courage to trust Brother Isaachar and these mushrooms, we can eat well. So what do we do?"

Overview

The people of Reikos - both returning refugees and Courageous new settlers - face a time of uncertainty.

The Highborn territory is being transformed by Spring magic. The power of an eternal, even one claiming to be working at Imperial behest, is rarely entirely welcomed by the Highborn. One element that is causing a great deal of consternation is the question of the eerie plant life that accompanies the rejuvenating touch of Spring.

Even after the magic itself begins to fade, weird mushrooms abound in all the places one might normally expect to find fungus. One breed in particular seems especially widespread - a deep violet 'shroom that grows with fecund enthusiasm wherever vinum is found. Similar strains infest grain and vegetable produce, but despite potentially ruining crops they seem to be particularly tasty and nourishing. Finally, the mulch left behind when some of these plants die seems to have a positive effect on herb gardens ...

... but there are still doubts as to whether any of this is a good thing.

Significance

The Judgements of the Synod

Many of the people of Highguard look to the Synod for guidance. In a way, concerns over the influence of Llofir reflect the Eternal Schism between the exclusionist (the Eternal Realms exist outside of the true Creation and are akin to parasites attached to the mortal world) and inclusionist (the Eternal Realms are part of the wider Creation and that contact with Eternals is inevitable and unavoidable) approaches to the eternal realms.

The General Assembly, Highborn Assembly, or Council of Nine can pass a Statement of Principle to offer guidance to the Imperial citizens in Reikos and direct the groundswell of public opinion. All such judgements will require that a named priest be authorized to spread the judgement of the Synod to Reikos, and must be accompanied by the collection of at least 25 liao for use in creating auras (the liao should be handed in in the pack of the named priest, as described here).

If the Statement of Principle is a clear warning against the dangers of the eternal realms and encourages the people of Reikos to avoid contact with the strangeness afoot there (an essentially exclusionist approach), the people will avoid contact with the agents of Llofir and shun the fruits of its influence in the name of Vigilance. As a consequence, each congregation in Reikos will receive 2 extra votes and 1 extra liao, as engagement and support from their representatives encourages the Highborn to attend congregation with a renewed interest in the Synod. At the same time, however, this will have a small negative impact on the production of all businesses, farms, forest, and herb gardens in Reikos as people destroy or cast aside any suspect materials they come across.

If the Statement of Principle encourages the people of Reikos to cautiously engage with the magic that has overtaken their people, while being mindful of the virtues (an essentially inclusionist approach), the products of Llofir's influence will be exploited by the rebuilding effort in the name of Prosperity and Wisdom, working with rather than against the magic to rebuild Reikos. Those things that have particular value to the apothecary or physician - or that the congregation consider too dangerous to leave unattended - will be forwarded to the keepers of the congregations of Reikos for study and safe-keeping. At the same time, all farms, forests, businesses, and herb gardens in Reikos will receive a small boost to their production as their owners are able to take advantage of the curious plants and fungus they encounter. It is not certain what resources this will yield, but it will include at least some doses of the herbs familiar to Imperial herbalists, as well as potentially some unique or novel substances produced by the eerie Spring magic.

The Concern of the Conclave

A number of magisters in Reikos have examined the effect that has swept across the territory and expressed some guarded concern. They judge that given the nature of the magic used, the widespread effects they are seeing should not be possible without first passing a Declaration granting amity to Llofir. Which it has clearly not.

The powers of enmity and amity are a powerful tool in the hands of the Conclave, which grant them additional powers to serve as intermediaries between the Empire and the Eternal realms. If it has been compromised, or someone or something has found a way to work around it, then it is probably Wise and Vigilant for the Conclave to investigate quite how Llofir has managed this.

Resolution

With the support of the Highborn Assembly, Gravus of the Shattered Tower volunteered to venture inside Reikos to spread an exclusionist message, with the full backing of the Imperial Synod. As a consequence, the congregations of Reikos were reinforced, while the production of businesses, farms, forests, and herb gardens has been reduced as people destroy or cast aside any suspect materials they come across.

Gravus of the Shattered Tower volunteers to venture inside Reikos to spread a message of Isolationism against the forces of the Spring Eternal Llofir. This will require 25 liao.

The Highborn Assembly of the Imperial Synod 380YE Summer Solstice

At the same time, the Imperial Conclave decided to strip the herald Gilean of her amity. In addition, during the months following the Solstice, the Citadel Guard of Urizen moved to Reikos in an attempt to capture the region of Tamarbode from the forces of the eternal Llofir. You can read about that here

A season of mushrooms

"How can it have got this bad this quickly?" Sister Hepzibah stared uncomprehending at the moss-covered ruin that was her childhood home. "We... We were here with the 'Pegasus last year, and it was all..."

She trailed off. Even as she watched, the one remaining wall was shifting, cracks spreading through its weakened stones, mortar seemingly turned to nothing but mud and mould.

"Get back!" She raised a voice that had cut through battlefields from Karsk to Spiral. "Get back! It's coming down!"

Clouds of amber and violet dust burst around her as the wall came down.

Overview

A wave of fertility sweeps Reikos consuming the broken and the blighted.

The bodies that were abandoned where they fell disappear first. Everything that has died is devoured by the fungus - but it does not end there.

Vast swathes of ivy tear up the side of buildings, while the timbers that once held them up disappear beneath a riot of brightly coloured mould.

Like the bodies, everything that is lifeless falls prey to this river of life.

At first it seems that the territory will vanish beneath this tide of life, but finally the waters recede a little. The fungus and moulds die back, as impossibly fast as they sprung up. In their place they leave a natural landscape transformed by their passage, washed clean not just of the foul touch of the Druj, but of every touch of a mortal being. Gardens have become wild meadows, orchards have become forests, hard stone roads turned to muddy trails. Of the poison and diseases seared into the land by the Druj there is no trace - now the ground teems with life. The poetic imagine that this is what Reikos must have looked like before the Highborn first tamed these lands.

Although everyone is happy to see the marks of the Druj erased, many Highborn are not sanguine about the loss of their own legacy that accompanies it. As soon as they realize what is happening, these inhabitants attempt to defend the structures of their chapter houses from the encroaching tsunami that threatens them. Working day and night they strive to preserve what they can of the Highborn history accrued from the centuries of life in Reikos. Only constant Vigilance suffices - each inhabitant can save only as much as they can clear in a day - for after a nights sleep the moulds and the fungus are back and the back-breaking work to save something must begin anew. Only by such constant diligence can they stem the flood and only the most prized monuments and buildings can be saved - anything that is lifeless that does not have someone to protect it is consumed.

There are also rumours that the Highborn are not the only ones fighting the transformation - there are reports of other forces holding out. There are orcs, pockets of Druj that remain and others who have never been anything more than bandits, hiding out in the barren places of Reikos, the hills, the wetlands and the forests. Those who take the time note that these folk, are fighting almost as hard as the Highborn to hold on to what little they have. And in some places there are reports that the magic has disturbed things other than orcs - though none can spare the time to find out exactly what the force of magic may have roused.

Significance

Reikos is a territory in the process of transforming from a broken wasteland to something else. Despite the claims of the superstitious, many magisters say that it is a powerful Spring magic, and that its effects have been further heightened by the Hallow of the Green World enchantment currently spread across the Empire. They also believe that the magic is somehow being directed by the eternal Llofir.

The magic has not entirely run its course. In many places the fungus that has consumed the ruin of Reikos has been replaced by new life, fresh grass, and even new woodland, the mushrooms, mould, and heralds of Llofir are still actively working to break down and rejuvenate several locations in each region. The magisters do believe that the magic is running its course, however, and will most likely have faded away entirely by the start of the Autumn equinox - leaving Reikos transformed.

Salvation

Lucifer of Highguard, with the aid of Nina of Cantiarach's Hold are to be sent to Reikos to save those who have been abducted and maimed, and bring them back to the light of Courage. They are entrusted with 100 liao for this.

The Assembly of Courage 380YE Winter Solstice

Two priests have come to Reikos with the authorisation of the Imperial Synod to address the problem of Golan and his heretical teachings. A third priest, Lucifer Son of Cyrus, of Felix's Watch, was sent here with a different mission; to offer succour to those damaged in body and spirit by the domination of the Druj and bring them back to the Empire.

His efforts could not have come at a better time. His charge to aid the people of Reikos, to help those who have lost purpose or become too accustomed to living in fear, are quickly turned to helping the people to preserve what they can of the history of Reikos. Like the return of the First Empress, there appears to be a strange serendipity about Lucifer's arrival. The auras of Courage he creates are critical, granting the Highborn the spiritual strength to go out to do battle every day with the sorcery that seeks to take their history from them - something which helps them to find their own salvation from the terrors of the past.

The Grand Ossuary and the Guardians of the Past

"Are we sure we are in the right place?" Brother Barnabas, the sexton, leaned upon his spade by the edge of what the scouts had marked as one of the many, many charnel pits of Haros.

Sister Aella frowned down at her slate. "Unless someone's been doing our job and lying about it, brother."

He crouched down and peered at the ground. "It's just that this hole is only a foot deep."

He took his spade in his hand, reached down, gave the soil an experimental poke. "You certain we-"

His voice cut off in a strangled shriek: the spade was wrenched from his hand as the black and noisome roots coiled their way up and around and about it. He frantically scrabbled away from the pit as the clearing echoed with the decisive crunch of the wooden haft as the splintered tool was drawn into the pit.

And the ground there rippled hungrily.

At the same time, there are a dozen independent captains who have brought their retinues to Reikos to help support the creation of a great ossuary there. Over the last three months, the names of Exarch Solomon, Inquisitor Courage, Guardian Maya, and Unconquered Jada of the Shattered Tower; Guardian Amon of the Raven's Watch; Guardian Cayleb of Felix's Watch; Cataphract Jericho of the Suns of Couros; Lucifer of the Cohort of the Winter Bear; Obidiah Rockborn, Ciaphas Dekar, and Arnulf Fuch, and Skywise Kray of the Imperial Orcs become known across the territory.

They have arrived just in time to help prevent the tide of green magic overwhelming the ruins of Highguard. The spring magic that breaks apart corpses does not differentiate between those who died at the hands of the Druj, and those who have rested in the tombs of Reikos for centuries. It does not care that a document is dusty because it is hundreds of years old, or that the mortar of a tomb is crumbling because of time and not because of any inherent weakness. They are quickly caught in a desperate fight to keep the (apparently well-meaning) servants of Llofir from devouring the history of Reikos alongside the lingering Druj taint.

The End of the Druj Miasma

But there is at least one very positive thing about this sorcerous "invasion". Between the captains fighting to protect the legacy of Highguard, the survivors motivated by the power of Courage, and the rampaging power of Llofir, many of the Druj miasma pillars have been located and destroyed.

While some surely remain active, their aura has been greatly curtailed, reduced to zones of terror a few scant miles across. Many of these sites are now buried under supernatural forests or partially sunken in magical marshes - quiescent for now but potentially creating enclaves appealing to certain threats that might creep into Reikos that do not fear death.

OOO Note: You are free to roleplay that if you have been in Reikos this season you have helped to destroy some of the Druj fear pillars, especially if you are one of the dozen characters who have lead their military units to Reikos, or have accompanied Lucifer, Son of Cyrus.

The New Forest at Tamarbode

Zellah and Jebediah crept silently through the wild undergrowth. Both had thick scarves covering their noses and mouths. They had learnt that as long as they kept moving, the spores would not settle on their leather armour, or eat away at the straps of their gear. If they stood still for more than a few minutes though...

From up ahead there came an eerie creaking noise. Zellah held up her hand. They froze in place.

With a couple of curt gestures, Jebediah silently asked "What that noise?"

Zellah didn't know, shook her head. The heavy clouds of spores hung like a thick fog, this close to the heart of the old regio. In the days when their chapter had stood watch over the Laughing Well, they had kept the entire area clear of plant-life taller than the long grass, and carefully monitored access to the enchanted waters. But none of the chapter had been in a position to do so for over a decade. Now the power of the regio had been unleashed, and what had once been an open field was a dense forest, full of fungus and ferns.

The noise came again, closer.

"Coming. Cover." she signed quickly. The two scattered, drawing the long-bladed knives they favoured for close combat.

A creature as tall as one of the northern mammoths was suddenly between them. Roughly humanoid, with squat bandy legs and long forearms, it moved like a mountain gorilla but with the kind of serene, unhurried patience that reminded Zellah of the whales she had seen as a child in the waters north of Meade. It had a small head, with large liquid eyes, and its back was covered in dark purple and golden mushrooms of all sizes. Perched between its shoulderblades was a little figure in a black robe.

For all its size it was surprisingly quiet. It passed between the two Unconquered, and disappeared eastwards away from the regio.

Zellah and Jebediah exchanged wide-eyed, blinking stares. Almost simultaneously looked down at their long-bladed daggers, and then with a single smooth motion, put them away."

Finally, there is a new force present in Reikos. Something has taken residence in the region of Tamarbode and claimed it for itself.

Perhaps it is a harbinger of the force of magic that has scoured the territory - there are reports that the first surges of the spreading Spring magic began here. Perhaps it is simply taking advantage of the situation - possibly even some dark thing snuck out of Brocéliande to the north-west. Either way, something has taken control of Tamarbode. A significant portion of the plains have been overrun by a new forest, a dark wood where the trees grow so close that the light cannot penetrate. The new woodland has completely engulfed, and seems to spread out from, the mysterious Sign of Tamar.

At present no-one knows for sure what manner of creature dwells there, and strange myconoid soldiers patrol the borders, turning back any who come in force.

The region of Tamarbode was not under Imperial control to start with, having been claimed by those barely organised Druj remnants left behind from the fall of Urith Barath. Several of the orc camps in Tamarbode had been destroyed by Imperial forces during the cleansing of Gray Charge. Yet there were also several settlements that had not been cleared.

Of those camps, and the orcs who once dwelt in them, there has been no further sign since the forest appeared.

Participation

Nehemiah didn't quite scream: he'd scrambled up the ladder so fast he didn't have any breath left for it.

Instead he slammed the trapdoor of the old cellar closed and took a second to breathe. Like his mother had taught him, he named seven Virtues and four Exemplars under his breath to give himself time to calm himself.

There was the sound of cracking and something collapsing below. He gingerly lifted the trapdoor again.

The creature was still there, gazing up at him with liquid black eyes, surrounded by the rotting remains of what until a few moments earlier had been a sturdy oak ladder. The beast favoured him with a gormless, toothless, lopsided grin.

"Hello!" it called up, its voice soft and breathy. "I'm here to help! Please don't try to eat me again! I taste terrible!"

He shut the trapdoor again and sat on it. From below came the sounds of the beast enthusiastically chewing up what he hoped were the broken pieces of ladder. He wondered what he was going to tell his mother.

Any Highborn group based out of Reikos can choose to roleplay that the inhabitants of their chapter or similar have been struggling to hold back the tide of new growth which has spread quickly across the territory. No chapter has been left untouched by the magic - every group has lost some history to the ensuing wave of powerful magic but how much has been lost is a roleplaying choice for the group. They may have saved the essential buildings and belongings, the documents and books that they want to keep, they may have lost everything to the change - or anything in between.

For those making a future in Reikos, the territory has been transformed into a more natural landscape. The villages and towns have been kept clear of growth, but the countryside, once a rural idyll, is now a haven for wild plants and animals. Copses have become woods, woods have become forests. Reikos is fundamentally changed in the passing of a single season - becoming either a natural paradise or else a blank canvas depending on your point of view.

An exception to the general destruction are the spoils of war - the key resources identified by the civil service in liberated Reikos. We assume that sufficient force has been present to ensure that these resources are protected from the aggressive power of the Spring enchantment.

"It's no good, Dinah." Sister Brannan mopped her brow and cast a doleful eye over the ruined arbour. "They're all like this. Every single blasted one of them."

She gave the thing a kick and it creaked alarmingly. "Ruined, I call that. Half a season's crop up in smoke."

"Up in spores, actually." Corrected Sister Dinah, peering closely at the mycelial mass where nothing but good vinum should be. She carefully turned over what had once been a leaf with a gloved hand, marveling at the way the tiny white moulds covered the underside.

"Well, I'm glad someone's finding some mirth in this situation-"

"No, no. Look." Dinah had found what she was looking for - carefully she lifted the little purple cap for Brannan to see. "Here's one again. This isn't regular blight. Never seen this variety before or since. A ring'll get you a crown this thing's nowhere in my books."

"So we've got some kind of new, superior vinum blight rather than regular vinum blight." Brannan scowled. "Should I send for the Pledge-"

"D'you not think it's odd, though?" The alchemist fished a little bottle out of her pocket, held it up beside the offending mushroom to catch the light. "That this thing grows on vinum and vinum alone, and it's the exact same colour as liao?"

The scowling sister's expression darkened further. "That's beyond foul. I'll get a fire going."

Dinah raised an eyebrow. "Without even having had a proper look at it? This is a problem, and we can solve it, if we put our minds to it. Where's your Wisdom, sister?"

"Behind my Vigilance, sister."

The two glared at each other in silence.

Regarding Previous Opportunities

The opportunity to rebuild the Garden of High Chalcis has not been impacted by the burst of Spring magic - quite the contrary. The apothecaries of Peakedge Song are keen to see what new medicinal plants the spreading wave of magic and decade of Druj domination might reveal. Likewise, the opportunity to construct a fortification at Broken Ride is if anything of even more interest to the Vigilant as it would also be in a position to keep a watch over whatever is happening in Tamarbode.

At this time, the Civil Service are uncertain what effect this magical wave may have had on the supply situation but it seems clear that the sudden cleansing of the Druj corruption from Reikos will have gone some way toward helping it to support a fourth Highborn army - assuming that the bounteous new life can be properly harnessed in the service of humanity.

A silver chalice

Overview

At the Summer Solstice the Imperial Senate passed a motion to establish The Silver Chalice, a new order in the Imperial Conclave. Such a thing has not happened in many years, so the civil service have prepared a general briefing to help people understand how the laws work in this regard and how the Empire has deal with such matters traditionally.

Motto, Symbol, and Manifesto

The creation of a new Conclave order requires a successful constitutional motion to be passed by the Imperial Senate. Formally, the manifesto of the order should be included in the motion; in this specific case the manifesto was read out on the floor of the Senate - so all senators should be aware of the manifesto they have approved. Once the motion is approved, the only changes that are allowed to the order's manifesto are minor changes designed to improve the grammar. Anything that the Constitutional Court consider to represent a substantive change would require further authorization by the Imperial Senate.

At the point where the motion is passed, then the Conclave order comes into legal existence - but it is not possible for any character to join the order until the motto and symbol are finalized, since both are required for a successful ritual to create the first arcane mark. The citizens involved with passing the motion have provided the civil service with the order's symbol and informed them that the motto will be "The well of life is bottomless".

The Manifesto

The Order of the Silver Chalice holds the following to be true:

- Life flows through each of us; our magic allows us to reach out to our fellows and nurture that life, mend what is broken, and bring what is torn apart back together.
- Healing magic has vast amounts of raw potential, but is complemented by the precise nature of physical healing
- The strength of the Empire relies on its citizens, thus by keeping citizens healthy, we strengthen the Empire

The Order of the Silver Chalice therefore exists to:

- Utilise the immensely practical applications of healing magic for the good of the empire, promote understanding of healing magic and research new healing rituals and spells
- Ensure that conclave is reminded of the value of life, and that it makes decisions with that value in mind
- Work with healers, physicks and apothecaries across the empire, including bodies that represent such individuals, such as the Anvil Hospital
- Look into supporting long term efforts to aid the infrastructure (and foundations) of the Empire

Manifesto of the Silver Chalice

Joining the Order

- The civil service have prepared an Autumn magnitude 20 arcane projection to create the arcane mark
- Nobody can join the order until this ritual is completed

The magical ritual Arcane Mark allows a single magician to join an Imperial order when it is cast. Any number of magicians can join the order by performing this ritual, but it is not possible to use the ritual to create a new order - a different ritual is required to achieve that.

By tradition the Imperial civil service prepare an arcane projection to create the new arcane mark (and by extension the order) which is presented to those magicians assembled at the first meeting of the order. The motto and symbol of the order must be finalized by this point, as they are required by the ritual. Because of this requirement, those involved must obtain the help of an Autumn coven and the 10 additional mana crystals needed to perform the ritual. There is usually some competition to fill this prestigious role - after all it is not every day a coven gets to create a new order. It is common for any Autumn coven planning to join the order to volunteer but there is no formal or magical requirement for the magicians performing the ritual to be part of the new order. The order remains a formal part of the Conclave but no magician can join it until the ritual is complete.

The ritual allows everyone targeted to join the order at the same time that the order is created. In practice this usually saves valuable time and mana - provided that there are more than a few members looking to join.

Contents

The vote to elect the first grandmaster takes place immediately after the ritual is complete. Everyone who joins the order at the point where it is created is eligible to vote. In an exception to the normal rules, citizens who were eligible to elect a grandmaster of a different order in the previous twelve months are still eligible to vote in the first election.

- 1 Overview
- 2 Motto, Symbol, and Manifesto
- 3 Joining the Order
- 4 The Font and the Vaults

The Overseer of Imperial Elections, Merlot, is due to present the arcane projection to the assembled magicians of the Conclave in the Hall of Worlds at 6pm on Saturday at the next summit.

No matter how many members join the order during the Autumn Equinox, it will automatically count as the smallest order in the Conclave for determining precedence. Precedence is based on the number of members an order has at the beginning of the summit.

The Font and the Vaults

Once a Conclave order is established by the Imperial Senate it is eligible for a share of the font - however, initially, there are no members, so it does not receive any mana until the summit following the event at which the ritual to create the arcane mark is cast.

The order is eligible to receive a share of the ilium immediately, although it automatically counts as the smallest order in the Conclave for determining precedence, until the summit after the first members join.

A new order will not have any bequests, so it will usually have no unusual materials in the vaults. It is common for new orders to attract bequests in the first decade after they are created as people and powers take an interest in them.

The new grandmaster does not have the ability to acquire mana until a suitable source of mana is constructed. There are standard protocols used by the Imperial civil service for all orders, but the 30 wains of mithril (and 60 crowns) required must be provided by the new grandmaster at the end of their first summit elected. They will then be able to purchase mana normally following the next summit.

A spiritual prism

Overview

In Summer 379YE, Yael of Highguard experienced a past life vision, during which she claimed to have received a revelation of the Land Without Tears, a paradise that waits beyond the Labyrinth for the truly virtuous. Initially she and her followers were given permission to use liao to spread word of this revelation across the Empire. A mighty congregation formed, swelled by pilgrims from every nation in the Empire.

But when the Doctrine of the Beyond was put before the Imperial Synod - it was rejected. This caused confusion across the Empire - if the Synod rejects Yael's revelation does that mean her words are heretical? If the Land Without Tears is not part of the Way of Virtue - is it illegal to preach it? Disagreements about what the Synod judgement really meant turned to arguments and in some cases to violence.

In response to the lack of leadership from the General Assembly, several of the national assemblies chose to pass clear judgments decisively rejecting Yael's words. The citizens of those nations have benefited from this clear moral leadership - but it has exposed a new danger. The Imperial faith represents the shared values that bring citizens of disparate nations together, without agreement that common unity is threatened.

The Doctrine of the Beyond

Beyond the Labyrinth of Ages lies the Land Without Tears. Paragon souls that had freed themselves from the Labyrinth may ascend to this golden place that is without pain and suffering. The Land Without Tears is the ultimate transcendent destiny of all humans who turn their lives to Virtue and the pursuit of Paragonhood.

Proposed but not upheld at the Autumn Equinox 380YE, 673 - 729

Repudiation

- Wintermark, Varushka, Navarr, Urizen, the League have their ability to provide effective military aid to Highguard, Dawn, the Marches and the Brass Coast halved (and vice versa)

At the previous summit, five nations of the Empire, Wintermark, Varushka, Navarr, Urizen, and the League each passed a statement of principle with a greater majority decisively rejecting the revelation brought forth by Yael. Most of the judgements explicitly rejected her claim to be the First Empress - and all of them urged their faithful of their nation to reject her teachings and instead hold true to traditional doctrine.

This clear moral leadership has resolved the conflict that existed in these nations. There are no more discussions about what Yael's revelation means for their nation - no more debates about the theological implications, no more questions or doubts. The national assembly has rejected her claims - and that has dispelled all doubts in the minds of most folk of that nation.

The drawback of this clarity is that it is increasingly causing conflicts between those nations that have rejected Yael - and those that have not. Ultimately, a rejection of Yael's claims is almost identical to a rejection of Yael. The priests of the Imperial Synod might choose their words carefully when addressing this complex task, but the common soldiery do not. So when those who have not yet made their mind up about Yael - sit round the campfires with those whose leaders have told them to reject Yael and her claims - fists start to fly.

The truth is that the Way of Virtue is the heart of the Empire - it is what ties the ten nations together. The more the disagreements grow... the harder it becomes for the Empire to act and fight as one.

As a result of the decisions taken by their national assembly, the armies of those nations that have decisively rejected Yael may no longer receive effective military support from military units from nations that have not issued compatible guidance - Dawn, Highguard, the Marches, and the Brass Coast. The reverse also applies, Dawnish, Highborn, Freeborn and Marcher armies may not be supported by military units from the five nations that have rejected Yael. In each case, the effective ranks of a military unit choosing to support an army on the other side of the schism will be halved.

At present the situation is still evolving and any national assembly may issue a statement of principle decisively accepting or rejecting Yael. Provided it is passed with a Greater Majority then it will take effect immediately and allow the military units of that nation to fight accordingly.

Conversion

While the statement of principle by a national assembly that is rejecting Yael is sufficient to end discussion of the issue, it is not sufficient to convince those who have embraced Yael to abandon their new faith. Most of these citizens still reside within the borders of their nation - but many have undergone a pilgrimage, traveling to Reikos or Casinea in the hope of encountering the First Empress Reborn or at least others like them who support her. This tide of pilgrims has swelled the ranks of the Congregation of the First Empress, a great mass of people looking to Yael for guidance and thereby granting her considerable influence and power within the Synod.

The national assembly sends X with X doses of liao to repudiate the false teachings of Yael of Highguard. Those who have been deceived by her claim to be the First Empress Reborn and the hope of a Land Without Tears should retract this false doctrine and return to their homes.

Synod Mandate

Any national assembly that has already passed a statement of principle with a greater majority may decide to issue a priest of their nation with this mandate to confront these wayward pilgrims. If they pass a judgement of mandate with a lesser majority then they can authorize a priest to use at least 25 doses of liao to convert those of their nation who have strayed from the path they can shepherd them back to the Way of Virtue. This mandate would end the movement of pilgrims seeking Yael from the nation, reducing the size and influence of that congregation in proportion, but only if it is couched in the clearest possible terms as a denunciation of Yael's teachings - nothing less than this will convince those who have converted.

In the event that several nations issue this mandate, the total amount of liao they spend on it would be summed for purposes of resolving conflicts with other mandates such as those to turned the Congregation of the First Empress into an army, or to incorporate it into a Dawnish army.

One Life

- The Imperial Orcs are no longer directly effected by the turmoil surrounding Yael and her revelations.

The revelation of the First Empress Reborn concerns the Land Without Tears, a paradise that waits for those who are virtuous enough to pass through the cycle of reincarnation in the Labyrinth. There is no role for the orcs in this vision and the Imperial Orc national assembly have made clear that this matter is only of significance and importance for humans. Given the basic orc belief in one life - a single attempt to cross the Howling Abyss or face extinction - this statement of principle has been sufficient to resolve the matter.

Unless there is further guidance form the Imperial Orcs assembly to the contrary, the nation are no longer affected by the turmoil surrounding Yael and her revelations. Their citizens will play no further role in this matter and their armies and military units may support and be supported by members of any other nation.

Manifest Destiny

- The division within the Imperial Synod is reflected in a division within the nation of Highguard.

The Way of Virtue began in Highguard. From there, it later spread across the nascent Empire, one of the symbols of its unification - and then across the world. The Highborn often boast that they embody the true spirit of the Empire; other nations might dispute that, but no-one can argue that Highguard is the spiritual and physical home of the Imperial faith. Virtue permeates every aspect of Highborn life and the nation looks to their priests for political as well as moral leadership.

As such, the failure of the Highborn national assembly to provide clear guidance on the First Empress Reborn and the Land Without Tears has hit this nation harder than any other. In chapter houses across Highguard, arguments rage over the nature of the revelations. Does the Doctrine of the Beyond contradict the Doctrine of the Paragons? Is it heresy or some profound new insight into the manifest destiny of the human race? Is Yael genuinely the reincarnation of the First Empress Reborn returned to help the Empire in its hour of need - or a charlatan who will destroy it?

These arguments have raged across the whole Empire - but are now settled in many of the nations by the decisive word of their National Assembly. Although Highguard is not the only nation whose Assembly has not spoken out, it is in this nation where faith and the Way are the very air they breathe, the Doctrines a dinner-table conversation as much as the price of bread. In the Marchers or the Brass Coast, it is uncommon for religious differences to divide friends and family; in Highguard, your friends and family are those who share your faith. This fellowship is the fabric from which the Highborn nation is woven; in this land, there are few threads that faith does not touch. As the threads fray, so too the fabric of Highborn society is beginning to divide with it; this now manifests in the discipline of their military.

Highborn armies are increasingly struggling to overcome the conflicts caused by the division amongst the faithful who serve. As a result all Highborn armies suffer a 10% penalty to victory points generated, and will break if their army strength falls below 1200.

At any time the Highborn National Assembly may still pass a statement of principle with a Greater Majority - either in support of Yael and her Doctrine of the Beyond - or against her. Either would resolve the conflict in the armies. Rejecting her would align Highguard with the other nations that have rejected Yael, and similarly give them the chance to pass the associated mandate. The situation is too complex to predict exactly what further effect unified national support for Yael might bring, but as in the case of Dawn, there is a powerful narrative that could bring significant benefit - the First Empress was, after all, Highborn...

But until a statement is passed - until the leaders of the most faithful nation can provably demonstrate that they have come to an agreement on this matter - the situation in Highguard will continue to deteriorate.

Exultation

The Troubadours of Dawn hold up the following song as proclamation:

- The Dawnish assembly has passed a judgement in support of Yael
- Some folk must walk the Labyrinth. To atone for their wrongs.
Four thousand winters: Think it not too long.
But others through the Labyrinth pass. To a land without tears.
As true liao scholarship. Discovered through the years.
Dawn's first Empress returned to us. From that happy vale.
Reincarnate in the person of Highborn Yael.
Blessed be this paragon. Returned from beyond.
Raise your voices. And praise her in Song.*

The Dawnish National Assembly has passed a judgement

Dawn National Assembly, 380YE Winter Solstice

recognizing Yael as the First Empress reborn and encouraging all citizens of the nation to raise their voices in praise of her. The situation is complicated, the judgement did not achieve a Greater Majority in the Assembly, but the judgements were stolen making voting much more difficult, and several important Dawnish priests were slain during the summit. For many these events seem just a little too convenient, is some force or group trying to prevent the Empire from recognizing Yael's claim?

As a result the majority in favour of Yael has given a number of Dawnish citizens reason to take renewed interest in Yael and her teachings.

The Glorious Monarch

One element that has caught the imagination of the Dawnish is her relationship with the land of Dawn. The First Empress is a legendary figure in the Empire, the founder of the Empire who personally united the squabbling human nations and conquered the orcs. But to many Dawnish she is something more - the first glorious Imperial Monarch of Dawn. According to history the Empress jumped over the River of Sighs to complete a Test of Mettle and win King Rodric's heart. The rebirth of the First Empress impacts every citizen of the Empire, but for some Dawnish what is more important is that the greatest Dawnish Queen that ever lived has returned to them.

For some, this momentous event signals a rebirth of Dawnish Glory and Pride. Rumours are already flying that one or more of the Dawnish regalia has been seen in the Barrens. Is this another sign that the "Greatest Monarch of Dawn" is come again?

Of course, by tradition - only the reigning Empress is offered the chance to claim the Throne of Dawn. Empress Lisabetta is well known for her widespread knowledge of Imperial history, easily the rival of any archivist or troubadour. So the fact that thus far she has not elected to press a claim to the title undoubtedly reflects politics rather than ignorance of her rights. Those who have passionately taken up Yael's cause seem convinced that Lisabetta will concede that Yael has a greater right to the title and not contest the situation.

All of which assumes that Yael can be persuaded to accept the honour and stake her claim. The Dawn monarchy is not inherited, it is fought over in Grand Tourney. To be crowned, she must win victory in a grand tourney of Dawnish nobility. As a Highborn citizen Yael is not eligible to fight, but any Dawnish noble may take up her cause and already there are some who dreaming of becoming her champion. Any noble who does not feel that Yael is worthy to bear the title of King or Queen of Dawn would then take the field against her. Thus far, Yael's claims, have been an issue primarily for priests and troubadours - but if she makes a claim to be Queen of Dawn, then there is a chance for all the Dawnish nobility to fight for or against her.

Victory in such a tourney would be electrifying. The long beards in the Synod may argue at length about the theological implications of the Land Without Tears - but none of that would matter to the average Dawnish yeoman. As First Empress Reborn - and Queen of Dawn, Yael would have the undying affections of all Proud Dawnish men and women. Support for Yael would no longer be in question - in one swift stroke she could capture the hearts of every Loyal citizen of Dawn. While lesser nations argue for doctrine and ask for evidence - Yael has the chance to physically demonstrate for all the world to see that she is the First Empress Reborn - what could possibly be more glorious than that?

The Song

The song of the First Empress lifts the hearts of every Proud Dawnish man and woman who hears it. All the yeofolk of Dawn dream of glory - so they cannot help but be inspired by the knowledge that the First Empress, a figure of legend, now walks amongst them. Let the priests in the Synod argue about doctrine - Dawnish troubadours know a glorious song when they hear one. The Dawnish National Assembly can choose to pass a mandate with a lesser majority to carry this song to every corner of Dawn bringing these benefits to all.

We send X with 25 doses of liao to carry the song of the First Empress to every Proud Dawnish man and woman. Let all who hear it know the truth of her glorious return from beyond the Labyrinth."

Synod Mandate

If the mandate is successful, every personal resource in Dawn owned by a Dawnish character will gain a bonus equal to one additional rank for the following year. This bonus will be doubled if Yael also becomes the Queen of Dawn.

The Faithful

There are makeshift camps in Reikos and Casinea where pilgrims who have traveled from all across the Empire have gathered to praise Yael. The Empire has resolutely ignored all pleas to create an appropriate church to provide shelter and guidance, instead they have left them to face the elements. Some have returned home, but many continue to stay, surviving as best they can. Some hope for a glimpse of the First Empress Reborn, but most are just grateful for a chance to live amongst those who share their beliefs. All worry what will become of them if the Synod rejects their doctrine as it has already rejected their requests for aid.

It is impossible to doubt the passion of Yael's followers - they are deeply committed to her - and to the Empire. For those who have visited the camps, the subject of the Empire's wars is a common topic - and one of the things that they are keen to remind visitors is that the First Empress was a conqueror. She united the human nations in a war of conquest that drove the orcs from the Empire. Many of the faithful are fully prepared to do more than just support the First Empress - they are willing to give their lives fighting for Yael.

We send X with x doses of liao to urge the congregation of the First Empress to travel to Dawn and fight alongside the Gryphons Pride. Let us conquer the barbarians together in her name.

Synod Mandate

While the Dawnish assembly continues to support Yael, it is possible for a Dawnish citizen who had been granted a suitable mandate by the Dawnish assembly and at least 25 doses of liao to convince the Congregation of the First Empress to fight alongside a Dawnish army. The most suitable army is the newly raised Gryphons Pride whose conquering spirit most aptly resonates with the history of the First Empress. Some of the faithful lack weapons and training - but they make up for this lack with their numbers and passion. If these devotees were inducted into the ranks of the Gryphons Pride then the army could be made large in a single season for a cost of 75 mithril only.

Taking this opportunity requires the Imperial Senate to pass a normal motion to enlarge the named army. If such a motion passed, the Senator would be responsible for determining how that would be achieved - even if the Synod then did not pass this judgement, the Senator could still enlarge the army using the standard methods.

As an alternative, rather than focusing on expanding the size of the army, the most capable warriors could be selected to form a cadre of elite troops, using the Dawnish nobles among their number as officers. This would still require 75 mithril, but combined with a single dose of true liao to permanently hallow the army banner, the entire quality of the army would be improved, further enhancing their determination to conquer the barbarians in the name of the First Empress.

Either approach would bring an air of fanatical devotion to the army, as the most devout pilgrims joined the ranks. However, should the Dawnish ever cease to support Yael and her vision of the Land without Tears, all benefits would be lost as the fanatics in turn cease to support Dawn.

Martyrdom

- The assembly of Courage supports Yael

Hear the words of Yael. The Synod is gripped with fear. They shirk from the enormity of my Revelation not because they believe I am a heretic but because they are consumed with doubt. They seek to stifle me to buy themselves more time, more evidence. But the Time of Revelation is now and Truth must be shared with all the Empire. I know this to be true, and with Courage as my Virtue I cannot be lead to doubt. I cannot be made to stop. If the Synod believe I am a heretic, it must name me one. I will face martyrdom without fear as did Permion and Isaella. And I will return again.

Backed by a greater majority of the Assembly of Courage, Yael has issued a defiant rebuke to the Synod. She has made clear that she will not be stopped and that she is perfectly prepared to die for her cause, safe in the knowledge that she will come again.

Her inspirational words have been embraced by many in the Congregation of the First Empress. They know that the fate of their nascent faith hangs by a thread - there is open talk of what they will do if Yael is declared a heretic and it is clear that many are prepared to die with her. At present these discussions are merely talk - albeit passionate and enthused - but it is clear that the Courage assembly could take advantage of this opportunity to unite the Congregation under Yael's banner and turn them into a fighting force.

To do so the assembly would have to pass a judgement of mandate, naming a priest and authorizing them to expend at least 25 liao urging the Congregation to take up arms and fight for the First Empress. If the mandate were successful, then the Congregation would be transformed into an army, albeit one that was small and possessed of a quality that reflected its lack of formal training and experience. It would no longer grant liao or votes in the Synod but it would be able to take military orders, just like any other army.

We send X with X doses of liao to urge the Congregation of the First Empress to unite under the banner of the Courage Assembly and fight for the truth of her revelation. Together we will defeat those whose doubts leave them too weak to face the truth.

Synod Mandate

The army would be motivated by their faith in the First Empress Reborn, so they would act independently, but it is likely that Yael would be able to write to the leader of the army to request what actions she would like them to take. The upkeep would be paid for by donations from Imperial citizens who accept the truth of Yael's revelations, so there would be no cost to the Imperial treasury and no requirement for additional support from an Imperial nation.

There are no legal impediments to prevent citizens like the Congregation banding together to form an independent army though students of Imperial history can point to the most obvious example when an Imperial force outside the direct control of the Military Council brought unpredictable consequences.

The army of the First Empress

- Has an initial fighting strength of 2,000.
- Requires no upkeep, and does not need to be supplied.
- Is controlled by NPCs, but Yael (or someone she formally designates by writing to the army) could guide their strategy.
- The only orders the army can submit are the overwhelming assault and heroic stand.
- Cannot benefit from natural resupply, but may receive emergency resupply from Yael.
- Once completed would be possible to provide emergency resupply, or increase its fighting strength to a maximum of 5,000, using a mandate of the Courage assembly, and a supply of liao

Competing Judgements

As always, in the event that multiple incompatible judgements are passed, the judgement that has had the largest amount of liao spent on it takes precedence. If more than one national assembly submits a mandate to convince their citizens to return home, then any competing mandate would need to contain more liao than was used with all these mandates added together.

Yael in play

It is important to bear in mind that Yael of Highguard is a player character, and not a member of our NPC crew.

A throne of blood

The soldiers came out of the snow to the barricade. Clad in long chain hauberks, their round shields slung from their backs. They flew the banner of Dogri Thulebane, he reminded himself. These were dangerous people, they had made it very plain that they would do what they felt was right whatever the cost.

"Got mail for yah here mate." The Navarri shouted jabbing a thumb at the oxen train behind him loaded with supplies and letters. Surrounding it were more Wintermark families, solders' and traders. "And some hangers on"

The Crowskeeper at the front smiled, her face was covered in scars and her eyes had a twinkle to them that was either playful or a threat of violence.

"Got a message for you too boy, take it back to the Empire for us eh?" she laughed patting him on the cheek.

"That's the job" the Navarri nodded as he rubbed his cheek. The other Crowskeepers allowed the caravan to pass.

"Tell 'em Dogri will talk. Crowskeep, Crowsridge, Skarsind. You come to us - we're not coming south. Piss on Anvil."

The Navarri started to scribble frantically, his fingers fighting stiffness in the cold.

"Tell 'em, Kali of the Saker and as many Skarsind, or those that was, as can travel with Kali. No Kali? No meeting. Look at me boy." The soldier snapped.

"It had better be Skarsind folk only - and that frayed prick of an ex senator isn't invited. Break these rules and the meeting finishes. There is no negotiation, no misunderstanding. That is how it is and how it will be."

The Navarri nodded, as she continued "These are the terms, if you break them Dogri walks out and we are done. That means we defend our own borders from here on - from anyone who tires to cross them."

Then she turned and followed the baggage train into the snow singing an old Skarsind battle song cheerfully to herself.

He shook his head, put the note in his pocket and pulled his mittens on. It was a long walk back.

Overview

Skarsind. In the south, the Imperial Orcs are engaged in building their nation. In the north, Dogri Thulebane and his supporters continue to occupy Crow's Ridge. As discussed elsewhere, the harshest winter in years has helped prevent the situation deteriorating further - but now that spring is here, and the worst of the snows are over, Winterfolk are again starting to rally to Thane Dogri's banner.

At the Winter Solstice, the stormcrows of Wintermark attempted to call the errant children of Wintermark home with a statement of principle.

"Whilst we commend the courage and conviction of Dogri Thulebane and his fellows, we cannot condone the gathering of forces. We discourage people of Wintermark from travelling to join Thane Dogri and encourage them to settle in Wintermark lands. We are seeking an amicable agreement with Dogri, the Imperial Orcs, and all peoples of the Empire, which will keep the Wintermark traditions of Skarsind alive."

Wintermark national assembly

Despite this judgement however, the Four Seasons Market remains in Wintermark hands. The owner maintains that as no Imperial Orc came to discuss the Market, there was no-one to give it up to. As a result, the Synod judgement has not had the desired effect and with Dogri now looking to talk, further developments are now dependent on the outcome of that meeting.

Significance

With the judgement of the Wintermark assembly, a number of stubborn Winterfolk have finally given up and left Skarsind. At the same time however, some of the real die-hards have travelled north to join Dogri. It is impossible to say at this time how many supporters he has gained. The situation is tense, and how the situation continues to develop will depend on the meeting with Thulebane.

The civil service has confirmed that a conjunction exists on the Sentinel Gate to Crowskeep, Crowsridge, during the upcoming Spring Equinox. Examination of the Gate once the Equinox begins will allow the precise time, and the number of citizens who can travel through it, to be narrowed down.

Resources

During the Spring Equinox, the Goeki Expanses and the Clattering Gulley are vacant, and will be auctioned by the civil service on Saturday evening.

Aben-Nuath

...and I believe, through meticulous collection and examination of multiple stories and accounts, that I have identified a little documented herald of Summer by the name of Aben-Nuath. To be clear, I must concede the possibility that Aben-Nuath is not the name of a singular herald, but the title of a series of heralds who fulfil the same function.

The common theme appears to be the character within stories who appears to lend some assistance to the central character in reaching a place of conflict or testing, but never to offer aid with the outcome. My list of examples include accounts of talking animals or trees, riddling hermits, and other inexplicable guides who appear and disappear without trace or precedent. Within the stories, the actions have been attributed to the Paragons, eternal or Fate with little clarity.

My hypothesis is that Aben-Nuath is a courtier of the eternal Barien. If this is so, then it would imply this eternal's court may have further layers and subtleties than may initially be perceived...

Elektra Evenspire, Order of the Celestial Arch

Summary

The speculation of Elektra Evenspire, and others, as to the existence and nature of Aben-Nuath has never been formally confirmed by any party, nor made explicit in the Conclave via Declaration of Enmity, Amity or Concord. The existence of a herald – or heralds – whose function is to nudge, or otherwise influence events, to facilitate decisive confrontations or moments of testing would be consistent with the nature of the eternal Barien, yet Barien has thus far denied such meddling unless directly challenged.

It is equally possible that Aben-Nuath exists as part of Barien's court and her / his / its actions are an impulse to further the interests of the one she / he / it serves and facilitate the kind of events or encounters that Barien likes to hear of.

If the speculation is true, then it would be foolhardy to consider Aben-Nuath as a wholly benevolent entity. Guidance in reaching a decisive moment or challenge may appear supportive, yet this is only the case where the guided one prevails. In those cases where the guided one falters, and potentially falls, Aben-Nuath can be seen to have led them to their doom.

Appearance

There is no consistent description of Aben-Nuath. Within the accounts that purport to detail the herald's existence, then various forms and descriptions have been attributed. This could be taken as evidence that there is no singular Aben-Nuath, and that there are multiple in different guises, or that she/he/it possesses the ability to alter its appearance in line with the task at hand.

Abraxus

At the Spring Summit, 377YE, a motion was put before the Senate by Edward Watcher of the Marches and Senator Lucifer, Proxy for Casinea. The motion authorised research into the controversial figure, Abraxus Whitespire of Urizen. The cost of the research was not funded by the Senate, but by a collective of private concerns.

Abraxus Whitespire (17-72 YE)

Contents

Abraxus of the White Spire Ascending was born and raised in Zenith in the early years of the Empire, which Urizen had recently joined. Abraxus was of Merrow lineage and showed a great curiosity around the Net of Heavens, and its potential relationship to the Pure Liao visions administered by the Synod. Consequently, Abraxus made the study of these intertwining phenomena his ambition, and a central theme of the Arete in his life.

- 1 Abraxus Whitespire \(17-72 YE\)
- 2 The Rise...
- 3 ...And Fall.
- 4 Legacy

These studies, and this journey, elevated Abraxus high within the Synod and the Empire, before his fall from grace and descent into madness and death. To this day, Abraxus remains a controversial, and divisive, figure. There remain those who consider Abraxus to be a visionary and potential Exemplar of Ambition or Wisdom. Others have referred to him as a cautionary tale.

...that I shall, in the following text, provide proofs that the visions received through Pure Liao are not random. Nor are they, as Cardinal Jezebel would have us believe, selected in relation to Virtue, or at least not solely by that means. It will be made clear for all to see that they are deliberately chosen. That they are, in truth, messages.

Messages that are wrapped in metaphor and context, because those sending them cannot communicate with us directly and must use our past lives in order to do so. Messages that are not about the past, but about the present - and the future. Messages from the Divine.

Excerpt from "On the Teleology of Pure Liao", by Abraxus Whitespire

The Rise...

Abraxus attained citizenship at the age of 17, and served the Empire as a priest of the Synod. By this stage, he was already articulate on spiritual and theological matters and attracted many - scholars and pilgrims - to hear him speak. Trained as an Illuminate, Abraxus would also arrange private meetings with influential people to offer guidance, specifically in relation to the interpretation of dreams and visions.

Aged 30, Abraxus achieved widespread notoriety with the publication of On the Teleology of Pure Liao, for which he was condemned by the Assembly of Vigilance for the religious crime of idolatry. At his trial, Abraxus recanted his claim, and instead attributed the messages he wrote about to the Paragons, though some doubted the sincerity of his retraction. Abraxus received a light punishment, but the idea that the Paragons could communicate with mortals carried with it a popular appeal.

For the following six years, Abraxus enjoyed a measure of celebrity and, as an experimental theologian, obtained repeated access to Pure Liao visions for himself, and his followers. Specific details are hard to come by, but it is rumoured that the Abraxians actively experimented with various ways to influence the visionary process, outside of those handed down by the Scions of Atun. Documents refer to metempsychotic anointing and alchemical concoctions featuring unusual ingredients from foreign and supernatural realms. In this time, there were two attempts to have Abraxus recognised as an Exemplar, but both faltered on the basis of a lack of supporting evidence.

In 49 YE, Abraxus married Jezebel of the Seven Stars Chapter of Highguard, who had turned from his harshest critic to staunchest advocate. They had two children, whom were given to Jezebel's Chapter to raise.

...And Fall.

In 54 YE, Abraxus was arrested by the militia. Details are fragmented, but the charge appears to have been treason. Even more curiously, the trial took place in a closed session of the Senate and the public gallery was cleared. The details of the trial, and evidence involved, were classified as pertaining to Imperial security. The verdict of guilty was declared, and Abraxus would have been executed, save for the intervention of Empress Richilde who exercised the throne's mercy.

After the verdict stripped Abraxus of his assets and citizenship, he elected to leave the Empire's borders. There are no records of what he got up to in the following thirteen years. He eventually returned to Imperial lands in 67 YE and made claims that he had made discoveries that would redeem him. Supported by Jezebel and a number of benefactors, Abraxus was able to purchase a portion of Pure Liao through the Bourse. Covered in runic marks and unusual robes, Abraxus declared that he would emerge from the vision having seen his future lives.

Records state that a large crowd gathered to see Abraxus emerge from his vision. However, rather than emerging triumphantly, he was carried forth by civil servants and followed by a grief-stricken Jezebel. Abraxus was unconscious and no physick, exorcist or magus could awaken him.

Jezebel and the Abraxians took Abraxus to Auric Horizon Spire in Morrow where a vigil was kept, and Abraxus' body was cared for. It is claimed, though not corroborated, that Abraxus would occasionally speak, and his followers wrote down what he said, certain that he had traveled to the future and possessed knowledge of import. Others claimed that this was a deception by the Abraxians to sell fake "prophetic scrolls". This continued for five years, before Abraxus Whitespire passed away in 72 YE.

Legacy

- There are a number of popular myths about Abraxus, many of which are populist and dramatic, with little supporting evidence. These claims often relate to things that Abraxus is expected to have seen and heard prior to his fall from grace. Equally, there are wild claims as to what treason Abraxus was alleged to have committed.
- Empress Teleri, as part of her reforms of the Synod, worked with the Assemblies to create the positions of the Gatekeepers. These posts were created, in part, to ensure that access to pure liao was safely regulated and kept from unstable, and potentially heretical or idolatrous hands, such as Abraxians.
- It is possible to find scrolls for sale that purport to be transcribed at Auric Horizon Spire from the words spoken by the comatose prophet. Several of these have proven to be modern fabrications and few scholars have agreed on what true Abraxian prophecy looks like.
- There is nothing that definitively links Abraxus Whitespire to the Abraxus Stone talisman. The talismans pre-date Abraxus, though some scholars claim that they held an older name and that Abraxus' association with the anti-venom protective came later as a product of the Abraxians' experiments with toxic substances. Others claim that Abraxus the Prophet was named for an older Abraxus that created the talisman but whose legacy has been overshadowed.
- In the modern era, there are groups who will identify themselves as Abraxians. However, this label is loosely defined. Some sects or covens may use it to refer to the, potentially-idolatrous, belief that pure liao visions are messages from beyond the Labyrinth, whereas others adhere to the belief that Abraxus saw his future life or lives.

Abraxus Stone

Description

The most common form for an Abraxus Stone is a silver or gold band set with a white oval stone, usually inscribed with a crimson or emerald Cavul rune. They are also crafted in the form of amulets, medallions and bracelets, but regardless of the form are usually composed of silver metal.

The use of these protective amulets dates back to the kingdom the Navarri call ancient Terunael. In the aftermath of that kingdom's fall, many of these rings were made to help the early Navarri fight against the Vallorn creatures. The rarest of these rings were bands of pure ilium set with pale gemstones and inscribed with runes; any one of these artefacts would be a gift beyond price to the Navarri.

In the wake of the disaster that destroyed the Terunael civilisation, the rings were discovered to have an additional vital power. They provided protection from the deleterious effects of exposure to the so-called vallorn miasma, up to and including preventing a dying person being infested with the plants that might cause it to rise as a vallornspawn husk. Indeed, the rings even appear to be effective at protecting their wearers from the effects of the sickness known as green lung that is linked to long-term exposure to the miasma - provided they are worn constantly of course. Even a few minutes without the protection of the talisman may result in the sickness being contracted.

Not all Abraxus Stones are rings. One of the first rings made by the Navarri was used as the basis for a beautiful amulet, given as a gift of friendship to the first of the Highborn navigators, Atuman: a single perfect white stone hung from an ilium chain, delicately crafted to suggest links of interlocking Imperial Roseweald flowers. As part of the negotiations surrounding the giving of this Tear of Peace, the Highborn agreed to allow the Navarri to travel through their lands. It disappeared following the assassination of Permion the Lawmaker, and while some stories suggest the First Empress wore the chain around her neck, as with the other rings its whereabouts today are unknown.

These rings are obviously of especial use to warriors who must fight magicians, assassins, eastern orcs or vallorn-beasts.

Rules

- Form: Talisman. Takes the form of a piece of jewellery. You must be wearing this item to use its magical properties.
- Requirement: Any character can bond to this item.
- Effect: When hits are restored to you by any means then you are also cured of the venom condition. This item will not work if the purify spell would fail to remove the VENOM for any reason. In addition, while wearing his talisman you are not subject to the venomous effects of the vallorn miasma. You will not contract green lung, nor will you become a vallornspawn husk if you die while wearing this talisman.
- Materials: Crafting an Abraxus Stone requires thirteen measures of beggar's lye, ten measures of weltsilver and seven ingots of tempest jade. It takes one month to make one of these items.

One of these items is, of course, the central device in the famous Marcher play, "Twelve Pigs". The Stone is inadvertently mixed in with the feed for a herd of swine on their way to market, and the penniless protagonist must scour the countryside trying to find the pig which has eaten it in order to secure his fortune. Despite the fact that the hero has to spend a good deal of time on hands and knees combing through pig-faeces, the play was originally regarded as a parable on Prosperity, and many in the Marches were outraged to discover that the League playhouses were playing it as a farce.

Abrogate Civil service observation

Abrogate the motion passed in 378 which assigned Civil Servants to Imperial Fleets.

Proposed Madruga, seconded by Upwold.

Overview

- End the measures that assigned Civil servants to Imperial fleets.

Date

Spring Equinox 379YE.

Cost

- None; the previous upkeep of 50 Thrones each season has now ended.

Campaign Outcome

- The measures preventing Imperial citizens from pirating foreign nation fleets, or trading with barbarians, have been suspended.
- The magistrates wish to remind Imperial citizens that while there is no crime of "piracy" per se, there are crimes of assault, murder, theft, criminal damage etc. Foreigners receive protection under imperial law so crimes committed against them can be prosecuted.
- OOC Note: It is now possible for PCs to commit piracy against foreign nations that the Empire is not at war with, or to trade with barbarians. Both actions still have significant legal ramifications, however. Bold text

Abstraction

Overview

Empire incorporates a simple downtime system that allows characters to gain new resources and wealth between events. In addition, the Imperial Senate receives an income every event from the Imperial treasury. Actions by characters at events and the ongoing plot can change the resources that are generated - but to ensure that this part of the system remains simple we employ a powerful principle to keep things simple - abstraction.

Contents

- 1 Overview
- 2 Keep it Simple
- 3 Below the Abstraction Layer
- 4 The Campaign Abstraction Layer
- 5 The Abstraction Layer is your Friend

Keep it Simple

Every resource controlled by every character in Empire is different. One character may control a fleet which consists of a single great vessel, while another character owns a fleet of smaller ships. Farms may be large or small, fertile or barren; while a business could be anything that fits with the setting. Players are free to roleplay these details as they choose, within the remit of what makes sense within the system.

However no matter what a player chooses to roleplay - the income and wealth generated by a resource remain fixed. The different possibilities that players may imagine do not affect the simple rules that determine what wealth a resource produces. For the purposes of the rules we use a simple abstract - all ships and anything conceptually similar are just a fleet. A shop, a restaurant, a theatre or an opera house - in game terms all these things are represented by a business, the details are "below the abstraction layer" - they are ignored for the purposes of the game rules.

Below the Abstraction Layer

Detail and complexity that is below the abstraction layer is completely ignored by the rules. This provides a clear freedom to players - since it enables them to roleplay in whatever way is appropriate to the setting and their character's personal circumstances. If you want to roleplay that your character does not just own a farm - but is a pig farmer with a herd of prize winning pigs - then you are absolutely free to invent that kind of detail. The corresponding limitation is that these details do not affect the rules that govern the game - your farm does not produce more income than another character's farm - even though your pigs win prizes.

Any attempt by players to try to affect the game rules by delving "below the abstraction layer" will always be rejected by the game team. There are a number of ways that a character can improve the income from a farm - they can have rituals performed upon it, they can invest money to buy weirwood to make a farm bigger. But you can never increase the income of your farm through better husbandry - these details simply do not have a direct game effect other than in how you choose to roleplay them.

The Campaign Abstraction Layer

The abstraction layer also covers the elements of the game on the Imperial scale in places like the Imperial Military Council or the Senate. The general of an Imperial army is free to roleplay whatever appropriate leadership and training they provide to their army that makes sense for their character and the setting - but it doesn't change the effective fighting strength of the army as recorded by the rules system. If a general wants to improve the fighting abilities of an army - there are rituals and investments they can make that do that.

Likewise the treasury available to the Imperial senators is the sum of money that remains after a vast amount of taxation has been collected - and a vast amount of taxation has been spent administering the Empire. Expensive items - and items that the players can change - like the upkeep of armies and fortifications or the stipend for an Imperial title can be changed. But the minutiae of the fine details of how the civil service have made thousands of payments ensuring that the Empire can run are simply not part of the game. These details can't be changed, whatever changes might be made are simply ignored for rules purposes. The income of the Senate increases as the Empire conquers new territories and as they invest in more resources for auction through the bourse. It can't be increased purely by roleplaying that the civil service have become more efficient.

The Abstraction Layer is your Friend

On the face of it, the limitations imposed by the abstraction layer may seem restrictive. In fact the opposite is true - by ignoring these details, we don't have to play-balance them and that means we don't have to attach any rules to them - and that means complete freedom for players to roleplay as they choose provided the roleplaying makes sense within the context of the setting.

The true benefits of the abstraction layer come from the simplicity that they ensure. The game design strives to ensure that the complexity of the game is in the field - in the interactions between characters - not in the interactions between players and refs. A basic rules framework - with clear abstraction of the core ideas means the rules remain simple and much easier for players to understand. It works to prevent the rules becoming complex with time, as individual players seek rules clarifications for details that are being ignored by the system.

Having run games where the rules became increasingly complex over time, we are absolutely determined that that is not going to happen to Empire. We will continue to add new elements to the game over time, but all these elements will use the same level of abstraction and simple rules that apply to everything else in the game - so that the game becomes richer with more elements in it - but does not become more complex.

Academy Student Council

The Academy Student Council draws its members from students attending the Imperial Academy. One member is elected from each nation. It serves both as an educational experience in the political processes of the Empire and as a decision-making body on behalf of all Academy students.

The council's activities are overseen by the Advisor to the Student Council, a member of the Academy Faculty who advises the council on how they may use their powers and the motions they present in council meetings.

Elections

Elections are held twice a year, at the Spring and Autumn Equinoxes. Any student attending the Academy may put themselves forward, and elections for each nation are conducted according to national traditions. Each Student Councillor may appoint a proxy.

Meeting times

The Student Council meets officially at 12pm on the Sunday of each event in the Senate to present and vote on motions. Meetings are conducted by a Speaker for the Senate. Council members may arrange informal meetings prior to this to discuss any Council business.

Powers

The council's powers are designed to empower the students to make decisions about the use of resources available to the Academy, including the stipend provided to the Bursar by Senate, any other charitable donations, and the produce of the Faculty's herb gardens, mana sites and mines.

Councillors may present one motion at each meeting. If passed, the Faculty will make all efforts to see that the motion is carried out. Previous motions have included the construction of magic items for the use of the Academy or as gifts to worthy people or groups, donations in support of organisations such as the Anvil Field Hospital, and suggestions for new classes or activities.

Acolyte's Mercy

Description

It is not clear why this wand, which requires so little in terms of special materials to construct, takes so long to form. It isn't the shape - there is no uniformity in the texture or appearance of the wood, metal or bone used to form the wand. It isn't anything to do with decoration - while traces of weltsilver ore are often used to colour the short baton, none of that mineral is actually required. Throughout the eight weeks or so that it takes for an artisan to craft one of these valuable implements, however, the wand-to-be must be handled constantly, smoothed and shaped by hand. For the best results the artisan speaks or sings to the item as it is slowly brought into being - many will sleep with the item beneath their pillow or beside their beds. They eat near it, drink near it, caress it and touch and hold it. There is a widely held belief that what is happening is that the artisan is teaching the wand about the shape and form of life itself, so it knows how best to shape the weaves of magic to restore it in others.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of a wand.
- Requirement: You must have the magician skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: You may cast, or swift cast, the heal spell as if you know it.
- Materials: Crafting an acolyte's mercy requires no special materials. It takes two months to make one of these items.

Sutin rolled the wooden rod around his hands, his thumb absently caressing the thin chains that wrapped tightly around its length. They had been crafted from the manacles that had bound his grandfather in years past, melted down and reshaped at his request. It had taken him months to complete the task the artisan had demanded of him, gathering wood from the forest where his grandfather had fallen fighting for freedom and chains of iron from the ruined mine where he had slaved.

He had never been able to grasp the intricacies of healing magic, his heart was full of the lust for battle; shattering the weapons of his foes and turning the blood of his enemies thick with poison, yet it had always pained him to watch kin die beside him with no means to help them. He clutched the wand tightly in his hands, the reflected firelight flickering along the metal.

He mused upon the words of his father, a skilled healer who had saved countless lives, and felt an echo of them whisper in his spirit, along with the touch of a departed hand on his shoulder.

"To heal, you must never forget the wounds of the past, my son"

He stared into the campfire before him, his gaze fixed on the flickering flames as if watching an unfolding play that only he was privy to. He began to sing, his voice soft but proud. The chains felt warmer to his touch as his tune filled the air, the sorrowful song lilting and passionate.

*"Times of toil, times of strife
Bound in chains, our darkened life,
Never forgotten, never un-told
Story of blood worth more than gold.*

*Then he came, a saviour strong
His voice the singer of freedom's song,
His arm the wrath of freedom's ire
Fuelling the pride of orc-heart's fire.*

*Battle won and battle earned
No longer orc -blood be Empire spurned,
From night-cloaked mines to blazing sun
Freedom earned and freedom won"*

He breathed deeply, his singing had drawn a crowd from the surrounding orcs, the very eldest amongst them wept at the memories that rushed through their minds. Sutin's breath misted in the air, spirals of white twisting in the winter night and coiled towards his wrists, wrapping around them for the briefest time before dissipating as they touched upon the warmly glowing metal that bound the wand.

Across the seven seas

"So what are the seven seas anyway? Is it something to do with the virtues?"

A small band of children had gathered to watch Mirkala painting, clustered on the dock beneath the wooden plank on which she perched, suspended by ropes from the deck of the Freeborn ship, The Seventh Sea. She paused for a moment, dropping her brush back into her pot, and turned to speak to the girl who had asked the question.

"Well! I'm glad you asked, young lady. It is clear your education has been sorely neglected if you do not know about the seven seas! If you quiet down, I can tell you all about it."

A small gang of children gathered in a rough semicircle below her. She turned round on her plank to put the ship at her back, and leaned forward holding on to one of the ropes.

"So! The first sea stretches roughly from here to midway to Sarcophan. That's the Sea of Sighs. So called because sailors sailing out of it sigh with homesickness, and those sailing back into it sigh with relief that they are practically home provided they can make it past the Grendel. The Bay of Catazar is only the northernmost part of it, and it stretches down past the Broken Shore and the lands of the orcs."

"South of that, between us and Sarcophan, is the Sea of Teeth. Lots of little islands, lots of fog. Lots of fog. Damp, warm fog that clings. You get more than your fair share of ghosts and ghost ships in the Sea of Teeth because it is so close to the Delves."

"Why's it called the Sea of Teeth and not the Sea of Fog?" asked one of the boys.

"Two reasons, both of them horrible." Far from being worried by the talk of horrors, the children clustered closer.

"Well children," she began, pitching her voice low so they had to cluster closer to hear what she was saying over the sounds of the busy quayside. "Well children ... some say the Sea of Teeth takes its name from the shallows and the unexpected rocks that will tear the bottom out of your sheep like you'd tear open a banana. If your pilot is an idiot, if your charts aren't up to date, you can run into a stone pinnacle even in deep water and then ... crunch! ... everyone drowns. And then you find out the other reason it's called the Sea of Teeth. Which is because of the SHARKS!"

She shouted the last word, causing the children to leap back in delicious terror. She snapped her teeth at them.

"Great big sharks! Bigger than a ship, some of them, and wily too. The Sarcophan hunt them, and make a special soup from their bones."

"Sharks don't have bones, though," said a boy she didn't recognise. He bore the obvious mark of merrow blood. Mirkala ignored him.

"That's two. Sail west a bit further, and you find the Sea of Storms which takes its name, as you might imagine, from all the storms. Apart from the bad weather, it's not very exciting to be honest with you ... although it's here that you find the really deep water - water so deep that you could drop the entire mountains of Urizen into it and not only would it swallow them whole but it would take half a day for the first wizards to come bobbing up to the surface complaining about how their silken robes have been ruined!"

She mimed an angry Urizen wizard, shaking her fist at the children.

"This is where you have to be very careful, because there are things in the deep water ... big things. All feathery fins and grasping arms and great big glowing eyes. Sometimes you see their shadow beneath your ship and when you do ... why there's nothing else for it but to run as fast as you can and hope you can get clear before they rise up, like islands of flesh and scales."

"Then after weeks of sailing you find yourself in the Sea of Salt. It's not a very exciting name, but it gets its name because the waters there are salted with the tears and the blood of the Sumaah and the Asaveans. They're always sinking each other and wailing and moaning about history centuries past. There's a lot of water there, which is just as well. If there was less, you'd not be able to move for angry ghosts of drowned Asavean sailors who can't get through the Labyrinth because they put all their faith in made-up-gods instead of in the Virtues."

"Do they come back as dolphins?" asked one earnest little boy. Some of his friends scoffed but Mirkala put on a serious expression.

"No not at all. The best of them who might have been virtuous if they had heard of The Way, they become albatrosses. You can see them sometimes drifting in the wake of an Imperial ship, especially if there is a priest on board, drawn by something they don't understand. The worst of them though are reborn as eels. Horrible big eels that lurk in the seaweed mats that float here and there in the open waters. The most wicked of all become trapped between life and death, and they end up as hungry shapechangers like the mora who pretend to be drowning sailors to lure the foolish in where they can wrap them in their sinewy bodies and drag them down into the deep!"

One of the littler children started to cry. Mirkala realised she might have overdone it a little.

"Not to worry though! They mostly try to lure in the Sumaah sailors who sank them, and while they may have poles up their arses the people of the Republic are too full of Wisdom to fall for the sob stories of unliving eel people! So they go hungry, and you can hear them moaning and grumbling at night about how famished they are - a little like Master Jubal does when he doesn't get his tea."

Mirkala laughed, and her laugh was infectious. Tears were dried and quickly forgotten.

"So that's four seas. The fifth sea is in the east, towards the Commonwealth and the Principalities. That's called the Sea of Steel because of all the warships you see. The people of the Commonwealth and the people of Jarm are great rivals, like two big dogs both thinking that the porch steps belong to them. They circle around each other and growl and show their teeth and occasionally one of them nips at the other one. Usually it means that the Sea of Steel is the safest sea, what with all those warships, but sometimes it gets a little messy. Sometimes Commonwealth censors want to board our ships and make sure we aren't transporting slaves to Jarm, or buying slaves from them."

"That's outrageous!" said the poor merrow. "The Empire would never deal in slaves!"

Several of the older children looked indignant. Mirkala realised she had gathered a couple of sailors for her audience now, leaning on the railings above her and passing a pipe back and forth between them.

Mirkala shrugged and muttered something about politics before getting back to her story.

"The sixth sea, I have never seen. It lies to the north on the far side of the Empire. The Sea of Snow the Wintermarkers call it, because it is full of ice. Great mountains of the stuff that move by themselves, and can crush a ship. They say there are all kinds of strange beasts in the Sea of Snow - massive cambion-whales with curling horns, and seahemoths with the upper bodies of mammoths and the lower bodies of black and white fish-beasts, and things like seals but the size of oxen with massive fangs - like thiff!"

Mirkala mimed the tusks of a walrus, and made dreadful faces, and the children laughed.

"You're making this up!" said the merrow child, plaintively. Mirkala raised her voice as she continued.

"The Sea of Snow stretches past Otkodov where the wicked Thule live, and I hear that no ships sail it because of the ice and the dark magic of the dragon princes. Leastways, I've never met anyone who has sailed up there and come back to talk about it."

The smallest of the children had been counting on her fingers.

"That's six seas," she said seriously. "Sighs, Teeth, Storms, Salt, Steel, and Snow. Your ship is called The Seven Seas - where's the seventh?"

Mirkala nodded and smiled, and waited until the children settled down again.

"The seventh sea is a magical place, and you can even see it from the docks here at Siroc if you know where to look, and if the waters aren't being shrouded in magical fog like they are at the moment.

"When the night is clear and the water is still, you can see it stretching around you like an ocean of light and darkness. Your prow cuts through it barely raising a wake at all, and everyone knows you're sailing through something special. It's like you're sailing in the sky itself, stars above and below, so clear you'd think you could reach up from the top of the mast and catch the Wanderer in your hand. Everyone goes quiet, everyone just watches. Sometimes it can last for hours, and when you sleep that night it seeps into your dreams."

The children had fallen silent as Mirkala spoke, spellbound. Only the little merrow boy seemed unimpressed.

"So is that it then? Only seven seas in the whole world and one of them obviously made up?"

"I'm telling you stories, you think?" She shook her head. "Well there's only one way to find out isn't there? You'll have to go to sea yourself!"

She picked up her brush again.

The children, sensing storytime was over, exploded uproariously then and raced off across the quay, dodging between workers and crates, starting up a confused but lively game of Corsairs and Pirates where it was not entirely clear who was on which side.

One of the sailors who had been listening in chuckled, and passed a bottle down to her.

"That was very funny," he said, as she took a swig.

Mirkala winked at him, handed the bottle back, and went back to painting.

Overview

Over the past season, all fleets belonging to Navarr and Varushkan characters have been under a potent summer enchantment. The magic means that any captain who engaged in either privateering or trade with a foreign port has had ... adventures!

They encounter strange obstacles - mist-shrouded islands not on any map inhabited by unliving courtiers; a disgruntled Night magician with a penchant for making people think they are pigs; a pod of friendly dolphins who help lost sailors find fresh food and water on an island of marvellous orichalcum apple trees; a sea battle with an angry independent pirate who must be faced down or outrun; a ghost ship haunted by the spirits of dead Sarcophan who must be defeated in a rhyming contest lest they try to drag the Imperial vessel beneath the waters; an island populated by savage dodo birds who guard strange egg-like stones of tempest jade and emerald; a leviathan whale that spews ambergris all over the deck of a ship; strange birds with gems set in their foreheads; the ruined tower of a stormlord of ancient days, long since gone to dust, but whose walls still bear valuable tapestries; an uncharted island that turns out to be the shell of a great sea turtle ... and so forth.

Each of these encounters presents a challenge that, when overcome, leads to a little booty and a tale of derring do to tell in Anvil. This effect comes from magic employed during the Winter Solstice, given to the Empire in the form of peculiar little scrolls by heralds of an unfamiliar eternal going by the name of Rhianos.

Significance

The purely mechanical effect is that enchanted fleets gain additional random income. Within the confines of the Empire world, however, you are free to make up your own stories about how you came by this additional wealth.

Rhianos, Regent of the Eternal Ocean

This eternal appears to be from the Summer realm. Imperial scholars know very little about this individual. While there have been occasional mentions of Rhianos in books and scrolls, the Empire has had no significant interaction with them in the last several centuries. The Conclave has no clear idea of who they are or what they are about beyond what has been gleaned from talking to their heralds, or uncovered in old stories.

Participation

The enchantments were delivered by heralds in the form of scrolls that could be evoked as if they were arcane projections - scrolls that lost their potency at the end of the Equinox. Due to the bad weather, not every nation had the same chance to employ these scrolls, and the physreps themselves were a little unclear as we forgot to include the arcane projection reference on them. As a result we have decided to extend their duration until the end of the Spring Equinox.

If you have one of the scrolls, you can bring it to GOD at the next event and we will replace it with an updated scroll that has the right code on it.

Adamant

Eternal of Summer

Sobriquets

Until very recently, King Adamant has been largely unknown in the Empire. The magicians of the Principalities of Jarm are believed to have extensive contact with him, where he is known as Sharaz, of the Throne of Admanat which implies that "Adamant" may be a title rather than his actual name. He is also believed to be a patron of some Asavean magicians, especially those responsible for building the great temples and monuments so beloved by the people of the western archipelago.

Appearance

In the Empire, very little is known about King Adamant. In on Jarmish text, he is depicted as a titanesque man with skin of white granite – like a living statue - seated on a throne, crowned, in vestments of mithril. In another, more fanciful image, he is depicted as a dragon with skin of gold, his scales encrusted with brilliant gemstones. Some scholars who have managed to speak to his koboldi describe him as a great stone face that appears on the wall of an immense throne room.

He is said to be the kind of a subterranean nation inhabited by short, stocky servitors who are incredible stonemasons and miners - the koboldi. These servants plumb the depths of the earth for gemstones and precious metal which they craft into beautiful forms as gifts for Sharaz. They are also sometimes sent to aid other Eternals, or even evoked by mortals, to help in the creation of great, enduring works of stone especially fortifications.

Concerns

Adamant is strongly connected to the enduring nature of the Summer realm. One Jarmish text refers to him as a consort, child or rival of Cathan Canaea, but it is not clear if there is any actual relationship. Adamant also embodies the resonance of majesty - he encourages mortals to build immense, inspiring structures and beautiful, glittering jewel with equal gusto; to delve deep into the earth to uncover the treasures hidden there; and to do everything on an immense, awe-inspiring scale.

It is not clear what has sparked his current interest in the Empire, but the first recorded appearance of his koboldi came during the Winter Solstice 379YE when a koboldi workforce appeared to help deal with accursed damage to the Castle of Thorns. The koboldi have been seen several times since - on the field at Anvil, and helping to maintain the Court of the White Fountain in the face of a malign curse.

Boons

Adamant appears to have boons related to construction and repair of castles, that much is clear. His koboldi claim to be expert miners as well - it is likely he may be able to offer boons related to mining such as Delve Deep, Beneath the Mountain. There is some speculation that he may be able to offer boons that grant mortals the properties of stone such as Stout Resolve of the Unyielding or Unbreakable Spirit, Unbreakable Blades. At this time, it is difficult to do more than guess.

Address

Overview

An address is an opportunity for an individual to make a presentation to the Imperial Conclave.

Procedure

Raising an address

Any Imperial citizen can place an address on the agenda for the next Conclave session. Placing an address costs a mana crystal, paid when the address is raised. The civil servant records the name of the person raising the address who may also choose to add a short sentence summarizing the topic of their address.

Presentation

Presenting an address allows an individual to speak before the Conclave, for up to one minute in duration, on whatever topic they desire. If they wish to speak for longer than a minute then they may spend additional crystal mana to do so as normal.

Legally, an address is considered to be any agenda item that does not require a vote of the Conclave. Traditionally, addresses are used to provide the assembled magicians with important information, or to inform the Conclave of significant magical or political developments.

The Warmage, Bursar and any archmage have the power to raise a single address for free each summit. They are expected to use their addresses to report on the progress of any gambits they have been fulfilling, but there is no legal requirement for them to do so.

Debate

After the presentation is complete, the grandmaster of each order may nominate someone present to speak, in order determined by the Principle of Precedence. Every speaker must pay crystal mana for the right to present their views. It is considered rude to move the debate away from the topic of the address - magicians who attempt to pursue unrelated agendas are often barracked by the assembled magicians until they stop talking.

Resolution

After the discussion, the address is complete and the civil servant moves on to the next address, or the process of resolving the declarations begins.

Adelmar the Lion

The object of war is not to die for your country, but to make your enemy die for theirs.

inscription on the wall of the Academy of Arms (circa 64 YE)

Virtue

Adelmar was recognised as an exemplar of Ambition by the Imperial Synod in 176 YE.

Biography

Adelmar of Arnet, also known as Adelmar the Lion, or the Lion of Arnet, is both the founder of the Academy of Arms and an exemplar of Ambition.

According to the Scroll of Noble Deeds, housed in the Imperial Library, Adelmar was born in 32 YE and grew up as a younger son to a family of farmers residing near the Dawnish town of Weaving.

At the age of eleven his parents played host to a visiting company of Knights-errant. The Knight-commander, Elaine of Faybourne, identified something special in Adelmar and took him under her wing, apprenticing him as her squire but also teaching him the way of the sword and setting him on the path to glory. He proved a quick study and trained hard, improving his techniques until he excelled with both sword and spear. By the age of sixteen he was as skilled as any of the Knights-errant and was granted command of the company's yeomanry.

During this period Adelmar continued to demonstrate a great thirst for knowledge. He befriended an itinerant Urizen scholar named Nicassia, who became a lifelong companion and the primary annalist of his accomplishments. Not content with improving his martial skills and taking part in the many conflicts with neighbouring barbarians, he still found time to learn his letters and with the aid of Nicassia, became a keen student of all aspects of warfare. However, his main area of interest related to the styles and perfection of personal combat. He sought advice from knights that he met on campaign and poured over martial tomes secured for him by Nicassia. Wherever they travelled, wherever they fought, Adelmar was driven by the need to refine and improve his combat skills.

One day the company of knights were approached by a band of foresters. They told the knights about a giant bear that had started preying on their village. They were poorly equipped to deal with such a monster and other knights who had attempted to aid them had fallen before the monster. At his request, Adelmar was granted his Test of Mettle; to destroy the great beast in combat. A grown bear is always a challenge for even the most skilful of knights, especially one that had overcome its fear of humans, but Adelmar was undeterred and relished the confrontation. He followed the tracks of the animal to a cave in a secluded dell. The surrounding area was littered with shards of torn metal armour and shattered spears - the remains of the knights the bear had killed. The bear had caught his scent and as he approached its lair it launched itself at him. The bear had clearly been twisted by foul sorcery for it was enormous even for one of its ilk. Standing four yards high at the shoulder, it was covered in long golden hair matted with the crusted blood of its victims. A row of six large horns protruded from its crown and its claws were twisted blackened daggers, the length of a person's forearm. In the ensuing battle Adelmar breaks his spear against the bear's hide which is so thick that it resists even his sharpest weapon. Not to be beaten, he adapts his fighting style and targets the monster's own weapons and one by one, he hacks the talons from the beast's paws. He then slays the monster with one of its own severed claws which he thrusts deep into its heart. He removes its pelt and fashions it into a golden fur cloak which he retains throughout his career. Some scholars believe this has mistakenly led to the epithet "Lion" when it should in actuality be "Bear".

In 52 YE, with Adelmar now a fully fledged questing knight, his company participate in the combined Marcher-Dawnish expedition to liberate Semmerholm from orcish occupation. An early skirmish with orc ambushers leads to the death of Elaine of Faybourne. In her will she expressed her desire that Adelmar take over her personal estate naming him "the most comely of Knights, skilled beyond measure in his mastery of arms". The other knights appear to agree with her statement and gladly accepted him as their new Knight-commander.

During the Semmerholm campaign Adelmar meets with the leader of the Imperial army Empress Richilde, the Sun Queen. He impresses the Empress with his skill and zeal in combat and, when not fighting, becomes a favoured figure among her court. It is believed that he reveals to her his ambition to start his own training school, dedicated to the perfection of combat. Impressed by the young knight, the Empress grants him the right to lead the heavy assault upon Arnet Keep.

Adelmar leads his knights in a charge upon the breached gates of the castle. Witness reports state that the fighting is intense and bloody work but by midday Imperial forces storm the inner fortress and set upon the defenders. Adelmar engages in personal combat with the feared orc warlord Tu'Chak, and slays him before delivering his head on a golden plate to the Empress. Several notable historians mention these actions in their accounts, paying particular note to Adelmar's incredible strength and speed. For his 'distinguished actions and demonstration of virtuous deeds', Empress Richilde rewards him with the Imperial funds required to establish an academy dedicated to excellence in personal combat, naming him her Lion of Arnet. However, in a notably adroit political move designed to prevent any grumblings of favouritism, the Dawnish Empress orders him to establish his academy in the Urizen territory of Redoubt and appoints the Urizen born scholar Nicassia, to support him in a role equivalent to seneschal.

Adelmar's reputation attracts many potential applicants - both as students and teachers. Unfortunately, by its very nature, places within the academy are limited. Although all are welcome to apply Adelmar insists that only those that demonstrate the true determination for self improvement and excellence will be accepted as students. A complex process of physical and mental tests are devised to identify those who possess the characteristics required to become the most deadly warriors in the Empire. This unorthodox selection process results in eager novices mixing with seasoned veterans and weapon masters - each seeking to reach the zenith of their ability.

Over the years the Academy of Arms, and Adelmar himself, become a lure for weapon masters from across the Empire and beyond - what the Urizen refer to as a 'node' among the 'net of heaven'. Throughout this period, Adelmar continues to train others while honing his personal martial talents. Eventually he masters every weapon commonly used within the Empire and stands undefeated among his peers. In the year 77YE, he makes the pronouncement that with no challenges left within the Empire, he intends to travel beyond the borders, seeking and mastering new forms of martial combat wherever they may be. He issues orders that the next master of the academy is to wear his cloak and become the new 'Lion'. After this declaration he simply vanishes and later that year Bryony of Tharn is appointed as the next Master of the Academy of Arms.

Many of those who train at the Academy go on to eventually found their own schools and the practice spreads throughout the Empire. Variations on the original Academy of Arms can now be found in most major cities, many specialising in particular styles or forms of combat.

A few have argued that after Adelmar recognised the perfection of his achievement he transcended which is why he disappeared. However, others have argued that his own statement that there was more for him to learn beyond the borders of the Empire would negate such an assumption. A few claim that Adelmar was poisoned by jealous rivals but there is little to no evidence to support this claim. The most popular theory is that Adelmar simply took the opportunity to leave quietly with the least pomp and ceremony possible, his mind clearly focussed on the journey before him as it had been in so many aspects of his life.

For many citizens of Dawn, Adelmar represents the epitome of the questing knight or knight-errant. He encapsulates the drive and ambition to succeed, to serve the Empire, destroy her enemies and be bathed in glory, heralded as a true hero of the Empire.

There are those, especially from Urizen, who believe that while his ambition must be recognised one could equally argue that so must his courage and loyalty, but that it is actually his pursuit of wisdom that underlays his great success. These arguments tend to be somewhat circular and remain as theoretical disputes to this day.

It has been noted that Adelmar himself was recorded as saying that "The quality of a person's life is in direct proportion to their ambition, expressed via their commitment to excellence, regardless of their chosen field of endeavour."

During the year 176 YE the Imperial Synod recognised Adelmar as an exemplar of Ambition.

Signs

The Assembly of Ambition cited the following signs of Adelmar's exemplardom:

- Adelmar's dedication to martial perfection was demonstrated in his service to the Empire and was an example of his benevolence.
- He was responsible for the formation of the Academy of Arms, an Inspiration to many warriors across the Empire.
- His journey from farm boy to weapon master, his teachings and focus in encouraging others from across the Empire, while setting himself as an example of excellence and ambition are viewed as evidence of his deep understanding of the virtue of Ambition and held to be testimony of his personal Pilgrimage. Many still follow in his footsteps, following the dangerous and circuitous path to the mountain fastness of the Academy in Redoubt.
- Adelmar's cloak, The Lion's Mantle, is a relic and evidence of a Legacy.
- Although not a sign per se, it has been noted that the Empress Richilde, a recognised paragon of Pride, rewarded Adelmar for his 'virtuous deeds'.

Admiral

Overview

The Admiral is an ceremonial title created by the Imperial Senate in Spring 378YE with responsibility to coordinate with fleet owners engaging in raiding as to the best possible targets.

The intention is that in the future this title will be expanded to include the ability to bind fleets to the Admiral's representation, but the costs and technicalities of this are being revised by Imperial Audit and Costings at present.

Contents

- 1 Overview
- 2 Responsibilities
- 3 Powers
- 4 Selection
- 5 Removal
- 6 History

Responsibilities

Imperial citizens who control fleets may issue them with orders to pirate the shipping of another nation each season. Such actions hamper the nation, by damaging trade and capturing vessels and supplies. The Admiral exists to coordinate Imperial corsairs to achieve the best military outcomes for the Empire.

Powers

The Admiral is a ceremonial title - it has no legal powers to representation in the Military Council. Only generals may vote in the Military Council and other Imperial Citizens present may be silenced by vote of the generals present.

Selection

This title is an Imperial position appointed by the Senate to serve for a year following their appointment.

Removal

The admiral serves for one year. They can be revoked by the General Assembly and the Assembly of the Nine.

History

The last time the Empire had significant naval strength was during the reign of Emperor Barabbas. The majority of the Barabbine fleet was destroyed when it encountered a supernaturally intense storm two days south of Joharra. This resulted in the first, biggest – and most expensive – naval disaster of Imperial history and goes some way toward explaining why modern Imperial fleets are mercantile, rather than military, concerns.

Advisor on orc affairs

Overview

The Advisor on Orc Affairs is an Imperial title created by the Imperial Senate in Winter 376YE and amended in the Spring Equinox of 379YE.

The first Imperial orc advisor was appointed at the Autumn Equinox in 377YE. Even before that appointment there was some controversy; when the position was first suggested, the magistrates were concerned that there were extensive constitutional problems with the title. "It is the magistrate's opinion that this motion is unconstitutional as the primary purpose of the senate is to represent the citizens of current imperial territories. The Imperial Orc nation does not currently have any territories. Furthermore it is within the existing powers of the senate to call someone to address the senate with regards to a particular motion." Following a full investigation of the matter by the Constitutional Court, these concerns were overturned - comparison was made with the Master of the Imperial Mint. As there was no attempt to give the Advisor any ability to vote or raise motions, the constitutional concerns were assuaged.

Prior to the establishment of the orc territory of Skarsind, the Advisor was appointed by unanimous decision of the Imperial Orc generals; if they were not unanimous, the only alternative was for a vote of appointment by the Imperial Senate. With the assignment of Skarsind, and the nation now having the ability to appoint senators, the appointment mechanism defaults to the standard method of appointing national Senate titles.

Responsibilities

The Advisor advises the Imperial Senate on matters relating to the orcs, both Imperial and otherwise. While they cannot raise or second a motion, nor vote, the Advisor is able and expected to participate fully in the debate that surrounds any Senatorial decision.

Powers

Member of the Senate

The Advisor on Orc Affairs is a member of the Senate. They are entitled to enter the Senate chamber at the start of a Senate session and participate in the debates. They do not have the power to raise motions or to vote on a motion.

Right of Address

The Advisor on Orc Affairs has the right to make an address to the Senate once per summit. This is intended to allow them to present issues or concerns relating to the orcs. To use this power, the Advisor informs the Civil Service that they wish to address the Senate. Their address will be added to the agenda for the next Senate session.

Appointment

The Advisor on orc affairs is appointed during the Spring Equinox each year. The title is selected by unanimous decision of the Imperial Orcs senator. If a unanimous decision cannot be reached, the title may be appointed by the Imperial Senate instead.

The title can be held by any Imperial Orc citizen, and they can be revoked by the General Assembly, the Imperial Orc National Assembly, and by the Assembly of the Nine.

Advisor on the Vallorn

Overview

The Advisor on the Vallorn is an Imperial title that may be held by any Navarr. The position was established by majority vote of the Senate in Spring 378YE.

The Advisor of the Vallorn has been the target of several attacks by agents of the Whisper Gallery. These eternals appear to object to the Advisor's role in directing the Empire's historical research agenda.

Responsibilities

The title is responsible for advising the Senate on matters relating to the vallorn, and protecting the Empire from the influence of this mysterious force or entity.

Powers

Historical Research

The advisor has the power to authorize a single historical research request each season. The civil service is able to process up to two research requests in total per season - research requests authorized by the Senate, the advisor, the Dredgemaster of Feverwater, or the Minister of Historical Research all count against this limit. The results of the research are compiled by the civil service then presented to the advisor.

To use this power, the Advisor provides an announcement to the Civil Service, who present the decision to the Imperial Senate. No voting is possible by the Senate at this point, as the power has been delegated to the Advisor. The Imperial Synod may, however, choose to exercise their veto over the advisor's decision.

Right of Address

The Advisor on the Vallorn has the right to make an address to the Senate once per summit. This is intended to allow them to present important information for the Senators consideration. It is extremely impolite not to inform the Speaker's seat of your intention to use the Right of Address in advance of a session.

Declaration of Interdiction

Once per summit, the Advisor on the Vallorn can raise a Declaration of Interdiction to the agenda of a Conclave session without spending crystal mana. They follow all other rules and guidelines for submitting an article for the Conclave agenda (it must be in advance, with the assistance of a civil servant, and they are responsible for any presentation).

Appointment

The Advisor on the Vallorn is appointed by unanimous decision of the Navarr senators. If a unanimous decision cannot be reached, the title may be appointed by the Imperial Senate instead.

The title can be held by a Navarr citizen. The advisor has tenure, and serves until they die or step down. They can be revoked by the General Assembly, the Navarr National Assembly, and by the Assembly of the Nine.

Publication

Notes presented to the Senate by Neb, a previous Advisor on the Vallorn, have been made available to anyone who is interested - File:Vallorn Notes.pdf.

Advocate

Overview

Advocates are professional yeomen who make a study of the history of the Empire and the structure of the Imperial offices, with an eye towards supporting noble senators. They may occasionally be called on to brief generals or other nobles on behalf of the senators, but for the most part they focus on making sure that Dawn gains political capital - and expends it as wisely as possible.

Creating an advocate

Dawn is very unlikely to need more than a small handful of advocates so it is worth trying to find out how many players are currently playing advocates. If there are less than three advocates then it is worth considering making an advocate character; if there are more than this then it is worth talking to some of the existing advocate players to see if they think another advocate would have enough to do at events.

If you are new to the game, it is worth considering playing a novice advocate who is looking to learn your trade. Until you have some experience of how the senate works, you are unlikely to be able to convincingly portray a highly experienced advocate, no matter how much you study the content of the wiki. It is always tempting to want to create the most brilliant advocate Dawn has ever seen, but ultimately your character's ability as an advocate will be determined solely by your skills playing them. An eager and helpful advocate who openly admits to being inexperienced is going to get called on to help more than a character that claims to know everything but whose advice reveals their lack of experience.

This is a character choice that will allow you to explore some of the themes of being a civil servant without actually being an NPC. A lot will rely on roleplaying, but you should never be afraid to approach a civil servant and ask for clarification on a point of law or procedure - liaising with the civil service can be a source of fun in itself.

Playing an advocate

Playing an advocate is a little like playing a personal assistant or secretary. Rather than restricting yourself to being an assistant to only one noble, however, there is a lot more fun to be had making yourself indispensable to all the Dawnish senators. There is a lot of opportunity for roleplaying interactions both within Dawn and with your opposite numbers in other nations.

As an advocate you are ultimately responsible to the nation you serve and the senators who take your advice. There may be opportunities to turn situations to your own advantage as an advocate, but the most popular and active advocates will be those who give effective and impartial advice.

Although advocates exist to advise the Dawnish senators, don't assume that the Senate is the only place you can get your work done. It is a poor advocate who helps their senators pass their bill only to see it vetoed by the Synod. The more you understand of the Empire, how it runs and who runs it, the more effective an advocate you will be.

Advocates have no official power in Dawn or the Empire, so you won't have any additional resources to call on. If you are able to demonstrate your effectiveness as an advocate, either individually or by working together with the other advocates then it may be worth pressing the Dawnish senators to provide a purse of money for the advocate's benefit. Everyone knows politics is dirty work and coin helps lubricate the wheels of power - but many Dawnish senators disdain money and are openly contemptuous of bribery. As nobles it's their responsibility to strive to be as glorious as possible, so someone else is going to have to make sure that Dawn wins those essential Senate votes...

Aesh

The Staff, Rune of Thought

Affiliated with the Realm of Day

Aesh is the Staff, or sometimes the Staff and the Star. It represents thought, reason and intellectual faculties. It is also the rune of Logic, suggesting the progression from one idea to another, and in this aspect may sometimes be called the Chain. The concept of one thought or idea providing the foundation on which others are built also makes it the Rune of Hierarchy, of stable social structures based around reason, order and shared ideals.

This rune also symbolizes all forms of mental discipline based on universal truths - mathematics, engineering and even music. As the Rune of Knowledge it is sometimes called the Scrollcase.

Reason is often devoid of moral imperative, however, and logic can lead inexorably towards terrible deeds. These darker aspects of Aesh bring with them the suggestion of intellectual bigotry and the assumption that learning and rationality alone make an individual better than their peers.

Thought empowers and is empowered by the rational mind. It directly opposes Zorech, the Rune of Passion, which represents instinctual behaviour. Some magicians argue otherwise and claim that Aesh and Zorech complement, rather than oppose, one another; the theory being that passion and intuition harnessed by reason and logic are stronger than either quality alone.

The Rune of Thought is sometimes associated with the general practice of magic, especially by some Urizen prognosticators. They claim that it is only through thought and reason that magic can be understood, mastered and wielded. Even in a nation known for intellectual rivalry and disparate philosophy, this idea is considered especially contentious.

Using Aesh in Magic

Aesh is unsurprisingly evoked with any magic that deals with the mind, but it is also commonly used in rituals that deal with the exercise of mental skills such as engineering, architecture or tactics. It is often used with the detect magic incantation.

Crafting with Aesh

Magicians often have the rune worked into their implement, or whatever tool they use to perform their magic. Some mystics claim that every magician's staff, wand or rod is a physical manifestation of Aesh. It is also commonly worked into the cover (often on the spine) or frontispiece of any non-fiction book; likewise it is embossed on scroll cases and writing kits by sages and itinerant scholars alike. Despite its associations with scholastic pursuits, tacticians and strategists often carry batons or other items marked with the rune, recognising the role logic and reason play in the planning of battles.

Aid Once More

Rules

Autumn Magnitude 6

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets a character, who must be present throughout. The target character must have the magician skill.

This spell is an enchantment. A target may only be under one enchantment effect at a time.

Effects

This enchantment allows the character to make use of a Volhov's Robe three times each day instead of two times each day. All other rules, including the requirement to be bonded to the item, and the restriction against being part of a coven, still apply.

The effect lasts until the start of the next Profound Decisions Empire event.

Description

This ritual was developed from research performed by the well-known magical theorist Aquillian Effugere, and formulated at the Halls of Knowledge by Provost Octavius. It was entered into Imperial lore by declaration of the Conclave during the Autumn Equinox 381YE.

This utilitarian enchantment subtly alters and reinforces the bond between a magician and a Volhov's Robe, allowing the wearer to use its power an additional time each day. Autumn magic is adept at working subtle changes to magical bonds, and in enhancing the product of mortal artisans. Magicians working to formulate this ritual speculate that similar effects could be created with any number of magic items - using Autumn lore to temper the bonds between the item and the wielder. Unfortunately, each ritual would need to be specifically designed to work with a single magic item, which will likely limit the applications of this research.

It is worth noting that the ritual does not enchant the robe itself. Rather, the magician wearing the robe gains an enhanced ability to draw on the power of the magic item. Comparisons might be drawn between the way the magician gains increased skill, and the way certain other enchantments allow a warrior to use their weapons with greater facility (such as Barked Command of the Iron Serjant).

Interestingly, the magician enchanted with the power of Aid Once More does not actually have to be bonded to a Volhov's Robe at the point the ritual is performed. The ritual is an enchantment after all, that simply provides the recipient with an ability they otherwise would not possess - in this case the ability to draw on the power of a specific magic item more effectively.

Performing the Ritual

While the magician need not actually be bonded to or wearing a Volhov's Robe to gain the benefit of the enchantment, if they are then the robe becomes an obvious focus for the ritual. It might be painted with a special design that is echoed on the body of the magician (for example, a rune on the hand also painted onto the hood). Symbols of binding and bonding are also appropriate - binding the hands of the magician lightly during the ritual only to free them at its climax representing their ability to push beyond the limitations of use normally imposed by a Volhov's Robe.

The ritual may also involve a casting of the create bond spell - either to bind a new Volhov's Robe to the recipient, or to symbolically reinforce and reforge the bonds between magician and magical robe. The ritual is low enough in magnitude that an adept of Autumn lore can be perform it without the aid of a coven; in such cases the magician may wish to enlist the aid of allies to help them don the robe in a ceremonial fashion to draw on the powerful hearth magic of girding.

The rune Hirmok, representing mastery and dominion, has particular resonance with this ritual, but Verys (the rune of strength) or Irremais (the rune of wisdom) might also be appropriate. A blood magician might use a little blood from a respected magician, used to anoint the hands or the robe. A dramaturge is likely to find this ritual has significant resonance with the Witch, and with both the Lantern and the Ring. For the astronomancer, the Chain (representing bonds and connections) and the Phoenix (with its resonance of learning and magical power) are particularly appropriate.

OOO Note

When this ritual was originally formulated, the effects of the enchantment were quite different. It allowed an enchanted magician to contribute to an additional ritual each day. This mechanic was based on a mistake at our end caused by misleading text on the Volhov's Robe. The ability to cooperate to perform rituals is a feature of a coven, not individual characters, and it's not possible to allow individuals to perform additional coven rituals. The ritual as written violated important core game mechanics and introduced irreconcilable problems. We changed it to the current form to get as close to the original intent as possible but keep within the core rules for the game. We have made the modified version part of Imperial lore, but refunded the resources spent on the declaration, and on the original arcane projection.

Alabaster Cerement

Description

The power of this enchanted robe is to grant a devout wearer a great reserve of inner strength; they bank the fires of mortality, helping the wearer to endure pain and suffering that might overwhelm and kill other people. Also called variously a martyr's shroud, a gravedigger's coat and a widow's (or widower's) gown these robes are modeled after the shrouds used to wrap the dead in Highguard and several other nations.

In contrast with many other enchanted robes they tend to be sombre, with limited decoration. The cloth is bleached with beggar's lye, toughened with ambergelt, reinforced with dragonbone and finally embroidered with delicate silver threads. Outside the Brass Coast they are rarely coloured, being commonly left white rather than any other shade.

Among the Freeborn, by stark contrast, they are usually dyed a deep red or yellow colour, and the sleeves and hems are much more likely to be ornamented with tiny gemstones. Here they are called flickering shrouds; while their association with death is not denied, it is celebrated rather than mourned.

Rules

- Form: Armour. Takes the form of a robe. You must be wearing these vestments to use their magical properties.
- Requirement: You must have the dedication skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: You gain three ranks of fortitude.
- Materials: Crafting an alabaster cerement requires seven measures of beggar's lye, six measures of ambergelt, and three measures of dragonbone. It takes one month to make one of these items.

Alderei the Fair

Over centuries the Volodny kept their feud alive through malign curses and spiteful sabotage. Shortly before the time of the First Empress, they launched a devastating attack against the Varushkans. While the Volodny themselves refused to use steel, they gave their support to a boyar called Alderei the Fair. Alderei raised an army and sought to unite the entire nation under his rulership, with the intention of leading this new nation to conquer the rest of humankind. Alderei was not afraid to use steel, and swept down from the north crushing everything in his path. Whenever a settlement fell to his army, he gave the survivors a simple choice “join me, or die.” To join Alderei required submission to the iron fist of a tyrant who would brook no argument, and tolerate no failure.

Many joined Alderei because, whatever else he did, he drove the monsters before his armies and protected those who swore allegiance to him from the darkness. To do this however required the aid of the Volodny and they took a terrible price from Alderei’s supporters in blood and flesh, which they used to propitiate the dark powers and fuel the boyar tyrant’s armies with their malign sorceries.

It seemed certain that the Varushkans would be united under the banner of Alderei; the people lacked a unified central authority capable of resisting the conquering boyar. According to legend, a gathering of wise ones took place at this time to discuss what could be done to stem the seemingly unstoppable tide washing down from the north. The gathering lasted for a full lunar month, and eventually came down to a decision between two very different yet hauntingly similar courses of action.

The first course was to compromise with Alderei and march beneath his banner, to create a great thousand-year Empire and to offer the dark powers the sacrifices they craved. The other was to seek external aid – the Navarr had brought news of a gathering to the south where a new way of life was being discussed, one of unity rather than subjugation. In the end the wise ones took a delegation to this meeting, while the remaining free boyars who refused to accept Alderei’s yoke fought desperately against the tyrannical boyar’s forces.

After days of negotiation, the wise ones agreed that Varushkans would join the nascent Empire in return for aid in defeating Alderei and his Volodny conspirators. A great host formed of the armies of the other nations rode into Varushka to relieve the besieged boyars. With the aid of ritual magicians from Urizen the power of the Volodny was matched and broken. The boyar himself was slain by the heroic Marcher general Tom Drake (who lost his life in the process), and several of the Volodny met their final ends as their army fell apart.

The body of Alderei was never recovered and at his execution one of the captured Volodny gave a prophecy saying that one day in the future the dark king would return and take vengeance for this defeat, shattering the Empire as he had once shattered Varushka.

Alderman's Edge

Description

These items often take the form of chains of orichalcum and gold, from which hangs an oval medallion inlaid with tempest jade. They are often used by Marcher aldermen to bolster their defences, allowing traders and artisans to fight alongside trained bill fighters.

In other parts of the Empire, they are often called Homefire Guardians and are used to allow civilians to protect their homes from invaders. These items more commonly take the form of simple rings or bracers of orichalcum and gold, inlaid with tempest jade in the form of symbols of vigilance (such as geese in Varushka), runes such as Ophis, Feresh or Iotra, or heraldic beasts such as gryphons.

Rules

- Form: Talisman. Takes the form of a jewellery. You must be wearing this item to use its magical properties.
- Requirement: Any character can bond to this item.
- Effect: You gain the weapon master skill.
- Materials: Crafting an Alderman's Edge requires nine ingots of tempest jade and three ingots of dragonbone. It takes one month to make one of these items.

Sir Orly squared his shoulders and held his spine as straight as possible while balancing on the slick surface of the fallen log. Lady Gwendoline couldn't see it, but his cheeks were flushed red with embarrassment beneath his visored helm. He'd never expected her to come here. In his wildest fantasies, perhaps, she'd finally given some sign of returning his ardour; maybe a silk scarf or a lock of her golden hair as a sign of favour, but he'd never expected to see her here in this dank marsh.

She smiled, and it was a smile that could melt a pound of butter in midwinter. "It's Sir Orly, isn't it?"

"You, ... your ladyship. I.. I...er...wasn't expecting to see you. Out here, I mean."

She twirled a delicate finger through the necklace of green stones that spilled down over her generous bosom - the same sparkling green as her eyes, he noted. "Oh, come now, Sir Orly." she admonished, "This is the test the Earl set for our marriage, is it not? Shouldn't I take an interest in a potential suitor?"

"On my honour, he made me swear to guard this bridge against all comers for three days, my lady. I've sent sir Dregan and a few village boys packing already. By morning I'll have completed the task. Not that it's a burden, or anything..." He looked at his feet, blushing once more.

She seemed to choose her next words carefully. "Orly, that's very sweet, but you might have done well to ask me first. The truth is that I already have a lover, and no interest in marriage besides."

This was all wrong! She was a sweet, virginal bloom, a tender young maiden. She couldn't be saying these words. "Who?" he snarled. "I'll gut him, I'll have his head, I'll eat his heart for breakfast!"

She smiled serenely again as she casually foraged a fallen branch from the bushes by the side of the stream, "You probably would, too, wouldn't you? Quite good at violence by all accounts. Dregan still hasn't woken up from that beating you gave him. Very well, my hero - come here and receive my embrace."

His instincts were telling him that something was wrong, but his passion overwhelmed them and he move forwards, arms outstretched for the kiss he'd been yearning for so long. Suddenly her arms whipped the heavy branch around with all the speed and skill of a trained warrior, striking him full in the side of the helm with a sickening crunch. For second he swayed, then collapsed towards the foaming stream. At the last instant he managed to get one hand into a knothole on the log's surface, although it almost wrenched his arm from its socket. He looked up as she stepped daintily along the log until she was above his hand.

"Help me!" he cried, "We are meant to be together! It's destiny!"

"Not in this lifetime, I'm afraid, Orly" she said as she brought the branch down on his fingers with all her strength.

Later that night as Lady Gwendoline celebrated her freedom, her lover handed her a glass of wine and asked "Did the jewels you asked for bring you pleasure, my lady?"

Gwendoline laughed lustily, "My dear Signeura, you have no idea..."

Aldones di Sarvos

There is only one true insult you can offer to a citizen of our League – 'unremarkable'

Virtue

Aldones di Sarvos was recognised as a paragon of Ambition by the Imperial Synod in 23 YE. He was also formally recognised as a paragon of Ambition by the Sumaah Republic in 186YE.

Biography

Aldones di Sarvos is both the founder of the League and a paragon of Ambition. According to legend he began life as an orphan before becoming the most powerful merchant prince of the city of Sarvos. As one of the earliest supporters of the First Empress and one of the the richest men in the world at that time, his silver flowed everywhere the Empress and her troops went. Early on, Aldones recognised a clear problem; while he and his fellow Sarvossians considered themselves the most civilised people in the world, a single city could not compare with the power of the nations that were drawn to the Empress' banner.

Demonstrating his great vision and pragmatism when it came to achieving his goals, he met with his fiercest rival, the Merchant Prince Barrell of Tassato, and with Maria Ivanova, Boyar of Temeschwar. He introduced them to the Empress, and together they persuaded the two that their future lay with the Empire. In private meetings following the more public meeting with the Empress, Aldones convinced the other two that as the greatest cities of the world, they had more in common with each other than with the nations that surrounded them. He persuaded them to join together into a single League and thereby create an entirely new nation.

Several years after the foundation of the Empire, Aldones took True Liao. He received a potent vision of which he would not speak but the priest he had a chosen to accompany him, Bishop Catertina de Sarvos, indiscreetly revealed the truth of the matter; Aldones had received a vision of having been the Highborn cultural hero, Atuman the Navigator. This caused an immediate uproar in the Synod, because they argued that it made it impossible for Atuman himself to have attained paragonhood.

The political furore that ensued badly damaged Aldones' plans but grudgingly the Synod were forced to agree that Atuman must have been an exemplar, and accept that Aldones was at least as virtuous as the founder of Highguard - both had created new nations out of nothing. For the rest of his life, Aldones attempted to downplay this revelation as much as he could - he took no pleasure in it, and stated several times that the revelation of the true liao had been "a tree that bore only bitter fruit" and that he "had aimed for sky but hit the sun".

He disappeared from history shortly after a keynote speech to the newly-united League. Some maintain that he transcended at the defining moment of his greatest success. Others maintain that he simply stepped back into the shadows, refusing to become a figurehead for his new nation, and continued to observe the League from behind the scenes. Historians and theologians are divided on the matter.

His private life is largely a closed book, but he is often quoted as saying "surround yourself with exceptional people, and make them love you." His cadre of friends, allies and supporters are often seen as the blueprint for the guilds that form the basis of League society. The son of his fiercest rival, later one of his closest friends, Giovanni di Tassato, went on to succeed the First Empress to the Imperial Throne, and claimed several times that he was inspired to make the sweeping reforms he enacted by the example of Aldones.

Aldones Today

For many followers of the Way Aldones represents an aspiration to be "all that you can be." Historical reports say he never stopped trying to improve himself, and by doing so inspired those around him to do the same. The list of his many accomplishments appears excessive - he was recognised as a skilled swordsman, general, poet, painter, sculptor, actor, economic theorist, playwright and politician who demonstrated extensive education in history and the arts. He famously said that "talent is no substitute for hard work", and spent most of his spare time training his body or studying to improve his mind.

Signs

The Assembly of Ambition cited the following signs as proof that Aldones was a paragon.

- The circumstances surrounding his disappearance were used to claim that he had Ascended and was thus Liberated from the Labyrinth.
- His personal past-life vision of having been the Navigator Atuman, for all the controversy that surrounded it, is a sign of Recognition.
- His work in founding the League, bringing prosperity not only to Sarvos, but also to Temeschwar and Tassato, was a sign of his Benevolence.
- The League continues to endure four-hundred years later, and along with assorted relics and writings is considered part of his Legacy.
- At the time of his Recognition it was already clear that he was an Inspiration to people from all nations and walks of life, including at least one Imperial Throne. Aldones is held up as an example of the power of Ambition by followers of the Way throughout the Empire and beyond.
- This powerful legacy of inspiration has certainly had significant success in bringing many people to the Way and the path of Ambition in particular - granting them Salvation.
- While Aldones travelled to Bastion more than once, and certainly spoke with priests and proponents of the Way, the Assembly of Ambition did not present this as proof of a Pilgrimage at the time of his recognition. Indeed, they made much more of the fact that he made a personal study of the Way and its Virtues, and came to his own conclusions rather than simply accepting the teachings of others.

Aldones in Play

Aldones is a paragon of Ambition whose actions changed the world.

Aldones' physical ascension is sometimes contested by theologians and historians. As Emperor Frederick himself wrote "the man is remarkable enough without needing to tack on the suggestion that he was somehow spirited away from the mortal world at the height of his triumph!" There are nearly as many theories among such scholars about what actually happened to Aldones after his apparent disappearance as there are scholars interested in the matter.

Inspirational Tomb

Aldones' inspirational tomb is empty. Built in Sarvos thirty years after his disappearance, the tomb is at the top of a tall tower on the northern side of the city. An empty chamber at the top of the tower is surrounded by arches that open out onto a circular balcony. Pilgrims can look out across the city of Sarvos, and north towards Temeschwar, Tassato, and Holberg. Understated as it is, the vantage point coupled with the potent consecration laid across the top of the tower creates a profoundly moving experience.

The Basilica of Aldones

Built in 28YE with the assistance of the Custodes Clavium, the basilica of Aldones stands in the White City of Bastion. It is one of the tallest structures in the city, with three great spires reaching over two hundred feet into the sky. Each spire is surmounted by a massive bell that rings every hour, as marked by the Grand Clocktower in Holberg. Four large stained glass windows dominate the interior, each one depicting one of the cities of the League. Originally, there were three windows, but in 138YE the interior was remodelled by the artist and architect Geneviève di Sarvos to include a new window depicting the city of Holberg - a project of great ambition in its own right that took three years to complete.

There is no Imperial Title associated with the Basilica of Aldones, and when decisions must be made regarding it they are made by the Cardinal of Ambition.

Align the Celestial Net

Rules

Night Magnitude 30

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 10 minutes of roleplaying. During the ritual the casters must be in a strong regio. The ritual targets the regio in which it is performed.

This spell is an enchantment. A target may only be under one enchantment effect at a time.

Effects

This ritual shifts the Realm quality of a regio for purposes of the next ritual cast using that regio.

The regio can be shifted one step in either direction along a fixed progression.

Day <-> Winter <-> Spring <-> Night <-> Summer <-> Autumn <-> Day

The enchantment lasts until a ritual is performed using that regio, or the next sunrise, whichever comes first.

Additional Strength

The ritual can be used to shift a regio two steps along the progression in either direction by increasing its magnitude by 50.

Description

As with The Eight-spoked Wheel, there is a great deal of mystery around how precisely this ritual does... what it does. Align the Celestial Net should in theory only transform a Night regio, or only allow a regio to be aligned to Night. Instead it allows transformation around a 'wheel' and is equally effective at targeting regio aligned to other realms, or aligning a regio into any realm. Despite its versatility, it is often easier to use this ritual to align a Night aura than any of the others - perhaps because Night auras are so imbued with the energies of transformation, more likely because a Night regio is likely to enhance Night Realm magic performed within it.

The Urizen claim that the ritual draws on the power of astronomancy, specifically on constellations such as The Wanderer and The Door. The runesmiths of Wintermark claim it relies on the convergence of Wyr and Xun. The Highguard prefer to imagine that it is the result of human magical strength bending the power of the supernatural Realms to their will. It may well be that none of them, or all of them, are right.

The ritual is at its most effective when used on a battlefield. With it, a regio attuned to Spring might be shifted to Winter to allow a powerful curse to be invoked, or a regio attuned to Autumn might be shifted to Summer to allow the creation of a vital enchantment. Either way, mastery of the ritual is not common - its use is circumstantial - but when it is needed it dramatically increases the battlefield options of an Imperial strike force.

The ritual is believed to have minimal effect on the regio-aura at Anvil; that regio is already attuned to several realms. The Imperial Conclave has specifically interdicted the use of this ritual at Anvil, for fear that it have unforeseen repercussions for the Sentinel Gate, the Hall of Worlds or the settlement of Anvil.

The performance of this ritual depends largely on the realms involved. To shift a ritual from Spring to Winter, symbols of entropy and declining energy might be used. To shift from Autumn to Day, images associated with building order and hierarchy through influence and rational thought might be more appropriate. The ritualists must be inside the regio, and often subject to any roleplaying effects.

As previously mentioned, this ritual often involves the runes Xun and Wyr, the constellations of The Wanderer and The Door and the invocation of Eternals of Night associated with mystery and transformation.

Alignment of Mind and Blade

Rules

Day Magnitude 18

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets a character, who must be present throughout.

This spell is an enchantment. A target may only be under one enchantment effect at a time.

Effects

The target may call impale once each day with any one-handed weapon or one-handed spear.

While under the enchantment the target experiences a roleplaying effect: they feel poised on the verge of sudden, decisive action. Thought and deed become increasingly united - when they decide to do something it is very difficult for them to resist acting immediately without guilt, doubt, hesitation or mercy.

The effect lasts until the start of the next Profound Decisions Empire event.

Additional Targets

This ritual can affect additional characters from the same banner. Every additional character increases the magnitude by 14. Additional characters must be present throughout.

Description

This ritual grants the ability to make decisive strikes with a one-handed weapon or one-handed spear. Along with the martial power comes a sense of poise and excellence that drives warriors under this enchantment to act with perfect clarity, removing doubts and freeing them from guilt. Some magicians who use this spell call it The Perfect Moment because it encourages the target to live entirely in the present, to abandon concerns about the past or future. This can be a powerfully liberating - and potential dangerous - frame of mind to experience. Many scholars of Day magic prefer to ensure this ritual is used only on those who have already demonstrated the ability to control their emotions, for fear of creating a merciless killer.

Common Elements

This ritual usually involves both the target and their weapon. A ritualist might trace matching runes on weapons and warrior, or might encourage them to run through a weapon-drill. Some magicians encourage the targets to remain absolutely still, sometimes in an uncomfortable martial pose, until the climax of the ritual when they explode into action with a single dramatic strike. The ritual is often combined with an oath or promise to use its power (or not use its power) in a certain way.

Legendary warriors, especially those who fought only when necessary, are often invoked as are Paragons and Exemplars who showed heroic judgement; the name of Zakalwe the Eternal Master Strategist is also appropriate. The virtues of Wisdom and Ambition may be referenced in literal or symbolic forms.

Any of the Day runes might be evoked. Cavul, the rune of clarity and Aesh, the rune of thought, are commonly marked on the weapon and the wielder respectively. An evocation of The Key may be appropriate with this ritual.

All Come Listen

This is a simple little song to a traditional tune which makes a lovely mnemonic for the virtues. It can also be sung as a round. It's well-known in Highguard.

The tune is traditional, the words are by Nira of Cantiarch's Hold.

All along the watchtower

"Well if that's how you see it, them's your choices, Mournwolder! Suck it up!" Jasna pushed her seat back, as she shouted at the local sat opposite her. His reaction startled her. He started laughing. Bitter, hollow laughter.

"Oh really schlacta? Don't you know our history? There's never just two choices." He leaned in, his face angry and intimidating.

"We're Marchers... when our backs are to the wall, and some arrogant prick is trying to tell us how important it is that we toe the line and do as we're told ... we march."

And at that he stood up, threw a handful of coins on the table, and walked out of the tavern."

Overview

For thirty years much of the Mournwold has languished under Jotun control. A handful of villages held out along with Overton in Greensward, but for many the Empire became a distant memory. As the seasons turned a generation were born knowing nothing but Jotun dominion. Now at last a great host of Imperial armies has entered the Mourn. But the Empire's magic designed to bleed the Jotun has claimed many innocent lives. With the destruction wrought by their magic it seems certain that the Empire will defeat the Jotun - what is less certain is how they will claim victory.

Imperial generals have been meticulous in issuing orders to their troops instructing them to avoid any civilian casualties, but while their concern is worthy the instructions are unnecessary. Imperial armies are made up of professional soldiers, drilled and disciplined; not some ravaging fire destroying everything in their path. Imperial officers strive to ensure the minimum civilian casualties from their actions unless they are specifically ordered to by their generals. Ironically the Jotun fight in a very similar style. The deaths of countless Mournwold civilians have not happened as the result of soldiers run amok at any point - they happened when the Imperial magicians explicitly summoned magic to bring death to everyone in the territory. The legacy of this act lingers in the grim demeanour of every yeoman the Imperial armies encounter.

Now that act has been complemented by the actions of the Iron Helms as their pursue their merciless onslaught against the Jotun, using any tactics necessary to break their enemies' spirit. This strategy is succeeding - the Jotun are falling back in terror. General Akstis Eigulys of the Iron Helms has given clear orders that his troops are only to slaughter the Jotun warriors in this way - no civilians are assaulted, they are allowed to pass unhindered. No Mournwold or orc civilian (of which there are many) have been harmed - but for the actions of the Iron Helms to work they have to be visible to everyone. Perhaps if this order had not come a season after the Empire used magic to kill a sixth of the population of the Mournwold things might have been different. But with that recent deed still fresh in their memory, many Mournwolders are watching the cruelty of the Iron Helms and thinking about what that means for them should the General issue fresh orders next season.

Significance

The situation in the Mournwold is dire. Imperial soldiers are now openly shunned, or driven away with rough music. This is not what most Marchers had in mind when they set out to free the Mourn. The Jotun are clearly on the back foot, but the mood of the Mourn grows darker with every passing season. The Empire has just put out one fire in the north, it will need to find a way back from this abyss if it is to avoid starting many more.

At present the situation is so complicated that the civil service are unable to identify a single clear action that the Empire could take to redress the situation. Instead they have identified a number of different approaches the Empire might consider, all of which would have some effect if they could be done - but not enough by themselves. But if the Empire pursued most of the options identified at this stage, it would at least be enough to get prominent Mournwolders to talk to them about the problem.

What categorically will not work at this stage is words. The Way teaches that there is no virtue in words - only in actions. There is nothing people can say to the people of the Mournwold at this time that is going to change this situation - but the right actions might be sufficient to start addressing the problem.

Spring

Shem shifted slightly where he sat on the moss covered boulder, and looked down across the valley with its light sprinkling of woods. He smiled for a moment at how well his backside fitted into the groove in the old rock. That's tradition right there, he thought. six, seven centuries of Landskeeper arse wearing a stone down until it's comfy.

He pulled out the folded parchment, and silently read it for the third time, his lips moving slowly as he read.

"our Empire has begun to lose ... it is not too late ... uplift the spirit ... I do not believe that the children of the Jotun are 'monsters', to be thus scourged ... It is only with your will and when we act together - in inspiration and benevolence - that we shall ultimately prevail."

He scratched at a scab of bark on his cheek, sighed, folded the letter carefully and put it away again.

Landry and Becks turned up together, as was their wont. There was the usual slightly stilted exchange of pleasantries and small talk.

"Do you want the good news or the bad news," she began. Pleasantries were over. Shem stood up and joined her by the old stone.

"I like to start with the good news," he said.

"Well there isn't any." she snapped. "Tell him, Landry."

"I spoke to a tinker at the market," Landry chimed in. "The problem with the regio? It's not just us. Oliver Ashill says it's up his way too, says everyone is asking about it. She said it's the same in Madeiras as well. And Becks spoke..."

"Euan Blackswan says it's everywhere," Becks interrupted. "Whole empire. Not a single coven can draw on a single Spring regio."

"Oh." Shem said. He knew he wasn't really adding much to the conversation but he just felt so ... hollow. Cold to his stomach. Empty. All that work... for nothing...

Several landskeepers from the neighbouring territories have come over the border to try and talk to the Mournwolders - to try to convince them that the incident with the winter and spring curses at the start of the year were an aberration and that those responsible have been punished. Copies of Empress Lisabetta's address to the Empire were distributed.

Eventually they begin to put together a plan. Rivers of Life is a potent Spring ritual that could be used to help the Mourn. It's not going to bring back any of the dead of course, but it protects against Rivers Run Red, it would give succour to people in the territory and to make them feel safer. Of course a few of the landskeepers realize such a decision might not suit the wishes of the Military Council, but the Empress has been emphatic about reducing casualties - this would be something the Empire could actually do to reduce the amount of killing in the Mournwold.

The Mournwolders have almost nothing - there are few magicians of any worth and little mana to perform the ritual. But they figure if they can convince the Conclave with some kind of declaration or something - then maybe they can get the Conclave to cast the ritual for them. It wouldn't solve the problem - but it would be a start. Half a plan!

And then word comes down that the Empire has lost the ability to perform powerful Spring rituals... which has largely stymied the plan. It is clear is that substantive actions taken to reduce the number of casualties on all sides would influence how those who live here view what is happening. But how that might be achieved is no longer clear.

Lore

The Marcher National Assembly have taken actions to ensure that the people of the Mournwold are aware that as a result of thousands of Marcher citizens being killed with magical curses, the Urizen General has been rebuked and the Warmage has lost their seat. The statement is largely falling deaf ears at the moment - but from all the dark talk about a wicker man, it is clear that little short of summary execution or voluntary immolation would mollify their anger. Still, a few people are able to at least make the case that the Empire has demonstrated a change of heart.

The monks and friars of the Marches condemn the lack of Vigilance shown in not facing the threats posed by cursing the Mourn. We condemn the lack of Loyalty shown to the 250,000 Marchers left there. The Urizen General has been rebuked by the Synod. The Warmage has lost his seat over this. Those responsible shall be held to account.

Marcher National Assembly, Spring Equinox 381YE, Martin Orchard, Upheld 46 - 0

Unfortunately these advocates for the Empire are forced to eat their own words when news arrives that the Imperial Conclave has added another potent Spring curse to Imperial lore. It is hard to make a case that anyone regrets the use of Spring curses on the Mournwold when the Empire is busily adding yet more rituals of this kind to lore. And the timing is particularly unhelpful. In other nations magicians are studying the ritual and wondering how they might use it on their enemies... but the response of the few Mournwolders who can do magic is to study the ritual to see how they might best protect themselves against it.

People have queried if a ritual might be removed from Imperial lore before now. In theory there is no legal mechanism by which such a thing might be accomplished, but Harry Archer, an enterprising thresher from Mitwold has come up with an option. The Imperial Conclave can interdict a ritual text - and they can give instruction for the thing they interdict to be destroyed. This declaration is usually applied to an item - or a small class of items - but Harry points out that in theory the Conclave might choose to interdict every single known copy of a ritual text - giving orders for them to be destroyed. If that were done - then the effect would be identical to if the ritual had never been added to lore.

The thresher has spoken to the civil service and they have confirmed that while there is no fundamental constitutional bar to this approach, it is not consistent with the current law. While interdicted magic items or materials should be handed in promptly to the civil service this explicitly does not apply to interdicted rituals, which are simply illegal to perform. Magistrates advise that a change to the law would be required to create a new Conclave power to accomplish this. They argue that it would be appropriate to create a new power and they warn it would be expensive - they calculate it would cost 25 thrones per named ritual to seek out and destroy every copy of each of those ritual texts in the Empire. It has been impishly suggested that this power could be called a Declaration of Remorse.

It would be incredibly expensive to remove Rivers Run Red from Imperial Lore but it would be a clear step to demonstrate to the folk of the Mourn that the Empire regretted the decision to use that ritual. It would need to be done alongside removing Mountain Remembers its Youth though - leaving one or the other rituals in Imperial lore would achieve nothing. If these rituals are removed it would not prevent anyone who has mastered the ritual from continuing to cast it but it will no longer be available to learn without a ritual text.

"Look you dumb-ass farmer... we're here to free you!"

"Free us!" Jasper slammed his fist down on the table. "Free us? You stuck up bloody town-boy! You've got some flaming cheek!"

Jenna rocked back in her seat at the fury in the old man's eyes, and the raw passion in his voice.

"You aren't here to free us. You're here to kill Jotun! That's all! It's not about us, it's about you - what you want. We're just another battleground. Our home is just a place where you can kill Jotun."

"That's not..." Jenna shot back but Jasper was not listening.

"Shut ya trap! I've listened to your sanctimonious drivel all night! You cannot say you are here to free us from the yoke of the Jotun when you killed thousands of us. Thousands! And for what? So you could butcher as many orcs as possible. You spent a year telling us it were wrong to Hate the Jotun. You sent that poor Whittler sod to the Labyrinth for it ... and the entire time, the entire time, your only reason for being in the Mourn is because you want to kill the Jotun!"

Jasper hurled his mug against the wall where it shattered. Jenna felt her own wrath rising.

"You'd rather live as a slave then?"

"Seems to me we get to live as a slave whatever happens, all that's changed is that the Jotun never pretended we were anything else!"

Mithril

Many Mournwolders feel betrayed by the Imperial Synod. After a year of criticizing the people of Whittle for their hatred of the Jotun, culminating in the execution of one of their spiritual leaders, the Empire appears to have demonstrated that they despise the Jotun every bit as much as the Whittle folk. The accusation on many lips is that the Empire is not really here to give the Mourn back to the Mournwolders - they are just here to kill as many Jotun as possible.

At this stage, the Marcher assembly and the rest of the Imperial Synod is going to find it impossible to move the hearts and minds of the people of the Mournwold. Indeed, given the way liao works to amplify situations, creating auras across the Mourn is likely to make the situation worse. Giving an angry population Courage, or making them Ambitious, or Proud... could end very badly. The Hierro clan demonstrated the risks in encouraging people to pursue virtue.

What would help is some concrete gesture that demonstrated that this war was being fought for the benefit of the Marcher people who live in the Mournwold. Something the Empire could do that would show these people that this was about freeing them - not killing Jotun. One way the Empire could do that is to allocate the Singing Caves, the mithril Bourse resource located on the Greensward near Overton, as a national seat rather than an Imperial one. Having one of their own in charge of the mine, rather than have some over-dressed League Prince (everyone seems to agree that the League will own it) would blunt the accusation that this war was only ever about killing the Jotun.

The Senate recently voted to allocate the seat to the Marchers - but the decision was vetoed by the Throne. If the mine is brought back under Imperial control that decision will need to be made again. The Empress has been crystal clear that the Prosperity of the Empire depends on resources like the Singing Caves being Imperial. It remains to be seen if she prefers to go down in history as a prudent ruler in the tradition of Empress Mariika or a benevolent leader like Emperor Frederick.

Land

Land matters above all else to Marchers. They defend what they have to the death - and they expect other Marchers to do the same. The Marcher generals understood that; General Will Talbot of the Drakes understood that. If Imperial strategy in the Mourn had been spearheaded by Marcher generals leading Marcher armies things might have been different. But the folk of the Mournwold watched in disgust over winter as countless Imperial armies gave ground before the Jotun advance. And to prove their point that no true Marcher would have done that... when everyone else was falling back... the Drakes were given orders to hold their ground, to fight for every inch of land. In the view of many here that's not just how Marchers should fight - that's how everyone should fight.

Of course those who study strategy can well understand the value of giving ground. Falling back at the right time can be essential to save an army or to win a campaign in the long run. But the people of the Mournwold don't see it like that - and extolling the virtue of the strategic value of a well-organized retreat just annoys them all the more. If you're not fighting for your land... what in Virtue's name are you fighting for?

Recent actions have led many in the Mourn to question what the Empire is fighting for. So Friar Agnes has proposed a way that the Marchers might show some solidarity with the people of the Mourn and by doing so they can show the Empire what they are fighting for. Having heard that General Talbot was interested in ways to win hearts and minds she has sent a message to his office with a proposal for a mandate that the Marcher National Assembly could pass.

Land matters above all else. Marcher armies should always stand their ground to defend what is theirs. We send X with 25 doses of liao to spread the word that no Marcher army should ever give ground.

Synod Mandate

The Marchers are naturally inclined to such a mindset, so it would not take much to convince them of the wisdom of this approach - and once it was agreed there would be no going back. If this mandate were enacted, it would become impossible for any Marcher general to issue the order to give ground to their army.

Such an action would not solve all the problems in the Mourn. It wouldn't do anything for the Empire's standing here - but it would improve the standing of the Marcher nation in the eyes of the inhabitants of the Mourn. It would demonstrate that the people of Upwold, Mitwold, and Bregasland shared their passion to defend their lands. It would help them view other Marchers as just like them, rather than lumping them in with the rest of the Empire which is what is happening at the moment.

Of course there is a way that the Empire could demonstrate that they shared the concerns of the Mournwold people. The General Assembly could pass a version of the mandate for all Imperial armies. That would require ten times the amount of liao - this change of strategy would be a hard sell in many lands. But giving up the ability for any Imperial army to give ground would prove to the people of the Mournwold that the Empire is here fighting for their land.

Neighbours

Gwen stood in the doorway, her arms folded, her face set. Her voice was calm, but Jim could hear her patience fraying with every exchange.

"It's just a warning, we're here to look after you." said the schlacta on the doorstep.

"Thank you for your warning." Gwen's voice was frosty enough to wither grass.

He hoped she'd keep her temper under control. He was under no illusion how easily the soldiers could kill her, him, and all three children. Burn the house and the field, Salt the ground. Put their bodies on ... he took a deep shaky breath. He hugged little Beth, her face pale and her eyes brimming with tears. She was being braver than he was. He forced a smile, held her close, whispered how well she was doing. Hugged her tighter.

"We know they're around and they're likely to be desperate. If you see them, let us know. We'll make sure you're safe."

"I will certainly bear that in mind," Gwen's voice was level, but Jim could see her shoulders vibrating with tension. He knew her well enough to know that she was fighting the urge to give the Varushkan captain a piece of her mind. Or show her the back of her hand..

"If that's everything, I have work to be getting on with. Don't let me keep you."

The soldier showed no sign of moving. She took off her oddly shaped helmet, held it in the crook of her arm, wiped the sweat from her scarred face with one thick hand. She was older than he had expected, her long braided hair steel grey.

"Look. These vermin are dangerous. Crafty. You and your family could be in danger. Don't let the stories fool you, they'll fight like cornered rats if their backs are to the wall."

Gwen took a deep, sharp breath in through her nose. When she spoke, her voice was quiet, her words precise.

"We have lived with them for the best part of thirty years - we know exactly what they are like thank you." She picked her words carefully. "Now, shall I get you all an oatcake and a mug of milk? For the road?"

At her words, Jim stopped breathing, his heart pounding. He was proud of his wife's courage, but deathly afraid she might have overstepped the mark. Everything teetered on a knife edge.

The Varushkan captain pressed her lips together tightly and spun on her heel, jamming her helmet back into place. Without another word she strode across the yard, collecting the four soldiers lounging at the gate.

Gwen shut the door, and leant her forehead against it for a moment. Then she moved to the window to watch, making sure the soldiers have left. Once it was clear they were not coming back, she pulled back the homespun rug on the kitchen floor, and lifted the wooden trapdoor beneath. She glared down into the root cellar. A half dozen frightened faces stared back up at her.

"They've gone for now, but they won't go far." she said quietly. "You'll not make it a field's length before they catch you. You're going to have to stay here at least another night, maybe two. So settle in, and keep quiet or paragons preserve me I'll stick you on spikes myself!"

None of the huddled orcs said anything. Hjordgar just nodded his head twice to show he understood. Gwen let the trapdoor drop again.

Jim picked Beth up, caught his wife in a tight hug. Beth began to cry silently. Gwen kissed her on the brow. They clung together, not speaking, listening to the column of soldiers outside marching south-west toward the Whatmore place.

The Jotun forced those who served them to toil hard regardless of their race. For three decades, those Marchers who were forced to become thralls have worked alongside the orc thralls that the invaders brought with them. They are not friends, by any stretch, what they are, however, is neighbours. In some places that bond has grown surprisingly strong. Some of these people have more in common, more shared experience of hard work in fields and mines, than they do with the people across the border in Tassato, or Kahraman.

Some of these thralls have fled the Mourn, but most have been trapped, desperately trying to avoid the clashes between the armies. Now that the Empire is on the advance, the Marcher inhabitants are able to return to their farms and look after themselves - but the orc thralls have no lands to go back to and with Imperial armies on the rampage things are becoming increasingly dangerous for them. Their supplies are running low - and winter is coming.

Of all the problems in the Mourn, this is the only one that can be solved by throwing money at it. But it would take a lot of money... it would need 75 thrones a season to provide enough food to feed the orc thralls until a permanent solution can be found. Doing so would not remove the current antagonism in the Mourn, but it would demonstrate that the Empire was absolutely serious about ensuring that the Jotun thralls were not to be harmed by the war. And that would help improve the standing of the Empire with those Marchers who have worked side by side with the thralls for so long.

People don't do the right thing because they care about others. That is the the lie we tell ourselves. The truth is that we do these things to feel better about ourselves. To tell ourselves that we are not monsters. It is only people like us, people who know that they are monsters, who don't have to bother with the games of children. The greatest strength I have is to know myself.

Empress Varkula, Letter to Karsk Senator

Iron

The situation in the Mournwold is dire - nobody can deny that the territory is dry field awaiting a flame. While there are fifty thousand Imperial troops driving the Jotun before them, nobody is going to take up arms. There will be plenty of shouting and bawling and whining about the price, but people will put up and shut up. But once those armies are sent elsewhere, it is anybody's guess what will happen. Thus many folk are focussed on what can be done to resolve the problem. Some way to sooth angry tempers, to calm frayed nerves, some magic spell to make everyone be happy again. Only a few have had the Courage to point out that there is more than one way to skin a cat.

It's nothing to do with "cruelty" - it's to do with laying down the law. Everyone wants to believe that this war is about freeing the Mournwold, but there is another way to look at it. The Jotun control this land - now the Empire is coming with sword and shield to conquer it. They have done it before - how do people think Holberg ended up part of the Empire? They might have chosen to "join" the League, but they weren't interested in joining anything until the Dawnish armies conquered every piece of land they could see from their mountaintop. Once the writing on the wall was plain for them to see - they found loyalty and joined up.

It's not going to be pleasant - a lot of Marchers are pretty pig-headed. You put a spear to their belly and tell them to decide whether they're for the Empire or the Jotun and some of them are going to be dumb enough to choose a quick trip back to the Labyrinth. But the grim truth is that if the Empire comes in and forces these people to decide where their loyalty lies then plenty of them are going to see which way the wind is blowing. And the ones that don't... the ones that end up dead? Those are the ones that were going to be trouble anyway... The bitter truth that nobody will want to accept is that you can either have this trouble now... when you have fifty thousand Imperial boots on the ground... or you can have it in two years time when the territory is empty, the Jotun are massing and the armies are engaged elsewhere.

Sure, laying down the law will leave a bitter taste that may never wash out. These people are going to be hostile and angry for years to come. But they will do what they are told, they will get their freedom whether they want it or not, the Jotun will be driven out - and the Empire will have the Mourn back. They will have to build some fortifications to make sure nobody rebels... but that's it. If the Empire wants these people to love them... then they're going to have wipe their tears for them. But they don't have to do that. The people in the Mourn are already angry, the Empire might as well be hung for a sheep as a lamb as the Marchers say. If the Empire is prepared to settle for obedience then there is a much more effective way to get the job done...

To accomplish this the Imperial Senate could pass legislation authorizing Imperial armies to lay down the law in the Mournwold. An example of a suitable wording to accomplish this might be:

Armies in the Mournwold are sanctioned to take any measures necessary this season to ensure that all resistance in this territory is crushed. All those who choose to violently resist should expect no quarter, neither will they be given redress under the law.

The current opinion of the constitutional court is that a motion drafted in such terms would have constitutional implications and require ratification by the Throne.

If this law is passed by the senate any Imperial general whose army is in the Mournwold this season may choose to issue the order to Lay Down the Law.

Lay Down the Law

- All casualties inflicted by this army are increased by a tenth.
- The ability of this army to conquer territory is decreased by a tenth.
- The army will ruthlessly suppress any dissent in the conquered territory.

As the army pushes the enemy back, they will root out any who are not loyal to the Empire. They will ruthlessly suppress dissent, executing any who will not acknowledge that they have been defeated. The conquered people will be hostile for years - the memory of this experience will not soon fade - but fear of the consequences will prevent any act of open rebellion within the next ten years.

If five or more Imperial armies follow this order, then any simmering rebellion in the Mourn will be ended before it can begin. If less than five armies submit this order, then only the regions that those specific armies capture will be conquered and forced to yield. If any Imperial general issues one of these orders then all other options presented here will fail.

Participation

If you are playing a character who is from the Mourn, or has family there, then as a PC you are absolutely free to choose your own view of the current conflict that is raging there. Your character should know people who died from the curses enacted over Winter, and if you have been there recently then you should be aware of the anger and resentment that is widespread. But there are Mournwolders on all sides of the arguments - so your character's position is perfectly valid whatever it is.

Resolution

During the Summer Solstice, the Marcher assembly successfully raised the mandate that Marcher armies would never give ground again. Mel of Mourn took liao to spread news of this mandate to the armies and people of the Marches. As a consequence, no Marcher army can ever again take the give ground order.

All the World in a Grain of Sand

Rules

Day Magnitude 30

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. At the end of the ritual one of the contributors is chosen to deliver the curse with a pronouncement of doom.

This effect is a curse. A target may be under more than one curse at a time.

Effects

This ritual creates a curse that is delivered to a target with a pronouncement of doom: one contributor is chosen to deliver the curse, and they must do so within fifteen minutes or it falls on their own head.

While under the curse, the target experiences a powerful roleplaying effect; their mind has been exposed to an enormous, revelatory and thoroughly terrifying truth that they cannot bear. They are plagued with madness; they may hallucinate, talk to themselves, become paranoid or obsessed with uncovering and recording trivial, confusing details. They may embrace their madness seeking more and more information, or flee from it and hide in their own minds.

While under the effect the target loses access to the ability to cast mastered rituals; they contribute to all rituals as if they had not mastered them (this includes losing the ability to employ any options that require you to have mastered the ritual).

The effect of the ritual lasts for a year (until the start of the Profound Decisions Empire event four events from now).

Removing the Curse

The curse can be removed by certain powerful creatures or items. It can also be alleviated by powerful rituals that remove curses of madness or personal disintegration such as Transmogrification of the Soul's Echo.

Description

This dreadful curse is sometimes embraced by its victims as if it were a blessing, but there is no real benefit to receiving it. The target loses the ability to perform rituals effectively, and often becomes obsessed with trivia. The vision they suffer is virtually impossible to articulate, and attempts to do so often leave them frustrated and confused.

Common Elements

As with many curses this ritual often involves a recitation of the grievances against the target; sometimes obscure formulae or invocations to reveal to the target the vast expanse of the cosmos are invoked. Lights or fires are often created, with more and more light focused on a single point to suggest the overwhelming power of the vision. Ashes, sand and dust are another common component. The rune of revelation is often evoked, suggesting that some revelations are damaging to the mind, and the runes Irremais or Aesh may be defaced or destroyed to represent the loss of wisdom and clarity.

"So let me get this straight," Eowyn pinched her brow and focused. The cold and her striding's flight were taking its toll on them all, and she was still nursing an injury from the skirmish which had left her without three of her strongest Thorns. She must have been desperate to even contemplate what her Vate was telling her. "Let me wrap my head around this. We can't hope to beat them in a fair fight. That's fine; once we meet up with the Third Way, we should have the advantage of numbers and that clever swine Leofric, who'll run rings around them. But you don't want us to run rings around them-"

"On the contrary, Eowyn. We'll need exactly that. We want to pull them as close together as possible."

"Won't they disperse if we surround them?"

"Not the Thule. The Thule will fall back to defend their Dragon if they feel he's truly threatened." Vate Olwyn demonstrated with a few of her rune-stones on the ground.

"Alright, so you want us to run rings around them. And then we engage them, and then what?"

"Pin them down," the vate said, taking a long sip from her drinking-horn, "and once we've convinced the Third Way's vates to swear to our coven-stone, we'll have the numbers we need to curse the Dragon."

"Curse him. Can't we just kill him?"

Off to one side, the Guide Daffyd's eyes widened for a moment, and he shook his head fervently. "Even they don't all die defending him, they'll fight to the death afterwards. Better to hurt him and retreat, my Brand."

Eowyn frowned as she took this in. "They say not even an archer can shoot a Thule Dragon, for the others will throw themselves before him to guard him. How do you hope to strike him?"

"I think that's a bit of an exaggeration, my Brand, but that's not what I'm aiming for. Just get me close enough that he can hear me - I'll stand right behind the line - and let me deliver a little poetry. You'll hear him scream, and his warriors won't have the first idea what to do about it. Without their Dragon's orders, they'll be lost. We can melt away, and I'll bet you all the mithril in the Bourse they'll retreat. If they don't, they'll wander round for a while, while the master they worship goes steadily more and more insane - and soon, all their rituals will fail, and you can attack them without their advantage of magic."

"If they hear their master screaming in pain, won't they just attack anyway?"

Olwyn's grin was feral. "Oh, but it won't be in pain. It'll be in delight. He'll know all the secrets of the universe. Just what a Dragon secretly hopes for, when he's not serving his people. He'll fight against any attempt to repair his shattered mind, and they'll be too frightened to disobey. And in the meantime, it won't hurt that he'll be trying to count the leaves on the trees, and capture the sunbeams in his drinking-horn, and anything else that might help him get back that omniscient feeling."

"If you can't turn that into a victory, my Brand, I'll be voting for another leader come the Solstice," Daffyd spoke with a broad grin, and Eowyn threw one of the runestones at him in irritation. The two of them had ganged up on her, but the plan sounded sensible. Cut the head off, and the monster would die flailing. Poison it, and it would die slowly. Just the trick."

"Alright, Olwyn, we'll do it your way. But if this doesn't go off, you owe me a pint in the next life..."

All work together

"I'm not sure I agree with you." said Kesiah. "The Way unites the Empire, that's what it does, that's what it's for."

"Half the Empire are heretics and blasphemers." Rosemary was emphatic. "Reincarnating as trees and rats? Treating unvirtuous acts as a commodity you can pass to a priest? Magic bird spirits coming to carry your soul to the labyrinth? Venerating so-called heroes? Virtuous ancestors? Hungry spiritual geography waiting to swallow you up? Dolphins? The broken wheel?"

"I suppose that's fair but is it really heresy or blasphemy to cling to old folk belief...."

"Yes." Rosemary put her cup down firmly on the table. "Yes it is. I can go through them all if you like. Let's start with 'only human spirits reincarnate' and whether a human spirit is still a human spirit when it's an apple tree..."

Overview

Nina of Cantiararch's Hold and a group of Academy children (and chaperones) will take 25 liao to preach Virtue throughout the Empire, and inspire The Empire to better follow The Way.

Statement of Principle, Summer 381YE, Nina of Cantiararch's Hold, General Assembly, Upheld 1206-28

During the Summer Solstice 381YE, Nina of Cantiararch's Hold raised this judgement to the General Assembly of the Imperial Synod, and it passed with a greater majority. Due to the peculiar wording which implies a mandate, it took some time before the civil service were able to determine what to do about it. (A mandate cannot be created ad hoc in this way, the Synod may only pass mandates in response to opportunities to do so identified by the civil service as it is a requirement that everyone knows that the mandate will actually do). Since it cannot be a mandate, the civil service treated the judgement as a statement of principle and, due to its greater majority, ensured it was communicated to every priest of the Way in the Empire.

This judgement came at an interesting time; the Yaelian Schism was coming to its dramatic conclusion. The Highborn were rejecting the philosophy of foundationalism, and the implications of the change of doctrine relating to the Imperial Orcs were beginning to sink in. After a period of turmoil and conflict, an opportunity to bring everyone together in their understanding of the Way looks like a welcome respite.

Significance

Except... not everyone follows the Way in the same manner. Each nation has their own opinions about spirituality and some of them are not supported by doctrine. A solid core of orthodoxy exists in the Way - the priests of Highguard, the League, and Varushka may differ on some points but their beliefs about the virtues and the soul are very much in line with one another.

The Navarr and the Urizen accept virtue, but have their own understanding about how to approach it - but the Great Dance and the Net of the Heavens are philosophies that are not particularly at odds with the Way. The Imperial orcs have likewise found a place in the Way thanks to the recent changes of doctrine.

Alternative Reincarnation

There is very little evidence to support Freeborn or Marcher beliefs about reincarnation as animals. There is no evidence to prove it isn't true either, but there are two relevant facts. The first is that any attempt to insight such an animal always gives the same response - not human, not orc, not a creature of the realm, not ghost. The other fact is that in nearly five hundred years of past life visions - nobody has ever had a vision of being a dolphin. Or a tree for that matter.

The acerbic priest Abbot Robin of Upwold argued passionately that this only proves that people don't experience past life visions of their time as a tree, not that they don't reincarnate as one. Robin was a controversial member of the Synod in the early years of the Empire and his claim that the "Labyrinth of Ages" was a metaphor for the time that a soul spent as a tree (and hence barely sapient) was flatly rejected.

The only known evidence that supports the idea of reincarnation as dolphins is that these fish seem particularly intelligent, and garbled claims that pods of dolphins have occasionally defended sailors from attack by sharks when their ship has sunk or they have fallen overboard.

There have been concerns about Dawn in the past, but the recent statement of principle by Vivianne de Couerdefer that the path to glory lies through true Virtue has gone some way to mollifying these concerns - at least for the moment.

There are three nations however whose commitment to orthodoxy is less clear. The folk of Wintermark place great value on heroism, and practice peculiar funeral rites in which heroes are interred in a swamp to sleep alongside their ancestors. The people of the Brass Coast believe odd things about dolphins and participate in a heretical festival every year in which they turn virtue on its head. And the Marchers... the Marchers believe any number of odd things from the belief that souls can be reborn as apple trees or rats, in passing unvirtuous acts on to others, and in burning people alive to "atone" for bad behaviour.

Of course nobody likes being told that they are doing it wrong - but if orthodoxy is to mean anything then at some point someone must pay the price to separate the wheat from the chaff. Changing views on these matters would take a lifetime or more - but you can't plough a farm in a day as the Marchers say - you have to start somewhere.

The Way unites the people of the Empire, and it is time for us all to come together and reaffirm our commitment to the virtues and the Doctrines of the Faith. We send x with 100 doses of liao to remind Imperial citizens of the need to embrace orthodoxy and refute superstition and heresy.

Synod Mandate, General Assembly

if this mandate were passed, the most orthodox nations - Varushka, the League, and Highguard - would see a significant increase in the size of their congregations granting them 1 liao and 2 votes in the Synod. At the same time, the least orthodox nations - the Marches, the Brass Coast, and Wintermark - would see a reduction in the size of their congregation, removing 1 liao and 2 votes for the same period. The Navarr, Urizen, Dawnish, and Imperial Orcs would see no change. These effects would last for a year - during which time the civil service would attempt to identify additional mandates that could be used to persuade people to follow the Way.

In addition, the named priest's words would be heard across the Empire. OOC: the named priest would be invited to provide a short statement about the Way, of no more than 1000 words. This text must be submitted by email to plot@profounddecisions.co.uk before the end of the downtime submission period following the event and will form part of the Winds of Fortune update for Spring 382YE.

Almery of Purity

Description

An almery is a decorated box, generally used for holding either ceremonial tools or consumables such as oil or liao - indeed many sects who are bonded to one of these potent items keep their communal liao stores inside it. As with other reliquaries, while an almery of purity usually takes the form of a container, it might be infused into any object that has spiritual significance to the sect to which it belongs.

As with all reliquaries, the almery of purity is bonded to an entire sect of the faithful. It is most popular with those sects that deal with spiritual evil on a regular basis. It offers great potency to ceremonies designed to remove malign auras from members of the sect. Indeed, some devout individuals who have come under the scrutiny of dark forces may intentionally seek the aid of such a sect in banishing the oppressive entity or presence.

Sects that use the almery of purity are often deeply concerned with maintaining codes of virtuous behaviour, and take a hard line against members who betray the sect or fail to live up to their standards of spirituality. The almery also offers extra potency to effects that cast those who are found wanting out of the sect - and indeed the faith.

Rules

- Form: Reliquary. Takes the form of a ceremonial reliquary.
- Effect: Once per day when a member of the sect performs or participates in a ceremony of exorcism or excommunication on another member of the sect, each dose of liao contributed counts double for the potency of effect.
- Materials: Crafting an almery of purity requires ten measures of beggar's lye, nine measures of dragonbone, five ingots of weltsilver and three ingots of orichalcum. It takes one month to make one of these items.

Almery of Silence

Description

An almery is a decorated box, generally used for holding either ceremonial tools or consumables such as oil or liao. As with other reliquaries, while an almery of purity usually takes the form of a container, it might be infused into any object that has spiritual significance to the sect to which it belongs. Unlike many reliquaries, an Almery of Silence is rarely placed on public display. It is more likely to be concealed or kept in a secure location than it is to be placed on the altar of a consecrated shrine.

While this reliquary is bonded to a sect, it conceals the auras of all members from the insight ceremony. Even true liao cannot garner any information about the aura of a person who is part of a sect with an Almery of Silence. Unlike more spiritually dangerous items such as a Shackle of the Unvirtuous, or poisons like the Shadowcrow Infusion it does so without impeding the sect members' ability to perform liao ceremonies. They have been popular in the Empire among sects dedicated to Vigilance against the enemies of the Empire, and with sects that engage in missionary work to foreign nations where they might encounter someone capable of wielding the insight ceremony or something similar.

The Almery of Silence has never been a popular item. It is expensive compared to a Wayfarer's Pyx or Litany of the Labyrinth and the benefits it provides of questionable value to anyone other than a sect of heretics. Yet there are always a few sects who value protection from the prying eyes of other priests.

The history of the Almery of Silence is a turbulent one. Several times during the history of the Empire it has been declared a criminal offence to create, own, or use this reliquary. Both Emperor Nicovar and Emperor Ahraz supported bans on the use of this item, albeit for different reasons. Surprisingly, however, the item began to see its first widespread use in the reign of Empress Teleri, primarily in the hands of sects with an emphasis on missionary work among the Faraden and the Jarmish - something that is sometimes pointed out when the thorny discussion of its use comes up in the Imperial Synod. Currently it is not illegal to own or use an Almery of Silence in the Empire.

This item is certainly known among the priests of Faraden, and according to travelers and missionaries, an item with very similar effects is known in Axos - indeed there is some circumstantial evidence to suggest the item may have originated in that eastern nation. It is, perhaps unsurprisingly, completely illegal in the Sumaah Republic.

Rules

- Form: Reliquary. Takes the form of a ceremonial reliquary.
- Effect: The aura of every member of the sect is concealed from the insight ceremony. A character responding to a quick insight must respond "my aura is concealed" and provide no other information.
- Roleplaying Effect: You feel an urge to follow the teachings of your sect regardless of consequence.
- Materials: Crafting an Almery of Silence requires five ingots of orichalcum, seven ingots of tempest jade, seven measures of beggar's lye, and eleven measures of dragonbone. It takes one month to make one of these items.

Alter manifesto of Sevenfold Path

Change the wording of the manifesto of the Sevenfold Path from "Human Destiny" to "The Destiny of Imperial Citizens"

Proposed by Sermersuaq, seconded by Skarsind

Overview

- The manifesto of the Sevenfold Path contained a point that "Magic should work in harmony with, and to promote, the fulfilment of human destiny."
- The motion follows on from a Declaration of Concord in the Imperial Conclave

Date

- Summer 378YE

Campaign Outcome

- The official manifesto of the Sevenfold Path has been altered to "Magic should work in harmony with, and to promote, the fulfilment of the destiny of Imperial citizens."

Altruist's Recompense

Description

These useful wands allow a magician on the battlefield to restore her allies while at the same time using a little of the magical energies expended to heal herself. While the residues of magic harnessed in this fashion are hardly on a par with the full power of true magical healing, they allow a magician to stay ahead of the damage caused by casual blows while reserving the majority of her energy for aiding her allies - or smiting her foes.

These wands are particularly popular with Cambion healers who find it irritating to offer others something as vital as healing without a guarantee that they will receive something in return. Although the recompense isn't much, it does make the transaction more palatable to the most highly lineage Cambion. Indeed it was a Cambion Hakima who devised the wand, sensing a demand for such an item among her relatives and colleagues. Some wands are made to reassemble an uncurled horn to draw upon the association with the children of Autumn.

Although born of selfishness, these wands are also forced upon the most dedicated healers by concerned friends. Some medical magicians have been known to neglect themselves by refusing to spare mana to heal themselves while others lie bleeding. Numerous healers have been given these wands under the pretense that they are Woundbinder wands to force the recipient to heal themselves. Some such healers claim that the rush of health is accompanied by a sense of well-meaning reproach, as if the wand itself is reprimanding them for not taking better care of themselves.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of a wand.
- Requirement: You must have the magician skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: Whenever you cast, or swift cast, the heal spell you regain one hit.
- Materials: Crafting an altruist's recompense requires five ingots of weltsilver and four measures of iridescent gloaming. It takes one month to make one of these items.

Marte was old and many-scarred. She'd seen many a fight, and had carried more than one of her sword-brothers to sleep in Kallavesa. Now her Thane had asked her to lead the grimnir-line. He'd said it was because he needed her raven's-mind to keep the grimnir whole, and that was a kindness, but she suspected the real reason. She was old now, and she couldn't hold a slaughter-wall as she had in her youth, couldn't keep the barbarians back by strength of arm alone.

She'd gathered her charges, made a speech about the glory of duty, and now she was passing through the camp, as her thane would be too, though in lines of warriors, not healers.

She came to a small fire, where a youngster she didn't recognise was checking small jars of oils and pastes, dried pink roots, dull green leaves and wraps of pounded irremaisabne.

"Ready? Your first battle? Worried?"

"Oh, I'll be fine." said the young Grimnir with a smile, "If there's no time to use the herbs, I've got my magics, and my husband's a runesmith, gave me this." He pulled a wand, lined with silvery metal and coloured like a kingfisher's wings from a leather belt-sheath, and smiled down at it.

"Bravash and Lann?" She marked the runes. Love and bargains.

"Oh, yes. We've only just started together, see, and he wants me to remember to take care. No skein-choices in this battle, he said. That's the promise."

"He knows you're not going to be near the front rank?" She asked gently. She sometimes felt she had to remind the younger grimnir of this; they knew the calling, but it was hard for them.

"Well, he knows that's the tradition." His eyes hardened. "But he knows me better than that. Not one of our people is going to die while I can still cast a spell."

She felt old, then, in the face of his youth and his certainty. She steeled herself and spoke with a voice of command.

"No hollow-headed jackdaws in my lines, we're ravens here. You'll do what you're told while you're with me, young man."

He looked down, chastened, his fingers absently caressing his wand. It was a sound gift, one that might help to keep him alive and counter some of the mistakes he was sure to make. He was vulnerable, but he reminded her suddenly of so many others. She was still tired, but she could get some sleep later. She smiled then; she thought she might have misjudged her Thane.

"But you know? I have but a few battles in me before I face a walk into Sydanjaa. Maybe between us we can make me an end worthy of a song... Stay with me, and we'll find your young man some recompense for that gift of yours..."

Always a Hero Comes Home

Adaptation of "A Hero Comes Home" by Alan Silvestri

Lyrics and Melody adapted by Joshua Binks (link to come).

Prelude Out of the mist of history, He'll come again. Sailing on ships across the sea To our wounded Nation.

Signs of a saviour, Like fire on the water. Its what we prayed for, One of our own.

Call Just wait, though wide he may roam.

Response Always a hero comes home.

Calls He'll go where no-one can go. He'll fight what no-one could fight.

Continue in this style, making up things for the hero to do until the end;

Call He stands, brave and alone.

Response But always a hero comes home.

Ambassador

Overview

The Imperial Senate has the power to commission an embassy to handle negotiations with a foreign nation or power. The Empire can open embassies with distant foreigners such as Asavea, Jarn and the Commonwealth. These foreign powers are empires in their own right and have a similar level of might and influence to the Empire, but are far away over the seas and have many concerns of their own. The Empire can also open embassies to nearby foreigners such as the Axos, the Faraden and the Iron Confederacy. These nations possess power equivalent to one or more Imperial nations, but they are much closer to the Empire and their concerns are much more likely to be aligned with Imperial concerns.

Each embassy is overseen by an ambassador - a new title is automatically created when a new embassy is created. The power to oversee relations with other nations is vested in the Imperial Senate but in practice it is logistically impossible for the Senate as a body to carry out detailed negotiations with a foreign power. As a result, appointing an ambassador automatically grants a citizen the authority to negotiate on their behalf.

The civil service appoint one or more of their number to the position of Secretary to the Diplomatic Corps (currently the magistrate John Cooper of Upwold). This position is intended to provide support for the Empire's ambassadors in pursuit of their responsibilities, in particular providing them with briefings and helping them to manage any foreign delegations that come to Anvil.

It is possible to appoint an ambassador to another nation without constructing an embassy - however most foreign nations will only take an ambassador seriously if an appropriate embassy is constructed to house them and the civil servants required to support them. When a title with authority is created, it is essential to clearly delineate which nation or power the title is being given authority to negotiate with. It is not possible to grant authority to negotiate with a non-Imperial group unless they are clearly a nation, major power or the equivalent. For example it is possible to grant an ambassador authority to negotiate with the Sarcophan Delves - but not authority to negotiate with a prominent Sarcophan family or trading house.

It is not possible for the Senate to limit the scope or dominion of an ambassador. For example, it is not possible to limit the authority to conduct treaty negotiations to specific subjects such as religion, trade, or magic.

Responsibilities

An ambassador is responsible for representing the Empire to a foreign nation, and often vice versa. They receive a briefing from the Civil Service about events in the foreign nation they represent, and are expected to conduct or oversee any treaty negotiations with that foreign nation. The civil service will direct representatives and citizens of the foreign power to the ambassador wherever appropriate. It is illegal for any Imperial citizen to falsely claim authority to negotiate a treaty on behalf of the Empire.

Although it is only possible for a single citizen to have authority to negotiate treaties with a foreign nation, any citizen can negotiate and agree individual deals with members of other nations and it is possible for the Senate to create other titles that have responsibility to ensure good relations or similar with certain members of that nation. In most cases the ambassador's responsibilities will be assumed to include such liaison and cooperation with those individuals as is required to ensure effective relations with the nation in question.

In addition to the Empire's goals, foreign nations have agendas of their own, and may seek to draw the Empire into their intrigues. The Asavean Plenum might seek to enlist the Empire in its conflict with the Sumaah Republic, for example. One member of the Plenum might seek to engage Imperial support in a conspiracy against another Plenum family. A high ranking noble might want to employ foreign mercenaries to help put down a slave revolt, or to locate a prized artifact. Handling these matters are considered the primary responsibility of the ambassador.

Treaty

Authority grants the holder the power to negotiate a treaty with another nation for consideration by the Senate. A senator must use a Senate motion to submit the treaty for ratification by the Senate - but ratification only requires a single senate motion, regardless of how many legal changes are required to ratify the treaty. For example, the Senate recently ratified a treaty with the Thule which ceded control of the Winter Mark region of the Silver Peaks and declared peace with them for three years.

Ratification of a treaty is considered to be a single motion before the Senate because the Senate can either choose to accept the treaty or reject it. It is not possible to amend a treaty once it is presented as a motion; it either passes in its entirety in the form it was submitted or it does not pass. The only legal way for the Senate to ratify variations of a treaty is to submit different treaties as separate motions.

Any citizen can negotiate and agree a deal with individuals from another nation, but only the Imperial title with authority may submit a treaty for ratification by the Senate and only when the civil service have confirmed that it is a genuinely negotiated treaty with members of that nation.

Any attempt to submit a treaty for ratification that is not negotiated with authorized representatives of that nation by the Imperial citizen with the appropriate authority would be breaking Imperial law by subverting the agencies of state. Any deals which require Senate authorization that are made with foreigners who are representing their own interests rather than their nation must be submitted as distinct Senate motions as usual.

As a senate motion, a treaty should be carefully worded. It should be concise and to the point, clearly laying out the actions to be taken as part of the treaty. Treaties are subject to scrutiny like any other senate motion. Perhaps more so than other motions, it is sensible to have a treaty scrutinized before it is presented to the Senate.

Delegation

If a foreign delegation is seeking to meet with the ambassador to discuss matters of state, then the Secretary will inform the ambassador of their presence and let them know when the delegation is expected to arrive. The ambassador can choose where to receive the delegation, they may opt to receive them in the Senate if it is free or choose a more informal location if they prefer. The secretary will pass on the information to the delegation and may escort them to the agreed location if necessary.

Unless instructed otherwise, the Secretary will remain present during any official meeting between an ambassador and a foreign delegation. They can provide help with formulating treaties to ensure that they are legal and binding. Where possible they will consult with the Constitutional Court over the wording of a treaty to minimize the impact of scrutiny and their confirmation is required to submit a treaty to the Senate to guarantee that it is genuinely negotiated treaty with representatives of the appropriate nation.

Priests with the power of witness may attend a formal meeting to observe proceedings but only those given permission by the ambassador may speak. Anyone who attempts to disrupt such a meeting, even speaking without permission, runs the risk of being prosecuted for subverting the agencies of state.

Briefing

If the Senate constructs an embassy, then this will be used to house civil servants who can compile information and reports on the current status of relations with the foreign nation. In this case, the ambassador will receive a briefing from the civil service each summit which provides a summary of current nature of diplomatic relations. This usually involves a meeting with the current Secretary who will provide the ambassador with the written documentation and attempt to answer any questions that the ambassador has.

Only the ambassador is privy to this information, and they have complete freedom as to how they use it and who they share it with. This briefing often includes opportunities for the ambassador to consider. The Pallas Docks, for example, were built as a result of an opportunity offered to the Ambassador to Jarm. It may also contain requests or demands, or foreshadow potential future problems between the Empire and the nation.

If an ambassador wants to take advantage of an opportunity or enter into a dialogue with the representative of the foreign nation, they make use of the ritual Call Winged Messenger. At this time it is the responsibility of the ambassador to arrange (and pay for) the performance of this ritual.

Mercantile Support

If the Empire opts to build an embassy then merchants of both sides who engage in trade between the Empire and the nation in question will visit it to curry favour with the ambassador for various reasons. Commonly they will take a portion of the items they buy and sell and make them available to the ambassador at favourable prices.

This benefit is reflected by the inclusion of a ministry as part of an embassy. This allows the ambassador to directly purchase raw materials from traders and merchants of the associated nation. For example, the Asavean embassy allows the ambassador to purchase Cerulean Mazzarine, Orichalcum, Iridescent Gloaming, and Tempest Jade directly for Imperial currency. The materials provided may fluctuate, but will be tied to those which the foreign nation has regular surpluses of.

Imperial Consul

The default situation under the Imperial Constitution is that authority for all foreign relations is vested in the Senate. If the Empire chooses to appoint an ambassador (or any other title with authority) then they have authority to handle all treaty negotiations with any representative of the foreign power, without recourse or appeal to any higher power.

In Summer 379YE, the Senate passed a motion to create a Consul, with the power to exercise authority where no other Imperial title existed with that power. The title included responsibilities to coordinate with existing ambassadors. The Constitutional Court issued explicit guidance to make absolutely clear that an ambassador would have primacy in all matters of authority for the nation they dealt with. The Consul has no legal right to direct the ambassadors in their work.

Selection

The well worn path for choosing an ambassador is via appointment through the Imperial Senate.

In the past, there have been times when individual ambassadors have been appointed by unanimous decision of the Senators of a chosen nation, by the General Assembly of the Imperial Synod, and through open auction on the Imperial Bourse. During the reign of Emperor Nicovar, a motion was proposed to modify the powers of The Throne to allow them to appoint the ambassadors. The motion was approved by the Constitutional Court at that time, but did not pass the Senate.

Removal

The method of removal depends on how the title has been selected. If the well-worn path is followed, an ambassador can be revoked by the General Assembly or the Assembly of Nine.

An ambassador serves until a new ambassador is appointed. By default, an ambassador serves for one year before the title must be reappointed. It is traditional for an outgoing ambassador to bring their replacement up to speed on any outstanding business. The foreign secretary will deliver a briefing to the new ambassador when they are appointed.

Current Ambassadors

This table includes all ambassadors which have been appointed in recent times. For a full list of title holders see here. This was last updated following Autumn Equinox 381YE.

Ambassador to Asavea

Overview

The Ambassador to Asavea is an Imperial title. It is an Imperial position appointed by the Imperial Senate. The embassy that created the title was commissioned by the Senate in Winter 377YE following a serious diplomatic incident related to levels of Imperial piracy in Asavean territorial waters., but work was not completed until shortly before the Summer Solstice 378YE. Today the Asavean embassy is a fixture of the Sarvos social whirl, and has lead to an influx of Asavean traders which in turn has lead to luxurious goods from the far west becoming more freely available on the streets of the city.

Responsibilities

The ambassador is expected to represent the Empire in relations with the Asavean Archipelago. They have all the responsibilities common to an Imperial ambassador.

Powers

Imperial Ambassador to the Asavean Archipelago

The title has all the common powers of an ambassador: they receive a briefing, can receive a formal delegation, and may prepare a treaty.

Asavean Merchants

The embassy in Sarvos means that the ambassador enjoys the benefits of mercantile support from traders keen to curry their favour. As a ministry, this allows them to purchase quantities of special materials at a set price. The ambassador spends their money and makes their choices during downtime from their character page. Money is removed from, and resources are placed into, the character's inventory when the downtime is processed.

Total Money Spent	Production
8 Crowns	6 Cerulean Mazzarine, 5 Orichalcum, 4 Iridescent Gloaming, 3 Tempest Jade
30 Crowns	18 Cerulean Mazzarine, 15 Orichalcum, 12 Iridescent Gloaming, 9 Tempest Jade
60 Crowns	30 Cerulean Mazzarine, 25 Orichalcum, 20 Iridescent Gloaming, 15 Tempest Jade

Appointment

The Ambassador to Asavea is an Imperial position appointed by the Senate. Any Imperial citizen can hold this title, and the ambassador serves for a year. They can be revoked by the General Assembly and by the Assembly of the Nine.

The Title in Play

The role does not provide additional information about events in the Empire, nor allow the player holding it to request special reports or downtime actions. These details are assumed to be below the abstraction layer. The title holder is encouraged to create their own stories about their activities within reasonable limits and to get involved in events appropriate to their title during the game, but they do not have any powers beyond those explicitly listed in the section on powers.

These details exist partly to provide context and character to the role - and partly to allow our writers to use the title as a plot hook. Plot that involves the position will be rare - but all the campaign positions in Empire have these details to create the potential for it to happen.

Ambassador to Axos

Overview

The Ambassador to Axos is an Imperial title. It is an Imperial position appointed by the Imperial Senate.

After several years of wrangling, an embassy to the citadels of Axos was commissioned by the Imperial Senate during the Summer Solstice 380YE, and work began almost immediately in Urizen. Built in the port-town of Cargo, in Redoubt, construction was completed in a timely fashion and the Axou ambassador and their staff took residence shortly before the Autumn Equinox. With the opening of the embassy, the Axou in turn opened the port of Towers of Kantor to Imperial shipping. Closer ties between the two nations also saw a significant increase in the number of black-sailed vessels calling at Imperial ports not only on the Bay of Catazar, but also in Dawnish and Varushkan ports on the Semmerlak.

Responsibilities

The ambassador is expected to represent the Empire in relations with the people of Axos. They have all the responsibilities common to an Imperial ambassador.

Ambassador to Faraden

Overview

The Ambassador to Faraden is an Imperial title. It is an Imperial position appointed by the Imperial Senate. The agreement to construct an official embassy was contingent on the liberation of Segura, and the repair of the Towers of Anduz. Without these two achievements, the Empire had no ability to protect trade routes (and avenues for diplomatic envoys) through the northern Lasambrian Hills. Construction of a Faraden embassy in Anduz was commissioned by the Senate in Winter 378YE and completed shortly after the Summer Solstice 379YE.

Responsibilities

The ambassador is expected to represent the Empire in relations with the people of Faraden. They have all the responsibilities common to an Imperial ambassador.

Powers

Imperial Ambassador to the Asavean Archipelago

The title has all the common powers of an ambassador: they receive a briefing, can receive a formal delegation, and may prepare a treaty.

Overview

The Ambassador to Jarm is an Imperial title. It is an Imperial position appointed by the Imperial Senate. The title was created as a consequence of the embassy commissioned by the Imperial Senate in Winter 377YE. While work was completed after the Summer Solstice 378YE, wrangling continued for several months. The Jarmish House of Princes demanded that the Empire select one of the three primary ports - northern Kavor, southern Vezak, or upstart eastern Rigia as the location for an Imperial embassy - an obvious move to entangle the Empire in the internicine internal wranglings of the Jarmish government. The decision was made to choose Rigia, and formal relations between the two world powers opened shortly afterwards.

Responsibilities

The ambassador is expected to represent the Empire in relations with the Principalities of Jarm. They have all the responsibilities common to an Imperial ambassador.

Powers

Imperial Ambassador to the Principalities of Jarm

The title has all the common powers of an ambassador: they receive a briefing, can receive a formal delegation, and may prepare a treaty.

Jarmish Merchants

The embassy in Cargo means that the ambassador enjoys the benefits of mercantile support from traders keen to curry their favour. As a ministry, this allows them to purchase quantities of special materials at a set price. The ambassador spends their money and makes their choices during downtime from their character page. Money is removed from, and resources are placed into, the character's inventory when the downtime is processed. The production of the ministry is related to the location of the Jarmish embassy to the Empire, located in the port of Rigia in eastern Jarm.

30 Crowns	18 Imperial Roseweald, 9 Crystal Mana, 15 Dragonbone, 9 Green Iron
60 Crowns	30 Imperial Roseweald, 15 Crystal Mana, 25 Dragonbone, 15 Green Iron

Appointment

The Ambassador to Jarm is an Imperial position appointed by the Senate. Any Imperial citizen can hold this title, and the ambassador serves for a year. They can be revoked by the General Assembly and by the Assembly of the Nine.

The Title in Play

The role does not provide additional information about events in the Empire, nor allow the player holding it to request special reports or downtime actions. These details are assumed to be below the abstraction layer. The title holder is encouraged to create their own stories about their activities within reasonable limits and to get involved in events appropriate to their title during the game, but they do not have any powers beyond those explicitly listed in the section on powers.

These details exist partly to provide context and character to the role - and partly to allow our writers to use the title as a plot hook. Plot that involves the position will be rare - but all the campaign positions in Empire have these details to create the potential for it to happen.

Ambassador to Otkodov

Overview

The Ambassador to the Thule orcs of Otkodov is an Imperial title. It is an Imperial position appointed by the Senate.

Work on an embassy for the Thule orcs was commissioned in Summer 381YE by order of the Imperial Senate, and completed just before the Autumn Equinox that year. This followed on from some disagreements with the northern orcs about how an ambassador might be appointed - they made clear that a uniquely Varushkan ambassador would be particularly appealing to them, to the point where a physical embassy would be unnecessary. The Imperial Senate declined their offer.

The embassy itself stands in Miekarova, just across the lake from Wendell's Hope in Mieriada. Isolated, snowed under for nearly half the year, the embassy is already seen as a poor posting for civil servants. By the time the embassy was completed the Varushkan Juha the Cave Spider of the Circle of Zulgan Tash was already serving as ambassador for several seasons.

Ambassador to the Commonwealth

Overview

Despite being commissioned in Summer 379YE, the Commonwealth embassy was not completed until shortly before the Spring Equinox 380YE. This followed several months of growing tension between the powerful south-eastern nation and the Empire, including a number of tariffs imposed by the Commonwealth government on Imperial imports and exports. The embassy stands in Siroc, on the southern coast of Madruga. For their part, the Commonwealth has sent word that a reciprocal arrangement has been made in the port of Leerdam, where a palatial estate has been made available for the use of Imperial civil servants.

Ambassador to the Iron Confederacy

Overview

The Ambassador to the Iron Confederacy is an Imperial title. It is an Imperial position appointed by the Imperial Senate. The Senate commissioned the construction in Sarvos of an embassy with the Iron Confederacy during the Spring Equinox 379YE. The embassy was completed shortly before the Summer Solstice 379YE, and Lukash Biessek von Temeschwar was appointed as the first ambassador. Rumour suggests that the Iron Confederacy expressed a preference for Lukash specifically.

Ambassador to the Sarcophan Delves

Overview

The embassy to the merchants of the Sarcophan Delves was commissioned by the Imperial Senate during the Summer Solstice 380YE, and work began almost immediately in Urizen. Built in the port-town of Cargo, in Redoubt, construction was completed in a timely fashion and a small group of ambassadors took residence shortly before the Autumn Equinox. Unlike other nations, there does not appear to be a single ambassador - instead representatives of five of the bedelaar husibas seem to share the residence and the responsibilities of diplomacy with the Empire. Each of these ambassadors has brought their own staff, meaning the embassy is almost certainly quite crowded - which has led to the embassy spilling over into, and dominating, the nearby neighbourhood.

Ambassadorial Gatekeeper

Rules

Autumn Magnitude 10

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets a character, who must be present throughout.

Effects

This ritual allows a single target to accompany one of the contributors through a portal. The target can enter the portal, and can leave through it without the assistance of one of the contributors provided they do so before the next sunrise.

The ritual must be performed at a portal; at the completion at least one of the contributors must accompany the target character through that portal. There is no additional mana cost to operate the portal.

Additional Targets

This ritual can affect additional characters who are members of the same band. Each additional target increases the magnitude by 8. Each character must be present throughout the ritual.

Description

This simple, if expensive, ritual is primarily used to convey characters who are not magicians to the Hall of Worlds, usually either to address the Imperial Conclave or to attend an audience with an Eternal. In the past it was also used to allow mundane visitors to pass through the hidden portals that are sometimes found in regio, especially by those Dawnish enchanters and Marcher landskeepers who did not consider it appropriate to call on the denizens of those chambers without at least a token entourage.

While one of the ritualists must accompany the target through the portal the first time, they can return under their own power simply by walking through an appropriate portal - provided that portal has not been sealed in some way. While a magician can usually force open a portal that an Eternal does not wish them to use by casting operate portal, a fully mundane person has no such capacity.

Although the ritual is usually performed in a regio, there is no requirement that the ritualists draw on that regio - in theory Ambassadorial Gatekeeper would work as easily on a portal found outside of a magical aura.

Some League mountebanks ironically reference the Pauper's Key and call this ritual The Beggar's Cavalcade - and the name is also used by a few members of the Celestial Arch order (specifically those who consider a magician who acts as a conduit for non-magicians to be acting in a slightly shameful manner). By contrast members of the Golden Pyramid have been known to favour using this ritual to allow artisans to enter the Hall of Worlds and attend meetings of the Conclave - in one capacity or another. Among the Suaq icewalkers and the Navarr this ritual is called The Guide for Empty Places, and a ritualist who leads a group through a portal traditionally assumes total responsibility for their safety - and their safe return. This can be a heavy burden, and there are stories of guides who have crippled or on some occasions even killed errant members of their own party whose foolish or rude behaviour has endangered the others.

One potential advantage to this ritual over the traditional incantation is that, while the ritual must be performed without armour, there is no requirement for the target to be unarmoured. It has sometimes been used to allow heavily armoured allies to accompany a magician on an excursion to a potentially dangerous regio chamber.

Common Elements

 - 1.1 Autumn Magnitude 10
 - 1.2 Performing the Ritual
 - 1.3 Effects
 - 1.4 Additional Targets
- 2 Description
- 3 Common Elements

This ritual is invariably cast in a regio, and the invocation and other trappings often reflect or symbolise the Realm to which that regio is attuned. Keys, especially metal keys, are a very common element as is the creation of an artificial threshold across which the ritualists and their guests step at the completion of the ritual. This is often achieved by laying down a thin layer of salt or powder, or among practical Marcher ritualists by laying down a staff or drawing a line in the dirt.

Some ritualists give a token to the targets of the ritual intended to protect them or mark them as guests - iron keys on thongs are a very common signifier that someone is a guest in a chamber or the Hall of Worlds. The rune Hirmok and Lann, the virtue of Loyalty and the constellations of The Key and The Door are often evoked with this ritual.

Ambergelt Baton

Description

These sturdy wands are usually made of a stout wooden core, wound about with weltsilver wire and tipped at the base with a shaped piece of ambergelt. They often bear one or more of the runes Rhyv, Cavul or occasionally Xun.

The Ambergelt Baton is a valuable emergency healing tool valuable both to dedicated magician healers, and to battle magicians of all sorts. It does not require extensive knowledge of healing incantations to provide powerful medical aid on a battlefield. A number of combat magicians wield a mundane rod but have an ambergelt baton as a support implement, drawing it out when they need to heal a critically wounded ally - or recover quickly from a particularly vicious engagement. Their usefulness has meant that some magicians simply call them the Lifesaver, and in some circles even an expended ambergelt baton is considered lucky.

Since 377YE, the warmage has been entrusted with Merel's Rod of Healing, an artefact ambergelt baton. The rod was made by Merel Pathfinder, with ilium provided by the Imperial Conclave. The warmage may wield the rod themselves, but the intention was that it could be allocated to a worthy individual each day to ensure it saved the most lives possible.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of a wand.
- Requirement: You must have the magician skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: Once per day you may cast heal, purify and restore limb on the target simultaneously as if you know them without spending any mana.
- Materials: Crafting an ambergelt baton requires seven measures of ambergelt, four ingots of weltsilver and three measures of iridescent gloaming. It takes one month to make one of these items.

"It seems we arrived too late, Magister" muttered the civil servant to the cowed and robed woman at his side, "There's no way he'll survive the trip back to a surgeon in this state".

"Perhaps, and then again, perhaps not," she replied, her voice betraying no emotion.

Pulling back her white hood she crouched down over the ravaged figure at their feet. Reaching into a hidden pocket she drew forth a varnished wooden rod decorated with intricate silver scrollwork and laid it against the fallen man's chest. Closing her eyes, she exhaled and began to speak slow, precise words of magic. After a moment, there was a catch and she felt the power being drawn out of her like air from a bellows, fanning up the flickering embers of life in the broken figure before her.

With a grisly crunch the shattered bones of his leg began to grind together, the gaping claw wounds began to close over and a snaking rope of damp guts coiled back into his innards like worms. Droplets of black fluid began to bubble and leak from the bite marks on his neck, dripping onto the grass where they began to steam and burn the soil bare. Feeling somewhat drained, she slowly rose to her feet again as the man on the ground regained consciousness with a scream and curled into a ball, rocking gently.

Smiling with satisfaction, she gestured to the civil servant.

"You see? Hale enough to travel now."

The civil servant nodded, brought forth a scroll and began to read.

"Gaius Thuron Harkaysis, you are hereby charged with betraying the Empire, and with trafficking with forbidden Eternals. You are ordered to surrender yourself to the Inquisition..."

Amberglass Chain

Description

The most cunning artificers create these staves so that they appear to be rigid chains of translucent amber or glass. The majority however take the form of a shaft of wood or metal wound around with amber or golden chains. They are sometimes favoured by bounty hunters and thief-takers who use them to hold fugitives in place so they can be arrested, or in battles with fast-moving skirmishers to pin them down and speed their eventual defeat.

The rune Hirmok, the rune of Dominion, is most commonly used on these staves, but some bear Bravash, the rune of Fertility, to command nearby plant-life to grasp at the target. Highly Lineaged Briars have complained that those staves cause their thorns to twitch uncomfortably when they call upon the enchantment, as if also affected by Bravash's call.

Some magicians keep the power of the Chain in reserve until they have expended all other resources and find themselves needing to flee an opponent, earning the staff the name Hopeless Headstart. The most notorious use of this staff was at the loss of the Mournwold, where one of the Marcher battle-mages used the Chain on their own commander during the rout, distracting the orcish pursuers long enough to allow the magician's escape. The treacherous mage was arrested and executed after receiving a damning Testimony to their lack of Loyalty.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of a staff. You must be wielding this implement to use its magical properties.
- Requirement: You must have both the magician and battle mage skills to bond to this item.
- Effect: Twice per day you may cast the entangle spell as if you know it without expending any mana.
- Materials: Crafting an Amberglass Chain requires nine measures of ambergelt. It takes one month to make one of these items.

As the other cities of the League joined with Temeschwar, they found that they were dealing with a different breed of criminal than their magistrates were used to. Violent, disciplined men and women who had been willing to stand up to the might of the boyars found little to fear in facing up to League justice. Reasoning that rooting out of these criminals was a specialist task best suited to specialists, the Princes hired Varushkan bounty hunters to deal with the situation. Using fear and brutality, the bounty-hunters broke the criminals and scattered them back to their rat-holes.

Over time this "Iron Harvest" was repeated again and again, until whole families of Varushkan bounty hunters moved to the League permanently, being absorbed into the culture of the city-states. In more recent times these well-established "Ironblood" families have turned to more civilised methods, leaving the more brutal end of bounty-hunting to the orcs.

Amberglass Orb

Description

This valuable item is usually crafted in the form of an orb of crystal, glass, metal inlaid with tempest jade. It is infused with potent enchantments and attuned to the realm of Spring. A coven can use it to draw on the power contained in ingots of ambergelt and align it with their own magic, allowing them to reduce or in some cases replace the need for crystal mana when performing Spring rituals.

This 'covenstone' may take the form of a bowl or chalice, but almost always a slightly irregular, organic-seeming construction. Some are studded with irregular hooks or thorns, and handling these items without being pricked can be quite challenging. Ambergelt comes from living trees, and even after it has set hard it maintains some of the vitality of the vegetation from which it is drawn. The item is often marked with runes; or with images associated with living things, especially trees and leaves, and occasionally insects. Regardless of the precise form it takes, a coven that uses it is careful to ensure that it takes pride of place in their ceremonies - in addition to its magical functions it is a potent reminder of their unity of purpose and their coven oath. Some covens maintain that the Amberglass Orb works best when it is kept in constant contact with living creatures, and one member of the coven tends to the orb at all times, even sleeping with it.

Rules

- Form: Paraphernalia. Takes the form of a piece of ritual paraphernalia. The item must be present in the ritual to use its magical properties.
- Effect: Members of the coven who are performing a Spring ritual they have mastered may use ambergelt in place of crystal mana. Every two measures of ambergelt spent count as one crystal mana.
- Materials: Crafting an Amberglass Orb requires seven ingots of tempest jade, four ingots of ambergelt and three measures of dragonbone. It takes one month to make one of these items.

Ambition roleplaying effects

Overview

These roleplaying effects are created by priests dedicated to the virtue of Ambition who use the relevant ceremonial skill. A character performing an anointing or hallow must pick one of the appropriate roleplaying effects when they perform the ceremony.

Consecration of Ambition

- In this place, you feel an impulse to do something that will further any objective you are pursuing; any reasons you have for not doing so feel trivial and irrelevant.

Anointings of Ambition

The following are a range of auras that can be summoned onto a living soul, with their consent, by priests whose own souls are dedicated to Ambition:

The Absolution of Ambition

- You are filled with a sense that your ambitions are of vital importance. Any regret, guilt or remorse you feel as a result of actions you took to advance your ambitions is diminished.

Description: The path of ambition can require a pilgrim to speak or act in ways that, whilst furthering their ultimate goals, can weigh them down with regrets and doubts. The priests of ambition have been able to use this aura to alleviate the distress of these necessary actions, and provide affirmation of the pilgrim's virtue in holding true to their path.

The Clear Path of Ambition

- You feel as though nothing should impede your ambitions, and you are inclined to ignore objections and obstacles. Emotions or attitudes that might interfere with the pursuit of your ambitions are muted, and you find it easier to do things you would normally find distasteful or unpleasant in furthering your ambition.

Description: Pilgrims on the path of ambition may know, or understand, in their heads what they need to do in the furtherance of their goals, but may be held back by weakness, doubts or fear of consequences. Priests of ambition have been able to use this aura to help quell those doubts, and bolster the virtue of the pilgrim, removing the obstacles in walking their path.

The Calling of Ambition

- During this anointing, you were asked to specify a particular goal, desire or outcome. Whilst this anointing is in effect, you feel a strong urge to prioritise this goal and make progress toward it. This applies even if the specified outcome would not normally count as your ambition.

Description: This is a contentious aura for, whilst it clearly promotes ambition, this is not always the true ambition of the pilgrim receiving the anointing. Priests of ambition have maintained that this aura can be useful in illustrating the virtuous path, or inspiring those who otherwise may seem to be utterly without ambition to seek their own. Others have pointed out to the potential abuses of this aura in compelling others to act in potentially destructive ways, but the priests of ambition assert that it is, and can be, only ever used with the full consent of the recipient.

- You feel the value of ambition in its own right. You feel a sense of immense satisfaction each time you take an action that you believe could further your desired ends, even if the action does not achieve the intended result.

Description: The path of ambition is not always clear to the pilgrim or priest. It can be hard to glean which of several options is the best for furthering the pilgrim's ambitions, or there may not appear to be any opportunities at all. Priests of ambition have been able to use this aura to help pilgrims in realising that the virtue of ambition is not simply about the destination, but the journey. In that light, it is the striving that demonstrates the virtue for, as has been taught, it is better to try, and fail, than to fail to try.

The True Ambition

- The next time you sleep you experience vivid dreams concerning your ambitions. Your dream show you pursuing your ambitions, achieving them and what follows on. You awaken deeply invigorated and renewed and with a new drive to achieve something you care deeply about.

Description: For pilgrims who wish to follow the path of ambition, it is easy to misstep; lesser concerns may seem more pressing than they are. Distractions in the form of commitments to others, the lure of prosperity, or the slow accumulation of fears and worries can all conspire to delay the pilgrim's road towards their heart's desire. Those anointed with the true ambition find it easier to shrug off the false comforts of prosperity and loyalty and renew their commitment to their own goals.

Hallows of Ambition

Hallowing of the Broken Shield

- When bonded to this item, and in contact with it, you feel an urge to eliminate any obstacles to your ambition. This includes an impulse to use this item in doing so, if it would be appropriate.

Hallowing of Tian's Reach

- When you concentrate upon this item, you are reminded of your ambitions. You also feel a surety of purpose even if the object of your ambitions seems distant.

Hallowing of Achievement

- You feel an urge to do something that will further your ambition immediately. Failure to move towards a goal before dawn causes the feeling to change to one of revulsion and rejection that flows from the item toward you for as long as you are bonded to it.

Hallowing of Aldones

- You feel strong desire to not discuss your true intentions or agenda so that others cannot seek to prevent your ambitions coming to pass.

Hallowing of the Master

- You feel a strong desire to utilise others in your presence to further your own aims.

Hallowing of the Conquerer

- You feel entirely at ease with any use you put this item to. This feeling is amplified to satisfaction if that use is clearly linked to fulfilling you ambitions.

Hallowing of Atuman

- You feel a desire to expand the breadth, or depth, of any current ambition you may hold, or to seek out a new and more compelling challenge.

Amend Crime of Desecration

Amend Powers of the Quartermaster General II

To amend the powers of the Quartermaster General.

To include the power to announce to the Senate once each season to which Armies, Navies, Fortifications and/or Spy Networks the Imperial Guerdon will apply that season.

Proposed by Segura, Seconded by Casinea

Overview

- This motion has constitutional implications
- The motion requires ratification by The Throne
- Passed
- This followed on from a previous motion to amend the powers of the Quartermaster General of the Imperial Armies

Date

- Summer 380YE

Campaign Outcome

- This motion was ratified by Empress Lisabetta in Summer 380YE, and the title of Quartermaster General of the Imperial Armies has been changed

Scrutiny

- This motion was ruled by the Constitutional Court to require a constitutional vote - it was duly passed by the Senate and ratified by the Throne.
- As the motion requires announcement in the Imperial Senate, it is subject to veto by the Imperial Synod as if it were any other announcement.
- This motion will not pass scrutiny without any accompanying change in the method of appointment.

This motion required ratification by the Senate as it was judged to represent a considerable shift in power from individual nations and their generals to the Imperial Military Council.

Existing powers of the Military Council do not require announcement in the Senate - but this power is a significant new extension of the powers of the Military council. Having the announcement take place in the Senate ensures greater public awareness and will mean that the announcement is subject to veto by the Imperial Synod.

In the final process of scrutiny, it was identified that the appointment of the Quartermaster General could fall within the provenance of the Senate rather than the Military Council - due to the appointment method for this Imperial title which allowed for input from both houses. As a result, the motion was ruled unconstitutional - with the recommendation to raise an administrative motion to change the method of appointment of the Quartermaster General - to be by majority vote of the Military Council. If this administrative motion is passed by the Imperial Senate - then the motion will pass into law.

- The administrative motion to amend the method of appointment of the Quartermaster General passed.

Amend power of Inquisition

The Senate to create the powers detailed by Jorma Steelhail in his Statement of Principle within the Synod during Winter 379 summit.

These powers are the judgements of Castigation, Vindication and Penance. The intent of these powers are to conclude and proclaim the outcomes of Inquisition that cannot be reasonably included under Condemnation.

The powers of Castigation, Vindication and Penance are escalated from Inquisition in the same manner as Condemnation and the powers and responsibilities are detailed below:

- Castigation: The target is believed by the Assembly to be guilty of Unvirtuous deeds and nature and is formally rebuked.
- Penance: The target is believed by the Assembly to have engaged in both Virtuous and Unvirtuous behaviour. The judgement recommends how the target can correct their Unvirtuous behaviour.
- Vindication: The target is believed by the Assembly to be innocent of any accused Unvirtuous acts levelled against them and/or be of a Virtuous disposition and is formally lauded as Virtuous.

Proposed by the Conscience of the Senate, Seconded by Redoubt

Overview

- This motion was to modify the Synod power of Inquisition
- Passed

Date

- Autumn 380YE

Constitution

The Constitutional Court note that there is an ambiguity in the wording of the Senate motion. The implication is that the author intends that castigation, vindication and penance are raised from an inquisition - but does not explicitly mandate that. Furthermore, the simplest legal interpretation of the opening line of the motion is that the Senate wish the Synod to have access to the judgements of castigation, vindication and penance. The intent may be that these powers will be used only after an inquisition, but that is not the legal protocol for a judgement. Intent will guide the judgement of the Synod, but is never legally binding.

In cases where there are different possible interpretations of a motion, the Constitutional Court restrict their deliberations to those interpretations which are constitutionally valid. It is the decision of the court that it would not be constitutional for the Synod to have access to the judgements of Castigation, Vindication and Penance but not be able to submit them without first submitting an inquisition. "Voting in the Synod will be performed by such assemblies as are rightfully able to weigh the virtue of an action or individual, in accord with their nationality and authority." If condemnation does not require an inquisition first, then there is no constitutional basis to prevent an assembly by rightfully able to weigh the virtue of an action or individual, with regard to vindication, castigation, or penance. Therefore the only constitutional interpretation of the law is one in which the Synod may submit these new judgements - exactly as if they were a condemnation.

OOO Note: It is not completely clear if the Conscience intended to allow the Synod to submit the new judgements without first submitting an inquisition, but we have ruled that the new judgements must follow exactly the same rules as condemnation in the interests of keeping a simple set of rules that players have the best possible chance to understand.

Date

Campaign Outcome

- There are significant constitutional implications to this motion - it is currently undergoing scrutiny.

Constitution

Citizens shall not hold more than one high office at a time and must exercise their powers in person; those whose virtue causes them to be offered numerous Imperial titles must choose between them

Imperial Constitution

- It is not constitutional to share a power between Imperial titles in this way. Either the civilian commissioner has the power of commission or they do not - it is not possible to make the use of a power contingent on the actions of another title in this way. The use of a power by an Imperial title may be limited by practical or logistical considerations - but it cannot be subject to legal limitations in this way.

Members of the constitutional court will make themselves available to the Senate on Saturday afternoon at the next summit to offer any help they can to allow senators to craft a constitutional solution to their current problem.

Amend powers of Dredgemaster of Feverwater

To improve the sinecure of Feverwater Lake, additionally to provide the Dredgemaster of Feverwater with the ability to approve one research request per season.

Proposed by Miaren, Seconded by Hercynia

Overview

- The sinecure dedicated to the dredging of lake Feverwater in Therunin is to be improved
- The Dredgemaster of Feverwater gains the ability to commission one piece of historical research each season.

Date

- Spring 379YE

Campaign Outcome

- The powers of the Dredgemaster were amended.

Necessary Details

- The Imperial Senate has set no upper limit on the amount of improvement possible. As such, the Senator can improve this sinecure as much as they like over the next year.

Constitution

- Clarify the limits on usage to commission historical research
- Amend the tenure of this title

Usage

While the Dredgemaster has the ability to commission Historical Research, the Empire as a whole can still only commission a limited number each season. To use this power, the Dredgemaster provides an announcement to the Civil Service, who presents the decision to the Imperial Senate. No voting is possible by the Senate at this point, as the power has been delegated to the Dredgemaster. The Imperial Synod may, however, choose to exercise their veto over this announcement.

Tenure

The ability to commission historical research is a significant power. Other similar titles with this power are appointed annually. To bring this position into line with existing titles, the Court have recommended that it be amended to be appointed annually.

Amend powers of the High Bard

To revise the Imperial Title “High Bard of the Empire” that was established in Spring 381 and appointed by the Assembly of Nine during the same season. As a result of Scrutiny by the Civil Service it has been determined that Right of Address may not be afforded to an Imperial Title without significant legal power or stipend and in order to pass the motion as presented during spring 381 the senate would need to append a minimum stipend of 1 Throne per season to afford right of Address to the High bard. I therefore propose this amendment to resolve the matter. “Set a seasonal stipend for the office of High Bard, amount to be determined on the Senate Floor.”

Amend the use of the Imperial breadbasket

To repurpose the Imperial breadbasket so that it will supply free food to people not in an army in the Mournwold.

Proposed by Bregasland, Seconded by Skarsind.

Overview

- This motion was to provide support to the people of the Mournwold.
- Passed

Date

- Summer 381YE

Campaign Outcome

- The entire function of the Imperial Breadbasket has been changed to "provide food for the people of the Mournwold."
- Until this motion is abrogated, the great work provides no funds to farmers in the Marches.
- Furthermore the granaries will have no effect to reduce the effects of natural decay on the armies of a single nation as detailed here.
- Changing the purpose of the Imperial Breadbasket to supply food to the Mournwold takes three months. If the motion is abrogated, the additional money for Marcher farms would be restored immediately. It would take a further three months to restore the ability to reduce the effects of natural decay on a nation's army. For example, if the motion were abrogated in Spring, the Marcher farms would receive their share of the great work monetary bounty at the Summer event, but the effect of natural decay would be suffered by all armies in the meantime.

Amity and enmity (Redirected from Amity and emnity)

Overview

The Imperial Conclave has the ability to declare amity or enmity towards an eternal.

Amity or Enmity towards an eternal is considered to apply to all that eternal's heralds. The Conclave may also occasionally extend amity or enmity towards a specific herald without changing the designation of other heralds or the patron eternal.

Amity

An eternal (and associated heralds) under Declaration of Amity gains the following rights:

- They receive protection under Imperial Law
- They can attend conclave meetings
- They may be nominated to speak before the conclave, although they cannot vote.
- They can place an Address or Declaration onto the conclave agenda under the normal rules as if they were Imperial citizens (the civil service does not accept realm-specific mana as payment).
- They can make bequests to the vault of a specific order or to the Conclave as a whole.

The declaration also has a magical effect. Eternals and their heralds find it easier to manifest in the Hall of Worlds and to move into Anvil.

Amity and enmity

Overview

The three declarations of amity, enmity, and neutrality are similar in nature. They are a critical tool used by the Imperial Conclave to interact with the eternals, the supernatural denizens that inhabit the six magical realms. They allow the Conclave to declare that a specific eternal (or a defined group of eternals) is an ally or enemy of the Empire, or remove one of those designations and restore the eternal to neutrality.

More than political and legal tools, these declarations have a known magical effect. Eternals who are subject to one of these declarations find their ability to interact with the empire changes to reflect the Conclave's decision. An eternal that has amity for example finds it easier to dispatch heralds and wield its supernatural power within the bounds of the Empire, while one that has enmity finds it significantly harder to perform these actions.

The archmage power of plenipotentiary circumvents declarations of amity and enmity to a small degree. An eternal formally invited to the Hall of Worlds for a parley may manifest itself or its servants regardless of its status with regard to these declarations.

Amity or enmity towards an eternal is considered to apply to all that eternal's heralds. In recent years, the Conclave has extended amity or enmity towards a specific herald without rather than the patron eternal. Recent investigation by scholars associated with the Lyceum has suggested that this practice may have unexpected consequences.

Declaration

In each case, the declaration names a single eternal or known group of eternals such as the Whisper Gallery, the Lictors, or the Thrice-cursed Court.

Heralds and eternals

During 381YE, a group of arcane scholars associated with the Lyceum undertook a number of experiments and investigations with the assistance of the eternal Lashonar and its herald Ut'Kar. The outcome of these experiments demonstrated something that had long been suspected; when a herald is given amity the supernatural effects apply also to the eternal. As far as the hearth magic that underpins amity (and presumably enmity) is concerned, there is no difference between an eternal and its heralds.

Resolution

If the declaration passes, the result comes into effect at the end of the Conclave session as normal. The precise effects differ depending on which of the three declarations has been passed.

The legal status of amity and enmity still differentiates between the two, but by giving amity to Baxshula, Ut'Kar and the rest the Conclave inadvertently gave amity to the eternals Arhallogen, Irra Harah, Lashonar, and Llofir as well.

Declaration of Amity

The Conclave may declare a specific eternal, and any associated heralds, an ally of the Conclave. Members of the Conclave are encouraged to demonstrate courtesy and even aid these eternals, or their Heralds, where it is possible for them to do so. This declaration automatically overturns a declaration of enmity.

An eternal (and associated heralds) under declaration of amity gains the following legal rights, enforced by the magistrates.

- They receive protection under Imperial Law
- They can attend conclave meetings
- They may be nominated to speak before the conclave by a grandmaster, although they cannot vote. The usual payment of crystal mana must still be made.
- They can place an address or declaration onto the conclave agenda under the normal rules as if they were Imperial citizens (the civil service does not accept realm-specific mana as payment).
- They can make bequests to the vault of a specific order or to the Conclave as a whole. Bequests made to the Conclave as a whole are generally dealt with using a declaration of endowment.

The declaration of amity also has a significant magical effect. Eternals and their heralds find it easier to manifest in the Hall of Worlds and to move into Anvil. Eternals with amity also find it easier to wield their powers within the Empire; in many cases eternals require amity to be able to use their most powerful abilities.

In some cases, the Empire has attracted the attention of an eternal they wished to initiate contact with through this declaration. The declaration of amity or declaration of concord have occasionally been used with some success, but the most effective way to get the attention of an eternal who is not currently interested in the Empire is through the use of an Archmage's plenipotentiary.

Declaration of Enmity

The Conclave may declare a specific eternal to be an enemy of the Empire. If this declaration is made, it becomes dangerous for anyone to consort with the eternal named in this declaration, or with their Heralds. It is not illegal to talk to an eternal with enmity (as is often incorrectly assumed) but the offender risks being declared a sorcerer, and can face investigation by a magistrate for treason. A declaration of enmity automatically overturns and replaces a declaration of amity.

An eternal (and associated heralds) under declaration of enmity suffers the following penalties:

- Eternals and heralds under enmity are considered to be barbarians for legal purposes.
- Trading or dealing with an eternal under enmity is illegal and will be investigated as treason.
- Any ritual that deals directly with an eternal subject to the declaration of enmity (Ephisis' Scale for Ephisis, Clarion Call of Ivory and Dust for Kaela or Missive for Sadogua for Sadogua, for example) is automatically considered to be interdicted; magistrates may seek the assistance of the archmagi to clarify which rituals this effects, unless there is a separate declaration of interdiction against specific rituals.

As with the declaration of amity, this declaration also has significant magical effects. Eternals find it much harder to enter the Hall of Worlds. Heralds cannot use the portal in the Hall of Worlds to travel to Anvil without ritual assistance from an Imperial citizen. There is significant evidence that heralds associated with an eternal under enmity find it extremely difficult or impossible to enter the Empire through any regio without ritual assistance.

Declaration of Neutrality

This declaration removes either amity or enmity from the named eternal, returning them to a neutral legal status. Any benefits gained from, or penalties imposed by, the previous status are lost at the end of the conclave session.

Any eternal not listed as having either amity or enmity is neutral.

Heralds of neutral eternals are not protected by Imperial law - it is legal for them to be slain by Imperial citizens. They are however expected to abide by Imperial law while they are withing the confines of the Empire.

An Echo of Life Remains

Rules

Winter Magnitude 2

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. The target remains must be present throughout, and close enough to touch.

Effects

This ritual is used upon a grave or a corpse. It will also work on the remains of a corpse, even if that corpse has been reduced to ashes, as long as the majority of the remains are still present.

At the conclusion of the ritual the ritualists become aware of a common name of the deceased being, and may learn other information such as an image of the deceased.

If more than two bodies are present in the remains, the answer is clouded.

Description

This bitter divination spell is useful for determining who is buried in a grave without needing to desecrate it; for identifying remains claimed from a battlefield so they may be given appropriate posthumous honours; to confirm the demise of a hated enemy or criminal even if the remains are scattered or defaced; and to identify the victims of murder or exposure whose bodies might otherwise be unrecognisable.

As long as the remains are present, the ritual will work on them even if they are not conventionally dead. It is rare, but occasionally the ritual is used on an undead or inhabited corpse, assuming it can be restrained for the performance.

While the spell is useful, it is somewhat circumstantial. It is not a commonly mastered ritual, except by those who deal with unidentified corpses on a regular basis. Even Winter ritualists would rather perform the ritual spontaneously that admit that they are dealing with desecrated remains or murder victims often enough to entail them mastering the ritual.

The ritual does have a little synergy with Whispers through the Black Gate. On occasion, it has been used to discover the identity of a fresh corpse so that the more powerful necromantic ritual can be invoked to learn more about the circumstances of death; it has proved especially useful in questioning the spirit of recently deceased enemy soldiers, for example,

Common Elements

The most common element of this ritual is ash. It may be scattered over the target remains, mixed with fat or water to draw a rune on the ritualist or the target, or sometimes used to outline the eyes of the caster. Examination of the corpse may be accompanied with the use of the Sular rune, or meditation and evocation of the spirit of the dead with the Ophis rune. Most often the rune of ending is sketched on or above the remains.

The performance of this ritual is often muted, grim and understated; at the end of the day, the ritual involves the remains of a mortal being whose identity is in doubt and that should be a sobering experience.

An apple that falls

Jenny Thresher stared at their pantry in disbelief. The cool storeroom was filled to the gunnels with food stuffs, mostly sacks of grain but also cured meats, dried fruit and similar. Enough to get her the whole farm through the winter no matter what happened. For the first time in her life she didn't have to worry about what would happen if the crops failed, didn't have to worry what the family would eat. Everyone who worked on the farm would be fine until next year now - come what may.

And all thanks to their cousins in Upwold and Mitwold. Well Bregasland too technically - but folk there were odd. These supplies were good solid Marcher staples, people in Bregasland probably eat exotic food like eels or seaweed or something. Still the bounty was thanks to all of them - that couldn't be denied.

She shut the door of the pantry and walked back into the light. "Lost time is never found Jenny Thresher" she told herself. With so much food stored for the winter, she could turn her attention to repairing the hedgerows round the four back fields. And there was the long ditch between her farm and Spittlefields that hadn't been touched in years. She could spare the time to dig it out now. She was determined to make best use of this windfall, invest her time wisely and see her farm prosper again.

Overview

The situation in the Mournwold remains tense. The Jotun seem to finally be being routed - the war is almost over - but the anger remains. Those who try to reason with the Mournwolders over the actions of the Empire are met with frank words. People here talk less in terms of liberation... and more of the Imperial conquest of the Mourn. The Jotun are not completely gone but already a few people have begun to talk wistfully of how much better things were when the jarls ruled the Mourn. The Empire has won this war - but it remains close to losing the Mourn.

The Empire took four significant actions last season to improve the situation in the Mourn. Marchers deployed their granaries and storehouses to help provide food for their neighbours which wasn't asked for but was all the more welcome for it. The Imperial Senate also approved a payment of 75 thrones to provide for the orc thralls through the coming winter, which was the least of the things the Mourn asked for - but still generated some respect. People were disappointed but not surprised that the Imperial Military Council did not support a plan to stop their armies giving ground. More than one Marcher laughs about "Dawn's glorious generals... always ready to give ground at any moment". But the Marchers did the right thing and put a stop to that for their own armies - showing everyone what it meant to be a Marcher and proving themselves in the eyes of many here.

Crucially the Marchers were able to reign in the Imperial armies, limiting further loss of life on all sides of the conflict. The orders issued to the four Marcher armies all amounted to a steady advance designed to minimize casualties, but it wasn't just the Marchers this time - the Imperial Orcs also took the same approach. If this behaviour continues over the seasons ahead it will have an increasing effect on attitudes on the ground in the Mournwold - blunting the criticism that this was about killing the Jotun and that the Mourn is just a convenient battlefield for the slaughter.

Sadly the immediate benefits gained from the Empire's generosity towards the Jotun thralls were largely squandered by the message sent to the Mourn (and the wider Empire) from the Imperial Warmage in which he appeared to defend the decisions of his predecessor and affirmed that he would repeat them in the future. Following the Imperial Address, the situation in the Mourn is now so febrile that it is impossible for the Imperial civil service to fully assess the situation, indeed it is increasingly dangerous for anyone who isn't a Marcher to be abroad alone in the Mournwold right now... As a result they are unable to advise on clear solutions that might be implemented - the best they can do is summarize the key problems and identify possible areas where action might be taken to mitigate the situation.

What might help is that three of the leaders of the Mourn are intent on attending Anvil this summit. Mel Greenhill, Long Tom, and Edda Counter are all well respected prominent citizens - they are well liked and influential people from across the Mourn. Mel was in Anvil last season, but neither Tom nor Edda have set foot outside the Mourn before now. But the three of them are coming now, bringing the concerns of the friends and families with them. If these three people return home with good news and fair words - it'll sway enough folk to calm the Mourn. If the opposite happens then the Empire had better not remove its armies from the Mourn anytime soon...

Marcher Proverb

Cruel Leaders Are Replaced

- The Mournwold seeks protection from the Imperial War Mage and the Imperial Conclave

In the aftermath of the magical slaughter wrought by the Empire, Martin Orchard raised a judgement that was passed unanimously by the Marcher Assembly: "The Urizen General has been rebuked by the Synod. The Warmage has lost his seat over this. Those responsible shall be held to account." This was far from sufficient to mollify those who had had to bury their loved ones - but it did at least give those loyal to the Empire a case to argue. Those responsible had been held to account and punished. Few people felt a "rebuke" was sufficient punishment - but the implication at least was that people understood that what had happened was wrong and that it would not happen again.

Then the Throne granted the new Warmage, Heilyn Bronwen's Rest, the right to address the Empire. When his words are heard in the Mournwold it causes riots. Couriers carrying the messages are threatened, two are beaten badly, one near to death. A few voices point out that the Empress is understood to be an ally of the Mournwolders, one who understand their anger and shares their tears - so the Warmage can't be using her address to say what he appears to be saying. There must be something more to it than that they reason.

Sadly most people see a different interpretation. Heilyn agrees, even knowing the death toll and how many innocents would die, with the decision to curse the Mourn. The idea that anyone has been rebuked, that anyone has lost their title as Martin Orchard claims are all irrelevant when the replacement indicates that they absolutely agrees with the decision of their predecessor. They also state clearly that they cannot promise not to do it again. That last part in particular is taken very badly - with more than a few people arguing that it is intended as a veiled threat... The Mourn had better not step out of line... because if it does... then the Warmage stands ready to kill the rest of us if needed...

As a result of this "threat", the people of Mournwold are looking at what steps might be taken to protect themselves from the Empire - specifically from the Warmage and the Imperial Conclave. Their ideal solution would be to have these rituals removed from Imperial Lore - but they know now that that is unlikely to happen. The Imperial Senate has spoken flatly rejecting any attempt to place these rituals beyond use. When a dog barks, you don't bark back. Marcher Proverb

Even so there are things that might be done. The Conclave interdicting these awful rituals would be the least of them. It won't convince many of the Empire's good intentions - the view is that the Conclave would just remove the interdiction next time it wants to use them. But it would be something. Alternatively the Conclave could choose to replace the Warmage with someone who would promise not to use such magics again - someone who speak clearly to the mistakes of the past.

But "You don't expect your neighbour to plough your own fields" as they say in the Mourn. Perhaps the Marchers should stop relying on others to protect them and set about it themselves. To that end the landskeepers have drawn up a plan and sent one of their own - Long Tom of the Chalk Downs - to see if there is anything that can be done to make it happen. The plan apparently involves a chain of dolmens set at key points across the territory - which might protect the populace from the worst effects of any territory-wide curses. The only problem is that it would require a lot of mithril...

Sure Of Having Something

Bread without spice is better than spice without bread.

- The Mournwold seeks evidence that the Empire's interests in their land run deeper than claiming their mithril mines Marcher Proverb

One of the criticisms of the Empire is that it is interested in killing Jotun and the Mourn's mithril and not a lot else. Those citizens who support the Empire are pointing out that the Marcher folk are truly free for the first time in a generation. They no longer have the Jotun taking the lion's share of everything they produce. But those who are angry at the Empire for the slaughter they wrought point to the Singing Caves and claim that the Empire will be taking everything the Mournwold has just like the Jotun used to do. There are many things the Empire could do to address this criticism, some more expensive than others.

The Marchers of the Mournwold have already expressed their enthusiasm to see the Singing Caves declared a Marcher national resource. That way it will be run by a Marcher and the mithril it produces can be used for the good of all the Marcher territories. They could use the mithril to protect themselves from the Conclave's magic and help the landskeepers rebuild their mana sites. They could raise military units that would be used to defend the Mourn from any who sought to conquer it. Giving the Caves to the Marchers would blunt the accusation that this war was about more than mithril and murder.

Indeed, the Senator for Mitwold attempted just that in Autumn 380YE - but the motion was vetoed by the Throne. Wise heads point out that Imperatrix Lisabetta has made clear that no seat will be declared National. But the Marches is the only nation of the Empire that doesn't have its own Imperial Bourse seat - so the argument goes - surely the Empress can see the unfairness of that? Surely she'll see how the Mournwold people have suffered? Surely this time she'll make an exception...

If the Empress did choose to allow the Singing Caves to be allocated to the Marchers it would have a significant impact on the situation. They understand that the Empire's coffers are running dry and that a new mithril seat could fill them. Allocating the Caves to the Marches would not remove the grievances that all feel - but it would prove that the Empress was prepared to acknowledge that suffering that the Empire had inflicted on them. It would prove she was on their side and greatly improve her standing there. The wealth that flowed from the Caves would significantly improve the Empire's standing and that alone would be enough to ensure that there was no chance of open rebellion in the future.

One step the Empire has taken that has considerably improved sentiment in the Mournwold is the allocation of the Breadbasket to feed the Mourn. The people here are not starving, they fed themselves during the Jotun occupation and they can feed themselves now. This is Marcher land in its bones and so there are prosperous yeoman farmers here even now. But... there are nowhere near as many of them as are found in Upwold or Mitwold. The land there is just so much more fertile - in the Mourn the wealth of the land is in the mines dug into the hillsides - not fields of crops. Now they are beginning to see the prospects that this impressive feat of Marcher engineering might provide.

When the granaries and storehouses of the breadbasket were built the Mournwold was almost totally controlled by the Jotun - so there are only a few links to the breadbasket in place. But if the Empire spent an additional 20 wains of weirwood and 20 wains of white granite then similar silos and stores could be built across the Mourn. But these stores wouldn't be used to hold grain produced here - but rather to bring it here from the Marches. That would allow many more men and women, to work the more prosperous mines rather than herding sheep on the arid hills. It would mean permanently surrendering the ability of the breadbasket to support additional Imperial armies - but it would extend the financial benefits of the old breadbasket to every Marcher territory - and with the flow of wealth from the new openly mines, the returns for everyone would increase by half as much again.

If the Empire won't do either of those things (and there is a lot of scepticism that any of that will happen), then there are less impressive things the Empire might do. Sarcombe was once a prosperous mining town, rich off the back of trade in green iron from the Southmoor hills. It's a ruin now, destroyed in the previous invasion of the Mourn, but it could be rebuilt. The more resources the Senate was prepared to commit to the reconstruction of Sarcombe the greater the restoration of Prosperity to the region. Such a move would kill two birds with one stone as well - since it would help raise levels of Prosperity across the territory - which would mean that taxation rose quickly to the level seen before the Jotun took the territory. Sadly the fact that the Empire might well be the biggest beneficiary of such a move would limit any positive improvement in local sentiment if this were all the Empire managed.

Of course, before the town could be rebuilt the region would need to be liberated from the Jotun still garrisoned at Hillstop castle there.

Willing To Die For It

You don't own it unless you can defend it.

- The Mournwold seeks a way to defend itself against aggressors

Marcher Proverb

Although the Imperial armies have largely driven the Jotun forces from the Mourn, two regions remain under Jotun control. Most folk here expect the Military Council to finish the job - it is just good sense to secure the territory while the Jotun are on the back foot. But then what? The Jotun have pulled back to Liathaven, they must be resupplying their armies already. How long until they return in force? A season or two? A year at most? They took the Mourn once - what is to stop them taking it again?

The answer of course would be to build some solid fortifications. Just look at how much effort the Empire is having to make to drive the Jotun out... A couple of solidly built fortifications would help to secure the Mournwold against the inevitable return of the Jotun. Perhaps if the Empire fortified the border - it wouldn't need to use ritual magic to wreak indiscriminate slaughter. Sceptics claim that such fortifications would take a year to build, but it is soon pointed out that it might not be in Imperial Lore but some magicians recently performed a ritual to speed the construction of fortifications. Perhaps the Conclave could begin to redress the balance of their crimes here?

A single fortification would not be sufficient to placate the Mourn - there was one of those in Overton and it fell quickly enough. But two would be mitigate fears - and three would calm them further. Perhaps the fortification at Overton might be rebuilt, with another at Green March and maybe Southmoor. If the Empire would just do what the Jotun do - and fortify their territories with a ring of castles - then the people might begin to feel safe.

Of course there is one step that the Empire could take to really improve the view of them here. They could build the fortifications - and then hand control of them to local Mournwolders. Never mind Imperial garrisons - give complete control of the fortifications to the Marchers who live here. Then the Mourn can take care of the Mourn. Of course such people would need to be paid - so it wouldn't save any money. In fact it wouldn't have any Imperial benefits at all. But if the Mourn ever tried to rebel... then the castles would be theirs to be used against any outside force that tried to impose its will on the people.

Not many people can see that happening. It would a lot of trust from all sides, and at the moment there isn't much trust to go round. Much more likely in most minds is that nothing will get done - the Senate will say it is too busy and too broke to build any fortifications in Mournwold and that will be that. Of course what it could do is restore the powers of the Imperial Master of Works. The title has always been a Marcher position and it served the Marchers well... until the Empire stripped it of its real powers. Giving the Master of Works the power to commission fortifications wouldn't improve the situation in the Mournwold by itself - but it would help to prevent it deteriorating further.

Edda Counter in particular is keen to talk to the Master of Works and to anyone who is prepared to discuss fortifying her homeland. She is interested in the disposition of the Mourn's mithril also - but as she said when she publicly rebuked the Elston Steward at the big meeting in Shaffy's Inn - "You don't own it unless you can defend it."

Silence is Argument

Nothing dries faster than a tear.

- The Mournwold seeks acceptance of their people and their beliefs

Marcher Proverb

There is of course still the matter of the remaining people of Whittle whose village remained unconquered by the orcs for thirty years. Their attempt to help fight the Jotun, and their ultimate flight to Tassato, created ripples that have still not entirely settled.

Protracted effort on the part of prominent citizens of the twin cities - led by Senator Cesare - has gone a long way toward helping the Whittlefolk open up a little to their new neighbours in Tassato Mestra. "When we go home", they say, "we'll surely keep a piece of Tassato in our hearts". They are already taking steps to ensure the agreed flow of green iron to the Chamber of Commerce continues, even should they themselves return to Freemoor. Little Mournwold, as the enclave claimed by the Whittlefolk is already known, will continue - there are other Mournwolders, like some of those who fled the Greensward, who will happily remain in residence.

Home. The Whittlefolk dearly want to return there - the Whittle Hill is liberated by the Empire, the Jotun pushed back westward. There is a problem however. The Whittlefolk make no secret of the fact that in addition to the seven Virtues, they recognise the false virtue of Hatred, openly speaking of a force the Imperial Synod decries as ultimately malign, as blasphemy. A blasphemy that has already claimed the life of Friar Robin of the Whittlefolk, executed for his beliefs by the Imperial Magistrates at the behest of the Marcher assembly. Yet the Whittlefolk have made clear, time and again, that they will not abandon these beliefs, nor tolerate any dilution of them.

The folk of the Mourn, when asked, seem to support the return of the Whittlefolk. Despite everything, there was a band of Whittlefolk at Overton when it fell, fighting on the walls of Orchard's Watch against the Jotun, giving their lives alongside their fellow Marchers to try and defeat the orc invaders. Many Marchers take a practical view of religion. There is a sentiment that the religion of the people from Whittle Hill is a matter only for them - not for other folks, and most especially not folks outside the Mourn. After all, there are no shortage of people who hate the Jotun in the Mournwold. During the occupation the continued liberty of Whittle was a source of comfort to many living as thralls in the eastern Mournwold. To some, they are heroes. More than a few are keen to talk to the Whittle people when they return - to find out more about this spiritual force that gave them the will to resist the Jotun for so long.

The Whittlefolk - led by Margaret Steward - are worried, however. While they have time and again been warmly received at Anvil by their fellows, the fact remains that the Marcher Assembly have repeatedly condemned them. No less a figure that Bridget Talbot raised the mandate spread by Sister Meredith encouraging Marchers across Mitwold, Upwold and Bregasland to shun them.

The Marcher Assembly sends Sister Meredith with 50 doses of liao to spread the word in Upwold, Mitwold and Bregasland that the folk of Whittle are not good Marchers. Their refusal to abandon their misguided belief in the power of Hate marks them as blasphemers. They must be shunned until they renounce this blasphemy.

Bridget Talbot, Marcher Assembly, Spring Equinox 381YE, Upheld 76 - 0

The truth the Whittle folk must endure is that those mandates decisively influence the behaviour of Marchers who do not attend the summits. It's all well and good having friends in Anvil but all their kind words aren't worth a bucket of pig shit when the Marcher Assembly condemns them. If their friends can't influence the Assembly to speak in their favour - then the Whittle folk may simply have swapped an orc enemy for a human one.

As the Whittle folk made preparations to return home, discussion of their fate is contributing to feelings of discontent with the Imperial Synod in the Mourn. There have been statements in some national assemblies that support the use of any available weapon - including the kind of weapons that resulted in the deaths of thousands of innocent civilians.

Support for all weapons that is except for the spiritual force that drove the Whittle folk to successfully resist the Jotun for three decades. Apparently it's fine for the Navarr to hate the Jotun but Marchers who Hate them face condemnation and execution by the Synod. People compare this principled defence of spiritual rectitude by the Imperial Synod with its pragmatic acceptance of thousands of Marchers slain at Imperial hands and they don't like it.

Even those who sympathetic to the plight of the Whittle folk accept there is a clear danger in allowing the return of a group of unrepentant blasphemers - a people deeply proud of their Hatred - to a territory where passions are inflamed with raw wounds and fresh grievances.

The Imperial Senate could theoretically deal with this problem once and for all - if they passed a law making it a capital offence to be dedicated to Hatred, then the magistrates could purge the Whittle folk using similar methods to the ones used to root out the Vyig in recent years. Such a move would categorically end the risk of Hatred spreading through the Whittle folk - but it would be taken extremely badly by the other inhabitants of the Mourn. Head Magistrate Stanislav Karkovich has, however, expressed his opposition to such a move, and warns that at the very least such a motion would be subject to extensive scrutiny and would certainly be constitutional in nature. He has invited lawmakers to speak with him on this thorny subject during the Autumn Equinox at Anvil

We send named priest with 25 liao to urge Tassatans to come forwards with any evidence of blasphemous acts by the Whittle folk.

General Assembly or League Assembly Mandate

If the Senate will not or cannot act, then the General Assembly or the League Assembly might pass a mandate urging citizens of Tassato to provide evidence against those among the Whittle folk who follow Hate. This would not be as effective as making the false virtue a capital crime - but it would provide the Synod with the means to call these people to inquisition or move directly to condemn them. It would be taken just as badly as intervention by the Senate - but it would also have the advantage of identifying any Tassatans who have been tempted into Hate, should such exist. Alternatively, the cardinal of Vigilance could instruct the Silent Bell to look into the Whittlefolk and identify any blasphemers among them.

The Whittle folk themselves are hoping that when the new senator is appointed they will make a public statement on the matter. They have asked the senator to send a winged messenger to Margaret Steward in Tassato to state whether they be welcomed home. The Whittle Steward appears to have identified that her people have no support of any kind in the Marcher Assembly - and no hope of getting any - so she intends to appeal directly to the elected representative to speak on their behalf. Any letter will be shown by the Steward to their critics - assuming it endorses their worth.

One option that would significantly improve the situation in the Mourn is if the Synod chose to repudiate their earlier calls to shun the Whittle folk and instead laud these people as heroes. It will be extremely difficult and time consuming to change the views of those in the other Marcher territories - who are now minded to shun the Whittle folk - but simply taking the action would be enough to convince the Mournwolders of the Synod's good faith - that it cares about land and people as much or more than it cares about souls.

The Assembly sends named priest with 150 doses of liao to spread the word throughout the Marchers that the Whittle folk are heroes who resisted the Jotun occupation for thirty years when all else failed.

General Assembly or Marcher Assembly Mandate

If this mandate were spread across the Marches then it would cement the reconciliation between the Marcher people of the four territories and convince many in the Mournwold of the Empire's good intentions, especially if it were passed with a greater majority by the General Assembly. Of course it would also mean that folk across the Marchers were then inclined to view the Hateful Whittle folk as heroes to be listened to, rather than heretics to be shunned. That would go a long way to settling the current rebellious mood of the Mourn but would be certain to cause problems later.

Mel Greenhill of Mourn is a monk from the Mournwold who is well regarded by many there on matters of faith. Their opinion of the solutions sought by the Empire to this problem, along with the views Long Tom and Edda Counter, are likely to be pivotal in determining the views of the Mournwold going forwards.

My End Will Be My Beginning

Fair words won't bury grudges

- The Mournwold demands a reckoning

Marcher Proverb

There is one other action that might help to calm the mood of the Marchers. An old tradition - older than the Empire - some say it is as old as the Marches themselves. Less than a year ago the Empire took actions that resulted in the deaths of thousands of inhabitants of the Mourn. Even those who understand and can accept that there was a strategy behind it all are adamant that there must be a reckoning.

The Synod told the Mournwold that folk had been "rebuked" for the deaths. Rebuked!? In the Marches you rebuke a child for not doing their chores when they're told. Those that cast these rituals, those that brought death to the fields of the Greensward... they were not children. There must be a reckoning.

There were tens of thousands of deaths in the Mourn - even granted that most of them were Jotun - that still leaves thousands of Marcher citizens slain. That is a price that can never be balanced out. Everyone understands that an eye for an eye will leave the whole world blind. But still... there must be a reckoning.

Out on Old Tam Shaffer's farm - under the eaves of Black Hill Wood men and women are leaving piles of straw and wicker. Not a word is said to anyone, but the pile grows ever bigger. Folk who have the time lend the old Landskeeper of the Wood an hour, helping him weave the wicker into a frame. Steadily it takes shape, like a child growing into a man - a wicker man. The tears for the dead have all run dry. Now there must be a reckoning.

It remains to be seen who among the Marchers has the strength to be counted. Whose death will bury this grudge? Whose end will be their beginning? The wicker man will burn at the eleventh hour on the night of the Solstice. All Marchers are called to bear witness... There must be a reckoning.

Notes

*There are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio,
Than are dreamt of in your philosophy.*

We appreciate that this is an exceptionally long and complicated Hamlet Act 1, scene 5

Wind of Fortune. We apologize for the length - but the situation in the Mourn is fevered and complex - a consequence of the various actions taken by players over the last few years of the campaign. What we've tried to do here, rather than lay out a short simple list of things that the players must do to solve the solution is start by identifying what the primary problems are - the key bullet points in each section. There is then a more detailed list of the various things players might do to try and redress the situation. In most cases the most dramatic intervention is listed first, easier (but less effective) interventions are listed later.

The list is accurate but not definitive. Like with the inspirational idea last event by the players to repurpose the Imperial Breadbasket to feed the Mourn, there will be things that players might think of that we have not considered. We always strive to be as responsive as possible to player actions - but on an occasion such as this where the problem is so complex, we wanted to underline the fact that anything that makes a substantive difference to life in the Mournwold - and which addresses the concerns of the inhabitants as defined in the bullet points - will have some effect on the problem. As with a mandate - we will try to add something to the wiki if you email your idea to us in the next few days (along with an appropriate explanation of how effective it would be). Otherwise you will have to take your chances at the event!

We did consider splitting each section into its own Wind of Fortune! That would have made it easier to read - but we wanted to make clear that these are all linked. The Mournwold has a set of concerns and grievances - making more effort to meet one concern would mean less needed to be done for others.

There will be three characters from the Mournwold at the event, Mel Greenhill, Long Tom and Edda Counter, all representing the people of the Mournwold. The outcome of the current rumblings of sedition will depend on the combination of the reports of these three characters with the actions the Empire takes to redress the situation. Please bear in mind that some of these characters are players, and not members of our NPC crew.

Resolution

Through the Autumn Equinox, a number of actions were taken to address the problems in the Mournwold. Their outcome will be dealt with in the Winter Solstice 381YE winds of fortune.

Anarchy in Miekarova

Trouble on the Road

The wagon jolted as a wheel splashed through a puddle that was deceptively deep. Radev grunted and wiped the rain from his eyes before pulling his cap forward. The rain and mud was unwelcome, but the oxen were sure footed. Besides, Radev was determined to make good time for the cart was laden with boxes of supplies for cousin Vassily and the others. Letters from home, food and other supplies that would bolster the spirits of the troops and remind them of home.

There was another jolt, and then suddenly a loud snap. The wagon lurched to the left, and Radev scrambled to keep his balance. Looking behind him, he saw one of the wheels fall away. The oxen halted. Radev jumped down and bent on one knee to take a closer look. After a moment, his expression soured. The marks were unmistakable; the axle had been partially sawn through. The jolting on the rough trod had strained it to breaking point - and beyond.

Radev looked at the road ahead of him, and behind. The rain continued to fall, and nightfall was mere hours away.

Civil Service Report

Citizens across the Varushkan territory of Miekarova are reporting encountering an increased number of malign auras of anarchy, as well as acts of sabotage and disruption. These seem to be primarily targeted at the infrastructure supporting smaller military units. The planned and coordinated nature of these events and auras speaks heavily of an unusually large, and organised, effort by an anarchy cult.

An analysis of the impact of these actions indicates that, if unchecked, these acts will significantly reduce the efficacy of military units that operate out of Miekarova. Soldiers in these units risk becoming demoralised, distracted by concerns at home, and be denied missives and supplies intended to bolster them. A small consolation is that the libertine effect of the anarchy auras has seen more impulse purchasing, which has been beneficial to businesses in the territory. However, this kind of stimulus is unsustainable.

As yet, no specific anarchist cult is claiming credit for the attacks, however these incidents follow the consecration of the Senate building to anarchy nearly two years ago, and that at least one individual condemned by the Synod has yet to face the magistrates.

The threat to Miekarova-based military units is twofold:

- The practical acts of sabotage committed by the cultists
- The use of hallowings and consecrations that affect the actions and judgment of citizens

Over the course of its history, the Empire has had to deal with a range of bandits, cultists and insurgents. Based off similar events, if nothing is done in response, then military units based out of Miekarova will experience a massive reduction in effectiveness^[1], but businesses in Miekarova will experience a moderate improvement in demand^[2]. In the past, strategies that have been employed in situations such as these include:

- A Senate Motion to recruit additional militia in an affected territory. This primarily addresses the practical acts of sabotage through prevention and apprehension of saboteurs. Disbursement of 18 Thrones would recruit sufficient militia support to reduce the disruption to military units ^[3]. Disbursement of 26 Thrones would recruit sufficient militia support to almost completely eliminate the disruption to military units ^[4]. Neither action would affect the bonus to businesses caused by auras..
- As an alternative to additional militia resources, the Senate could authorise the deployment of military units in Miekarova. A Senate-approved deployment of five military units would be able to sweep the territory for anarchists and forcibly relocate them to a neighbouring territory, i.e. Skarsind, Karov or Volodmartz. The intended relocation would need to be specified in the Senate Motion.
- During the Freedom Heresy, the Synod directed priests to lead the exorcism of blasphemous auras in Montane. A Statement of Principle made by the Varuskhan National Assembly, or a Virtue Assembly, could name a person who would be responsible for coordinating exorcism efforts. Estimates are that the person would need around 14

liao to achieve this. The disruption to military units would be reduced, but the benefit to businesses would also be reduced/eliminated[5].

- An alternative would be the creation of a multitude of auras of Vigilance to aid the citizens of Miekarova in being alert to anarchists and/or resisting the blasphemous auras. A Statement of Principle from the Assembly of Vigilance could name one of their number - capable of raising consecrations of vigilance - to coordinate the creation of virtuous auras to counter those of the anarchists. The named priest would need around 17 liao to achieve this. The auras would limit the disruption the anarchists can do to military units, but not change the impact on businesses[6]
- This anarchist sect appears to be well-organised. The ability to disrupt their leadership structure would likely limit their ability to disrupt Imperial military units [7]. However, the civil service has very little intelligence regarding this anarchist group.

The above options are the lessons learned across the history of the Empire. The civil service does not expect that this is an exhaustive or absolute list. Costings for Senate Motions, Conclave Gambits or Synod Rewardings can be requested from the civil service at the Hub. The impact of other actions taken by Imperial Citizens can also be factored into consideration.

Anarchy roleplaying effects

This is a placeholder page for content that PD are actively working on.

Overview

These roleplaying effects can be created by a person whose soul is dedicated to Anarchy using the relevant ceremonial skill. A character performing an anointing or hallow must pick one of the appropriate roleplaying effects when they perform the ceremony.

Anathemic Call of Bug and Briar

Rules

Spring Magnitude 16

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. At the end of the ritual one of the contributors is chosen to deliver the curse with a pronouncement of doom.

This effect is a curse. A target may be under more than one curse at a time.

Effects

This ritual creates a curse that is delivered to a target with a pronouncement of doom: one contributors is chosen to deliver the curse, and they must do so within fifteen minutes or it falls on their own head.

While under the curse, the target experiences a roleplaying effect; they often suffer from itchy skin, and are regularly targeted by biting or stinging insects when they are in a natural setting.

While under the curse the target loses half of any production that would have been provided by a farm, forest or herb garden resource.

The additional production provided by an enchantment such as Rampant Growth or Gathering the Harvest is not affected by this curse.

The effect of the ritual lasts for a year (until the start of the Profound Decisions Empire event four events from now).

Removing the Curse

The curse can be removed by certain powerful creatures or items.

Description

This curse focuses the fecund energies of the Spring realm onto a target, and through them onto their resources. Insects and parasites breed with frightening speed around them, and uncontrolled fertility causes rhododendrons, briars, weeds and fungi to breed at supernatural speed, overwhelming the valuable vegetation that their wealth relies on. It makes little difference if the target abandons their farm, forest, or herb garden - within a few days the same unnatural growths begin to overwhelm their new resource.

Several eternals of Spring are known to have the power to remove this curse - and to deliver their own variants of it - especially Yaw'nagrah and Llofir. Unfortunately, both are more inclined to encourage the curse than to discourage the supernatural growth it causes; it generally requires a great deal of effort to encourage them to assist. By contrast, some eternals of Winter (notably Kaela) are more than happy to help remove the effect... but this rarely leaves the resource in question any more productive.

During the Spring Equinox 381YE, then-Archmage of Spring Rosamund Holt raised a Declaration of Concord suggesting that the common name of the ritual was "stupid" and should be changed. The Imperial Conclave agreed.

Common Elements

As with many curses, this ritual often involves a recitation of the grievances against the target, casting aside food or forest resources, invoking the rune Bravash, or calling on the names of Eternals such as Yaw'nagrah or Llofir.

Annan Water

Trad. Tune here or here.

A pdf of the tune and lyrics can be found here but please learn the tune from the YouTube links first - the pdf is a memory aid and not note-perfect.

Oh Annan Water's wondrous deep And my love Ann is wondrous comely And woe that she should wet her feet Because I love her best of any. Go saddle for me the bonny grey mare Go saddle her and make her ready. For I must cross the stream tonight, Or never more I'll see my lady.

He's ridden over field and fen. O'er moor and moss and many's the mire, But the spurs of steel were sore to bite. Sparks from the mare's hoofs flew like fire. The mare flew over moor and moss, And when she's reached the Annan Water She couldn't have ridden a furlong more Had a thousand whips been laid upon her.

Chorus And woe betide you Annan Waters By night you are a gloomy river, And over you I'll build a bridge That never more true love can sever.

Oh Boatman put off your boat, Put off your boat for gold and money. For I must cross the stream tonight, Or never more I'll see my lady Oh the sides are steep, the waters deep. From bank to brae the water's pouring And the bonny grey mare she sweats for fear. She stands to hear the water roaring

And he has tried to swim the stream, And he swam on both strong and steady, But the river was deep and strength did fail, And never more he'll see his lady. Oh woe betide the willow wand, And woe betide the bush and briar, For you broke beneath my true love's hand When strength did fail and limbs did tire

Chorus And woe betide you Annan Waters By night you are a gloomy river, And over you I'll build a bridge That never more true love can sever.

Anointing

Overview

By anointing a person, the priest creates a potent personal aura on them drawn from their virtue. An anointing provides two key benefits. Firstly, it produces a roleplaying effect which will influence the way the recipient acts. Secondly, any personal aura will also provide a source of spiritual strength to overcome a malign roleplaying effect.

A character may only have one personal aura on them at once, so creating a new aura automatically replaces any existing standard aura. A stronger aura is more difficult to remove. Characters with the same virtue can cooperate to perform an anointing to create a stronger aura or to remove or replace an existing one.

Anointing is not the only way that a person may experience a powerful, personal aura. Powerful spirits, curses and some dangerous experiences have the ability to create auras, and in theory a personal aura can manifest spontaneously - although this is exceptionally rare.

Performance

- Requires a dose of liao and at least ten seconds of appropriate roleplaying
- Does not require the presence of a referee
- Requires a willing target
- The priest must choose which aura they are creating during the ceremony

Anointing a character uses a dose of liao. It requires at least ten seconds of appropriate roleplaying to perform the ceremony and target must be close enough to touch throughout. The target must be willing. If they are unwilling or unaware of the purpose of the ceremony, it fails.

After you anoint a character, they are infused with a standard personal aura that makes them subject to a roleplaying effect chosen by you. You can choose one aura from the list available for the virtue you are dedicated to.

Effects

- Anointing creates a personal aura on a character
- Given appropriate aura card to the target and show them the aura you have chosen
- The aura provides a source of spiritual strength for overcoming roleplaying effects
- The effect lasts until the start of the next Profound Decisions Empire event
- Orcs can be the subject of an anointing

Anointing a character creates a personal aura that lasts until the start of the next Profound Decisions event. A character can only be under the effect of one personal aura at a time. The strength of the aura determines how hard it is to remove or replace the aura.

When you anoint a character you must give the target an aura card - and indicate which one of the four auras available you have chosen to create. Aura cards are freely available in GOD for anyone playing a priest dedicated to a virtue with the anointing skill, you can collect them at any time. They exist so that you can give an aura card to the target when you perform an anointing - the card is entirely OOC and has no game effect until one or more doses of liao are used to create the aura.

Removal

- Anointing lasts until the start of the next Profound Decisions Empire event, or until removed or replaced.
- The anointing skill can be used to remove a personal aura.

As with any aura, you can only be under the effect of one personal aura at once. Any character with the anointing skill (including one who is not dedicated to a Virtue) may replace an existing aura by creating a new one or they may use the skill purely to remove an existing anointing.

Auras by virtue

Ambition

Courage

Loyalty

Pride

Prosperity

Vigilance

Wisdom

The anointing skill can also be used to remove personal auras arising from other sources, including those created by some enchancements such as The Conspirator's Cloak.

A durable aura is more difficult to remove - it can only be replaced or removed by multiple characters cooperating to create an anointing of equal or higher strength.

True Liao

- True liao can be used in place of liao to perform the anointing ceremony

You can use true liao in place of normal liao to perform an anointing ceremony. This will create a true aura, the aura is permanent - it will last at least as long as the character is alive and perhaps even longer than that.

Anthem of Cantiarth's Hold

A pdf of the lyrics and music can be found here.

To the tune of Gaudete (trad), words by Cassiel of Cantiarth's Hold.

Cantiarch, raise your sword against your foeman Side by side, in Virtues name we shall stand
Cantiarch, raise your sword against your foeman Side by side, in Virtues name we shall stand

Let our soldiers show their pride as they march to battle, Victors strong and standing tall, they are no man's chattel.

Cantiarch, raise your sword against your foeman Side by side, in Virtues name we shall stand
Cantiarch, raise your sword against your foeman Side by side, in Virtues name we shall stand

Let their courage know no bounds, death claims those who falter, Act in full or bear the shame, whether word or slaughter.

Cantiarch, raise your sword against your foeman Side by side, in Virtues name we shall stand
Cantiarch, raise your sword against your foeman Side by side, in Virtues name we shall stand

Lead them boldly from the fore, show your heart's ambition, Willing hearts the greatest fuel, dreams will bring ignition.

Cantiarch, raise your sword against your foeman Side by side, in Virtues name we shall stand
Cantiarch, raise your sword against your foeman Side by side, in Virtues name we shall stand

Loyalty can only show, when the lights are fading, When darkness comes and men despair, be the beacon guiding.

Cantiarch, raise your sword against your foeman Side by side, in Virtues name we shall stand
Cantiarch, raise your sword against your foeman Side by side, in Virtues name we shall stand

True wealth comes with hardest work, only strong men prosper, Those in need should earn thy aid, strength in turn they'll foster.

Cantiarch, raise your sword against your foeman Side by side, in Virtues name we shall stand
Cantiarch, raise your sword against your foeman Side by side, in Virtues name we shall stand

Ever vigilant he stands, he who guards the tower, Though his watch is cold alone, in his eyes the power.

Cantiarch, raise your sword against your foeman Side by side, in Virtues name we shall stand
Cantiarch, raise your sword against your foeman Side by side, in Virtues name we shall stand

Learn the path that no man walked, knowledge ever growing, Share the truths that you have learned, seeds of wisdom sowing.

Cantiarch, raise your sword against your foeman Side by side, in Virtues name we shall stand
Cantiarch, raise your sword against your foeman Side by side, in Virtues name we shall stand

Anvil Hospital & Imperial School of Medicine (Redirected from Anvil Field Hospital)

Overview

The Anvil Hospital and Imperial School of Imperial Medicine is an Imperial sodality dedicated to the protection and promotion of the healing arts.

The School produces a memorandum twice a year that includes updates and news items on what is happening in the medical community within the Empire, articles on various medical matters and so on. This pamphlet can be picked up for just a few rings. In addition, the School runs frequent medical lectures. There is a small charge for entrance to these lectures for non-members and for lecture materials (provided by the lecturer), a portion of this fee going to the School and the rest to the lecturer themselves.

The School collates and prints the Guide to Medicine. This bound volume is the authoritative edition of all things medical within the Empire, and covers every herb, potion, recipe, healing ritual and wound in the game, together with details on various and specific threats, how to deal with traumatic wounds, and so on. Copies can be purchased directly from the Hospital. The School also publishes, and will help publish, other texts, treatise, and other materials relevant to medicine and medical treatment at Anvil and the wider Empire.

The sodality also has its own dedicated website which contains an overview of how the venture works, a comprehensive library of IC texts, and an online database of all things medical in Empire.

The Imperial School of Medicine

The Imperial School of Medicine is the administrative body of the venture. The school has several functions which include running the Hospital, protecting the interests of the profession, promoting training in the healing arts with the Academy, presenting regular lectures, making representations to the Senate where necessary and operating a herb bank which allows members to trade herbs at preferential rates.

This School of Medicine is open to all citizens of the Empire and has a membership fee which goes toward the running of the institution. In return a member receives a number of benefits, details of which can be found in the Members section of our website.

The Anvil Hospital

The Anvil Hospital (field hospital) is the business end of the institution. It is funded, run and administrated by the School of Medicine and provides healing to the citizens of the Empire, and especially to those soldiers returning from the battlefield who are in need of treatment. The Hospital has a permanent home by the Sentinel Gate and is marked by a flag bearing the Hospital symbol; the blood rune Rhyv on a white background.

Any medic of skill and dedication is welcome to come and help out in the Hospital, and those who work there give their services freely. You do not have to be a member of the School of Medicine to benefit from or work within the Hospital, and whilst the Hospital is glad to receive donations of people's time, money, or herbs, it does not charge for its services; all citizens of the Empire are entitled to receive free healing.

History

The Anvil Hospital was created in the chaotic years following Britta's death in 376. Concerned citizens of the Empire banded together to create the institution and it quickly grew from there.

Following a vote from the Senate during the Spring Equinox of 377YE the School of Medicine was awarded a one-off lump sum of money. This was used to upgrade members' herbs gardens, providing a permanent source of herbs for the Anvil Hospital. Although the disbursement by the Senate provided the Hospital with Imperial recognition, it does not affect its independent status - the Hospital and the School are not subject to the Imperial Senate or the civil service.

The Anvil Field Hospital operates from a tent which is permanently sited next to the Sentinel Gate. Anyone seeking the Imperial School of Medicine or the Hospital is best advised to go there first.

To ensure broad support from across the Empire, the sodality is managed by a board, comprised of one representative from each of the ten nations. The School of Medicine does not elect or appoint the board members; a representative is chosen by the medics of each nation by whatever means they deem fit. The board decide on the day to day running of the School and the Anvil Hospital, vote on changes and dictate direction. Any citizen of the Empire may request a matter be brought before the board by speaking with their national representative.

In addition to the board, the Hospital is served by the three non-executive positions, a bursar, chancellor, and librarian. These positions can only advise the board. They have no voting rights, they exist to ensure continuity as the board members change, and to handle the background administration and costs of the venture.

Surgical skills (Redirected from Apothecary)

Surgical Skills

- You cannot use any surgical skills on yourself
- Surgical skills require both hands free and your attention on your patient

Chirurgion

- You must purchase chirurgion before you can take any other surgical skills

If you spend at least 30 seconds of appropriate roleplaying treating a character who is bleeding to death, then you can restore a single lost hit. The bleeding character's death count is paused while you treat them. This skill has no effect on a character who is not on zero hits. You must complete this time without being interrupted. If your character is a physick, you may also apply a single herb during this time.

Physick

- You can use appropriate roleplaying to treat a range of conditions
- You can also apply herbs to an affected character to treat them
- You cannot use this skill on yourself

If you spend at least 2 minutes of appropriate roleplaying treating a character then you may restore the use of a limb ruined by the CLEAVE or IMPALE call or treat the effects of a traumatic wound. Some traumatic wounds require longer than 2 minutes of treatment, as directed by the trauma card.

If you spend at least	Herb	Benefit
3 minutes of	Bladeroot	Removes the WEAKNESS condition
	Cerulean Mazzarine	Repairs a ruined limb
	Imperial Roseweald	Removes the VENOM condition
	Marrowort	Allows a character to ignore the roleplaying effects of traumatic wounds
	True Vervain	Restores all lost hits to a character who is not dying

appropriate roleplaying treating a character who is terminal then you may allow the character to act as if they are not in pain.

If you spend at least 5 minutes of appropriate roleplaying treating a character who is wounded then they regain all lost global hits after ten minutes of rest and relaxation. This roleplaying can only be performed in a tent or similar building suited for use as a physick's chamber - it cannot be performed on a battlefield.

You can also use this skill to attempt to diagnose what is wrong with a patient. You must ask a ref if there is anything else you can tell about your patient, and what you can do to fix the problem.

You can also apply medicinal herbs directly to a patient to treat them. There are five herbs in Empire, each can be used to treat a different effect. You must spend at least 10 seconds of appropriate roleplaying to apply a herb, but it is possible to apply a single herb while spending thirty seconds treating a character using the chirurgion skill.

Herbs are produced by a herb garden, and are measured in drams. Any character can choose to start with a herb garden, which is a personal resource. A starting herb garden produces fourteen herbs per event, six drams of True Vervain and two of each of the others.

Apothecary

- Herbs can be mixed to produce a potion that can be taken by any character

You are able to mix herbs together at an event to produce a potion that recreates the effects of the herbs but that can be drunk by any character. It requires five seconds of appropriate roleplaying to drink a potion.

This skill gives you the ability to mix all five of the Apothecary Potions automatically. You can take the extra recipe skill to learn how to make additional potions.

Extra Recipe

You can choose one additional recipe set of potions that your character knows how to make each time you purchase this skill.

Apothecary Potions

Every apothecary knows how to mix these five essential preparations. They allow the drinker to gain medicinal aid without needing the personal attention of a physick.

Anodyne Analgesic

Replacing the more cumbersome Anodyne Embrocation, this potent elixir numbs pain, and helps clear and focus the mind of the drinker. The philtre is not without its dangers; while it allows the imbiber to overcome many of the effects of a traumatic injury, it does nothing to actually treat the effects of such wounds. More than one soldier has dropped dead after using the potion to allow them to ignore a serious condition that required immediate medical attention. It can also be used to alleviate the symptoms of painful medical conditions such as inflamed joints, arthritis and rheumatism, but the cost of doing so with a potion tends to place this option outside the reach of all save the most wealthy.

- Form: Philtre.
- Description: This dark blue elixir has a gritty, slightly sandy texture. It smells strongly of freshly cut grass. Put a tiny drop on your finger or your tongue, and the tip quickly becomes numb.
- Roleplaying Effects: The liquid numbs the pain of your injuries, and provides an invigoration that quickly clears your mind.
- Mechanical Effects: You can overcome the roleplaying effect of a single traumatic wound of your choice until the end of the current engagement.
- Recipe: One dram of Marrowort and one dram of True Vervain.

Contents

- 1 Anodyne Analgesic
- 2 Bloodharrow Philtre
- 3 Elixir Vitae
- 4 Feverfail Elixir
- 5 Ossean Solution

Bloodharrow Philtre

A thin, slightly toxic elixir that harrows the blood of the one who drinks it. After a moment or two of agonising pain, the body is purged of venom, and of some minor poisons.

- Form/Description: Philtre.
- Form/Description: This translucent red liquid has tiny white particles suspended in it. It has a spicy scent, and a tiny amount on your tongue or your finger tingles unpleasantly for a moment.
- Roleplaying Effects: Pain spreads rapidly through your body; you feel as if your blood is on fire. After a moment or two, the pain fades.
- Mechanical Effects: You lose the venom condition.
- Recipe: One dram Imperial Roseweald and one dram of Marrowort

Elixir Vitae

This potent healing elixir captures the essence of True Vervain to restore health and vitality. It is a common preparation in the Empire, carried by warriors and healers alike, and many can identify the clear, slightly sticky liquid on sight.

- Form: Philtre
- Description: This translucent liquid is tinted a pale blue-green. It has a clean, fresh scent. A tiny drop of the sticky fluid on your tongue or your finger tingles pleasantly for a moment.
- Roleplaying Effects: A warm glow spreads quickly through your body, removing pain, revitalising your spirit and creating a sense of enormous well-being.
- Mechanical Effects: You regain up to three lost hits.
- Recipe: One dram of True Vervain and one dram of Cerulean Mazzarine.

Feverfail Elixir

This elixir drives out the lingering effects of enervation. It is occasionally useful in treating symptoms that include excessive tiredness or dizziness.

- Form: Philtre.

- Description: This translucent grey liquid smells faintly of spring flowers. A tiny drop of the thick, syrupy fluid on your tongue causes a grimace - it tastes a little like spoiled milk.
- Roleplaying Effects: You feel nauseous. A dizzying chill spreads through your body, leaving you incapacitated for a few moments. Both effects clear as quickly as they arose, leaving you feeling revitalised.
- Mechanical Effects: You lose the weakness condition.
- Recipe: One dram of Bladeroot and one dram of Imperial Roseweald.

Ossean Solution

For centuries, the Ossean Balm was used to rapidly restore ruined limbs. Recently, however, a method of distilling the essential power of that salve into liquid form was perfected by Navarr apothecaries, giving rise to the Ossean Elixir. When the philtre is drunk by someone who has been seriously injured, with more than one limb crippled, it tends to repair the limb that is most advantageous to the imbiber - a feature that intrigues some apothecaries. There is fierce debate in some circles about how the potion "knows" which limb to heal - how it knows that someone wishing to flee needs their leg repaired rather than their arm for example. Most apothecaries and physicks simply shrug and point out that this is just a tendency - that there are also harrowing stories of the philtre restoring the "wrong" limb with tragic consequences.

- Form: Philtre
- Description: This thick, odourless, blue liquid has a gritty texture. When you rub it between finger and thumb it leaves a crusty residue that soon flakes away. It tastes disgusting.
- Roleplaying Effects: You feel a numbness spreading through the flesh of your ruined limb as the torn ligaments and broken bones fuse together.
- Mechanical Effects: You regain the use of a single limb that has been ruined by cleave or impale.
- Recipe: One dram of Cerulean Mazzarine and one dram of Bladeroot.

Older Potions

In the past, these powerful philtres were brewed as less concentrated preparations, and were liquids or salves. In character, new recipes have been introduced and embraced by apothecaries that make the process of brewing these old potions obsolete.

Any player who has one of the old potions, represented by a laminated slip, can bring it to GOD and swap it for one of the new philtre cards.

Anodyne Embrocation

This analgesic body rub numbs pain, and the strong scent helps to clear the mind when rubbed firmly into the skin. It can also be used to alleviate the symptoms of painful medical conditions such as inflamed joints, arthritis and rheumatism, but the cost of doing so with a potion tends to place this option outside the reach of all save the most wealthy.

Appoint Senate auditor

To request an Auditor to be chosen by full Synod by whichever means the Synod see fit to audit accounts of Senators to whom funds have been supplied by Senate vote, auditor to then report back to the Senate.

Proposed by Astalot, seconded by Semmerholm.

Overview

- Create an Auditor of Senatorial Accountability with responsibility to investigate Imperial Senators.
- Passed with one vote against

Date

- Passed Spring 377YE (Event Two 2013).

Cost

- None

Legal Ramifications

- This position has a responsibility to investigate Senate expenditure and report to the Senate
- The Senate has not chosen to assign any legal authority to this position
- The Senate has not chosen to assign a stipend to this position

The civil service opinion is that there are a range of legal powers that might have been considered appropriate to this position. As the title is assigned by the Synod, the auditor could have been granted the authority to use inquisition on members of the Imperial Senate. The position could have been given the authority to address the Senate. Additional Senate votes would now be required to grant any additional powers to this position.

Election

- Synod General Assembly Appointment

The title is elected by the General Assembly of the Imperial Synod, and once chosen will serve for life, until they resign or until revoked by the General Assembly or Assembly of Nine.

The first election of the Auditor of Senatorial Accountability takes place at the Autumn Equinox 377YE.

Appoint trade envoys

To appoint ambassadors to foreign nations to pursue trade in bulk raw materials. Ambassadors to be appointed to the Principalities of Jarm, the Asavean Archipelago, Faraden, the Commonwealth and the Sumaah Republic. Results to be presented for Senate approval at the next meeting.

Proposed by Tassato, seconded by Temeschwar.

Overview

- Ambassadors to be appointed to the Principalities of Jarm, the Asavean Archipelago, Faraden, the Commonwealth and the Sumaah Republic.

Date

- Passed unanimously Spring 377 (Event Two 2013).

Cost

- None

Constitution

- This motion should have been presented as five separate motions so that senators could vote individually
- These positions have a responsibility to initiate trade with the foreign nation
- The Senate has not chosen to assign any powers or functions to these positions
- The Senate has not chosen to assign any money to support these positions

Progress

The purpose of these positions appears to be closer to trade envoys, than to actual ambassadors - the Senate appears to wish these positions to find a way to allow the Empire to trade for bulk raw materials with neighbouring powers.

The civil service have provided those appointed with the names of known contacts in the foreign powers so that they may initiate communication with them via Winged Messenger.

It is possible that a trade embassy might be built to allow regular trade to be automated. This would require significant investment of bulk resources - the civil service strongly recommend that this construction does not begin without firm agreements with a foreign power on trade terms first.

Election

At the event the following people were appointed to these positions by the Senate.

- Constanza Barassadi di Tassato of the league for the Principalities of Jarm
- Adnanna Dionati of the League for the Asavean Archipelago
- Braganza i Arco of the Brass Coast for the Faraden

Appointment

The Synod will establish assemblies that each may know their virtue and select the most virtuous amongst them to lead.

Imperial Constitution

Overview

The judgement of appointment allows the Synod to choose a citizen to hold an Imperial title for a year or more. It is a standard method of appointment that forms one of the well worn paths for election available to the Senate when they create a new Imperial title.

A judgement of appointment may only be submitted by the Tribune of the Synod - rather than by a member of the Synod. Candidates who wish to be considered for the position make themselves known to the Tribune. Once they have done this, any member of the appropriate assembly is eligible to vote for them.

Judgement

Each Imperial title that is appointed by the Synod specifies which assembly the title is appointed by. Any title that is re-elected annually will also specify when the election occurs. At the summit, any citizen who is eligible for the position may approach the Tribune to indicate they wish to be considered for the title. The Tribune will then raise a judgement in the appropriate assembly asking the the Synod to judge the appointment.

Once the judgement is submitted by the Tribune, any citizen who is eligible can have the Tribune add their name to the judgement. Members of the Synod may vote at any time, casting their votes for a single candidate named on the judgement.

The Tribune will use their discretion to choose the appropriate deadline for the election, normally this will be 6pm on the second day of the summit, provided that the nominations begin on the Friday. A judgement of appointment is not subject to further scrutiny by the cardinals; the deadline for voting on a judgement raised by the Tribune may not be moved. Voting continues until the deadline unless there is primacy or the civil service determines that a greater majority has been achieved.

A candidate for appointment may withdraw at any time. If they are the only candidate for the title, then the judgement will be withdrawn. Any votes that are recorded for the candidate will not be counted (though Synod members may change their vote) - a candidate may not give their votes to another candidate.

If no nominee comes forward for a position, the Tribune will not raise a judgement of appointment for the position.

Outcome

Having a beard doesn't make you wise.

A judgement of appointment does not need a greater majority to succeed - Marcher Proverb - whichever candidate has the most votes wins. If two citizens are tied for votes, then nobody wins the election and a new judgement must be raised to appoint the title.

Once the election is confirmed, the Tribune will inform the Overseer of Imperial elections of the result and the winner assumes the prerogatives of their office.

Current Titles

The following Imperial titles are elected by the priests of the Synod using a judgement of appointment.

Appointments by the Senate

This is a placeholder page for content that PD are actively working on.

Overview

The Imperial Senate has the authority to make a number of important appointments. The most significant is The Throne, but the Senate is also responsible for appointing the generals of the Imperial armies. In addition it is common for the Senate to create new Imperial titles which are in turn appointed by the Senate, though it is easiest if they follow the well worn paths laid down by the constitution.

Imperial Position

Imperial positions are usually the most important positions made by the Senate. These titles can have far reaching powers that affect everyone in the Empire and are likely to have responsibilities that concern the Empire as a whole.

Appointment

To elect a citizen to an Imperial position appointed by the Senate requires a member of the Senate to raise a motion of appointment for that position. The election does not happen immediately, instead the motion of appointment is announced by the Speaker for the Senate at the session where it is submitted but the election takes place at the following session to give senators time to arrange their own candidates. When new Imperial titles that are appointed by the Senate are created, it is traditional for the Speaker to immediately raise an administrative vote to carry out an election for the position.

At the following session, the proposer will present their opening address, then the Speaker invites every member of the Senate with the power of proposal to nominate a candidate if they wish. After all nominations are concluded there is a short period for the candidates to speak and answer questions, and then the motion concludes with a vote.

Because of the constitutional implications, election to the Throne require a two-thirds majority vote of the Senate, as does any Imperial position appointed by the Senate which required a constitutional vote to create. Any other position appointed by the Senate only requires a simple majority.

If an Imperial position is vacant, then it remains vacant until a new motion is raised to hold an election and appoint a candidate. Some titles effectively lapse when the holder dies because of this rule.

If the Imperial Synod veto a motion of appointment, then that appointment cannot be raised again that summit.

Selection

Any Imperial citizen may hold an Imperial position, provided it is the only Imperial title they control.

Some Imperial positions are held for a year. This means that the citizen serves for a year from the summit where they were appointed. Such a position becomes eligible for reappointment at the equivalent summit one year later. The Senate may pass a motion of appointment at any time during that summit. The incumbent remains in position until they are replaced or the end of the summit - whichever comes sooner.

Example, Earl Marguerite D'Alicer is appointed by Senate motion to the Imperial position of Minister of Historical Research at the Spring Equinox 378YE. They will serve for a year from this point, the title becomes eligible for reappointment at the Spring Equinox 379YE unless the Earl dies, steps down, or is revoked before that date. The Imperial Senate may pass a motion to reappoint the title at any point from the start of the Spring Equinox 379YE summit onwards. The Earl serves as Minister until the end of that summit or until replaced by the Senate during the summit.

Other Imperial titles have tenure. The title is held until the citizen dies or steps down.

 - 3.2 Selection
 - 3.3 Removal

 - 5.2 Additional Information

Removal

Imperial positions are subject to revocation by the General Assembly and the Assembly of the Nine of the Imperial Synod. The position becomes vacant and is eligible for reappointment immediately. If the Senate chooses to reappoint the incumbent then this is still considered to be a new appointment - this means that they serve their full term from the point where the new motion passes, and are still subject to revocation by the Synod.

National Position

National positions are only eligible to citizens of that nation and usually they have responsibilities that concern only that nation. They are usually less important than most Imperial positions and less likely to concern the Senate as a whole. Consequently there are mechanisms in place to allow the nation to choose the title holder without recourse to the entire Senate.

Appointment

A vacant national position may be appointed at any time by a unanimous vote of the senators of that nation. To succeed, the vote requires the support of a senator of every territory of that nation in the Empire. If a senator is not available, or one has not been appointed, then the position cannot be filled in this way.

There is no time-limit for the senators to make a decision, they may continue to deliberate and arrange matters amongst themselves for as long as they wish. The appointment takes place at the point where all the senators confirm a single agreed candidate with the civil service.

The alternative is that any member of the Senate may raise a motion of appointment for that position. The process then proceeds as normal.

Selection

Only Imperial citizens of the appropriate nation are legally entitled to take up an Imperial title that is a national position, regardless of how the position is elected. A Freeborn senator may raise a motion to appoint a Highborn general - but to be constitutionally legal, the candidate they any nominations must be Highborn.

Removal

Most national positions, particularly sinecures, are for life, the incumbent serves until they die or are revoked.

Almost all national positions are subject to revocation by the General Assembly, Assembly of Nine, and the appropriate National Assembly of the Imperial Synod.

Senatorial Appointment

In the chaotic years that followed the death of Britta, a number of motions were passed to create titles that were directly appointed by a single senator. After studying the records, the Constitutional Court have issued further guidance that such appointments are not constitutional - the existing titles remain - but it is not possible to create a new Imperial title that is appointed by a single senator.

Appointments to the Senate

Senate Appointments

- The Throne is occupied by an Emperor or Empress.
- The senators, one for each Imperial territory.
- The Conscience of the Senate is appointed by the Cardinal of the Assembly of the Way

Related Appointments

- The Master of the Imperial Mint is chosen by public auction; it is available only to League citizens, and advises the Senate on economic matters.
- The Speaker for the Senate is a civil service position; the speaker helps run Senate sittings

Sanctions

The Speaker for the Senate can censure anyone in the Senate during a sitting who acts in an inappropriate or disruptive fashion. There are three sanctions the Speaker can apply, each more serious than the last: Silence, Exclusion and Expulsion.

The Throne

The Throne may speak, vote and raise motion as a senator does and has a variety of powers which modify the functions of the Senate.

The Throne has the right to speak and the right to address, to vote, assign budgets, and to abstain if they choose, They may also raise a motion and allocate a budget.

Proxies

Any member of the Senate, bar the Throne, may appoint a proxy.

Apprentice's Blade

Description

An Apprentice's Blade is often the first item crafted by a young artisan at the beginning of their career. While they require only the most trivial amount of orichalcum ore be worked into the metal, the process of creating the correct alloy is very time-consuming. Most apprentices have to begin the process several times, melting the blade back down again, painstakingly extracting the precious ore, and alloying the steel all over again. Once the proportions needed to create the alloy are correct, the metal must be folded and refolded hundreds of times in a seemingly never-ending series of forging and quenching and hammering.

Completing one of these weapons is often a rite of passage; even the most dour master must admit that a crafter who can create one of these items is an apprentice no longer. Mastering the art of crafting this item is often considered proof that the artisan possesses self-discipline, due respect for the materials, and the ability to undertake complex crafting processes.

The Wintermark rune Jotra is sometimes engraved into the pommel of an Apprentice's Blade, or more commonly onto the scabbard that holds the weapon. They are sometimes called a Banner-bearer's Desperation among the Winterfolk, as they are often used by banner-bearers caught in dangerous circumstances.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of a one-handed weapon.
- Requirement: Any character can bond to this item.
- Effect: You may spend a hero point to call CLEAVE with this one-handed weapon.
- Materials: Crafting an Apprentice's Blade requires no special materials. It takes two months to make one of these items.

"Look boy, the price is ten crowns, take it or leave it. I'm not dropping the price for a prince, let alone a guttersnipe like you."

"Seven Crowns is all I have, take it and leave me the blade, or things will go badly for you."

"Are you threatening me boy? Oh I see, you've hired yourself a bravo. And she's going to seal this deal for you is she? Well why don't I give you a little demonstration of why my steel is worth ten crowns."

"Don't be a fool, you're a blacksmith not a warrior. You can't possibly fight my cicisbeo. Take the 7 crowns, it's a good offer."

"Boy, just because your hired thug is fucking you, doesn't make her a cicisbeo. She's a pretty lass, but if her hand draws that sword, then ambition take me, I'll take her bloody arm off."

"Don't make threats you can't keep blacksmith. Take the pouch, leave the sword, walk away. I'll let you chalk it up to experience."

The bravo's blade darted from her scabbard as she lunged forward to strike, eager to pierce the blacksmith's heart. Giorno had none of the bravo's speed but he staggered to his left and the strike took him in the shoulder. He screamed in agony, and lashed out with the sword in his hand letting the red hot fire of the wound fuel his anger. He had little skill with arms but he poured his strength and his pain into the blade feeding the magic he'd locked there. The bravo was already darting back, but not before the sword fell across her forearm. Across it and then through it, as the eager magic chewed into the muscle and the bone. The Bravo dropped to the floor screaming and clutching the bloodied stump of her ruined hand.

"I'll keep my sword and I'll keep your pouch boy. Seven crowns will pay for a physick to treat the wound your thug just gave me. And a lesson for you about smithing. The apprentice's sword is ten crowns, and it's worth every ring of that. It might be a simple enchantment, but it's the best enchantment to have if you don't know how to fight but you've got some fire in your soul. I'll let you chalk that up to experience."

Apprentice Ability

Any character who has no skills (either because they have not yet spent any exp, or because they are a child) can utilize the apprentice ability. This ability allows them to use any skill provided they are being actively instructed by another character who knows that skill.

An apprentice can only use a skill under the close supervision of another character who knows that skill. The supervisor must roleplay providing direction and instruction and cannot use any other abilities of any kind. They must be able to use the skill themselves at the time so they must not be restrained, dying or terminal. The apprentice gains all the benefits of the skill use, rather than the character supervising them.

In the event that the apprentice is participating in a ritual, then the supervisor's coven bond is used rather than their own. If the apprentice is casting a spell or using a heroic ability, then the supervisor's mana or hero points are used.

The apprentice ability exists to enhance the roleplaying of tuition and instruction and to provide more opportunities to get young players involved in the game in areas that require skills, such as alchemy. There are no mechanical benefits provided by the apprentice ability.

Appropriate roleplaying

- Many abilities require appropriate roleplaying to use

All religious, magical and heroic skills require appropriate roleplaying to use. The roleplaying can be anything that is appropriate to your characterization and to the ability that you are using. Most skills of this kind require some audible speech or noise as part of the roleplaying. For example, you are using the heroic skill that allows you to break an enemies bones with your great sword. The appropriate roleplaying is a blow that you roleplay being swung with great force and perhaps a war-cry or an almighty groan of exertion.

Arcane Architect

Overview

The Arcane Architect is an Imperial title appointed by the Imperial Conclave. The title was created by the Imperial Senate during the Autumn Equinox 379YE.

When the title was initially created, it had an unlimited power to commission the construction of mana structures. The Senate amended the power to once per season as part of an administrative motion.

Responsibilities

The Arcane Architect is responsible for supporting the ritual magicians of the Empire in virtuous application of mana.

Powers

Commission construction of mana structures

Once per summit, the Arcane Architect can commission the construction of structures that will produce crystal mana. The materials required for construction are provided by the Arcane Architect. Each such commission automatically creates a sinecures, one that is appointed by Declaration of Candidacy. These titles must be Imperial titles, rather than national titles (meaning they can be held by any citizen). As with any other title appointed through the Imperial Conclave, these subsidiary titles cannot be revoked by any assembly of the Imperial Synod.

To use this power, the Arcane Architect provides an announcement to the Civil Service, and then presents the announcement to the Senate. No voting is possible by the Senate at this point, as the power has been delegated to the Arcane Architect. The Imperial Synod may, however, choose to exercise their veto over the Arcane Architect's commission.

Address the Conclave

Once per summit, the Architect can raise an address to the agenda of a Conclave session for free.

Toad Wand

During the Winter Solstice 379YE, the eternal Sadogua pledged to provide a magic item to the Arcane Architect. This item takes the form of a wand surmounted by a toad. Sadogua has pledged to re-empower the wand every year during the Winter solstice, as long as he enjoys the amity of the Imperial Conclave. The powers of the wand have not been made public knowledge.

Appointment

The appointment, replacement, or removal of the Architect is made by the declaration of candidacy as part of a Conclave session. Any Imperial citizen may hold the title.

The Arcane Architect serves until they are replaced by another magician using the Declaration of Candidacy. As a title in the Conclave, they cannot be revoked.

Arcane Mark

Realm: Autumn

Magnitude: 2

Performing the ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets a character, who must be present throughout. The target character must possess the magician skill and be willing to receive the arcane mark.

Effects

This ritual places an enduring magical mark on the target character which can be perceived only with magical detection. The mark created by this spell takes the form of the symbol for one of the current conclave orders, as chosen by the target. If a conclave order is dissolved, its associated arcane mark vanishes from every individual who possesses it.

An arcane mark can be detected by a detect magic spell cast on the character for that specific purpose (a detect magic spell cast for any other purpose does not reveal the mark). If the caster of the detect magic bears the same arcane mark as the target they discover that their marks are the same; otherwise they only discover that the target has an arcane mark.

A character can have only one arcane mark at a time - subsequent casting of the ritual replaces a previous mark. It is possible to perform this ritual with the intent of creating "no mark" to remove an existing arcane mark without replacing it.

The arcane mark is not restricted to any part of the target's body; it cannot be hidden from detection by covering it up.

The arcane mark remains until it is replaced; it may persist even through death.

Additional Magnitude

This ritual can affect additional characters from the same coven. Each additional character increases the magnitude by 1. Additional characters must be present throughout, and all characters targeted by the ritual receive the same arcane mark.

Description

This ritual is used when joining a Conclave order. The ritual was adapted in the first years of the Conclave by Urizen magicians building on existing formulaic rituals that allowed the caster to mark the target as a member of a specific magical group; by expanding the range of targets and clever use of hearth magics involving identity and the nature of being an Imperial citizen, a ritual that allowed any Imperial citizen to mark any magician with the mark of one of the defined magical orders was created.

A fascinating element of the ritual is that the purely political decisions of the Imperial Senate directly affect it. When a new order is formally created, or an existing order is destroyed, the marks change appropriately. There has been talk for some time among some members of the Unfettered Mind about an experiment to see what would happen if the Senate formally changed the symbol of an existing order - their assumption is that the symbol created with this ritual would change to match. So far, concerns that doing so might effectively dissolve the existing order have meant that they have been unable to get support for their experiment.

Other magicians have drawn parallels between this ritual and the testimony of a priest. The parallels appear superficial; the arcane mark is not visible to a priest using the ceremony of insight, or a mystic consuming Ravenwing Infusion; it is visible only to magical detections such as detect magic or to those employing Magpie Infusion. Even then, magical detection only allows the mark to be seen if the caster specifically uses the spell in that fashion, and when they do no other information is uncovered by their detection.

It is not uncommon for the order the target wishes to join to pay the mana crystal needed to perform the ritual, especially when someone is an established magician changing an order for some reason. Some grandmasters try to organise meetings where several candidates can have the ritual performed on them at the same time, cutting down the amount of mana required to bring a group of new members into their order and adding to the drama of the experience.

A mark has a wider context than just showing a person to be a member of an order; divination magic grounded in the lore of Day can be used to discover basic information about people who bear the same arcane mark as one of the contributors in the nearby vicinity. The civil service perform this ritual at the start of each summit as part of their task to provide the grandmaster of each order with a list of members of their order.

An unknown number of other versions of this ritual exist - some cults and secret societies use related rituals to create specific marks that are not compatible with the mark created by this ritual. In each case, these rituals create a single mark and are jealously guarded secrets.

OOO note

A new character with the magician skill can join the order of their choice when they are created without needing access to the ritual; they are assumed to have been able to find the required mana crystal and someone to perform the ritual for them.

It is not possible to 'falsify' an arcane mark, whether one created by this ritual or a similar ritual. For example, if a secret order uses a variant of arcane mark to mark out their members, the only way to duplicate that mark is to through that specific formulaic ritual. It is possible for an Imperial citizen to spontaneously perform this ritual, however, as the ritual is part of Imperial lore.

It is important to note that this ritual does not create any sort of bond.

Performing the ritual

Many magicians prefer to perform this ritual in the Hall of Worlds; some magicians say it strengthens the bond between the target and the magical order. The target often makes a point of touching or associating themselves with a physical symbol of the order; it's common for Navarr to cut or trace a stylised version of the symbol onto the skin of the target, while many Urizen and Highborn prefer to receive the ritual from someone who is already a member of their preferred order, strengthening bonds of connection and loyalty. Lann is often evoked during the performance, as are the virtues of Loyalty, Pride and Ambition (and the associated paragons and exemplars).

A common thread in any casting is that the target recites a short catechism, or makes a short statement, about their belief in magic and why they choose to join this order. Some rituals involve recitation of the manifesto of the order, or an almost Hermetic series of questions and answers between the ritualists and the targets.

Arcane projection

Overview

It is possible to create a magical effect without performing a formulaic ritual. Creating an impromptu magical effect is commonly referred to as performing spontaneous magic or less correctly as a spontaneous ritual. Spontaneous magic is difficult and costly, partly because it is not possible to master a spontaneous magic effect as a magician might with a formulaic ritual that is part of Imperial lore. The advantage of spontaneous magic is the wide flexibility it gives a coven or master magician. With it, they can perform unique feats and explore the boundaries of magical theory.

Unlike a formulaic ritual, spontaneous magic is very rough-and-ready. A formulaic ritual has been carefully created and rigorously tested so that it can be reliably cast again and again. No such benefit exists when performing spontaneous magic. Many formulaic rituals include options such as using orichalcum in place of crystal mana or beggar's lye to reduce the magnitude. This is not possible with spontaneous magic; likewise, it is impossible to use ilium to to make a spontaneous ritual effect permanent.

It is not possible to simply create a spontaneous effect. Significant preparation is required during which a magician explores various theories, considers the techniques used to create other similar rituals, and tries to take into account the many variables that might effect the flow of magic during an impromptu performance. In addition to the time involved, a preparation requires ten mana crystals to create, although this magic is then available to perform the spontaneous ritual. The result of this investment of time and mana is an arcane projection.

Players interested in performing a spontaneous effect should make sure they read through the information on ritual theory.

Arcane Projection

- An arcane projection is a magical text that contains the basis for a spontaneous magic effect
- Only the magician or coven that holds the projection can attempt the effect
- A projection lasts until it used
- A projection is consumed once it is cast
- Ritual theory summarizes the known lore of what is and is not possible with a ritual

An arcane projection is a magical text that contains the information and some of the power needed to create a spontaneous magic effect. The projection is essential for completing the magic; only the magician or coven that has possession of the projection can attempt the spontaneous effect described. The contributors must still have sufficient ranks to perform the effect, the projection merely allows them to make the attempt.

Any magician can attempt to create an arcane projection. Doing so requires several weeks of study, theory, experimentation, and complex calculations. There is no guarantee that it will produce a workable spontaneous magic effect; if the attempt to create an arcane projection is unsuccessful some of the crystal mana dedicated to the attempt may still be lost.

There is a large body of ritual theory that Imperial magicians have discovered through painstaking research. Reading this lore will help any player who is interested in discussing or creating an arcane projection. It is often easier to create an arcane projection that is similar to existing rituals already described in Imperial lore than it is to create an entirely new effect.

Preparing an Arcane Projection

- It takes ten mana and several weeks to create an arcane projection
- You must use your PD account to make a projection
- If the effect is possible, the referee will tell you what magnitude it will be

Preparing an arcane projection is an arduous and expensive task that can only be attempted by a magician who has one or more ranks in the relevant realm. The magician must use their magical skills to calculate the magnitude of the effect they are trying to create. To do this requires the magician to incorporate ten mana crystals into the arcane projection being created.

It is possible to prepare more than one arcane projection at a time, or to prepare several possible variations of an effect, but each variation is considered to be its own projection; you must spend ten mana crystals for each projection you wish to create.

During downtime, any character with the magician skill who has ten or more mana crystals in their character's inventory on the database can submit a request for an arcane projection automatically using their account. Log on to your account and the option to request a projection will be visible in the screen containing your character details. Once Downtime closes, it is no longer possible to submit an Arcane Projection. You must have sufficient crystal mana in your inventory when you submit the arcane projection. For example, you cannot use mana produced by a mana site or sinecure the same downtime it is produced.

If you wish, you can also submit an arcane projection during an event using the computers in GOD, and will receive the result at the start of the next event.

An arcane projection must incorporate numerous hearth magic effects beyond the magicians' control, such as magical tides, the seasons and the constellations. These effects are locked in when the arcane projection is created, so the preparation can be used at any time, however in some cases these effects will be fundamental requirements of the spontaneous effect. If the magician attempts to recreate the same effect later they may find that too many factors have changed and the effect can no longer be reproduced.

Details Required

- You must select what realm of magic you are planning to use
- It helps significantly if you provide a good in-character description of what you are attempting
- It helps significantly if you provide a good description of what you would like the rules outcome to be
- If you leave either element out, we will make them up
- It does not help at all to provide the magnitude you think it will be

When you are planning a spontaneous magic effect, it is a significant help if you provide a good in-character description of what your character or coven would like to attempt. It is just as helpful if you provide a clear explanation of what you would like the out-of-character rules outcome to be. If you don't provide either of these two details then our team will make them up, and if they are very different to the ideals you had but didn't tell us this could result in an arcane projection that is not useful to you.

You cannot specify what magnitude you want the spontaneous effect to be. It is the job of the referee team to calculate the level of magnitude required. You must select one (and only one) of the realms of magic available to your character. Many magical effects are best produced with a single realm and some effects cannot be produced at all with the wrong realm.

Outcome

- We will work with your description to try and provide you with a ritual that is as close as possible to what you have requested.
- If we cannot provide you with a suitable ritual, some of your mana will be refunded.

If you successfully create an arcane projection, it will be available for collection in your pack at the start of the event. It is not possible to request a projection during the event. If your attempt fails, some of the crystal mana dedicated to the effect will be returned to you in your pack along with an explanation as to why your attempt to create the arcane projection was not successful.

We will work as closely as we can with the details you provide us to create a suitable ritual. You may not get exactly what you are expecting, especially if the in-character and rules elements of your submission do not go well together. In these cases, we will try to give you something that is at least in the spirit of what you have requested. If we cannot provide you with a workable ritual based on the details you have given us, we will refund half your mana (five crystals).

Using an Arcane Projection

- All spontaneous magic effects have a magnitude exactly like a formulaic ritual
- You cannot master a spontaneous magic effect
- Only the magician or coven that holds the projection can attempt the effect
- A projection is consumed once it is cast

All spontaneous magic effects have a realm and magnitude exactly like a formulaic ritual. You must provide mana crystals equal to the magnitude of the ritual (less the ten mana crystals used to make the projection). You must also have sufficient ranks in ritual lore amongst the participants to be able to use all the mana required to perform the ritual, exactly as if you were performing a formulaic ritual.

An arcane projection contains the power of the ten mana crystals that are used to create it. These are released when the spontaneous magic is performed, providing ten mana towards the casting of the ritual, but consuming the arcane projection in the process. If a spontaneous magic effect is higher than magnitude ten then the casters must provide the additional mana as normal, otherwise no mana is needed to perform the effect.

An arcane projection may be codified at a college of magic, turning it into a formulaic ritual. This can take many months of work. Not all arcane projections are suitable to be turned into a formulaic ritual. The arcane projection is destroyed in the process of turning it into a formulaic ritual, producing a ritual text. The precise details of the ritual may change during the process of formulating an arcane projection; magnitude may increase or decrease, or additional options may become available such as the ability to add additional targets.

Archetypes

Overview

When you create your character you can choose a single character archetype from those described for the nation on the wiki. This is entirely optional; you don't have to have one. Picking an archetype, however, tells us a lot about what you consider to be the main role of your character. An archetype comes with a number of assumptions - if you choose the Dhomiro archetype for your Freeborn character that tells us that you are playing someone who represents their family to the wider world. If your Dawnish character is a troubadour, then we assume you are playing a priest who uses storytelling or music to exalt glorious champions.

Archetypes can provide useful characters hooks, but we also sometimes reference them when writing plots. For instance, if we are going to write some plot involving combat in Urizen - then we might aim that plot at players who have told us they are playing a sentinel. If we're writing plot involving rum doings in the Marches, we might aim part of that plot at characters who are bounders or landskeepers.

Not every character role is an archetype - there are priests in Dawn who are not troubadours, for example. Archetypes usually present a role in a certain way that resonates with the themes of a nation - or in rare cases is at odds in some way with those themes.

The Brass Coast

- Dhomiro A Dhomiro is a member of a Freeborn family who is chosen by the family to be their representative to the wider world; sometimes as a leader, sometimes as an emissary.
- Kohan Kohan are groups of volunteer and outcast warriors-without-family, who traditionally pledge loyalty to a group of hakima.
- Sutannir Sutannir perform inspiring religious ceremonies for the Freeborn, and (more importantly) organise the parties that follow.
- Hakima Hakima are highly-organised groups of magic-users whose loyalty is to the nation, not their family. They are taken to be wise.
- Corsair Freeborn Corsairs are traders and privateers who deal with - and raid - barbarian shipping in the Bay of Catazar.
- Scrivener Scriveners are Freeborn contract-writers who help traders frame the terms of their deals, and then decorate them with artwork and calligraphy.

Dawn

- Earl The Earl of a Dawnish Noble House is the House's leader, who leads the House in all its great achievements and who sets its conditions of membership.
- Knight-errant Knights-Errant are men and women engaged in their Test of Mettle, who are still technically yeomen but who are expected - and who are questing - to prove themselves glorious.
- Questing knight Questing Knights are those Knights who have proved themselves worthy in their Test of Mettle and have chosen to keep on questing for ever-greater glory.

Troubadour	A Troubadour is a priest who learns all the stories of their Noble House, past and present, and tells them in poetry and song to inspire their people to greatness.
Witch	Witches are Dawnish magic-users. In noble houses, they fight alongside the House's warriors. Most others belong to Weaver Cabals, independent groups of ritual witches which accept both yeomen and noble members.
Guiser	Itinerant entertainers who often combine magic with their performances and practice dramaturgy . They are often (sometimes justly) accused of being spies, tricksters and mountebanks as well as performers.
Enchanter	Some Earls who have studied magic choose the title "Earl-Enchanter" or simply "Enchanter". Most learn ritual magic to benefit their people; some build relationships with powerful Summer Eternals.
Seneschal	A Noble House's Seneschal is a trusted yeoman who oversees its financial affairs, arranging deals and trades and keeping the House solvent.
Advocate	Dawnish Advocates are yeoman politicians who navigate the murky waters of Senate politics for their noble masters.
Retainer	A yeoman Retainer is a Dawnish Noble's most trusted attendant, who works closely with a particular Noble, or sometimes for the whole House.
Highguard
Exarch	The Exarch, or Exarchs, are those who are appointed by a Highguard Chapter as their leader(s) as determined by the Chapter's creed, or by embodying its principles.
Guardian	Guardians form the core of Highborn military, taking on a range of roles in defence of their Chapters, and in prosecuting vigilant warfare.
Unconquered	The Unconquered are Highguard's elite guerilla troops. They are prone to using ruthless tactics, even operating behind enemy lines, to destroy the enemy's capacity to make war.
Cataphract	Cataphracts are Highguard's elite heavy warriors, who once rode horses into battle but who, in modern times, represent a resolute and unbreakable wall of steel.
Wayfarer	Wayfarers are Highborn priests with a long-standing tradition of teaching the truth of The Way to the ignorant, and seeking out Exemplars and Paragons born in other lands.
Inquisitor	Highborn Inquisitors are zealous defenders of The Way from those that would threaten it, whether mortal or supernatural.
Steward of the Dead	Stewards of the Dead dedicate their lives to preserving the legacies of the worthy. This includes the interring of remains as well as the preservation of legacies and tales.
Magister	Magisters are the master magicians of Highguard, often with an affinity for Winter Magic. They shape magic using movement, sound and the chime of bells.
Benefactor	Benefactors are affluent Highborn merchants and tradesfolk who do not pursue wealth for its own sake, but who sponsor individuals, great works and endeavours.

Archivist Archivists are a unique class of Highborn scholar dedicated to preserving the essence, or truth, of history, over and above accounts and evidence that may seek to undermine that truth.

Imperial Orcs

Warlord Legions chose their own commanders, called warlords, with individuals chosen for their ability to provide clear effective leadership in battle, according to the traditions of the individual legion

Pitfighter Professional fighters of the Pits in which the Orcs hone their combat skills; trading on the reputation for skill and strength that they have built up in previous fights, pitfighters build their careers until their notoriety means that other orcs begin to seek them out and actively challenge them.

Shaman Most orcs only experience communion with the ancestors when battle is upon them but a few individuals - called shamans - are able to hear the voices more frequently; they are almost incessantly surrounded by the constant input of ancestral advice much of it bearing a contradictory or even hostile message.

Preacher Those Imperial Orcs who embrace the Way and become priests.

Warcaster The highly physical traditions of the Wintermark runesmiths has appealed to some orcs who adopt a similar approach and become Warcasters.

Oathwright Oathwrights believe that the bond between an item and a person affects them both, items may gain worth by being owned and bonded to the right person and the right item affects an individuals' hopes of becoming an ancestor.

Bonesetter Usually trained apothecaries, physicks or both, Bonesetters are expected to attend to the physical needs of the legion, but their remit runs well beyond this.

Thief-taker Working closely with Imperial Magistrates, Thief-takers earn their income by collecting bounties on criminals who have fled the law and more rarely by taking payments from private individuals looking to identify perpetrators of crimes.

Reaver Soldiers of the Legions who become dedicated to raiding and mercenary work.

The League

Merchant Prince A Merchant Prince is head of a Guild, the tight-knit mercantile organisations which define the shape of League society.

Bravo Bravos are the members of the mercenary Free Companies, as rough and rowdy off the battlefield as they are disciplined and professional on it, and immensely proud of their Companies.

Bishop The Bishops of the League are its high priests, who provide Virtuous guidance to any who can afford it, and who compete using the size and influence of their congregations.

Troupe Magician Troupes are bands of actors who often go masked while performing, and when performing ritual magic. To them, magic is a commodity like any other.

Mountebank Mountebanks are street magicians whose tricks may be sleight of hand or genuine magic, many of whom skirt the edges of the law playing short-cons and rigging street games.

Cicisbeo A Cicisbeo is an expensive professional paramour, the only exception to League culture's absolute prohibition on extramarital relations.

The Marches

- Steward A steward is the chosen head of a Marcher household. However a steward leads their household only with the consent of the other yeoman.
- Beater Beaters are a roaming informal police force, learning every part of the land, watching for thieves, vagrants and other ne'er-do-wells. Beaters are often instrumental in settling land disputes between neighbors and they have a vital role in the tradition of beating the bounds. Most are skilled foresters or hunters.
- Yeoman The yeoman is to many the archetypal inhabitant of the Marches. They are a hard people, who own their own land and are well accustomed to a long day working it. Military service is a proud tradition in the Marches, and the majority of yeomen are also soldiers.
- Monk Monks minister to the spiritual welfare of the folk around their monastery, largely ignoring Household boundaries. They divide their time between study of the Imperial Faith and working the farmlands claimed by the monastery.
- Friar Friars work their own land and provide spiritual advice and counsel to their fellow yeomen in their household. Many also serve as scholars for their community, acting as a surgeon, and teaching letters and history to young children.
- Landskeeper A landskeeper is a figure from the Marches magical tradition, who supports the territories or the nation as a whole. Landskeepers can use a variety of methods, from hearth magics and good practical advice to rituals.
- Mummer Itinerant entertainers who combine theatrical performance with magic using the techniques of dramaturgy. They attend fairs, markets and other regular gatherings performing plays and feats of skill but are often greeted with a suspicion and (sometimes unfairly) accused of being tricksters and mountebanks.
- Alderman Aldermen are the appointed leaders of market towns, and are the rough equivalent of the yeomen. In most cases these men or women are wealthy merchants of the town, but often they include prominent town folk such as a friar or blacksmith who lives in the village.

Navarr

- Brand Navarri who have dedicated themselves to the service of the community, who work tirelessly to aid others without fee. They might be from any profession - Thorn, Vate, blacksmith, tanner, it doesn't matter. They are named for the brand burned into the skin on their left cheekbone.
- Thorn A Navarri sworn to service in battle - usually, but not necessarily, a warrior. Always tattooed, they often wear warpaint into battle.
- Guide A Navarri who follows the path of the Virtues, and takes it upon themselves to ensure that members of the Empire have found the place in society that they are best suited to.

Broker A Navarri who serves as an intermediary between a buyer and a seller, usually claiming some sort of payment from the deal.

Vate The magical practitioners of Navarr. Often called upon to perform rituals in service of the nation and the Empire, they are the Navarri most trusted to meet with Eternals or their Heralds.

Urizen

Arbiter An Arbiter is the appointed leader of a Spire, often (but not always) its wisest and most skilled mage.

Sentinel Sentinels are scholar-warriors who strive for excellence in the ways of warfare. In battle, they prefer to stay in reserve until it is clear where they are most needed.

Questor The Questors are a sect of rationalist priests who believe the Way of Virtue is an unfinished doctrine, and must be questioned to understand its truth, relevance and moral rightness.

Illuminate The Illuminates are an Urizen priesthood who work improve the Empire's Virtue by identifying and influencing pivotal figures to become Virtuous.

Mage Urizen Magi are cunning politicians who use magic to bolster their influence, both in the mortal world and in the Eternal Realms.

Stargazer Stargazers are pure scholar-mages who study and experiment to advance humankind's understanding of magic and the Realms, and use their power to improve the world.

Seer The Seers are kin to the Torchbearers, seekers after objective truth who maintain extensive libraries. Many are powerful diviners.

Architect Architects meticulously study the Empire's economy to identify where and when to invest for the best return, and to exert the most influence.

Torchbearer The Torchbearers are a political movement devoted to spreading truth as wide and as fast as possible, in a quest to keep the Empire "honest".

Varushka

Boyar A Varushkan Boyar is the hard heart of a Varushkan community, whose first duty is as a strong protector of their people. Second to that, they arbitrate and govern their vale in council with their Wise Ones.

Warden The Warden brotherhoods are heroic warriors who employ magical protection along with their armour and weapons to hunt down the terrors of the Varushkan wilderness, and to uphold Imperial Law.

Schlacta The Schlacta are Varushka's well-organised bands of soldiery, who provide defence to a place or an employer.

Wise One Wise Ones are the true hearts of Varushkan communities. They are the thinkers who deal with those problems which cannot be dealt with by strength, and who look through the appearance of things to discover the threats lurking beneath.

Volhov A Volhov is a Varushkan who studies magic, particularly warding magic (so necessary to Varushka's safety) and divination, to uncover threats before they grow too great to deal with. They often find it necessary to deal with Eternals, and sometimes even to pacify Varushka's deadly Sovereigns with rituals or bargains.

Cabalists Cabals are teams of ritual magic-users, who often act as individual groups, independent of their vales. Each Cabal is different from each other, but their magical might grants them considerable influence.

Storytellers Varushkan Storytellers are the nation's ragged priests, often itinerant, around whom entire communities will gather to hear news, entertaining tales, and spiritual messages told well.

Stzena The inheritors of a tradition of night-sentries, Stzena are bands of musicians who perform at local events.

Wintermark

Thane The leader of a Hall in Wintermark, a Thane settles disputes that lie outside the law and provides civic and military leadership.

Banner-bearer Warriors whose purpose is to raise the morale and fighting spirit of their companions. Banner-bearers often literally carry their warband's banner.

Stormcrow The ragged priests of Wintermark, who act as guides, witnesses and confessors, and who provide spiritual and moral inspiration and guidance for the Winterfolk.

Runesmith Artisans who specialise in the magic of the old runes of Wintermark, who create engraved weapons and armour, or scribe warding marks to protect people or places.

Icewalker The cunning mages of the Suaq, who use their magical skills and their knowledge of the Ice as part of their hunting tradition.

Mediator A Wintermark merchant who specialises in negotiating weregild between aggrieved parties.

Maggot A scavenger, a looter on the battlefield; "Maggots" are seen as scum by most Winterfolk.

Mystic Deeply spiritual Kallavesi who make predictions about the future and advise their fellows on the wisest course of action. Often a magician, but some do it with hearth magic and intellect.

Scop The professional entertainers of Wintermark, Scops are known for their mastery of saga and song, and their skill with alliterative poetry. They are responsible for granting an adult name to a child coming to adulthood.

Grimnir The battlefield doctors and healers of Wintermark, Grimnir swear an oath to stay clear of the front lines.

Archmage

Overview

Archmage is an Imperial title bestowed upon a magician by the members of the Conclave. There are six archmagi in the Conclave; one for each of the magical realms. They serve as a focal point for ritualists of that realm, as well as helping to guide the use of the Conclave's resources.

The six archmagi match the six realms into which magic is divided. Where the influence of a grandmaster is primarily political, the archmagi are responsible for attending to the magical business of the Conclave. They are assumed by the Senate, the Military Council, foreign dignitaries and Eternals alike to be well-versed in the capabilities and lore of their Realm. The archmagi are often seen as the public faces of the Conclave; they are the individuals most likely to be consulted by other Imperial bodies when they wish to know what magical possibilities exist.

Each archmage is addressed by their title and the name of the Realm of magic they stand for - Tavistock, Archmage of Spring or Archmage Reyon d'Esange of Summer. The title archmage comes originally from Urizen, a development of the title mage.

Responsibilities

The six archmagi are responsible for attending to the magical business of the Conclave. They represent the Empire to the eternals, and vice versa. They also work with magicians versed in the ritual magic of their realm to expand the Empire's understanding and power in that realm, and employ it to the advantage of Imperial citizens.

Powers

Each archmage position is an Imperial title in the Conclave.

Addressing the Conclave

Once per summit, an archmage can raise an address to the agenda of a Conclave session for free. This power is intended to be used to let an archmage appraise the Conclave of a magical problem or development related to their realm of mastery, but the archmage is free to address the Conclave however they wish.

Plenipotentiary

Each archmage is expected to represent the Empire to the eternals of their realm, and vice versa. While it is perfectly legal and extremely common for individual citizens to speak with almost all eternals and their heralds, the archmagi are the closest the Empire has to having a formal representative to the Realms, similar to an ambassador. Most eternals understand that the archmage is a representative of the Empire and look to them for assistance on formal matters. The majority of eternals will meet with the appropriate archmage before meeting with other magicians, and will sometimes ask the archmage to be present at any meeting. They also instruct their heralds to look to the archmage for support and protection should it be necessary.

To empower them to carry out their work, each archmage may choose to send a missive of up to 313 words to a single named eternal of their realm each summit. This message is guaranteed to reach the eternal. No eternal who wishes to maintain relations with the Empire will fail to respond to the missive - even if those relations are currently strained.

It is impossible to predict with certainty what form the response will take. Usually an eternal that is well-inclined to the Empire - or is agreeable to the wording will make contact with the archmage at the following summit - possibly creating a chamber connected to the hall of worlds or more likely sending a herald as an envoy. If the eternal is hostile to the Empire - or is insulted by the content of the message - then their response may be aggressive or dangerous as reflects their nature.

The nature of the missive is such that it serves as a powerful invitation making it easier for the eternal to respond. An eternal who is sent a missive by an archmage of the Conclave is able to enter the Hall of Worlds at the next summit regardless of any state of enmity that may exist. It is not unknown for an eternal to take the opportunity to appear with their entourage in the Hall of Worlds in parley, though most choose a more low-key response. A peaceful response is not the only option however though it is exceptionally rare for an eternal to respond with force.

To send a missive, the archmage must cast open portal on the portal at the back of the Hall of Worlds and cast their message into the portal when it opens. Attempts by other characters to send missives in this way will fail, as will any attempt to send more than one missive per summit, or a missive longer than 313 words.

it is not illegal for an archmage to use the power of plenipotentiary to send a missive to an eternal who is under enmity, although it is possible that the contents of such a missive might constitute a crime.

Parley

If an eternal chooses, they respond to a missive sent by an archmage with a formal parley that takes place in the Hall of Worlds. The civil service will be aware of the timing of the parley and will communicate the information to everyone attending the summit through the normal means.

A formal parley follows similar rules to those that govern speech during a Conclave session, but it is the archmage with whom the eternal has come to treat who determines who may speak. The archmage cannot forbid entry to the Hall of Worlds during the parley but the laws of Conclave mean that no magician may speak unless they are granted permission. Speaking does not require a payment of mana, and the archmage may silence the speaker at any point.

A violation of parley by a citizen is prosecuted as an act of subversion against the state - but this may be the least of the magician's concerns if the eternal chooses to take offense at this breach of protocol.

Like the missive, the parley is bound by powerful oaths that govern it. These solemn oaths bind both parties, prohibiting them from acts of violence - if the eternal or the Empire were to break this contract, the hearth magic of the oath would likely exact a terrible price. An eternal that does not request a formal parley is not bound by this oath and is free to respond to a missive in any way it chooses.

it is not illegal for an archmage to engage in a parley with an eternal under enmity, but otherwise the usual rules apply. An archmage who parleys with an eternal under enmity must be scrupulous in their conduct if they wish to avoid investigation for potential treason.

Master of Magic

In situations where it is unclear if a specific act of magic breaches a Declaration of interdiction or association with a herald or eternal breaches a Declaration of Enmity an Imperial Magistrate may issue a formal request for the appropriate archmage to provide a ruling. Control of the judicial process remains with the Magistrate, but the Archmage's ruling on whether the act is a breach of the relevant declaration is binding.

An archmage is legally obligated to provide a ruling when requested by a magistrate or else to direct the magistrate to another archmage better able to clarify the situation.

Regalia of the Archmage

Each archmage receives a staff, a chain and a belt when they take the title. Together these are referred to as the regalia of the archmage. These items are re-enchanted each year. If an archmage loses their position, then the items must be given to the new archmage. If part of the regalia is lost or stolen it may be replaced depending on the resources available to the Conclave; otherwise it remains lost until the next Winter solstice when a replacement is made. Theft of part of an archmage's regalia is a very serious business. Archmagi are encouraged to take all appropriate precautions to keep these items safe.

The regalia is created by a reclusive order of Dawnish artisans in Weirwater, the Five Rings, who pledged themselves to this task in the first years of the Conclave.

Staff of the Archmage

The archmage takes custody of the ceremonial staff of the archmage. Each of the staffs of the archmagi is a ritual staff, appropriate to the realm of the archmage, which grants two additional ranks of the appropriate realm lore skill.

Chain of Aesh

The chains are magical items that can be used to empower ritual magic, and are bound to the archmage in the same manner as other magical talismans. Once per event the archmage can evoke the power of their chain before a ritual from their Realm is performed to reduce the effective magnitude of that ritual by 10. The archmage does not need to be a participant or contributor to the ritual, they only need to be present; likewise, they do not need to be of the same nation as the coven they are using the chain to assist.

Belt of Stars

The belt allows an archmage to help different covens work together. Once each summit, they can invoke it to allow multiple covens from the same nation to co-operate on a single ritual from the archmage's realm of magic. This counts as a daily ritual use by each coven involved in the ritual, and while the covens may perform a ritual together, they are still treated as separate covens for all other purposes (for example, a ritual that affects an entire coven will only affect one target coven). Each coven can use their own paraphernalia while performing a joint ritual. The target covens must all be from the same nation but that does not have to be the same nation as the archmage invoking the belt.

Any ritual performed with the power of the belt of stars takes an extra minute to perform for each additional coven involved.

Appointment

The appointment, replacement or removal of an archmage is made by declaration of candidacy as part of a Conclave session. A candidate can be presented for the post of archmage only once a season, and the title can be held by any Imperial citizen.

An archmage serves until they are replaced by another magician using the Declaration of Candidacy. As a title in the Conclave, an archmage cannot be revoked.

Arete

Excellence is not an act but a habit.

At its most basic, Arete suggests that whatever can be “done” can be done “better.” Being content that one is “good enough” is seen as a failing. Arete exists in all endeavours from preparing food to building an aqueduct. The concept stems from a belief that human actions are of paramount importance; the world is a place of conflict and difficulty, and human value and meaning is measured against individual effectiveness in the world.

The Urizen apply the term to anything; for example, the excellence of a chimney, the excellence of a goat to be bred and the excellence of a human. The meaning of the word changes depending on what it describes, since everything has its own peculiar excellence; the arete of a person is different from the arete of a building.

In people, Arete is strongly linked to the Way of the Virtue and is sometimes referred to simply as “virtue”. For a human being to possess Arete they must instinctively embody some or all of the seven virtues. The virtues represent scales against which individuals and their actions can be weighed to see if they possess Arete.

Arete is borrowed from classical Greek and adapted for Empire. It is the core Urizen philosophy, an idea that underpins their cultural personality; our presentation is intended to be a relatively simple concept that any player can work into their characterisation if they are playing an Urizen character. As Urizen is a land of countless philosophies if you wish to play a character with a detailed knowledge of philosophy, then the contemporary Greek philosophies such as Stoicism and Epicureanism are good source material, once adapted, for more esoteric Urizen philosophies.

Arhallogen

Eternal of Spring

Sobriquets

Most commonly, Arhallogen is called the Spider King (although gender has little meaning for this powerful creature, it is usually addressed by male honorifics).

It is also occasionally referred to by other Eternals by a name that sounds like a sequence of quick clicking noises - noises commonly produced by Arhallogen, its heralds and its spawn.

Appearance

A swarm of poisonous insects and arachnids that speak with a single whispering voice; a monstrous spider-like, scorpion-like horror, all pincers and deadly stingers; or sometimes an insect-like vaguely-humanoid shape in cobweb robes and an iron crown, bearing a poisoned glaive.

Concerns

Arhallogen is an inhabitant of the Spring Realm, and part of the family of Eternals that are the most alien to humanity. It seems to be fascinated by the ways living things prey on and compete with each other, especially the adaptations and natural qualities that let them hunt, kill and consume prey - or that let the prey fight off their predators.

Unsurprisingly, the Spider King rates venom as one of the most potent tools that any living creature can employ, and is delighted to encounter new poisons.

During the Winter Solstice 378YE, Arhallogen was declared to have the enmity of the Imperial Conclave. The enmity was later removed, but not before the eternal launched a vicious attack on the Hall of the Worlds with venomous heralds.

Boons

This dark Eternal encourages competition between living things, not so much out of a desire to see death or conflict but apparently from an urge to see living things survive and prosper. It offers a number of boons, many of them violent, and often involved with crushing weaker prey or poisoning stronger creatures to make them weak.

Arkad

Overview

This page covers what little is known by Imperial citizens about the elite Druj troops. Most of this information is not widely known across the Empire - but soldiers and commanders who have fought the Druj before, or those unfortunate enough to have been enslaved, might be familiar with it.

Players who are interested in getting more involved in monstering at Empire can create their own elite monster unit \(EMU\) by choosing one of the known forces listed below. The list is deliberately limited - the Druj have deliberate weaknesses in the way they fight, as well as strengths - so it is not possible for players to create a new arkad.

The Arkad

The most promising young Druj are recruited into one of the five arkads, each of which operate their own lodges throughout Druj lands. Those who are chosen face a dangerous initiation rite, a mix of Druj mysticism coupled with powerful narcotics prepared for them by the tepel. Not all the warriors who take this rite survive. Membership of an arkad confers status and prestige on the new recruits and brings them closer to the centre of power in Druj society. The tepel run the lodges, providing the members with potent herbs and brews needed for their spiritual rites and giving out instructions and orders sent from their masters, the buruk tepel, the rulers of Druj society.

Like the Druj clans from which they are drawn, each arkad has their own unique totem creature, a venomous reptile, bird, insect, or other beast. Members of a lodge train to fight together on the battlefield and frequently employ tactics that emulate a particular trait of their totem creature. The animal is also upheld as the perfect example of a particular trait favoured in battle by the arkad.

The tepel ensure that members of the arkad have the best weapons and armour available. Along with their banners and shields, these are often decorated with a stylized representation of the arkad's totem creature. In battle their different fighting skills tend to complement each other and most Druj armies are built around groups of warriors drawn from each arkad lodge.

Pakkad

The orcs of the Pakkad are always well equipped and better armoured than the warriors of other arkad. These brutal fighters may wield any weapon that suits their purpose, but all wear the heaviest armour they can get their hands on. Some lodges keep slaves who can forge fine weapons and armour for their warriors, but others take theirs from their defeated foes which can give the unit a ramshackle and incoherent appearance. They dress as fearsomely as possible, using body parts, flayed skin, bones and skulls as decoration. A favoured ritual among the Pakkad is to smear their armour with blood before a battle, a practice that has led to the Pakkad being known as "the Bloodied".

In battle the Pakkad are often directed to provide protection for the Het commander or another notable Druj on the field. Their devotion means they are quick to throw themselves into harm's way to ensure the survival of the one they have been ordered to protect. If no protection is needed they may be used secure and hold key objectives, but they also act as a potent, heavily armoured and shock unit that can smash into enemy lines or eliminate exposed high-value targets. With this in mind, the Pakkad are often held in reserve until the enemy is already weakened and the leader is ready for them to strike with brutal force.

The Pakkad embody the aspect of the Black Hide Beetle, their armour and weapons reflecting the creature's thick chitinous plates and sharp mandibles. These beetles are found in small social groups that, when threatened, will form up around the dominant beetle and ward off predators.

Chikad

The Chikad are elite skirmishers. They harass enemy formations many times their size, picking off lone individuals, slowing the enemy, and forcing them to spend valuable time and resources tending to their crippled and poisoned comrades. A Chikad force will often feign engagement with a foe, only to break and flee at the first sign of resistance. If all goes to plan, the distracted enemy is then taken by surprise by a flank attack from another Druj force.

The leaders of the Chikad are known to be devious tacticians. They often conceal themselves in undergrowth or watch an engagement from the treeline, directing various elements of their force from relative safety. Large forces of these skirmishers generally break up into smaller groups, assaulting enemy lines from different angles and with different tempos. Even when they are outnumbered this strategy can make it hard for Imperial forces to bring their full might to bear on any individual group of attackers.

Chikad units vary greatly in their appearance and the equipment they carry, and are among the most adaptable of the arkad. Whilst they favour medium armour, some groups will wear light leathers and padded jacks to allow them to stay fast and mobile. Other units may at times don chain vests and plate armour on their limbs, turning themselves into a heavier force that can overcome weaker foes very effectively. Where possible their tepel provide the Chikad with poison to smear on their weapons so that even the smallest wound has a chance to kill or incapacitate an enemy.

The pack-hunting Razor Skink is the revered totem of the Chikad. These lizards are fast hunters whose hides are festooned with bony blades, barbs and spiny projections. They chase down prey much larger than themselves, slashing at vulnerable bellies and legs, slowly wearing the animal down until the pack is able to begin feasting on the exhausted creature.

Hupul

The Hupul fulfill a pivotal role in the Druj forces, operating as both forward scouts and skilled hunters. They often operate as a vanguard force of archers, slinking along the sides of a battle to unleash shot after shot into the ranks of the enemy. Sometimes they try to bring down key heroes, or vital support troops. They especially target healers, knowing that their loss can sow panic among the enemy. Whatever their target, they avoid direct engagements wherever possible. Constantly on the move, they always endeavor to flank their enemy, or draw them into ambushes, and as much as possible remain in close communication with their commanders.

On campaign they may be called on to operate away from the army for weeks at a time, and so strive to be as self-sufficient possible. As a result all Hupul are adept survivors, capable of avoiding the enemy left to their own devices. Most carry herbs or potions provided for them by the tepel, and adopt a distinctive style of dress intended to allow them to move unseen through the wilderness. More so than other Druj, they favour natural coloured open robes and ragged cloaks that help them to hide in ambush.

The totem of the Hupul is the Deathstinger, a deadly insect found in the eastern Barrens and the Mallum. These large red-and-black vespids can grow to the size of a dove or sparrowhawk and are commonly found in small groups. Brightly coloured, fast in flight, and practically fearless, a pack can easily overcome an unwary human. Travelers in the areas they frequent know to flee as soon as they hear the distinctive low-pitched buzzing the creatures make. Moving in small groups these oversized hornets hunt down their prey, darting in from just beyond reach to deliver vicious stings before flying out of harm's way. Their barbed stingers tear the skin and their venom thins the blood and causes the heart to begin beating faster and faster. Depending on size and constitution more than half a dozen or so stings is usually fatal as the heart literally explodes in the chest or they expire from massive blood loss. The bodies of their victims are left where they fall until the natural processes of rot and decay have made them more palatable to the vicious territorial killers.

Vikari

Those Druj that demonstrate magical aptitude who are not claimed as apprentices by the powerful Ghulai are usually inducted into the ranks of the Vikari. This arkad draws on the aspect of the Green Forest Scorpion, weakening, poisoning and entangling their foes. They favour hit and run tactics, combining a fast assault and a swift retreat before their lack of armour and resilience can be used against them.

As a Vikari gains status they will seek to craft a set of mage armour to protect them in battle, embellishing it with all manner of scorpion symbols, bright green splashes and the preserved chitin, pincers and tails of their scorpion totem. If they survive long enough the orc may add an elaborate headdress that takes on the shape of a scorpion, with pincer-like cheek guards and a tail that curves up and over the top of their head.

When deployed a unit of Vikari fights in two ranks. The front rank, known as the claws, is comprised of arcane weapon users who can cripple their opponents as well as harry them with weakening spells. The second rank, called the tails, then use their mage staffs to entangle their foes or ravage them with venomous magics.

The Green Forest Scorpion is just one of dozens, if not scores, of different scorpion species found in the Mallum. These fast-footed creatures are very aggressive and strike without provocation, delivering poisonous stings that slow or even paralyse their prey. They tear at their victims with their razor-sharp claws, inflicting bleeding wounds, before retreating. They are particularly single-minded; a green forest scorpion has been known to pursue prey for vast distances following their initial attack, continuing to claw and sting at fleeing prey, waiting for it to finally expire of blood-loss, accumulated venom, or terrified exhaustion.

Kallad

* The Kallad are played by our Skirmish Crew and are not a player monster option. In some ways the Kallad are the most feared of all Druj - even warriors of other arkad tread lightly around these single-minded killers. All the arkad take their orders from the buruk tepel, but it is the Kallad that the rulers of the Druj tribe employ when they wish to openly discipline their subordinates. The Druj do not punish failure that could not have been foreseen or averted, but those whose failings bring defeat on the tribe will soon meet with members of the Kallad. Executions or torture are brutal and carried out in public, providing an object lesson of the need to avoid repeating the mistakes of the condemned.

In battle the Kallad operate separate from the main body of the Druj forces. They can often be seen stalking through the woodland after lone foes, or descending on enemy soldiers who have been left behind by their comrades. The lucky ones receive a swift death, those less fortunate face an agony of torture before they return to the Labyrinth. A fallen Highguard scout might have their legs cleaved as they lie on the ground, a Dawnish knight errant may have daggers driven into their flesh whilst having poisons poured into their mouth. These murderers will often taunt their foes by hauling fallen comrades to their feet, lashing them to trees, before they are eviscerated. While cruel, these brutal murders are intended to serve a purpose. By tormenting their prisoners, the Kallad try to provoke their enemies into rash and costly attempts to save the lives of their friends.

This arkad take the Coiled Shrike as their totem. This terrible creature is not a bird but a snake that lurks in trees, waiting for prey to pass by, believed by some scholars to be a distant relative of the jaculi native to the tropical jungles of the war west. When the moment comes to strike, the snake uncoils its body to leap from the branch. Only the most skilled tepel can save those bitten by the terrible fangs from an agonizing death - the Shrike's necrotic poison causes the victim to swiftly rot while still alive and is said to be one of the most painful experiences imaginable. Victims of the Coiled Shrike often beg for death or take their own lives to escape the unspeakable torment the venom inflicts.

Herbalism Skills

The elite Druj warriors who train with the arkad lodges work closely with the tepel. Away from the battlefield, the warriors often help gather and prepare valuable herbs. As a result, any member of the arkad who shows aptitude is given limited training by the tepel, learning how to treat and staunch wounds sustained in battle. While they will never match the abilities of a fully trained physick, they can use this training to get other warriors healed and back into battle. In battle the tepel provide the arkad with limited supplies of True Vervain to heal the wounds of their comrades.

Any member of the Druj Arkad can spend 30 seconds applying True Vervain to restore all lost hits to another character as if they had the physick and chirurgion skills. Any player who is playing a member of an arkad who has their own appropriate phys-rep for a bag of herbs or similar will receive True Vervain herb cards.

Arms of the Warwitch

Description

A rod and a one-handed sword are the most common combination for the Arms of the Warwitch, although it is by no means the only arrangement of these arcane weapons. They are obviously favoured by warriors who combine magical lore with martial prowess. Ironically, these arcane weapons are not especially popular with the traditional war witch, who tends to focus more on raw magical power. They are much more commonly used in the League, Brass Coast, Varushka and among the Navarr; even there it is rare to find a warrior who uses both offensive magic and aggressive combat techniques. It is much more common to find a magician with offensive magic and a the confidence to keep themselves or their allies fighting, or a magician who relies on the ability to strike crippling blows and uses healing or utility magic off the battlefield.

In the League, the Brass Coast and Highguard this arcane weaponry is called a set of Dragonbone Scales, and they are often engraved with a set of unbalanced merchant's scales. The name references the way the wielder 'balances' their confidence and inner fire with their magical power.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. A pair consisting of a one-handed weapon and either a rod or a wand. You must be wielding both the weapon and the implement to use the set's magical properties.
- Requirement: You must have both the ambidexterity and magician skills to bond to these items.
- Effect: You may either expend one hero point to regain one personal mana, or expend three personal mana to regain one hero point.
- Materials: Crafting the Arms of the Warwitch requires nine measures of dragonbone, three ingots of green iron and three measures of iridescent gloaming. It takes one month to make a pair of these items.

The Festival of the Little Mother was at its height. Tassato sparkled like a diadem with candles at every corner, and its party-goers shone no less, with jewels at every throat. The city-folk said that the Vass and Gancio themselves were in town, and in full fest. The Cozido was fit to burst with locals and visitors. Small bowls of the stew for which the tavern was named were passed from hand to hand over the crowd, and gratefully accepted by drinkers at three tables in what would usually be a quiet corner...

One was occupied by a Troupe from the south, in for the week and all four still masked from the night's performance.

"...I loved your Beast, Mikael. A work of genius."

"Ah, it would have been nothing without your Mountebank, father!"

"True, true. Here, they may see the Mountebank as a hero, but those of us with more refined tastes see him as the braggart and thief he is. Not to put too fine a point on it, that is the difference between Sarvos and lesser cities."

There was a scraping sound, as chairs were pushed back from the second table. Two men in cloaks and leathers stood and took stance. One spoke:

"Refined, you say? Not quite 'stilled enough yet, I think. Are you ready for the retort, sir?"

"Oh, a Bravo of Mestra! How delightful! How rude of me not to introduce us! I am Jof, the Vassa there is my wife Mia, the Beast is my son, Mikael, and Gancio is Skat, our manager. We are four, and you are two. Tell me, is your sword as sharp as your tongue?"

"We shall put a fire under you, sir, and see that long neck bend to us, under Tassato's heat..."

"You know the name of the Troupe of the Seventh Seal, of course? You know our performances are... Spellbinding?"

"What a coincidence..." said the first as the pair pulled back their cloaks, and each drew short sword and rod.

The second added: "Not Bravos, but 'braggarts'. Though we can match words with deeds: can you and yours...?"

The "fight" was short. Two of the Sarvan Troupe had hardly drawn before they were slammed back to the wall. The one called Mikael was stuck fast to the floor, unable to offer any assistance to his father, last in the fight.

In a final flurry, one of the Tassato mountebanks swiveled with a flourish, swept his rod round in a languid arc, and touched the other on the chest. The Empowered fighter stabbed in low octave, and the Sarvan actor in the Mountebank's mask fell to the floor, grunting in pain, as his left leg collapsed under him.

"As I said. You will bow..."

The occupants of the third table had paused in their carousing to watch the scuffle. A man in parti-coloured green-and-blue of utter flamboyance stood, and swept a generous bow:

"Two rings, I note? May I interest you both in a third? I am Seigneur of the Free Company of Bacalhau. Yes, it is our little joke. We named ourselves when that was all we had to eat defending Holberg, and it stuck. However. The Company of Salt Cod. We travel well, we outlast our enemies... and we are hiring."

Army orders

Overview

Each general can issue a single set of orders for the army they control. The orders should describe a broad strategic plan representing what the general would like the army to achieve on campaign in a territory over the downtime before the next event.

A military campaign is not a single battle, a campaign is a prolonged period of warfare that takes place over the whole territory in the three months between events.

Movement

Generals may issue orders to attack or defend any territory their army can reach. To keep things as simple as possible, an army is assumed to move to any territory that the general issues orders to attack or defend before any fighting takes place. In effect, an army can slip away at the start of a season before the campaign begins.

Most Imperial armies can move through three territories in a season (for example, an army in Bregasland may be ordered to defend Hercynia - it will pass through Kallavesa and Hahnmark before reaching Hercynia where it will join any campaign that takes place. However an army cannot pass through a territory it does not control - it will automatically stop and engage any enemy forces present if it enters a hostile territory - one that is controlled by an enemy power.

A fast army can use the forced march order to move as far as its general wishes each season, but must still stop when it enters a territory that is controlled by an enemy.

Note that the elite military unit resources controlled by players do not move like this. Military units can cross the entire Empire swiftly and quickly - so they can be freely assigned to an Imperial army, or sent to raid a neighbouring nation.

There is no "move order" for an army, even if an army moves to the centre of the Empire to resupply, it is assumed that it would defend the territory it has moved to if that territory were attacked.

Attacking

- Imperial armies can only attack a region that is adjacent to an existing region controlled by the Empire
- Taking any attack action means a campaign will happen if the enemy is still in the territory.
- Taking any attack action means the army is not eligible for natural resupply this season.

If a general wishes to attack a territory, they must indicate which region they wish to assault. Imperial armies can only attack a region that is adjacent to an existing region controlled by the Empire. This represents the limitations of warfare and the practicalities of moving armies through enemy territory. The region the army is attacking from may be in another territory - but in this case it is twice as difficult to take the region.

If a general wishes to attempt to capture more than one region, they should indicate which regions they will attack and in what order. Subsequent regions that are assaulted may only be adjacent to the region that has just be conquered.

All of these orders will always cause a military campaign to be initiated in the territory if there is an opposing force present. If an attacking force is victorious - they will capture land - the greater the victory the more land they will take in a season.

Cautious Advance

- Casualties suffered by this army are reduced by a fifth
- The ability of this army to capture territory is reduced by a fifth

A general may be keen to scout out a territory to identify enemy forces, or simply wish to make a probing attack to initiate a campaign. A cautious assault can also be useful to disrupt enemy supplies lines and prevent the enemy from resupplying.

Cautious assaults are less effective at claiming territory - the attackers are less able to overcome the defenders and drive them back - but casualties suffered will be lower. Urizen and Freeborn armies favour this strategy as it provides the most certain ways to identify the strength of the enemy position.

Balanced Attack

- There are no modifiers associated with this order

This is the standard order issued by Imperial generals who wish to engage the enemy forces in a territory. A balanced attack involves assaulting the enemy positions but seeks weak points in the enemy lines rather than attempting to smash through strong positions. Highguard armies favour this strategy believing that the natural efficiency best serves the manifest destiny of the Empire.

Overwhelming Assault

- Casualties suffered by this army are increased by a fifth
- The ability of this army to capture territory is increased by a fifth

A general who seeks victory at any price can order an overwhelming assault. The army will spend the season seeking out the strongest enemy troops and attempting to smash through their positions. This kind of attack is dangerous - casualties will be higher than normal - but the army will gain more ground during that season. Wintermark and Dawnish armies favour this strategy as it provides many opportunities for glory and heroism.

Steady Conquest

- Casualties suffered by this army are reduced by a fifth
- Casualties inflicted by this army are reduced by a fifth
- Only Imperial armies may take this order.

Every Imperial army is accompanied by a cadre of battlefield physicks and chirurgeons, and magicians skilled in healing magic, who are more than prepared to take risks to help minimize Imperial losses. By adapting strategies to make the most use of these resources, a general can ensure no part of the army is ever too far away from skilled medical attention. At the same time, the general ensures that the soldiers in their army eschew risky tactics, or those that would lead to unnecessary loss of life, in pursuit of spilling enemy blood.

Steady conquest is as effective as balanced attack in claiming enemy territory and securing strategic objectives, but significantly reduces the casualties suffered by the army - at the cost of inflicting less casualties on enemy forces. This order became possible after the coronation of the twentieth Throne, Empress Lisabetta, when Imperial strategy was reassessed in the light of significant losses inflicted by the barbarian orcs.

Defending

- No campaign will take place unless another force issues an order to attack
- Any victory achieved by the army translates into fewer casualties incurred rather than territory gained
- Taking a defending order means an army is eligible to receive natural resupply provided the other requirements are satisfied.

Armies on defend are seeking to hold their position and fight off any attackers they encounter. If all forces in a territory have orders to defend the regions they control, then no campaign takes place and the side that controls the territory will be able to resupply their forces. If the defenders are victorious - if their side has a higher effective strength than the attacker, then their victory translates directly into reduced casualties for the defenders. The greater the victory, the less casualties they suffer. Defenders take fewer casualties than attackers anyway; all other factors being equal there is a small natural advantage that favours the defender.

Give Ground

- Casualties suffered by this army are decreased by a half
- The ability of this army to defend territory is decreased by two fifths

A general that wants their army to carry out a fighting retreat can issue orders to give ground. The army will avoid major engagements, while still attempting to slow the enemy advance using ambushes and the like. An army that is giving ground is much less effective at holding the territory against an attacker, but will see their casualties reduced accordingly. Navarr and Varushkan armies are both fond of this strategy. The Navarr consider it an effective way to bleed an enemy as they advance into a trap, while in Varushka the land itself can soon become the enemy of an unwary attacker. Following the events of the Summer Solstice 381YE, no Marcher general can issue this order. If they try to do so, it will default to Solid Defence.

Solid Defence

- Casualties suffered by this army are decreased by a fifth
- Any army that does not submit an order defaults to solid defence.

An army that attempts the solid defence of a region will seek to make best use of the terrain to bring the enemy to battle in a way that favours the defender. Casualties suffered are less than if the army simply attacks, even though an enemy army that attacks is just as likely to be rebuffed. The League traditionally favours a solid defence believing that the fortifications at Holberg have proven the advantage of this strategy over many years.

Heroic Stand

- Casualties suffered by this army are increased by a fifth
- The ability of this army to defend territory is increased by three tenths

An army that commits to a heroic stand will not initiate a military campaign - but they will make the enemy pay for every inch of ground they take. The army will take every opportunity to engage with the enemy side, they won't fight to the last soldier, but they will fight on even until the cause is utterly hopeless. Marcher armies favour this strategy; their natural belligerence makes them loathe to leave any battlefield while the chance of victory remains.

Army qualities

Overview

All Imperial armies and most barbarian armies possess a single unique quality that give them advantages in certain situations. These qualities represent the unique strength of each army reflecting the flavour of the army and the nation to which it belongs. The most common qualities are described below. Other qualities exist, and some such as cyclic magic may even be unique to a specific army.

New Qualities

When a new Imperial army is raised, it receives a quality automatically that reflects its purpose, the nation who has raised it, and the conditions under which it was mobilized. Most Imperial nations have one or two qualities that are common for their armies, but it is possible for plot developments to provide the option for to choose a different quality.

Existing Imperial armies already have a quality representing their traditional roles and history. It is never possible for an army to have more than one quality or to diversify its abilities, but it is possible for an army to improve their essential quality if a plot opportunity presents that option.

Conquering

- Can use the push the line order when attacking
- Other Descriptors: Methodical, Inspired

A conquering army focuses on capturing territory, driving the defenders of the land before them. The newly restored Gryphon's Pride of Dawn has this quality, representative of Dawnish ambitions in the Barrens.

Push the Line

- The ability of this army to conquer territory is increased by three tenths
- Casualties inflicted by this army are reduced by a fifth

The army seeks to dominate key strategic objectives, and focuses on claiming territory from the opposing army.

Cruel

- Can use the merciless onslaught order when attacking
- The presence of a cruel army in a territory is impossible to conceal and is always obvious to other armies in the same territory
- Other Descriptors: Dread, Fearsome, Merciless, Monstrous, Terrifying

A cruel army breaks the morale of its opponents. It may employ ruthless tactics, torture of prisoners and civilians, monstrous auxiliaries or psychological tricks that cause even the most disciplined army to prefer flight over capture. Enemy forces often withdraw well before their troops are in danger of being routed, aware that overconfidence in the face of a cruel opponent could lead to the loss of their entire army. No current Imperial army has this quality, but in the past both the Iron Helm of Varushka (disbanded during the reign of Empress Mariika) and the Dance of Blood of Navarr (destroyed by the Jotun in 245YE) employed dreadful tactics against their barbarian opponents.

Merciless onslaught

- An enemy army that takes casualties from this army will break if their military strength falls below 1,500 (or below 2,250 if they are large)

The army tries to break the spirit of their enemy. They ambush or overrun the enemy, leave mutilated corpses or maimed opponents to warn their comrades. Some cruel armies may employ monstrous beasts, summoned creatures, or psychological tactics designed to demoralise the opposing forces.

Disciplined

- Can use the strategic defence order when defending
- Other Descriptors: Strategic, Tactical, Vigilant

A disciplined army is well-organised and relentlessly drilled. Every soldier is a professional who knows their place in the chain of command. The Granite Pillar of Highguard are armies known for their discipline. Several attempts have been made in the past by the sentinels of Urizen to raise a disciplined, strategically minded army that embrace the national philosophy of arete.

Strategic defence

- The army gains an additional victory point for each enemy army in the territory that takes an attacking order to a maximum of 5 additional victory points.

The strategic army concentrates on orchestrating well planned defences designed to exploit flaws in the enemy strategy. The army excels at taking advantage of the slightest mistake or misjudgement by enemy commanders.

Fast

- Can use the forced march order when attacking
- Can use the desperate reinforcement order when defending.
- Other Descriptors: Durable, Pathfinder, Organized.

A fast army is able to move quickly over long distances. This is not just a quality of speed - moving thousands of soldiers overland is a daunting logistical prospect. Within the Empire, a fast army takes advantage of the trods whenever it can, supplementing their magic with forced marches and expertly organised baggage trains. The Freeborn Fire of the South and the Navarr Black Thorns are both known for their speed and mobility.

Forced March

- Can move as far as the general wishes this season. It must still stop moving when it enters a hostile territory.
- The ability of this army to capture territory is decreased by one fifth.

A general who orders a forced march pushes their troops to move swiftly - but also takes pains to preserve their strength so that when they arrive they are in a fit state to fight. Some soldiers may fall behind, but they keep moving until they catch up with the army again. By taking advantage of roads and trods, the general ensures that when the army arrives at its destination it does so with the will to engage the enemy. Yet a forced march is not magical movement - the army will arrive late in the campaign season, meaning their ability to capture territory is reduced..

Desperate Reinforcement

- Can move as far as the general wishes this season. It must still stop moving when it enters a hostile territory.
- The ability of this army to defend territory is decreased by one fifth.

Sometimes a situation is desperate, but additional troops may turn the tide of battle. In such cases, the general pushes their troops to move as quickly as possible, to ensure that a faltering garrison receives last minute assistance, or a failing position is reinforced just before it collapses. When time is of the essence, the general can risk exhausting some of their troops to ensure they arrive in time to support their allies.

Foraging

- Can use the plunder order when attacking
- Other Descriptors: Looter, Scavenger, Snaffler, Raider, Maggots (derogatory)

A foraging army excels at stripping enemy settlements and casualties of valuables. The Freeborn Red Wind Corsairs were known for their ability to gather resources in enemy territory, prior to their embrace of the idea of ransoming their enemies rather than simply robbing them. Some Wintermark armies find fighting alongside a foraging army distasteful - the deeply ingrained cultural dislike for "maggots" is well known.

Plunder

- Casualties inflicted by this army are reduced by one tenth.
- The ability of this army to capture territory is reduced by one tenth.
- The army generates wealth based on the number of victory points generated.

The army concentrates on looting enemy forces. They launch attacks intended to capture baggage trains and other financial objectives. They focus on capturing mines, forest preserves, farms, businesses, mana sites and herb gardens. A portion of this bounty in the form of money, herbs, crystal mana, crafting materials and potentially even rare materials such as weirwood, mithril or white granite are claimed by the army general.

Daring

- * Can use the daring raid order when attacking
- Only the Red Wind Corsairs army has this quality

This enhanced quality was gained by the Red Wind Corsairs shortly before the Winter Solstice 381YE. It was gained as a response to an opportunity, the Freeborn assembly sent Gonzalo i Riqueza to spread a message that capturing and ransoming enemies was preferable to simply robbing them. Battle is a chance to seize the wealth of the enemy - war is about increasing your affluence at the expense of your foes, rather than to see them dead. The opportunity came in the wake of a well-planned raid against an Grendel-controlled Legacy in Spiral.

The Freeborn soldiers of the Red Wind Corsairs embrace their instinct to treat their defeated enemies with respect and take their money not their lives. Instead of the plunder order, the general can submit the daring raid order. Although some Wintermark armies find fighting alongside a foraging army distasteful - many Wintermark heroes prefer the idea of ransoming defeated enemies to butchering them and have no reason to dislike a daring army.

Daring Raid

- Casualties inflicted by this army are reduced by three tenths.
- Casualties suffered by this army are reduced by a tenth.
- The army generates wealth based on the number of victory points generated.

The army concentrates on lightning attacks against the enemy forces intended to take key strategic points and capture prisoners in the process. Defeated enemies are treated with respect and healed, but kept as prisoners to be ransomed back to the enemy. By such a means members of the army will grow wealthy; a portion of this bounty in the form of potions, magic items, money, herbs, crystal mana, crafting materials and valuable materials such as weirwood, mithril, white granite, and ilium will be claimed by the army general.

Glorious

- Can use the triumphant charge order when attacking
- Can use the final stand order when defending.
- Other Descriptors: Crazy, Heroic, Honourable, Righteous.

A glorious army is full of fighting spirit, and is capable of utter commitment to the act of war. Stories are still told of the Burning Falcon, a Freeborn army with many kohans that was wiped out to the last soldier holding off a Jotun force three times its own size during the invasion of Kallavesa in 247YE; troubadours still sing of the last-ditch, foolhardy assault of the Dawnish Gryphon's Pride against the barbarians in the Barrens. Today, the Dawnish Hounds of Glory are glorious, while the Green Shield of Wintermark are known for their heroism.

Triumphant charge

- The ability of this army to capture territory is increased by two-fifths.
- Casualties inflicted by this army are increased by one fifth.
- Casualties suffered by this army are increased by half.

A general who unleashes their troops in a triumphant charge seeks great victory, but pays a great price. The army confronts the strongest enemy troops and the most defended positions, and attempts to rout them. Individual soldiers and companies engage in valiant attacks, employing risky tactics to defeat their opponents. The army will gain much more ground, but does so at the cost of increased casualties.

Final stand

- Any victory gained by the enemy converts to additional casualties taken by this army, rather than territory gained.
- Every enemy victory point causes 100 additional casualties to this army until the army disbands.

Sometimes a general needs to hold a position regardless of cost. A final stand trades Imperial lives for every inch of ground that would otherwise be lost. The order is rarely used; even if the army is not wiped out, it will almost certainly be severely weakened. When an attacking force must not be allowed to gain territory or establish a beachhead, it is incredibly effective.

Guerilla

- Can use the hit and run order when defending
- Other Descriptors: Adaptable, Hunter, Ranger, Territorial.

A guerilla army is adept at fighting in difficult terrain. It is often organised into many small companies that can fight independently of each other, employing scouts and messengers to keep each element of the force apprised of the status and position of other forces. The Northern Eagle army of Varushka has extensive experience fighting in difficult terrain; the Winter Sun of the Imperial Orcs incorporates hard lessons learned by the original rebels fighting the Empire in the southern territories.

Hit and run

- Your side must control a region with the forested, hilly or marsh keyword.
- The ability of this army to defend territory is increased by a fifth.
- Casualties suffered by this army are decreased by a fifth.
- Casualties inflicted by this army are decreased by a fifth.

The army uses their mastery of wilderness survival to impede enemy advances. They set up camp in defensible locations, use hidden paths to move around, and employ natural features of the wilderness to hamper their attackers. A guerilla army in a defensible position does everything it can to make itself hard to attack, rarely presenting the enemy with an opportunity for a pitched battle. This tactic is especially effective at slowing the advance of an enemy force while awaiting reinforcements

Hard Bitten

- Can use the make them pay order when defending
- Other Descriptors: Garrison, Unyielding, Stubborn

A hard-bitten army refuses to give ground to invaders. When fighting from defensive positions they can inflict massive casualties on enemy forces that dare to approach them. The Strong Reeds of the Marches are a stubborn army who use every advantage to make their enemies pay for every inch of Marcher soil they try to take, while the Fist of the Mountain possess a dogged refusal to back down before their foes. Some Druj armies are adept at using traps and treacherous tactics to slowly grind an aggressor down as they attempt to claim barbarian territory.

Make them pay

- Casualties inflicted by this army are increased by two fifths
- Casualties suffered by this army are increased by a fifth

The army attempts to bleed the enemy, making them pay for every inch of ground surrendered. The army takes any chance to butcher their attackers; enemies suffer greatly increased casualties if they push forward, at the price of increased losses for the defenders.

Haunted

- Can use the reap the harvest order when attacking
- Other Descriptors: Accursed, Leech, Slave, Unliving

A haunted army gains strength as it defeats enemies. It might contain creatures that are able to consume the corpses of those they have defeated or be empowered with fell winter magics that allow them to raise the dead as husks to fight again. A haunted army that gains strength using this order cannot take itself above its normal maximum strength. No

Imperial army has ever had this quality; no encountered barbarian army has had this quality, either.

Reap the harvest

- The ability of this army to capture territory is decreased by one-fifth
- If the army is victorious it gains 10% of all the casualties slain in that campaign as free resupply

The army recovers the bodies of those who have fallen on the battlefield, using the corpses to replenish the army, at the cost of pushing forwards and taking territory. If the army is not victorious then they do not gain any resupply from this order.

Magic

- Rituals that target a territory may be performed using the general of this army as a focus
- Can use the Arcane Consolidation order when defending
- Other Descriptors: Arcane, Necromantia, Occult, Sorcerous

A magic army contains many magicians, and soldiers trained to fight alongside magicians and help with the targeting of powerful rituals. If they are defending a territory then they can provide a bounty of crystal mana to their general for use in creating helpful enchantments. Rumours suggest that the native defenders of Karsk who have been assisting the Varushkan generals during their fight against the Thule also possess this quality. Several Thule armies possess similar sorcerous powers. The Axou and the Jarmish also field several armies with this quality.

Before the use of the unmade trove granted them cyclic magic, the Citadel Guard of Urizen possessed this quality.

Arcane Consolidation

- The army generates mana crystals based on the number of victory points generated.
- Does not change army strength, casualties inflicted or casualties suffered.

The army concentrates on making magical preparations, shoring up their reserves of mana crystals and seeking out nearby sources of magic. A portion of this bounty in the form of mana crystals is passed to the army general so that they can make the most appropriate use of it.

Ritual targeting

This army contains many specialized magicians and magical experts. The general of the army can serve as a focus for any ritual that targets a territory, replacing the requirement for that ritual to be performed at a regio in the target territory. This only works for rituals targeting the territory where the army is currently on campaign. The general must be present throughout the ritual. Examples of rituals that can be empowered in this way might include Frozen Citadel of Cathan Canae (although the target territory must still contain a suitable region), or a curse such as Rivers Run Red or Naeve's Twisting Blight.

Mercenary

- The army can use siege, scouting, foraging, resilient or skirmishing once each per year
- Other Descriptors: Flexible, Free Company

A mercenary army has experience working with and integrating mercenaries and other independent military units. They may employ siege engineers, expert scouts, wagon raiders, light infantry or free companies, but each group can only be employed once each year. The Wolves of War is a League army that attracts mercenary banners and free companies from across the empire.

Mercenary Options

A mercenary army is versatile, but can only employ each type of specialist troop once a year. For example, the general of the Wolves of War is appointed in Autumn. They might immediately employ wagon raiders (and use the pillage order), but then cannot employ those auxiliary troops again until after the next Autumn summit.

Physick

- Can use the tend the fallen order when defending
- Other Descriptors: Apothecary, Grimnir, Healer, Herbalist, Hospitaller, Support

A physick army contains a large number of battle-field hardened healers of various traditions, and soldiers adept at fighting alongside them. The force excels at using medical skills, establishing mobile field hospitals, and applying principles of triage to save those who can be saved. The Valiant Pegasus of Highguard has the physick quality. The Wintermark Bloodcloaks, who also possessed this quality, were lost to the Thule during the reign of Empress Brannan. Known for their crimson cloaks, the army was composed of many grimmir and mystics; all save a few were slaughtered during a disastrous retreat from Otkodov.

Tend the fallen

- All casualties suffered by this army are reduced by a fifth.
- All casualties suffered by allied armies in the same territory who are taking defensive orders are reduced by a tenth.
- The ability of this army to defend territory is reduced by a fifth.

The army establishes mobile field hospitals, and supply points while ensuring allied forces are accompanied by talented physicks and soldiers trained to support them. Medicinal herbs are gathered, and healing or defensive potions distributed to officers. The army focuses on moving casualties away from battlefields, patching them up, and returning them to the front.

Relentless

- Can use the cut them down order when attacking
- Other Descriptors: Bloodthirsty, Ruthless, Savage

A relentless army is capable of focused, sustained attacks against their enemies. They may have superior equipment, advanced combat training, or simply possess an unquenchable thirst for the blood of their foes. Within the Empire, the Bounders are known for their relentless pursuit of their enemies while the Summer Storm of the Imperial Orcs are known for their military acumen and carefully channelled bloodlust. It is also a common quality for Jotun and Druj armies.

Cut them down

- Casualties inflicted by this army are increased by three tenths
- Casualties suffered by this army are increased by a fifth

The army takes every opportunity to engage with the enemy to try and cut them down. They may claim some territory, but this is secondary to their goal of slaughtering as many of the enemy as possible. This emphasis on engaging the enemy means that the army loses more troops itself; but the commitment to fighting and preparations it takes mean that it suffers comparatively less than the opponents it engages.

Resilient

- Can use the grinding advance order when attacking

Other Descriptors: Cautious, Defensive, Responsive

A resilient army fights defensively, even while advancing. It often represents an army that specialises in heavy armour and shields, but it might also represent an army of soldiers with above-average fortitude or endurance. The heavily armoured Golden Sun of Dawn, and the adaptable Golden Axe of Varushka are resilient armies.

Grinding advance

- Casualties suffered by this army are reduced by three tenths.
- Casualties inflicted by this army are reduced by a fifth.

The army slowly advances, consolidating every gain before moving forward. The army looks to avoid direct engagements with the enemy, ceasing their advance and taking defensive positions if they are engaged.

Resourceful

- This army can benefit from emergency resupply regardless of what territory they are in or whether they are engaged by the enemy.
- This army can benefit from natural resupply regardless of what territory they are in as long as they are not engaged by the enemy, even if they are taking an attacking order.
- Other Descriptors: Quartermasters, Superior Logistics

A resourceful army has expert logistical support. It can quickly distribute resources and assign new soldiers, even while under attack. It may also represent an army whose soldiers are doggedly committed to their cause, so that soldiers who are so badly hurt they would normally be decommissioned fight to be allowed to rejoin their units. The Eastern Sky army of Dawn and the Drakes of the Marches enjoy the support of the people of their nation, represented by regular investment of people and resources to keep the army at fighting strength.

Scouting

- Can use the Gather Intelligence order when attacking
- Can use the Guard the Gates order when defending.
- Other Descriptors: Astute, Farsight, Infiltration

A scouting army is adept at gathering information about opposing forces. While it is active in a territory, associated rangers, agents and magicians gather intelligence about opposing forces in the area. They compose a report specifically for their general which includes information about significant forces in the area. Because this information is gathered by mundane means, and by agents in the field, it is rarely impeded by magical effects such as Drawing the Penumbral Veil. Both the Navarr army of the Quiet Step and the Highborn unconquered auxiliaries of the Seventh Wave are excellent scouts.

Gather Intelligence

- The general who commands the army receives a report about forces present in the same territory as the army
- Casualties inflicted by this army are reduced by one fifth.

A general who sends their scouts to gather information while engaged in an aggressive campaign receives a report that includes details of the enemy campaign armies in the territory; their allegiance; an estimation of their strength; the name of their general and information about their special qualities. They also receive information about significant local fortifications; and other potentially useful strategic and tactical information about the campaign and the forces involved in it..

Guard the Gates

- The general who commands the army receives a report about forces present in the same territory as the army
- Casualties inflicted by this army are reduced by one fifth.

While defending, the general can send their scouts and spies out to focus their attention within the borders of the land their side controls. They receive information about any foreign spy network operating in the territory, and about any strategic or tactical opportunities related to defending the territory from outside forces. They also receive details of any enemy campaign armies that undertake an attacking order in the territory - their allegiance; an estimation of their strength; the name of their general and information about their special qualities.

Siege

- Can use the storm the walls order when attacking
- Other Descriptors: Engineer, Sappers

A siege army excels at attacking fortifications. The army is experienced with fighting over the walls of enemy castles, and supported by engineers and artisans who can quickly built siege engines. The newly recommissioned League army of the Towerjacks has this quality.

Storm the walls

- The army must be attacking a region containing a fortification or else the order defaults to cautious advance
- The ability of this army to capture the fortified region is increased by half
- Casualties suffered by the army are increased by three tenths.

The army unleashes hell against the fortification. While catapults and trebuchet pound the walls, siege towers and ladders are deployed to allow the soldiers to take the fight to the defenders. Meanwhile, engineers work to undermine the walls, and massive covered rams are deployed against the gates. The loss of life is likely to be severe, but the fortification will fall much more quickly than it might in a prolonged siege.

Skirmishing

- Can use the outmaneuver order when attacking
- Other Descriptors: Maneuverable, Flanking, Tactical

A skirmishing army specialises in outmaneuvering its opponents. The mobility and independence of the troops composing the army makes it extremely effective at exploiting situations where some or all of the enemy armies have committed to defence, rather than attack. There are currently no Imperial armies with this quality; the venerable Thundering Tide, composed of the descendants of the old Highborn light cavalry units, were disbanded during the reign of Empress Mariika. Many of the unconquered and cataphracts that used to belong to this army would go on to join the Seventh Wave

Outmaneuver

- The army gains an additional victory point for each enemy army in the territory that takes a defensive order, to a maximum of five additional victory points.
- If there are no enemy armies in the territory using defending orders, it defaults to Balanced attack.

The army attempts to take advantage of the enemies defensive stance and lack of mobility. The army probes the enemy defences, determines where they are weak, and reconfigures its attack plan to exploit those weaknesses. The more enemy forces defending a reason, the more complex the countermeasures the army employs to strengthen its own attack.

Venomous

- Can use the fire in the blood order when attacking
- Other Descriptors: Ambush, Assassin, Poisonous, Treacherous

A venomous army contains soldiers skilled in the use of poison and unorthodox tactics. The force contributes these experts to support allied attacks, luring enemies into traps or taking advantage of engagements to savagely ambush their foes. There is no Imperial army with this quality at the moment.

Fire in the blood

- All casualties inflicted by this army are increased by a tenth.
- All casualties suffered by this army are increased by a tenth.
- All casualties inflicted by allied armies in the same territory who have issued attacking orders are increased by a tenth.

The army works with their allies to set up ambushes, feints and opportunities to bypass enemy defences to kill high-value targets. Other elements of the force distribute poisoned weapons, or valuable offensive potions, to their allies.

Arratan Gamble

Overview

The Arratan Gamble stands in northern Enterio, in the League territory of Tassato. Custodianship of the Arratan Gamble grants an Imperial title; a seat on the Imperial Bourse; and a seasonal bounty of valuable white granite.

The Resource

The Gamble is a large quarry; is claimed that on a clear day the Arratan Gamble is visible from the tallest spires of the city. In addition to the white granite produced in the Gamble, the quarries of Entario are known for producing fine masonry stone using in construction throughout Tassato and the central Empire.

Official records have always named the quarry Arratan Gamble, but the quarry has also been known as Lerner's Folly, and most often The Poor Choice. The reason is simple; as the ruination of many a citizen, the quarry is believed to be cursed. According to rumour, Ernesto Lerner von Temeschwar was the first of the victims claimed by the quarry. The first Imperial citizen to hold the Seat, he was an inveterate gambler. Within six months of taking the Seat, he was murdered - hurled off the top of the quarry by one of his many debtors. In plays and stories, Ernesto is killed by a group of people, each of whom had been promised the full production of the Arratan Gamble as collateral on a loan, or inducement to invest in his campaign to take the Bourse seat.

After that follows a litany of unfortunate seat holders; a Varushkan poisoned by an apple; a Marcher stabbed whilst visiting the "theatres" of Tassato Mestra. One notable death came when Tamani i Riqueza was killed when Mightly Franco, the largest single block of white granite ever raised from the quarry, somehow toppled over and crushed her.

Those of a rational persuasion do not believe the Gamble to be cursed. Many of them blame the dissolute lives of the victims themselves, and blame poor tallies on the workers themselves. The more cynical point out that every "victim" of the curse of the Arratan Gamble has come from somewhere other than Tassato, and point to the legendary jealousy of the citizens of the twin cities. They also like to point out that no magical investigation of the Arratan Gamble has ever found the slightest trace of a curse. This absence of obvious malediction has allowed conspiracy theories to run riot - perhaps the most famous of which is the existence of a shadowy secret society immortalized in the play "The Fellowship of the Red and Gold Mask" - a cultish cabal made up of members of prominent guilds from both Tassato Mestra and Tassato Regario motivated by a crazed desire to punish any "outsider" who meddles in the feud between Regario and Mestra. Sensible people dismiss these claims as wild - albeit entertaining - fabrication.

Still, a wise Seat apportions the bounty of white granite provided by the Seat cautiously; is careful never to get into debt; and gives the actual quarry itself (and its workers) a wide berth.

The Bourse Seat

Responsibilities

The Seat has no particular responsibilities; they simply receive a bounty of white granite which is theirs to do with as they will. If the Arratan Gamble were to be threatened in any way, it would be the responsibility of the Seat to deal with those threats. Likewise, if any particular opportunity were to arise related to the Arratan Gamble, the Seat would expect to be consulted as to how that opportunity might be resolved.

Powers

Seat on the Bourse

Custodianship of the Arratan Gamble comes with a seat on the Imperial Bourse. For the most part, this Seat comes with no additional responsibilities. It is an Imperial title that grants the right to participate on the rare occasion when the Imperial Bourse as a body is required to make a decision.

Bounty of white granite

The Seat has control of a source of white granite and receives Bourse certificates to represent that control. They can dispense this resource as they choose. Production is 25 Imperial wains of white granite every season.

Appointment

As with all white granite Bourse seats, the holder of the title is determined during the Summer Solstice. As an Imperial seat, any Imperial citizen may participate in the auction and hold the title.

Custodianship of the Arratan Gamble is retained for a year, or until the citizen holding the seat dies, or steps down. An Imperial Bourse seat cannot be revoked by the Imperial Synod.

Art of the Deal

Rules

Autumn Magnitude 8

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets a fleet. The character who controls the target personal resource must be present throughout.

This spell is an enchantment. A target may only be under one enchantment effect at a time.

Effects

The fleet provides an additional 120 rings of profit over the next season, in addition to normal production, but only if it engages in foreign trade.

The character who controls the target resource is under a roleplaying effect for at least ten minutes after the ritual is performed: they feel a strong sense of the worth of every item they possess, and of how much they would trade to acquire the items and attributes of others. They see all interactions in transactional terms, and are absolutely disinclined to engage in either altruistic or charitable action.

The effect lasts until the start of the next Profound Decisions Empire event. If the owner of the resource does not attend the next event, then the additional production provided by the resource is still added to that character's inventory. If the fleet does not engage in foreign trade during the next downtime, the ritual has no effect.

If the owner of the resource does not attend the next event, then the additional production provided by the resource is still added to that character's inventory.

Additional Targets

This ritual can affect additional fleets as long as they are controlled by characters in the same band. Each additional fleet increases the magnitude by 6. The character who controls each fleet must be present throughout the ritual.

Description

This ritual enchants the traders associated with a fleet resource, giving them an innate feel for deals and trade. As with Rivers of Gold and similar effects it serendipitously influences the likelihood that they will make profitable deals, and it grants supernatural insight into the shifts and trends of the markets through which they move. It is very subtle in its effect, but it means that a trader with a hold full of trade goods reaching the Asavean Archipelago or the Sarcophan Delves is assured not only of purchasing valuable goods of use to Imperial citizens but also returning with a hold groaning with obscure and exotic trade goods that will sell well on the docks, paradors, bazaars and markets of the Empire.

As with many such rituals, especially in the Realm of Autumn, the effect is more economical the more fleets it targets. Six crowns for four crystal mana is one thing; eighteen crowns for ten crystal mana is much more appealing. The true joy of this ritual for many Autumn ritualists is the knowledge that their magic is reaching half-way around the world. Through this ritual and others like it, their influence is felt in distant parts of the globe, without their ever having to leave their comfortable chairs in the Empire.

On occasion fleets enchanted by this ritual have returned to the Empire with exotic, unexpected trade goods whose value has far exceeded what was expected. There are whispered stories of rare trade goods, exotic narcotics, supernatural liquors, minor enchanted items and even (on one occasion) a ring of ilium found among the many fine items acquired by the traders whose ships were under the influence of this Autumn spell.

- 3 Common Elements

Mind you it is also worth noting that some of these "items" have brought nearly as much danger as they have presented opportunities for profit and influence, such as the time a Freeborn dromond returned with an exiled Jarmite princess hiding in a weirwood wardrobe, or when a Dawnish caravel returned from the Sarcophan Delves with a delicate golden ring stolen by tomb robbers whose unsleeping, undying guarding proceeded to pursue it to the Empire and cause havoc in Weirwater.

Common Elements

This ritual encourages profitable deals and exchanges, and enhances the natural interpersonal skills of a merchant or trader. The performance is often accompanied by coins and other precious items, especially those symbolic of foreign trade. In The Marches and The Brass Coast, coins taken from a previous venture's profit are often used as a way to 'prime' the enchantment and attract more wealth. The rune Pallas is often evoked, but so are subtle rune of plots and the serendipitous rune of chance, as well as the rune of discovery - chosen both for its connection to ships and to highlight the idea that the wealth this ritual offers is sought - it does not simply fall into the lap of the merchant. Symbols of Prosperity are also common, often with an invocation highlighting the rewards of hard work.

Foreign traders are a component of some rituals; Navarr ritualists often mix blood with that of a visitor to the Empire to symbolically encourage understanding between strangers; likewise, Varushkan ritualists might create an oath or promise between the target and a representative of a foreign land, and use that oath to strengthen the ritual. Stones from foreign seaports might be the target of the enchantment, then used for ballast on the flagship of the fleet, and flags or even sails woven by skilled ritualists might be enchanted and used to help the ship navigate treacherous waters both literal and metaphoric.

Artefacts

An artefact is a magical item whose enchantment is permanent. These items can only be permanently destroyed with the Words of Ending ritual or by certain powerful creatures (including some eternals).

Artefacts are not common because they require a significant investment of the exotic material ilium. The most common place to acquire this material is from the Imperial Bourse; several Seats (such as the Regario dossier or The Scorrero Nets) provide their holder with a bounty of ilium. Occasional finds of ilium by private citizens also tend to be auctioned through the Bourse to the benefit of the lucky prospector.

Every artefact has a name, and many exert strong influence over their wielders in the form of roleplaying effects. Over time these roleplaying effects may become more pronounced, or subtly shift, based on the significant events in which the item is involved. This is a permanent part of the item and cannot be removed with a ceremony of exorcism.

An artefact is still affected by the shatter call, but can always be repaired with the mend spell.

Creating an artefact

An artisan can create an artefact version of any magical item they know how to craft.

Creating an artefact requires one ring of Ilium for each ingot and measure required to make the item, with a minimum of 10 rings of Ilium. For example, crafting a permanent duelist's scales sword, which requires seven ingots of orichalcum, three ingots of tempest jade, three ingots of weltsilver and three units of beggar's lye will require sixteen rings of Ilium to craft as an artefact.

The ilium must be imbued into the item at the same time it is crafted; it's not possible to make an existing magic item into an artefact.

The creator gives the artefact a unique name when they craft the item, which appears on the item ribbon; they may choose to imbue the item with a roleplaying effect. Such roleplaying effects usually reflect the nature of the artisan, or the purpose for which it is intended.

For example, Guntherm's Hammer is an artefact greathammer crafted for the Steinr Emperor Guntherm which shares the magical qualities of a Captain's Command weapon but fills the wielder with a strong desire to kill any orc standing on Imperial soil.

Artisan's Oil

Description

Every artisan knows how to prepare Artisan's Oil. When applied by someone who understands the complex secrets of creating magic items, Artisan's Oil quickly mends an item that has been damaged by a shattering blow.

This thick, glutinous substance can be stored indefinitely, and is usually contained in bottles, jars, and small pots. In Wintermark, these containers are already being marked with the Rune of Wealth, although several Urizen artificers have expressed a preference for the astronomantic symbol of the Chalice.

The procedure for creating Artisan's Oil was disseminated throughout the Empire in late Autumn and early Winter of 379YE by agents of the Fellowship of Purple Sails. Agents of this relatively young sodality secured the process from representatives of the Commonwealth where it was originally developed. Already, several variations have been tried and tested by imaginative Imperial artisans, resulting in substances closer to a salve, cream, or paste than an oil. Regardless, the substance has the same marvellous properties regardless of the precise materials that go into its creation. Some of the substances are quite expensive, but readily available throughout the Empire. A month of work by an artisan produces three doses of Artisan's Oil, and consumes a crown's worth of materials.

The substance is equally effective at restoring both magical and non-magical items; even an artefact can be fully restored with the application of Artisan's Oil. A magical item repaired with this substance retains all its special properties (although obviously any restricted abilities that have been expended are still used up).

As with the mend spell, Artisan's Oil can be difficult to use in the middle of a fight. The artificer needs several moments to apply the oil, during which time they must handle the item and ensure that all parts are covered with the valuable substance, and avoid being interrupted. Unlike the magical ability of some magicians, however, an artificer can employ Artisan's Oil while fully armoured.

The oil is mildly toxic. If someone were to eat it for some reason, they would suffer painful stomach cramps and constipation.

Rules

- Can only be applied by a character with the artisan skill.
- Using 30 seconds of appropriate roleplaying the artisan This oil repairs an item, such as a weapon or shield that has been broken using the SHATTER call.
- The artisan's oil use fails if you or the target item are hit, or used to attack another character, during application. The artisan's oil is not consumed but the roleplaying must be begun again.
- Materials: Crafting Artisan's Oil requires a crown's worth of materials. It takes one month to make three doses of Artisan's Oil.

Asavean Archipelago (Redirected from Asavea)

The information presented here is designed to give a feel for the foreign nation, and is by no means exhaustive. The focus of the Empire campaign is on the Empire and its citizens, and while this information can be used to create backgrounds or inform role-playing on the field; it is not intended that players portray characters from this foreign nation without discussion with Profound Decisions.

Overview

A predominantly island culture, Asavea possesses a small empire scattered across a sprawling archipelago, far across the ocean to the west. A timeless and cultured nation, it sees itself as having moved beyond the questioning and struggle of more primitive lands. The Asavean people consider their society to approach perfection; change is considered unnecessary and disruptive and should be avoided as much as possible.

Until around a hundred years ago, the Asavean empire had holdings all over the world. Over the last century they have slowly withdrawn, turning their attention inwards. They appear to be a nation in decline, although they are still powerful enough to maintain a presence on the 'world stage'.

Of particular interest to Imperial citizens are the Asavean ports which are open to trade with the Empire.

Terrain

Asavea is much warmer than the Empire, and centred around several chains of volcanic islands. Their land mass isn't huge (probably about the equal of any two Imperial nations), but it is densely populated. Each island is surrounded by floating shanty towns inhabited by the poorest members of Asavean society. The Asavean engineers are experts at creating structures on and in water, draining swamps and performing other tasks that allow them to expand the habitable land-mass of their archipelago. In the past they have regularly used powerful ritual magic in the pursuit of more living space, but these days they prefer to do their land-sculpting with large numbers of slaves over many decades.

People

The people of Asavea are almost exclusively human. Members of all six lineages are known among them, but only the merrow lineage really prospers. Members of other lineages (especially cambion and briar) are often seen as being 'troublemakers' and exiled to positions in the subject territories. Several of the ruling families have strong merrow blood. Orcs are almost unknown; they are usually considered to be exotic, primitive savages who none-the-less enjoy a level of mystique and feature in several lurid Asavean tales of adventure (usually as cannibalistic worshippers of dark god-spirits who bring the foolish adventurer's expedition to a nasty end).

The archipelago is ruled through a system of shared hereditary nobility known as the Plenum. The head of each major household has a seat on the Plenum and receives a set share of the nation's wealth. While the Plenum can make laws and take decisions, they rarely do so quickly, and years of debate and consultation of precedent can be required to make major changes. In truth the Plenum more often discusses matters such as art and philosophy, preferring to let their slave-run civil service administer to the day-to-day affairs of state.

Almost all manual labour, and a good deal of skilled labour is done by the slave class, which constitutes the majority of the population. However, slaves are strictly stratified and spend a lot of time trying to advance themselves. A high-caste slave could wield similar influence to an Imperial citizen, and slaves are generally well treated. However, children of slaves automatically start at the lowest caste, and must work their way up through effort and rigorous examinations. Slaves cannot be granted freedom, as it is an accepted part of the natural order of things that they remain so. The vast majority accept the stratification of Asavean society without question; those who do not are exiled or executed.

Although the Asaveans still regard themselves as sprung from heroic stock, the truth is that they no longer regard the military as either glorious or important. Members of the Plenum caste often serve as officers, but this is merely considered tedious civic duty, and most allow their competent slave-soldiers to handle things.

The Asaveans are extremely wealthy due in part to their large slave-fleets and their dominant position for shipping. They trade extensively to both east and west, and are known to deal with nations far beyond those familiar with Imperial traders in lands beyond the setting sun. Despite their emphasis on social stability, Asavea has an enormous and insatiable appetite for luxury goods and rare objects. Anything unique, novel or aesthetically pleasing fetches a high price, as the nobles are always looking for items to add to their collections.

Politics

According to the legends of the islands, the archipelago was once home to monsters, with the only safety to be found in walled city-states who feuded continually with each other. Starvation was common, and resources were scarce because the interior lands were so dangerous. In myth, the heroes known as the Asav were born directly out of the ocean; shining champions who conquered the bickering cities, united the people of the archipelago and destroyed the monsters. The Asav brought order and civilisation, and by tradition the members of the Plenum caste claim blood descent from them.

The rulers of a number of smaller nations near the Asavean Archipelago are 'advised' by satraps appointed by the Plenum. These nations maintain a polite fiction of independence but are Asavean subjects in all but name. The satraps often help the smaller nation maintain order through the use of Asavean troops. Imperial citizens who have visited these smaller nations often comment that the Asaveans they encounter there seem more alert, competent and committed to the ideals of their nation than those they encounter in the Archipelago itself. These lesser nations tend to speak the same mix of languages that are spoken on Asavea proper, and it is likely that they form the root from which the Asavean people have sprung.

The defences of the island chains are impressive, with fortifications that have been added to for centuries, and standing armies of well equipped and drilled slave-soldiers. Many Asavean structures, especially those built outside the Archipelago proper, are heavily fortified - a remnant of a time when their ancestors were constantly under threat of war or invasion. With deep pockets, and large stores, they can always afford to simply retreat behind their walls, allowing time for their allies to send aid. Modern Asavean architecture focuses more on beauty than defensibility.

While they have a large navy, their vessels are more commonly trading or pleasure ships. Almost all Asavean ships use banks of oars and slaves to supplement their sails, and are based on developments of the dromon and the liburna. Although they maintain a small number of military vessels, they often rely on mercenaries to protect their fleets. While the Asavean shipwrights were the best in the world just over a century ago, their designs have been superseded by those of younger nations such as the Empire and the Sarcophan Delves; Imperial vessels may be more dependant on the vagaries of the wind but they do not require slaves, and those of the Sarcophan Delves are often moved by entirely reliable crews of tireless unliving creatures rather than slaves that require food, drink and discipline.

Magic

At their height, the Asavean sorcerers were powerful wielders of ritual magic. Over the last century or so, their magical power has declined. The Asavean Archipelago has fewer magicians than the Empire, although this is likely to be more due to a lack of access to teaching than to any lack of actual magical ability. Most of their ritual magicians are now slaves, although every coven is lead by a member of the Plenum caste.

Magicians of the Plenum caste perform their civic duties in a perfunctory way, spending most of their time in private research into the wonders of the universe - or naval gazing as many Imperial magicians would have it. There are some very loose ties between the Asavean magicians and the Imperial Order of the Unfettered Mind, as well as with similar cabals in other parts of the world.

Religion

They are polytheistic, and completely open to any religion that doesn't interfere with the smooth functioning of their state. However, fervent belief is seen as uncouth and uncivilised, and those of the Plenum caste see religion as being a matter of tradition rather than spirit. Slaves are often deeply religious, but know well enough to be quiet and discrete in public.

There are over a hundred Asavean god-spirits, and only their priests are likely to know more than a handful. Priests are often extensively tattooed with images that represent the god-spirits to which they feel the closest connection. Offerings are made to the god-spirits by those who need good fortune in an area that god-spirit oversees, or who wish a rival to suffer bad luck in that area, or who wish to fend off bad luck. Offerings are usually burnt before an image of the god-spirit in question by a priest. Human sacrifice is not a common practice but is known to have taken place in the past, and there are dark mutterings among Imperial missionaries that in some extreme cases it continues to this day.

This practice informs the belief among members of the Plenum caste that goods burned with the body accompany the soul into its afterlife. Hence members of the nobility have a tradition of amassing enormous collections of exotic items to be burned with them on a slave-ship when they die. In the past, the slaves were also burned with their masters, but these days this only applies if the slaves themselves constitute a collection. They amass libraries, treasure vaults and halls full of antiquities, only to have them all burned to ash with them upon death. They regard this as rather obvious, and engaging in one-upmanship for collections is a major past-time amongst the Plenum class.

Recently the Way of the Imperial faith has begun to find a foothold amongst the slaves of Asavea, and several members of the Plenum are becoming alarmed – objecting to its strident and atheistic tone. They have exhorted the Imperial missionaries to “tone down” their rhetoric for the public good. However it is a little unclear whether this growing dissatisfaction is a result of Imperial missionaries, or whether agents from the Sumaah Republic are to blame.

Look and Feel

Asavea is much warmer than the Empire, and this is reflected in their dress. Long tunics are common, sometimes with a loose robe in a contrasting colour worn over the top. Tunic and robe alike will often possess decorative embroidery - even slaves have access to materials that allow them to decorate their clothing. White is the most common colour for the tunic, with red, purple and green being the most common colours for the loose robe. The most valuable tunics are bleached brilliant white with beggar's lye, while the most valuable robes are dyed in a number of deep blue hues using iridescent gloaming and Cerulean Mazzarine. Asavean blue is a valuable coloured cloth that is sold throughout the known world.

Members of the Plenum caste of both sexes usually wear a toga over the top of their tunic, rather than a robe. Only the highest ranking slaves are allowed to wear the toga, and only the Plenum caste are allowed to wear the prestigious black toga on pain of death. The toga is usually worn only out of doors or in very formal situations, and is rarely embroidered or decorated.

Jewelry tends to be ostentatious but an Asavean would rather wear one or two pieces of extremely fine and valuable jewelry than drip with gold and gems - quality over quantity is a traditional Asavean saying and applies especially in this area.

Languages

The Asavean people are the descendants of a number of tribes from a wide geographic area. The dominant languages of the archipelago are represented by those from the romanic language group especially French, Italian, Portugese, Romanian and Spanish. French and Spanish are slightly more dominant than the others, and at various points in their history one or the other has dominated Plenum business; when people refer to Asavean they may be talking about any of these tongues.

Asavean Archipelago in play

The Asavean Archipelago is a nation that has become hide-bound, inward-looking and decadent. It is facing a slow decline into obscurity, and whether it goes quietly, explodes in a frenzy of violence, or somehow renews itself, only time will tell. At its peak a hundred years ago, it can be seen as an “elder statesman” of the other nations active on the ‘world stage’. It combines a number of ideas and images from real-world Roman, Greek, Byzantine, Phoenician and Egyptian empires as well as diverse fictional sources such as Mervyn Peake’s Gormenghast or even David Eddings’ Mallorean.

While Asavea is a nation based on slavery, the institution is so old and hierarchical that the majority of the slaves consider it entirely normal. For the most part, only those slaves on the very bottom rung of society - those who labour in fields and mines - have a poor quality of life. Many of the slaves in the higher echelons have a lifestyle that peasants in other parts of the world would envy. To many Asaveans, freedom is a terrifying prospect which is generally believed to lead to starvation and death, or murder at the hands of criminals. The entire society reinforces this belief, and those who agitate for freedom are viewed at best as insane and at worst as anarchists who want to destroy society. This is not the prevalent attitude among the subject territories, but even there the presence of Asavean troops and the protection of Asavean naval forces is seen as a good thing that helps prevent society collapsing into widespread anarchy.

The Asavean people as a whole are traditional and hierarchical, introspective and faintly smug but they are no more stupid or cruel than anyone else. They consider their society as close to perfect as makes no difference, and tend to ignore critics as being irrelevant, ignorant or rude.

Asavean merchants travel to several locations favoured by the Empire, and their languages are spoken all over the known world as a consequence. Characters who speak French, Italian or other ‘Asavean’ languages might never have visited the archipelago itself, and may have only a tenuous connection to the distant island empire.

It's worth noting that the Asavean god-spirits are not 'real' in the way the virtues of the Way are real - these are not Eternal cults, and Imperial scholars suggest that many of them are defied versions of folk heroes whose stories have taken on a supernatural edge. Asavean priests lack access to any religious skills; have no use for liao; and while they believe in reincarnation they assume that people are reincarnated into the same caste they were in their previous life. Their faith is very institutionalised and secularised, and it seems that few Asavean people actually believe in the god-spirits. Some of these god-spirits have odd similarities to Paragons and Exemplars, and the Asaveans are quite happy to absorb the gods, folk-heroes and ancestors of other nations into their bloated pantheon.

In short, while many Imperial citizens find Asavean society offensive, it will take a lot more to change it than a foreigner going to Nemoria and telling the teeming citizenry that they are 'doing it wrong'.

Asavean Archipelago

The information presented here is designed to give a feel for the foreign nation, and is by no means exhaustive. The focus of the Empire campaign is on the Empire and its citizens, and while this information can be used to create backgrounds or inform role-playing on the field; it is not intended that players portray characters from this foreign nation without discussion with Profound Decisions.

Overview

A predominantly island culture, Asavea possesses a small empire scattered across a sprawling archipelago, far across the ocean to the west. A timeless and cultured nation, it sees itself as having moved beyond the questioning and struggle of more primitive lands. The Asavean people consider their society to approach perfection; change is considered unnecessary and disruptive and should be avoided as much as possible.

Until around a hundred years ago, the Asavean empire had holdings all over the world. Over the last century they have slowly withdrawn, turning their attention inwards. They appear to be a nation in decline, although they are still powerful enough to maintain a presence on the 'world stage'.

Of particular interest to Imperial citizens are the Asavean ports which are open to trade with the Empire.

Terrain

Asavea is much warmer than the Empire, and centred around several chains of volcanic islands. Their land mass isn't huge (probably about the equal of any two Imperial nations), but it is densely populated. Each island is surrounded by floating shanty towns inhabited by the poorest members of Asavean society. The Asavean engineers are experts at creating structures on and in water, draining swamps and performing other tasks that allow them to expand the habitable land-mass of their archipelago. In the past they have regularly used powerful ritual magic in the pursuit of more living space, but these days they prefer to do their land-sculpting with large numbers of slaves over many decades.

People

The people of Asavea are almost exclusively human. Members of all six lineages are known among them, but only the merrow lineage really prospers. Members of other lineages (especially cambion and briar) are often seen as being 'troublemakers' and exiled to positions in the subject territories. Several of the ruling families have strong merrow blood. Orcs are almost unknown; they are usually considered to be exotic, primitive savages who none-the-less enjoy a level of mystique and feature in several lurid Asavean tales of adventure (usually as cannibalistic worshippers of dark god-spirits who bring the foolish adventurer's expedition to a nasty end).

The archipelago is ruled through a system of shared hereditary nobility known as the Plenum. The head of each major household has a seat on the Plenum and receives a set share of the nation's wealth. While the Plenum can make laws and take decisions, they rarely do so quickly, and years of debate and consultation of precedent can be required to make major changes. In truth the Plenum more often discusses matters such as art and philosophy, preferring to let their slave-run civil service administer to the day-to-day affairs of state.

Almost all manual labour, and a good deal of skilled labour is done by the slave class, which constitutes the majority of the population. However, slaves are strictly stratified and spend a lot of time trying to advance themselves. A high-caste slave could wield similar influence to an Imperial citizen, and slaves are generally well treated. However, children of slaves automatically start at the lowest caste, and must work their way up through effort and rigorous examinations. Slaves cannot be granted freedom, as it is an accepted part of the natural order of things that they remain so. The vast majority accept the stratification of Asavean society without question; those who do not are exiled or executed.

Although the Asaveans still regard themselves as sprung from heroic stock, the truth is that they no longer regard the military as either glorious or important. Members of the Plenum caste often serve as officers, but this is merely considered tedious civic duty, and most allow their competent slave-soldiers to handle things.

The Asaveans are extremely wealthy due in part to their large slave-fleets and their dominant position for shipping. They trade extensively to both east and west, and are known to deal with nations far beyond those familiar with Imperial traders in lands beyond the setting sun. Despite their emphasis on social stability, Asavea has an enormous and insatiable appetite for luxury goods and rare objects. Anything unique, novel or aesthetically pleasing fetches a high price, as the nobles are always looking for items to add to their collections.

Politics

According to the legends of the islands, the archipelago was once home to monsters, with the only safety to be found in walled city-states who feuded continually with each other. Starvation was common, and resources were scarce because the interior lands were so dangerous. In myth, the heroes known as the Asav were born directly out of the ocean; shining champions who conquered the bickering cities, united the people of the archipelago and destroyed the monsters. The Asav brought order and civilisation, and by tradition the members of the Plenum caste claim blood descent from them.

The rulers of a number of smaller nations near the Asavean Archipelago are 'advised' by satraps appointed by the Plenum. These nations maintain a polite fiction of independence but are Asavean subjects in all but name. The satraps often help the smaller nation maintain order through the use of Asavean troops. Imperial citizens who have visited these smaller nations often comment that the Asaveans they encounter there seem more alert, competent and committed to the ideals of their nation than those they encounter in the Archipelago itself. These lesser nations tend to speak the same mix of languages that are spoken on Asavea proper, and it is likely that they form the root from which the Asavean people have sprung.

The defences of the island chains are impressive, with fortifications that have been added to for centuries, and standing armies of well equipped and drilled slave-soldiers. Many Asavean structures, especially those built outside the Archipelago proper, are heavily fortified - a remnant of a time when their ancestors were constantly under threat of war or invasion. With deep pockets, and large stores, they can always afford to simply retreat behind their walls, allowing time for their allies to send aid. Modern Asavean architecture focuses more on beauty than defensibility.

While they have a large navy, their vessels are more commonly trading or pleasure ships. Almost all Asavean ships use banks of oars and slaves to supplement their sails, and are based on developments of the dromon and the liburna. Although they maintain a small number of military vessels, they often rely on mercenaries to protect their fleets. While the Asavean shipwrights were the best in the world just over a century ago, their designs have been superseded by those of younger nations such as the Empire and the Sarcophan Delves; Imperial vessels may be more dependant on the vagaries of the wind but they do not require slaves, and those of the Sarcophan Delves are often moved by entirely reliable crews of tireless unliving creatures rather than slaves that require food, drink and discipline.

Magic

At their height, the Asavean sorcerers were powerful wielders of ritual magic. Over the last century or so, their magical power has declined. The Asavean Archipelago has fewer magicians than the Empire, although this is likely to be more due to a lack of access to teaching than to any lack of actual magical ability. Most of their ritual magicians are now slaves, although every coven is lead by a member of the Plenum caste.

Magicians of the Plenum caste perform their civic duties in a perfunctory way, spending most of their time in private research into the wonders of the universe - or naval gazing as many Imperial magicians would have it. There are some very loose ties between the Asavean magicians and the Imperial Order of the Unfettered Mind, as well as with similar cabals in other parts of the world.

Religion

They are polytheistic, and completely open to any religion that doesn't interfere with the smooth functioning of their state. However, fervent belief is seen as uncouth and uncivilised, and those of the Plenum caste see religion as being a matter of tradition rather than spirit. Slaves are often deeply religious, but know well enough to be quiet and discrete in public.

There are over a hundred Asavean god-spirits, and only their priests are likely to know more than a handful. Priests are often extensively tattooed with images that represent the god-spirits to which they feel the closest connection. Offerings are made to the god-spirits by those who need good fortune in an area that god-spirit oversees, or who wish a rival to suffer bad luck in that area, or who wish to fend off bad luck. Offerings are usually burnt before an image of the god-spirit in question by a priest. Human sacrifice is not a common practice but is known to have taken place in the past, and there are dark mutterings among Imperial missionaries that in some extreme cases it continues to this day.

This practice informs the belief among members of the Plenum caste that goods burned with the body accompany the soul into its afterlife. Hence members of the nobility have a tradition of amassing enormous collections of exotic items to be burned with them on a slave-ship when they die. In the past, the slaves were also burned with their masters, but these days this only applies if the slaves themselves constitute a collection. They amass libraries, treasure vaults and halls full of antiquities, only to have them all burned to ash with them upon death. They regard this as rather obvious, and engaging in one-upmanship for collections is a major past-time amongst the Plenum class.

Recently the Way of the Imperial faith has begun to find a foothold amongst the slaves of Asavea, and several members of the Plenum are becoming alarmed – objecting to its strident and atheistic tone. They have exhorted the Imperial missionaries to “tone down” their rhetoric for the public good. However it is a little unclear whether this growing dissatisfaction is a result of Imperial missionaries, or whether agents from the Sumaah Republic are to blame.

Asavean blue is a valuable coloured cloth that is sold throughout the known world.

Members of the Plenum caste of all genders usually wear a toga over the top of their tunic, rather than a robe. Only the highest ranking slaves are allowed to wear the toga, and only the Plenum caste are allowed to wear the prestigious black toga on pain of death. The toga is usually worn only out of doors or in very formal situations, and is rarely embroidered or decorated.

Asavean Archipelago ports

Overview

There is only one port available to Imperial characters with the fleet resource; Nemoria, jewel of the Asavean Archipelago.

Some Imperial fleets skirt the central islands of the archipelago and trade with the various smaller subject states dominated by the Asavean Satraps. These states tend to be poorer than Asavea itself, and trade in roughly the same goods (OOC: It is fine to role-play trading with one of the subject nations, but your character will receive the same goods regardless of whether they go to Nemoria proper or not.)

Nemoria

Jewel of the balmy Asavean Archipelago, the civilised folk of Nemoria welcome traders who bring exotic curiosities. White marble columns, exotic flowers, the hustle-and-bustle of the great wharf-side markets where slaves buy food for their noble masters from higher-ranking merchant slaves, Imperial vessels lie alongside ships from nations far to the west beneath the setting sun, unknown in the Empire.

A range of goods can be acquired by traders from the Empire visiting Nemoria. Foreign visitors enjoy a status within Asavean society roughly equivalent to that of a high-ranking slave, although they have more freedom to travel and trade. Still, a merchant must be cautious not to get on the wrong side of a politically powerful member of the Plenum caste - or one of their favoured slaves.

In addition to orichalcum and tempest jade from the mines of the subject territories, Asavea trades extensively in iridescent gloaming and rich dyes of all colours, luxurious jewelry and exotic food and drink from lands unknown to the Imperial citizenry. The warm forests of several islands are given over to the cultivation of Cerulean Mazzarine, which is also used in the many subtle and gorgeous blue dyes favoured by many Asaveans.

Trade with Nemoria

A starting fleet resource that engages in trade with Nemoria during downtime will produce 3 doses of cerulean mazzarine, 3 ingots of orichalcum, 3 measures of iridescent gloaming and 2 ingots of tempest jade. A fleet that has been upgraded will produce more valuable resources according to this chart of foreign ports.

Ascendance of the Highest Mind

Rules

Day Magnitude 15

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets a character, who must be present throughout. The target character must have the magician skill.

This spell is an enchantment. A target may only be under one enchantment effect at a time.

Effects

The target gains the ability to cast up to three spells as if they knew them. The spells are chosen during the ritual, and must be known to at least one character who contributes to the performance.

They also experience a roleplaying effect: You feel an urge to increase your magical power and your knowledge of magic.

The effect lasts until the start of the next Profound Decisions Empire event.

Additional Targets

This ritual can affect additional characters from the same coven. Each additional character increases the magnitude by 11. Additional characters must have the magician skill and be present throughout; each target receives the ability to cast the same spells.

Description

Like Illuminate the Higher Mind and Transcendent Mastery, this ritual imprints precise knowledge of how incantations are performed, their effects and limitations, into the mind of the target. By using that knowledge they can perform the spell 'by rote' and greatly increase their personal knowledge of magical incantations.

The magical knowledge is more fragile than that granted by Illuminate the Higher Mind and erodes completely overnight. It allows a coven to focus their magical lore into a number of individual magicians, often with the intention of sending those individuals somewhere the coven as a whole are not going. It is rarely cast by a solo ritualist, although it would certainly be possible - the problem is that a ritualist powerful enough to perform the ritual solo rarely has a broad range of skills from which to choose. That said, there are several cases where a venerable volhov or a wise one has shared potent incantations with a young apprentice, or a staid enchanter has bestowed a surprising range of battlefield incantations on an ally.

Common Elements

The ritual usually involves a symbolic transfer of knowledge between the character or characters who know the chosen spells, and the recipients. Often this mimics the master/apprentice or student/teacher relationships, and sometimes it involves the casting of the spell to be taught. In cases where there are multiple magicians 'donating' spell knowledge, each will give a short lecture or demonstration in turn while the rest of the coven counterpoint with chants or gentle music.

Further ideas might be found in the description of Illuminate the Higher Mind.

Ascetic Star of Atun

Rules

Day Magnitude 2

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets a character, who must be present throughout.

The ritual fails if you or the target are hit, or attack another character.

Effects

This ritual removes the venom condition from the target.

The ritual will not treat more powerful poisons, but target receives a feeling of clarity and well-being that may also help alleviate roleplaying effects that cause nausea or fever. (such as that which may come from some traumatic wounds).

Additional Targets

This ritual can affect additional characters. The magnitude increases by one for every two additional targets. All targets must be present throughout, and the ritual fails if any of the targets are hit, or attack another character.

Description

The Navigator Atun is a Paragon of Wisdom, and most stories that speak of her describe her a Highborn ascetic; reserved, calm and distant. Some legends say that she lived almost entirely on bread and water for philosophical reasons, eschewing meat entirely, and treating alcohol and narcotics alike as poisons that had no place in her body. Some of her followers believed that her disdain for many worldly affairs freed her mind to allow her to refine her already powerful intellect, and to maintain a clear and rational sense of what was important at all times. Through her discipline, she attained mastery over her physical desires, and by mastering them, transcended them.

Not all historians or theologians agree with these stories, but nonetheless this ritual is intended to emulate her ascetic mastery over her own body. Through the power of the Realm of Day, individuals can master their own bodies and drive out dangerous impurities, Ascetic Star of Atun restores the victims of venom from such sources as a venom spell or the use of a Barbed Spear. While the purify spell is more versatile, this ritual is very effective at alleviating this condition from a number of people such as the victims of rituals such as Fetid Breath of Teeming Plague or The Grave's Treacherous Edge, or those who have been fighting deadly creatures such as plaguewulfs or hyrda. A single competent ritualist can restore nearly a dozen injured or dying people with a handful of mana crystals; a coven can restore a small army.

The ritual is also useful when a group of explorers encounter a source of weakness unexpectedly. Any circle of Day ritualists can spontaneously perform Ascetic Star of Atun, and while this may be expensive for them to do so it can preserve the life of a number of people who might otherwise risk death with every battle.

Common Elements

Lights, open flames and mirrors are both common elements in this ritual, as are fresh water and meditation. Focusing the mind to overcome the body is an important feature, as are invocations that drive out evil or corruption. Bleeding is also a common element. A Navarr or Varushkan ritualist in particular is likely to inflict a small cut on the target, drawing the poison in their body out with their blood. For the Navarr this has obvious resonance, while for the Varushkan ritualist the small wound is often left to intentionally scar as a reminder to avoid being poisoned again.

 - 1.2 Performing the Ritual
 - 1.3 Effects
 - 1.4 Additional Targets
- 2 Description

Even on a battlefield, it is common for the ritualists to try and create a feeling of tranquility and calm. The targets may be instructed to focus their attentions on some stationary point (which is where lights, mirrors and open flames come in useful); their bodies may be cleansed with fresh water or their thirst's quenched. It is also common to include slow, measured rhythms such as the ringing of a bell or gong, or the beating of a drum to help the targets focus their minds.

In The League this ritual is often associated with the character of The Doctor or The Bishop, and the use of The Chalice; in Dawn, some cabal of weavers make use of a favour that is used to draw out the poison from the target and symbolically burnt at the completion of the ritual.

The Cavul rune is an obvious symbol evoked in this ritual, but some ritualists prefer the rune of wisdom or rune of mastery; the constellations of The Fountain or The Key are another common element, as is the firebird which heals itself through supernatural immolation.

Ashen Mantle

Description

These robes are sometimes considered the pinnacle of the weaver's art. The process of creating them consists of carefully treating the fabrics involved with beggar's lye and colouring them with dyes infused with iridescent gloaming. The magisters of Highguard are particularly fond of these beautiful vestments, and use only the richest dyes to combine with the finest and most subtle decoration. In Urizen the robes are delicately shaded and sometimes simply called Robes of the Magi, although even there the traditional name is used more commonly.

In the Brass Coast by contrast these robes are usually bright, clashing colours and fine fabrics with beautiful dragonbone decorations, while those volhov lucky enough to own an ashen mantle prefer one made from fine waterproofed lamb's wool.

For many magicians an Ashen Mantle and a Staff of the Magi are an obvious combination, greatly increasing their spellcasting abilities.

Rules

- Form: Armour. Takes the form of a robe.
- Requirement: You must have the magician skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: You gain four additional points of personal mana.
- Materials: Crafting an Ashen Mantle requires fifteen measures of iridescent gloaming, seven measures of dragonbone, five measures of beggar's lye and four ingots of ambergelt. It takes one month to make one of these items.

She leant on the lectern, cleared her throat, and looked down at her notes.

"Dating from the second century of the Empire, the Shroud Empirical is an item of historical, magical and artistic significance, and hence far too valuable to be actually worn except on occasions of national celebration. One of the very first Ashen Mantles constructed (at least to the modern arcane definition), the Shroud was commissioned by Arbiter Layana as her official robes of office.

"A well-constructed Mantle is a challenge to the skilled crafter, but the Shroud was intended as a clear signal of the dominance of Urizen's arts to the rest of the world. It depicts a map of the entire nation in silken threads, picked out with seed pearls and minuscule worked glow-stones. Skillfully interlaced with this are passages from some of the greatest philosophers and magicians of Urizen, some lines written to a scale so small that they are difficult to read with the naked eye. Woven through it all are threads of puissant magical power arranged in a pattern meant to depict the Net of the Heavens itself.

"Those of a conspiratorial bent also assert that Layana left the secrets of many of her most cunning rituals somehow woven into this relic, for those with the wit to decipher them. It is said that more than one archivist has gone insane simply staring at its endlessly complex pattern."

She cleared her throat again and looked up.

"As you can see the item is in excellent condition, despite its sojourn in the ruined citadel of Karos. Two of my agents died recovering this beautiful and powerful artefact from Spiral. It is unique, a priceless example of artisanship and a symbol of Urizen cultural ideals.

"So I believe we shall start the bidding at one hundred crowns, ladies and gentlemen.

"Do I hear one hundred?"

Assembly

Overview

The Imperial Synod is divided into many distinct assemblies, each of which has differing powers, responsibilities and roles in ensuring the virtue of the Empire. The purpose of the Assemblies is to ensure that power is vested in those best placed to judge a matter - for example, the Marcher National Assembly, composed of Marcher priests is responsible for the virtuous behaviour of the Marcher generals as well as Marcher national titles.

Every member of the Synod is automatically a member of the General Assembly as well as the relevant national and virtue assemblies.

General Assembly

The General Assembly is the largest and most senior of the assemblies of the Synod. The authority of the judgments made by the General Assembly extend to the whole Empire, including the Throne and its judgments stand in authority over those made by any other Assembly.

Every citizen of the Empire who has responsibility for a congregation or a sinecure whose role includes guiding the spiritual well-being of Imperial citizens is a member of the General Assembly. They receive a number of votes in proportion to the size of their congregation or sinecure when they attend Anvil.

The National Assemblies

With the establishment of the Imperial Orc Assembly in Winter 377YE there are ten national assemblies, one for each nation of the Empire. A national assembly consists of all members of the Synod of that nation. Members of the assembly may cast a number of votes in proportion to the size of their congregation or sinecure when they attend Anvil.

Each assembly is charged with the spiritual well being of the nation it is responsible. The authority of the assembly's judgments extend only to individuals and groups from that nation.

The Virtue Assemblies

There are eight virtue assemblies, one for all the priests of each of the seven virtues and the Assembly of the Way, for all priests who are not dedicated to a virtue. Members of the assembly may cast a number of votes in proportion to the size of their congregation or sinecure when they attend Anvil.

Each virtue assembly elects a cardinal from their number to sit upon the Assembly of the Nine. The cardinal is then responsible for selecting a gatekeeper from their assembly. The gatekeepers of virtue are collectively responsible for apportioning the True Liao.

Each assembly is charged with providing guidance and spiritual teaching for their virtue, as well as ensuring the virtuous behaviour of those citizens who profess to follow it. Characters of any virtue - or none - are subject to the oversight of any virtue assembly, but by definition they are expected to concern themselves only with matters pertaining to their virtue.

If a priest changes dedication at a summit then their assembly does not change until the next summit they attend.

Assembly of the Nine

The Assembly of Nine consists of the eight cardinals appointed by the virtue assemblies and the Throne. Each member of the Assembly has a single vote.

Although it is rare for a judgement by the Assembly of Nine to be tied it can happen. In this situation, if there is a sitting Throne then they may issue a deciding vote. They may do this regardless of whether they have voted already or not.

Assistance

Overview

For the events at Dadford Road Campsite this year we will be operating a system to assist all players getting their kit onto and off the IC and OOC fields. This page explains how the system works, so that you can understand how to take advantage of it.

Mules

- We have hired 6 ATVs - all terrain vehicles to move kit around on site for players and crew
- We have recruited half a dozen new crew to operate the vehicles on set-up and take down
- The mules will be available Thursday and Friday and throughout take-down

We will have six ATVs - all terrain vehicles - mostly Kawasaki mules like the one pictured. Some of the mules will have trailers to carry extra kit. We have recruited a team of new crew purely to operate them so that we can move equipment quickly and simply around the site for players. In addition we expect to have a tractor and large trailer for moving heavy equipment.

Requesting Help

- Make your way to a Mule pick-up point and request assistance
- They will radio GOD who will log your name, location and time
- GOD will direct the mules to the next person on the list as soon as one comes free
- You must remain with your equipment to be sure that you do not miss your slot
- Make sure your equipment is ready to be quickly loaded

We are going to log all requests for assistance from players on the site (you cannot request a slot in advance). This will allow us to make sure that we are able to help players move their kit into place as quickly as possible with the fewest possible delays. To get help, you need to go to a Mule pick-up point and request assistance. Please tell them roughly how much equipment you have (a car load, a trailer full, a van load etc) and show them where you will be waiting. They will log your request with GOD. GOD will manage the list and send an ATV to your mule pick-up point for you as soon as one becomes free.

Please make sure that you remain in the area once you have requested help. We will get to you as quickly as possible - but we will move to the next name on the list if we cannot find you quickly.

Please have your kit ready to be loaded as quickly as possible. Once your kit is loaded, at least one of you should travel with the mule driver to your destination. You will then need to unload your equipment. The quicker you can load and unload your equipment - the quicker we can help everyone.

Mobility Needs

- We expect able-bodied players to load and unload their own equipment, but help is able to anyone who needs it.

We expect able-bodied players to load and unload the own equipment from the mules, but the crew operating them will provide assistance with loading and unloading for anyone who needs it. If you need help then please let the operator know.

Arrival

- There will be a pick-up point in the quiet camping field next to the main gate
- There will be one pick-up point in each of the OOC camping fields
- If you need to move equipment to two locations, then you may request assistance twice

There will be a pick-up point in the quiet camping field - near the main gate - and another one in each of the OOC camping fields. They will either be wearing a crew t-shirt and red hat or a hi-vis waistcoat.

If you need to drop equipment in the OOC field and in the IC field, then tell the crew operating the mule. You may put all your kit on one mule - but the driver cannot wait while you put a tent up - you must unload all your kit from the mule before putting anything up. If you prefer you may move your equipment first to the OOC camp first, put up that tent - then request assistance again and get a second mule to help you move your remaining equipment to the IC field.

Departure

- There will be a pick-up point in each nation camp
- There will be one pick-up point in each of the OOC camping fields
- If you need to move equipment from two locations, then you may request assistance twice

On departure, we will deploy a member of the crew to the rough centre of each nation camp to act as a point of contact for players to request a mule, and one crew member to each of the two OOC camping fields. They will either be wearing a crew t-shirt and red hat or a hi-vis waistcoat.

If you need to move equipment from the OOC field and the IC camping field, then you may put all your kit on one mule - but only if everything is packed and ready to go. The crew operating the mule will only wait while you are loading kit, not while you are taking a tent down. If you do not wish to take all your tents down at once then you can request assistance a second time once you are ready to move the remainder of your equipment.

Astolat

Overview

Central, well defended, civilized and beautiful, Astolat is the heartland of the nation. It is famous for its rose gardens, and the offering of a single Astolat rose is considered the perfect gift of true love (as in the Dawnish song The Rose Garden). In the north of Astolat, the majestic granite mountains are rich in ore, but occasionally threatened by their proximity to the wild forests which shelter beasts, barbarians and bandits.

Recent History

Major Features

The Castle of Thorns

Seat of the old Dawnish Kings and Queens, in Withy. Given over now to a great park, and almost completely engulfed in rose bushes, the Castle of Thorns serves as an academy for the training of civil servants, and is where most of the day-to-day business of running the Nation takes place. Each Dawnish Senator has apartments within this beautiful edifice, decorated with the produce and images of the territory they represent.

According to legends, the roses that enshroud the castle of thorns are the remnants of a magical defence created in pre-Imperial times by the enchanter Queen Jessamy. When the castle was besieged, she wove a great thicket of magically strengthened roses that surrounded the castle and tore the attacking forces to pieces when they tried to press the siege. The thicket lasted for only a season, but bought time for Jessamy's husband and allies to rally and come to her defence. The roses of the castle of Thorns are highly prized to this day as a symbol of enduring love and loyalty.

The River of Sighs runs past the Castle of Thorns. This wide, deep, fast flowing river was the site of the First Empress' legendary leap that won her entry to the house of Cevise. Traditionally set as a challenge for yeomen who were considered to be seeking to rise above their station, there are still knights-errant today who try to duplicate the Empress' jump, and the majority of those who fail are swept away and drowned.

Brightway

A peaceful settlement in the glades on the edge of Miaren. Famed for Aurelie's Rest, a Dawnish centre of healing, where physicians and surgeons do what they can to aid those who are crippled or seem beyond cure -- in Brightway they may find rest for a while.

Laroc

Famous for its tournament ground, which sets a standard for pageantry that other, lesser, nations can only envy. Many Dawnish who care for the glory of the duel hold Laroc in their hearts as they fight elsewhere. Several miles to the southeast of Laroc lie the Rosered Woods, a stretch of forest with a mysterious reputation said to be aligned in some fashion with one of the night eternal. It is said that anyone who spends a night in the forest will dream of their one true love - whether that be a person or a cause.

A short distance from the tourney grounds of Laroc stands the so-called Laroc Cathedral. The grandiose name is a bit of a misnomer as it is closer to a large chapel in size and import, but it is beautifully decorated and dedicated to the virtue of Courage.

Oldheart

An ancient town famed for its fine fruit brandies, set in an unusually verdant landscape; blossom is abundant in spring and its autumns are fruitful. The weaver cabal here weaves in willow withies, not cloth, and if any in Dawn have links to the Marchers, it is the weavers of Oldheart.

Weaving

A centre of learning for ritual magics, where cabals plan the greatest of rites, and discuss what their voice in the Conclave should say for the greater good of Dawn and Empire. As a waymeet, it's also a town of many inns, where you'll often find questing knights or squires swapping stories, desperate for news of chances for heroism in far-flung places. Adelmar the Lion, Exemplar of Ambition was born here, and a small shrine marks the site where his family once lived.

Kethry's Grove

A glade dedicated to the Paragon, Kethry, thought to be where Makin once courted her. Often used by the Dawnish as a place of vigil for those who follow Pride.

Boar's Hollow

A great statue of a boar, fully 20 hands high, moss covered and inscribed with writings of Terunael, stands here in a small hollow, apparently watching the border with Varushka. Some amongst the Dawnish regard it as a place of fertility.

Astronomancy

Overview

The constellations have been known since time immemorial – they figure, largely unchanged from their present forms, on some of the oldest buildings and artifacts in the world. Many magicians – especially those of Urizen – believe them to be a map or chart of the powers of the world reflected above – as if the sky were a great dark lake and reflected on its surface was the means to understand, control and manipulate the forces of nature.

At its core, astronomancy is a magical tradition that involves identifying patterns in the stars associated with fundamental magical and natural laws, and drawing power from them to fuel ritual magic. These patterns - the constellations - are held by many astronomancers to be the same tools the Creator used to forge Creation. Like the runes and the narrative principles of dramaturgy, Astronomancy is a means of placing magic in context and understanding it.

- 3 As Above, So Below
- 4 Tulpas
- 5 Constellations
- 6 Further Reading

Invocation and Command

The stars are handles – physical ways to grab the force of magic. Nobody in the Empire imagines The Stork is an actual stork. That arrangement of stars you can see in the sky is the way it is to represent one of the primal powers of creation; by using that imagery and incorporating it into your rituals, you are tapping into that primal power and associating your ritual with it.

Astronomancers believe that the sky is limitless, and so are the powers it represents; the constellations known and codified by the Empire are merely the tip of the iceberg. Every star is part of a constellation and every constellation is a representation of a cosmic principle, a natural force or a universal power. The codified ones are simply those whose meaning and purpose is clearly understood; there exist many more to discover, comprehend and codify. Every Astronomancer dreams of naming a new constellation and adding them to the great catalogue.

Using the constellations the easy way, an Astronomancer can draw the design on an implement or artifact, arrange things or people to recreate the design below (such as standing your ritualists in the shape of The Fountain or The Chain) or simply invoke them during a ritual to shine favourably or unfavourably upon the outcome or a specified target. By naming propitious stars to someone you could bless or curse them.

As Above, So Below

Astronomancers firmly believe that echoing the structure of the constellations strongly influences the environment – it is not uncommon to find an Urizen spire's encampments laid out in the form of The Net, or Astronomancer's chambers arranged specifically to evoke a particular constellation.

Tulpas

The constellations are not sentient or sapient in any meaningful way – they are symbols of potentiality, emblems of cosmic forces ill-understood by the Empire's magicians. But sometimes during a ritual, a combination of the existence of the constellation, coupled with the efforts of the magician, will cause the manifestation of a Tulpa. These are thought-forms; concepts and ideas given form by magical will and the motive power of the Constellation.

Tulpas are curious creatures – constructs of will and magic that make it easier to form a connection between the constellation and mortal magicians. The process by which a Tulpa forms and manifests is structurally and magically very similar indeed to the process by which a national Egregore is formed; some Astronomancers view them perhaps as the understandable face of principles too vast and alien for our minds to clearly understand. As the Varushkan Egregore sometimes represents a way for magicians to understand what it means to be Varushkan, to interact with the soul of a nation in a meaningful way, so Tulpas of the Claw allow a magician to interact with the principle of conflict between living things.

They are bridges, formed by magicians to connect them to these potent principles. Essentially the magician gives the magic a physical form or a spiritual form that is easier for mortal minds to interact with. In a real sense, if the magician were not doing the ritual the Tulpa would not exist - it is like a combination of the cosmic principle and the ritual itself. It exists from moment to moment at the point where magicians work magic using it. Through the principles of Astronomancy, the tulpa allows magicians to connect to the power of the constellations; they are not entities in the way the eternal are entities; the Urizen in particular describe them as being much more like cosmic ushabti.

Whilst Tulpas traditionally form their own bodies, astronomancers who are deeply aligned with a constellation during a working sometimes experience what they describe as “brushing by” or “alignment” with a Tulpa. The ritualist’s mind brushes the consciousness of a Tulpa during a ritual and the ritualist finds themselves behaving in a way which personifies or exemplifies the principle of the Constellation. The ritualist does not lose control or consciousness, they remains in control of their own actions; but all factors to do with the constellation are amplified.

Constellations

There are eighteen constellations recognised by Imperial astronomancers, from which they can draw power.

Constellations of Astronomancy

Constellation	The Law	Common magic
The Chain	Things hold together	Bonds, oaths
The Chalice	Things heal; things apart come together	healing, mending, connections
The Claw	Things bleed	Battle, destruction, violence
The Door	Things move and change	transport, travel, personal transformation
The Drowned Man	Things end	Curses, misfortune, ending
The Fountain	Things live	Growth, fertility, foundations
The Great Wurm	Things change and transform	magic, grand transformation
The Key	Things are revealed	screaming, opening, skills
The Lock	Things can be hidden	wards, defence, concealment
The Mountain	Things are not easy	obstacles, effort, trials
The Oak	Things endure	strength, endurance, fortitude
The Phoenix	Things learn	knowledge
The Spider	Things are watched by a hidden eye	hidden forces, eternal, sovereigns
The Stallion	Things procreate	fertility, growth, wealth
The Stork	Things matter	decisions, responsibility, leadership
The Web	Things are connected	relationships, synchronicity, sympathy
The Three Sisters	Things are connected by blood	consequences, ties of blood, sorrow
The Wanderer	Things are not what you think or Things go awry	destiny, fate, chance

In each case, the common magic mentioned is just a starting point or summary. The individual pages for each constellation contain a lot more information about the use of a constellation in ritual magic or spellcasting.

Atuman

Virtue

Atuman was recognised as a paragon of Ambition in 3YE. He had already been recognised as a paragon by the Highborn Assembly of the Virtuous in the time before the Imperial Synod. When the General Assembly recognised Aldones di Sarvos as the reincarnation of Atuman, they "reduced" the former paragon to the status of exemplar.

Biography

Atuman was the brother of Atun, and one of the Twin Navigators of Highborn legend. The stories say that it was Atuman who was the motivating force behind the exodus that brought the early Highborn to the shores of the Bay of Catazar. His ambition to provide a safe homeland for his people not only created the nation of Highguard but by extension the Brass Coast, the League, and the Empire itself. Indeed, there is some evidence that Atuman was mentioned by both the Founders during their exodus to the west, and by Aldones di Sarvos in his discussions with Merchant Prince Barrell of Tassato and Maria Ivanova, Boyar of Temeschwar - making it doubly ironic that Aldones would be partially responsible for Atuman losing his status of paragon.

Accounts of Atuman describe him as "ebon haired, with a proud profile, and eyes of fire." All accounts depict him as a powerful orator - a man whose passion could charm a storm as easily as it swayed his enemies to his side. When his sister spoke of a terrible fate that would befall their people, it was he who brought together all who would listen and persuaded them on the dangerous course of fleeing their beleaguered homeland and seeking to found a new nation. The early histories of the Highborn are adamant that many of those who followed Atuman and Atun on their flight were enemies, and that it was Atuman's charisma that helped them to put aside their differences and work together so that all could prosper.

Atuman founded the city of Pharos at the mouth of the river Couros, and became effectively the king of Highguard, although Highborn historians agree he never used that name and refused to take a crown when the patricians offered it to him. His daughter Acenath took the title Navigator after his death in his honour, and raised a great tomb for him on the cliffs overlooking the Bay. He designed the tomb himself, and laid the foundation stone with his own hands. On his deathbed, he told Acenath that his reasons for wishing to be interred on the headland were threefold: he wished to be able to look out across the sea to the homeland he had left behind in his youth; to watch for any danger that might come from the sea to threaten his people; and so that if his beloved sister ever returned from across the sundering sea, he would be the first to see her - and the first thing she would see would be him, waiting for her.

During the Turmoil, several supporters of Permion the Lawmaker - including one of his surviving daughters - sought sanctuary in the tomb during the burning of Pharos. Even the supporters of the bloodthirsty patricians would not defile the sanctity of that place. There is a story, almost certainly apocryphal, that when a dark-hearted soldier of the patricians sought to spill blood in the tomb her sword shattered and she was struck blind, terrifying her fellows and causing them to flee the area. The tale is considered mildly heretical by orthodox Highborn priests, but this did nothing to reduce its popularity - or the idea that even in death, from beyond the Labyrinth, Atuman sought to protect his people.

After the civil war, the Assembly of the Virtuous elected to turn the ruins of Pharos into the Necropolis, and built a new capital further north in Bastion. The Tomb of Atuman still stands on the cliffs overlooking the sea.

While Atuman has never proved as popular a figure in the Empire as his twin, he is still held as an inspiration by followers of the Way. Many Navarr point to him as an example of someone with an instinctive understanding of the Great Dance. When his people and his home were threatened, he chose to move and find somewhere better to make a new home. Some Navarr writings refer to him as The Unbranded Brand and used his stories as a way to build stronger ties between the pre-Imperial Navarr and the Highborn. In the League, he is overshadowed by Aldones but even there the priests patiently point out that one of the motive forces behind the foundation of their nation himself pointed to Atuman as an inspiration - and was literally the man himself reborn to continue to work of building powerful nations. In Wintermark Atuman is seen as a heroic figure - a passionate leader who brought his family and his people through a terrible exodus to found a nation that has endured for seven centuries. Some Thanes, especially among the Steirn, see in the stories of Atuman an all-too-human leader who never stopped striving to secure the safety and prosperity of his people - even when his people were squabbling among themselves like spoiled children.

It is unfortunate that his greatest achievements - bringing the Highborn to their new home, founding their nation, and building the great city of Pharos on the shores of the Bay of Catazar - are today overshadowed by the politics of the early Synod. Historians can only speculate about the events leading to the General Assembly refuting his paragonhood. Aldones di Sarvos is said to have repeatedly denied that his vision meant that Atuman was not a paragon, but the Synod did not agree. The Doctrines of the Faith say that "A truly Virtuous Spirit, one who is a paragon of Virtue, is capable of freeing itself from the Labyrinth of Ages through transcendence. If Aldones di Sarvos was Atuman reborn, then his spirit could not have freed itself from the Labyrinth, and thus he could not have been a paragon."

There is some evidence that there was more than simply doctrinal disagreement at work in the Synod. Some stories suggest that some of the priests of the other nations had grown weary of what they saw as the presumption of the Highborn Assembly - not only in their role in the Synod. There are certainly stories that speak of the "arrogant" attitude of the Highborn - that because the First Empress was Highborn, the Empire had ultimately been founded by their people. As the acknowledged founder of Highguard, Atuman was sometimes described as the ultimate founder of the Empire. The truth will probably never be known, but the belief in a conspiracy of early Imperial priests to "shame" Highguard by "dethroning" Atuman has waxed and waned in popularity for the last three hundred and fifty years.

Signs

- Regardless, nobody questions that Atuman was the driving force behind the Highborn exodus, and the founder of their Nation, as well as their first king. By saving his people, he demonstrated his Benevolence.
- His Legacy is the nation of Highguard, a legacy which he shares with his sister Atun.
- While his influence is somewhat diminished, and his thunder somewhat stolen by Aldones di Sarvos, he remains a powerful Inspiration. He demonstrates that with sufficient will, one can achieve anything.
- By strict definition, Atuman's voyage across the sea to what is now modern Highguard should not count as a Pilgrimage. However, as with certain other cases of paragons and exemplars who lived before the construction of the White City his journey to the Bay of Catazar is deemed to meet this criteria.
- As with Atun, several miracles are assigned to Atuman in stories of his life. The one that is often cited as a specific miracle is the tale of how he was such a powerful public speaker that during the crossing of the oceans to the Bay of Catazar he not only quelled a storm with the power of his voice but convinced the winds to fill the sails of the fleet and carry them across the waters to safety.
- That Atuman had been Liberated from the Labyrinth was disproved by the vision of Aldones di Sarvos.

Atun

Virtue

Atun was recognised as a Paragon of Wisdom in 3YE. She had already been recognised as a paragon by the Highborn Assembly of the Virtuous in the time before the Imperial Synod.

Biography

The paragon Atun of the Highborn, was one of the Twin Navigators who lead her people cross the sea to found the nation of Highguard. Stories claim that she was noble-born, and trained as a physician and apothecary in the time before the Highborn exodus. She was the twin of Atuman, and is usually held by Highborn scholars to be the elder of the two. Softly spoken, she is said to have been a living embodiment of the idea that the Wise never use forty words when four would do, and that there are times when actions can communicate ideas more effectively than any number of words.

Where her twin was a figure of fire and passion, Atun was described as "calm, and deep, like the sea beneath the stars - and just as powerful." The stories describe her as a visionary - that her insight into the world, and her spirituality so profound, that she had visionary dreams that warned her of danger. Her most famous vision was of the doom that would engulf her people, and which saw Atun and her brother lead a remnant of their people to safety on the shores of the Bay of Catazar.

Where Atuman focused on binding the people together - and keeping them from turning on each other during - their long journey, Atun watched the sea and the stars and charted their course. Where her twin stirred the spirits of their people with fiery rhetoric, her wisdom and foresight reassured them. It was Atun who ensured they always had sufficient provisions, that there was always enough water to drink as well as dried meat and bread. There is a somewhat contentious story that when a sickness struck three of the ships, Atun made the hard choice to impose a strict quarantine, leading to the deaths of half of the people on those ships. In the story, she chastises her brother who wishes to lift the quarantine out of compassion by saying "It is hard, and it is cruel, and it is not just - but it is better that we lose one half of the people on those three ships, than that we lose one half of the entire fleet. If we must do harm, we should do as little harm as we can."

Eventually, the Highborn fleet reached the shores of the Bay of Catazar and made landfall on Sanctuary Sand. Alone of those who had made the journey, Atun never set foot on the new land. She remained on the flagship of the fleet for three days, speaking to several of her friends and members of her family, and on the fourth day she bid farewell to her people and set sail again. While the stories say that she traveled alone, it would have been impractical for her to crew the vessel by herself and there is some scattered evidence that suggests perhaps as many as thirty Highborn accompanied her.

Her reasons for refusing to set foot on the new land have been a matter of speculation for seven centuries. They range from the mystical to the blasphemous - the most popular is that she had received another vision, or that her vision had always told her that she would not join her brother and her people in founding the new nation. Others have suggested that she was burdened by grief not only for those who had died during the crossing, but for the thousands they had left behind, and that she could not rest. There is some speculation that she returned to the land the Highborn had left behind to search for survivors and met her final end in the ruins of her original home. A particularly blasphemous version of the tale, recounted in the salacious book The True History of the Highborn claims that she was an agent of the eternal Sorin, and that part of the dark pact that allowed her to save her people was that she would never help them rebuild. All known copies of the blasphemous book were burnt shortly after it was published, and the eternal himself has categorically denied that there is any truth to the tale, but that has not stopped this calumny resurfacing from time to time.

Regardless of the reason, Atun passes out of history, and into the realm of legends. She left behind students who honoured her memory, some of whom ultimately went on to form the Scions of Atun and devote their lives to spiritual matters, including unlocking the mysteries of liao. She did not leave any written accounts of her own, but her words live on in fragments gathered from the journals and recollections of the many people whose lives she touched. In the modern Empire the main source for collected quotations from and about Atun is the short book "Fragments of Atun" collected from a number of sources in 121YE.

Contemporary accounts paint a picture of a woman of great wisdom - and of great spirituality. While she lived centuries before the foundation of the Way, it is easy to see how her words helped shape the early understanding of the Virtues, and even some of the Doctrines of the Faith. Some of the quotation ascribed to her seem to be echoed in parts of the Doctrine of Reincarnation and the Doctrine of the Creator, for example, and in the .

More so than her brother Atuman, Atun is an inspirational figure to many followers of the Way especially those following the path of Wisdom. Many Freeborn pilgrims see clear parallels between her story and the story of the Founders, especially Riqueza. Several Kallavesi mystics helped spread the Way among the people of Wintermark using stories of her visions, and her understanding of herb lore as a way to draw parallels between their own people and this "distant cousin, not of our blood, but of our spirit." While she has never proved as popular with the Varushkans as Zoria, many see her pragmatism as a sign that she would have made a good quality Wise One - especially in the story of the three plague ships.

Signs

The Assembly of Wisdom cited the following signs as proof that Atun was a paragon.

- She provided a great Inspiration to the Highborn in particular. Stories of her life are often cited as demonstrating the importance of making difficult decisions, and of trusting one's own judgement - in several stories she expresses the idea that before a solution can be found one must understand what the problem actually is (a clear paraphrase of the oft-repeated saying that Wisdom is not always knowing the answer; Wisdom is finding the right question). While many followers of the Way focus on her wisdom, she is also cited as an inspiration by many physicks, who point to her practical application of medical skills as a true expression of her paragon status.
- Her wise sayings and her exploration of spiritual matters are a clear indication of Salvation. Without her it is likely the Way might have taken a very different form.
- As with Atuman, several miracles are assigned to Atun. The most obvious, and the most widely accepted, are her prophetic visions. Later theologians have claimed that it is more likely that her "visions" were the result of a great insight into people and events than of some supernatural power, but these critics are largely discounted.
- Her Legacy is the nation of Highguard, a legacy which she shares with her brother Atuman.
- While there are few hard-and-fast facts, it is clear that by leading her people across the sea out of great danger she showed great Benevolence.
- Although the circumstances of her death are unknown, there has never been a past-life vision that has even included Atun much less indicated she has been reincarnated. This is seen as a clear sign of Liberation.
- By strict definition, Atun's voyage across the sea to what is now modern Highguard should not count as a Pilgrimage. However, as with certain other cases of paragons and exemplars who lived before the construction of the White City her travels both before and after the foundation of the new nation are deemed to meet this criteria.

"I have looked into the eyes of the dying, and of the newborn. I have seen the same light in those eyes, and I say that there is something in humanity that is immortal. It walks the world for a time in a fragile suit of flesh and bone, experiencing all the joy and pain that life can bring."

"I have thought on this long and hard, all through the dark night of the spirit when I have questioned why it is that humanity is so fragile, and so prone to foolishness. I believe the spark of life within us is unquenchable, that it may pass from the world for a time but that it returns again. It is the common thread that all humans know in their bones; it is the only thing that makes sense."

"I look at the world and I see the hand of the Creator in every sunrise and in every sunset. They set the stars in the sky, they formed a world out of the darkness, and they breathed life into humanity."

"An angry woman asked me that the Creator had ever done for us, and I answered her by saying 'They created a world, and they brought us into it, and then they stepped away so that we might live, and grow, and come to know ourselves.' I think that is their greatest gift to us, the only one that matters."

"The world is arbitrary, but it is not cruel, Cruelty requires intent, and there is no intent in nature. It is only humans that can be cruel, or kind, or fair, or vicious. It is only humans who can look at the world and see it as it is - and as it could be."

"We are creatures of spirit, and of flesh. Without spirit, we could not know ourselves. Without flesh, we could not know each other."

"Every time I learn something new I think to myself 'how can I use this?' I enjoy knowing things, but I enjoy doing things even more."

"Every night before I go to sleep I think about what I have seen during the day and I ask myself 'I wonder what I will see tomorrow?'"

"Answers are obvious, if you ask the right question." "Fragments of Atun", collected by Hannah of Loric's Cross, 121YE

Atun's Ring

Description

The most common form taken by Atun's Ring is either a single band marked with one rune associated with each of the six realms or a single ring formed of six interwoven bands, each of a different precious metal.

These rings are named for the paragon Atun, the sister of Atuman, exemplar of Ambition. Stories indicate that Atun was a powerful magician, prone to visionary experiences even without the use of magic, and a mistress of multiple realms. When she departed the nascent Highborn nation she left the artefact magical ring that bore her name with her brother as a keepsake. Her followers crafted lesser rings in its image, and when the Freeborn began their exodus it is believed that all three founding sisters bore versions. The use of the rings was also widespread among the magicians of Tassato and Sarvos, and three were given as gifts by Highborn magisters to the magicians of Urizen during early diplomatic exchanges.

The original ring would be a treasure beyond price, were it to be found, but it vanished during the tumultuous years of the Highborn civil war. Its last known bearer was Permion the Lawmaker, and it was not seen again after his assassination.

Rules

- Form: Talisman. Takes the form of a ritual focus. You must be wearing this item or holding it in hand to use its magical properties.
- Requirement: You must have the magician skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: Once per day you may use this ring to gain one additional rank of any one ritual lore for the purposes of performing a single ritual, subject to the normal rules for effective skill.
- Materials: Crafting Atun's Ring requires seven ingots of orichalcum, seven ingots of tempest jade, seven ingots of weltsilver, seven measures of ambergelt, seven measures of beggar's lye and seven measures of iridescent gloaming. It takes one month to make one of these items.

Auction the rights to name the Sinkhole

To sell through the bourse the naming rights to the Sinkhole.

Proposed by the Dean of the Academy, Seconded by Volodmartz.

Overview

- This motion was to ...
- Passed

Date

- Summer 381YE

Campaign Outcome

- The right to name the sinkhole that recently opened in the north-western empire will be auctioned at the Autumn Equinox to the highest bidder.

Constitution

- The Constitutional Court cautions that while the citizen who buys the right to name the sinkhole can give it whatever name they see fit, they have no authority to enforce the use of that name. The local citizens who suffered tragic losses as a result of the sinkhole opening are unlikely to embrace a comedic or inappropriate name.

Auditor of Senatorial Accountability

Overview

The Auditor of Senatorial Accountability is an Imperial title created by the Imperial Senate in Spring 377YE with responsibility to investigate the use of Imperial funds by Senators.

The Imperial Senate has responsibility for allocating and spending the treasury. They do this by appointing individual Senators to oversee projects from building a shipyard to raising an army. They also disburse funds to worthy causes such as the Anvil hospital or toward the creation of valuable tools for the Empire. In all such cases, it is the responsibility of the chosen individual to ensure that the funds are used wisely and for the purpose they are intended.

The powers of the Auditor were extensively amended by the Imperial Senate in Spring 381YE.

Responsibilities

The Auditor of Senatorial Accountability is charged with ensuring that funds allocated to Senators by the Imperial Senate are spent wisely and for the purpose for which they were intended. The findings of the Auditor should be reported to the Senate.

Powers

Right of Address

The Auditor has the right to make an address to the Senate once per summit. This is intended to allow them to present important information for the Senators consideration. To use this power, the Auditor informs the civil service that they wish to address the Senate. Their address will be added to the agenda for the next Senate session.

Inquisit Member of the Senate

Once per summit, the Auditor may call an inquisition against any member of the Senate (including The Throne) without the need for a vote in the Synod. This is in addition to any existing judgements they have raised normally. This use of the power may be escalated to a Condemnation just like any other inquisition. To use this power, the Auditor must still place a judgement before the Synod, but it is considered to pass automatically at the point it is presented.

Appointment

The Auditor is appointed during the Spring Equinox. They are chosen with a judgement of appointment by the Assembly of the Nine.

The title can be held by any Imperial citizen. They can be revoked by the General Assembly and the Assembly of the Nine.

Auras of Ambition

This person is not illustrious, but they are cunning, competent and ambitious. Let us raise them to high office, for the betterment of us all.

Callus Strategos, "The Book of Callus"

Overview

An aura is a persistent spiritual effect on a person, location or item. The auras listed here are created by priests dedicated to the virtue of Ambition who use the relevant ceremonial skill. A character who is dedicated to Ambition must pick one of the following auras when they perform the relevant ceremony. A priest of the Way may also use the Dreams of Ambition when they use the dedication ceremony to provide a pilgrim with a visionary dream.

The names used for each aura are simply the most common ones used in the Empire. For example, the Clear Path of Ambition may be called The Armour of Ambition by a Dawnish troubadour. This is especially true with those auras that are named after paragons and exemplars; all these auras would have had different names before the exceptional individual they are named for was recognised by the Synod. The Hallowing of Aldones for example was commonly called the Hallowing of the Mountain before Aldones' recognition as a paragon of Ambition.

Study of these auras helped the founders of the Way to create the Path of Ambition. Some lay persons assume that the Imperial Synod created these auras in some fashion to encourage adherence to orthodoxy, but according to theological scholars the situation is the other way around. The auras came first, then the tenets of the Path of Ambition.

Anointing

Anointing involves a short ceremony to create a personal aura on a mortal being. Anointing always requires the consent of the subject.

The Absolution of Ambition

- You are filled with a sense that your aspirations are of primary importance. Any regret, guilt or remorse you feel as a result of actions is diminished.

Description: The path of Ambition can require a pilgrim to speak or act in ways that, whilst furthering their ultimate goals, can weigh them down with regrets and doubts. Priests use this aura to alleviate the distress of these necessary actions, and provide affirmation of the pilgrim's virtue in holding true to their path.

The Clear Path of Ambition

- You feel confident and certain of your ambitions. Doubts fall away and you feel justified in ignoring objections from others.

Description: Ambitious pilgrims may understand what is needed to further their goals, but be held back by weakness, doubts or the arguments of others. Priests of Ambition have been able to use this aura to help quell those doubts, and bolster the virtue of the pilgrim, removing some the obstacles preventing them walking their path.

- You feel a strong urge to prioritise the goal you named when anointed. You feel a pressure to pursue that agenda before others.

Description: This is a contentious aura for, whilst it clearly promotes Ambition, there are fears it could be abused to make someone pursue an agenda other than their own. Others have pointed to the potential abuses of this aura in compelling others to act in potentially destructive ways, even though it can only ever be used with the willing consent of the recipient. Most priests of Ambition maintain that this aura is useful in illustrating the virtuous path, and for helping a pilgrim with multiple or confounding ambitions to focus on the one that is most important to them. Some priests also use the anointing to inspire those who would otherwise be utterly without Ambition to help them find purpose.

The Drive of Ambition

- You feel driven to seize any opportunity to further your aspirations. It feels better to take a small step towards your goal than to take no steps at all.

Description: The path of Ambition is often long and arduous. The opportunities for a pilgrim to advance their goals may seem dangerous or unattainable, and lofty goals may appear impossibly distant. Priests use this aura to help pilgrims to appreciate that the virtue of Ambition is not simply about the destination, but the journey and "even the most impenetrable forest may fall one tree at a time".

Consecration

Consecration is the ceremony used to create an aura on a clearly defined location. There is only one aura for each virtue, and all priests create the same one when they use this skill.

Dare Do All

- You have a profound sense of destiny - of what can ultimately be accomplished by you if you strive for it. You feel nothing is beyond your reach.

Description: This powerful aura of Ambition fills those who experience it with an uplifting sense of what they might achieve if they set their mind to it. It drives people to act encouraging them to set aside other considerations.

Dedication

Dedication is the ceremony used to link a pilgrim's soul to virtue. It can also be used to create vivid oracular dreams.

Dreams of Ambition

- The next time you sleep you experience a vivid dream concerning your ambitions and the goals you have set yourself. Your dream will often show you pursuing your ambitions, and may include challenges you face or consequences that will follow from the things you are striving for. Sometimes the vision will show you new ambitions, things that seem appealing while you are dreaming though you may not have considered them before.

Hallow

Lost time is never found.

Hallow is used to create an aura on an item, such as a weapon, implement, shield or suit of Marcher Proverb armour. It is not possible to use hallow to create an aura on large immobile objects. Hallows do not provide a source of supernatural strength, but are durable and can last for a year (or potentially forever in the case of an artefact hallowed with true liao).

Hallowing of Adelmarr

- You feel a desire to take immediate action no matter how convincing the reasons to delay appear.

Hallowing of the Masquerade

- You feel an urge to conceal your true intentions or agenda from those who might oppose you.

Hallowing of Aldones

- You feel an urge to seek out new challenges to expand your ambitions.

Hallowing of the Broken Shield

- You feel an urge to eliminate obstacles that stand between you and your goals.

Hallowing of the Conqueror

- You feel driven to publicly defeat any enemy who stands against you.

Hallowing of the Master

- You feel a desire to use others as tools to further your own aspirations.

Hallowing of the Navigator

- You feel driven to ignore anyone who tries to dissuade you from pursuing your goals.

Hallowing of the Visionary

- You feel a desire to recruit allies and gather support from others.

Hallowing of the Patron

- You feel driven to silence naysayers; those who tell others they cannot achieve must be confronted.

The Light of Courage

- You feel empowered to speak out. The more unwelcome the truth is, the more important it is to face it.

Description: Most Priests of Courage stress that the virtue is about much more than just bravery in battle, that Courage has a vital role to play in the Empire not just on the battlefield. The virtuous are encouraged to face unwelcome truths as boldly as any barbarian charge. This aura encourages pilgrims to find the strength to speak out, so that others can find their Courage. It is popular with priests and pilgrims who find the need to make a public address in one of the political houses of the Empire, and especially with those who follow the example of Gilda Ashwine.

The Purity of Courage

- Any uncertainty about your chosen path falls away. Fears and doubts - whether your own or those of other people - do not move you.

Description: Fear and doubt are the natural enemies of the pilgrim on the path of Courage. Priests use this aura to help pilgrims strengthen themselves against these forces, and live their lives by the teaching that states "do not fear to act; only be shamed by inaction".

The Proof of Courage

- You feel an urge to face the challenge you named when anointed, no matter the dangers. Reasons for inaction or delay increasingly feel like cowardice.

Description: This common aura allows a priest of Courage to gird the pilgrim's soul, helping them find the strength to face a particularly dangerous task. It is popular with priests and pilgrims alike, for it fulfills the common understanding of Courage - the spiritual strength to face danger. Like similar auras for other virtues, some have pointed to the potential abuses of this aura in driving others to act in potentially life-threatening ways, even though it can only ever be used with the full consent of the recipient.

The Trial of Courage

- You feel an urge to seek new solutions to problems that you have failed to overcome. Where you have failed before, this time you feel sure you can succeed.

Description: Nothing is more dangerous than defeat; failure saps the confidence of any pilgrim, making them doubt themselves and their abilities. This aura helps pilgrims who have experienced a setback, strengthening their resolve to try again. However it is also helpful for pilgrims who have not yet made the attempt but are faced with a challenge that seems insurmountable. An essential part of Courage is the self-confidence to believe that you will be able to find a way to triumph, no matter how difficult or intimidating the task appears.

Consecration

Consecration is the ceremony used to create an aura on a clearly defined location. There is only one aura for each virtue, and all priests create the same one when they use this skill.

The Sticking Place

- You have a profound sense of conviction, an urge to do what you believe is right. You feel certain that you can change the world.

Description: This powerful aura of Courage fills those who experience it with a powerful drive to pursue a course of action they believe to be true. It boosts confidence helping those who feel that the obstacles in their path may be insurmountable.

Dedication

The craven die every day, the brave but once.

Dedication is the ceremony used to link a pilgrim's soul to the virtue. It can also be used to create vivid oracular dreams. Marcher Proverb

Dreams of Courage

- The next time you sleep you experience a vivid dream concerning the things you are afraid of. Your dream will often show you confronting these fears, and may force you to face unwelcome truths and self-deception. Sometimes your vision will show you new enemies, forces that seem threatening even though they are not things you have encountered before. Often the dream will include you doing battle with the things you fear or may include elements that inspire you, either symbolically or directly.

Hallow

Hallow is used to create an aura on an item, such as a weapon, implement, shield or suit of armour. It is not possible to use hallow to create an aura on large immobile objects. Hallows do not provide a source of supernatural strength, but are durable and can last for a year (or potentially forever in the case of an artefact hallowed with true liao).

Hallowing of Permion

- Your fear of death is greatly diminished. If you are terminal or dying you may roleplay stoic acceptance.

Hallowing of Irontooth

- You feel driven to expose cowardice and corruption regardless of consequences.

Hallowing of Inga Tarn

- You feel an urge to confront and defeat dangers that threaten the innocent.

Hallowing of Brass

- You feel an urge to openly practice your beliefs regardless of consequences.

Hallowing of the Bard

- You feel driven to encourage others to act and stop them succumbing to doubt.

The Hallowing of Isabella's Resolve

- You feel a urge to do what you know to be right regardless of consequences.

The Hallowing of Ashwine's Rose

- You are filled with certainty - attempts to dissuade you are unlikely to succeed.

The Hallowing of the Cataphract

- You feel driven to challenge the overcautious and confront those who throw up reasons for the righteous to doubt themselves.

Auras of Loyalty

Don't ask how far are they prepared to go. Ask what are they prepared to go all the way for.

Quellcrist Falconer, Poet

Overview

An aura is a persistent spiritual effect on a person, location or item. The auras listed here are created by priests dedicated to the virtue of Loyalty who use the relevant ceremonial skill. A character who is dedicated to Loyalty must pick one of the following auras when they perform the relevant ceremony. A priest of the Way may also use the Dreams of Loyalty when they use the dedication ceremony to provide a pilgrim with a visionary dream.

The names used for each aura are simply the most common ones used in the Empire. For example, the Eyes of Loyalty may be called The Oath of the Hall by a Winterfolk warrior. This is especially true with those auras that are named after paragons and exemplars; all these auras would have had different names before the exceptional individual they are named for was recognised by the Synod. The Hallowing of Bolstering Bill for example was commonly called the Hallowing of True Devotion before Bill's recognition as an exemplar of Loyalty.

Study of these auras helped the founders of the Way to create the Path of Loyalty. Some lay persons assume that the Imperial Synod created these auras in some fashion to encourage adherence to orthodoxy, but according to theological scholars the situation is the other way around. The auras came first, then the tenets of the Path of Loyalty.

Anointing

Anointing involves a short ceremony to create a personal aura on a mortal being. Anointing always requires the consent of the subject.

The Proof of Loyalty

- You feel an impulse to defend those you care most about. An attack on them feels like an attack on you personally.

Description: A key facet of Loyalty is the idea of shared burdens and shared dangers. One of the great tests of the virtue comes when the subject of a pilgrim's fealty is threatened or attacked. This aura is used to bolster the strength of pilgrims to help them find the fortitude to defend the things they care about, and not just from physical threats; the anointing also inspires the recipient to defend against political or verbal attacks.

This aura has also been used by those facing a difficult decision in ensuring that Loyalty informs the choices they make. There are even a few folk tales where a wily priest has used this aura to trick people into revealing their true loyalties.

The Bonds of Loyalty

- You feel an urge to keep faith with those you are loyal to, whatever it takes. It is easy to ignore qualms caused by actions you take on their behalf.

Description: Loyalty is easy to find when the path ahead is clear and free from danger. It is much harder for a citizen to remain virtuous when the demands of Loyalty are onerous. This aura is often used to help citizens and pilgrims prepare themselves for a coming time of trial, or when confronted by a difficult decision. Some pilgrims use this anointing to stir them into action on behalf of those they are loyal to, but who know this will be to their own detriment or harm. According to some priests, the Navarr thorn Isaella was anointed with this aura shortly before her fateful encounter with Emperor Nicovar.

The Seeds of Loyalty

- You feel an urge to aid the person or group you declared your loyalty to when anointed. You feel each of their triumphs and defeats as if they were your own.

Description: Some priests question the proper use of this anointing, worried that it can be misused to attempt to make someone serve a person or cause. The aura remains popular, however, and those who favour it point out that it can only be used with the consent of the target. It is sometimes used when a supplicant wishes to make a public demonstration of fealty or where they wish to shore up their commitment before facing a great danger.

The Eyes of Loyalty

- You feel an urge to support those you are loyal to no matter the cost. You find it easy to accept any action they take in pursuit of their goals.

Description: One of the hardest trials of the path of Loyalty is when the person, or persons, who are the subject of that devotion err, falter, or compromise. Standing by, or following, one who has given you unwelcome cause for doubt is where many pilgrims have strayed from the path. Priests of Loyalty have been able to use this anointing to help bolster a pilgrim's commitment and dedication to another. This has also proven beneficial in helping citizens to forgive one another and approach reconciliation, or at least be forward looking rather than dwelling on the past.

Consecration

Pride in small things, loyalty to great ones.

Consecration is the ceremony used to create an aura on a clearly defined location. There is only one aura for each virtue, and all priests create the same one when they use this skill.

Marcher Proverb

A Peerless Kinship

- You have a profound sense that service to a person or cause is truly worthy. Nothing extraordinary is achieved without sacrifice.

Description: This powerful aura of Loyalty fills those who experience it with a deep sense of the significance of a life dedicated to a person or cause. Those who experience it feel a sense of the essential nobility of devoting themselves to the purpose that commands their devotion above all others. With this comes an understanding that Loyalty may require the pilgrim to make great sacrifices for the virtue demands commitment to something other than yourself.

Dedication

Dedication is the ceremony used to link a pilgrim's soul to the virtue. It can also be used to create vivid oracular dreams.

Dreams of Loyalty

- The next time you sleep you experience a vivid dream concerning the people and ideals that matter most to you. The vision will often show you how your loyalty upholds and exalts them, reminding you of how these people depend on you. Sometimes you will dream of individuals or causes with whom you feel no affiliation at present, though in your dream it is clear that they need your aid. Often the dream will show you the fate that will befall those you fail to support.

Hallow

Hallow is used to create an aura on an item, such as a weapon, implement, shield or suit of armour. It is not possible to use hallow to create an aura on large immobile objects. Hallows do not provide a source of supernatural strength, but are durable and can last for a year (or potentially forever in the case of an artefact hallowed with true liao).

Hallowing of the Steward

- You feel a desire to serve your cause without concern for your own reward.

Hallowing of the Banner

- You feel an urge to challenge detractors who criticise the object of your loyalty.

Hallowing of Bolstering Bill

- You feel driven to protect those you love from all harm regardless of the cost to yourself or others.

Hallowing of the Silverlark's Tears

- You feel an urge to conceal your devotion from others, even the object of your loyalty.

Hallowing of the Token

- You feel ready to risk anything in support of the allegiance this token represents.

Hallowing of the Marked's Oath

- You feel a desire to recruit others to the service of your chosen cause or patron.

Hallowing of the Favour

- You feel driven to advance your patron's interests by any means, especially if they gave you this item.

Auras of Pride

Of all those who have sat the Throne she may well have been the greatest. She was not named for the golden charge on her banner but because she outshone the sun.

Eddard of House Cassilon, Legend of the Golden Throne

Overview

An aura is a persistent spiritual effect on a person, location or item. The auras listed here are created by priests dedicated to the virtue of Pride who use the relevant ceremonial skill. A character who is dedicated to Pride must pick one of the following auras when they perform the relevant ceremony. A priest of the Way may also use the Dreams of Pride when they use the dedication ceremony to provide a pilgrim with a visionary dream.

The names used for each aura are simply the most common ones used in the Empire. For example, the Wellspring of Pride may be called The Glass Wheel by a Freeborn corsair. This is especially true with those auras that are named after paragons and exemplars; all these auras would have had different names before the exceptional individual they are named for was recognised by the Synod. The Hallowing of Richilde for example was commonly called the Hallowing of the Nightingale before the Empress' recognition as a paragon of Pride.

Study of these auras helped the founders of the Way to create the Path of Pride. Some lay persons assume that the Imperial Synod created these auras in some fashion to encourage adherence to orthodoxy, but according to theological scholars the situation is the other way around. The auras came first, then the tenets of the Path of Pride.

Anointing

Anointing involves a short ceremony to create a personal aura on a mortal being. Anointing always requires the consent of the subject.

The Affirmation of Pride

- You feel a keen awareness of self-worth, and of the worth of other people. You find it difficult to tolerate disrespect, rudeness, or insults.

Description: The path of Pride is not about airs and graces, but pilgrims who embody Pride expect to be treated with courtesy and respect. Crucially the path teaches that the virtuous inspire others, they do not demean them. Those who benefit from this aura feel driven to help those around them find Pride in who they are and what they do and to defend those who seek to belittle or tear down their fellow citizens.

The Experience of Pride

- When anointed you were asked to name a personal quality which you are proud of. You feel an urge to exemplify that quality in everything you do.

Description: This anointing can be used to help pilgrims experience the benefits of Pride, allowing them to focus on a source of the virtue within themselves. However it is also invaluable for encouraging pilgrims to embody Pride in their actions. The Way teaches that Virtue is about action not words; Pride is not about vainglorious or egotistical boasting. It is about acting in ways that make you and others proud.

- You feel an urge to embody the culture and customs of your home. Abandoning your traditions or compromising on your peoples' beliefs feels shameful.

Description: The path of Pride stretches in both directions and pilgrims are often required to reflect on where they have come from, as well as where they are going to. This anointing emphasizes tradition, encouraging the pilgrim to embrace their past and defend the values of their home. It is popular across the Empire, especially among those who seek help in staying firm in defence of their traditional values in the face of calls for compromise or sacrifice. It is invaluable for helping Imperial citizens resist pressure to abandon their cultural traditions. This anointing is also called The Touch of Kethry, in recognition of that paragon's achievements in keeping their nation's traditions alive and inspiring others to embrace them.

The Strength of Pride

- You feel an urge to do what you say you will do. Whenever you face a challenge to your commitment, you feel a surge of inner strength.

Description: One of the key teachings of Pride is the importance of commitment. Those who strive to be virtuous must become forthright and resolute. Every pilgrim is different but those who have Pride must be clear what they stand for and they must clearly stand for it. There is no tolerance for the half-hearted, the uncommitted, or the pretender. Finding such strength of purpose is difficult, so this anointing exists to aid pilgrims giving them the strength to remain on the path of Pride by staying true to themselves.

Consecration

Pride in small things, loyalty to great ones.

Consecration is the ceremony used to create an aura on a clearly defined location. There is only one aura for each virtue, and all priests create the same one when they use this skill.

Marcher Proverb

Partner of Greatness

- You feel a profound sense of self-esteem, that who you are and what you do is significant. You are the foundation on which the future will be built.

Description: This powerful aura of Pride fills those who experience it with a deep sense of their own relevance. Every pilgrim finds Pride in different things, but the aura uplifts all of them the same. It reminds them of the profound importance of their actions to the fate of the Empire - and the importance of passing on the things that inspire Pride to future generations.

Dedication

Dedication is the ceremony used to link a pilgrim's soul to the virtue. It can also be used to create vivid oracular dreams.

Dreams of Pride

- The next time you sleep you experience a vivid dream incorporating elements from your past that make you proud. The dream will often show you striving to improve on the achievements of the past, working to make them greater still. Sometimes your dream will show you something new, in the vision you feel proud of this thing even though you may not have experienced it before. Often the dream will involve others you know, working with you to achieve something worthy.

Hallow

Hallow is used to create an aura on an item, such as a weapon, implement, shield or suit of armour. It is not possible to use hallow to create an aura on large immobile objects. Hallows do not provide a source of supernatural strength, but are durable and can last for a year (or potentially forever in the case of an artefact hallowed with true liao).

Hallowing of Lepidus

- You feel an urge to demonstrate your worth, inspiring others to follow your example.

Hallowing of Richilde

- You feel an urge to create art, to fill the world with wonder and exalt the souls of others.

Hallowing of the Inquisitor

- You feel a desire to expose false claims, revealing spurious and empty boasts for what they are.

Hallowing of the Conqueror

- You feel driven to convert others, and feel certain that everyone should embrace your traditions and ideals.

Hallowing of the Diplomat

- You feel driven to treat people with respect. Disrespect by others, even towards your enemies, grates on your nerves.

Hallowing of the Advocate

- You feel driven to refute unwarranted criticism, especially by those who tear down others from bias or self-interest.

Hallowing of The Throne

- You feel an urge to stand by your decisions. You sense instinctively that the choices you have made are the right ones.

Hallowing of the Cicisbeo

- You feel driven to exalt your companions; their confidence and dignity reflects on you.

The Ten Things

It is obviously down to the individual which qualities make them proud, but each of the Imperial nations can be associated with a single common idea that is often referred to as a source of Pride. The Navarr writer Cerin of Winter Trees referred to them as the Nine Things in the early years of the Empire. They were still in use over three hundred years later when the Imperial Orc philosopher Jakaj added her own people to the list during a speech given at the funeral of Emperor Ahraz. Following a recitation of the Nine Things, she appended her own people, and since then the list has been referred to by its current name.

For the Freeborn it is honesty; in Dawn it is glory (of course); in Highguard it is certainty; among the Imperial Orcs it is strength; in the League it is cleverness; in the Marches it is either practicality or stubbornness (depending who you are speaking to); among the Navarr it is sacrifice; in Urizen, excellence; in Varushka the idea of wisdom; and among the Winterfolk heroism.

Auras of Prosperity

We did not build an Empire so that citizens might make it rich, but rather that it might bring them wealth.

Emperor Giovanni the Peacemaker

Overview

An aura is a persistent spiritual effect on a person, location or item. The auras listed here are created by priests dedicated to the virtue of Prosperity who use the relevant ceremonial skill. A character who is dedicated to Prosperity must pick one of the following auras when they perform the relevant ceremony. A priest of the Way may also use the Dreams of Prosperity when they use the dedication ceremony to provide a pilgrim with a visionary dream.

The names used for each aura are simply the most common ones used in the Empire. For example, the Worth of Prosperity is sometimes called The Yeoman's Due by Marcher farmers. This is especially true with those auras that are named after paragons and exemplars; all these auras would have had different names before the exceptional individual they are named for was recognised by the Synod. The Hallowing of Good Walder for example was commonly called the Hallowing of the Sheriff before his recognition as a paragon of Prosperity.

Study of these auras helped the founders of the Way to create the Path of Prosperity. Some lay persons assume that the Imperial Synod created these auras in some fashion to encourage adherence to orthodoxy, but according to theological scholars the situation is the other way around. The auras came first, then the tenets of the Path of Prosperity.

Anointing

Anointing involves a short ceremony to create a personal aura on a mortal being. Anointing always requires the consent of the subject.

The Path of Prosperity

- You feel driven to enjoy the fruits of your hard work. You sense that this is the right time to celebrate your endeavours.

Description: A cold beer or hot meal at the end of the day is much more satisfying if you have spent the day working. The path of Prosperity is arduous, but priests encourage pilgrims to celebrate hard earned achievements without delay. There are always those who try to delay celebration in the belief that wealth must be hoarded for the challenges to come, but the path of Prosperity reminds pilgrims that nobody knows what tomorrow will bring. The virtuous do not postpone their festivities because of war or famine - for doing so undermines the value of hard work.

The Worth of Prosperity

- You feel a desire to ensure you receive the reward your efforts merit. Attempts to persuade you to work for free feel like theft.

Description: A crucial element of Prosperity is the entitlement that derives from honest labour, the right of the prosperous individual to be rewarded for their efforts. While most pilgrims are strong enough to demand what they deserve in good times, when times are hard there are always calls for people to give up their rewards for the greater good. This aura helps pilgrims remember that their Prosperity is virtuous. Appeals to altruism or patriotism are often attempts to persuade a pilgrim to share what they have worked to achieve with those who do not deserve it.

The Benevolence of Prosperity

- You feel an urge to reward those who have contributed to your achievements. It feels just to share your success with those whose efforts deserve it.

Description: This existence of this aura is often used to rebut criticism that Prosperity is selfish. Priests emphasize that the Path of Prosperity is not just about ensuring that you are rightly rewarded for your hard work - but also about ensuring that those who help you are also treated fairly. The aura is also used to refute assertions that prosperity is about giving your money away, pointing out that the aura only encourages the pilgrim to share their success with the deserving, not with everyone.

The anointing is sometimes used to stir those who lack virtue into action, whether they are lazy or miserly, but it is also common for those who have achieved great success to request it, hoping to ensure that triumphs do not cause them to forget those who aided them along the way.

The Means of Prosperity

- You feel an urge to work with others to achieve the goal you named when anointed. You experience a deep satisfaction from committing yourself to this endeavour.

Description: Pilgrims on the path of Prosperity are encouraged to work with others to achieve shared goals. Cooperating with other people to produce rewards everyone can share is virtuous and should bring a deep sense of fulfillment to all involved. Sometimes the pilgrim may commit themselves to an endeavour that will not benefit them immediately, in the knowledge that the virtuous will reciprocate in the future. This aura can help a pilgrim find the motivation to work hard in such circumstances.

Although this aura requires the consent of the recipient, some priests still worry that it could be abused to try to make a pilgrim feel work towards a goal which is not their own.

Consecration

Easy come, worth less.

Consecration is the ceremony used to create an aura on a clearly defined location. There is only one aura for each virtue, and all priests create the same one when they use this skill. Marcher Proverb

Neither Beg Nor Fear

- You feel a profound sense of fulfillment from all your hard work has achieved. You feel no reward is beyond your reach if you strive for it.

Description: This powerful aura of Prosperity grants a compelling sense of satisfaction at all they have accomplished to those who become aware of it. Even those who feel despondent that recent actions have not been successful will usually find that the aura reminds them of the victories they have gained. Whatever the case, it also brings an uplifting sense of what can be achieved through hard work.

Dedication

Dedication is the ceremony used to link a pilgrim's soul to the virtue. It can also be used to create vivid oracular dreams.

Dreams of Prosperity

- The next time you sleep you experience a vivid dream concerning the rewards you have been working towards. The dream will often show you toiling and succeeding through hard work. Sometimes the vision will show you something new, a challenge that would appear to offer great rewards if successful, though it may not be something you have considered before. The dream will often include people you know, usually working with you to help you achieve your goals, but in some less pleasant visions you may see strangers taking what you have earned from you.

Hallow

Hallow is used to create an aura on an item, such as a weapon, implement, shield or suit of armour. It is not possible to use hallow to create an aura on large immobile objects. Hallows do not provide a source of supernatural strength, but are durable and can last for a year (or potentially forever in the case of an artefact hallowed with true liao).

Hallowing of the Little Mother

- You feel an urge to encourage others to work hard and to help them earn their just rewards.

Hallowing of the Overflowing Cup

- You feel a desire to enjoy the fruits of your labour and celebrate as hard as you have worked.

Hallowing of the Shepherd

- You feel an urge to protect what has been justly earned from the undeserving who would seek to take it.

The Hallowing of Good Walder

- You feel an urge to confront and expose the undeserving who steal from and exploit others.

Hallowing of the Prudent Seneschal

- You feel an urge to secure thrifty deals and to avoid profligacy and waste.

Hallowing of the Lazy Orphan

- You feel driven to expose and punish the lazy, especially those who take without giving.

Hallowing of the Grateful Debtor

- You feel driven to reward others with fair recompense for what they have done for you.

Hallowing of Damakhan

- You feel driven to pursue the work at hand. Other matters increasingly feel like distractions you should ignore.

Hallowing of the Zemress

- You are driven to rebuke the envious; those who condemn the deserving for their prosperity demonstrate their unworthiness.

Hallowing of Giovanni's Retort

- You are driven to defend prosperity and expose the self interest of those who take the just rewards of others.

Commentary: The idea that hard work should be its own reward, or that people should be denied their just rewards in the name of some spurious "greater good", deny Prosperity. The Prosperous may choose to share the rewards of their hard work with the deserving, but they should never be coerced into doing so. Altruism - the idea that someone should do something without expectation or reward, or give away their skills or possessions - can be seen as little more than theft.

Auras of Vigilance

A soul warned is half saved.

Marcher Proverb

Overview

An aura is a persistent spiritual effect on a person, location or item. The auras listed here are created by priests dedicated to the virtue of Vigilance who use the relevant ceremonial skill. A character who is dedicated to Vigilance must pick one of the following auras when they perform the relevant ceremony. A priest of the Way may also use the Dreams of Vigilance when they use the dedication ceremony to provide a pilgrim with a visionary dream.

The names used for each aura are simply the most common ones used in the Empire. For example, the Preparations of Vigilance may be called Gathering the Spears by a Navarr guide.

Study of these auras helped the founders of the Way to create the Path of Vigilance. Some lay persons assume that the Imperial Synod created these auras in some fashion to encourage adherence to orthodoxy, but according to theological scholars the situation is the other way around. The auras came first, then the tenets of the Path of Vigilance.

Anointing

Anointing involves a short ceremony to create a personal aura on a mortal being. Anointing always requires the consent of the subject.

The Demands of Vigilance

- You feel an urge to probe the claims, motives, and actions of others. Refusal to cooperate inspires feelings of suspicion.

Description: This is an anointing favoured by inquisitors, Illuminates and other priests who desire to get to the truth behind deception and dissembling. It is less popular with citizens who have had their privacy invaded as a result, though the innocent have nothing to fear from the Vigilant. Priests of Vigilance have also used this to help citizens question assumptions, and whether individuals or groups are actually worthy of their loyalty.

The Price of Vigilance

- You feel an urge to end the threat you named when anointed. Morals and scruples feel like distractions that will prevent you from taking action.

Description: The threats that beset the Empire are wily and cunning, and few will ever provide absolute proof or solid evidence of their intentions before it is too late. Yet doubts about the consequences of acting, or feeling that there is insufficient information, can bedevil the pilgrims of Vigilance and discourage them from doing what must be done. Priests use this anointing to ready the virtuous and strengthen them to act with confidence and certainty. This anointing is popular in empowering priests and pilgrims to overcome other effects that cloud the mind, including malign auras.

The Merits of Vigilance

- You feel driven seek the source of a threat. You feel an urge to work with those who share your certainty and bypass those who procrastinate.

Description: This aura encourages pilgrims to try to address the source of the dangers that threaten them, rather than directing their efforts against the most visible or immediate threat. The Vigilant understand the importance of rooting out a threat to ensure that it is completely destroyed. This aura is popular with some Urizen priests who draw parallels with the Net of the Heavens, arguing that the aura drives pilgrims to find the pivotal node, the most effective point to act against the danger.

The Preparations of Vigilance

- You feel a need to prepare for the threats that are to come. You feel an urge to call out the complacency of those who are blind to the dangers.

Description: Many priests of the Path of Vigilance use this anointing as a call to arms, especially for those who they feel have become complacent and are unready for the dangers that may come. Other Vigilant groups or sects may use this anointing more regularly to encourage regular drilling and practicing of skills.

Consecration

You don't own it unless you can defend it.

Consecration is the ceremony used to create an aura on a clearly defined location. There is only one aura for each virtue, and all priests create the same one when they use this skill.

Marcher Proverb

In Deepest Consequence

- You feel a profound desire to protect the things you truly care for. You know your decisions are crucial to ensure their safety.

Description: This powerful aura of Vigilance fills those who experience it with a passion to protect the things they care most about. Although it can be an unsettling aura, it gives pilgrims an unshakable sense of the significance of their own role in averting danger. It is often used to create places of contemplation, a place for pilgrims to be reminded of the importance of Vigilance when making difficult judgements.

Dedication

Dedication is the ceremony used to link a pilgrim's soul to the virtue. It can also be used to create vivid oracular dreams.

Dreams of Vigilance

- The next time you sleep you experience a vivid dream concerning known threats and likely dangers. The dream will often show ways in which you might take action to confront and defeat them. Sometimes the dream will show you a new threat, it appears ominous and foreboding in the vision even if you have not encountered it before. The dream will often include symbolic elements that seem to provide some hint of the source of the dangers that threaten you.

Hallow

Hallow is used to create an aura on an item, such as a weapon, implement, shield or suit of armour. It is not possible to use hallow to create an aura on large immobile objects. Hallows do not provide a source of supernatural strength, but are durable and can last for a year (or potentially forever in the case of an artefact hallowed with true liao).

Hallowing of the Torch

- You feel an urge to root out and expose corruption among the powerful.

Hallowing of the Bell

- You feel an urge to rouse others to deal with a threat or danger you have identified.

Hallowing of the Scale

- You feel driven to uphold the law to ensure the innocent are protected.

Hallowing of the Scout

- You feel driven to investigate danger to find the source of the threat.

Hallowing of the Archivist

- You feel an urge to decipher secrets and unravel mysteries to identify hidden threats.

Hallowing of the Unconquered

- You feel an urge to act decisively to eliminate potential dangers before they can threaten you.

Hallowing of the Arbitrator

- You feel an urge to simplify complex situations; ultimately everything significant is either a threat or something to protect.

Hallowing of the Sentinel

- You feel an urge to take strategic actions to defend your homeland.

Commentary: Strategic actions often include things such as raising armies, building fortifications, creating large-scale enchantments and curses, hiring mercenaries, encouraging generals to remain wary for unexpected threats, and similar actions.

Auras of Wisdom

We can gain a lifetime of knowledge, yet never see the wisdom in it.

Avigliana di Sarvos

Overview

An aura is a persistent spiritual effect on a person, location or item. The auras listed here are created by priests dedicated to the virtue of Wisdom who use the relevant ceremonial skill. A character who is dedicated to Wisdom must pick one of the following auras when they perform the relevant ceremony. A priest of the Way may also use the Dreams of Wisdom when they use the dedication ceremony to provide a pilgrim with a visionary dream.

The names used for each aura are simply the most common ones used in the Empire. For example, the Worth of Wisdom may be called The Fork in the Road by a Varushkan wise one. This is especially true with those auras that are named after paragons and exemplars; all these auras would have had different names before the exceptional individual they are named for was recognised by the Synod. The Hallowing of Avigliana for example was commonly called the Hallow of the Messenger before Avigliana's recognition as an exemplar of Wisdom.

Study of these auras helped the founders of the Way to create the Path of Wisdom. Some lay persons assume that the Imperial Synod created these auras in some fashion to encourage adherence to orthodoxy, but according to theological scholars the situation is the other way around. The auras came first, then the tenets of the Path of Wisdom.

Anointing

Anointing involves a short ceremony to create a personal aura on a mortal being. Anointing always requires the consent of the subject.

The Worth of Wisdom

- You feel driven to make a decision and act on it - you are painfully aware that if you do nothing the situation can only get worse.

Description: The Path of Wisdom teaches that "the virtuous apply what they have learned; Wisdom knows all knowledge is incomplete". Priests of the Path of Wisdom are able to use this anointing to stir those who have become mired in contemplation or the acquisition of knowledge to test and apply that knowledge and gain wisdom. This anointing has also been applied to citizens and pilgrims who face difficult decisions, or are hesitating from taking action.

The Focus of Wisdom

- You feel driven to find a practical solution to the problem you named when anointed. Digressions, fanciful suggestions, and unworkable ideas infuriate you.

Description: One of the core axioms of the virtue states that "Wisdom is not always knowing the answer; Wisdom is finding the right question". The virtue is not about accruing ever more information, rather it emphasizes the importance of using the crucial knowledge to apply practical solutions to problems. Priests of Wisdom use this aura to remind pilgrims of the importance of focussing their search for knowledge on the essential facts needed to overcome challenges.

- You feel an urge to express your ideas and opinions clearly and concisely. You find it difficult to tolerate those who ignore the facts.

Description: The pilgrim who follows the Path of Wisdom understands the benefits of sharing facts and understanding with others. As well as enabling others to act wisely, helping others gain insight may be the most effective way to use the knowledge the pilgrim has gained. However priests often remind the virtuous to "let every word you speak carry meaning; do not use forty when four will do." Effective communication requires simple, short communication of the essential ideas, not rambling or grandstanding. Priests of Wisdom use this aura to remind pilgrims of these ideas, as well as helping those who struggle to find the confidence to speak out about what they know.

The Challenge of Wisdom

- You feel an urge to test your knowledge, discarding anything that falls short. A good decision depends on good understanding.

Description: Assumptions and inherited knowledge can be dangerous obstacles on the Path of Wisdom. The Path of Wisdom teaches pilgrims to "test what you learn; only fools accept hearsay as truth". The Empire is filled with misinformation and falsehoods, often promulgated by people who have not applied critical reasoning to the things they have been told. Priests of Wisdom use this anointing to encourage pilgrims to examine the things they have heard, to try to separate the wheat from the chaff by identifying what is likely to be true from pure fiction.

Consecration

Having grey hair doesn't make you wise.

Consecration is the ceremony used to create an aura on a clearly defined location. There is only one aura for each virtue, and all priests create the same one when they use this skill.

Marcher Proverb

Dagger of the Mind

- You have a profound sense that nothing is impossible. You feel you can solve any problem if you ask the right question.

Description: This powerful aura of Wisdom fills those who experience it with an uplifting sense that they can overcome any obstacle if they find the right approach. The aura helps pilgrims focus on the challenges they face and inspires them to seek new solutions.

Dedication

Dedication is the ceremony used to link a pilgrim's soul to the virtue. It can also be used to create vivid oracular dreams.

Dreams of Wisdom

- The next time you sleep you experience a vivid dream concerning the problems you are facing. The dream will often show those experiences and moments that revealed information about the challenges you are now facing and sometimes you see yourself acting on that information or seeking out new information. Sometimes the vision will include new problems or mysteries - these seem pressing and important in the dream even if you have never considered them before. The dream will often include individuals you know offering advice or information that helps you in the dream though it is hard to recall the details of what was said or done later.

Hallow

Hallow is used to create an aura on an item, such as a weapon, implement, shield or suit of armour. It is not possible to use hallow to create an aura on large immobile objects. Hallows do not provide a source of supernatural strength, but are durable and can last for a year (or potentially forever in the case of an artefact hallowed with true liao).

Hallowing of the Questor

- You feel an urge to question received wisdom and determine how trustworthy that information is.

Hallowing of the Strategist

- You feel an urge to appreciate the bigger picture. The needs of individuals pale besides the greater good.

Hallowing of Chastisement

- You feel an urge to chastise fools, and those who spread folly or use hindsight to criticize others' wisdom.

Hallowing of the Volhov

- You feel driven to find problems to solve and to ignore anyone who tells you to mind your own business.

Hallowing of the Stormcrow

- You feel an urge to listen to others when they speak about the things they know.

Hallowing of the Magistrate

- You feel a urge to trust your judgement, and act according to the information you have now.

Hallowing of Avigliana

- You feel a desire to spread ideas, sharing your experiences, knowledge, and insights with others.

Authority

The Senate will assume responsibility for relations with other nations

Imperial Constitution

Overview

The power to oversee relations with other nations is vested in the Imperial Senate not The Throne as many foreigners assume. As with many of their powers, it is possible for the Senate to choose to create an Imperial title that can wield their authority on their behalf.

The authority to negotiate with foreign powers is constrained by a number of important limitations.

Limitations

Cannot be Shared

The civil service will direct representatives and citizens of the foreign power to whichever title or body has been granted authority to represent the Empire. The power of authority cannot be vested in multiple titles or bodies; it must be absolutely unambiguous who holds authority.

The default situation is that authority for all foreign relations is vested in the Senate. If the Empire creates an Imperial title that has authority, such as by creating an ambassador, then the Senate is considered to have appointed the title holder to negotiate on their behalf. Authority is then vested in that title holder instead of the Senate.

If the Senate passes a second motion to create a title with authority for relations with the same nation, then this creates a constitutional impasse. If possible, the Constitutional Court will interpret the motion as implicitly abrogating the previous motion. If that is not viable, they may rule the second motion to be unconstitutional.

No Delimitations

It is not possible for the Senate to create a title with authority that is limited in scope or dominion. An Imperial title either has authority for negotiations with a foreign nation - in which case they may negotiate on any subject they choose - or they do not. It is not possible to limit negotiations to specific subjects such as religion, trade, or magic.

In Spring 377YE, the Senate passed a motion to create ambassadors with several foreign nations but indicated that the scope of their responsibilities was purely to initiate trade in resources. Because of this limitation, it was judged that these positions did not carry any authority and were ceremonial titles only.

Primacy

Once appointed, an ambassador (or any other title with authority) is the sole legally appointed representative of the Empire to the power or nation they have authority for dealing with. They are empowered to handle all negotiations with any representative of the foreign power, without recourse or appeal to any higher power. The Imperial Constitution is explicitly clear that an ambassador appointed by the Senate outranks the Throne as well as the Senate themselves - in matters of diplomacy with the appropriate power. Any citizen that attempts to negotiate on behalf of the Empire in place of an officially appointed ambassador would be breaking Imperial law and be guilty of subverting the agencies of state.

Authority does not include the power to declare war or peace, those powers must be granted separately if the Senate wish their representative to have that right.

In Summer 379YE, the Senate passed a motion to create a Consul, with the power to exercise authority where no other Imperial title existed with that power. The title included responsibilities to coordinate with existing ambassadors. The Constitutional Court issued explicit guidance to make absolutely clear that an ambassador would have primacy in all matters of authority for the nation they dealt with. The Consul has no legal right to direct the ambassadors in their work.

Ratification

Authority gives the right to negotiate on behalf of the Empire, but it does not automatically grant other powers of state, such as commission or the power to declare peace. If an agreement requires a change in the law or a change in the legal status of a barbarian nation then this does not become legally binding until it is ratified via a successful Senate motion.

For example, an ambassador may agree a ceasefire with a barbarian nation - but they cannot legally prohibit an Imperial general from submitting an order to attack the barbarians. That requires a declaration of peace - which must be passed by the Imperial Senate.

Embassy

If the Empire opts to build an embassy then that commission implicitly includes the creation of an Imperial title of ambassador to oversee the structure. It is not possible to build an embassy and not appoint an ambassador with authority to operate it.

An embassy allows the Empire to initiate diplomatic contact with foreign nations to make requests of them. Experience has shown that all attempts to initiate diplomacy with foreign nations without first building an embassy are ineffective.

It is possible for foreign and barbarian powers to make diplomatic requests of the Empire without the Empire creating an embassy. These representations must be handled by the Senate unless the Empire has vested authority in another title or body. At present the Consul has authority to deal with any foreign nation for which no embassy exists.

Procedure

The civil service provide support to allow the ambassador to speak on behalf of the Empire when dealing with foreign dignitaries from the relevant nation. If the visitors are present at the summit and have requested an official audience, then the Senate room is made available for use by the Ambassador at least once. The ambassador is expected to receive guests from the Imperial throne and to decide on who will be present in the chamber during this audience.

Autumn Equinox 2013

Overview

This page currently lists all the details that are specific for our fourth Empire event - the Autumn Equinox 2013. There is an additional page with event information which lists arrival and departure times and similar details that are common for all Empire events.

Battles

At the Autumn Equinox we will be running two large battles, one 11:00 Saturday morning and one 11:00 Sunday morning, along with a large number of smaller encounters. The large battles will follow the normal rules for battles; you may only participate in a single battle as your character and you must monster the other battle if you decide to participate in one.

Volunteering

Players are welcome to volunteer to help PD crew the smaller encounters, but are not obliged to do so - anyone who volunteers to help by monstering an encounter will receive a token that enables you to collect a free drink from the bar as thanks.

Site Map

The map shows the layout of the OOC camping fields and the IC area. The grey lines in the in-character field are roads that go through the camps. These roads will be laid out with fencing pins and nylon rope until the start of the event. You must not pitch your tent in the road, the red hats are under instructions to move any tents pitched in the IC roads.

No cars are allowed in the IC camping area at this event - they may only use the road indicated by the grey line that circles around the field. The road will be wide enough for you to pull up and park so that you can unload your vehicle next to your camp. Please unload your camping equipment and then move your vehicle to the car park before putting up your tent to allow other players to unload.

If you have a trailer or a large vehicle such as a minibus then you may drive that on to the field to unload. To do that you must wait at the IC entrance to the field. A member of the PD security team will then escort your vehicle to your camp where you can unload your vehicle. Once you are ready to move your vehicle to the car park you must request a member of the PD team escort your vehicle off the field.

OOC Camping

The OOC camping area will be laid out in lines with fencing pins and nylon rope. The system is designed to separate the tents from the cars so the rope has signs hanging from it which indicates that you should park your car adjacent to the rope and then pitch your tent on the other side of the rope.

Do not pitch your tents in the wide lane between the guide ropes, this lane must be kept free for access.

Traders

The following traders have booked for the event.

Autumn Equinox 2015

Overview

This page lists all the details that are specific for the Autumn Equinox 2015. There is an additional page with event information which lists arrival and departure times and similar details that are common for all Empire events.

IC News

Please see the 379YE Autumn Equinox winds of fortune for the latest IC developments known throughout the Empire.

For the Civil Service events set to occur and at what location, please refer to the external link to this civil service timetable

Battles

At the event we will be running two large battles, one Saturday morning and one Sunday morning. The large battles will follow the normal rules for battles; you may only participate in a single battle as your character and you must monster the other battle if you decide to participate in one. The sides for the battles will be chosen by the generals in the Muster of the Imperial Military Council on Friday night.

The fighting begins at 11:00 am - but if you are playing the battle then you will need to muster up before this time and if you are monstering then you need to make your way to the monster area for 10:00 am to give us time to get you into costume, made-up and briefed.

Quests

As before we are asking for player volunteers to give us a few hours to monster some of our larger quests. This allows us to run much more plot at the event.

To help us organize folk, we've set aside a slot for each nation to volunteer to monster, which are listed below.

	Saturday
Time	Nation
14:00	Imperial Orcs
14:30	Varushka & The Brass Coast
15:00	The League
16:00	Navarr
16:30	Wintermark
17:00	Urizen
18:00	The Marches
18:30	Highguard
19:00	Dawn

Monstering during this slot is purely voluntary - but it will help us put on a much better event for everyone. We are tracking the numbers of players who volunteer from each nation on an ongoing basis and using that to create equivalent sized quest opportunities for those nations at the next event. In effect, we'll try and deliver more fights to the nations that volunteer the most - on the assumption that those nations contain the players who want those opportunities the most.

We will be operating a one-way system at the event with players who are dropping off IC tents and equipment in this field following the marked road until they reach the gate. Once there they should travel around the site and come back in through the entrance to park in one of the two OOC fields.

The roads will be marked with fencing pins and rope as usual. There is a narrow strip of land around the edge of each field which is deliberately set aside for use by birds and wildlife. This area will be fenced off, as you must make sure that you do not drive or camp there.

The camp coordinators for each camp will have their own layout for their camp, showing where all the tents they know about are to be pitched. If you do not know where you are supposed to be camping, then please speak to them on arrival at your nation's camp.

We are confident that the ground will be much dryer and firmer at this event, but please make sure that you follow the directions provided by the red caps when you arrive on site. No unescorted vehicles are allowed off the roads in the IC camping area. The road will be wide enough for you to pull up and park so that you can unload your vehicle next to your camp. Please unload your camping equipment and then move your vehicle to the car park before putting up your tent to allow other players to unload.

If you have a trailer or a large vehicle filled with heavy kit then you may drive that on to the field to unload. To do that you must wait for a member of the PD security team who will escort you vehicle to your camp where you can unload your vehicle. Once you are ready to move your vehicle to the car park you must request a member of the PD team escort your vehicle off the field.

We have a lot of players booked for this event, so we're trying to organize the parking a little better in advance. If you are not staying on site overnight then please park your car in the far field next to the exit gate. You can enter and leave by that gate as needed. If you are staying on site but do not have any OOC tents, then please park in the marked parking area in the quiet camping field. Anyone who wishes to camp in this field is welcome to do so as normal, provided that they respect the quiet camp designation.

OOO Camping

The OOC camping area will be laid out in lines so that people can pitch their tent next to their car. The gate team will direct you where to park. The section of the OOC camp nearest to the IC area will be set aside for any player with mobility issues as normal. Please ask the gate crew for directions if you are eligible to camp here.

Autumn Equinox 2016

Overview

This page lists all the details that are specific for the Autumn Equinox 2016. There is an additional page with event information which lists arrival and departure times and similar details that are common for all Empire events.

IC News

Please see the winds of fortune and the winds of war for the latest IC developments known throughout the Empire.

For a list of what official elections are due to take place (and other changes to Current Imperial Titles as they occur during the event) refer to the 38oYE Autumn Equinox Imperial elections page

For the official civil service timetable of events occurring throughout the Autumn Equinox, please refer to this [\[link\]](#)

Battles

At the event we will be running two large Jotun battles, one Saturday morning and one Sunday morning. The large battles will follow the normal rules for battles; you may only participate in a single battle as your character and you must monster the other battle if you decide to participate in one. The sides for the battles will be chosen by the generals in the Muster of the Imperial Military Council on Friday night.

The fighting begins at 11:00 am - but if you are playing the battle then you will need to muster up before this time and if you are monstering then you need to make your way to the monster area for 10:00 am to give us time to get you into costume, made-up and briefed.

Both these battles will feature Jotun opponents - if you have any costume that is appropriate for the Jotun please bring that with you when you come to monster.

National Weightings - Autumn Equinox 2016

For this event we have decided to try out a new approach to monsterring. As a result, rather than advertising a set of times that players could volunteer at - we are asking everyone who is enthusiastic to volunteer to help with some extra monsterring to volunteer to play Grendel at 6:00pm on Saturday.

We want to stress that this is a request to people to volunteer - unlike the battles there is absolutely no obligation to volunteer to monster. But our hope is that enough players will volunteer to fight alongside our full time monster crew that we will be able to deliver a great skirmish at this time.

The skirmish is at

- 18:00 Saturday - Grendel

Of course anyone who wants to do some npc'ing will be welcome at any time - but 6pm Saturday is when we really need people - put the word around! The players will be fighting the Grendel, so if you have any Grendel costume please bring it with you when you come. We expect the slot to last between 60 and 90 minutes at most.

Caterers

- Mhorish
- Right Wok
- Applebys

There will be three caterers at the event, Mhorish will be providing a range of meals which are available from the IC or OOC field. In addition Right Wok will provide take-away dishes and Applebys will provide hot drinks from the catering area near the entrance to the IC field.

Site Map

The site map is opposite; the camp coordinators for each camp will have their own layout for their camp, showing where all the tents they know about are to be pitched. If you do not know where you are supposed to be camping, then please speak to them on arrival at your nation's camp.

Mobility Camp

The area marked with a wheelchair on the out-of-character camp is intended for participants with mobility needs. If you have genuine mobility needs then you can park your car here in the out-of-character camp - but still come and go throughout the event provided you have parked the car near the road. Please discuss with the crew if you have a disability that means you will need to camp here.

There are two disabled toilets at the event, one is part of the showers next to the disabled camp - the other is in the in-character field near Varushka and the Imperial Orcs. In addition there are two more disabled toilets in the shower units 750m away in the quiet camping field, if you are choosing to camp there.

Autumn magic

Overview

The magic of Autumn is the magic of influence and prosperity. Where Summer enhances the capabilities of the individual or Winter diminishes those same capabilities, the magic of Autumn spreads outwards from its targets along points of correspondence to affect large areas or large numbers of people. To a degree the magic of Autumn is the magic of scale – it is the ability to bless crops, or to blight them; to reveal mineral deposits or conceal them; to unite people or cause them to become fractious; to aid travel and movement over large distances, or to impede it. Autumn magic is subtle - its most powerful effects often come together due to synchronicity and serendipity. To an outside observer, many Autumn magic effects appear to be entirely natural and coincidental.

The magic of travel is also part of the Autumn purview. Whether it is speeding the movement of a shipping fleet or transporting four hundred warriors over great distance, the rites of Autumn play on the connections between here and there to bridge the gaps in the world. That same magic can be used to confound direction sense – there is a tale of a rite that causes all the pathways through a forest to loop back on themselves, and of an army still trapped somewhere unable to find their way out even through death.

Magic that deals with wealth, prosperity and comfort – or the appearance of the same – is also part of Autumn. It preserves food and drink, it enhances the potency of wine and the flavour of meat, it repairs broken things. Magicians who work extensively with Autumn magic often describe the experience as being mentally taxing, as if they are negotiating with a cunning opponent, persuading it to perform a task for them. Autumn magicians are often seen as arrogant or controlling because they feel they must cultivate an indomitable will if they are to work the most powerful magics.

Autumn magic is the most powerful because it harnesses some of the most potent, subtle forces in creation - not just synchronicity but the ability for mortals to work together to create wonders. Influence and wealth go hand in hand and provide potent tools for shaping the world.

Resonance

Prosperity

Money, wealth, and the comfort that derives from it are all resonant motifs of the Autumn realm. Other realms provide ways to improve the production of resources but few can compete with Autumn and none where the outcome is purely monetary. The Autumn realm has a special love for wealth, especially precious metals of all kinds and magic that deals with the creation of wealth falls squarely within the remit of Autumn.

Examples: Streams of Silver, Rivers of Gold, The Chamber of Pallas, Art of the Deal, The Lure of Distant Shores, Rivers of Gold, Gathering the Harvest, and Gift of the Wily Broker.

Trade

Some claim that Autumn magic's resonance with wealth is really only a consequence of a deeper connection - with the act of trade itself. Autumn rituals that create wealth usually do so by enhancing the trades carried out to produce the wealth, but the very idea of exchanging one good for another is fundamental to the realm of Autumn. Rituals that help satisfy desires and needs through mutual agreements and exchange are most powerful when performed using Autumn magic.

Examples: Ephesis' Scale, Before the Throne of Estavus, Twist of Moebius, Like Water Through Your Fingers and Balanced Scales of Lann.

Influence

Magic that strengthens and empowers influence and authority is strongly resonant in Autumn. Where the Summer realm grants power through prowess and majesty, the Autumn realm prefers a more subtle approach based on enhancing loyalty and command. Interestingly, unlike Summer, Autumn can also weaken central authority, by creating rituals that encourage individual ambition and aid conspiracies and treachery.

Examples: The Conspirator's Cloak, Mantle of the Golden Orator.

Bands

Autumn magic resonates strongly in any ritual that attempts to create magical bonds between members of a band. The Realm claims mastery over all magics that involve allegiance and loyalty, especially where those rituals involve the creation of binding contracts. For the most serious agreements, the Lictors, a powerful Autumn Eternal, can be invoked to ensure that all parties are suitably bound. This resonance covers more than just pacts, however, covering any magic that connects people, through webs of influence, diplomacy, and allegiance.

Examples: Create bond spell, Arcane Mark, Mark of Ownership, Ties that Bind, Scrivener's Bloodmark.

Rituals that bring disparate groups together, binding them to a common cause are resonant with Autumn magic. Magic that works to empower a group, improving coordination, trust and loyalty, enhancing the strengths that flow from cooperation are all favoured by the Realm.

Examples: Shared Mastery of the Magician's Guild, Barked Command of the Iron Serjant, Circle of Gold, Sum of the Parts, Bound by Common Cause

Binding

Autumn magic delights in complex chains and knots that bind things together. The motif of chains made of countless links and ropes woven from innumerable fibres is seen everywhere in the Autumn realm. Skilled magicians can translate this resonance into magic that literally binds the target in place. Rituals and spells that entangle the target, metaphorically or physically, are all possible using Autumn magic.

Example: Stance of the Constricting Scourge, Brazen Claws of the Lictor, Inescapable Chains of Bitter Glass, and the Entangle spell.

Craftsmanship

The Autumn realm claims dominion over the skill of the artisan, the act of turning raw materials into more complex, more useful items. This is especially true of metals, both base metals and precious metals, all of which are strongly favoured by the realm. Although magical items themselves are not of the realms, being made of materials found squarely within the mortal world, magic that marks them, bonds them, and affects them is common in Autumn. The realm resonates with most aspects of craftsmanship and powerful Autumn rituals allow crafters to work in a fraction of the time it would normally take them.

Examples: Hand of the Maker, Mark of Ownership, The Anvil of Estavus, The Blade Bites Back, Smooth Hands Shape the World, Timeless Hammer Rhythm, and Shadow of the Bronze Colossus.

Travel and Communication

The idea of communication is central to the Autumn Realm, but Autumn magic also resonates strongly with anything that empowers the travel needed to support such contact. The very notion of travel, the idea of roads, and the movement of people and ideas is an often overlooked resonance within Autumn.

Example: Call Winged Messenger, and The Ambassadorial Gatekeeper.

Dissonance

Personal Strength

Autumn hates making individuals stronger. It likes to grant influence, not strength or prowess. It despises the heroic warrior king. Where Summer is about doing it yourself or empowering a champion, Autumn is about getting someone else to do it, or empowering a group. This means there are few personal enchantments in Autumn, and those that are tend to be associated with objects (such as Shadow of the Bronze Colossus).

Vegetation

There is very little wild vegetation in the Autumn realm. Even a garden in an Autumn city is likely to be made of cunning replicas created from metal and gems rather than actual trees or plants. There are no forests or sprawling meadows in Autumn; all vegetation in autumn is tamed. There are farms, and well-maintained gardens but most of the terrain is made up of cities and the coiling stone and metal labyrinths that connect them. While Autumn magic can enchant a farm, it is impossible to use Autumn magic to encourage wild growth.

Creation

Autumn magic does not create matter from nothing; the essence of crafting is to modify and combine materials to make something else. Autumn magic could never spin gold out of straw, or conjure a sword out of thin air. It might allow someone to work faster, or with limited tools, but it will never bypass the need to actually make something. Modifying and combining existing things is the way of Autumn.

Creativity

Likewise, autumn is not creative. Inspiration and the kind of imagination that creates a brand new item are much more resonant with Night. There is an essential spark missing from Autumn magic when it comes to making new things. The Eternals of Autumn often make copies of creatures - a copper butterfly or a heart of gold - but really their power lies in manufacture, not innovation. Autumn eternals do not make art, and often fail to appreciate its more ephemeral representations. A gold ring is a solid thing, a display of wealth. A poem is just words put together in an interesting order - it isn't "real".

Destruction

Autumn magic does not destroy. The magic is about accumulating and trading things of value; destroying something valuable is a dreadful crime against the realm and its magic. It may allow a team of wreckers to work with supernatural speed and instinctive co-operation to tear a boat apart quickly and efficiently but the magic itself cannot simply make the boat fall apart into its component pieces. When an Autumn magician wishes to destroy a castle, they must enchant an army to smash it apart with catapults. When it wishes to ruin someone, it encourages chance to turn against you; it doesn't destroy your money.

Healing

Autumn is great for fixing broken objects - the mend spell is very resonant with Autumn. It is useless for fixing broken people - the heal spell is dissonant. Autumn would much rather replace a crippled hand with a cunning steel replica than try to restore the damaged tissues. At its heart, there is something cold and mechanical about Autumn magic that resonates poorly with healing and health. It is almost impossible to directly heal someone with Autumn magic.

Coarseness

Autumn is all about being subtle, it hates booming loud things, fireballs and flashy effects. Autumn moves and influences others, and it does so with finesse. Magic that draws attention to itself creates dissonance - leave earthquakes and walking forests to Summer and Spring. The ideal Autumn magic influences and encourages, it doesn't act directly. Using a tool to overcome a problem is the essence of Autumn, but the paradox is that the magic of Autumn itself is rarely the right tool to use.

Avigliana di Sarvos

And I say to you, that whilst the vaults of Highguard, and the grain stores of the Marches, may store wealth, only the League can make it.

Avigliana di Sarvos, on addressing the Senate

Virtue

Avigliana di Sarvos was recognised as an Exemplar of Wisdom by the Synod in the year 76 YE, as she lay on her death bed.

Biography

Avigliana was born in the city of Sarvos on the year that the Empire was founded. The daughter of a money-lender, Avigliana learned the accountant's trade, but had a grander vision.

When the first Empress died, she judged the situation wisely, and moved to Tassato in order to gain the ear of Emperor Giovanni.

Her work at the time was primarily on large-scale accounting, but many of the larger guilds were confined to the League by complex exchange rates and the lack of a shared currency. The idea of an Imperial currency was not a new one, but Avigliana was able to appeal to the Emperor on behalf of his home city, and also appeal to the Imperial Senate, to entrust the League with the creation of the single universal measure of the Empire's wealth.

Although she continued to work with the Imperial Mint, she used her influence to set up the School of Epistemology, to which she eventually retreated entirely, seen only by the students there. But her writing became prolific – pamphlets and letters would emerge from the school, bearing her seal, talking about subjects both mundane and esoteric.

These writings form the “Epistemologicon”, which is held, in coded form, by the school. A modern edition, “Excerpts from the Epistemologicon” is an ongoing project by the new master of the school, Niccolo Dos Tassatos.

The school continues to support the Empire – many diplomats are trained there, as are spies and cartographers, using a highly specialised approach that only the Path of Wisdom can offer.

Signs

The Assembly of Wisdom held that Avigliana demonstrated the following signs of being an Exemplar:

- Avigliana was recognised as being the reincarnation of Kala, a Urizen Exemplar of Wisdom. Both were committed to weighing and measuring the world they dwelt in. It was simply a matter of what was weighed and measured, and how.
- Avigliana's efforts in contributing to the Imperial Mint, and in seeing the League's currency - and fascination with wealth - accepted across the Empire, demonstrated her benevolence to the Empire.
- Through her school Avigliana encouraged citizens of the League to take note of the world they lived in and put the truth of it in writing. The school continues to teach spies, diplomats and cartographers, alongside the more traditional accountants and priests. Those that study there study Avigliana's works closely, which illustrates how she inspired others.
- Some claim that the Imperial Mint is Avigliana's legacy, but she has also left behind a magnificent reliquary that pilgrims have visited and meditated in the presence of.
- Finally, demonstrating the sign of salvation, Avigliana wrote extensively about Wisdom as a path to Ascension; teaching the laity to meditate on the entire Labyrinth as a means of transcending its function. As an extension of this, she also wrote a treatise on the distant future of the Empire, and the rewards, and dangers, of mass Ascension of large numbers.

Axos

Introduction

The Axos Citadels are located to the south east of the Empire on the far side of Urizen, and sharing a border with Skoura. Their name refers to the chain of citadels that protrude from the crags that line the coast. A people with an ancient history, the Aneleito Axou, or Merciless Axis, are an allegiance of sorcerous city states each answering to a sorcerer king. The Citadels have fierce rivalries with each other, but stand together against the barbarians and the Empire. Due to the catastrophic losses they have suffered, they are more given to diplomatic outcomes and solutions. They have developed strong cultural ties with the people of the mountain in Skoura, trading with them for ore and stone in exchange for military aid and sorcerous assistance. .

Never particularly friendly to the Empire, they politely closed their borders against Imperial traders in 207YE. Prior to that there had been a few border skirmishes, but given their closest neighbours were the Urizen, these skirmishes rarely came to anything. In 330 YE, diplomatic overtures from the Senator for Spiral were sent into Axos but rebuffed; it is believed that the Urizen were attempting to arrange a joint defence of that beleaguered territory but no records exist one way or another.

Of particular interest to Imperial citizens are the Axou ports which are open to trade with the Empire.

People

The people of Axos are well educated and have a reputation for being cunning, pragmatic and arrogant - convinced that their way of life is superior to all others. Recent information about the Axou is sparse; since they closed their borders, most of what is known of their society is based on written works nearly a century and a half out of date.

Their population is almost entirely concentrated in their massive citadels. Very different to the measured open spaces that characterize Urizen spires the diplomat Mercadia de Sarvos wrote in 196YE "It is as if someone has taken the city of Tassato, or perhaps a nest of vipers, and built it into the side of a mountain." Of the people, Savella of Stormspire wrote in her short treatise Studies of the Axou "It is as if someone has taken all the misplaced confidence of the most boastful citizen of the League, mixed in the worst elements of the parochialism of the Marches, and then forced thousands of them to live on top of one another like rats!"

Culture and Customs

Like their neighbours and, allegedly, distant cousins the Urizen, the Axou are steeped in magical tradition. It is believed that their culture is strongly influenced by their mystical beliefs in - some might say obsession with - death and what happens afterwards.

In person, Axou usually appear friendly and welcoming, but to Imperial citizens often seem superstitious and unpredictable. They are known to have made a great study of summoning and communicating with the spirits of the dead - a practice they call necromantia. Their skills in this area rival and in some areas exceed the knowledge of the Empire.

The people are grouped into clans known as Ile, which appear to be organised in a very hierarchical fashion. In each Ile there is a circle of sorcerers known as the Ilae who are responsible for leading their household and holding its secrets. Amongst these, an Ilarch is chosen to lead the house and represent the Ile to the Commander of the Agema Guard. One Ile within each citadel is pre-eminent. The Ilarch that holds the Throne and the Crown of the citadel take the title of Grand Ilarch and have undisputed control over the citadel.

While Axou culture is far from egalitarian, and while slavery is not illegal, they tend not to keep slaves. They are not above selling captured orcs into slavery in Jarm or Asavea, but there are few actual slaves in the nation itself. Rather, the Axou rely on an ambitious underclass eager to work for any wage or the possibility of patronage from one of the great clans or houses. Drug use is common among the lowest tiers of Axou society, and there are also popular arena combats in which teams of volunteer warriors fight in specially designed gladiatorial contests - sometimes to the death although more often not - against each other, thrill-seeking foreigners and savage beasts for purses of gold and the adulation of the masses.

Abridged History

The early Nikitis Axou or Victorious Axis were a nomadic people who navigated the Skoura plains using a series of peaks along the coast as markers for their hunting patterns. Over time, monuments were built on these peaks, then settlements, then the Axou Citadels that stand today. Imperial scholars theorize that the original Axou were cousins of the modern Urizen and Navarr, although the Axou have denied this repeatedly. There is some evidence that exiles from the nations that would become the Eastern Empire found a welcome of sorts in Axou, and many Ile have Highborn, Dawnish and Urizen ancestors. Unfortunately these exiled Imperial ancestors tend to have left dark reputations for heresy, criminality or sorcery behind them in the Empire, a fact which has in the past caused some tension with the Axou.

During the time of Emperor Nicovar the Axou closed their borders; two years later they launched an unexpected attack into the Imperial territory of Spiral. The attack was eventually rebuffed, but seriously damaged relationships with the Axou from that point onwards. The motivation behind the Axou attack are unclear, but it seems likely that it was an opportunistic activity by a single citadel looking to gain access to Urizen magical resources rather than a concerted effort of the entire nation.

Axou Military Concerns

The armies of the Axou consist of the Agema and the Toxatai, heavy and light skirmishers respectively. Many Toxatai are magicians as well, wearing mage armour on the battle field. Agema by contrast are usually fully devoted to the fighting arts. Crescent shaped shields, long thin swords, and sorcerous rods are the weapons of choice among the Axou, although both the Agema and the Toxatai are known to make good use of compact bows before engaging in melee.

Axou forces are often supported by small numbers of elite magical troops known as Tavos Ageli. These creatures are identified by their heavy armour and the face-covering masks that they wear. Urizen sentinels who have faced them in battle say that they appear to be moderately intelligent, or at least cunning, and appear to possess both great strength and barely controllable blood-lust. Their exact nature is unknown. Some scholars theorize that they are similar to the husks created with Quickening Cold Meat, most likely preserved human corpses possessed by more powerful Winter spirits; others believe they are similar to the undying soldiers summoned with Clarion Call of Ivory and Dust, perhaps the result of an enduring pact with an Eternal such as Sorin or Kaela.

Axou Economic Concerns

For many years Axos did not trade with the Empire, instead relying on close ties with the Skoura for many raw materials. In 380YE, however, a thawing of diplomatic relations following Imperial aid during the Druj Siege of Ipotavo and the subsequent Liberation of Kaban saw the port-citadel of the Towers of Kantor opened to Imperial traders.

The citadels that lie along the coast are known to make use of fleets of dark-sailed ships that have been encountered as far afield as the Asavean Archipelago and the Principalities of Jarm. They are known to trade extensively with the Sarcophan Delves. It is believed that the jungle-like forests of central Axos are a hostile environment with few raw materials, a serious problem for a nation with as much interest in magical implements and robes as the Axos. The Axou are known to offer a particularly good price for Imperial dragonbone. They are also believed to have little access to weirwood, and are known to import much of the mithril they require from Skoura in return for access to the fine white granite with which they build and expand their citadels.

The Axou have a reputation for being duplicitous and untrustworthy in matters of trade, but this may be based on a misconception. While the nation is united in matters of self-defence the individual citadels - and often individual families within them - see to their own trade agreements and one family or citadel rarely feels bound by an agreement made by another Ile or Ilarch.

Axou Religious Beliefs

The Axou are known to have a series of spiritual beliefs based on the relationship between body and soul. During the Summer Solstice 381YE, then Cardinal of Wisdom Agnetha de Rondell extended an invitation on behalf of the Assembly of Nine to Axou scholars prepared to visit Imperial institutions of higher learning and share information about their peculiar faith. The Empire now has a much clearer insight into the the peculiar - and almost certainly blasphemous - Axos religion.

Axou Magic Traditions

The magicians of Axos appear to be as competent and talented as their Imperial counterparts; if they have a weakness it is that each citadel and in many cases each Ile jealously guards its own magical lore. The Axou are known to make regular deals with the Eternals, especially those of the Realms of Autumn and Night. Their interest in necromantia means that several seek out specific Winter eternals whose interests align with their own - especially Kaela and Sorin.

Axou Territories

Axos appears to be made up of several areas of land equivalent to an Imperial territory. Each citadel is believed to be situated on the mausoleum of the founder of the structure, and is named for that founder. The land that surrounds the citadel shares the same name; so the Tunnels of Kaban control an area of land called Kaban. The six citadels of Axos are:

- the Towers of Kantor; which has the closest ties of any of the citadels with the Skoura
- the Chambers of Issyk; perhaps the most active of the citadels in external trade especially with the Principalities of Jarm.
- the Tunnels of Kaban; known to be almost constantly at war with the Druj barbarians.
- the Gates of Ipatovo; like the Tunnels of Kaban engaged in war with the Druj.
- the Halls of Maykop, believed to have the largest necropolis in Axos and be home to the most advanced practitioners of necromantia.
- the Spires of Solokha; while this is the closest citadel to the Empire, it is believed to have been abandoned or destroyed at some point after the closing of the borders.

Look and Feel

TBC.

Axos in Play

Axos lies near to the Empire, and the Axou speak the language known as Imperial, represented by English. Axos does not directly border any Imperial territory, and its people are insular - much of the information presented here may be a century or so out-of-date. The Axou are not at war with the Empire, but they are not friendly, either. Imperial player characters will not have greater knowledge about Axos than is presented here, and it is very unlikely that any background that includes periods of time spent in Axos will be accepted. This may be subject to change based on activities that take place during the game.

Axos ports

Overview

There is only one Axou port available to Imperial characters with the fleet resource; the Towers of Kantor.

Some Imperial captains prefer to avoid the Towers of Kantor and trade directly with some of the other citadels. This may involve a short overland trek - neither the Gates of Ipotavo nor the Halls of Maykop are easily accessible by sea. These citadels tend to be less prosperous on average than the Towers of Kantor itself, but trade in roughly the same goods (OOC: It is fine to role-play trading with one of the other citadels, but your character will receive the same goods regardless of where they go in Axos.)

Towers of Kantor

A citadel of Axos, a city of towers and mausoleums built in the foothills of the of the sky-scraping mountains southern Axos. Where other cities might spread in all directions, the architects of Kantor have chosen to build upwards instead. The towers are of fine white granite - Kantor controls some of the richest deposits of that strange material in the known world - and connected by thick arched bridges. It is said that a citizen of Kantor can live their entire life without once setting foot on the ground, if they are wealthy enough. The hills above the city are pocked with entrances to maze-like tombs, guarded by living and dead alike, where lie the ancestors of Kantor - and where the ghosts of sorcerers and merchants alike can be found

The Towers of Kantor were allegedly founded by the Sorcerer-King whose name they share. A busy metropolis that focuses on trade, the docks of Kantor dispatch black-sailed ships throughout the known world but they are also known as a centre of trade for the entire nation. Not only Axou merchants come to Kantor, but also Skouran traders from across the southern mountains, Sarcophan vessels from the south, and Jarmish vessels from the far east. There are even a few orc merchants in Kantor - the Grendel are as welcome as any others should they wish to risk the smoky, heavily scented bazaars of lower Kantor.

Like all Axou cities, a visitor is never far from a mausoleum, tomb, or memorial to the dead. Like the other Axou citadels, the revered dead of Kantor are interred in chambers beneath the city. Due to the vertiginous buildings that the citizens of Kantor favour, however, the arrangement of the catacombs is significantly less haphazard than in other citadels for fear of undermining the massive structures. Rather, there are said to be a second set of inverted towers build in the spaces between the main structures - sepulcher after sepulcher extending down, down into the dark stone beneath the city and linked by narrow galleries and passages.

In addition to beggar's lye gathered from extensive forest preserves at the foot of the plateau in central Axos, and between the cities, Kantor has extensive mineral wealth gathered both from deep mines in the mountains and trade with Skoura, leading to a bounty of tempest jade and orichalcum. Yet perhaps the most valuable trade good in Kantor is crystal mana - a material they have in such abundance that it has reportedly replaced money among some of the richest families of the citadel.

The Towers are also a source of luxuries unknown in the Empire - exotic foodstuffs, strange wines and spirits brewed with subtle spices, beautiful woolen garments, delicate but hard-wearing ceramics, and disturbing ceremonial articles associated with the practice of the necromantica, funerary urns, and narcotics. Also of interest to Imperial merchants are scrolls and books, which are easily available in Kantor and (unlike those acquired in more distant ports) written in the Imperial tongue. These texts are often quite disturbing, dealing as they commonly do with themes of death, ghosts, and the heretical notions of the strange Axou religion. All of these items fetch a fine price in the Imperial bazaars and among Imperial collectors. (OOC Note: Luxury goods from the Towers of Kantor are represented by money, acquired as part of the production provided by a fleet that visits the citadel.)

Trade with the Towers of Kantor

A starting fleet resource that engages in trade with the Towers of Kantor during downtime will produce 2 measures of beggar's lye, 2 ingots of orichalcum, 2 ingots of tempest jade, 2 crystal mana, and luxury goods worth 24 rings. A fleet that has been upgraded will produce more valuable resources according to this chart of foreign ports.

Axos religion

Overview

The religion of Axos appears based on one fundamental "truth" - a truth completely at odds with the Way. it posits that the Creator is an actively malign force, and that the Labyrinth exists to torture human souls. Reincarnation is a cruel trick - because the process strips a human of all the knowledge they have accrued in life, constantly forcing them to begin the process of seeking enlightenment - or transcendence - from scratch.

Beliefs

The Malign Creator

The Creator is not an entity that should be revered, but a cruel tyrant who hates and fears humanity (and possibly the orcs as well). Death is the wicked tool that the Creator uses to ensure its power is never threatened. The malignancy of the Creator is obvious in the mortal world which is full of pain, hardship, suffering, and pestilence.

Spiritual Forces

The Axou agree that powerful spiritual forces exist, which many refer to as "virtues." Humans can wield these spiritual powers with liao and other substances that allow a person to gain the correct spiritual state. The virtues are the manifest power of human spirits, however - they are nothing to do with the Labyrinth. Quite the contrary. To many Axou, the virtues are the touch of dead human spirits. This is most commonly manifest in the dreams which are a way of offering guidance that every properly trained priest knows - the put the target in touch with their ancestors who offer advice and support.

What the Empire calls virtue are just a seemingly random selection of the spiritual forces that exist. Most Axou don't differentiate between them the way the Empire does. The various religious orders regularly combine the auras that they produce in service of their goals and beliefs. For example, in Imperial terms, the Order of the Ivory Cup regularly draws on auras of Courage, Wisdom, and a force they call understanding - which seems unsettling familiar to some Imperial theologians.

Axou use the same spiritual ceremonies that Imperial priests use. Liao is not cultivated in Axos - rather their people use a number of expensive, hard to create narcotics and drugs to achieve the correct spiritual state to wield their powers. Liao is both more effective and significantly easier to create - leading to a great demand for it among the priests of Axos. Sadly, the priests must compete with the necromantia (magicians) for every dose of liao - for liao has use in several of the magical rituals they use to speak to, bind, or create ghosts.

The Eternal Torture Chamber

The Labyrinth is a trap and a torture-device put in place by the Creator. It exists to grind away the personality of a human so their soul can be reborn, mewling and shitting, with no ability to access its prior experiences. Thus the Creator keeps souls recycling forever and prevents humanity achieving its true destiny.

It is the duty of human beings to fight against the Labyrinth. The natural state of humankind is to be immortal in body and spirit, but the Creator opposes that. Thus the Axou fight to keep the spirits of the dead out of the Labyrinth so they remember who they are.

A very few people are strong willed enough to either avoid the Labyrinth or resist the tortures of the Creator that destroy memory. Ghosts are one example of this but there are also ancestral spirits such as the first six Sorcerer-Kings who maintain their personalities after death. Faithful Axou hope they will manage to avoid the Labyrinth and stay in the world to help their descendants.

 - 3.6 The Doctrine of the Labyrinth

The Imperial Synod serves the Creator by convincing people that reincarnation is a good thing. Worse, they enshrine the idea that getting through it quickly is a good idea - while in fact all it means is that people get their personalities destroyed quicker.

Ancestors

All Axou trace their lineage, and most can follow it back to the six great Sorcerer-Kings who founded the citadels. Axou treat revered ancestors in much the same way the Empire treats exemplars - but with the twist that it is possible for some Axou to physically speak to those ancestors that linger as ghosts in the catacombs beneath Axos. Many Axos who experience spiritual auras, or dreams guided by priests, speak of encountering the spirits of their ancestors, or feeling their ghosts watching over them. Indeed, unlike pilgrims of the Way, the Axou regularly offer prayers to chosen ancestors, asking for them to offer strength or even mundane assistance with their nebulously defined "spiritual powers".

Axou mystics use all manner of divinatory methods to seek to communicate with the spirits of the dead - cards and runes are common, especially runes carved from the bones of dead people. They are also known to pursue visionary trances, and in the past have sought access to liao specifically to seek contact with dead spirits. Even the most sensible-appearing Axou will make offerings to the spirits of their dead ancestors who they appear to believe cluster around their living descendants at all times - the most common offerings appear to be alcohol and food mixed with the fresh blood of the offerer.

Funerary Rites

Priests are not particularly powerful or influential in Axos, but the entire nation is known to have an odd relationship with death, and the spirits of their dead. They are known to dig vast mausoleum warrens beneath their citadels where the dead are interred.

It is important to the Axou that the bones of the fallen are taken back to the citadel - parallels are drawn with the Marcher desire to be interred in Marcher soil. Historically, after skirmishes with the Empire the Axou have been known to pay for the safe return of their fallen soldiers. They are known to honour every agreement they have made with Imperial troops designed to allow themselves and their opponents to recover the bodies of the dead and injured. On the rare occasions that Axou mercenaries have fought alongside Imperial troops, this single-minded desire to recover the bodies of the dead has led to occasional problems - Axou troops will often take foolhardy risks in their pursuit of their dead comrades.

Axou religion and orcs

Axos theology recognises that orcs are probably people, and that they probably don't have souls in the way humans do. It is likely that the Creator has its own malignant, hateful plan for them and ways of ensuring they do not avoid the trap of death. For the most part they do not concern themselves with the beliefs of orcs, being more interested in ensuring they do not destroy them. Most Axou have no experience of orcs other than the occasional invasion by the Druj, after all.

Since visiting the Empire, Axou priests have become aware of the Doctrine of the Ancestors (which they find very interesting indeed for obvious reasons), and the Doctrine of the Howling Abyss (which they point to as yet more proof of the malignancy of the Creator and the hatefulness of death).

Repudiation

In explaining their religion to Imperial scholars, Axou priests use a series of repudiations, designed to demonstrate where the Way has gone wrong. Each repudiation is a response to one of the Doctrines of the Faith. It must be stressed that these are not Axou doctrines - the priests do not seem to have formal doctrines in the way the Empire does. Rather they are devised as a "teaching tool" to show the differences between the Way and the faith of the Axou.

Repudiating the Doctrine of Reincarnation

The human spirit is immortal. It does inhabit mortal flesh, and while doing so it gains knowledge and enlightenment. Mortal flesh dies because the Creator is jealous. The spirit is cast into the Labyrinth where it is rendered down until all knowledge and enlightenment is stripped away, then it is cast back into the world as an ignorant child to begin again.

Repudiating the Doctrine of Human Destiny

Human spirits do not gain strength, knowledge, or enlightenment through rebirth. These things are stripped away through death and the Labyrinth. The paragons do not reincarnate and there are two explanations – that they have escaped the Labyrinth or that they have been rendered to nothingness by it.

Repudiating the Doctrine of Seven

There are many spiritual forces that arise from the human soul. Any of them can grant strength of purpose and will, and help a human being to fight against death and the jealous Creator. The Empire has arbitrarily picked seven that they use to enslave human beings to their incorrect vision of how creation works.

Repudiating the Doctrine of The Paragons

There is only one certain way to escape the Labyrinth. That is never to enter it and remain in the world of material things. Some very rare spirits are powerful enough to free themselves from the Labyrinth and they guide their descendants as best they can.

The Doctrine of the Creator

The Creator is a jealous, hateful fool. It dominates humanity through the monstrous world it has created, and the torture chamber that is the Labyrinth. Humans must hold the Creator accountable and reject everything it has created. Happiness comes only from human endeavour – everything else in creation is either a trap, or a punishment.

The Doctrine of the Labyrinth

The Labyrinth is a place of pure spirit where the dead are tortured and rendered down until they forget everything. It is all that waits beyond life. Death is the cruel punishment of a jealous Creator. It is the duty of all human beings to fight against death. Whenever we can, we must preserve the spirits of the enlightened so that their wisdom can guide us towards finally destroying the Creator and freeing every human spirit.

Baersark's Rage

Description

A baersark's rage lets the wearer recover quickly from crippling wounds. It is a popular piece of armour with many Kallavesi warriors, and they have introduced it to the Steinr who fight alongside them. It allows a hero to rise up from incapacitating wounds and then fight for a short time even in the face of active opposition. Kallavesi-made suits often have boar-hide as the base and may incorporate a boar mask, calling upon the beast's almost boundless tenacity. Indeed, Baersark was the name of a particularly huge and vicious boar which roamed Kallavesa centuries ago, slaying many hunters who sought to make their names by killing it. Eventually a team of Suag slew it, but it killed several of their number before it fell, charging down the spears embedded in its flesh to gore its killers with its massive tusks. Its hide was used to make the first examples of this armour.

Navarr skirmishers also value this armour when spread out in forests and far from medical attention. Some wait for the right moment to heave themselves to their feet and join the fray once more, waiting for their opponents to disregard them as a threat. Others regard this as foolhardy for every moment spent bleeding is a dangerous one and every moment on the ground could be the last if a foe decides to deal a finishing blow. Navarri archers sometimes call this armour Arrow Catcher when being polite and a string of more colourful words in the heat of battle, for a barbarian chieftain dressed in such armour can take several arrows to keep on the ground.

There is debate over which runes are best to work into this armour. Rhyy is used in its healing aspect, but some hold that those suits encourage their wearers to shed their blood freely in the knowledge that they can recover and that such a cavalier attitude is unhealthy. Verys, the rune of might, is a popular alternative, multiplying the wearer's natural reserves of strength.

Rules

- Form: Armour. Takes the form of a suit of medium armour. You must be wearing this armour to use its magical properties.
- Requirement: Any character can bond to this item.
- Effect: When you use the unstoppable skill you regain up to 5 lost hits.
- Materials: Crafting a suit of baersarks' rage requires fifteen ingots of weltsilver, eleven measures of ambergelt, five ingots of tempest jade and five measures of beggar's lye. It takes one month to make one of these items.

The sneer on Jaster's face disappeared as the big Kallavesi lumbered back to his feet, despite the crossbow bolt protruding from his chest. Suddenly the bravo began to sincerely regret his duellist's title of "one shot", since he carried no other ammunition, nor any weapons larger than the silvered pocket knife he used for cleaning his nails.

"the Spotted Bull cannot be killed by one arrow!" snarled the Kallavesi, unsheathing a war-knife that would have doubled as a sword for most people.

This duel was going considerably awry.

"Has anybody got a spare crossbow bolt?" shouted Jaster, barely evading another swing from his enraged opponent...

Bailiff of the Grand Market

Overview

The Bailiff of the Grand Market is an Imperial title awarded to a Marcher citizen. It is a Marcher position appointed through the Bourse but chosen by Marcher yeomen with votes allocated based on the size of their farm holdings.

The Bailiff has offices in Meade, but it is a rare Bailiff who spends much time there. While the title is associated closely with the weekly or bi-weekly markets of Mitwold, the Bailiff is regularly involved in trade fairs and markets across the Marches, and Marchers from every territory have regularly held the post. The title pre-dates the formation of the market towns, and comes from a time when almost every town and village in the nation would have their own regular market.

Traditionally the Bailiff's role was to ensure security at fairs and markets across the Marches. In return, they were guaranteed a hearty meal, a minimum of one meat pie and a tankard of ale. More importantly, however, to help the Bailiff meet the costs of their office they were given the opportunity to buy some goods before the market officially opened allowing shrewd bailiffs to secure bargains for themselves. Many markets considered it a matter of pride to ensure that the Bailiff turned a good profit in exchange for their hard work in keeping the marketplace safe and fair for all.

Within the space of a season, the Bailiff might find themselves in a position to buy beggar's lye and ambergelt at a fair from a village in the birchwoods of Upwold; a cask of Wintermark mead and some measures of dragonbone from a Suag peddler in a town square in Mitwold; a basket of tempest jade from a scowling stallholder at the great market in Meade; a basket of assorted herbs at a dour fair in Bregasland or even a handful of crystal mana at a strained gathering in Overton.

When the Marches joined the Empire some of the more expensive responsibilities of the Bailiff were assumed by the civil service. Marchers are loath to abandon their traditions however; the presence of an honest Bailiff was considered to be good for trade as it let everyone know that the market was safe to travel to. With the help of Emperor Giovanni the role of Bailiff was incorporated into the Bourse, to allow the civil servants to identify the individual with the most support from other yeomen.

Responsibilities

The Bailiff is expected to ensure fairs, markets and trade gatherings in the Marches are undertaken in a traditional and honest fashion. They also have some responsibility for ensuring that the major roads between towns and villages remain free of bandits and feni who might otherwise restrict trade. In practice, this is quite a tall order for a single individual - many markets have their own local bailiff or sheriff who sees to the security of their fair.

Specifically, the Bailiff oversees the Grand Market in Meade which takes place on the third weekend of each month and attracts traders from across the Marches and even occasionally from Wintermark to the north.

Ministry

As a ministry, the Bailiff of the Grand Market can purchase quantities of trade goods at a set price. The Bailiff decides how much money to spend during downtime from their character page. Money is removed from, and resources are placed into, the character's inventory when the downtime is processed.

Appointment

This title is appointed during the Winter Solstice by citizens of the Marches who control farm personal resources. The larger the farm an individual has, the more votes they can allocate in support to a candidate. The voting is handled by the civil servants in the Bourse.

Only a Marcher character may hold the title. As a title in the Bourse, they cannot be revoked by the Imperial Synod

The Title in Play

The role does not provide additional information about events in the Empire, nor allow the player holding it to request special reports or downtime actions. These details are assumed to be below the abstraction layer. The title holder is encouraged to create their own stories about their activities within reasonable limits and to get involved in events appropriate to their title during the game, but they do not have any powers beyond those explicitly listed in the section on powers.

These details exist partly to provide context and character to the role - and partly to allow our writers to use the title as a plot hook. Plot that involves the position will be rare - but all the campaign positions in Empire have these details to create the potential for it to happen.

Balanced Scales of Lann

Rules

Autumn Magnitude 20

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets a character, who must be present throughout. The target character must have the Autumn lore skill.

This spell is an enchantment. A target may only be under one enchantment effect at a time.

Effects

The target gains one effective rank of the Autumn lore skill for purposes of performing rituals, subject to the normal rules for effective skill. In addition, they gain the ability to trade valuable materials for additional power. When performing an Autumn ritual they have mastered, they can substitute ingots of orichalcum, weltsilver, tempest jade, or green iron for crystal mana. Every 2 ingots spent counts as 1 crystal mana when contributing to the ritual.

While the enchantment lasts, the target character experiences a roleplaying effect: you sense that people who want you to do something for them without offering appropriate recompense are trying to take advantage of you. It is difficult for you to engage in even the most trivial social interactions without seeing them in terms of an exchange of influence and favours.

If the target is a cambion, the roleplaying effect is especially pronounced. A cambion may also choose to temporarily add to or increase physical trappings of their lineage. These changes are temporary and do not last more than a few hours after the enchantment ends.

The effect lasts until the start of the next Profound Decisions Empire event.

Additional Targets

This ritual can affect additional characters from the same coven. Each additional character increases the magnitude by 15. Additional characters must be present throughout. Characters who are targeted by the ritual may gain an additional rank in different realm lores.

Option

Any caster who has mastered the ritual may choose to substitute ingots of tempest jade, orichalcum, or weltsilver, or green iron for crystal mana when contributing to it. Every 2 ingots spent count as 1 crystal mana when contributing to the ritual. The ingots need not be of the same type.

Description

This enchantment grants a magician improved facility with Autumn magic. It draws on a formal agreement between mortal magicians and the eternal Ephasis, enhancing their ability to perform rituals from Autumn lore. Furthermore, the enchantment allows the magician to directly exchange ingots of valuable material for raw magical power; the ingots are claimed by Ephasis (or more correctly her agents). When using this additional facility, magicians usually place all the ingots they intend to use in their ritual in an opaque container such as a box or bag and formally offer them to the eternal at the beginning of the ritual.

Unlike some similar rituals, the enchantment only allows a magician to trade materials for power when contributing to an Autumn ritual they have mastered. Magical scholars suggest this is a consequence of the way that creativity can create dissonance when working with Autumn magic. When Spring magic encourages spontaneity, and Summer magic delights in magicians taking risks, Autumn magic often favours a more rigid, considered approach to wielding power.

 - 1.2 Performing the Ritual
 - 1.3 Effects
 - 1.4 Additional Targets
 - 1.5 Option
- 2 Description
- 3 Common Elements

The enchantment makes up for this rigidity by offering greater opportunities to trade raw materials for magical power. When using ingots to power a ritual, the magician formally offers them in trade for the raw magical potential they can then forge into the finished magical effect. In a nod to rituals such as Ephisis' Scale or Before the Throne of Estavus, the materials a magician will exchange for magical power are often placed in a sealed container and presented to Ephisis in return for the agreed upon magical affinity.

There are a few rumours of more potent versions of this ritual that permit a magician to trade ingots for magical energy to perform any mastered ritual, not just those of Autumn lore. There are also a few accounts of a similar ritual that revolves around an agreement with the eternal Prospero allowing magicians to instead trade measures of ambergelt, beggar's lye, dragonbone, and iridescent gloaming for raw magical power.

Common Elements

The ritual often involves some sort of symbolic exchange or balance. A target may begin with something representing their understanding of Autumn lore in one hand and transfer it to another hand, or they may trade it to one of the ritualists in return for a symbol of their new mastery. In other versions a symbol representing Autumn magic, often Lann is inscribed on the skin - a blood mage will often use blood donated by a cambion to paint such a symbol.

In many cases, the crystal mana or materials intended to be used with this ritual will be sealed in an opaque container - often one that has been used to perform Ephisis' Scale. When the mana is used in such a fashion it is usually characterised as a "payment" to Ephisis in return for the power the enchantment provides. Some magicians include contracts in which they agree to always use a certain portion of ingots to perform their Autumn magic in the coming season - while the legal status of these contracts is unclear they often disappear during the performance of the ritual.

Unsurprisingly Ephisis (or one of her named Factotums) is usually evoked as the ritual is performed. A theurgist will often evoke paragons or exemplars of Prosperity or Wisdom when the ritual is performed - the exchange of wealth in return for a reward, or the idea of applying understanding to enhance skills both resonate well with this ritual.

Ballad of the Schlacta

To the tune of Katusha. Lyrics by David Holley.

Once, in Karsk, I came across a meadhall Mead, they served, just one Ring for a pint “We’ll drink here”, oh, I called out to my cousins “Sun’s gone down, we’ll drink right through the night”

Dawnish lads, were sat around a table Gleaming armour, ready for a fight “Drinks for them”, oh, I called out to the barkeep “Maybe they’ll drink with us through the night”

Pissed, we got, a Throne had passed our pockets Dawnish lads, just pissed their pretty tights “Had too much”, oh, I called out to the tavern “Only schlacta drink right through the night”

One got up, and waved his dagger at me “You!” he said, “I challenge to a fight” Thrown outside, oh, he landed in a snowdrift With some luck, he’ll make it through the night

Mead we had, and mead we kept on drinking ‘Til outside, did glow the morning light Drink, drink, drink, til Varushka’s day is dawning Time to leave, we’ve made it through the night.

Balms of the Fountainhead

Mastery of these recipes allows an apothecary to brew preparations valuable to ritual magicians versed in the Lore of Spring. With one of these potions a ritualist can wield the magic of the Spring Realm more effectively, but they also become more susceptible to the influence of that Realm.

Initially, Imperial apothecaries who had mastered the Balms of the Fountainhead were able to create the Vernal Balm and Suffusion of Blood. However, following the defeat of the Druj orcs in Reikos in 379YE, information about certain techniques used by the Buruk Tepel came to light - coupled with the recovery of a number of books belonging to skilled Highborn apothecaries stolen by the occupation force. These writings contained details of a potent potion favoured by the Druj Gulai that built on the principles already familiar to Imperial potion makers, and knowledge of how to create the Talonvine Infusion quickly spread.

Vernal Balm

This textured ointment is quickly absorbed through the skin, speeding the blood and enhancing a magicians awareness of Spring power. It is often mixed with pigment and used to draw or paint runes or looping designs on the skin of the face and hands just prior to the start of a ritual; while the balm itself is absorbed, the pigment remains behind.

Some magicians find the almost narcotic sensations that accompany use of this balm to be very appealing. The vernal balm helps to strip away complexity, and allows a magician to see straightforward solutions to problems, as well as freeing them from emotion constraints and encouraging them to express themselves simply and directly.

- Form: Salve.
- Description: This blood-red ointment smells delicious. It has an oily, greasy texture if you rub it between finger and thumb, and it is quickly absorbed into your skin causing your entire hand to tingle.
- Roleplaying Effects: You become prone to sudden mood shifts and displays of strong emotion. Your attitudes become more straightforward, and you find complex plans and overthinking frustrating. You would rather take action than talk about it.
- Mechanical Effects: If you possess the Spring Lore skill then you gain one additional effective rank to the next spring ritual that you perform within ten minutes, subject to the normal rules for effective skill. This is a tonic; the effect of any other tonic you have drunk immediately ends.
- Recipe: Two drams each of Imperial Roseweald and Marrowort, one dram of True Vervain and one crystallized mana.

Suffusion of Blood

This blood-red elixir allows a ritual magician to exert great power in the Realm of Spring. It allows a ritualist to align their reserves of personal power with the Realm by synchronising their emotions and behaviour with that of the Spring. By seeking out the ways that the human spirit most reflects (or is reflected by) the supernatural Realm, they unlock great potential to weave Spring magic.

Some magicians find the sensation of working Spring rituals with the aid of the suffusion of blood to be almost ecstatic. They pursue opportunities to use the potion, even when there are sufficient crystallized resources available. The thrill of directly wielding the power of a Realm, rather than using an intermediary, coupled with the emotional influence of both the elixir and the realm leads to addictive behaviour. Masters sometimes tell their apprentices the cautionary tale of Angelique von Tassato, a League ritualist who beggared and ultimately destroyed her own troupe in pursuit of the freedom she could only find in the arms of the suffusion of blood.

- Form: Liquid.
- Description: When this blood-red elixir catches the light, it glows with a faintly translucent aura. The scent smells of freshly cut grass, and causes your nostrils to tingle. The sweet, fruity taste causes a moment of dizziness.
- Roleplaying Effects: You become very direct, preferring to go directly to the heart of a problem, say what you think, or deal with immediate problems. You find it difficult to think about the past, or anything more pressing than the immediate future. You also become emotionally volatile, and are especially short-tempered. Anything that frustrates or irritates you is likely to cause you to lash out against its source.
- Mechanical Effects: If you possess the Spring Lore skill then you can use up to 3 personal mana as if it were crystal mana on the next spring ritual that you perform within ten minutes.
- Recipe: Three drams of Imperial Roseweald, two drams of True Vervain, and one dram each of Cerulean Mazzarine, Marrowort and Bladeroot.

Talonvine Infusion

This coarse substance is mildly toxic, and can cause uncomfortable welts to form on exposed skin. There are some cases of people who have gotten the infusion in their eyes suffering from painful blindness or restricted vision that can last for several hours. The infusion is usually added to boiling water, and produces a thick, pungently musty smoke that must be actively inhaled. Doing so causes an exhilarating rush of vitality and enthusiasm, which is quickly replaced by impatience and an urge to do something - anything at all - as soon as possible. The initial rush from inhaling the steam from a properly prepared Talonvine Infusion may prove to be dangerously seductive, and the secondary effects can be difficult to channel constructively.

- Form: Infusion.
- Description: This coarse yellow substance gives off a musty scent. It raises itchy welts similar to nettle stings on contact with skin. It tastes sweet, but causes a painful swelling on the tongue - as if one had been stung by a wasp.
- Roleplaying Effects: If you have inhaled the steam or smoke, you feel a rush of vitality and strength that quickly fades but leaves a powerful desire to take action - without concern for rules or long-term consequences. If instead you ate this substance, you experience stabbing stomach pains (consult a ref).
- Mechanical Effects: If you possess the Spring Lore skill then you gain three additional ranks to the next spring ritual that you perform within ten minutes, subject to the normal rules for effective skill. This is a tonic; the effect of any other tonic you have drunk immediately ends.
- Recipe: Three drams each of Imperial Roseweald and Marrowort, one dram of True Vervain, one crystallized mana, and one ring of ilium.

Eating Talonvine Infusion

Actually eating Talonvine Infusion is a bad idea as it is quite toxic. It causes internal swelling, sore throat, and stabbing stomach pains. In extreme cases it can even result in loss of voice. The symptoms persist for up to half an hour, but can be alleviated by anything that would remove the VENOM condition such as the purify spell or a dose of Imperial Roseweald applied by a physician.

Banner of the Bold

Description

The intricate needlework required to embroider a banner of the bold is time consuming in the extreme. Trace amounts of dragonbone and iridescent gloaming are used to trim and reinforce the sturdy cloth of the standard, but it is the intricate designs worked into the fabric itself that provide most of the magic.

The true potency of this banner becomes clear when the bearer is exposed to malignant auras such as those produced by some horrors or eternals, evoked by heretics and blasphemers, or brought into being by enemies of the Empire to protect key areas.

As with most magical banners, a banner of the bold bears the appropriate symbols for the heraldry or livery of the soldiers who will fight beneath it. This means that the banners are most often made for commission, although some artisans focus their attention on producing fine blank canvases which can be embroidered or painted with appropriate symbols after they have been sold.

A banner of the bold often bears the runes Feresh or Tykonus worked into the banner pole, or embroidered around the edge. Some banners, especially those made by Dawnish weaver cabals use the intricate Summer sigil, carefully worked in thin silver or gold thread into the reverse of the flag proper.

Unlike many magic standards, a banner of the bold is bonded to only a single individual rather than an entire band. The protection and support it offers allows the standard bearer to brave dangerous situations to support their comrades, and gives them a small measure of inner strength to draw on while they do so.

Rules

- Form: Magical standard. The phys-rep requirements for a magical standard are more stringent than those of similar items.
- Effect: While wielding this standard, you gain an additional hero point, and can treat it as a source of spiritual strength for purposes of overcoming roleplaying effects.
- Materials: Crafting a banner of the bold requires no special materials. It takes two months to make one of these items.

It is said that the General Halmerad always insisted on having his command banner unfurled and present when he was due to appear before the Empress Varkula. This was, of course, a sign of martial respect, and not - as has been scandalously suggested by certain other scholars - an indication that he in any way feared his beloved Empress ...

Bannerman's Band

Description

A Bannerman's Band is a ring, usually worn by banner-bearers, standard-bearers, bards, scops, Varushkan stzena, Dawnish troubadours, many priests and even League cicisbeos. It is a valuable item that allows a supporter or assistant to use their charisma and inner strength to keep their allies alive in the most desperate straits. While the common name is used throughout the Empire, the individual nations often refer to them by the name of an archetypal supporter from their own culture - thus there are Cicisbeo Signets, Troubadour's Rings and Bard's Bands in various places.

A Bannerman's Band is a grand gift to a member of a fighting company whose bravery and loyalty are seen as being inspirational. Some companies with a long history are lucky enough to own an artefact-quality version of the ring which is passed from one 'mascot' to another. Being chosen to carry one of these treasured relics is a mark of great honour. The nature of war means that these priceless rings often fall into the hands of enemies, unfortunately; recovering one of these rings and returning it to the company to which it belongs can easily create a lifelong debt, especially in places such as the Marches and the League where debts are not treated lightly.

Rules

- Form: Jewellery (Talisman)
- Effect: You may spend a hero point to use the stay with me skill. Once per day you may use the stay with me skill without spending a hero point.
- Materials: Crafting a Bannerman's Band requires five ingots of green iron, four measures of ambergelt and five measures of dragonbone. It takes one month to make one of these items.

Dear Tomasina di Sarvos, Captain of the Company of the Black Banner,

Firstly, allow me to extend my warm congratulations on the birth of your granddaughter, a girl whom I am certain will be as full of the virtues of courage and pride as those who gave her birth. Keep her close and love her dearly, and she will not falter for want of good examples to guide her.

Secondly, please request from my messenger the package accompanying this letter now. I hope that you recognise it, my dear friend. I only wish that I could deliver it in person, but the terms of my contract keep me across the water for now, and it seemed too important to wait once I discovered its origins.

This fine ring fell into my possession on campaign along the Brass Coast, among a hoard of otherwise trivial jewellery being auctioned after its capture from foreign reavers. My lieutenant recognised it immediately as a Cicisbeo's Signet, and clearly decorated with a banner of Sarvos, and yet though it lingered on the edges of our awareness, none among the crew could place it by sight. Call it a failing of vigilance, perhaps, but my banner-book was damaged by water some years ago, and parts of it remain utterly illegible. As you are aware, I am not presently on friendly terms with the Reckoner guilds, and I did not wish to entrust it to another, and so it lay unknown, an object of fierce curiosity, for these past two years.

Eventually, however, along came a torch-bearer of Urizen who wished to travel in foreign parts. He boarded the same Freeborn ship as us, and his own notes on the banners of the Companies of the League were quite extensive. It was then, some days into the voyage, that we recognised it in those notes as the old seal of the Company of the Black Banner, formerly the Black Swan Ascendant, which your grandfather re-named and valiantly rebuilt after its defeat at sea.

Imagine my delight at the discovery. I swear to you, that nervous old mountain-goat did not appreciate being shaken with quite such excitement as I felt at that moment. Immediately we made landfall I attempted to amend the terms of my contract to permit me to deliver the ring myself, but alas, you know the Freeborn: signed in a cambion's blood, the contract was immutable. I do not blame them; when I look back, the gesture seems a tad off-colour, but such was my delight.

Instead, you have it from the hand of my most trusted lieutenant Drago Durante di Sarvos, along with this letter, sealed with two kisses of joyful affection, one for each cheek. I hope that when we next meet, I will have the honour of seeing it resplendent on the hand of your cicisbeo.

I must to the campaign trail now, but know that a part of my thoughts go with this ring to you.

With warmest regards, I remain,

Yours,

Fabrizio di Sarvos

Barbarians

This is a placeholder page for content that PD are actively working on.

Overview

Barbarians are people that are not part of the Empire, that the Empire is currently at war with.

There are several distinct barbarian powers which represent hostile tribes, kingdoms, and nations. The barbarians are designed to look cool in massive numbers in battles; to provide immersive, exciting and dramatic combat encounters; and to allow a range of interactions outside of combat. Most of the barbarian powers that currently surround the Empire are orcs.

Players are not able to play barbarian characters - by definition, they are not welcome on the playing field, however everyone has the opportunity to play a barbarian by volunteering to monster a battle or quest.

The Orcs

There are a large number of scattered orc tribes, but four tribes neighbouring the Empire are large enough that they are considered threats to the Empire.

- The Jotun are warlike but honourable, and occupy a large swathe of land to the west of Wintermark and The Marches.
- The Thule are dominated by their magicians, and engage in merciless asset-stripping of any lands they invade. They are found across the mountains to the north of Varushka in an area called Otkodov.
- The Druj are a comparatively small tribe that uses fear to exert influence over a number of smaller tribes. They are found in the swamps and forests to the east of Dawn and Highguard and known for their treachery and their love of terror-tactics.
- The Grendel primarily occupy a land-mass to the south of the Bay of Catazar, and are kept at bay by the activities of the Freeborn corsairs. They are also found in numbers on the Broken Coast to the south of Urizen.

Smaller orc tribes are scattered across the Empire as bandits, or live outside its borders in numbers. The orcs of the hills between the Brass Coast and their foreign neighbours (Faraden and The Iron Confederacy) are a case in point.

The orc barbarians are not a monolithic threat - the tribes may form temporary alliances, but they sometimes fight each other with as much ferocity as they show to the Empire.

Barbed Spear

Description

The first Barbed Spears were crafted and wielded in combat by the Navarr - they are especially effective against vallornspawn husks - but they are not the only people to make use of these weapons. In the League the weapon is sometimes called a Biting Glaive, and valued for its ability to inspire terror in opponents.

In some quarters these weapons are also known as Teeth of Vengeance, because they are often used to ensure the death of an opponent who has harmed the wielder or one of her companions. This specific usage of the Barbed Spear has caused concern in the Synod because it can help to encourage unvirtuous behaviour.

While it is common for a Barbed Spear to bear the rune Rhyy, they are often also marked with the rune Irremais.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of a polearm. You must be wielding this weapon to use its magical properties.
- Requirement: You must have the weapon master skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: You may spend a hero point to call VENOM with this polearm.
- Materials: Crafting a Barbed Spear requires thirteen measures of beggar's lye, three ingots of green iron, and three ingots of orichalcum. It takes one month to make one of these items.

Iuceph ducked, without slowing, and the two-handed battleaxe swept harmlessly over his head. He struck out to the left, and turned the movement into a tight spin, sweeping to the right and then rolling forward. He came to his feet, his heart pounding, his breath short, every muscle protesting. Both his opponents were still standing. He felt as if he was on fire.

He leapt forward, striking out again, catching another of the bandits across the shoulder, then twisted away before the woman could close the distance. He jumped and rolled again, swerving his body away from the thrust of the last brigand's clumsy strike, slicing his weapon across his side.

He felt dizzy for a moment. He wiped his hand across his forehead, and it came away with a sticky mixture of sweat, blood and yellow paint. He frowned. One of the bandits must have marked him at some point in his charge. He didn't remember it. The adrenaline began to sour, and he became aware of the familiar fizzing ache of the venom in his body. He looked over his shoulder to check what he already knew; that the dance was done.

The reavers lay where they had fallen, still, breathless. The brigands had tried to flee; they knew as soon as his glaive bit them that there would be no mercy for them today. They lay still now, each marked a second time by one of Graciana's arrows. These men and women, maddened by privation or greed, had learnt a hard and final lesson here today.

Now that the fight was done, the village healer came hurrying over with a flask of apricot brandy, swirling it vigorously to mix the sanguine hibiscus with the sweet liquor. The kohan accepted it with a nod and a strained smile, and allowed the doctor to tend his wounds and quiet the tempest in his blood.

Bards

Bards

- Provide music and entertainment at events appropriate to the nation.
- Encourage PCs to perform and entertain each other.
- Encourage national identity through music, storytelling and dance.
- Help to immortalize characters who have heroic deaths.

Each member of our bard team plays a single role throughout the event as an active bard and performer in their nation. The primary responsibility is to produce music and entertainment in the evenings and to encourage and support PCs doing the same. The goal is to ensure that every camp has a festival feel with celebrations taking place through the event. They are also intended to encourage a strong sense of national identity in their nation, using their performances and roleplaying to encourage players to embody the brief. Their final responsibility is to collect stories of characters who have died in tragic or heroic circumstances and to try to preserve their tales so that all players are encouraged to live up to the heroic challenges the game presents. It is possible for a bard to play other roles some of the time if they wish.

Being a bard requires credible ability to perform and entertain. Story-telling, singing or instruments are all fine, but please don't ask to be a part of the bard team unless you have the out-of-character skills and confidence to play the role. You have total freedom to play your character as you please provided you bear in mind the out-of-character responsibilities of the role, so a bard is a great role for anyone who wants to get stuck into the game but also wants to be involved with performance and entertainment at the event.

Current Nation Bards:

Mark Chilvers is organizing and recruiting the bards for Empire. We are still looking for bards for the Brass Coast, Dawn and Highguard.
