Barien

Eternal of Summer

Sobriquets

Barien is called the Iron Duke.

He is sometimes called the Seneschal of the Road, the Lord of the Crossroads, Knight of the Long Road, the Host of Hosts or the Traveller. He is the Master of Challenges, the Keeper of the Revels and the Reeve of the Summer Lands. A common name among the Winterfolk, the Jotun and the people of the Commonwealth is Barien Dragonforge, referring to his hidden forge rather than his role as master of challenges - he accepts this title with mild good humour. The Sumaah and Asaveans alike both call him Iron-Staff.

It is unwise to call him the Lame, Half-hand or Maimed Lord to his face.

Appearance

The Iron Duke appears as a man of average height and build. His ears are pointed and his skin is covered with coiling silver and grey marks. The Duke is lame - he favours his right leg, and sometimes leans on his iron-bound staff for support. He makes no secret of the fact that his lameness is a "natural" condition, rather than the result of any injury.

In contrast to many of the other Summer eternal, he dresses conservatively; favours dark, subdued colours; and eschews jewelry save for a circlet of polished weltsilver that surmounts his brow. When dealing with the Empire his attire is often influenced by the fashions of Dawn or the Marches, but from time to time he favours clothing more appropriate to a Wintermark runesmith.

The Knight of the Crossroads is an artisan, and at any given moment is likely to have several wondrous items about his person which he may call upon if he feels the need to defend himself - and lend or gift to someone he considers worthy. On the rare occasions he has chosen to fight, he wields his iron staff with devastating skill.

When Barien is encountered as part of group, he may be accompanied by members of his own household, or by those seeking his favour. The former tend to be skilled individuals who serve as seneschals, heralds, messengers and artisans. The latter are eternal of Summer who are paying a debt to Barien, or seeking his favour. They are often knights or entertainers, and may be heralds in their own right in service to other eternal.

The most common figure accompanying Barien is his Castellan, an eternal whose power is comparable to that of the Iron Duke and who is his most trusted lieutenant.

Concerns

Barien exemplifies meeting, setting and overcoming challenges. He regularly sets challenges for those who seek to prove their worth, but also ensures that great successes - or even brave failures - are recognized and celebrated. He favours not only heroes and champions, but also the troubadours, scops and storytellers who celebrate their deeds.

He is scrupulously neutral in the rivalries and alliances of the Summer Realm. His role means he regularly oversees tournaments and presents challenges to the other eternal. He is a regular guest at the courts of Eleonaris and Cathan Canae in particular. He has no realm of his own, but his household travels freely from place to place, and his court is based in a great pavilion camp or outdoors under the open sky. It is not unknown for his heralds to pitch their tents in strong Summer regio from time to time, offering hospitality to travelers and engaging them in contests of strength, wit and will. A common task set by Barien to those who seek his favour is to set their tent up at a crossroads and challenge all travelers to appropriate contests of arms or wit.

In personality Barien is much more restrained than many of the other eternal of Summer. He is absolutely confident in himself, his abilities and the abilities of his court. He is polite - friendly even - to those who treat him and his people with respect, but those who presume too much or who assume too great a level of familiarity find him cold and condescending. Anyone who tries his patience will be given one opportunity to apologise and if they do not they will be ejected from his presence.

He admires self confidence, while disdaining overconfidence and arrogance. People who actively seek out ways to test themselves and hone their abilities find it easier to attract his favour. He enjoys helping others solve their problems almost as much as he loves seeing an underdog overcome the obstacles life has placed in their way. Woe betide the individual who asks Barien for help they do not need, however. He is much more likely to offer advice or suggest allies the petitioner might seek out than he is to involve himself directly. Despite this there are several stories of individuals who asked Barien for advice, triumphed over their challenges, and then received some minor gift of Barien's favour in recognition of their accomplishments.

Barien does not favour any particular form of challenge - strength of arms, cunning, wits and subtlety are all equally important to him. He appears to prefer challenges that pit people against each other if only because it means every challenge will produce a victor, but he celebrates victory over nature or the self with almost as much enthusiasm. The mountaineer who conquers a mountain nobody else has ever scaled receives just as warm a welcome from the Master of Revels as the warrior who saves a village from ogres.

The Master of Revels takes hospitality extremely seriously. Anyone who eats or drinks under his roof and treats him with the cordial respect he is due is treated as part of his household, and he expects the same in return for his heralds and agents. He may ask an unwelcome guest to leave, but when he does so the guest will be assured of safety until they reach the mortal world again - but they should be very cautious about returning to his court.

He has no patience for those who demand what is not due to them - those who expect respect without earning it, or who express feelings of entitlement. Those who take their position, possessions or friends for granted or who assume they are 'owed a living' by the universe irritate him, and he has little time for them. The complacent and the content also annoy him, but he is more likely to try and challenge their complacency or contentment than to eject them from his court.

He absolutely despises both cheats and those who claim deeds or glory they have not earned. On the rare occasions such individuals have been exposed before him, he has lain terrible curses on them that have robbed them of their strength and will, and occasionally seen them waste away and die.

The Iron Duke is known to look on the Empire with approval as a place where merit often determines success; where personal glory is recognised and celebrated; and where commitment to ideals and goals is encouraged. While he predictably favours people of Dawn, he is also known to appreciate the Wintermark willingness to test themselves and the stubbornness of the Marchers. He is also said to have a soft spot for the Imperial orcs and is believed to greatly admire their commitment to their plan.

He is also known to approve of the Jotun orcs, however, and this has occasionally resulted in short periods where he has been the subject to the enmity of the Imperial Conclave.

In Wintermark he is strongly associated with Jotra, rune of challenges and Tykonus, rune of victory.

Boons

The most common boon offered by the Iron Duke is a challenge - an opportunity to face dangerous odds and either triumph or fail. The ritual Challenge the Iron Duke is specifically designed to allow mortal magicians to find those worthy of the Duke's time. He has been known to offer covens who favour this ritual boons that make the ritual easier to perform, or that allow the coven to help arrange the challenge more easily.

Barien is an artisan, and he makes many of the rewards he offers to victorious challengers himself. He also collects items of worth - and in this regard his definition of 'worth' is very similar to that of the Imperial Orcs. Specifically, he likes to acquire items associated with heroes and champions which he then uses as the basis for the magical items he crafts to reward the victorious. When questioned about it, he explains that his purpose is two-fold. First, he honours the champion who bore the worthy item; second, he finds it easier to make a potent artifact from a worthy relic. Magical items crafted by Barien often encourage personal pride, strength of will and the drive to seek out and overcome obstacles in their bearers.

The Master of Revels knows how to prepare a magical brew that restores bodily strength and integrity, removing supernatural afflictions such as the Curse of Gangrenous Flesh or the Curse of Decrepitude and similar effects. Gaining a flask of this strong elixir always requires someone to complete a difficult quest on Barien's behalf.

He has some ability to help smooth the path of those seeking a personal challenge. He might identify someone who knows the location of an object a questor seeks, or suggest ways to overcome a certain problem presented by a difficult quest. This aid never removes the danger from a challenge or quest; instead it helps make the quest or challenge attemptable. For example, when the Knight-errant Trisant sought aid in defeating the terrible Azerdack it was Barien who told him about the Kallavesi mystic who could prepare a defensive elixir to let them penetrate the fetid glen where it dwelt - although this meant Trisant and his companions had to face three challenges from a Jotun warlord in order to secure the rare flowers that formed the basis of the elixir.

While he is largely disinterested in trade, he is said to value dragonbone and ilium, and favours those who offer him gifts of these materials - although any suggestion that these gifts are bribes or payment is likely to annoy him.

It's a tired metaphor, but those who face challenges are forged in a way that those who live an easy life are not. I don't think I need to belabour my point any further?

Castellan

This creature is a woman with two swords and mithril armour who serves as Barien's champion, body-guard and primary agent. She never uses any other name than Castellan, and is his trusted lieutenant. She bears the same silvery designs on her skin as her lord. She is an extremely practical creature, who speaks in terse sentences, and unlike Barien she is much less tolerant of fools and time-wasters.

Except when she is serving as Barien's agent in the mortal world, she is rarely encountered apart from Barien but on the very rare occasions that she is alone she is generally pursuing her personal interest in the challenges that face those who fancy themselves in love. Occasionally, she intentionally places obstacles in their way to test the strength of their commitment to each other.

She is described in the writings of Lydia de Courland as "one of the least romantic patrons of star-crossed lovers one could hope to meet; her advice is direct, her support uncompromising and her patience for fools almost entirely non-existent."

Castellan claims to be an eternal of equal power to Barien although some magicians believe that this cannot be true (due to her ability to enter the mortal world rather), and she might simply be an extremely powerful herald. Others point out that mortal classifications of the inhabitants of the Realms become a little unreliable when applied to creatures such as Castellan, Reed, or the Voivode of Chains.

Barked Command of the Iron Serjant

Rules

Autumn Magnitude 14

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets up to three characters from the same banner. Each character must be present throughout. A character with the weapon master skill must also be present throughout (although they are not enchanted by the ritual).

This spell is an enchantment. A target may only be under one enchantment effect at a time.

Effects

This ritual targets up to three characters from the same banner. It requires the participation of a character who is part of that banner who has the weapon master skill. The target characters gain the ability to fight with one weapon type chosen from the list: one-handed spear, two-handed weapon, polearm or pike, chosen by the character who has the weapon master skill. Each target receives the ability to use the same weapon.

As long as they are enchanted, the targets experience a roleplaying effect; they feel a desire to stick together, fighting alongside each other and with the character who 'trained' them in their new combat skill.

The effect lasts until the start of the next Profound Decisions Empire event.

Additional Targets

This ritual can affect additional characters from the same banner. Each additional character increases the magnitude by 4. Additional characters must be present throughout.

Description

While this enchantment does not precisely turn a group of raw recruits into an elite fighting force, it is considered valuable for its ability to grant soldiers the ability to quickly master a weapon favoured by their military unit so they can fight alongside them (or in some cases, specifically to gain the benefits of being bound to a magical standard such as Glory's Call or the Yeoman's Flag). It is especially favoured by Imperial orcs whose legions prefer to fight with a recognisable combination of weapons and armour, and in The Marches for allowing everyone the opportunity to take their place in a bill-block or pike-wall.

Some ritualists employ the effect of Barked Command of the Iron Serjant on themselves, forming a temporary banner with a skilled combatant and working the performance around their instructions. In Urizen where this ritual is often called Lesson of Shared Excellence the transfer of skills tends to be accompanied with more careful attention to stance and achieving the right feeling of centred discipline than on barking instructions at magicians as if they were green recruits on a parade ground.

Common Elements

The focus of this ritual is the character who acts in the role of the iron serjant. That person may be one of the ritualists, but is more commonly someone selected for both their martial ability and their capacity to convey their expertise to others. In The Marches or a League Free Company this is as often as not a boisterous drill sergeant or similar character, who runs the targets of the ritual through the use and care of the weapon while correcting their mistakes. The ritualists sometimes join this drill or mark the targets and their weapons with runes or tokens. At the climax, it is common for the targets and the iron serjant to share a drink or a toast to their eventual victory.

Oaths, toasts and rousing speeches are also common, as are recitations of songs favoured by soldiers while the weapon drill takes place. The ritual often focuses less on rousing the fighting spirit of the targets, and more on encouraging them to fight together and obey orders; invocation of Paragons and Exemplars of Loyalty are especially common, as is the use of the rune Lann.

"Alright, you ill-born swine, show me your drill," the sergeant shouted at the few warriors chosen from out of the household's ranks. Quickly they fell to work, standing shoulder to shoulder and lowering their pikes. They stepped, they thrust, they defended, they stepped again.

Only their step was out. And their thrust was off. It was so bad, one of them almost dropped his pike. When it came to defending, he watched four of them die to an enemy inside their reach. It was awful.

"By Vigilance," he swore under his breath. He hoped they reaped better than they fought. As he watched, several of them lost and regained their footing hurriedly, and stepped without a thrust to catch up with their fellows. He turned to the Steward of the Household, who was busy trying to maintain some dignity beneath her obvious disappointment. "Who trained this lot?"

"That would be Blind Harry," she said. The old soldier had, perhaps, not been up to his former standard in the months before he'd died of old age. And his eyesight couldn't have helped.

One of them fumbled his pike, and tripped as he tried to force its tip out of the ground.

"By all that's..." Sergeant Dick gritted his teeth, "You're not sending this lot anywhere without an Autumn cabal. I'd say Summer, but I ain't trading competence for common sense. You need Autumn. Lots of it. I'll be their iron serjant, or they'll just get 'emselves murdered. Just tell me, please, by Wisdom, tell me you've got friends in Autumn." White-faced, the Steward nodded. "Course you do," the sergeant muttered, "Bloody townies, honestly, I tell you..."

Basic Skills

Hole Punching.

Why:

Holes are wonderful things. Rivets need them, lacing needs them, they can make sewing easier and yet whilst being so useful, they can also be a repetitive pain.

When:

Generally it's worth marking where your holes are needed just prior, or at the same time are marking on any design (especially if tooling VegTan leather), but it can be advisable to leave off actually punching them until the leather has been dyed and finished. Whilst damp leather can be slightly easier to cut (and therefore punch through) if you apply dye to pre-punched leather it will obviously soak through the holes and bleed onto the reverse (grain) side. This is not necessarily an issue and is not overly wasteful, however unless the underside is then also sealed the colour can be prone to transferring to items being worn underneath. When punching holes for rivets, snaps and eyelets it is best for them to be as snug a fit as possible. Line the post of the rivet etc up alongside the stem of your punch to assess the fit. Be aware when using thinner leathers and suede there can be a small amount of stretch to it, so it is best err on the side of caution; you can always punch again, larger, if needed, but you can't put bits back to make it smaller.

Where:

Holes can be punched pretty much anywhere you can get a punch to, which is why drive punches are much more versatile than a rotary punch; which can only reach a small way in from the edge.

How:

Unless you're using a rotary punch, always place something underneath the leather you are punching through. Not just to protect your work surface, but also to prolong the life of the punch; one strike against a stone block and that's the end of your drive punch. Card isn't really suitable for this, though a very thick piece of scrap leather (or a stack of thinner pieces) will work as a minimum; cutting mats for knives are generally too thin as you run the risk of driving the punch right through it with a solid mallet strike. The best to use is a substantial piece of tough rubber or nylon; a cheap alternative to those sold specifically for this purpose is a good quality nylon, kitchen chopping board. Simply rest the punch over the mark, hold the punch perpendicular to the leather and strike with a mallet. The amount of force required is as variable as leather itself, from a tap to a solid whack. Not just thickness but the type of leather and whereabouts on the hide it is from all play a part in determining its toughness. Practice will enable you to judge, but it can be better to err on the side of caution; you can always hit it again, but once you driven your punch all the way through in one hit and blunted the cutting edge, it's too late.

With a rotary punch the process is almost the same. Simply line up the punch with the mark and apply pressure. Sometimes with rotary punches, especially on thick leather, they can leave a small amount of uncut fibres on the very outside of the hole, meaning the waste section won't easily come out. A slight rotational twist to either side whilst pressure is applied can give a clean cut.

- 5.10 Blocking.
- 5.11 Edge Dye.

Additional Tip:

Wherever possible you should punch holes from the facing side of the leather downwards, not from the grain side upwards. As each hole is punched the waste section of leather is forced upwards, through the hollow stem of the punch, and ejected out of the side (or top on a rotary punch). By punching from the facing side down a slight curve is formed on the smooth leather, making it's passage through the tool's stem fairly straightforward. This tends not to happen for the grain side and so the waste section is prone to resisting and merely compresses when the next hole is punched; jamming the tool and preventing it cutting properly. If this does happen it can be cleared with very careful application of a bradawl, stylus or similar long, thin, strong piece of metal. However, be warned, if it slips you can risk braking the cutting edge of the punch, rendering it useless, and possibly injure yourself too.

Cutting.

What:

Tools used in this section:

Why:

Well obviously you need to cut and trim a finished piece, but also, unless you are creating something the size of half a cow, it is far easier to remove a rough section from a hide to work on.

When:

Leather can be expensive so, much like with fabric, the best way to get the most out of your material is efficient layout of the pattern. Lay out a template on the reverse (grain) side of the leather, mark it out with a ballpoint pen and use this as your cutting guide prior to marking any design or pattern onto the facing side.

Where:

Large hides can be cut on the floor if you don't have a table large enough. Make sure to protect the surface underneath, ideally with a specialised cutting mat, though thick card or rubber can serve equally well. This is not just to protect your carpet or table, but also to prolong the usefulness of your knife blade.

How:

Light leathers can be relatively easily cut by simply using a decent pair of scissors. However care should be taken when cutting smooth surfaced leathers to position the scissors to the outside of item (as illustrated). This will give a clean cut edge rather than one compressed by the scissor blade .

There are shears that are specifically designed to be capable of cutting the heavier weights of leather most often used for LRP projects.

Alternatively a knife can create a cleaner and more versatile cut and if being used to cut a straight line always use a metal ruler; a blade is far less likely to skip across a metal ruler than a plastic one, which can also easily become notched and scored. The toughness of the leather being used, along with the pressure that needs to be maintained to ensure a smooth cut will dictate which kind of knife would be suitable. Scalpels, whilst extremely sharp, are not particularly strong and so would not be recommended for anything other than the lightest of leather. A better alternative would be something similar to an Xacto craft knife with a substantial handle. These will better take the pressure whilst also being fine bladed enough for more intricate shapes. Depending on the thickness of the leather repeated cuts may be needed, but it is generally better to cut slowly, smoothly and more than once than putting excessive pressure on a knife; this will more often than not, result in a jerky, rough cut and be more likely to slip, break or otherwise be potentially dangerous.

Specific leatherworking knives can easily cut through the toughest of leather, however they are not suited to intricate shapes and are best used to remove a section from a large hide to make it easier to work on. Draw-gauge knives, or strap-cutters, are a very quick and easy way to make straps, belts and anything that requires a parallel cut. Simply use a knife/metal ruler to provide the initial straight edge then measure in the desired width of the strap. Again use the knife and ruler to make a starting cut of about 1"-2"; this will enable the leather to be pulled through the strap-cutter slightly to more easily start it off. (On heavier leathers this initial cut is not always required, provided the cutter's blade is sharp the leather will be cut rather than resist and buckle when pushing it through to start.) Set the strap-cutter to the required width and depth as illustrated, then insert the leather into the initial cut and then pull through to complete the cut.

Release the bolt at the end of the handle, this will allow the cutting gauge to slid through until the desired width is reached. If the leather is excessively thick or thin you can adjust the depth with the small bolt at the end of the cutting gauge and by carefully squeezing closed, or prying open, the blade end with a pair of pliers; keeing it set at about 4mm is generally OK for more leathers. Set the width by matching the measure with the edge of the handle, then simply re-tighten the main bolt.

Ensuring the straight edge is kept firmly butted against the handle of the cutter can have a bit of a knack to it, some people prefer to draw the cutter across the leather whilst holding that firmly, others find it easier to hold the cutter steady whilst pulling or pushing the leather through. As with most things, practice until you find a way that suits you best.

Skiving.

Skiving, rather than just not doing any work, is actually a specialised horizontal cut used to thin leather. It can be done by machine or by hand with a wide range of specialised knives. Ideally it should only be done to the reverse (grain) side of the leather, as the surface (skin) side contain the most densely packed and strongest fibres thereby retaining the most strength possible on a thinned section.

Generally it is most often done along edges where joins are formed, at the end of straps to allow for better fitting of buckles or where handles are to be sewn into place and if done carefully, can even thin a very small area of leather around a punched hole to allow for a depressed, hidden rivet. The latter can also be used to allow a secure set for a snap fastening on leather that would otherwise be slightly too thick for the length of the snap's post. For skiving an edge along which a stitched or riveted join will be done it is probably most easily achieved with a straight skiving knife or a 'Super Skiver' (a handy beginner's tool sold by Tandy). With a Super Skiver, simply place the leather on a flat work surface and hold firmly in place. Hold the Super Skiver towards one end of the leather, protruding over the edge and resting at a slight angle as illustrated.

Applying enough pressure for the blade to bite into the leather carefully draw the tool towards you, trimming the edge as you go. The depth of the cut (and therefore the thickness of the leather remaining) is dictated both by the amount of downwards pressure exerted and by the angle at which you hold the tool itself; usually between 30 and 45 degrees.

To use a plain skiving knife the action is pretty much the same as the Super Skiver, except you are pushing the blade away from you rather than drawing towards you.

Also there is no guard or other guide on how deep you cut; it is purely down to your own control over the blade itself and holding your leather firmly. One slip and it could easily be 'that's all she wrote' for your work, and possibly your fingers!

Probably one of the most versatile knives that can be used for skiving is a 'Head Knife', also known as a 'Round Knife'. Skiving, cutting, trimming, all can be done using a head knife, however it is very much an acquired skill that is almost totally unlike using any other kind of blade. Once learnt though, you may wonder why you bothered with so many other knives...

... and yes, even after 20 years I'm still learning different ways of using it!

Held in a similar fashion to a regular skiving knife, a head knife is also pushed away from you rather than drawn towards. However, due to the curve in the blade the angle at which it must be held is far less otherwise you run a far higher chance of simply creating a channel that is much thinner along one area than the other. Also, being a larger blade, it requires more effort to control so you don't either gouge deeper as you apply pressure or alternatively, simply slip upwards and skip across the leather's surface; possibly only stopping in your fingers!

For narrow strips or around rivet holes a 'French Skiver' is possibly best and easiest tool to use. It is very similar to an edge beveller, only with a ¼" (6mm) wide blade. Again, this is one that is pushed away from you rather than being pulled towards. Seat the edge of the blade over the cut edge of the leather, apply pressure to start the cut and then push carefully away from you whilst holding the leather firmly with the other hand as illustrated. The depth of the cut is controlled not only by the angle at which you hold the tool (usually about 20-40 degrees) but also by the amount of pressure applied. Take care when making the first pass along the very edge of the leather as it is easy for the blade to dig deeper due to there being no resistance against the tool's outer edge.

Once you reach the end of the section to be skived, place the blade back at the start, yet this time set it approx half the blade's width in from the cut edge and proceed as before. This time the leather on the outside edge of the tool will act as a guide to help prevent you cutting too deeply. Continue in this fashion until you have skived the desired width and depth. If you are doing this at the end of a narrow strap (e.g. to allow a better seat for a buckle) then you may find that it will only take three passes with the tool to achieve the full width of the strap. In which case it can sometimes be easier to effectively make two 'first passes', one along either cut edge and then make the third down the middle.

To make a depression for a hidden rivet, or to allow a shorter one to be used, first punch the hole. Position the French Skiver exactly as before only instead of seating the edge of the blade over the cut edge of the leather, seat it just inside the rivet hole. As you apply pressure to make the cut carefully pivot the tool around this central point, skiving as you go.

Common problems:

With the Super Skiver the blade itself is held in the tool at a slight curve. Be aware of this when using it to skive a broad section as it will obviously cut deeper at the centre than at the edges.

Additional Tips:

Little and often is the key here. You can always keep going over the leather, removing thin strips each time; you can't really stick it back on once you've slipped and taken a chunk out of your precious work!

Edge Finishing.

What:

Tools used in this section:

Why:

Unless they are being over-laced or otherwise concealed, bevelling and burnishing the edges of a piece can add so much to the finished look and is relatively simple to achieve. It also serves a purpose in enabling straps to more easily pass through loops and buckles without unnecessarily wearing or roughing up the edges. Finally a burnished edge, even without any form of edge dye, is more resistant to moisture entering, opening up the fibres and thereby weakening the leather.

When:

The following techniques of edge bevelling and burnishing are generally only used on VegTan leather and are performed before any dyeing or sealing. Neither is appropriate for suede though bevelling can be undertaken, with care, on bridle leather or the facing side of full grain or oiled leathers.

Where:

Bevelling effectively trims off the sharp corner along the edge of a knife cut and is most commonly done to both the facing and reverse edges. By burnishing it the edges are further smoothed and rounded off.

How:

Bevelling.

Specific edge bevelling tools come in a variety of sizes, though annoyingly they are generally numbered rather than simply referring to the width of the blade, so here is a rough guide to make your shopping a little easier:

No 1 = 1mm No 2 = 1.5mm No 3 = 2mm No 4 = 2.5mm No 5 = 3mm

The actual depth of the cut can also be determined by how acute an angle you hold the tool against the leather, but the variation is minimal and not horrendously noticeable if you are also going to be burnishing the edge. The action is simple enough, however it can take some practice when dealing with curves and tight corners. Hold the tool so the corner of the cut leather edge sits snugly against the blade whilst firmly holding the leather in place with your other hand. You then simply push the tool away from you, running along the cut edge, stripping off the corner as you go.

As you come to the end of a stroke you can finish by pushing the blade forwards and away from the leather, lifting it and removing the trimmed strip. Alternatively you can stop dead, without completely removing the trim, readjust your grip on the leather and then continue the next stroke exactly where you left off. It may be appropriate to only bevel the facing edge of a piece, however, on belts or substantial pieces like armour it is useful to also bevel the reverse side. Like much of leatherworking, there is no real 'right' or 'wrong' way to do it, only the way you are most comfortable with which achieves the desired results.

Burnishing.

To burnish the edge it first needs to be moistened. This can be done simply with water, however best results are achieved with a product called Gum Tragacanth; this helps the fibres adhere together and can be diluted with water by up to 50%. Draw either a damp sponge or wool dauber gently across the very edge of the leather. Be careful not to soak it or the edge will become too soft. If this does occur just leave the item to dry until it is just damp. Practice will enable you to gauge this.

Large items can be held on a steady surface with the part to be worked slightly protruding over the edge. Smaller items can simply be held in one hand and straps or belts can often be propped perpendicular to a work surface. If using a variable burnisher ensure the leather sits easily within the 'U' section; too tight a fit and track marks will be left on either side of the leather as it is forced through. Too loose is much less of an issue as with care and gentle angling of the burnisher a reasonable finish can still be achieved.

With the leather held steady, firmly and repeatedly rub the burnisher along the edge until a smooth finish has been achieved. It's that simple.

Additional Tips.

On fine, thin leather it can be difficult to apply enough pressure without the leather buckling. However, if it is placed flat on a work surface a straight burnisher can be angled and rubbed across the uppermost corner as illustrated.

For particularly thick leather that does not fit within the 'U' section a similar technique to that described above can be used. Instead of simply laying the leather flat on the work surface, position it near to the edge. Rub the burnisher firmly along the edge, gradually shifting the angle so as to work across the corner and along the bevelled and cut faces as illustrated. Once this has been done on the facing side, simply turn the piece over and repeat on the reverse side.

Setting.

What:

Tools used in this section.

Why:

There are a large number of items used in leatherworking that require setting in some form or another, from the structurally essential rivets to decorative gems or other adornments. The basic skill is the same, unsurprisingly, hammering, but both the setting tools and anvils differ, as does the amount of power required.

When:

Generally setting items is one of the final stages in completing a piece either by attaching components together, adding buckles, straps etc or for adding purely decorative pieces. Whilst rivets and eyelets can be dyed over doing so can impair both their finish and that of the dye. Like re-spraying a car, the best results are often achieved by completing each individual component prior to assembly.

Where:

Wherever possible, set rivets on a solid metal surface such as an anvil. Mini 2lb ones are ideal for use on top of a workbench or table but even a small metal plate placed on a brick can do. Unless the anvil is secured to the surface on which it is resting, it can be advisable to place some form of cushioning between the anvil (or brick) and the workbench/table; mostly to avoid the vibrations causing things to bounce or slip.

How:

Rivets.

Riveting is possibly the quickest and simplest method of fastening leather together but not always the most appropriate depending on the look you are trying to achieve. Ensure the holes used are a snug fit and not too loose. This is especially important with lightweight leather and suede; there will be a certain amount of stretch that can make a rivet more likely to pull through under pressure if the hole is already slightly too large. Use the correct length of rivet for the job in hand. This can be of slightly less importance when using 'Rapid' rivets, however solid and tubular ones require a certain amount of excess to actually form the 'set'.

Solid.

Solid rivets are generally the best choice if you are looking to secure leather to a substantial piece of metal and there is likely to be much rotational movement and/or load bearing, e.g. a strap to a metal greave or breastplate. Any movement of a raw metal edge against the rivet could easily wear through lighter 'Rapid' rivets. Insert the rivet through the pieces to be joined so that the flat head is on the facing side and place the washer on the tapered end. Use the hollow part of the setter to drive the washer down to be snugly seated against the surface.

Using a pair of cutters trim the excess to <2mm. It should not be trimmed to be flush to the washer. Using the concave part of the setter hammer the excess flat whilst using a rotational motion with the setter itself. This will form the excess into a mushroom shape and secure it over the washer.

This is one of the few times when using a metal hammer can be better as it gives a sharper blow; additionally the required setter is a fairly robust tool and more capable of taking the abuse than others.

Tubular.

These are relatively strong rivets and often used in many automatic riveting machines. They are suitable for any connection where substantial load bearing is required, e.g. for securing a heavy section of leather to be hung from a belt or when using a single rivet to secure a strap or buckle. They are not particularly suited to any location which is going to be subject to continued rotational movement (such as on articulated items) unless an additional washer is used. This is simply because the peened rivet curls back with potentially sharp edges that will chew away at the reverse side of the leather joint. To gauge the correct size of rivet to use the post should ideally be protruding between 2-3mm. Insert the rivet through the pieces to be joined so that the flat head is on the facing side. Seat the setter snugly into the hollow, open end of the rivet.

Ensuring the setter is held perpendicular to the leather's surface/anvil strike it firmly with a mallet until the rivet splits and is forced firmly back against the leather.

'Rapid' Rivets.

These are possibly the most readily available rivets in a number of finishes, sizes and can be found in both single and double cap varieties. This gives them incredible versatility for use within LRP, from securing decorative items to kit, straps and buckles to joining separate lames of articulated armour. Whilst they are less substantial than tubular rivets they are certainly up to the task for the majority of uses in LRP, especially when a number are used in close proximity, e.g. a triangle of three used to secure straps from breastplates, greaves etc. To gauge the correct size rivet to use the post should ideally be protruding between 1-2mm. Insert the rivet through the pieces to be joined so that the base of the rivet is on the reverse/hidden side of the item and seat the cap onto the protruding end of the rivet. Hold the setter perpendicular to the leather/anvil and strike firmly with a mallet.

The amount of force required to completely set the rivet can be achieved with a few small taps, a gentle tap then hit or a single whack. It's personal preference and through practice you will get a feel for it and how you are most comfortable doing it. On an open ended (rather than double capped) rivet you can see through to where the body of the rivet has compressed and flattened to secure the cap.

Additional Tips:

Likewise with these particular rivets they can be set using nothing more than a metal hammer and a hard surface like a brick or paving slab. Watch your fingers and it won't be the prettiest of finishes (you are highly likely to mark the leather) but it can be done if you don't have access to the correct tools.

Common Problems:

The main pitfall with these types of rivets is in using one that is too long. With insufficient support to keep the rivet upright it will compress at an angle, skewing the layers that are being secured. That said, whilst this may look unsightly and not be the most structurally strong connection, if it has been mashed together well enough it's unlikely to separate and so still can serve its purpose.

Snap Fasteners.

Readily available in a variety of finishes and colours these can provide a relatively simple fastening solution, especially where straps and buckles are either awkward or relatively unnecessary. The holes for these fasteners need not be as snug a fit as for rivets, however, it is wise to avoid making them overly large as this can result in the peened section of the post deforming the male or female cap and thereby giving an insecure set. Ideally the post of both the 'button' and base should protrude through the leather by about 1-2mm. On thicker leather careful skiving around the hole can enable these fastenings to be used.

Rest the outer 'button' in the concave anvil and locate outermost piece of leather over it, outside facing side down, then place the female cap over the protruding post. Seat the setter snugly into the hollow, open end of the post. Hold the setter perpendicular to the leather/anvil and strike gently to peen the post back against the cap. Rest the base on the flat surface of the anvil and locate the innermost piece of leather over it, inside facing down, then place the male cap over the protruding post. Proceed to set as above.

Additional Tips:

It is better to set these with a series of gentler strikes, occasionally lifting the setter to check the state of the peened post and cap rather than with just a couple of whacks. The posts should curl back neatly against the cap, but it is very easy for them to split to one side or for the hole in the cap to deform or even split; especially if the setter is not exactly perpendicular or if the mallet strikes at a slight angle.

Eyelets.

Readily available in a variety of finishes and sizes eyelets are basically reinforcement for holes. They help to stop shape deformation and wear and are most useful when the hole will come under some form of pressure, e.g. from lacing to hold a vambrace closed or sleeve on a jerkin. Choose a size appropriate to whatever is going to be threaded through it but also be aware that ideally they also need to be able to protrude around 2-3mm through the leather to be securely set. Ideally the hole used needs to be as snug a fit to the eyelet as possible, especially on the lighter weight leathers which may have some stretch in them. Mainly because the peened edge only folds back over a small distance and if it is too close to the hole's edge there is a great risk the eyelet will easily be pulled out. There are versions available with small washers that can alleviate this problem and are perhaps better used with finer leathers for better security. Insert the eyelet through the leather with the facing side outwards. Seat into the shaped anvil and if using a washer, place over the protruding eyelet stem.

Hold the setter perpendicular to the leather/anvil and strike firmly to peen the stem back against the leather or washer. The amount of force required can vary depending on the size of the eyelet and the amount protruding so it's best to use a few gentle strikes, checking as you go, until you get a feel for it.

Buckles.

The two main things to be aware of when setting buckles are ensuring enough allowance is provided for both the central bar of the buckle and the full width of the rivet. Too much and the buckle will be loose. It won't come off, it'll just be annoying, but it's better to err on the side of caution; too little and the leather will be too tight around the buckle-bar and there could be difficulty setting the rivet properly. As a rough guide, fold the leather loosely over, leaving enough of a gap that you would otherwise be able to fit the buckle bar in. Make a mark on either side of the fold a couple of mm in then flatten out the leather. These marks will form the endpoints for the prong's slot.

Whilst there are specialist hole punches readily available to make the central slot for the prong, it can be done with a regular hole punch and some careful work with a knife. Use the end points you have just marked to punch two holes the same diameter, or slightly larger, than the buckle's prong. Then carefully cut between them either using a small ruler or, if you're more willing to risk your fingers, it can be done freehand. It is probably better to make repeated, light cuts, than use too much pressure and risk slipping. An additional tip is to only cut away from the hole to the centre rather than all the way across from hole to hole. This way is less likely to cause an overcut as illustrated.

The two rivet holes can then be marked approx $\frac{3}{8}$ "- $\frac{5}{8}$ " (10-15mm) out from each end of the slot.

Additional Tips:

As a guide, for a simple pressed $\frac{3}{4}$ " buckle as illustrated, an average allowance of $1\frac{3}{4}$ " (45mm) between the rivet holes is appropriate when using 3mm leather. If you have more than a couple of the same size buckles to set then it can be useful to make a template of either card or leather to save measuring each one individually.

Generally a single rivet is sufficient to hold a buckle in place that is likely to not come under excessive strain. For example holding a pouch/ bag flap shut, or for vambraces and greaves where the load is distributed between a number of straps/buckles. However, for added strength, or for wider straps, additional rivets can be placed either in a line or alongside each other.

If the leather being used is excessively thick where the buckle is to be placed, then it can be skived down from the far end to just prior to the first rivet hole as illustrated. This will obviously weaken the leather slightly so be careful to only remove enough to allow for a comfortable fold over the buckle.

Dyeing.

What:

There is a vast range of dyes, stains, pigments and paints designed for use on leather, and an even wider range of products that aren't but can still be used. Feel free to experiment but always bear in mind the durability, flexibility and permanence of what you are using.

Why:

On natural VegTan leather used for tooling and carving you will probably want to colour it in some way, be it in a subtle or strong fashion. Even if you wish to keep the natural colour it is recommended you seal the leather to help protect against damage from water and light scuffs. Though you should be aware before choosing to leave a natural finish that VegTan leather will continue to effectively 'tan' itself when exposed to natural light and so will continue to darken in tone. This action can therefore cause shadows and highlights if something is placed on top of it (effectively blocking the light) for even a relatively short period of time; as little as an hour under a midday summer sun!

When:

As VegTan leather needs to be cased (sprayed, sponged or soaked with water) for tooling, any dyeing or staining needs to be done once all your work is completed. It is generally advisable to seal items in some way once you have finished working and dyeing VegTan leather. Not only does this help to preserve the surface from damaging watermarks, it can also help prevent any transference of dye both during wear and if the item does get wet (it's LRP, during a British summer, it's going to rain at some point). It is also advisable to dye and finish each component prior to any setting of snaps, rivets etc. Not only will you achieve a more even appearance and colour but each item will be more effectively sealed, as opposed to missing areas under straps, riveted joins etc.

Where:

Most dyes, stains and finishes are used across the facing surface of the leather; they are also suitable for use on the reverse (grain) side if it is likely to be exposed to view. However be aware that this side will be slightly more absorbent. There is also a specialist dye, Fiebing's Edge Dye, which is specifically formulated for, you guessed it, the cut edges of your leatherwork.

How:

Essential tip:

First thing, wear a pair of gloves unless you want to be trying to scour your fingers with acid and a wire brush for the next two days! Disposable latex ones are fine if you are using Antique or Highlighter, but can sometimes not be thick enough for other dyes, especially alcohol based ones; leaving you with stained fingers like you've been smoking sixty roll-ups a day for a decade. Reasonable household rubber washing up gloves work best. There are almost as many ways to dye and stain leather as there are dyes and stains; each will provide subtly differing results. Likewise, leather being a natural medium, the same dye can provide a different finish or tone across similar yet separate hides; frustratingly sometimes even across the same hide! It is therefore advisable, when making a matched set of anything, to use leather from the same hide as far as is possible. The method of application can be by brush, sponge, cloth, wool dauber or even a small piece of dense sheepskin. There are advantages and disadvantages to each and much of it comes down to personal preference. Brushes can leave streaks and brush marks, as can daubers. Sponges often deliver an excessive amount of dye, again, as can some daubers, whereas cloths can sometimes not deliver enough leaving a patchy finish. A piece of trimmed sheepskin can be the most consistent, however they can be tricky to obtain; too dense or coarse and streaks can be a problem, too soft and an inconsistent amount of dye will be delivered. There is a knack to their selection and trimming, however they are my preferred medium so unless otherwise stated consider the following advice given as if they were being used. Though the techniques themselves are pretty much the same across the board, I would advise practising on scrap leather to find whichever suits you best.

Common problems:

A streaky or patchy finish. This is most commonly caused by an uneven application of the dye across the surface overall. The bigger the area being dyed the harder it is to maintain an even coat. To combat this it is important to dye each piece in a single session. If a break is taken for long enough to allow the dye to dry it is much harder to blend it with the undyed section. Likewise, simply applying additional coats can sometimes simply exacerbate the problem; excessive layers will simply build on each other rather than even out the tone. This can particularly be a problem with Tandy's Eco-Flo 'All in One Stain & Finish' for as it contains a varnishing agent within the dye it will become tacky and streaky if a second coat is applied. With penetrative dyes the best approach is to keep the initial application as even as possible. The first contact will always deliver the most dye to the leather. The further the dye is spread beyond that point the less will be delivered to soak into the leather. However it can often still continue to 'colour' the surface of the leather and so patches can be missed until it dries; where more has penetrated it will dry a darker tone. For surface dyes this is less of an issue. However maintaining an even pressure over the entire application is what will help alleviate any streaking. Likewise with antiquing and staining, even pressure is most important, not just when applying the colour, but also when removing the excess.

Penetrative Dyes.

These are dyes that soak through the surface and into the grain of the leather. This can give a better depth of colour and generally be more resistant to scratches and scuffs revealing the natural colour of the leather below. One application is generally enough to provide a good even tone with alcohol or oil based dyes, though with lighter colours and some water based variants a second, more sparing coat, can be helpful. Many of these dyes within a single range (such as Fiebing's Leather Dye) can be mixed together to provide a wide range of individual colours and shades. The lighter ones can also provide a good base colour for further antiquing or highlighting. Gently apply using a small overlapping circular motion, working from one side to the other. When you feel it running dry, reload your 'swab' (be it a sponge/dauber/whatever) and continue where you left off. You shouldn't need to use much pressure to transfer the dye from the swab to the leather, if you do then it generally means that the swab is drying out and you need to reload. It is better to work little and often rather than over-soak. Once everything is completely dry, you should use a clean cloth to buff over the entire piece to remove any excess surface pigment. Some dyes will shed more than others; oil dyes tend to shed the least.

Surface Dyes.

Not surprisingly, surface dyes barely penetrate the leather to colour it or, in the case of acrylics (like Tandy's Cova Color), merely adhere to the surface and do not penetrate at all. This can make them more subject to revealing scratches and scuff marks, though this can actually be useful if that's the overall look you are trying to achieve. A very good example of a surface dye is Tandy's Eco-Flo 'All in One Stain & Finish'. Applied in a similar fashion to penetrative dyes however, it is recommended that a greater load is delivered in a single session. You should work it well across the surface of the leather with overlapping strokes, maintaining an even pressure to distribute it over a larger area. Once the full area is evenly covered and any cuts, tooling etc are filled, change to a clean cloth, or piece of soft sheepskin, and buff over the entire piece to remove any excess stain.

Acrylics are effectively paints rather than dyes and are used in exactly the same manner as if you were painting on to paper or canvas. Used neat they are generally opaque, though be aware that if you are using them over an already dyed surface some lighter colours (especially white) will pick up and transfer the dye below. They can be diluted with water to varying degrees, becoming more translucent. Some interesting effects can be gained this way by using them as a wash over other colours. It is advisable to build up thin layers, allowing each to fully dry in between, rather than rely on plastering it on. When applied too thick, particularly over large areas, acrylics can be prone to cracking and flaking; especially if the area in question is designed to be flexible (e.g. across the spine of a book).

Antiques & Highlighter.

Antique and Highlighter are both very similar products that achieve a very similar effect. The difference (apart from the colour range) is simply the viscosity of the product; Antique is thicker. That's pretty much it. Both can be used as a surface dye and applied directly onto VegTan leather, though being thinner, Highlighter will require more coats to provide any real depth of colour. However the durability of the finish is inferior to penetrative dyes, or even surface dyes such as those mentioned above. Significantly the lightfast quality of these is not particularly good and so will be subject to fading in strong light; worth bearing in mind when storing items, if something has been partially laid across an item you can be left with a distinct shadow with faded colour where exposed. The real benefit to these products is to build up in depressions and surface cuts thereby providing a variable contrast of tones within a piece overall. This makes them particularly suited for use on tooled work, or on pieces which you have specifically damaged the surface of (be it with a mallet, blade, rasp or simply jumped up and down on) to give an aged, battle-damaged look.

Applied in a similar fashion to surface dyes you should work it well across the surface of the leather with overlapping strokes, maintaining an even pressure to distribute it over a larger area. Once the full area is evenly covered and any cuts, tooling etc are filled, leave the item to dry. Important: Do not leave for longer than 10 minutes. Fill a bowl with clean, slightly warm water, wet a sponge or cloth and wring out until it is just damp. Now proceed to remove the excess dye using the damp sponge. Use a similar overlapping, circular action to the initial process of dyeing but only a light pressure is generally required. Keep going until either the sponge is dry, therefore leaving no further mark on the surface of the leather, or else saturated with excess dye; the latter being noticeable as you will be left with streaks of excess dye rather than it being removed. In this case, quickly rinse the sponge clean in the bowl, squeeze out as much water as possible and continue where you left off.

Common Problems:

When using Antique or Highlighter on a single large piece it can be difficult to maintain an even tone without any patching. This is simply because the longer any excess is left on the surface the harder it becomes to remove. Over a large area you will need to rinse clean your sponge or cloth a number of times, all the while the last bit you get to has had extra time to set. Apart from obviously working as smoothly yet as fast as possible, the only other way to help alleviate any patching is by using a large cloth rather than a sponge. Whilst the latter is quicker to rinse and squeeze out, with a cloth you don't need to do this and can simply shift it about to use a clean section.

Additional Tip:

To increase the durability of the finished colour you can apply a base colour with a penetrative dye and then use a complimentary or even contrasting antique or highlighter over the top. The results can be widely varied depending entirely on the combination of colours and strengths of dye used, so experimentation on scrap leather prior to final dyeing is advised.

Surface Finishing.

There are a wide variety of finishes available, some of which perform the same function so selection can simply be a case of personal preference. Products like Tandy's Super Shene and Satin Shene will give a reasonable level of water resistance (though not 'proofing') and have the added advantage of coming in both a high gloss and satin finish. Likewise Fiebing's Leather Sheen or Acrylic Resolene provide a similar glossy finish (though Resolene is more mellow) and can be applied in the same ways as the Tandy products. A brush or sponge are both viable methods of applying the above finishes. Brushes can be more useful over small or detailed pieces however are more likely to leave tracks or uneven coverage over a larger area. Sponges can allow easier, more even coverage over larger pieces but care needs to be taken over heavily tooled areas as they can often cause excessive foaming or bubbles. Gentle, overlapping, straight strokes (as opposed to the circular motion for dyeing) will give a reasonably smooth delivery. Wash clean any brushes or sponges immediately after use with water if you would like to be able to use them again.

Common Problems:

Brush marks and streaks can easily be caused by passing the brush or sponge over the finish whilst it is still tacky. Unfortunately there is little that can be done about this other than the obvious of not allowing it to happen in the first place. If it does however, a second coat applied with a little more pressure over the entire item, prior to the first completely drying, can sometimes help even out the coverage. Additionally some stains or surface dyes can be lifted somewhat by these finishes and leave slightly coloured smears. This is more likely to happen where excess dye has built up in deep cuts or heavily tooled areas. Extra care should be taken when dyeing items like this to ensure as much excess is removed as possible. Beyond that, very careful and gentle application of the finish with as little pressure as possible should help to avoid too much pick-up.

Additional Tips:

There are a number of finishes available, such as Fiebing's Leather Balm, Tan Kote and Carnauba Creme which are not water resistant. These may be used to seal your work and tend to result in a more mellow finish. They also tend to contain ingredients that help keep leather supple, so are particularly useful for more flexible items such as book covers. If a more waterproof finish is required then specialist proofers such as Nikwax can be used. However be warned that not all products work well together, so rather than potentially ruin your work it is best to check their suitability on some scrap which you have dyed the same way as your project. If this isn't possible then test on a small unobtrusive area of the item itself and give the proofer time to be fully absorbed and then re-test for colour fastness. Additionally some waterproofing products such as Mink Oil, or leather conditioners such as Neatsfoot Oil or Fiebing's Saddle Oil, whilst they will undoubtedly will protect your leatherwork, are not recommended for use on leather which has been water-hardened (cuir bouilli) or case moulded (cold water moulding). This is because the oils in these products are specifically used as they are deeply penetrative and serve to swell and separate the leather's fibres (which is why heavily oiled leather is so supple). However, this action is contrary to mechanism by which hardening and moulding works, which is (very basically) to swell the fibres and then contract them more tightly into a new position.

Blocking.

Blocking (sometimes termed 'resisting') is a very useful technique that can create beautifully subtle colour effects or help preserve more striking differences. The specific product for this is Tandy's Eco-Flo 'Block Out'. Applied neat with a brush and carefully painted over an area then allowed to dry completely. This will then resist any colour bleed when undertaking further highlighting or antiquing.

A similar effect can also be achieved by using Super or Satin Shene, though neither provide quite as an effective resistance as Block Out. You can apply multiple coats instead (usually 2 or 3) or use it to your advantage to create subtle shades of colour.

Wash clean any brushes immediate after use with water.

Edge Dye.

Fiebing's Edge Dye is formulated to provide a good seal on the vulnerable cut edge of your leather. Whilst you do not have to bevel and burnish the edge first, doing so with provide you with the best possible seal and help prevent excessive wear. Edge Dye is available in regular bottles, or a squeeze bottle with an integral sponge applicator. However, this applicator can become split and worn prior to using all the dye in the bottle. A wool dauber can be used, but it can prove to be wasteful and not be particularly neat when trying to keep the dye just to the leather's edge. Personally I've not found better than a small strip cut from a sponge, folded and gripped by a clothes-peg. As it gets worn, simply discard the sponge and replace as necessarily. To apply simply dip the sponge (or dauber etc) onto the surface of the dye and pick up a small amount onto the sponge. If needed, scrape any excess off against the top of the bottle, then gently draw it along the edge of the leather. Continue reloading and applying all the way round then leave to dry. If required apply a second coat to obtain an even colour. Edge Dye is only available in black and brown, which is generally suitable for most projects, indeed a black edge can provide a nice contrasting finish to a piece dyed a lighter colour overall. However, if you are intending to keep a natural VegTan finish, then there is an alternative: a plain beeswax block. Rub with a fairly firm pressure along the leather's edge to apply some wax to the leather and then rub vigorously over it with a burnisher. The friction will warm the wax and blend it into the leather providing a seal. This method can also be used if you wish to keep the dyed edge the same colour as the surface of the piece. It is worth bearing in mind though that it will not be quite as durable a seal as that provided by a specialist edge dye.

Casing

For leather to be tooled it ideally needs to first be cased, which is an old, technical and clever term for getting it wet. The reason it has an old, technical and clever term for it is because, unfortunately it's not just any old kind of 'wet'.

There are a number of ways of casing leather, some of which are a bit misleading. Firstly the idea of submerging leather and then sealing it in an airtight container or bag for 24 hours isn't really casing it; it's just soaking it! This is because, being airtight, none of the excess moisture can escape so you may as well have just dunked your leather in a bath and proceeded to tool it immediately; the results of which would be just as poor as the leather would be far too wet and soft to hold any definition.

In broad terms, to case leather it should be briefly submerged in luke warm water; the amount of time is entirely dependent on the density and thickness of the leather. Very fine leather will require just a quick pass through the water, whereas thicker, heavier weight leather should be left submerged until the rate of bubbles rising from the flesh side begins to slow. It should then be allowed to breathe, either simply placed to one side or traditionally it was placed in a wooden box (the wood would possibly absorb some of the moisture evaporated from the leather and the boxes certainly weren't airtight).

This period of 'resting' allows the moisture to fully penetrate even into the deep fibres of the leather and be retained there whilst the surface is allowed to dry. The leather is ready to be worked when the surface has returned to its original colour but still feels cool when placed against your skin due the moisture retained within.

The dryer surface will provide resistance to the swivel knife and tools, thereby remaining crisp; the softened fibres within will be easily compressed by your tool's impact and remain that way.

That said, the main traditional reason for properly casing leather for tooling is that when the surface is sufficiently dry, and the inner fibres sufficiently moist, the surface will colour through and 'bruise' when the inner fibres are compacted; giving a variety of shades to the natural colour of the leather.

To case or not to case?

If you are intending on keeping the natural colour of the VegTan leather and are simply going to use a clear seal over it once your work is complete, then properly casing it first will give you the finest results. Likewise if you are intending on moulding the leather then the methods used for casing (with some temperature variants) can be used.

However, if you are simply going to be dyeing over the leather with any colour, the subtlety of the natural shading is going to be lost, so is it really worth all the preparation? In all honesty, no; I don't believe it is.

Dampening

A simple plant mister or spray bottle, preferably one with an adjustable nozzle or as fine a spray as possible and plain tap water. This is all I've ever really used for tooling leather that is later going to be dyed. Simply spray the entire piece of leather you are going to be working on until it is evenly covered and there is minimal water sitting on the surface; though how much you actually spray will depend on how thick the leather is.

For fine grade, thin leather just a quick pass over will be sufficient, for thicker 'armour' leather (3mm and above) it is best to aim for some remaining on the surface and allow it to soak in completely prior to starting work.

What you don't want is for the surface to be too wet. Yes this will mean it is much easier to mark and cut, but this is because it is softer and therefore won't provide as crisp or clean lines and even the most minor of tooling mistakes will be shown; even nail marks where you have rested your hand can be picked up!

You are aiming for the surface to be 'just damp' when you start work. In that way you will have time to progress before you need to spray it again; which on a large piece you will need to do repeatedly.

As you work you should begin to feel it becoming slightly tougher, your strikes need to be a little harder and the feedback has a little more bounce to it. This is when the inner fibres are drying out and it's time to give it the once over with the spray again. This is an acquired skill that will develop over time. Though sadly this will not be made any easier by the simple fact you are working with a natural material, meaning that each hide will have its own variations. Sorry about that.

You can dampen your leather with a wet sponge or cloth instead. However it can be more difficult to provide an even coverage in addition to often making the leather too wet and needing to wait longer for it to dry prior to starting work.

Additional Tip

Make sure you dampen the entire piece you are working on and not just the section you are intending to tool. This will avoid the creation of water or tide marks that, more often than not, will continue to show through as variations once the leather has been dyed.

Marking

There are a number of different ways to mark your design onto your leather. Each has their advantages and disadvantages and the success of some are unfortunately dependant on how artistic you are.

Freehand

Either in pencil prior to dampening your leather or with a plain stylus after you have dampened it. With a light pressure draw your design directly onto the surface of the leather. The advantage in this is you can either incorporate natural flaws in the piece of leather or tailor your design to make the best use of the space available as well as creating a truly unique piece. The disadvantage can also be that it will be unique, therefore replicating a complex freehand designs can prove to be difficult. It also, unfortunately for some, requires you be able to draw in some capacity.

Craftaid

A 'Craftaid' is a preformed template, usually made of plastic (though you can make your own in wood or leather) where the basic lines of a design appear as raised ridges. Once you have dampened your leather you simply place the Craftaid face down where you would like the design to be and evenly apply pressure to the reverse side of it, either with your hand, spoon end of a stylus or even gently tapping it with your mallet. Lift the Craftaid off and it will have formed a series of depressions all ready for cutting. It's that simple. The advantage in these is that it enables anyone, regardless of any drawing ability, the opportunity to tool a design, some of which can be quite complex. The disadvantage is that they are each fixed and so cannot be made slightly smaller or larger to fit your piece of work.

Tracing

This is the general method of transferring designs to leather. The best medium to used is tracing film as it is unaffected by the dampness of the leather that would otherwise cause tracing paper to easily tear, it also stands up well to repeated use over the same design. However, with care, good quality tracing paper can be used, though generally not for more than a couple of reproductions. First trace your design from the original onto the film. I would recommend using a pencil as some pens only work sporadically on film and additionally can cause transference of the ink to the leather. Pencil can also sometimes transfer to the leather, but is easily removed simply through the actions of tooling and so will not impair the final dyed finish. Once you have dampened your leather rest the film with the design in the desired position then simply re-trace over it. This can be done again with a pencil or a stylus or even with a ball point pen (it doesn't matter if it won't mark the film). Be careful not to move the film whilst you are tracing the design. When done simply lift it away and you will be left with a slightly darker, bruised mark where the pressure has transferred the design to the leather. This is the most versatile method of transferring designs and one that allows you to use a vast array of original source images to turn into tooled work. Clever moving and re-tracing of a repeating design can enable you to go from straight sections to round curves. Likewise, with some artistry, you can specifically tailor a design to make the best use of available space within your overall template. Best of all, you can do it again, and again, and again.

Additional Tip

If you wish to create a matched, mirror image of your design, you do not need to redraw it, simply turn the film over and re-trace from the other side. This is where you can run the risk of ink transfer to the surface of the leather.

Swivel Knife

To use a swivel knife you rest your index finger across the rest and lightly grip the barrel between your middle and ring fingers and your thumb as illustrated.

Rest the knife perpendicular to the cased leather and apply pressure with your index finger and draw the knife towards you to make a simple straight cut. To curve the cut the basic action is exactly the same but as you draw it towards you to roll the barrel between your fingers and thumb to turn the blade to either side. Initially you may find it easier to make a slight curve, stop and lift the blade clear, turn the leather on your work surface and carefully reposition the blade before continuing your cut.

It is generally easier to pivot around your little finger, so clockwise for left-handers and anti-clockwise for right-handers.

Mallet (or Maul)

To use a mallet (or maul if you prefer) for tooling the grip is often subtly different that if you were making a firm strike for setting for example. Generally softer grip is used, one that allows you to feel the feedback through from the leather. By that I mean actually feeling how tough the leather is, whether it is resisting the tool's impression, whether it is solid or soft, springy or firm. It is a hard thing to describe, but trust me when I say it's an even harder thing to feel yourself if you got your mallet in some kind of death grip. It is rare that you will need to use much more than a firm tap for tooling, and most often it will be a gentle tapping bounce that drives the tool against the leather. As such a gentle, balanced and flexible grip is essential, in addition to the fact that you will find it far more comfortable to sustain for a potentially long period of time.

Personally I tend to barely grip the haft of the mallet at all and pretty much just balance it on my middle and ring fingers, using my wrist to provide the motion and my index finger and thumb to control it. Some people grip it more firmly; others hold it further down the haft or even by the head itself. Again, there is no real right or wrong way, only the way you find most comfortable, but relaxed control and feel are key, not power.

Beveller

Exactly how you hold the tool is another matter of personal preference, much like the mallet. Generally it should be gripped between the thumb and side of the index finger, with the tip of your middle and ring finger used as further support. Depending on the curve of the line I will tend to have my little finger both sticking out and resting on the leather, to pivot round for a large curve, or resting underneath my ring finger for tight curves or long straight lines.

The two main points are to be holding the tool perpendicular to the leather and not to have it in a tight grip that will only serve to make your hand ache after a few minutes.

The tip of the beveller should rest lightly in the cut and be struck directly down into the leather.

With each strike your fingers should act like a spring to return the tool to the same height, just resting on the surface of the leather. In this manner you gradually move along the line, being guided by the tip of the beveller along the cut.

Whether you draw the tool towards you or away from you is entirely a matter of preference and you may find it equally as comfortable going either way; some people even prefer to curl their arm round so that they are working from side to side with the tool facing them. There is no right or wrong way, only your way.

To start with you may find it easier to take it slowly, step by step, a tap at a time. Strike. Move the tool. Strike. Move the tool. Strike. Making a conscious placement of the beveller between each strike. As you practice and get more comfortable with the action and confident with your grip on the beveller, you will find you think less about exactly where you place the beveller and begin to slide it gently across the surface as you go.

The ultimate in control is when you don't need to use the tip in the cut as a guide but can hover the tool just above the leather's surface and still follow the line smoothly.

It is advisable not to move the tool too far between each strike, instead allow each one to overlap the previous by at least half. This will help to eliminate edge marks and the second strike will help to even out the tool mark from the first and so on. Also essential in eliminating tool marks is maintaining an even strength to your mallet strikes. One random heavier strike will leave a clearly deeper impression of the tool behind that will be harder to smooth out than if you have made a few random lighter blows.

Textured bevellers are at the same time both easier and more difficult to use. They can be easier as you can find the tool almost biting into the impressions from the previous strike, and so may find it easier to progress evenly along the line.

That can also make it harder to maintain a smooth progression as the texture doesn't allow it to easily slide along the surface, therefore developing the skill of 'hovering' the tool is more useful, but at the same time can give rise to mis-strikes.

Common Problem

Other than tool impressions being left along the line of the work, the most common problem with bevelling is a mis-strike. This is where the tool does not follow the line and either makes an impression slightly off to one side or the other.

If you are lucky and mis-strike on the bevelled side then it can be blended in with a few graduated strokes over it along the correct line of the cut. If the tool has strayed into the clean area of the design, then it's a little harder to hide. Careful rubbing over with the smooth back of the spoon end of a stylus can blend light mis-strikes in, but be warned that this does subtly change the surface of the leather and will possibly be made even more noticeable with dyeing; especially antiquing which is designed to show up irregularities of the leather's surface.

To be honest, unless you are going to attempt to re-cut your line and completely re-bevel it, I would leave the mis-strike as it is. These things happen, it's not a flaw, it's a design feature.

Additional Tip

If you do find that you are leaving minor tool impressions behind, it can be beneficial to run the beveller back over your work, using a firm, regular pressure to help smooth them out before you continue on with the next section. Alternatively, once all the bevelling has been done you can go over the entire thing with the 'spoon' end of a stylus. In much the same way, using the smooth back of it to even out any marks, though if it is in an area you will later be backgrounding it's not really necessary; the textured background will hide the majority of marks made by a beveller. This is only tip is only really relevant to smooth bevelling.

Backgrounder

The strikes required will be generally heavier than for bevelling but other than that the method for holding the tool is the same. Likewise the aim is, as far as possible, not to leave individual tool marks but a evenly textured surface; remember, it is easier to blend in a lighter area by going over it again but the only way to blend in a single heavy hit it to go over everything to match it.

As you will be covering a block area rather than following a single line there often won't be a cut line to follow, unlike bevelling. This generally means that it is worth cultivating the 'hovering' action of the tool, holding and returning it to a point just above the surface of the leather after each strike. In this manner you are freer to move your hand to influence the area of effect.

Whilst this can take a measure of control that may take time to acquire, it's not always important to be neat and ordered when backgrounding. In fact there are times when having a much more random movement can actually be beneficial. Generally if you are filling in a small area it can be worth following the bevelled perimeter and gradually work your way inwards.

For larger areas, or when you are fading the background effect out to the surface of the leather then small circular, or more random, movements can give you a better overall effect; it is also more likely to blend in any accidental individual tool marks.

Pear Shader

Pear shaders are held the same way as the previous tools but perhaps with a slightly stronger grip. This will enable you to smoothly move the tool over the surface of the leather as there are generally no cuts to guide you; though many designs may allow for a light dotted line to show roughly where to shade (see Tracing).

Strike strength will vary greatly depending on how deep a depression you wish to make. Remember the larger the surface area of the tool the harder the strike will need to be to make a significant impression and vice versa.

It can be used with just a single hit, or a series of strikes, gradually becoming softer as you move the tool. Due to its convex shape it is far less likely to leave a distinct edge to the tool mark, it can be easily blended in to the regular finish of the leather due to the smoothness with which it can be glided over the surface.

With textured shaders you don't get the same glide and so must hover the tool to move it smoothly. There is no real right or wrong way to use a shader so experiment away. You can create some fantastic undulating textures just by randomly moving it about, gliding it along or even twisting it in your grip as you strike.

Basic Tools

It is worth mentioning now that your choice of tools should be primarily one of comfort and not cost. You can have the most expensive, top brand maul, but if you are more comfortable using a cheap wooden mallet then the chances are that it is with the cheap mallet that you'll produce your best work. It may sound like a load of hippy nonsense, but it is the simple truth that when working with a natural medium, be it leather, wood, whatever, the quality of your work will be very much reflective of the 'feel' you have with the medium you are using. Such sensitivity is greatly enhanced by familiar and comfortable tools. That said, there are times when the quality of your tools will help and they will often tend to be easier to use.

Swivel Knives

Unique to leather tooling, a swivel knife is essential. It comes in two parts, the main barrel of the knife itself and an interchangeable blade.

The barrel is definitely a matter for comfort as its action is quite unlike anything you've probably ever used before. The two main areas for consideration are the finger rest and the ease at which it will turn. The former is most important as the latter can generally be made acceptable with a tiny drop of oil. However, if the height of the rest is incorrect for you then you will find using the knife either becoming rapidly tiresome and a strain, or you will be unable to exert enough pressure with enough control to make a reasonable cut.

There are no magic formulae for how high the rest should be in comparison to your hand size, it's a purely personal thing that you will only really be able to judge through use. Therefore it can be wise to invest in one with an adjustable rest and simply fiddle with it until it's comfortable. If you are lucky enough to have one included within a starter kit that is at the correct height for you, but is an uncomfortable shape then try covering it. Anything from a piece of foam and gaffa tape, to a couple of plasters, if it works for you, it's all good.

The blades for swivel knives however are an excellent example of where more expensive can often prove to be a wise investment. In most starter kits the blade included is somewhat broad, chunky and it is simply physically impossible to create a fine and intricate cut with it, no matter how good you are. Investing in a good quality fine blade will enhance your initial cuts, and therefore the resulting work.

Metal

There are a number of precision ground metal blades available that suit most, if not all, situations; from broad flat blades to angled blades for finer detailed work. One thing they all share in common is that they will need to be kept in good condition, regularly stropped and honed to continue providing you with a clean cut.

Ceramic

Relatively expensive, ceramic blades are generally found in almost as wide a range as metal ones. Their main advantage is that they keep a keen edge, do not need to be honed, and barely need to be stropped either. Their disadvantage is in the fact that they are somewhat brittle and so are far more likely to chip or break if knocked against something hard or dropped. When I first started tooling, I bought my first ceramic blade on the second day, and then I dropped it five years later and had to buy another one; I've used that almost exclusively now for well over a decade! I've never needed to sharpen it, and probably even only strop it once a year, if I remember!

Blade shape

If you are unlikely to be carving or tooling fine, intricate shapes or very small or tight curves then a straight blade will most likely suffice. They do require the swivel knife to be held at a greater angle (rather than almost perpendicular for angled ones) so as to cut with the corner of the blade and this is generally what makes tight curves somewhat more difficult to achieve cleanly. Often they are also slightly thicker and are therefore capable of giving a wider cut. This gives them slightly more versatility when it comes to carving accents.

Angled blades taper to a point that enables far more intricate and fine cuts to be made. If you are considering complex knot-work, small designs, tight curves or even more pictorial carving then this is probably a more versatile blade to invest in.

Though this is a somewhat specialised blade, the ability for it to provide consistent, even parallel cuts can be an incredible time saver, especially for very fine knot-work or flora, leaf stems etc.

Mallets

Well, technically there are hammers, mallets and mauls, though generally it isn't advisable to use a metal hammer when tooling leather for two reasons. Firstly and most importantly, they give a very sharp strike and therefore it is more difficult to gauge the feedback from the leather. Secondly, the tools are generally made from softer alloys than metal hammers and so will deform if used with them, though this in itself isn't necessarily much of an issue.

The difference between a mallet and a maul is basically in the shape of the head. A mallet will give you a flat striking surface and a maul has a curved one. Mauls are also generally found in heavier weights than mallets. There is no real right or wrong time to use one of the other, though you can get a greater range of strikes (by using the curve to deflect some of the force) from a maul that you can from a mallet. However, their use can be something of an acquired skill and to be honest it's not one I've even felt that comfortable with so I only use a mallet. As with so much of leatherworking, it's personal preference so if possible, try before you buy.

Wooden

Most of the starter kits you can buy will come with a simple wooden mallet. There is nothing wrong with this and if you prefer a lighter weight you may find you want to stick with it for tooling purposes. However, they are not very durable (the surface of the head can easily become damaged, so it is recommended you get an alternative for setting and any embossing, both of which are likely to require firmer strikes).

Rawhide

Usually relatively heavy, rawhide mallets can be a good alternative to wooden ones and are also more durable. The face will degrade over time but can take a lot more punishment than a wooden mallet. They can give quite a sharp strike with a fair bit of bounce to it that can be harder to control, but this does soften as the head becomes more worn in.

Nylon or Polymer

This is where the greatest range can be found. From relatively cheap, medium weight mallets to top of the range, weighted and balanced mallets and mauls. The heads themselves can be found in differing densities, and therefore give differing levels of bounce and feedback; generally the harder they are the more durable but also the more bounce-back you get. The main advantage I've found with poly-headed mallets is that even as the head is damaged with use, the feedback you receive from each strike remains fairly constant. Due to this I'm still using the same mallet that I bought over fifteen years ago and it still feels the same to work with as it did back then (or at the very least it has changed so imperceptibly over the years that I've grown used to it).

Beveller

Of the three most basic tooling skills of bevelling, backgrounding and shading, bevelling is probably the most used of all. Additionally good bevelling can really lift the quality of a piece of work so it is a skill worth taking the time to practice with. Like many 'tooling' tools bevellers come in a number of variations, both in size and those with a smooth or textured face and each has a very slightly different way of being used. Generally the smaller the tool the easier it can be driven into the leather and so will possibly need a lighter strike, the broader the tool, the harder the strike. Most basic sets will contain a medium sized beveller, though if it is one with a textured face I would recommend getting a smooth faced one too as it is such an essential and versatile tool. Additionally once you've mastered a smooth beveller then the transition to a textured one is easier than the other way round.

Where to Use

The simple answer to this is almost everywhere! Creating borders, lifting a design or 'raising' a section, as a prelude to background shading, creating the illusion of an overlap (essential when tooling knot-work), all are achieved with bevelling. The general rule of thumb is to bevel on the outside of a design, or on the side of a line where you would wish a 'shadow' to form. The more artistic the design, the more difficult it can be to judge which side to bevel on, but both practice and/or frequent checking back to reference material will help. If you wish to background shade an area, it can be useful to bevel on that side of the line as it will provide you with a cleaner edge.

Backgrounder

Like bevellers, backgrounders come in a variety of sizes and a wide range of textures. The most basic and oft used is a simple cross-hatched, diamond texture, but you can get some quite random ones; even a pebble effect. Regardless of the face, the manner in which they are used is the same, with the same provision as bevellers regarding surface size in relation to strike strength.

Where to Use

Generally the point of these tools is to evenly reduce the overall surface area of a section, thereby effectively 'lifting' the remainder of the design. Most commonly they are used evenly within small enclosed sections of a design, for example within the lines of Celtic knot-work. However, they can be used on the edge of a design, gradually fading out by using lighter and lighter strikes, to blend in with the smooth leather surface.

Pear Shader

Yet again, like bevellers, pear shaders are available in a variety of sizes and with either a smooth or textured face. For the same reason as the beveller this is another tool I would recommend getting in a smooth face as well if your initial kit only contains a textured one. The smooth face will allow for a good glide over the leather whereas a textured one will require a certain amount of hovering.

Where to Use

This is a very versatile tool that can quickly and easily give a real tactile lift to a piece. On plain VegTan which bruises (shows a darker colour) under impact this tool can literally shade your work. Though this effect is lost with most dyeing techniques the impressions they make, smooth depressions and channels, can make a piece just beg to have you run your fingers over it. Often used on American western saddles and tack to give a sense of curvature to floral carving, it can do similar and lends itself very well to heraldic designs and scroll work.

Basileus Flint

Eternal of Autumn

Contents

Sobriquets

Known as the Sovereign Lord of Locks, Basileus Flint is the master of intrigue, espionage and brutal power plays.

While he sometimes appears in female or monstrous guise, Basileus Flint is generally referred to with masculine pronouns, He is sometimes known as the Patron of Spies and Traitors due to his role in keeping people's secrets. Flint is dubbed Prince of the Black Vaults, in recognition of the role that espionage and military defence play in his realm - and of the oubliettes to which those who fail or displease him are consigned.

He is also known as the Keeper of the Weir, due to his interest in fleets and sea trade and to the great canals that run like a web through his eternal city. A mistake over the nature of eternal politics had him known as Nightbane due to the belief that his role in keeping secrets secure put him in direct opposition to the eternal of Night and Sadogua in particular; more correctly he has a great deal of interest in extending his influence to include the eternal of other Realms, especially those of the Whisper Gallery. Several sources also refer to him as Basileus Kade, and reference a confused story that Flint is not the first Eternal to rule the City of Locks.

Appearance

Basileus Flint has two distinct forms, and swaps between them as he wishes. Most commonly he appears to be a lithe young man dressed in the well-tailored clothes of a professional of some kind. He can also appear as the Beast of the Locks; a monstrous horned creature reserved for the darkest of Flint's moods. He often wears the tattered remains of a fine suit of clothing, and while he rarely carries a weapon in his other guises, as the Beast he may wield a brutal double-edged gladius and a main gauche. When he is encountered in this form Flint is at his most dangerous. All pretence of civilisation is abandoned, and he appears entirely consumed with the ruthless application of power to achieve one's goals. All the scholars agree - deal with the Beast of Locks extremely carefully. The Sovereign Lord of the City of Locks was once known to take the form of a beautiful woman as well, but this guise has not been seen since the ascension of Basileus Flint.

It is not common for an Autumn eternal to change shape so freely, and scholars of the eternal theorize that he has access to an item of power, possibly a mask or the belt of locks he wears at all times - a tool that helps to keep those he deals with uncertain and off-balance.

Regardless of form, he wears discreet yet obviously valuable jewelery to reinforce his appearance as a man of station. Regardless of his attire, he always wears a belt with a lock and set of chains worn over the buckle. However else he appears, Flint is always wealthy, powerful and in control.

Flint never appears alone. He may remain aloof, allowing his heralds to do the talking for him (especially when he is in the guise of the Beast of the Locks). Other times he plays the gracious host, entertaining his guests with conversation and fine food - but a guest should never forget that this creature is a being of intrigue and power, and that very little he says or does should be taken at face value.

Concerns

Ultimately, Flint is manifestation of raw, naked ambition and control, He is a power-monger, a figure who decides who will prosper and who will be ruined within his domain. Everything has a place within his grand scheme, and the world is divided into those who support him, and those who are yet to support him.

In his own realm, Flint is concerned with the never ending politics of the charter houses of the City of Locks. These brutal displays of dog-eat-dog politics are continuous and never ending, as the citizens constantly vie for the blessing of their Lord Sovereign. These concerns inevitably spill over into the temporal realm and into the Empire. Flint encourages the charter houses to look for sources of power and influence outside of the Realm of Autumn to give them an advantage in their constant competition against each other.

- 1 Eternal of Autumn
 - 1.1 Sobriquets
 - 1.2 Appearance
 - 1.3 Concerns
 - 1.4 Boons

Flint is always reaching outwards, looking to extend his influence from his centre of power to envelop and encompass everything else. In this regard, he embodies the idea of trade as a tool of control, and many of his heralds function as both traders and spies; gathering intelligence that can be used to extend the power of both Flint and the City of Locks.

While the enmity between Flint and the Night eternal Sadogua is a myth, the Lord of Locks has spent an eternity attempting to master and harness the eternal of the Whisper Gallery. Unfortunately, the Sovereign Lord of the City of Locks seems to believe that every action taken to achieve this goal increases the chances of Basileus' own secrets being used against him by the Whisper Gallery. He has engaged in convoluted schemes to bring them under his control, but dearly wishes to know precisely what they know about him. This goal is further hampered by the various problems that trying to exert influence over the eternal of another Realm present to the Autumnal lord; not least the fact that while he understands the power of secrets to blackmail and influence others, he cannot really comprehend the more mystical and philosophical concepts in the way the Night eternal do. For their part, the Night eternal pretend to neither know nor care about Basileus Flint, and this drives him to distraction - he cannot fathom their wider plans, and until he can understand them he cannot influence them.

Boons

The Sovereign Lord of the City of Locks gathers secrets; not mystical secrets like the eternal of Night, but the secrets gathered by spies and agents who watch and record what the people around them are doing. He spreads his influence by influencing those who seek influence and control over those around them - anyone could become a node in his web of power and control. He helps those who want to protect their investments, build on the assets and alliances and increase their share of whatever market they are competing in - all the time ensuring that he increases his own share of that market through the person he is aiding. Magicians prepared to make a strong deal, and willing to accept the risks of a continuously changing foreign and possibly alien market can get access to the incredible resources and assets in the halls and vaults of the City of Locks.

Flint encourages his heralds to make deals with magicians, and those who are clever enough can reap great rewards; but they must be careful not to be crushed by the rapidly changing politics of the city. This is especially true when you consider that the magician will not be able to directly get involved in the management of any assets they gain in the city and will have to trust that the Charter House will protect their interests. The most common way of achieving this goal is to have plenty of resources to draw on in the Empire to be used as capital, and to ensure that any agreements are carefully worded. The representatives of the Charter Houses will never break the word of a contract, but they have no regard for the 'spirit' of an agreement - only the actual words on the paper.

Those dealing with Flint should take care to remember that trade is not his primary goal; it is a means to increasing his power and control over the world. While some Autumn eternal engage in trade for the love of the deal and its subtleties, ultimately Flint is concerned only with power over others. Playing the game with the Sovereign Lord of Locks is not for the faint hearted, and although the rewards are great, the possibility of the Lictors - or worse - collecting on debts owed cannot be ignored.

The Truth About Basileus Flint

For most of the Empire's history, the City of Locks was ruled by Basileus Kade. During the Autumn Equinox 379YE, following a significant period of turmoil in the City of Locks, Basileus Kade was supplanted by a citizen of League city of Tassato. The details of precisely how Flint was able to claim this position are known only to those directly involved. What the political, religious (and legal) implications of this ascension, assuming it is even real, are extremely unclear.

Basileus Flint (Redirected from Basileus Flynt)

Eternal of Autumn

Contents

Sobriquets

Known as the Sovereign Lord of Locks, Basileus Flint is the master of intrigue, espionage and brutal power plays.

While he sometimes appears in female or monstrous guise, Basileus Flint is generally referred to with masculine pronouns, He is sometimes known as the Patron of Spies and Traitors due to his role in keeping people's secrets. Flint is dubbed Prince of the Black Vaults, in recognition of the role that espionage and military defence play in his realm - and of the oubliettes to which those who fail or displease him are consigned.

He is also known as the Keeper of the Weir, due to his interest in fleets and sea trade and to the great canals that run like a web through his eternal city. A mistake over the nature of eternal politics had him known as Nightbane due to the belief that his role in keeping secrets secure put him in direct opposition to the eternal of Night and Sadogua in particular; more correctly he has a great deal of interest in extending his influence to include the eternal of other Realms, especially those of the Whisper Gallery. Several sources also refer to him as Basilius Kade, and reference a confused story that Flint is not the first Eternal to rule the City of Locks.

Appearance

Basileus Flint has two distinct forms, and swaps between them as he wishes. Most commonly he appears to be a lithe young man dressed in the well-tailored clothes of a professional of some kind. He can also appear as the Beast of the Locks; a monstrous horned creature reserved for the darkest of Flint's moods. He often wears the tattered remains of a fine suit of clothing, and while he rarely carries a weapon in his other guises, as the Beast he may wield a brutal double-edged gladius and a main gauche. When he is encountered in this form Flint is at his most dangerous. All pretence of civilisation is abandoned, and he appears entirely consumed with the ruthless application of power to achieve one's goals. All the scholars agree - deal with the Beast of Locks extremely carefully. The Sovereign Lord of the City of Locks was once known to take the form of a beautiful woman as well, but this guise has not been seen since the ascension of Basileus Flynt.

It is not common for an Autumn eternal to change shape so freely, and scholars of the eternal theorize that he has access to an item of power, possibly a mask or the belt of locks he wears at all times - a tool that helps to keep those he deals with uncertain and off-balance.

Regardless of form, he wears discreet yet obviously valuable jewelery to reinforce his appearance as a man of station. Regardless of his attire, he always wears a belt with a lock and set of chains worn over the buckle. However else he appears, Flint is always wealthy, powerful and in control.

Flint never appears alone. He may remain aloof, allowing his heralds to do the talking for him (especially when he is in the guise of the Beast of the Locks). Other times he plays the gracious host, entertaining his guests with conversation and fine food - but a guest should never forget that this creature is a being of intrigue and power, and that very little he says or does should be taken at face value.

Concerns

Ultimately, Flint is manifestation of raw, naked ambition and control, He is a power-monger, a figure who decides who will prosper and who will be ruined within his domain. Everything has a place within his grand scheme, and the world is divided into those who support him, and those who are yet to support him.

In his own realm, Flint is concerned with the never ending politics of the charter houses of the City of Locks. These brutal displays of dog-eat-dog politics are continuous and never ending, as the citizens constantly vie for the blessing of their Lord Sovereign. These concerns inevitably spill over into the temporal realm and into the Empire. Flint encourages the charter houses to look for sources of power and influence outside of the Realm of Autumn to give them an advantage in their constant competition against each other.

Flint is always reaching outwards, looking to extend his influence from his centre of power to envelop and encompass everything else. In this regard, he embodies the idea of trade as a tool of control, and many of his heralds function as both traders and spies; gathering intelligence that can be used to extend the power of both Flint and the City of Locks.

While the enmity between Flint and the Night eternal Sadogua is a myth, the Lord of Locks has spent an eternity attempting to master and harness the eternal of the Whisper Gallery. Unfortunately, the Sovereign Lord of the City of Locks seems to believe that every action taken to achieve this goal increases the chances of Basileus' own secrets being used against him by the Whisper Gallery. He has engaged in convoluted schemes to bring them under his control, but dearly wishes to know precisely what they know about him. This goal is further hampered by the various problems that trying to exert influence over the eternal of another Realm present to the Autumnal lord; not least the fact that while he understands the power of secrets to blackmail and influence others, he cannot really comprehend the more mystical and philosophical concepts in the way the Night eternal do. For their part, the Night eternal pretend to neither know nor care about Basileus Flint, and this drives him to distraction - he cannot fathom their wider plans, and until he can understand them he cannot influence them.

Boons

The Sovereign Lord of the City of Locks gathers secrets; not mystical secrets like the eternal of Night, but the secrets gathered by spies and agents who watch and record what the people around them are doing. He spreads his influence by influencing those who seek influence and control over those around them - anyone could become a node in his web of power and control. He helps those who want to protect their investments, build on the assets and alliances and increase their share of whatever market they are competing in - all the time ensuring that he increases his own share of that market through the person he is aiding. Magicians prepared to make a strong deal, and willing to accept the risks of a continuously changing foreign and possibly alien market can get access to the incredible resources and assets in the halls and vaults of the City of Locks.

Flint encourages his heralds to make deals with magicians, and those who are clever enough can reap great rewards; but they must be careful not to be crushed by the rapidly changing politics of the city. This is especially true when you consider that the magician will not be able to directly get involved in the management of any assets they gain in the city and will have to trust that the Charter House will protect their interests. The most common way of achieving this goal is to have plenty of resources to draw on in the Empire to be used as capital, and to ensure that any agreements are carefully worded. The representatives of the Charter Houses will never break the word of a contract, but they have no regard for the 'spirit' of an agreement - only the actual words on the paper.

Those dealing with Flint should take care to remember that trade is not his primary goal; it is a means to increasing his power and control over the world. While some Autumn eternal engage in trade for the love of the deal and its subtleties, ultimately Flint is concerned only with power over others. Playing the game with the Sovereign Lord of Locks is not for the faint hearted, and although the rewards are great, the possibility of the Lictors - or worse - collecting on debts owed cannot be ignored.

The Truth About Basileus Flint

For most of the Empire's history, the City of Locks was ruled by Basileus Kade. During the Autumn Equinox 379YE, following a significant period of turmoil in the City of Locks, Basileus Kade was supplanted by a citizen of League city of Tassato. The details of precisely how Flint was able to claim this position are known only to those directly involved. What the political, religious (and legal) implications of this ascension, assuming it is even real, are extremely unclear.

Bastion

Overview

Bastion is the heart of the Highborn nation. The beautiful rolling plains are dotted with woodlands and carefully maintained parks, and with great stone chapterhouses that date back to the first years of the Revelation. Since the end of the Highborn civil war, Bastion has presented the calm, serene visage of the Highborn to the world. During the founding of the Empire, Bastion very nearly became the "official" capital of the Empire in 3YE; at the last minute the Senate decided to hold their quarterly gatherings in Anvil instead.

It was settled in the first years after the founding; but the focus of the early years remained on the southern territory of Pharos. Considered a hinterland where a military presence was necessary rather than a place to settle, Bastion remained sparsely populated for decades; most settlements were little more than small fortifications along the northern and eastern borders. Things began to change as the first ripples of the Revelation began to shake Highborn society. As the patricians became more and more embroiled in their personal feuds and agendas, the Highborn who would become the founders of the Revelation sought fresh opportunities in Bastion.

The civil war swept across Bastion as well as Pharos, and several chapters were destroyed in the fighting. Several have never been restored, left as reminders of the follies of the past and a warning to the future. Once the war was over, however, the new Assembly of the Virtuous constructed a new city along the banks of the Couros, seeking a new start for their people and their nation.

Recent History

When the Druj initially conquered Reikos, they launched several strikes across the river into Sybela Cross and the Elms. These were repulsed, but not before bringing down the fortification of the White Tower. Many refugees from the lost territory made new homes in Bastion. Over time, some abandoned any intention to returning to Reikos, and there was some friction between established Bastion chapters, and those refugees who now consider themselves citizens of Bastion. Now that Reikos has been liberated, the tension has lessened significantly - most of those forced to seek sanctuary here have returned to rebuild and those who remain are rapidly assimilating .

Major Features

Bastion, the White City

The sacred city of Bastion, the White City, is a marvel of marble and mosaic. Even her enemies cannot deny her magnificence – the white marble domes and towers raised up to demonstrate the glory of a virtuous life, the roads trodden smooth by the footsteps of countless philosophers, warriors and pilgrims. More garden than city, the skyline is dominated by the tall spires and elegant architecture of the huge chapterhouses. The entire city has been expressly designed as a monument to the devotion of the Highborn. When the Imperial Synod recognizes a paragon or exemplar, then a new basilica is constructed here to celebrate their life and deeds.

Few Highborn dwell here permanently but most important folk make a pilgrimage once every year. Every chapter maintains a hostel in the great city, to serve as a dwelling for members who visit. The wealthiest and most powerful Highborn often possess their own residence here, but the city is much more a symbol than it is an active urban centre. During the formation of the League, the citizens of the White City were approached about joining and politely rebuffed. Historians suggest the other cities of the modern League were actually quite relieved - Bastion is a city in name only, and neither its wealth nor its population approach that of a major urban centre like Temeschwar or Tassato.

One of the oldest structures in Bastion is the Spire of the Open Hand; in pre-Imperial days, it served as an embassy from the people of Urizen to the people of Highguard. Even after the foundation of the Empire, the spire continued to serve as an embassy until Urizen officially became the ninth nation during the reign of Emperor Giovanni. Today, the three pale towers that made up the spire serve as a combination of school and museum.

Bastion is a site of pilgrimage for followers of the Way but within the city itself are several specific places of note. The ruins of the Lepidean Library, for example, are a valuable lesson of the importance of maintaining Vigilance. A repository of historical information about the lives of paragons and exemplars, it was one of the earliest victims of the rampage of Emperor Nicovar. It has never been rebuilt - today it is maintained as a public park and the Heirs of Lepidus whose chapterhouse it once was live in much more frugal circumstances in Woodbury.

By contrast, the old meeting halls of the original Highborn assembly, the Basilica of Seven Doors are as beautiful and majestic as they were when they were first completed. Seven chapels, one dedicated to each of the virtues, form an outer ring around a single great hall beneath a white marble dome. The great cathedral stands at the heart of a public park through which seven wide avenues extend, serving as the "spokes" around which the rest of the city was originally arranged. The Highborn still use the Basilica of Seven Doors for important festivities; the duty of overseeing the citadel and its grounds belongs to the Custodes Clavium - a Highborn chapter named for the ring of keys they notionally hold, each one used to secure one of the gates to the citadel.

Sybela

A small trading town where goods from local farms are sold, Sybela boasts an unusually large number of inns, since it acts as a crossroads for travel between Highguard, the League, Urizen and Dawn. It is a key stopping point on the pilgrim routes to Highguard. For some, the journey is as important as the destination and Sybela is one place where pilgrims meet, and join together to travel through the still-dangerous lands between the civilised places of the world.

By order of the Imperial Senate, in early 377YE a series of watchtowers and fortified inns were constructed around Sybela following an increase in banditry. The works were overseen by Bridget Eastville (senator for Mitwold) as part of a larger plan to provide protection to towns throughout the Empire. While the defences are not sufficient to qualify Sybela as a fortification, they have already helped reduce brigandry throughout the territory.

Regions

Bastion Rounds

The White City dominates Bastion Rounds. The spires of the city are said to be visible from every part of the region, both the fertile farmlands and the light woods of the north and west. There are few actual chapterhouses here - while most Highborn Chapters maintain a small residence in the city itself, few are actually based here. Those that are are usually concerned with the maintenance and support of the city proper.

One of the best known of these local chapters is Ravensfell. Directly north of Bastion city on top of a rocky outcrop over the valley that carries the river Couros, in more peaceful times the chapterhouse was a staging post for traders and travellers on pilgrimage to Bastion city from Reikos and Urizen. Recently, the chapter has been defending the crossing of the river Couros from Druj incursion, and offering shelter to refugees from Reikos.

The Elms

Quality: Forest

The Elmwood Forest is the wildest part of Bastion. The chapters established here tend to be a little more introspective than those in the rest of Bastion; several maintain forest preserves while others take advantage of the wild woods to hone their combat and survival skills. Several of these more martial chapters are especially active in the armies of Highguard; the region is known for the strength, fortitude, and Courage of its guardians. Their martial might was tested several times during the Druj occupation of Reikos. The orcs raided regularly across the river and on one occasion in 372YE attempted to establish a beachhead here; they were repulsed by the Seventh Wave after a months-long campaign through the woodlands during which the expertise of the chapters here proved a key advantage in driving the Druj back across the Haros.

Stoneside

The woodlands of Stoneside cannot really be described as a "forest". Broad avenues are maintained between the trees, and much of the region has the feel of a great park or even orchard, rather than a wild wood. Stoneside is home to several large and prosperous chapterhouses, and also to a special site of pilgrimage. In central Stoneside there is a great rock carved with Wintermark runes, allegedly carried here from Hahnmark by the Exemplar Inga Tarn as part of a pilgrimage of her own. The Burden of Inga Tarn is a common destination for those treading the path of Courage, and represents one of the few "basilicas of the Exemplars" that are not found in the White City itself. Prior to her arrival the region was called East Woods.

Sybella Cross

Sybella Cross is rich farmland scattered with fortified chapters; some of the oldest in the Empire were founded here in the first diaspora from Pharos. The rich town of Sybela stands in the south, while in the north the ruins of the fortification known as the White Tower (brought down in 369YE by the Druj) still keep an uneasy vigil over the trods that lead north into Reikos. The ruins have been somewhat restored as part of the ongoing fortification, but the watchtower and palisade are a poor shadow of the great white granite walls that stood here until the orcs of the Stone Toad clan took them down. It is also the site of the Sybella Cross Physician's Hall, an establishment that purchases herbs from the citizens of Bastion, and serves as a medical academy focusing on the use of herbs.

Woodbury

The scattered woodlands here are well maintained, and provide building materials for construction work all over Highguard and beyond. In the early years of the Empire, Woodbury was extensively forested; three centuries of major construction work have seen most of the old forest disappear leaving a number of carefully cultivated woodlands and a lot of open grassland largely used as pasture. Unlike the chapters of the northern and eastern regions, those of Woodbury tend to be less fortified and more concerned with agriculture and the virtues of prosperity. Perhaps as a consequence, they tend to be a little wealthier than their counterparts in other parts of the territory. At least one of the chapters here was founded by converts from the Marches, who embraced the piety and strength of Highguard but maintained their deep appreciation for farming and land ownership.

OOC Notes

- Highguard (and thus the Empire) control all the regions of Bastion.
- Before its destruction by the Druj, the White Tower was a level one fortification. Built in pre-Imperial times, the fortress was originally level two, but during the time of Empress Mariika it was partially decommissioned - the Senate at the time did not imagine it would ever see action again.
- Some prominent chapters of Bastion are detailed here.

Battle Anthem

Lyrics by Daisy and Jude. The tune is very roughly based on Debochadan by Severa Nazarkhan, from her album Sen.

It is said that the nine declarations made in this Empire battle anthem each refer to one of the nine Imperial nations. Which one is which is, however, a matter of much debate...

A pdf of the lyrics and the tune can be found here.

One voice, one people and one Empire One throne and one loyalty One will to drive us ever onward One glorious destiny!

I am the iron quarried from the mountains Forged in fire till only steel remains I am the wind that gives the Empire breath and life I am the quick blood in its veins.

One voice, one people and one Empire One throne and one loyalty One will to drive us ever onward One glorious destiny!

I am the flame that burns inside the Empire's heart I am the earth's great bones, steadfast and sure I am the bonds that hold us fast in fellowship That forever will endure

One voice, one people and one Empire One throne and one loyalty One will to drive us ever onward One glorious destiny!

Battle safety

Health and Safety in battles

It is the responsibility of everyone taking part in a battle to consider their own safety and that of the participants around them. All participants in battles should adhere to the instructions of referees and other members of crew, who have your safety and enjoyment as their primary consideration. The following are points that all participants should bear in mind when taking part in combat activities at Profound Decisions events:

- Hydration: You should endeavour to bring water with you onto a battlefield and take on more water during lulls in fighting.
- Trip hazards: When fighting you have a better view of the ground behind your opponent than they do, you should under no account deliberately push opponents over obstacles in order to gain an IC advantage, OOC safety always comes first.
- Exhaustion: Battles are strenuous physical activities, you should endeavour to fight within your limits and take breaks where needed to avoid over-exerting yourself.
- Footwear: Battles at Empire events primarily take place in woods, you should strongly consider sensible supportive footwear for taking part in battles
- Suncream: While the woods do provide cover from the sun, some battles will occur on hot days and you should therefore prepare appropriately.

Man Down procedure for battles

While anyone can call a Man Down, it should only be done with the belief that an actual injury has occurred, not simply because someone has fallen over.

Under no account should you use the call 'Man Down' to indicate an IC injury or attract the attention of healers or physicks. Man Down is solely to be used to indicate a suspected Real Life injury

If players or crew believe there is a 'man down' incident in their area, they should:

- Stop fighting
- Kneel down

Players should not spread the call wider than the immediate area of the incident, this is to ensure the battle can continue to flow, and the appropriate crew can get to the location.

Man Downs remain localised until called battle-wide by the battle manager. This will be indicated by repeated blasts with a whistle, and passed on over the radio. Referees in the vicinity of the incident should remain standing and raise their yellow cloth to assist medics and other crew to reach the incident. Depending on the severity of the injury, referees may keep the area timed out until it's resolved, or move players away from the incident and resume fighting in the area by calling 'time in', this will be done with a '3, 2, 1, TIME IN' call after all participants are repositioned.

In minor incidents, such as displaced glasses, Imperial and Barbarian players in the area should use the common sense practise of stopping fighting, assisting the recovery of the glasses and then continuing from where they were.

Battlefield ritual (Redirected from Battlefield Ritual)

Overview

Rituals require a referee to be present when they are cast, but finding a referee who is free on a battlefield can be extremely difficult to do. This significantly impacts on the effectiveness of several rituals which are explicitly designed to be cast in battle. To make it easier for players to perform these rituals, there is a special set of rules that apply to these battlefield rituals, allowing them to be cast without a ref.

Rules

- On the battlefield, you may cast certain rituals without the presence of a referee
- Be sure you understand the effects and limitations of the ritual
- Rip any mana crystals you have used on completing the ritual
- You must do your best not to exceed the ritual uses per day available to your coven
- After leaving the battlefield, report all rituals you have cast to a referee
- If you wish to cast any other rituals on the battlefield, please inform a referee as early as possible on the day of the battle

If you are casting one of the listed battlefield rituals then you may do so without waiting to get a referee. Calculate the mana cost and perform the ritual, ripping the appropriate number of mana crystal cards at the conclusion of your roleplaying. Brief all targets on the effect once the ritual is complete. Please try your best to remember the number of targets and the mana cost you have paid.

Not all of these rituals work exactly as you may expect. Last Breath Echoes, for example, would be an excellent tool for covering up a murder if it didn't require a willing target, while Blood of the Hydra targets limbs, not characters. If you are planning to cast a battlefield ritual then you must make sure that you fully understand the rules for that ritual. It is well worth checking your understanding with a referee before the battle if you are performing a battlefield ritual for the first time.

There are usually a number of referees available after the battle is over. Find a referee and report all the battlefield rituals you have cast so that they can log them.

These rules only apply to the battlefield rituals listed below; if you wish to cast any other ritual on a battlefield you will need to make sure you have a referee present as normal. This is most likely to happen if you try and inform a referee of your intentions as early as possible on the day of the battle.

The Coven Bond

- A coven may only perform a limited number of rituals together each day
- Make sure that everyone who is part of your coven is aware of how many rituals the coven has done that day

You must do your best not to use your coven bond more times per day than you are permitted under the rules. By default, you may perform two coven rituals per day. Make sure that you know before going on the battlefield how many times your coven may use their bond today. If you perform a coven ritual at which not all coven members are present, ensure that absent members are updated OOC when next you meet them.

Anvil

Please find a referee, as usual for ritual casting, if you wish to cast any of these rituals in Anvil. If the situation is genuinely time-critical then you may cast them without a referee, as if you were on the battlefield. Such situations are expected to be uncommon on the main field.

Night

There are no night rituals that can be performed on the battlefield without a referee.

OOO reasoning

Referees can add a lot to rituals: they will check your maths, keep track of coven bonds, and look up details of the rules while you get on with your ritual. They can tell you your wounds are closing themselves with bark rather than skin, curse you with illiteracy, or drop a Tulpa on your head. On the battlefield, though, there aren't yet enough referees to guarantee you get one to your Hands of Sacred Life before the targets have bled to death or been overrun by orcs. We are recruiting more refs but even if we manage to double the size of the referee team, that would still be the case: there are a lot of ritualists, and the woods are large. The benefits of having a ref present for a ritual are outweighed, in these cases, by the fact that requiring their presence makes the ritual useless.

There are other rituals that are useful on the battlefield, but are not on this list; Rising Roots that Rend Stone needs a referee (probably grinning, and holding the trigger for a pyro) to handle the effect, for example. The rituals on this list are here because the cost of going and getting a referee in a battle outweighs the benefit of having a referee present when it is cast.

Battlefield Rituals

- On the battlefield, you may cast certain rituals without the presence of a referee
- Be sure you understand the effects and limitations of the ritual
- Rip any mana crystals you have used on completing the ritual
- You must do your best not to exceed the ritual uses per day available to your coven
- After leaving the battlefield, report all rituals you have cast to a referee
- If you wish to cast any other rituals on the battlefield, please inform a referee as early as possible on the day of the battle

Many rituals do not require a referee to cast on the battlefield. If you wish to cast one of these, do not spend any time or effort looking for a referee. Calculate the mana cost and perform the ritual, ripping the appropriate number of mana crystal cards at the conclusion of your roleplaying. Brief all targets on the effect once the ritual is complete. Record or remember the number of targets and the mana cost you have paid.

Not all of these rituals work exactly as you may expect. Last Breath Echoes, for example, would be an excellent tool for covering up a murder if it didn't require a willing target, while Blood of the Hydra targets limbs, not characters. Make sure you fully understand the rules for the ritual, as opposed to the outcome you desire or the rules that make most sense, before casting these rituals. If in doubt, find a referee, ideally before the battle.

The Coven Bond

You must do your best not to use your coven bond more times per day than you are permitted under the rules. By default, you may perform two coven rituals per day. Make sure that you know before going on the battlefield how many times your coven may use their bond today. If you perform a coven ritual at which not all coven members are present, ensure that absent members are updated OOC when next you meet them. If members of your coven attempt to perform a coven ritual and you are aware that you have exhausted the coven bond for the day, inform them of this OOC.

Enchantments

Some of these rituals (indicated with an asterisk (*) in the list below) create an enchantment on their targets. This will overwrite any previous enchantment on that character. Ensure that you brief the target on this, in addition to the enchantment's effect. To ensure that Profound Decisions apply this to the correct character, please record or remember at least two of the target's CID, character name, and player name when casting one of these rituals.

Many enchantments last until the end of the next battle, skirmish or quest the target participates in. If these are cast on the battlefield, they last until the end of the current battle, skirmish or quest: the enchantment will wear off when you return to Anvil through the Sentinel Gate, assuming your character is lucky enough to make it out.

After the battle

After you have left the battlefield, please find a referee and inform them of any rituals you have cast, the number of targets, the mana cost paid, whether you used your coven bond, and in the case of rituals that create enchantments the identity of the targets. Please do not do this on the battlefield.

Off the battlefield

Please find a referee, as usual for ritual casting, if you wish to cast any of these rituals on the main field. If the situation becomes time-critical, you may cast them without a referee, as if you were on the battlefield. Such situations are expected to be uncommon on the main field.

Some of the rituals on this list are of pretty questionable use on the battlefield, but if you want to refresh your Swan's Cruel Wing because you've used its cleave for today, it's your mana: knock yourself out. A lot of other rituals are useful on the battlefield, but not on this list; Rising Roots that Rend Stone needs a referee (probably grinning, and holding the trigger for a pyro) to handle the effect, for example. Battlefield ritual

Rituals require a referee to be present when they are cast, but finding a referee who is free on a battlefield can be extremely difficult to do. This significantly impacts on the effectiveness of several rituals which are explicitly designed to be cast in battle. To make it easier for players to perform these rituals, there is a special set of rules that apply to these battlefield rituals, allowing them to be cast without a ref.

Rules

- On the battlefield, you may cast certain rituals without the presence of a referee
- Be sure you understand the effects and limitations of the ritual
- Rip any mana crystals you have used on completing the ritual
- You must do your best not to exceed the ritual uses per day available to your coven
- After leaving the battlefield, report all rituals you have cast to a referee
- If you wish to cast any other rituals on the battlefield, please inform a referee as early as possible on the day of the battle

If you are casting one of the listed battlefield rituals then you may do so without waiting to get a referee. Calculate the mana cost and perform the ritual, ripping the appropriate number of mana crystal cards at the conclusion of your roleplaying. Brief all targets on the effect once the ritual is complete. Please try your best to remember the number of targets and the mana cost you have paid.

Not all of these rituals work exactly as you may expect. Last Breath Echoes, for example, would be an excellent tool for covering up a murder if it didn't require a willing target, while Blood of the Hydra targets limbs, not characters. If you are planning to cast a battlefield ritual then you must make sure that you fully understand the rules for that ritual. It is well worth checking your understanding with a referee before the battle if you are performing a battlefield ritual for the first time.

There are usually a number of referees available after the battle is over. Find a referee and report all the battlefield rituals you have cast so that they can log them.

These rules only apply to the battlefield rituals listed below; if you wish to cast any other ritual on a battlefield you will need to make sure you have a referee present as normal. This is most likely to happen if you try and inform a referee of your intentions as early as possible on the day of the battle.

The Coven Bond

- A coven may only perform a limited number of rituals together each day
- Make sure that everyone who is part of your coven is aware of how many rituals the coven has done that day

You must do your best not to use your coven bond more times per day than you are permitted under the rules. By default, you may perform two coven rituals per day. Make sure that you know before going on the battlefield how many times your coven may use their bond today. If you perform a coven ritual at which not all coven members are present, ensure that absent members are updated OOC when next you meet them.

Anvil

Please find a referee, as usual for ritual casting, if you wish to cast any of these rituals in Anvil. If the situation is genuinely time-critical then you may cast them without a referee, as if you were on the battlefield. Such situations are expected to be uncommon on the main field.

Battlesmith's Panoply

Description

A Battlesmith's Panoply is a powerful suit of mage armour, granting both increased arcane power and durability. In Urizen, where it is commonly called the Warlock's Net, it is said that this mage armour allows any mage to go into a battle unformed, focusing their strengths where they are most needed, being free to adapt and flow as their needs change. In Wintermark, a runesmith wearing a battlesmith's panoply is often said to have forged himself for nothing but war, and that those who bond to such an item make a powerful fork in their skein.

These potent forms of mage armour are commonly brightly coloured, with multiple shades created by the extensive use of iridescent gloaming dye, orichalcum and weltsilver threads and the polished and subtly shaded ambergelt inlays used in their construction. It often bears both of the runes Jotra and Wyr.

Rules

- Form: Armour. Takes the form of a suit of mage armour. You must be wearing this armour to use its magical properties.
- Requirement: You must have both the magician and battle mage skills to bond to this item.
- Effect: You gain two additional points of personal mana and two additional ranks of endurance.
- Materials: Crafting a Battlesmith's Panoply requires eleven ingots of orichalcum, seven ingots of green iron, seven ingots of weltsilver, nine measures of ambergelt, five measures of beggar's lye and eleven measures of iridescent gloaming. It takes one month to make one of these items.

"How does it work? Hard to explain to somebody without the gift of magic - no offence." Tacitus sipped his pale blue wine thoughtfully.

"Here. Take a knight." His hand rested absently for a moment on one of his pieces, almost stroking it. "He puts on his armour a piece at a time until he's all covered up, head-to-toe. Look at him and what do you see? A man, a man wearing armour. Two things, connected but distinct."

His hand drifted away again. He looked into the middle distance for a moment, twisting the stem of his glass.

"Look at me in my panoply and you're seeing one thing, not two. They've put their armour on, I've become mine."

He looked across the table at his opponent, his eyes hooded. Then shrugged and a smile spread across his face as he picked up one of his pieces and moved it emphatically to a new position.

"I can't make it any plainer than that."

The other player frowned down at the board and asked a question designed to distract the magician as much as elicit an answer.

"What? No! Of course it's not controlling me, any more than your arm is controlling you. It's more like... it magnifies you, makes you more of yourself." He laughed then. "It's easy to get cocky when you're new to it. You'll find a fair few of us who are superstitious about wearing somebody else's panoply - no telling what bad habits it could pass on..."

His brow creased then, just for a moment; but his opponent's attention was focused on the board between them and his frown passed unnoticed.

Bear Claws

Description

Often crafted in the form of two one-handed axes, these destructive weapons are equally effective at tearing a shield apart and smashing the haft of a pike or polearm. Kallavesi artisans devised these blades to allow warriors to mimic more closely great predatory beasts and thus more readily draw upon their power and courage. Although Bear Claws are the common styles, others are known as Wolf Claws, Eagle Claws or even Boar Tusks and are usually wielded with the appropriate mask.

These weapons are also popular in Varushka, where their power to splinter wood is appreciated in logging as well as in battle. Known as Felling Hatchets, bearing these weapons is sometimes seen as a sign that the wielder intends to battle human or at least human-like foes who carry weapons and shields, rather than wolves or animals.

They are a popular weapon with a certain foreign nation, where they are often crafted as sickles or curved swords and called Twin Moon Blades.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. A pair consisting of two one-handed weapons.
- Requirement: You must have the ambidexterity skill to bond to these items.
- Effect: You can call SHATTER against an item you hit with both weapons simultaneously by spending a hero point.
- Materials: Crafting a set of Bear Claws requires fourteen ingots of tempest jade, seven measures of Beggar's Lye, twelve measures of dragonbone and nine ingots of orichalcum. It takes one month to make a pair of these items.

Twelve trolls toiled to tear and torment,

To beat bloody that bold and brutal bear,

Their crude cleavers its crushing claws did crumble,

And with spirited swipes their skin and substance sever,

Only one ogre outlasted the onslaught to overwhelm,

And fell the fiercest foe found in frozen forests,

It stooped to skin the savage and in surprise it saw,

The hide a human hid, her heart that hairy hunter had haunted,

Its deepest daring drawn and damage dealt til death descended.

Bearer of an Imperial Wayleave

Overview

The Bearer of an Imperial Wayleave has the right to announce a single commission. There are currently three of these titles, all auctioned through the Imperial Bourse. Although the bearer is not a member of the Imperial Senate, they may use a single Senate announcement to instruct the Empire to approve a commission provided that they do so at the summit that the title was appointed.

The titles were created at the Winter Solstice summit of 380YE. The titles were used to replace the existing civilian commissioners who were expected to approve and oversee the commission of sinecures, ministries, and great works in their nation.

Contents

- 1 Overview
- 2 Responsibilities
- 3 Powers
 - 3.1 Commission
 - 3.2 Announcement
- 4 Limitations
- 5 Selection

Responsibilities

The Bearer of an Imperial Wayleaf has no responsibilities and may use the authority granted by the title to order any commission they choose. These titles replaced the previous system where each nation would appoint a civilian commissioner, and carry some of the restrictions and limitations imposed those titles.

Powers

Commission

Once during the summit where the title is appointed, each bearer can commission the construction of a sinecure, ministry, or great work in their nation. The materials and money required for construction must be provided by the bearer or their agents.

If the bearer announces the commission of a sinecure or ministry then an Imperial title to oversee the commission is automatically created. The location and size of the commission and the method of appointment and tenure of any associated title are all part of the necessary details and may be included in the announcement made by the bearer or determined later by them.

Announcement

To use their power of commission, the bearer must make an announcement in the Imperial Senate. No voting is possible by the Senate at this point, as the power had been delegated to the bearer.

The Imperial Synod may choose to exercise their veto over the bearer's announcement; there is no refund of the money provided to purchase the title if the commission is vetoed.

Limitations

The bearer of an Imperial wayleave can only commission a sinecure, ministry, or great work.

Unlike a civilian commissioner, the bearer is not prohibited from using their power to commission anything that provides liao or votes in the Imperial Synod. However the appointment of such a title is still subject to the normal constitutional restrictions.

They not required to build their commission in their own nation and may use any method of appointment (for example, through the Bourse, the Conclave, Military Council, or Synod). The civil service are on hand to offer legal advice or support to a bearer just as they are to a senator, and the bearer may wish to submit their commission for scrutiny before it is announced to ensure there are no problems with their design.

Selection

Each title of bearer of an Imperial wayleave is determined by auction by the Imperial Bourse. As an Imperial seat, any Imperial citizen may participate in the auction and hold the title.

The bearer retains the title for a single season only - they must use the power of commission at the summit where they gain the title, otherwise it is lost. As an Imperial Bourse title, the position cannot be revoked by the Imperial Synod.

The Marches military concerns (Redirected from Beater)

War is a thrice-ploughed field.

Marcher Traditional

The rich Marcher soil gives rise to great military strength and, after the recent recruitment of The Tusks, four of the Empire's armies come from the Marches. Marcher generals have a reputation for being cautious, and for valuing victory more than personal glory. War is seen as work, hard dirty work, something to achieve over months of effort, not something to be won or lost in a moment. It is also seen as a shared responsibility, something that everyone who can must face together. On campaign, even Marcher generals who can't fight for whatever reason are expected to share the same risks and privations as the common soldier, one yeoman amongst many.

Powerful households field ranks of heavily-armoured yeomen wearing their colours and fighting together. Neighbours well-used to working together fight shoulder to shoulder. The expectation of loyalty and sacrifice can make a Marcher household a fearsomely cohesive force. Traditional rivalries are put to one side when a Marcher army faces a force of outsiders, and folk who would go out of their way to avoid acknowledging each other will fight back to back against a band of invading orcs.

The strength of the Marcher forces is derived from their long hours of toil. Arms hardened by days at the forge, cutting a forest, or threshing grain are strong enough for any fight. It is common for Marchers to wield weapons made from the tools of their labour; bills used for cutting hedges and great hammers used for driving piles are pressed into service of war. The wealthiest may march in a harness of plate but plenty have nothing more than a hard leather tunic or quilted jack they have made themselves. Their true strength is their loyalty and discipline; at their best a Marcher army is a great hedge of steel, moving inexorably forward like a harvest-gang through a field of wheat.

Service to the Empire in one of the Marcher armies is considered an excellent coming of age for the sons and daughters of a yeoman. This offers them a chance to learn a little of the outside world and to earn enough to purchase their own farm and become yeomen themselves. For a nation that prides itself on its military prowess, it also ensures a steady stream of soldiers with practical experience of battle.

Beaters

Beaters roam through the Marches, learning every part of the land, watching for thieves, vagrants and other ne'er-do-wells. Beaters are often instrumental in settling land disputes between neighbours and they still play a vital role in the tradition of beating the bounds. Beaters often live off the land and most are skilled rangers or hunters. They serve as an informal police force, investigating crimes and tracking criminals. While an individual beater often associates with one or more households, they make no secret of the fact that they maintain an informal network among themselves.

The beaters watch the boundaries and defend them against trespass until its forces can muster. They also remain vigilant for internal threats. In addition to the orcs that still occupy the more inaccessible hills and wild forests of the Marches, there are bands of Féni, the ancient people driven from the fertile lowlands centuries ago. These primitive humans cover their skin in green and yellow tattoos and launch raids against civilised Marchers to steal cattle or crops. If something or someone is raiding out of the forests or hills then the beaters are the ones who are called on to hunt it.

In time of war, beaters serve the Marches as scouts, ranging ahead of the main force. Their experience watching the boundaries of the nation makes them useful light troops, particularly in forested areas, an excellent complement to the heavily armoured yeomen.

Imperial Armies

The Marches field four imperial armies; the Drakes, the Strong Reeds, the Bounders and "The Tusks".

The Drakes

- 2 Imperial Armies
 - 2.1 The Drakes
 - 2.2 The Strong Reeds
 - 2.3 Bounders
 - 2.4 The Tusks

First led by the legendary Tom Drake, this army is extremely well-supplied and has an excellent corps of quartermasters, allowing it to recover casualties much more swiftly than normal. Many of the soldiers in this army come from Mitwold, and this has led to a reputation for dogged determination and occasional internal conflict away from the battlefield. Its ranks have been swelled in recent years with soldiers displaced from the Mournwold, which has helped exacerbate the situation.

The first Marcher General leads the Drakes army, and is appointed (or re-appointed) at the Summer solstice each year.

The Strong Reeds

Initially raised from the people of Bregasland, there is still a strong territorial bias in the soldiers of this army. The army is notoriously dour, stubborn and hard bitten. The Strong Reeds have a long history of resisting Jotun aggression against the marshes, and have several times in their history fought alongside the Wintermark armies in Kallavesa.

The second Marcher General leads the Strong Reeds army, and is appointed (or re-appointed) at the Winter solstice each year.

Bounders

This adaptable army attracts many beaters who support a solid core of Upwold soldiers and a small cadre of dedicated battlefield magicians. They are skilled skirmish fighters, able to quickly learn the lay of the land and relentless in their pursuit of their enemies. Some of the best military archers in the Empire are part of this army, adept at bringing down their opponents with a combination of clever placement and withering storms of arrows.

The third Marcher General leads the Bounders army, and is appointed (or re-appointed) at the Autumn equinox each year.

The Tusks

The fourth Marcher Army was raised by Senate motion proposed by Henry Ward, then Senator for Upwold, during the Winter Solstice of 377YE. Mustering completed shortly before the Summer Solstice 378YE. The army of The Tusks was briefly named after High Courage, an ancient monument in Mournwold. This highly disciplined force saw its first major engagement when the Empire launched its liberation of the Mourn in late Autumn 379YE.

The fourth Marcher General leads the army of The Tusks, and is appointed (or re-appointed) at the Summer Solstice each year.

The Marcher officer walked out into the middle of the gathered mob, slow and casual, thumbs tucked into his belt. He took a long look around.

The circle of Marchers looked tentatively one to another, a few raised hands and chuckles.

“Quite a few of you, I see. So let me ask you this – raiders come to burn their farm, would you go help them?”

Nods, fist shaking, raised bills and bows.

“Course you would, only common sense; they burn that farm this week, could be yours the week after, couldn’t it?”

He pointed at the gaudily dressed Free Company officers swaggering about in the League lines on their flank.

“See them? I don’t like ‘em. I don’t like their plumes, I don’t like them silly pantaloons, I don’t like the perfumed piss they call wine, or the way they put on airs when they talk, or their grub what’s so full of spices it gives me the gallopin’ trots. Nope, I don’t like ‘em, not one bit. But, them? They’re our neighbours.”

He pointed to the other end of the valley, where thousands of grey-skinned orcs covered the ground like blades of grass on a pasture.

Rumbling growl, stamping feet, billhooks banged on the ground.

“We proposin’ to let em?”

Full throated roar, weapons brandished, rising chant.

Before the Throne of Estavus

Rules

Autumn Magnitude 4

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets an opaque container.

Effects

When the ritual is performed, the ritualists put five ingots or measures of special materials in an opaque container. At the completion the contents disappear, presented to the factotum of Estavus, an Autumn eternal who is always hungry for raw materials from the mortal realm.

It will take at least an hour for anything to happen, potentially longer. After this time, when the box is opened, it will contain a single pouch of ashes from the fire-mountain Shikal. Each pouch of ash can be used as part of an Autumn ritual as if it were up to three crystals of mana. All the ashes in a pouch are consumed regardless of how much is needed, but the pouch can be passed among multiple magicians who are contributing to the ritual if desired.

The ashes have no use in spellcasting, or in the rituals of other realms.

Additional targets

The ritual can affect additional ingots. Each additional five ingots included in the ritual increases the magnitude by 2. Additional ingots must be placed in the same container but need not be the same type of material.

Description

The Eternal Estavus, called the Forgemistress, is always hungry for rare materials from the mortal realm. This ritual represents a binding covenant between the Eternal and mortal magicians - in return for the raw materials she desires, she provides them with the magical ashes which she has in abundance. The ashes are only useful for Autumn rituals, but they allow a coven with a surfeit of special materials to convert their surplus into additional ritual power.

Before he became interested in the Tribute to the Thrice-Cursed Court ritual, the Freeborn scholar Serval i Riqueza of the Unfettered Mind spent a year (and a small fortune in ingots from his family's green iron mine) exploring the way this ritual worked. He concluded that, like Missive for Sadogua, the ritual could theoretically have been designed at a lower magnitude if its only purpose was to send materials to an Eternal. He theorised that the additional magnitude existed to ensure a small 'profit' for Estavus, but that without the extra magnitude the exchange would not be binding - the Autumn Eternal would be free to simply take the ingots or measures and provide nothing in return. The additional mana and magnitude make the ritual a 'formal' exchange. He also commented in his footnotes that he appreciated the symmetry that a pouch of the ashes of Shikal was exactly sufficient to allow a single casting of this ritual to produce two pouches, and mused that this was probably not a coincidence.

Some magicians dislike the overtones of submission in the name of this ritual, and prefer to call it The Slopes of Mount Shikal.

Common Elements

A box or sack, often of rare woods. fine silk or velvet, is the obvious focus used with this ritual, The container is often inscribed with the rune Lann, or with symbols of weights and scales. Ink and parchment may be used to write down the exact contents of the box and the expected return in pouches of ashes, and transferred along with the ingots. Often the ritualists weigh and measure the ingots carefully before they place them in the container, to ensure that everything is above board.

Beneath the Skin

By Leslie Snow youtube version

Children playing in the snow Further out than they should go, Saw a stranger walking near – Never stopped to think or fear.

CHORUS Hair like snow, eyes that gleam, Things aren't always what they seem. Teeth too long, hands too thin – Always look beneath the skin!

Greetings children, the woman said, It's so cold, I'm chilled near dead, Where's your camp and family, too? Won't you take me home with you?

CHORUS

Long white hair and eyes like ice, She spoke so fair she seemed so nice; Foolish children did not ask, Why she set them such a task.

CHORUS

They did not wait to find a guard, They led her straight to their own yard. They did not think to ask their kin, They brought her home and let her in.

CHORUS

And when she was well hid inside, Then she cast off her human hide. Her fangs grew long, her claws sprang free – A hungry fierce snow beast was she!

CHORUS

And all that night through every tent She stalked and slaughtered as she went. When the sun raised up his head, Half of all that tribe lay dead.

CHORUS

For pretty words and pretty whiles And pretty looks and pretty smiles – Those folks were slain and scattered all, Because they let their caution fall.

Hair like snow, eyes that gleam, Things aren't always what they seem. Teeth too long, hands too thin – Always look beneath the skin! Always look beneath the skin!

Benefactor

Had you not returned with a map of a shorter, safer, path through the Great Forest they would have called me a fool for funding your expedition as I did. Yet you are alive and have triumphed. I will ensure that this map will make us both rich and your Ambition and Courage are justly rewarded.

Lorkas the Benefactor

Overview

Benefactors operate a wide range of entrepreneurial endeavours, whether this is a business that operates solely in the field, such as a place to eat, or through more infrastructure-based trade through downtime resources, such as mines. For most benefactors, wealth is not an end in itself but a means to fund and support the projects that truly interest the benefactor, a principle that even extends to the Imperial Bourse. A benefactor may take a less advantageous trade if it means that they have the resources they need for their desired project, though a benefactor that beggars themselves may be seen as lacking Prosperity and Wisdom and not to be taken seriously.

Benefactors are not moneylenders, they do not lend money and charge interest. Instead they invest in people and projects, providing money to help fund something in the hope that all the participants can gain as a result. The Highborn believe that this is a more ethical way for those who have money to employ it, since the benefactor takes the risk alongside the people they choose to invest in.

Beyond purely monetary concerns, benefactors actively encourage people to make moral decisions when dealing with economics, discouraging the rapacious economic practices of other nations in favour of a virtuous approach to dealing. Benefactors believe that virtuous men and women set prices for things which are fair and buy and sell them accordingly. To do otherwise, to justify price gouging by citing market forces, is to abdicate responsibility for your own actions to an impartial and consequently immoral force. In the eyes of many Highborn this is equivalent to stealing food from a child “because nature made you hungry”.

There is no formal organization of benefactors, but some have been known to gather in co-operation, and many of them use the symbol of the unbalanced scales, the upper pannier containing coinage and the lower (heavier) pannier containing some symbol of morality or humanity such as a heart or a skull.

Creating a benefactor

A benefactor will have a means to support themselves, either through commerce at festival or through the season. They will also have one or more projects that interest them, and may feature in their chapter's creed, to which the benefactor's funds and resources are primarily directed. Groups of benefactors may collaborate on a project, and may even be part of a particularly commerce- or project-focussed chapter. Alternatively, they may come together with an intention of pooling resources that will collectively benefit individual projects or investments.

Examples of possible projects or Investments that may appeal to a benefactor:

- Supporting an individual or group in their political aspirations
- Providing material support to a chapter in living to its creed
- Outfitting and funding an expedition to locate or obtain lost relics of Paragons
- Funding research into metaphysical lore around the Labyrinth of Ages

Playing a benefactor

The role of the benefactor can be found in various forms throughout various media. There are few adventurers and heroes who get very far without the means of an entrepreneur to aid them on their way. Examples include:

- Marcus Brody, who underwrote so many of Indiana Jones' adventures
- Professor Inkling, who funds and equips the Octonauts
- Squire Trelawny, who supported the expedition to Treasure Island

Though some of the examples above involve characters who play subordinate roles to the titular characters, the benefactor in Empire can be more of an equal partner and is rarely silent.

Beneficent Sigil

Description

A Benedicent Sigil normally takes the form of an amulet or talisman of bleached dragonbone, or of carefully treated beggarwood inlaid with dragonbone. Normally one side will be carved with an intricate labyrinth or maze, while the other bears a symbol of particular significance to the person who wields it. The labyrinth mark is not universal. In Dawn, the amulet is likely to bear an image of a sun, usually rising or setting, giving the amulet the common name of a Sunrise Talisman. In Wintermark, an artisan often replaces the labyrinth with an appropriate rune or circle of runes - often Verys (representing strength) and Yoorn (ending a curse). In the Brass Coast these amulets are usually inlaid with golden flames, and are referred to as Goldfire Coins.

A Beneficent Sigil allows a priest to unravel certain minor curses that would normally not be susceptible to a liao ceremony. It is only useful to a priest trained in the ceremony of exorcism. When such a priest wishes to use it, they consume a dose of liao and uses the talisman to focus their thoughts, allowing them to perceive an effect that weakens an allies' body or spirit and burn it away. The effect is more focused than a purify spell cast by a magican, but slightly more powerful - it allows the removal of weakness that would normally resist a simple incantation provided that it could in theory be removed by a dose of bladeroot.

The precise workings of the talisman are a matter for conjecture; the common belief is that the priest destroys the connection between the effect and the target's body with their knowledge of exorcism and the power of the magic item, while simultaneously strengthening the patient's soul with the power of liao and their own spiritual power (using similar connections to those employed in the dedication ceremony).

Rules

- Form: Talisman. Takes the form of ceremonial regalia. You must be wearing this item to use its magical properties.
- Requirement: You must have the dedication skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: When you use the exorcism skill you may remove the WEAKNESS condition from a target rather than exorcising a spiritual effect.
- Materials: Crafting a Guided Path requires five measures of beggar's lye and five measures of dragonbone. It takes one month to make one of these items.

Berechiah

Recognition

Berechiah was recognised as an exemplar of Vigilance in 302YE, fifty years after his death.

Prominence

The tale of Berechiah's life was largely lost from history until recently. Details of his exceptional deeds were unearthed recently as a result of the work carried out at the School of Epistemology in preparation for the Symposium of the Imperial Synod of Winter Solstice 380. It is possible that the important lessons his words and works teach about Vigilance may be of interest to the current generation of pilgrims.

Biography

Born in 198YE, Berechiah was an extremely contentious figure in life, his death did little to change this. He exemplifies the often unpopular idea that the vigilant should be prepared to do whatever is necessary to protect their people from outside threats. Raised in a Tassatan orphanage, he lived much of his early life as "Shifty" Bertolli de Tassato, he left the League in his forties and joined the nation of Highguard, taking residence in a little-known chapter not far from Sybela where he finally became Berechiah.

From his earliest days, Berechiah had a natural talent for uncovering information, and judicious application of his abilities saw him rise to a position of influence within the Empire. As Bertolli de Tassato, he acted as an expert witness for the Imperial Senate on numerous occasions relating to financial mismanagement, embezzlement, or illegal business practices. He provided regular information to the Imperial Conclave about the sorcerous doings of misguided magicians, and exposed both idolatrous cults and the machinations of eternals whose actions threatened the stability of the Empire.

He also aided in the identification, location, and prosecution of dangerous heretics and blasphemers - invariably people whose extreme convictions made them a threat to the wellbeing of Imperial citizens. Perhaps his most famous success in this regard was exposing a cult of anarchists intent on fomenting a secessionist rebellion in Varushka. Berechiah's gaze was not focused entirely within the Empire however - he was equally effective at exposing the plans of a group of Asavean diplomats to gain influence over the Senate through bribery and blackmail as he was at providing useful intelligence to the Imperial Military Council that prevented at least one surprise attack by the Druj that might otherwise have seen the loss of the town of Drycastle and the deaths of hundreds of Imperial citizens.

Berechiah's effectiveness has rarely been in doubt. His methods, on the other hand, are still discussed and debated by priests and students of the law to this day. No tool was too underhanded for Berechiah to use in pursuit of Vigilance. His primary agent in exposing the anarchist cult in Varushka, for example, was a member of that group who he had helped to become addicted to a certain rare substance withdrawal from which caused agonising madness and death. He regularly blackmailed and bribed people who might be in a position to provide him with information - pointing out that neither was a crime under Imperial lore. He regularly consorted with criminals, arguing that the world was not black-and-white; that there was a difference between mundane criminal behaviour and threats to the Empire and its people. "Morality and ethics are fine and good most of the time,, he wrote. "But they offer little comfort to those who have been murdered, or enslaved, because nobody was prepared to get their hands dirty when the threat was still managable."

He was also a vocal supporter of the idea that the vigilant should take direct action once a threat was identified. "If you discover that someone is a threat" he wrote, "why should you scurry off to ask a magistrate to agree with you? Do you not trust your own judgement? I trust my judgement, and no judge should shy away from wielding an axe if they think the threat merits it."

His critics regularly accused him of malfeasance - pointing to his wealth and influence as sure sign that his "talents" were directed not only at the enemies of the Empire but at its citizens. He refused to either confirm or deny any such accusations and on the occasions when he was brought before a Magistrate either proved his innocence or simply paid the fines they levied and promised to "mend his ways" in the future. He was the target of three serious assassination attempts directly linked to his work protecting the Empire - he survived not due to any particular skill of his own but to his habit of surrounding himself with competent, effective soldiers who he paid very well indeed.

After his death, in an act of unexpected largesse, he donated his entire fortune to the support of orphanage and schools across the Empire. In his will, he claimed that without these institutions he would never have achieved the heights of his ambitions - and that by supporting them he hoped to see another Berechiah or three. "The Empire badly needs someone like me," he said more than once. "It needs Someone to take a lantern into the nasty places, where the virtuous cannot go for fear of getting their boots dirty."

He was recognised as an exemplar of Vigilance five decades after his death, following regular campaigning by members of his chapter and fervent supporters in several parts of the Empire - especially the Courage and Vigilance assemblies. A year after his Recognition, his book "The Necessary Actions of a Virtuous Sinner" were first published in Tassato - a book that the printer claimed had been left with her grandfather to be printed in the event of Berechiah becoming an exemplar. While this was not the first book Berechiah had written, it was the most "honest" - and the most inflammatory. The words within were either an excellent forgery or written by the exemplar himself. Frank and unashamed, they detailed many of the actions he had taken in pursuit of Vigilance including - contentiously - several crimes against Imperial Law. The book caused outrage, and an attempt was made to deny his exemplarhood. The basilica in Bastion erected in his name was badly damaged by fire, and the Synod furiously debated his flagrant claim that virtue - and especially the virtue of Vigilance - neither knew nor cared what mortal lawmakers might attempt to claim was appropriate behaviour.

Yet his book does not claim that all actions are justified. "Judgement is key," he wrote. "But while we hear a great deal about the importance of accepting the consequences of actions taken, people are amusingly reticent to talk about accepting the consequences for actions not taken. Inaction is a choice, just as action is. If you choose not to stop the threat to your family now, you must be prepared to live with the consequences of that decision as well."

The assembly of Vigilance and Courage both actively opposed priests of the assemblies of Pride and Loyalty who denounced Berechiah. The argument became quite vicious, but in the end recognition of Berechiah as an exemplar was upheld - to the open consternation of several high ranking magistrates and captains of the militia.

Signs

The Assembly of Vigilance cited the following signs of Berechiah's exemplarhood:

- First and foremost, for all that his methods were considered underhand and borderline illegal, there was no doubt that Berechiah's benevolence repeatedly protected the Empire from external and internal threats and corruption.
- That Berechiah inspired others is also without question. In addition to those he directly patronised, his writings were published after his death and served as a blueprint for the followers of Vigilance in detecting threats before they became too great.
- These writings also form the bulk of Berechiah's legacy. In some circles, they have led to him being heralded as a "modern Vardas" - a vigilant investigator who embraces the tools of civilisation rather than those of the wilderness hunter. Pragmatic priests also point to the schools and orphanages across the Empire that Berechiah set up or supported in his life - and claim these are a much more significant and lasting legacy than any amount of books extolling the use of blackmail as a tool of the Vigilant.
- Berechiah made a very public pilgrimage to the White City towards the end of his life. A lifelong supporter of the aspirationalist movement in the Synod, there is little doubt that this was an exceptionally cynical move by a man aspiring to be recognised as an exemplar.
- In a similar vein, several of Berechiah's supporters argued that as nobody had had any past-life vision of being the exemplar he clearly satisfied the sign of liberation - although more as a cynical attempt to demonstrate their opinion as to the foolishness of this sign than any real attempt to prove his exemplarhood.

"Legality is a matter for lesser minds; I am concerned with Vigilance and ensuring that it is upheld. There are few prices too great to pay, and few alleys too dark to explore, when the prize is the Virtue of immortal souls." - From "Necessary Actions of a Virtuous Sinner"

Better world

"Yes, but what is it?" asked Lydia. She adjusted her dress and squatted down next to Jaffo. She pulled off one of her gloves, and somewhat gingerly picked up a handful of the white substance, getting a feel for it, letting the granules sift through her fingers as it fell back into the sack that lay between them. She dusted her hands quickly, wiping the on her crimson skirts leaving a pale residue on the fine fabric.

"As near as I can determine," said the alchemist slowly, "It's a combination of things. There's mithril in there-

Lydia raised her eyes and opened her mouth to ask an excited question but Jaffo shook his head.

"- trace amounts of mithril. A little tempest jade, of all things. Some essential saltes. And something else. I've never seen the like of it, nor has anyone at the Guild. Or anyone else I've been able to talk to. It's mineral, definitely. Crystalline. But other than that..."

"So we have no idea if it will do what the Jarmish claim it will do?" asked Lydia standing up. "Prince Maria will be disappointed."

Jaffo shook his head again, likewise standing. He crossed to the bench where his paraphernalia was laid out.

"No, we're all pretty sure it does precisely what it says on the tin. In water, in a strong mana flow, it will speed the formation of crystal mana. Potentially quite significantly if you have enough of it. The solution reaches a point where its saturation rises above the Crystalline Mean..."

The alchemist noted Lydia's bored expression and choked back his technical explanation.

"Basically, if you use enough of it you can increase the amount of mana you can harvest each season from your average mana site by a little bit more than half. You need to be careful about disposing of the residue, but it's no worse than some of the runoff from the Mestra tanneries, or the copper mines up in the hills. You'd need to use sacks of the stuff for decades and pour it straight into your drinking water, frankly, before it would cause problems"

"And the Jarmish are just giving it away?" Lydia was thoughtful.

Jaffo swallowed, his face creasing with incredulity.

"...giving it away?" he echoed. "By the paragons Lydia, this sack cost me well over a dozen crowns! They are absolutely not 'giving it away'."

Lydia waved his minor monetary concerns away lazily. She walked over to the window and stared out across the river.

"And you're equally certain this is nothing new?"

Jaffo was. "There's an impromptu salon grown up over the last year or so with some of the Jarmish from that lodge out in the sticks. I've been talking with Vasile, claims to be the nephew of Magician-Prince Soreana. He's a very friendly lad, we have a lot in common."

"I'd heard," said Lydia, she turned slightly and arched one eyebrow at her friend.

Jaffo blushed, cleared his throat.

"Anyroadup as they say in Little Whittle, he's been pretty forthcoming about it. The active ingredient is a mineral from the northern mountains, and the Jarmish have been using it for a little over a century and a half. The Boraşova are responsible for a lot of the mining, but there's about a half-dozen Magician-Princes in on the deal to sell it in the Empire. Vasile claims they're all expecting to make money hand over fist. If there's a trick here, I don't think Vasile or the others are in on it."

Lydia pursed her lips and frowned slightly.

"So the last question then is why now? Why right now? Why a fortnight after the Radz make their exciting announcement?"

Jaffo shrugged.

"That sounds like politics to me. I'm just an alchemist. Politics is your department."

Overview

There has been some interesting news coming out of the Principalities of Jarm. In the east, Magician-Prince Barbara Radz of Rigia has made sweeping changes to the laws in her own principality. Changes she is attempting to enforce on the rest of the eastern alliance, a political affiliation of Princes commonly viewed as "upstarts" by the more traditional magicians of the north and south.

Barely three weeks later, one of the more influential princes of the northern faction, Soreana of Boraşova, made a public announcement of her own and set about making supplies of something called beloye zerno (BYEE-el-o-yay zerr-NO) available to Imperial citizens. If this substance is as effective as it seems it could have a dramatic impact on the Empire's economy.

Radical Reforms

At the Autumn Equinox 381YE, Magician-Prince Barbara Radz - the leader of the eastern alliance - addressed the magician-princes gathered at her palace and announced major changes to the laws regarding the ownership of slaves. In her speech she announced that it would now be a crime to kill or mistreat a slave in her principality. Slaves must receive two meals every day and sufficient access to water, or their masters will face penalties as if they had abused a non-magician citizen. And any magician-prince who did not enact similar changes in their own principality would not be welcome in the Eastern Alliance and would have to fend for themselves.

There was, to put it mildly, uproar. Even the House of Princes are cautious about attempting to make sweeping changes to the laws codified centuries ago by Ion Inesca. In Jarm, each individual magician-prince has significant autonomy to determine the rules under which their household and their subjects will live. For Barbara Radz to attempt to force her allies to change their laws - especially in such a dramatic way - is an extremely bold political move.

The claim is that by adopting these enlightened, progressive views she hopes to guarantee the continued support from the Empire in terms of trade and political concessions. But the benefits of this trade are a drop in the ocean compared with the profits that the slave trade brings to Jarm. Even assuming that the deeply unreliable Empire can be counted on to uphold their side of the bargain, it is doubtful whether this will persuade anyone outside her immediate household. As a result, her position is now so precarious that the slightest misstep would undoubtedly bring certain ruin.

The matter was extensively discussed in the House of Princes - the forum where the magician-princes come together to discuss the direction of their own nation. There were a great many raised voices denouncing this act as yet more evidence of Imperial interference in Jarmish politics. But the majority of the princes of the North and South appear to be amused rather than threatened. When questioned on this development, Anton Trescher of the Hidden Hook (primary adviser to the House of Princes on matters of international trade) is reported to have simply said "wait", and shrugged his shoulders.

The Synod

In recognition of the actions and intentions of the Eastern Principalities of Jarm, and the understanding that they continue, to abolish the vile institution of slavery, it would increase the Prosperity of the Empire and its citizens, as well as that of the Eastern Principalities, if Imperial fleet captains were to visit the trading ports of the Eastern Principalities and engage in trade with the traders and merchants there.

Ezekiel of the Chantry, Autumn 381YE, Prosperity assembly, upheld 187-0

During the Autumn Equinox, the Prosperity assembly urged all fleet captains visiting Jarm to trade with Rigia rather than Vezak or Kavor. Under normal circumstances a statement of principle from a virtue assembly has minimal impact, but the events in Jarm create an opportunity.

The Synod recognises the actions of Magician-Prince Barbara Radz in moving to improve the condition of slaves in her eastern alliance. We send (named priest) with 25 doses of liao to urge every Imperial captain intending to visit Jarm to trade with the enlightened people of Rigia, rather than the corrupt slavemasters of Vezak and Kavor.

Synod Mandate, General Assembly

If this mandate is passed by the General Assembly, any Imperial captain visiting Vezak or Kavor over the coming year would see their production reduced by 2 crystal mana. While there would be no immediate benefits to trading with Rigia, if the Empire were to sustain a consistent level of support for the eastern alliance it would go some way towards showing support for Magician-Prince Radz and her radical reforms, as well as being a clear rejection of the backward views of the Northern and Southern princes.

Alternatively, they could express even stronger support for Magician-Prince Radz.

The Synod lauds the action of Magician-Prince Barbara Radz in moving to improve the condition of slaves in her eastern alliance. We send (named priest) with 150 doses of liao to urge every Imperial captain intending to trade with a foreign nation to show their support for these reforms by taking their goods to Rigia rather than any other port.

Synod Mandate, General Assembly

If this mandate were passed by the General Assembly, any Imperial captain visiting any foreign port other than Rigia through the coming year would see their production reduced by 2 ranks. Again, while there would be no additional benefits to trading with Rigia, it is likely that many traders would prioritize the eastern port and provide an even more obvious show of support for Magician-Prince Radz and her radical reforms, sending an overwhelmingly clear message to the Northern and Southern princes. Furthermore, as the mandate is aimed at Imperial citizens, and does not discourage foreign merchants from visiting the Empire to trade, it would not attract any sort of diplomatic repercussions from any nation other than Jarm.

Beloye Zerno

A few weeks after the dramatic announcement of Magician-Prince Barbara Radz, there is an announcement by Soreana of Boraşova, the Magician-Prince of one of the most prosperous of the northern principalities. In conjunction with a number of her fellow northern princes, she has decided to make a small amount of beloye zerno available to traders dealing with the Empire. The import of this announcement is apparent only when someone is able to explain what beloye zerno actually is.

The magician-princes of Jarm use a lot of crystal mana. Part of their success is due to the presence in the mountains of northern Jarm of a rare mineral unknown in the Empire. In its refined form, the mineral appears to be fine white sand with tiny salt crystals - beloye zerno or "white seed". Added water, and with some basic maintenance, it causes mana to crystallise more quickly and creates larger, richer crystals.

Recognising the excellent trade relations between Jarm and the Empire, and after consultation with Anton Thresher, Prince Soreana and her partners - which include Tuernin of Limitu, the principality where the largest temple of the Way in Jarm is located - contacted the traders at the lodge in Tassato. Already familiar with the mana crystal markets of the Empire thanks to their work with the Tassato Mana Exchange, they are in the best position to provide white seed to Imperial magicians. The first shipment of white seed arrived on a heavily armed Jarmish vessel a month or so before the Winter Solstice, and the Jarmish merchants of Tassato are ready to sell this marvellous material to anyone who can meet their very reasonable prices.

The White Seed

Beloye zerno (pronounced very roughly as BYEE-el-o-yay zerr-NO), or "white seed" is a potent substance that can increase the amount and quality of crystal produced by a mana site. The Jarmish have cheerfully made a few small samples of the white seed available to alchemists and magicians eager to reassure themselves that this substance is what it claims to be. Examination via a variety of means has confirmed the properties the Jarmish claim for it. It is somewhat toxic if breathed in in large quantities for long periods of time, and will make a person or animal very ill if they eat it. It requires some care in handling it, once the crystals have formed the water containing the new depleted white seed must be carefully disposed of or risk tainting water supplies near the mana site. There is an upper limit to the amount of mineral that can be deployed each season - and its effects last only for a season.

	Total Money Spent	Additional Crystals
36 rings		1 crystal mana
90 rings		2 crystal mana
162 rings		3 crystal mana
252 rings		4 crystal mana

The White Seed OOC

Anyone who owns a mana site will find a new downtime option available to them after the Winter Solstice. By purchasing and using some of this rare mineral (spending money), they can produce more mana crystals in the same way a mine owner might use their downtime option to produce more materials. Unlike a mine, forest, or herb garden however it is possible to use greater volumes of the mineral to produce more mana crystals - albeit with rather steep diminishing returns.

There is no actual commodity or lammy involved with white seed - to use this option, a character simply ensures they have enough funds in their inventory and selects the appropriate amount on their downtime screen. This material is only useful for improving the production of a mana site on a temporary basis - and only crystal mana at that (it does not help in the production of vis).

It has absolutely no use in alchemy or magic, and while it may make someone ill the sickness it causes can be treated with the purify spell so it is useless as a poison. Furthermore it is pretty clear to everyone who examines it, and the raw material from which it is produced, that this substance is utterly unfamiliar to Imperial scholars. It would be impossible for the Empire to refine their own white seed without access to a source of the raw mineral from which it is made, and nobody has seen anything like it anywhere in the Empire.

Beware my power (Winds of Magic)

"What are you doing?"

Ulysses was mindful and breathed out before answering. "I am looking at the sky."

Iago left his position at the railings and sauntered casually over. He stood just a little too close to the Urizen stargazer, and theatrically shaded his eyes and stared up at the sky. Ulysses found the smell of him - and his wine - quite distracting.

"Why? It's the middle of the night!"

"Because only out here, in the open waters of the Bay, can I see the stars properly."

Iago i Guerra shrugged and gulped down a mouthful of wine, smacking his lips enthusiastically as he did so. It made Ulysses' skin crawl. The Freeborn mariner belched, horribly, and looked pleased with himself.

"Tepid wastrel," muttered Ulysses under his breath.

"What?" Iago looked a little unsteady on his feet, but the stargazer had no doubt who would win if a fight broke out.

"I said 'that's interesting'" he lied. He gestured with his spyglass.

"The Wanderer is in alignment with both the Lock and the Key, while the Spider looks on. That is very significant."

Iago looked disinterested. He peered owlshly at his empty goblet.

"So?"

Ulysses silently recited the virtues in reverse-alphabetical order, then asked:

"What was the first lesson your master taught you?"

Iago furrowed his brow. "I don't remember. I think it was 'Just because you're able to use magic doesn't mean you have to whip your wand out for everything.'"

Ulysses blinked a few times. "How would that even work?" he asked.

Iago shrugged. "He wasn't really talking about magic, if I'm honest. It was a euphemism."

The tall stargazer looked back to the sky.

"The first thing my master taught me was that creation exists between two mirrors. They reflect each other. The heavens reflect the earth, and the earth reflects the heavens. The stars do not shape magic, they represent it. I have no idea what it means but it worries me. Secrets, revelations, watchers ... I am uneasy."

Iago nodded a few times as if he understood what the Urizen was saying and then out of the blue said: "I was turning my cards before we left port, and I noticed the Captain had changed. She has started wearing a mask, a silver one that conceals most of her face. That's not normal. It's only there about half the time, mind. But then last night I went to the theatre and they were playing 'The Incongruous Rationale' and I noticed they had Vassa in a mask. The lad playing her was ... you know the monologue in Act Two?"

"No. I have no idea what you are talking about."

"The monologue in Act Two. All the words were the same, but the emphasis he was putting on them worried me. They did a twist at the end where she wasn't really there and ..."

He shuddered. "Sarvosans are odd people, they are too clever for their own good sometimes. War, military matters, secrets, revelations, watchers. I don't like it"

The Urizen stargazer and the Freeborn dramaturge shared a moment of gloomy camaraderie, and then Iago belched again and Ulysses wrinkled his nose. He closed his spyglass with an audible snap.

"Well, I'm for bed. I'm sure it will all be clearer in the morning."

"Really?" Iago peered at him.

"No." And with that he turned away and stalked toward the stern.

"I might just stay here and look at the stars for a bit," said Iago to nobody in particular. He pulled a flask of Madrigan peach brandy out of his sleeve, and took a swig, gazing upwards at the bright dome of the heavens.

The Tannhauser Gate sped on through the night over a star-scattered sea.

Overview

It would be difficult to miss the powerful shrouds cloaking the night sky across the entire Empire. Likewise, everyone in the Empire - and in several territories on the border - has felt the influence of the powerful enchantment of artistic inspiration woven with Night magic.

In addition to those large-scale effects, there are a scattering of other magical effects that Imperial citizens may be aware of in the run-up to the Winter Solstice. In no particular order then:

Storms and Castles

Nobody in Spiral can miss the massive storms raised by Freeborn magicians that spring up off the coast. Ships travelling through the north-eastern Bay of Catazar are battered and beaten, although it is not entirely clear whether this includes any Grendel navies. It will certainly have had a deleterious effect on any fleet trying to trade out of that war-torn territory. There is also a good chance it has stymied the Asavean vessels bringing white granite to their orc allies in the ruins of Apulian. Indeed, a story is doing the rounds in Ateri that at least one Asavean galley was caught unawares by the storm and smashed to pieces against the southern cliffs.

Likewise, it is difficult to miss the magical fortifications that have risen in the marshes of Kallavesa and woodlands of Necropolis. The Circle of Endless Dark of the Marches, and the Sussivari Frost Coven and Sherard Hunters of Wintermark continue to wield their powerful magic in service of the Empire. Neither territory came under attack from barbarian enemies this season - but if it had, these magical castles would have provided a significant impediment to attacking armies.

Peculiar resonance and the Sentinel Gate

Civil servant magicians examining the Sentinel Gate - the miraculous device that allows Imperial heroes to fight the enemies of the Empire during the solstices and equinoxes - have reported some peculiar experiences when examining it. They can't confirm precisely what is going on, but it seems as if some of the conjunctions of the gate appear to be... odd. Not odd in the sense that they may collapse unexpectedly or anything, but odd in that peculiar and hitherto-unremarked qualities appear to have infused them. For example, one conjunction appears to allow no immediate return through the gate until a second conjunction opens an hour later allowing only a return. They are monitoring the situation and suggest that any magician examining the Sentinel Gate with detect magic, or leading their friends on an adventure with operate portal, take reasonable precautions.

As near as anyone can tell, these perturbations are a secondary effect of the red star falling, and should (with any luck) have abated entirely by the Spring Equinox.

OOO Note

This event some of the conjunctions of the Sentinel Gate will follow slightly different rules than normal. You will always be appraised if the gate is expected to operate in a peculiar fashion when you perform detect magic to examine a conjunction, and the civil service have already quantified and recorded any peculiar effects that may accompany a major conjunction. Out of character, we are using the fall of the red star as an opportunity to run some slightly different formats of quest and battle.

The Rejuvenation of Cinon

Over the last three months, a powerful magical effect from the Spring realm has fallen on the region of Cinon, in Spiral. This magic appears to be quickly rejuvenating the injured, and healing the remaining effects of the unnatural fire that scorched the region last Winter. On the land itself, growth will be promoted and new green life will show. On individuals, old wounds heal and scars fade. There are even a few reports that soldiers injured by the fire that fell in Cinon who are on the other side of the Empire found the burn scars flake away to reveal clear skin underneath!

Unfortunately, as with all Spring magic, the effect was somewhat unpredictable. Most of the ruined spires - including the fire-damaged ruins of Ossen's Spire - were completely overrun by vines and trees, torn apart as if by many decades of natural growth in the space of a season. Significant parts of Damakhan's Forge were also destroyed, though in this case the more intact central parts of the spire were able to withstand the green onslaught - due largely to the efforts of a number of Urizen citizens who spent three months clearing undergrowth and cutting back hungry, destructive overgrowth.

Despite the powerful magic, one small section of Cinon appears to have resisted the healing. A grove of blasted and burnt trees, no more than twenty-feet across, remains devoid of greenery. Magicians who have visited the area suggest that it is infused with the power of Winter magic, and may be a nascent regio tied to the Thrice-cursed Court. A small group of illuminates have committed to keeping an eye on the place, to see what happens.

OOO Note

Any character from Spiral can role-play that they were involved in stopping Damakhan's Forge being overrun by greenery. Apart from the single clearing mentioned above, all sign of the fiery damage from Winter 380YE has been removed and the region is now hale and hearty. However, peripheral damage to Damakhan's Forge has meant that any previous costing for commissioning a runeforge has been rendered obsolete. If the Urizen wish to continue with this project they will need a new costing from the Civil Service.

An Unexpected Number of Babies

It has been roughly nine months since the entire Empire was infused with potent Spring magic. The Hallow of the Green World has long since faded, but the after-effects are still being felt. Occasional patches of Realmsroot are still being uncovered, for example. Perhaps more noticeably there has been a dramatic upswing in the number of children being born to humans and orcs in every Imperial territory. All these children are possessed of a particularly strong constitution - there seems not to be a single sickly child among them. Almost all of the human babies have green eyes - although this does not appear to be the case with the orc babies although they are no less healthy and strong. There is some muttered concern that these children all bear the briar lineage - but given that blood touched by Spring magic almost never reveals itself at birth, there is no evidence to support this. Outside of the most traditional and conservative parts of the Marches and Navarr, it hardly matters.

The Silver Mask

The personae, the ritual foci of the dramaturgical tradition, are mutable concepts. Over the centuries, common names and themes have changed and changed again. The Bishop, for example, was known by another title before the formation of the League, and some say the Servant With Two Masters only really solidified in its current form following the notorious case of Piero of Both Banks in first century Tassato. Now, the eddies have stirred once more.

A new, minor persona of the Captain has emerged - the Silver Mask. It seems Dawnish guiser troupes first came up with the new persona, but the figure is proving popular with dramaturgists across the Empire and, of course, the crowd, who appreciate a good dose of irony to the violent justice in their entertainment. The Silver Mask is appearing with particular frequency in dramaturgy that draws on the purging of the Vyig or the Empire's hostility to the Whisper Gallery as inspirational material, as well as a particularly vindictive play penned by an anonymous playwright from Tassato that speculates on the many horrible ways the notorious Guillermo di Tassato might meet his fate.

Some wide-eyed guisers and playwrights in Dawn and the League are also spinning wilder tales - that the Silver Mask is a persona incarnated in the world, that their stories of devious spies and hidden justice are not mere inventions but born from encounters with a mysterious, masked figure. No two actors can agree on exactly what this Silver Mask looks like, or any meaningful details about them other than they are, apparently, Dawnish. Most serious, sober citizens disregard the whole story as the typical dramatic excess of the actor.

You can find more details about the new minor persona here.

Tamarbode

The region of Tamarbode in Reikos remains under the control of the Spring eternal Llofir. The only part of it that remains accessible to Imperial citizens is the mana site known as Tamar's Toes, and people tasked with gathering the mana have complained of all sorts of rum experiences - being watched by peculiar creatures, their clothes being infested with rusts and moulds, and the brooding sense that if they deviate from the shortest path to and from the mana site there may be trouble. There are also scattered reports that the eerie fortification that rose from the Sign of Tamar itself is still present - a living castle of mushrooms and fungus drawn from the realm of Llofir that seems almost alive.

On the plus side, the servants of Llofir seem to show no interest in leaving Tamarbode, neither to explore Reikos nor to poke around Elerael just over the border in Brocéliande. Both Highborn magisters and Navarr vates agree that whatever else one might say about Llofir, it is interested in the long game.

The Semmerlak

There have been a few problems with the Semmerlak of late but as of the Autumn Equinox they have abated entirely. The waters are placid and remain unseasonably warm. Fisherfolk report bumper hauls, and the citizens who live near the shore experience a delightful "Indian Summer" of warm afternoons and pleasant nights. The odd folk of the waters return, and those enchanters and volhov who speak to them say they are contrite and full of apologies for any recent unpleasantness. As near as anyone can tell, the "Lady of the Semmerlak" has been "rescued by brave and wise folk" from "a dreadful curse". Details are scant, but already storysmiths are beginning to speculate, and create fabulous tales of derring-do - or grim tales of cunning and cleverness, depending on whether one is on the southern or the northern shore.

A Hidden Conjunction

And finally... the stars may be hidden, but that does not mean that there are not adventurous astronomancers prepared to take a boat out into the Bay of Catazar just to get a look at them. The ebb and flow of magic can be sensed by other means as well, manifesting in the unconscious decisions of which plays a dramaturge selects, or the runes that come out of the rune master's bag (in this case, Diras, Sular, and Queros are turning up noticeably more often). Even the practitioners of blood magic can sense the whirling eddies of magical power - blood dripped into water swirls into the shape of a serpent, or gently expands until the entire basin is pale, and red, and opaque.

But it is often easier to use the language of the astronomancer. In the wake of the crimson starfall, three powerful constellations have come into conjunction with the Wanderer. The Key and Lock are in ascendance, and aligned with the Spider. It is reasonably clear that this represents conspiracies and things being hidden - but also things being revealed. Magicians across the Empire have reported subtle shifts in the power of their rituals, and suspect that this careful reweaving of magical power may be reflected in the conjunction.

OOC Note

This conjunction has no immediate effect on any rituals or other magic, but it provides an IC explanation to some of the recent changes to ritual magic as well as the change to the operation of a spy network.

Beyond Apulian's Light

Words and tune by Aneurin Redman-White. PDF here.

Beyond Apulian's Light

Ithamar Legacy

When I was young and scarce eighteen They said I lacked for poise; With book or wand was seldom seen But wine and handsome boys. My parents to my great dismay Did vow to set me right; They said I'd learn my arete Beyond Apulian's light.

Apprenticed to a sailing crew And set aboard in haste, From captain's lips the order flew "There is no time to waste!" They weighed the anchor, shook out sail And soon we were in flight To southward on a summer gale Beyond Apulian's light.

Now as time fled I bolder grew And seasoned in my work; I ran aloft with my ship's crew And would no duty shirk. When Grendel sought our ship to burn We triumphed in the fight I knew that honour I would earn Beyond Apulian's light.

We crossed the ocean unafraid For Asavea bound Where orichalcum, tempest jade, And mazzarine are found. We bargained for their treasures there And to my bed at night I took a slave-magician fair Beyond Apulian's light.

Soon home to Spiral we returned And found within the year My parents' lesson I'd not learned: I bore a daughter dear. But though I've travelled far since then And memories burn bright Her father I've not seen again Beyond Apulian's light.

Bidford Grange

Overview

All our events in 2016 will be held on the land next to Bidford Grange golf course. If the location proves to be a site for our events, then we will look at long term options for running events at the site.

Queries

For all site related queries about Profound Decisions events at Bidford Grange, please contact Profound Decisions, please do not attempt to contact the site.

Site regulations

Vehicles

Turn into the golf course from the large entrance off Stratford Road. The land we are using for the events is next to the golf course, so turn right immediately after you have passed through the gate. Please do not continue down the single track road to the club house. Drive parallel to the hedge, heading towards our reception area, our crew will provide you with further directions from there. If weather conditions are reasonable then vehicles will be allowed on the IC field to unload.

Camping will be operated on our usual "pitch and park" process. The gate team will direct you where to camp and you can then pitch your tent next to your vehicle.

Ground Fires

Fires must not be set on the ground, they must only be lit on the oil drums provided or an equivalent that keeps the fire off the ground. Existing fire sites and should be completely extinguished each night. We are arranging firewood for the site.

Rubbish

Please make sure that all your rubbish is suitably bagged and disposed of in the skip before you leave site. Do not overfill your rubbish bags - more bags are available on request from GOD at any time. The skip is located in the main OOC field. Please ask for directions if you cannot find it.

Binding Threads

Description

The Binding Threads are a weapon and an implement infused with magical power that allows the wielder to root an opponent to the spot. Their use is often accompanied with a great roar. Some wielders make a point of striking the opponent with both the weapon and the implement (usually a rod) simultaneously when they employ its magic.

They are a popular choice with warrior-magicians who work with Imperial magistrates, as well as with a number of wardens and Dawnish war witches who especially appreciate the ability to keep a fast moving or fleeing opponent in place where they and their allies can get to it.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. A pair consisting of a one-handed weapon and either a rod or a wand.
- Requirement: You must have both the ambidexterity and magician skills to bond to these items.
- Effect: You may spend a hero point to call ENTANGLE when you hit with this weapon or implement. You cannot use this ability if you are wearing armour.
- Materials: Crafting the Binding Threads requires seven measures of dragonbone, seven measures of ambergelt and three ingots of green iron. It takes one month to make a pair of these items.

Tassato was crowded, every street awash with revellers, and two brightly costumed actors were taking wine at a street table.

"So: your rod and blade lose their enchantment in...."

"A week. Made just after the Festival last year. And yours?"

"Two months. And between us we have?"

"36 rings and two measures of ambergelt."

"Not the five of ambergelt, three of iridescent gloaming, and Prosperity knows how much dragonbone we need then?"

"No. Nor the six ingots of green iron..."

"That presents a problem..."

"Indeed."

An apothecary's shop, some minutes later.

"My good man, we are but humble actors, who leaven our poor work with minor magics. The leader of our humble troupe was mortified when a critic accused us of wallowing in the the third act of "The Captain, the Chamber and the Coin" Wallowing! Pride damn him! A little short of pace perhaps, but the needs of the magic... Hearing this, our director flew into such a fury, and sent us out into the busy street to fetch such fine materials as are required for a Mantle of the Mountebank."

"A what?"

"You have not heard of it? Why, the most useful of robes for such as ourselves! Once we fetch our wardrobe mistress the requisites she'll run one up in a month, and our Captain's penultimate speech will be a mere minute! Not the two he needs now... Why, the improvement to the scene will be immeasurable!"

"I have not. I'll check, but I have not..."

The apothecary turned and reached for a heavy book, the collected notes of years of study of the craft, and rumours and tales gathered from artisans across Empire.

"No, there's no mention of such a... Ah."

A sharp pain at his kidney, the trademan froze.

"Indeed... Robbery. We may not be actors, but our need is just as great as some crass ham caught butchering a classic. You'll excuse the affront, I hope?"

"Perhaps no masks to be worn in your shop in future? Or may I advise retaining the services of a bravo?" added the other, as he emptied the contents of small drawers, bowls and bags into a sack.

The door shook with three hammering blows as a long-haired woman in the hood of an Imperial thief-taker crashed in.

"Halt in the name of the Empire!"

"Really? Or will it be you who halts..." said one of the robbers as he took guard.

Thrust and parry, riposte and beat. Glassware crashed to the floor and tables of stock were over-turned as the two circled and probed. In a flurry of blows, the advantage of short blade and rod versus long sword in a confined space was clear. With a final balestra and lunge, the thief-taker's defenses were pierced. She stood rooted to the spot, blood oozing from her shoulder.

"Murder is such a foul word, and its penalty so severe... But that's simply a scratch, and with a lead of ten heartbeats? I doubt you'll catch us..."

The other booted the back door of the shop, and the pair were away...

An alleyway, shortly afterwards

Panting a little, the pair removed their masks and stripped off their gaudy outer garments, revealing serviceable leathers underneath. Emptying the sack onto the alley-floor, one counted measures and ingots, while the other unfolded cloaks.

"Do you know, that feels better already. Back to our true selves. Time for a holiday, I believe. Some Company will be hiring, of a certainty. Shall we to a low tavern, the sort frequented by fighters and those who like to think of themselves as such?"

"To start a fight, and see who's watching?"

"Indubitably."

"The Cozido?"

"Indeed!"

Birds and bats

Richard of Holberg took a long pull on the hookah, and almost immediately started coughing. His companion looked concerned, and started to unhelpfully beat him on the back.

"I'm ... I'm alright, I'm alright!" he said between coughs. One of the eerie heralds who ran the place pulled one of the heavy veils aside to check everything was in order. Richard nodded. She let the silken veil fall back into place.

"Are you taking the herbs I got you?" The scaled countenance of his companion creased with something approximating concern.

Richard nodded impatiently. His companion took an impossibly deep lungful of scented steam from his own pipe, and amused himself by blowing out two long bursts through his nostrils.

"It just went down the wrong hole is all."

His companion sniggered, smirking, and slapped his belly with one hand. Richard rolled his eyes.

"So you were saying the Freeborn offered you a deal and it's all their fault?"

The other fellow nodded quickly.

"Mostly their fault. It seemed harmless enough and I've always wanted some. In some ways I'm the victim here." He looked pathetic, but Richard had no sympathy.

"A man died!"

"Yes, I said that. But he wasn't a magician so ... I don't see what the fuss is about."

Richard blinked a few times. His companion seemed oblivious, and helped himself to one of the little twitching larvae on the table, sucking it out of its shell with gusto.

"I ... wait, did you tell them that?" Richard already knew the answer to the question, of course, but a triumph of optimism over experience urged him to ask it anyway.

His companion blinked, apparently surprised by the question.

"Of course! I keep pointing it out to them but they're just ... they're just not listening!"

Richard of Holberg sighed a weary sigh, and set about trying to explain why the Conclave almost certainly were listening, and were entirely right to be less than happy with what they were hearing.

Overview

Over the last few months, there have been communications from the eternal of the Night realm to the magicians of the Empire. In both cases the messages have been delivered through more formal channels to the civil servants who support the Imperial Conclave. Lashonar the chatterer has sent a sonnet to the civil service, apparently announcing a competition involving writing love letters. At the same time the Brother of Wizards has dispatched one of his heralds to politely petition the Empire to grant him a formal parley in the Hall of Worlds.

Chattering Birds

- Lashonar proposes a contest of words.

A chattering bird, one of the heralds of the eternal Lashonar, delivered a sonnet to the civil servants associated with the Imperial Conclave. In poetic languages, it proposes a contest run by Rossignol the Herald, with the enthusiastic support of the Conscience-of-Kings. The contest, it appears, concerns the creation of love letters - a form of expression known to be of particular interest to the eternal.

Accuse me this: That I have left too long since last I made this call. A plea for soft sweet words of love to echo more than song and lift loquacious hearts to quicken every beat.

Anyone who wishes may place their name and location in a "vessel of interest", which will be located in the Hall of Worlds. Rossignol intends to come to Anvil and visit any who leave their names, and discuss the rules and timescales of this competition in person with them. The herald is not expecting to receive - and will ignore - messages that contain anything other than a name and a location at Anvil where that person can be found.

*Once more for thee, Imperials, a contest will I run, to find lines that I approve.
Be it requited, spurned, embittered, blessed all forms are welcome that do true love prove whate'r the style with which they're writ. Yet hold!
One word more. This written love must be real whoso'er is its muse. I, once so bold, writ words that a Terunael queen did feel.
In your hall of worlds a bowl I'll place
each name you leave, I'll seek you face to face*

Rossignol, Herald of the Loquacious One in YE 381

The civil servants expect that the vessel will be present on the Friday night of the Autumn Equinox, and that anyone can put someone's name into the vessel - thus making the competition open to all regardless of whether they are a mage. It is not clear what the consequences might be for putting someone's name forward with malicious intent, but the wise caution against testing the patience of an eternal, even one as relaxed as Lashonar.

Accessibility Info

Lashonar's competition is designed to explicitly reward written communication skills - skill at performance will not be necessary to take part or to win.

Desperate Sloth

The Brother of Wizards, the Father of Bats, the Globberslotch, o Patricio Preto, has made no secret of the fact that he is increasingly distressed by the Empire's decision to remove him from the list of eternals who enjoy the amity of the Empire. A week before the Autumn Equinox, he dispatches a messenger to speak to the civil service. Giving her name as Neora of Spiral, the messenger appears to be a mortal girl of no more than twelve years old, albeit one with a potent naga lineage.

She formally requests the right of parley with the Empire on behalf of the Black Sloth, under the auspices of the Archmage. Her mentor wishes to discuss a number of topics but specifically wishes to talk about an opportunity to save the Halls of Knowledge from the Druj.

If there is any time after that, he also politely requests an opportunity to offer a minor boon to the Imperial magicians - specifically over the years he has provided a number of rare items to Imperial magicians to help them with their magic. Should the Empire consent to offer him a parley, he would like to offer the opportunity to have such items reforged or restored in power as appropriate (although Neora indicates that there may be a little quid pro quo involved).

He would also like to discuss "the location of a certain weirwood tree" with anyone who might have information about it, and what kind of boon they might ask in return for disclosing this information.

Finally, in the event that a formal parley is granted him, she mentions that this would be a perfect opportunity for the tea houses interested in the legacy of the Dark Moon to discuss that matter with him.

it is rare, but not unknown, for an eternal to request a parley without responding to a plenipotentiary message. The final decision rests with the Archmage of night. Should they wish to offer the parley, they should let the civil service know, and dispatch a Missive for Sadogua to let the Brother of Wizards know. The time suggested for the parley is half past ten on Saturday night - assuming that the Imperial Conclave has concluded its business by then - or immediately afterwards if not.

Resolution

Sadogua received an invitation to a parley with the magicians of the Empire, which took place on Saturday night in the Hall of Worlds. Precisely what was discussed remains a matter between the eternal and the magicians present, but shortly after the Winter Solstice the Halls of Knowledge vanished from Zenith under mysterious circumstances. This may have been the result of an arrangement with the Father of Bats, or due to some machination of the Druj.

Birth of a Nation

Follow this link to hear a recording File:Birth of a nation 56.mp3.

And the wind and the rain, They still whisper his name, And the name that they whisper....

Deep in the wildland, Placed by a cold hand, A tribe of the heartland, A world far away. The forest surrounds them And virtues have found them, They drink from the fountain, On the noon of the day.

And the wind and the rain, They still whisper his name, And the name that they whisper.... Is Thrace 2x

I hear voices singing, And fires are burning, The young they are learning, From the Elders of the Tribe, The brands they are lifted, And names they are gifted, And the initiated, Are welcomed inside.

And the wind and the rain, They still whisper his name, And the name that they whisper.... Is Thrace 2x

Many orcs they have fallen Shaman's lamentation, But their memories still wander, Within our kindred hearts, I feel their eyes on me, Their spirits will still be, Here for all to see, Through circles of time.

And the wind and the rain, They still whisper his name, And the name that they whisper.... Is Thrace 2x

We won our Freedom The shackles they are broken For the Empire we're fighting The army's our home For many years we drifted But then lands were gifted A new nation's born With worth in our hearts

And the wind and the rain, They still whisper his name, And the name that they whisper.... Skarsind

Bishop

Introduction

Bishops represent the clergy and religious leaders of League society. They have embraced the truth and power of The Way and the Imperial Synod. Each has a church and is responsible for the spiritual guidance of a congregation of lay citizens, as well as playing an active part in the Synod.

- 4 Playing a bishop

Religious Heritage

Religious heritage in the League is both derived from, and a rebellion against, the more inflexible and stuffier approaches of Highguard's chapters and wayfarers. Whilst still respecting, and recognising, the importance and reality of Virtue, the bishops of The League understand the importance and reality of power too.

There are many routes an individual may take to become a bishop. For some, they simply follow in the footsteps of their parents with their congregations learning to respect their wisdom, much as they have done for generations before. Other more entrepreneurial bishops have invested in a location, perhaps having identified a holy place or relic, and used their charisma and connections to draw a congregation to that location. Some such bishops are even given support by a guild.

Regardless of how the status is attained, it is fiercely and jealously guarded. Bishops understand that perception is everything, and so many ensure to present themselves in the finest manner, with civility and style - though of some bishops it has been said that their compliments can sometimes cut more deeply than a bravo's blade. In the sea of the imperial faith, the bishop is a shark.

*If you give me six lines written by the hand of the most honest of folk,
I will find something in them which will hang them.*

Bishop Armand of the League Assembly

Creating a bishop

Bishops are powerful and influential figures who are responsible for the spiritual leadership of congregations of League citizens. The best way to play a bishop is to select a religious downtime resource which will represent a church, tomb, pilgrimage site or other holy location wherein the bishop can administer guidance and direction to the laity. These congregations can be in any part of the League, even if the bishop elects to travel extensively leaving day-to-day matters to junior clerics.

There is no actual requirement for a bishop to know any of the liao ceremonies, as such rituals are not actually required to give sound counsel. Some bishops elect to sell the liao allocated to their holy site so that they may use the funds to further the worth of the faith in more practical ways. Others find that the liao ceremonies are an important part of exerting social pressure.

Bishops may operate alone or as part of a larger group. Within a group of bishops, one or more is usually nominated as their leader or spokesperson given the title of archbishop. Such groups may also include junior priests, who know liao ceremonies but have no congregation, as well as other League folk who have dedicated their lives to The Way.

A Bishop may choose to graciously grant their patronage to a guild or a free company, though never as a common member or bravo. Doing so is usually a calculated act. Such a patronage can enhance the status and reputation of both the group and the bishop, provided that the conduct of each reflects well on the other.

Playing a bishop

For a bishop of the League, perception and reputation are important concerns. The clergy of the League are no less competitive than any bravo or merchant prince, but success is measured by profile and influence. A celebrated bishop is far more likely to be asked to conduct a state funeral or be consulted by senators. Yet, for all that they are a prominent part of a Faith that extols individual Virtue, bishops of the League are perhaps more likely than most to take a pragmatic approach to the Virtues, accepting that - sometimes - the ends justifies the means.

It is possible to play a less-competitive bishop with no interest in politics, machinations and status. Such bishops are important to the more politically-minded and may be courted for the support and resources they can provide. After all, a bishop who commands the attention of other bishops, whether courting or courted, must indeed be a force to be reckoned with.

For inspiration of figures who have walked the tightrope of religious credibility with political acumen and ruthlessness, some good examples are Jeremy Irons' portrayal of Rodrigo Borgia, various interpretations of Cardinal Richelieu from The Three Musketeers, and Abbot Hugo from the Robin of Sherwood TV series.

Bishop's Chalice

Description

A Bishop's Chalice most often takes the form of an ornate goblet, although versions in the shape of bowls or basins are not uncommon. Regardless of the precise shape, it is generally kept full of liquid - purified water, fruit juice, and spirits are all popular choices. It can be used by a priest familiar with the ceremony of dedication to reach out to members of their sect and inspire them with a renewed sense of purpose. In the process of invoking a Bishop's Chalice, both the priest and the members of the sect must be in a consecrated area. In places such as Anvil the Chalice is typically kept in a carefully consecrated shrine, sometimes on open display and sometimes secured in a locked chest. During use, the Chalice is used as part of a sermon - and indeed many sects use their Bishop's Chalice in all ceremonies, especially ceremonies of anointing.

This item obviously takes its name from the League, where it is associated with both wealthy sects and religiously-minded Free Companies. The other nations tend to have their own names for this reliquary, such as the Stormcrow's Bowl in Wintermark or the Troubadour's Goblet in Dawn, or a Font of Purity in Highguard where it often takes the form of a shallow bowl used for ceremonial washing. Not all nations are equally likely to craft this item in the form of a cup, however. In Urizen an Illuminated Flame more commonly takes the form of a brazier or lantern in which an eternal flame or beautifully crafted lightstone burns eternally. In Varushka, the reliquary is much more likely to take the form of a sculpture or triptych representing virtuous animals of particular significance to the sect which is used to illustrate parables and stories told during religious services.

Rules

- Form: Reliquary. Takes the form of a ceremonial reliquary.
- Effect: If a member of the sect with the dedication skill uses this reliquary in a consecrated area as part of a religious ceremony then after ten minutes of appropriate religious roleplaying any member of the sect who was present throughout may regain all their spent hero points. You may only gain this benefit once per day - any additional uses of a Bishop's Chalice after the first have no affect on you. This ability cannot be used on a battlefield or in a similar stressful environment. You cannot benefit from this item if you are under an effect that prevents recovery of hero points overnight (such as Dreamscape of the Endless Hunt and similar curses).
- Materials: Crafting a Bishop's Chalice requires seven ingots of orichalcum, five ingots of green iron, and nine measures of dragonbone. It takes one month to make one of these items.

Bishop's Ensemble

Description

The Bishop's Ensemble is a suit of magical clothing infused with a little of the power of the dramaturgical persona of the Bishop. A ritual magician who wears this clothing can draw on the power it contains to empower their ability to perform Day magic. In addition to providing additional magical power, the robes also infuse the wearer with some of the personality of the Bishop.

As the Prince represents temporal power, so the Bishop represents the power of the spiritual realms. The dramaturgical persona represents questions of morality and ethics, and of the motivations that move men and women. The Bishop possesses keen insight and unassailable judgement, and this magical garment is infused with a little of that ethereal potency. In addition, the power woven into the threads of the Bishop's Ensemble strengthens and extends the critical faculties of the wearer, supporting their ability – and will – to offer profound advice to those who need it. A magician girded in the guise of the Bishop will rarely falter in the pursuit of what they know to be right.

A trained ritual magician bonded to the robe can touch the essence of the Bishop and draw on additional strength when working Day magic. With the insight and discernment of the persona enhancing and supporting their own, they can weave much more potent effects either by themselves or as part of a coven.

The garment itself tends to suggest both authority and spirituality. The cloth – woven from fine linen and wool – is repeatedly bleached in vats of beggar's lye until even the tiniest impurity is removed. Moonsilver and sungold threads are used to embroider the outer robe with symbols of spiritual power – often the Labyrinth, the wheel, or iconography of the seven Virtues (especially Wisdom and Vigilance).

While the standard design is clearly patterned after the vestments of the bishops of Tassato and Sarvos, the decorations are carefully chosen to represent the spiritual symbols of the wearer. For example, a Bishop's Ensemble crafted for a Varushkan magician might replace the common iconography with images of the virtuous animals, and substitute a striking crimson cloth for the under-robe. Likewise, a robe woven for an Urizen magician might eschew the symbols of the Way in favour of designs reflecting the imagery of the sun and moon, or an intricate web of seed pearls and weltsilver thread.

House Bourné produces a popular alternate design they have dubbed the Seer's Ensemble. It abandons the more usual gold-and-white colour scheme in favour of a deep blue cloth patterned with curving weltsilver lines reminiscent of sunlight on water – a design that has obvious Asavean influences and has allegedly proved quite popular in the Brass Coast.

Rules

- Form: Armour. Takes the form of a robe. You must be wearing this robe to use its magical properties.
- Requirement: You must have the magician skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: Once per day you may use this robe to gain two additional ranks of Day Lore for the purposes of performing a single ritual, subject to the normal rules for effective skill.
- Roleplaying Effect: While wearing this robe you feel an urge to root out corruption and weakness.
- Materials: Crafting a Bishop's Ensemble requires five ingots of orichalcum, twelve ingots of weltsilver, seven measures of dragonbone, seven measures of beggar's lye, and nine measures of iridescent gloaming. It takes one month to make one of these items.

OOO Note

This is one of six sets of ritual robes designed by House Bourné, a Sarvosan guild formed by the union of League master-artisans and a Dawnish weaver cabal. Their unique designs combine the power of dramaturgy with a deep understanding of the hearth magic of girding. During Winter 380YE, in conjunction with popular publication The Looking Glass, the Merchant-Prince Genia Bourné di Sarvos announced that the guild would allow any Imperial artisan to visit their estate in Sarvos and study the schemata detailing the six raiments, free of charge.

Any character can learn how to create this raiment following the normal rules - either by selecting the robe as one of their starting items, or learning it as an extra item pick. The only restriction is that anyone who knows how to make one of these robes must have spent a week or two studying at House Bourné in Sarvos - there is currently no other way to master the patterns which remain the proprietary knowledge of the Bourné guild.

Biting Blade

Description

A Biting Blade is a respectable weapon that grants additional power to a skilled soldier, as well as offering the ability to strike a significant blow to an individual who is not a professional warrior. The weapon is sometimes simply referred to as an Orichalcum Blade or (in the poetry of Wintermark) a Dawnfire Blade or Duskfire Blade in reference to the slight reddish tinge to the metal produced by alloying orichalcum with steel.

The Biting Blade is the weapon many common folk think of then they think of a traditional 'magic sword.' Artisans in Wintermark especially like to inscribe the rune Jotra on a biting blade, and Dawnish crafters often shape the pommel into the head of a gryphon or engrave one onto the blade directly.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of a one-handed weapon.
- Requirement: Any character can bond to this item.
- Effect: Once per day, you may call CLEAVE with this one-handed weapon.
- Materials: Crafting a Biting Blade requires seven units of orichalcum. It takes one month to make one of these items.

The ragged stranger watched as the Steinr smiths completed their long forging, the chant rising and falling as they hammered at the hot metal one last time. Sing-song voices echoed strangely around the forge as the golden-red rays of a winter's sun sank slowly behind the mountains.

*"Red the fires of the forge
Red the blade and red its thirsts
Red the wine that it drinks so deep
Red the mouths that it opens wide
Red the dying light of day
Red its dreams"*

With one last chorus of hammer-strikes the blade was gathered up in tongs and a great cloud of steam rose up with a hissing noise into the dusk air. A few more moments of examination and testing and the Steinr women turned to the stranger, offering the fruit of their long labours. The eldest smith spoke for them all, "The debt is settled, outlander, you have your blade. Make no mistake, we have felt this one's skein - it is a crow-feeder, a widow-maker, a flesh-cutter and a spiller of blood. Bond yourself to this, and you'll know nothing but strife for the rest of your days."

The ragged man leaned forward and took the blade in one scarred hand. Even with an unwrapped hilt and before cleaning and sharpening, he fancied he could feel the proficiency of murder this thing represented - a yearning toward mayhem and death. He hissed a breath inwards through his remaining teeth. Oh yes, this would do most excellently for his revenge...

Black Iron Blade

Rules

Winter Magnitude 2

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets a character or item which must be present throughout.

The ritual must include the use of an edged weapon or tool used to cut the target character or item.

Effects

This ritual breaks bonds in the same way as the create bond spell. The ritualist must touch the target item or character. The ritual severs any or all bonds connected to the target at the discretion of the casters.

Additional Targets

This ritual can affect additional targets. The magnitude increases by one for every additional target. All targets must be present throughout.

Additional Magnitude

When the ritual is performed on a single target, the magnitude can be increased to overcome effects that prevent the destruction of a bond, such as Riddle Hides the Reward or certain curses. If the magnitude of Black Iron Blade is at least equal to the magnitude of the effect, the bond is severed. This use of the ritual may permanently remove some cursed bonds, but is generally insufficient to remove more powerful and enduring effects. For example, an item that by its nature makes it hard to sever a bond created to it will not lose that property if a bond is severed with Black Iron Blade. When the magnitude of the ritual is increased and all bonds are targeted, the ritual severs any bond to the target that is the same or lower magnitude.

Description

This ritual allows a magician or coven to simultaneously sever large numbers of bonds. It is sometimes used to dissolve an oathbound band, or to remove several characters simultaneously. While it is moderately expensive, at the point where it is necessary to cut five or more bonds at the same time it begins to become more appealing.

The ritual can also prove effective at dissolving bonds that cannot easily be cut in the traditional way. Certain shrouds, such as Riddle Hides the Reward can be negated through the use of Black Iron Blade provided it is performed at sufficient magnitude to overcome the power of the curse. The ritual has also proved effective when dealing with certain cursed items (and even artefacts) where destroying the item with Words of Ending was considered less than ideal. Genuinely cursed items that resist attempts to cut the bond created to them are thankfully rare but not unknown.

Common Elements

This ritual always involves a small cut or nick to the target, which is highly symbolic of the severing of the bond. Anything that cuts or unravels is also appropriate. Some ritualists tie a cord, ribbon or thread between the target and the item to be unbonded, and then ceremonially cut it at the climax of the spell. Others require the target to cast the item away, over their shoulder, or into a basin of water. Considering that any magician can perform create bond, mastery of this ritual is comparatively rare.

The rune Yoorn, especially when inscribed on shears, is a common element of this ritual. The name of the Eternal Kaela may be evoked, especially when cutting the bond between a cursed object and an individual - some magicians prefer to evoke the name of Wise Rangara, and symbolically unravel the bond rather than cutting it directly.

A song written by Nicassia of Phoenix Reach after the first skirmish to the Black Plateau, Spiral, in YE377.

Through the gate and here we go, Up, up to the Black Plateau, With courage and pride to face the foe, High up on the Black Plateau.

There is a place in Urizen fair, Up, up to the Black Plateau, Where whispering voices fill the air, Those who tread should tread with care, Don't trust what you hear on the air, High up on the Black Plateau.

Gathered people, wild and cruel, Up, up on the Black Plateau, They'll laugh in your face as they run you through, High up on the Black Plateau.

There is a place in Urizen bold, Up, up on the Black Plateau, Where wild men worship something old, The sight of it will leave you cold, They'll take your blood to feed its soul, High up on the Black Plateau.

Blades of venom, blades of glass, Up, up to the Black Plateau, Will stop you if you try to pass, High up on the Black Plateau.

There is a place in Urizen high, Up, up to the Black Plateau, Where they've got blades to warp your mind, An anger unknown to our kind, Don't lash out or get left behind, High up on the Black Plateau.

Through the gate and here we go, Up, up to the Black Plateau, With courage and pride to face the foe, High up on the Black Plateau.

Black and white

"Because it would be illegal." said Ana, deftly hiding the fact that she wasn't sure whether it in fact was illegal or not.

Peter of Hintown looked down at his bowl of soup and said nothing. He may have made the discovery, but he was not getting between the Winterfolk.

"What do we do when we tell them about our find and the damn Senate takes it away from us and gives it to the damn orcs!" Bellowed Ulan.

"They can't do that," said Jeorg reasonably, stirring the fire.

"Well then they'll give it to the damn League!" Ulan jabbed his spoon vaguely southwards. Here on the edge of Tsirku, almost very direction counted as "south"

Peter opened his mouth to say something and then thought better of it. He sighed, and added another pinch of herbs to his sealmeat stew. He was actually beginning to wish he'd never found the thing now. It was so much easier when they were just looking at troll artifacts and dodging ... whatever it was that they'd been attacked by in the cave. He shuddered, remembering the stink of its breath and the immense bone-crunching jaws gaping on either side of his terrified head. He started to catalogue the things he would not miss when he was safely back in the Marches. He never imagined he would be nostalgic for the Feni-haunted drowned ruins of Bregasland ... but he was. At least they were warm.

His companions continued to argue, huddled together in the yurt on the edge of the wasteland. Peter nursed his broken arm and felt sorry for himself. He laid back on his cot and listened to the sounds outside - to the occasional cry from the penguins and the lapping of the waves. He drowsed a little and fancied he could hear the great ice wall itself creaking and groaning. Singing him to sleep.

Privately he wished he had taken the other route through the caves near the glacier. Not just because of the ... the thing ... that had tried to maul him. If they had gone left, his arm would not be broken and Rickon would never have spotted the metal veins and Jeorg would never have confirmed it was bloody ...

Now, there would probably be more arguments, and then the Face of Ikka would be crawling with miners and prospectors. The chances of finding anything more in the tunnels down near the great lake would fade and melt away like ... he groped for a suitable analogy. An ice cube in a furnace?

He felt his eyes filling with water, and dashed them away with his good arm. As Ulan continued to try (ineffectively) to sway the others to a crazed plan in which they kept the find to themselves, he pulled out a square of parchment and continued to pen the first of his letters back to civilisation.

"... While I have yet to confirm my hypothesis with regard to the relationship between the Thule invasion and the Trolls, we do appear to have found a sizeable deposit of raw mithril"

Overview

Peter of Hintown - the civil servant responsible for compiling a historical research document on the rune forge in Gildenheim has been provided with sufficient funds to perform a follow-up investigation in Sermersuaq. While exploring the Face of Ikka for troll artifacts, he and his expedition have made a fortuitous discovery - a vein of unworked mithril in caves near the glacier.

The civil servant is still composing his report on the troll ruins, but the vein of mithril has caused immediate interest. Experts have been dispatched to examine the fine and have confirmed that all their preliminary observations suggest that there is indeed a significant mithril deposit in the absolute farthest north, where the great glacier grinds into the waters on the borders between Tsirku and the Empire.

Obviously, magical divination cannot determine much about the extent of the deposits, and the location of the find raises significant issues with exploiting it.

Significance

The preliminary investigation suggests it will be very expensive for the Empire to exploit this resource.

Construction

Exploiting the mithril find would require a motion of the Senate, and a significant investment in materials and labour. It is estimated that for an initial outlay of 100 Thrones, a mining operation could be established on the edge of Suaq Fount in six months time. All things being equal, the first mithril would be produced in time for the Autumn Equinox. The expectation is that the mine would provide 10 wains of mithril every season for the foreseeable future.

For a more significant outlay of 200 Thrones (total), and a total of nine months of work, more extensive workings could be established. This would produce 15 wains of mithril every season. These deeper delvings would begin producing mithril in time for the Winter Solstice 380YE. It would be possible to establish the basic mineworkings and then expand them later, but doing so would take six months unless the mine were shut down completely for a minimum of three months.

Prospecting

It may be possible to expand the workings even further, but it is impossible at this time to be sure - only the presence of a significant number of skilled miners will be able to determine exactly how rich this mithril find might be. A party of prospectors familiar with mithril formations and the difficulties of working in the far north could be dispatched at a cost to the Senate of 10 Thrones.

The Bourse Seat

Exploiting this mithril find would obviously create a Seat on the Imperial Bourse. When - if - it produces its first load of mithril the Imperial Senate would need to determine if it is to be Imperial or National. An Imperial Bourse Seat could be held by any Imperial citizen; would be subject to an open auction; and the money bid would be paid into the Senate treasury.

As the territory of Sermersuaq is part of Wintermark, if the seat is made National it would automatically be allocated to that nation. It would create a national seat, and the well-worn path would be for it to be appointed through the Bourse by vote of the captains of Wintermark.

As with all other mithril seats, this seat would appointed or auctioned at the Autumn Equinox. If the seat is completed earlier or later than Autumn 380YE, the first holder of the seat will obviously have a shorter tenure.

Difficult Situations

There are two potential problems with this seat which might need to be addressed.

Firstly, its proximity to Jotun and Thule lands cannot be understated. The Empire is already at war with the Jotun, and in the event of a renewal of hostilities with the Thule it would come under immediate threat. Peter of Hintown and his Suaq advisor, the architect Ana, have both sent strongly worded recommendations that the Empire consider building a fortification in the Suaq Fount to help protect the new mithril resource (and in Peter's case, the historical artifacts of the Face of Ikka).

Secondly, the mine stands on the very northern edge of the Empire in an area known from troll ruins and exotic artifacts. If any horror emerged from T'sirku, or from within the glacier, then the mithril mine would almost certainly be straight in its path

Resolution

During the Winter Solstice, the Imperial Senate commissioned the construction of a mithril mine in the cold wastes of Sermersuaq. Senator Atte provided 200 Thrones to the civil service, and work has begun on the new mine. It is projected to be completed in time for the Autumn Equinox 380YE assuming nothing goes wrong.

No provision was made for a fortification, and there was no motion of prospecting at this time - although this would remain an option going forward.

Blackest night

Sveta tried to shift the nervousness she felt at calling the others together. As the youngest member of the cabal by, she was always conscious that her wisdom lacked a quality that age would bring. But the news she bore was so extraordinary - so dire - that the others needed to hear it as soon as possible. She cleared her throat to get everyone's attention before speaking.

"The red star is definitely drawing closer. I've checked and rechecked the measurements with Ognjen's telescope three times now. I've even tried completely re-calibrating the device - the results are the same each time. It will hit the Empire - and soon. It will strike... somewhere in Miekarova."

The room fell silent for a moment, and then immediately filled with the buzz of voices as every member of the cabal began to talk at once. Wise Ognjen, whose telescope she had borrowed held up his hands for silence. Once he had the room's attention he asked Sambor, the Night Witch to confirm the findings.

"I cannot be certain where the star will fall, but fall it certainly will. But... nothing I have discovered contradicts what little Sveta has said."

Ognjen nodded his head sagely, considering the witch's words for a moment. "Very well, I think it would be best if you continue to borrow the Urizen Day Lens, Sveta, and continue your studies. Perhaps as the thing draws closer you can discover where in Miekarova it will land. But remember to heed my warnings - do not use the lens to view the star itself - all the news suggest that that is very dangerous."

Sveta started at Ognjen trying to make sense of his calm. She shook herself and tried to find the words to convey the scale of the problem "This star is huge - vast - when it falls... the impact will be... devastating - surely we must do something! We must work some magic - something powerful enough to avert this catastrophe!" Someone was chuckling - Sambor - of course it was Sambor - it was always him.

"A wonderful idea young Sveta, very appealing. We can all be heroes I'm sure. Just two small problems. One... the star is going to fall in Miekarova so any magic would have to be done there - not here in Karsk. And secondly..." Sambor stopped and smiled in a way that made Sveta painfully aware that she was going to get another of his patronizing lectures. "... secondly... the star is going to fall in Miekarova - not here in Karsk - and that makes it their problem... not ours."

"But wherever this star falls it will devastate the entire region! Hundreds - maybe thousands of people could die."

Sambor began to heckle her again but Ognjen silenced him with a gesture. "Child there is always something wrong with the world... Some war, some disaster, some famine. But there are lots of very capable cabals in Miekarova, Sveta, someone will do something - they always do - and it will be fine. Our job here is to look after the vales of Moresvah, not to go solving the problems of the world."

And with that, the matter was over and they moved on to more other discussions - a curse had been found on the cows that grazed on the Malinov lands and there was a suggestion that a sinister volhov may be behind it. Apparently one of the herd had born a calf with two heads...

Overview

Towards the end of last year, astronomancers from several observatories in Urizen, Varushka, and the Brass Coast reported sighting a new star. constructed a device they were confident would allow them to get a closer look at the star

By all accounts, things did not go well. There are many confused reports of events but rumours say that the spire has fallen and the all the magicians there are now dead, allegedly as a direct result of their attempts to get a closer look at the ominous red star. Meanwhile, the star continues to grow. Where once it was a pinprick of barely visible light, it began to shine as brightly as any other star.

The star is not visible in all parts of the Empire; that alone suggests that powerful magic is at work here. It can be seen in the northern sky over Sermersuaq, Hercynia; in Wickmoor and Sandling in Weirwater; in Northspires and Bruckland in Hahnmark; and over the whole of Varushka. It is even clearly visible in Skarsind - although it is the only thing other than the moon that is visible in the skies over the homeland of the Imperial Orcs. The sky there remains as empty of stars as it was before the Spring Equinox.

Even in places where it can be seen, however, it is low to the northern horizon, seeming to dance just above the peaks of the great mountains that separate the northern Empire from the lands of the Thule. With a month to go before the Summer Solstice, reports from the north say that it is still easily hidden behind an upraised thumb. It has "only" grown to the size of an apple-pip. Still, this is sufficient to spread its baleful red glow across a quarter of the northern horizon, brighter even than the rainbow lights that dance in the night sky in the coldest winters.

Every divination points to the same thing - the star is falling - and it is going to strike the Empire - almost certainly somewhere in Miekarova. If it lands in an important region the destruction and loss of life is likely to be appalling.

Significance

The nameless red star has detached itself from the Wanderer. It remains reasonably static in the night sky now (it is not visible during the day... not yet at least). It continues to exert a baleful influence on the Empire - and if it does crash to the ground then it will devastate the region it hits.

Magic and the Nameless Red Star

Whatever region of Miekarova is hit by the comet will be utterly devastated. Most resources that are hit will be destroyed - and if there are any significant settlements there then many people will die. However, regardless of where it hits, the comet is likely to rain destruction across a wide area as it breaks up. As a result every resource in the territory that is currently improved beyond level one will permanently lose a level from the destruction caused by the comet.

At present it is not known what region in Miekarova will suffer, though that is likely to become clearer as the star draws closer. The magic of Day, and Night can both be used to attempt helpful divinations. Several individuals have already attempted to use Signs and Portents in the hope of learning more - although they will not be drawn on the specifics of what they have seen, generally shunning the company of those who attempt to push them for more information.

As the star draws closer, then it may come within range of ritual magic before it falls to earth. Influencing the movement of the star would fall within the purview of Autumn magic - assuming it is possible to a powerful enough ritual could be accomplished. If it is anything like those stars that fall in the Summer months, falling to earth is a function of its essential nature and no force of magic can gainsay that quality.

Regardless, rituals to divine its path or potentially shift that path do not exist in Imperial Lore. In the absence of a ritual text, Imperial magicians must fall back on more spontaneous magics. Any ritual to affect the star would almost certainly have to be performed in Miekarova - or at the Anvil regio.

The Influence of the Nameless Red Star

As before, if your character suffers from any sort of mental or emotional ailment, they may choose to have that condition intensify during the coming event. Any lineaged character may also wish to review the section on the wiki regarding roleplaying their lineage, with particular regard to the final bullet point on "descent into madness".

Other Celestial Phenomena

The Absent Phoenix

The astronomantic constellation of the Phoenix has continued to fade. It is now almost impossible for Imperial scholars of the stars to see the constellation in the night sky. Oh, the stars are still present of course - but even when they are looking straight at them, or comparing the night sky to an astronomantic diagram, the constellation itself is impossible to make out.

It is extremely hard to explain what the Phoenix constellation represents. Every Imperial character is under the effect of a peculiar roleplaying effect: it is extremely difficult to remember or express the meaning or importance of the Phoenix, or to evoke its power in magic, without relying on a source of spiritual strength.

Among the mundane population, it has reached the point where some have forgotten that there ever was a constellation called "the Phoenix", or that the magical law that it embodied ("things learn") was part of astronomantic lore.

The Empty Skies

The "empty sky" phenomenon observed last season appears to be spreading. Where previously it was restricted to Skarsind and Holberg, the effect is now felt over Necropolis, Bregasland, and Segura.

By day, nothing appears different; but by night, nothing can be seen in the sky save the moon, the clouds, and (in Skarsind) the crimson star. Magicians are at a loss to explain what is happening; the Empire is familiar with the Penumbra Veil of course - but that ritual warps the skies, it does not empty them. The eerie, empty skies exert an unsettling influence over those who spend too much time studying them.

Furthermore, any character of the naga lineage who has spent extensive time in any of these five territories over the last season will find that their natural urge towards subtlety and secretiveness is greatly strengthened. Naga in general relish being mysterious and secretive, but those who have spent an extended period beneath the inky black skies of the League city or the new homelands of the Imperial Orcs may actually need to make a significant effort of will to answer direct questions or be honest about their intentions.

Resolution

The red star continues to grow bigger, and the phenomenon of the empty skies continues to spread. By contrast, the fading of the Phoenix constellation has been reversed and it is now once again plainly visible in the sky. You can learn more about these events here.

Blacksmith's Wage

Description

The haft of this useful weapon is polished with ambergelt, and coloured with iridescent gloaming. Often it is reinforced with rings of orichalcum alloy, that occasionally seem oddly warm to the touch. The weapon has no particular puissance in combat, but "heals" itself when it is damaged. No matter how old, the weapon tends to look much as it did when it was first forged. Casual wear and tear from use vanishes overnight, and if the weapon sustains more catastrophic damage - if it is broken apart by a magician or rendered into pieces by a savage ogre - it can restore itself completely provided the wielder wants it enough. The ability of the weapon to repair itself gives it its common name, as it takes a blacksmith's wage, because a warrior need not buy a new weapon when this one is damaged, nor pay anyone else to repair it for them.

Some artisans craft the head of a Blacksmith's Wage to resemble the rune Pallas, but more often the rune is simply marked on the haft near the base. Likewise, the rune Xun is sometimes used to form the head of a pole-axe, or inscribed on the metal, and traced when the magic inherent in the weapon is evoked.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of a polearm. You must be wielding this weapon to use its magical properties.
- Requirement: You must have the weapon master skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: You may repair this polearm by expending a hero point and spending at least five seconds of uninterrupted appropriate roleplaying involving handling the weapon. This ability fails if you are hit or attack another character during spellcasting, or if the weapon is hit or used to make an attack.
- Materials: Crafting a Blacksmith's Wage requires nine ingots of orichalcum and six ingots of ambergelt. It takes one month to make one of these items.

The clash and clamour of battle seemed distant now, faded to just a dull hubbub across the slithering morass that surrounded Alfonzo. He cursed as his boots slipped and squelched through the muck, blade gripped tightly in one hand while the other fumbled for support against a wet-barked, leaf-bare tree that poked sullenly out of the marsh.

Lazzaro couldn't have gone far. The captain's breastplate lay discarded at the tree's base, filthy water pooling across the ornate curlicues embossed onto its surface. Alfonzo sneered and regained a little bit of his bravo's swagger, despite the mud seeping into his boots; Lazzaro's famous armour, was now just another piece of rusting detritus abandoned to the wet dirt. It felt fitting, given what was going to happen next.

When the Free Company's retreat on the flank had turned into a full-scale rout, Alfonzo had felt the weight of the hallowed amulet of Ambition against his chest – a gift from Orsino, his uncle and his priest, that had come with an admonition to seize opportunity by the throat and never look back at what might have been. So he'd run after Lazzaro as fast as he could, even as the pursuing orcs snarled and roared and hacked at those lagging behind, with the idea set in his head that now was his chance. He'd make an opening for his own advancement and get payback for Lazzaro's insults, all in one stroke – and all hidden amidst the chaos and confusion of the rout.

He'd shouted to Lazzaro, watched the captain turn and slow his pace for a moment, letting Alfonzo catch up. As they drew level, Alfonzo had swung his own enchanted blade with all his might. Long months of saving his pay were worth it; he felt the sword vent its own roiling anger into the glaive that Lazzaro hastily swept up to block, and then that weapon's etched wooden haft had splintered apart, reducing it to so much kindling wood.

It was then that Lazzaro had surprised him, sprinting off with the glaive's wreckage gripped tightly against his chest – but not running towards the distant bridge and its promise of safety. Instead, down the slippery slope he went, splashing and sliding to a halt where this accursed swamp carved the battlefield's edge, loosening buckles and shedding the weight of his armour as he went.

Now standing at the bottom of the same slope, musing how much he hated this blasted, dripping place, Alfonzo cursed once more, at length and with venom. He cursed the swamp; cursed the arrogant Lazzaro; cursed his own slowness for not striking fast enough and slitting the captain open there and then in the rout.

Now, slogging through the wet fen under the weight of his own plate, he knew he held the advantage – Lazzaro had no weapon, no armour and no-where to go, not past the rushing river at the swamp's far border and certainly not past the orcs that ravened and howled out their victory on the battlefield. It was just a matter of time til he found his prey.

At the edge of a murky pool, the bravo peered across the mist-wreathed ground, trying to make out Lazzaro's shape through the skeletal, sickly fingers of marsh-trees reaching for the hidden sun. Against all the other dripping, burbling, sloshing noises of the swamp, Alfonzo paid no heed to the gentle slop of water that pushed past his boots ... and then something heavy slammed into his back-plate and sent him sprawling into the water.

The pool closed in around him, shockingly cold, and as he tried to push himself up he found the weight of his own armour sinking him deeper into the mud below, a sucking grip that folded round his forearms and only pulled down harder. He thrashed and struggled, but it was already too late, the freezing embrace of the quagmire sucking the strength from his limbs as it dragged him down into darkness.

Lazzaro stood over the pool for a little while, watching as the bravo struggled beneath the surface and, finally, fall still. He leaned on the haft of his glaive, its reassuring and renewed strength the only thing keeping him standing in the face of today's bitter loss – the battle, the reputation of his Free Company, and now a promising young man who'd have made a good second in time. If only he'd been able to reign in his arrogance, or been a little more patient.

“Ambition's a Virtue, lad,” he said without venom, even as the last bubbles frothed the surface of the muddy pool, “but rash stupidity's a different lady indeed, even if they do both share their mother's looks.”

- Requirement: You must have the weapon master skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: Once per day you may call STRIKEDOWN with this one-handed spear.

Bladeroot

Description

This perennial flowering plant grows most commonly in cold environments, and is often called frost narcissus. The plant itself flowers briefly in late winter/early spring and is almost unique in that its flowers are grey in colouration - a ring of six circular petals around a darker inner trumpet. It is said to grow most freely over the graves of lovers, and in art and literature is closely associated with premature death. The woody bulb of the bladeroot is noticeably elongated compared to that of similar plants earning it the name Irremaisahne among the Suag hunters due to its similarity to the Winterfolk Rune of Wisdom.

The root is mildly toxic, causing nausea, vomiting and dizziness if consumed raw. Properly prepared, these negative side effects pass quickly.

Rules

- Can only be applied by a character with the physick skill.
- Using 30 seconds of appropriate roleplaying the physick can remove the weakness condition from a target.
- The herb use fails if you or your target are hit or attack another character during application, but the herb is not consumed

Blessing Wheel

Description

Also known as a Spirit Spindle, Spinning Wheel or Hallowing Wheel, a Blessing Wheel is a tool used by priests, specifically during the hallow ceremony. It commonly takes the form of a cylindrical wheel on a spindle, or a circular disc mounted on a rod. The device is marked with symbols of the Way - most commonly a straightforward Labyrinth or Wheel design traced across the entire wheel, over which are painted seven sigils which correspond to the seven Virtues at roughly equidistant points.

A priest engaged in hallowing an item sets the wheel spinning, and keeps it spinning throughout the ceremony. Often, the priest places the tool next to a small bowl in which liao is mixed with oil or water. They moisten their fingers, touch the wheel to keep it spinning, and then touch the item that is the target of the hallow. The movement of the wheel serves not only to focus the attention of the priest but also as a metaphor for the cycle of reincarnation.

Some priests, especially in the Marches and among the Dawnish yeomen embrace a more practical symbology when using a Blessing Wheel - especially a circular rather than cylindrical one. They draw similarities between the priestly tool and a more mundane spinning wheel and talk about "spinning" the raw stuff of spirituality out of the Labyrinth and wrapping it around the item they are working with. When removing an unwanted aura, these priests are careful to spin the Blessing Wheel the "other way", pulling the unwanted spiritual essence away from the item and flinging it back out into the Labyrinth.

In parts of Urizen, Navarr, and Varushka, and among the Kallavesi and the Suag, a Blessing Wheel takes the form of a hoop bound within which is a web of cords or thongs. Charms or symbolic items are hung from the strands of the network - depictions of the virtuous animals in Varushka, crystal or glass sigils in Urizen, feathers or bone runecharms for the Kalalvesi and the Suag, coloured beads for the Navarr, Rather than being spun, the net created by the crisscrossing strands is studied and adjusted throughout the ceremony - sometimes restrung completely as part of the process of hallowing the item. As well as serving as a focus for the priest, these delicate tools are used to draw symbolic connections between the item that is to be hallowed and people, places, and things that exemplify the aura the priest seeks to create. For example, a priest who works to create a Hallowing of Inga Tarn might trace the net held within the hoop while quietly reciting the story of one of the exemplar's heroic journeys, and perhaps go so far as to hang a miniature hammer charm from one of the strands.

Rules

- Form: Talisman. Takes the form of ceremonial regalia. You must be wearing this item to use its magical properties.
- Requirement: You must have the dedication skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: When you perform or cooperate with the performance of the hallow skill, you may spend up to three additional doses of liao to increase the strength of the ceremony by the same amount.
- Materials: Crafting a Blessing Wheel requires three ingots of weltsilver, five measures of beggar's lye, seven measures of dragonbone, and three measures of iridescent gloaming. It takes one month to make one of these items.

Blessing of New Spring

Rules

Spring Magnitude 2

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets a farm. The character who controls the target personal resource must be present throughout.

This spell is an enchantment. A target may only be under one enchantment effect at a time.

Effects

The farm earns an additional 10 rings at the Spring Equinox (event 2), the Summer Solstice (event 3) and the Autumn Equinox (event 4). The ritual ends at the start of winter.

This spell is intended to be cast at the Winter Solstice. If the spell is cast later in the year, then money that would have been gained in earlier seasons is lost. It is useless if performed after the Summer Solstice.

If the owner of the resource does not attend the next event, then the additional production provided by the resource is still added to that character's inventory.

Additional Targets

This ritual can affect additional farms in the same territory. Each additional farm increases the magnitude by 1. The character who controls each farm must be present throughout the ritual.

Description

This spell is intended to be cast at the Winter Solstice. It is less efficient and productive if cast later in the year and is useless if performed after the Summer Solstice. If the spell is cast later in the year, then money that would have been provided during any missed seasons is lost. Performed at the optimal time, and left to run its full course, the ritual provides a total of 30 rings of additional profit to the owner of the target farm.

A farm effected by the ritual will provide more and better crops, increasing the amount of money at the spring, summer and autumn equinoxes. Once it is in place, it also allows for more powerful rituals to be cast. It serves as an anchor for the Strong Ox, Golden Sun ritual, permitting even more wealth to be reaped from the soil.

The blessing of new spring is a very old ritual indeed, practiced in various forms throughout the world. The power of this ritual infuses animals and plants with vigour and fertility. Crops grow quickly, and in great abundance; they are naturally healthy and resistant to threats such as harsh weather, frost, disease and parasites. Animals are fruitful, with large litters, and young creatures grow quickly and enjoy great health. If there is a downside to the ritual it is that it increases the amount of work that must be done - crops must constantly be tended for weeds, and animals become a little more restive as they become more fruitful.

In the long term, however, the benefits of this ritual should not be underestimated. It is understandably popular in The Marches, and there are covens of landskeepers who work hard to ensure that they can perform this ritual on many farms simultaneously. Such covens also work to master Strong Ox, Golden Sun and Gathering the Harvest if they can, so they can offer even greater prosperity to the households and monasteries. With tension growing between householders and the market towns, many landskeepers refuse to perform the blessing of new spring and similar rituals to benefit the aldermen; the townsfolk have begun to look outside the Marches for magical support for the few farms they do own.

The ritual creates fertility and encourages hardy growth of plants and animals. Ritual performances often include the evocation of the rune Bravash or the constellation of The Fountain. Hearth magics and symbols associated with health and Prosperity are also commonly evoked, such as shedding small amounts of blood or offering a cup or bowl of wine, ale, milk or mead to the targets.

In the Marches, a portion of the produce that the farm produced the previous year might be used in the ritual; a similar element might be used in a Freeborn ritual intended to bless the produce of an orchard or vineyard.

Artificers can construct a ritual focus that enhances the performance of this ritual, and its associated rituals. The Straw Mask can be used any number of times a day, and it will allow even a novice spring ritualist to perform Blessing of New Spring without having mastered it and without the assistance of a coven; it will allow a more skilled ritualist to add an additional farm or two to the performance depending on the mastery of the wearer; and when combined with the Imperial Regio it will allow a magician without even a basic grounding in Spring lore to perform this ritual by themselves.

Blood-dimming Tide

Description

These rods allow a magician who fights on the front lines to heal themselves and an ally without needing to leave the fray. They are equally useful to the dedicated battlefield healer who risks being hurt while getting to their patients, and to the war witch who fights alongside the other nobles of their house.

In Varushka a potent artefact known as the Brother's Arm appears several times. It is most commonly mentioned in the tales of Johann of Gristlev who used it extensively while fighting alongside his elder brother Gustav against the three powerful Mora who had stolen in to their town. The historicity of the Gristlev brothers is debated - in some parts of Varushka they are considered Exemplars of Courage and Loyalty, but the Synod has never recognised them as actual people. If the actual brother's arm could be found, it would go some way towards helping to prove these two men actually existed..

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of a rod.
- Requirement: You must have the magician skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: Twice per day you may swift cast the heal spell as if you knew it and without spending any mana
- Materials: Crafting a Blood-dimming Tide requires seven ingots of weltsilver, four measures of ambergelt, and seven measures of iridescent gloaming. It takes one month to make one of these items.

"Three times did the three wicked Mora circle the little town. Three times they begged the watchmen to let them in, calling out each time "Oh, we are hurt, we are wounded, we are dying!", but the watchmen, wise to the Mora's wicked ways would not let them in.

"Three times they circled, until finally they found the one house that had not hung the primroses and marigolds by their door - the house of the old baker Tomtar - and when they found that house, they changed back in to their belegged forms and slithered in through the window of that house ..."

Little Tomtar drew his legs up beneath the brightly coloured blanket, his eyes and his mouth all three forming perfect "O" shapes of horror and delicious excitement. His father leant forward so that the candlelight cast strange shadows across his face. He smiled wickedly at his son, letting the horror of what the mora might do to the foolish baker sink in. Then he clapped his hands together, making the boy leap almost out of his skin.

"... right in to the trap that the brave Brothers of Gristlev had laid! With a roar like a hero of the Empire, Gustav Gristlev courageously threw himself in to battle with the three wicked creatures, knocking their beaked heads together. Loyal Johann Gristlev leapt to his brother's side, drawing his knife and the glittering weltsilver rod.

"Blow for blow they traded with the three Mora, whose curved blades cut red ribbons in our brave boys. But each time Johann felt his own strength fail, he would reach out with that strange magical rod that the white owl had given him, using its power to heal his brother's wounds and in doing so, he would also feel the fight return to his own limbs.

"They fought and they fought until finally the three wicked Mora became black ravens again and fled back to their dark mistress, flying high across the vale, never to be heard of again."

Blood-sweat Hauberk

Description

Whether constructed of mithril or tanned leather, the most important step in crafting a blood-sweat hauberk is the removal of all impurities. The metal to make the rings, or the leather from which the armour is created, are extensively treated with beggar's lye to ensure the highest possible degree of purity is achieved.

This armour comes with an obvious cost - the wearer is left physically exhausted by the experience of burning the venom out of their system. In the right circumstances, however, it can be a life-saver. The Navarr were the first to devise these sets of leathers in response to the poisons of the Vallorn, drawing their tradition of ritual blood-offering. They were often made with a convenient slit in one sleeve where the wearer could make the cut without ruining the garment. Warriors who often need the power of this armour while battling the Vallorn are occasionally nicknamed Gore-Cuffs due to the inevitable bloody stains they bear.

When first introduced to this form of armour by Navarr Brokers, most other peoples were leery about making use of them, lacking the Navarr's attitude to blood. However, some apothecaries adopted them as protective clothing while at work in case of small explosions and accidental poisonings, leading to the nickname Herbalist's Hauberk. Particularly paranoid political figures have been known to wear these almost constantly, including rumours that one Draughir Cardinal of Vigilance, Antonia Constanza di Sarvos, took to wearing her Blood-Sweat Hauberk as a night-dress.

Rules

- Form: Armour. Takes the form of a suit of light armour.
- Requirement: Any character can bond to this item.
- Effect: Twice per day you may use 5 seconds of appropriate roleplaying that includes a self-inflicted cut to remove the VENOM condition from yourself. Using this power is very painful; it feels as if your blood is on fire and this roleplaying effect takes several seconds to fade.
- Materials: Crafting a blood-sweat hauberk requires eleven measures of beggar's lye, and five ingots of orichalcum. It takes one month to make this item.

It was past dark in the tavern again, and the woodcutters were telling tales of death again. Narrow escapes, and the deadly breath of the monster in the trees, and how they'd once had to leave someone behind.

I remembered one night a time ago, when they'd been telling the same tales and wizened old Karys looked up from her embroidery and leant in close and whispered "Oh, they imply they know it all, but don't you listen to them my bright boy." She jerked her head to where one of the woodsmen was recounting the tale of the plaguewulf. "What do they really know about poisonous air? Next time a brand comes through, you ask one of them about the deep woods and the things that live here, and the poisonous air."

Next time a Navarri striding came though the vale, I asked one of their warrior-artisans about poisonous air, and what to do about it. In return for furs and leather, she taught me how to burn beggarwood, and what metal to use to make a mesh, and I spent every spare moment making myself what they called a blood-sweat hauberk. A good thing to wear if you're fighting Vallorn-monsters, she said, and she told me there'd be a price to pay for using it.

On the night of the blood moon we'd gone out hunting in that bit of the forest where old Marushka had fallen, I was decked out in my new armour, ignoring the others' funny looks. The plaguewulf came down on us, and the poisonous howling took a few, and it burned me but it didn't kill me. I was barely ready for how damn exhausted using the hauberk made me, but I kept myself on my feet and put the last axe in through its face and brought it down. It tore my guts as it fell, but I didn't die.

Next time, the end of the woodsmen's tale had been about me, and how I'd been just a normal warrior, with not a spit of magic to call on, but I'd still been able to fight when I should have been dead. I caught old Karys chuckling but she smiled at me and gave me the shirt she had been embroidering all Winter, the shirt she'd meant for Marushka.

So that's why I wear a thick-furred animal-pelt round my shoulders now. Cos I earned it.

It's a good story, is that one.

Blood and Salt

Rules

Spring Magnitude 12

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets a fleet. The character who controls the target personal resource must be present throughout.

This spell is an enchantment. A target may only be under one enchantment effect at a time.

Effects

The target fleet earns additional profit during the next season, but only if it engages in privateering. The effect of the ritual increases the level of the target fleet by 5 ranks, which is sufficient to effectively double the production of a starting fleet.

The character who controls the target resource is under a roleplaying effect for at least ten minutes after the ritual is performed: they feel unrestrained and unconcerned about the consequences of their actions, with an urge to take what they want; they feel uninhibited about using violence against anyone who gets in their way.

The effect lasts until the start of the next Profound Decisions Empire event. If the owner of the resource does not attend the next event, then the additional production provided by the resource is still added to that character's inventory. If the fleet does not engage in privateering during the next downtime, the ritual has no effect.

Additional Targets

This ritual can affect additional fleets belonging to characters in the same banner. Each additional fleet increases the magnitude by 8. The character who controls each fleet must be present throughout the ritual.

Description

This ritual is sometimes called Blood in the Water, The Shark Amidst the Nets, The Corsair's Cruel Smile and other equally poetic names. It helps to ensure that a fleet will get good weather and excellent tides, and fires the crew up with vigour and primitive strength. The more aggressive the crew is, the more the magic of Spring encourages them and strengthens them; if they engage in the relatively bloodless pursuit of trade, the enchantment will quickly fade.

A crew enchanted by this ritual does not turn on itself (although there are stories of crews who were already mutinous who tore each other apart once the enchantment began to erode their inhibitions and restraints); nor do they become monstrous (although there are also stories of cruel, merciless men and women who lost the last vestiges of humanity under the influence of this enchantment); they are, after all, possessed of free will. If a fight does break out they are less likely to offer or accept quarter or mercy, and likely to fight with wild, terrifying abandon. In many cases, the sheer ferocity of the sailors in the enchanted fleet is enough to convince the prey to give up without a fight.

The ritual is obviously most common among the Freeborn corsairs and adventurous League privateers; there are also plenty of reports of the Grendel using similar enchantments. It is common for those who receive the benefit of the spell to offer a portion of any plunder they gain in the coming season to the ritualists, although this is by no means mandatory - not least because some ritualists prefer to be paid in advance rather than trust to the short memories of corsairs and privateers.

Sometimes the ritual involves the targets cutting themselves with a blade and swearing oaths to be merciless in pursuit of their prey. There are often invocations of sharks or kraken during the performance of Blood and Salt.

Blood of the Hydra

Rules

Spring Magnitude 2

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. The character with the target ruined limb must be present throughout.

The ritual fails if you or the character are hit, or attack another character.

Effects

At the completion of this ritual you may restore a limb ruined with the CLEAVE call or IMPALE call.

Additional Targets

This ritual can affect additional limbs. The magnitude increases by one for every two additional limbs. All targets must be present throughout, and the ritual fails if any of the targets are hit, or attack another character.

Description

Blood of the Hydra is a simple healing ritual that is more powerful the more patients it treats. It draws on the same powers as the restore limb incantation. It sees most use on battlefields, or in the aftermath of accidents and disasters. A single competent ritualist can restore a dozen injured people with a handful of mana crystals.

The restore limb spell is more versatile, and takes less time to cast, but any magician is likely to find their personal reserves of strength quickly depleted in the aftermath of an especially vicious engagement. The ritual is also quite easy to improvise in emergencies; anyone who has made even a cursory study of the lore of Spring can spontaneously evoke the healing power of the hydra.

The ritual causes a ruined limb to spontaneously regenerate; broken bones, torn flesh, ruptured blood-vessels and ripped muscles spontaneously knit back together. The experience can be very painful, and can be quite unnerving to watch. This healing usually restores the limb without leaving a scar, restoring the limb to full utility within a couple of seconds.

The hydra is a multi-headed reptilian beast that possesses both incredible healing power and a deadly poisonous bite. This combination of features means many scholars draw parallels between the beast and the magic of the Spring realm. This particular ritual is modelled directly after the remarkable ability of the hydra and some other lizards to restore their own crippled limbs with almost supernatural speed.

Common Elements

Performing this ritual often includes herbs, bandages and other trappings of the healer's profession. It is also common to mix earth or clay with water to create mud, which is slapped onto the damaged limbs to help seal them. Indeed, as with many other healing rituals, water is a common element. Washing the ruined limb with fresh or salt water is a common way to begin the ritual.

The sight of ruined flesh and bone restoring itself can be unsettling, and so many ritualists especially among the Dawnish and Urizen wrap linen, silk or cotton bandages around the ruined limb during the ritual, removing them only when the magic has run its course. In a similar way, Marcher ritualists weave braces of corn or grass around the elbow and wrist or knee and ankle of their target, drawing on the fertility and healing magic implicit in the harvest. In The League this ritual is often associated with the character of The Doctor, and the use of The Chalice.

Elements such as wholesome food, the Rhyv rune, the constellation of The Fountain and (obviously) the supernatural regeneration of the hydra can all be evoked to restore vitality to the targets of this ritual.

Some magicians call this ritual Blood and Ashes, and evoke the power of the legendary firebird when they perform it. These ritualists often mix ashes and fresh water or honey together to create a poultice, and draw on the healing power and warmth provided by fires and hearths to speed the healing process.

Life flows through each of us; our magic allows us to reach out to our fellows and nurture that life as a gardener might nurture a failing flower.

Bloodfeather Harness

Description

The bloodfeather harness is popular with those Kallavesa mystics who integrate a bird-mask into the armour along with feathered vambraces and greaves. Some Marcher artisans hunt mandowla, making leather from their ursine hide and working their feathers into the decoration of the mage armour.

When the wearer of the harness is critically wounded, its magic slows their heartbeat and grants them precious minutes before they are finally claimed by death. Time itself seems to slow down from the point of view of the wearer, and many of those who have been saved by the magic of this mage armour have described experiences in which they could not help but dwell on the significant events of their entire life, and the consequences of their deaths - some returned to their comrades profoundly changed. In some parts of Brass Coast it is called a nervous guest or occasionally the more waggish lurker on the threshold to laughingly poke fun at a reluctant to step through the door of death and enter the labyrinth.

Rules

- Form: Armour. Takes the form of a suit of mage armour.
- Requirement: You must have both the magician and battle mage skills to bond to this item.
- Effect: You gain three additional ranks of fortitude.
- Materials: Crafting a bloodfeather harness requires three measures of beggar's lye, five measures of ambergelt, and ten ingots of weltsilver. It takes one month to make one of these items.

I woke screaming by a warm hearth, yet not as warm nor as welcoming as the heart-warmed hearth which for nine months had been my home.

I grew stronger, grew taller, learned to speak, learned to walk, learned to read.

I grew stronger, grew taller, learned to fight, learned to live.

I grew stronger, grew taller, learned wisdom and courage, pride and vigilance.

I grew into a man, and lived as a man. I took a wife – or she took me, I was never sure.

I fought with my people in the skin of a bear. I took its ferocity into my heart, and the scop gave me its name. I carried the banner, and stood by my Thane's side.

With my rod and my axe I fought for my people. Through boredom and battle, through days both harsh and joyous, I stood for the strength and character that make our people great.

And now I lie dying, an arrow in my heart. Only my harness keeps me from the Labyrinth's gate. I am certain that my body is being moved. If the Grimnir can save me, then their skill will be the mark of their own greatness.

Perhaps I dream in convalescence. Perhaps I am already saved. Or perhaps it is too late, and I go now to a new life, to write a new tale.

Whatever my fate, I am content with it. Whether it comes today or tomorrow, I am content with it.

A hero's story ends in death.

Bloodfire Periapt

Description

A Bloodfire Periapt most commonly is made as a green or red stone worn on a chain, although they are also worn as rings or bracelets. They are often marked with the rune Rhyv and Verys. Some Varushkan and Winterfolk artisans mark these items with Irremais, a rune associated with sacrifice - or shape the pendant stone in the form of a hanging blade.

These amulets grant the wearer a feverish, unnatural strength when they are stuck by envenomed attacks. Some fanatics have been known to intentionally envenom themselves to draw on the sick vitality these talismans offer, but doing so is an extremely risky proposal that has led to these items being christened Fool's Bargains.

Rules

- Form: Talisman. Takes the form of a jewellery. You must be wearing this item to use its magical properties.
- Requirement: Any character can bond to this item.
- Effect: .While under the effect of VENOM, you gain three additional ranks of endurance. You lose three hits from your current total if the VENOM is cured, or you lose this item.
- Materials: Crafting a Bloodfire Periapt requires eleven ingots of weltsilver, seven ingots of orichalcum, three ingots of green iron, and seven measures of beggar's lye. It takes one month to make one of these items.

Yisalto was his name, the son of a Riqueza ritual dancer and wandering naga poet, but he was never called anything but the Serpent.

They say he lived atop a pillar of brass amongst the cliffs of Kahraman, refusing to eat anything except the most venomous of birds, beasts and insects, drinking only from a fouled well. When the sweet horns of war sounded, the Serpent slithered down from his lair in the mountains and danced amongst the spear-points and axe blades of the enemy. Each poor soul that felt his caress knew their doom as his magic turned the blood in their veins to poison. The Serpent laughed to see the strong become weak at his merest touch, even as his own blood flowed thick and dark until it seemed that his flesh could never contain such vileness.

But in the end the Serpent fell prey to a force more treacherous and poisonous than himself - love. As he slept his lover stole away the charmed necklace that let him draw strength from his venom, and the Serpent died, thrashing and foaming in agony like his many victims.

His tower still stands, surrounded by the bones of the creatures that thought to make a meal of his remains...

Bloodsilver Spike

Description

This polished rod is often made of alloyed weltsilver and iron around a wooden core and tapered at one end. It delivers powerful and immediate healing, knitting grievous wounds to bring badly injured warriors back to their feet in seconds, and for this reason is valued widely among the armies of the Empire.

It is most commonly carried by second and third-rank magicians, especially among the ranks of the Imperial Orcs, who value its power to quickly bring warriors back from the brink of death. Among the Navarr it is sometimes known as the Second Chance, for those who undertake the dangerous duty of flanking an enemy may find themselves in need of its quick healing if the enemy tries to quickly overwhelm them.

It is often engraved with the runes Rhyv or Feresh.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of a rod.
- Requirement: You must have the magician skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: Once per day you can swift cast the heal spell as if you knew it and without spending any mana.

Kallak saw it coming long before Rald did. The Ironheart Legion, right at the centre of the Imperial battle-line, had to run into the enemy's chieftain, and here he was: massive, cruelly scarred, an imposing figure in the finest armour his tribe had managed to scavenge from their raiding out of the Barrens.

Of course Rald was going to go for him. The young fool couldn't resist the chance.

The two Orcs' swords clashed with a shock that rang across the battlefield, and with a nod from her sergeant, Kallak stepped back out of the lines and over toward the impromptu duel. Rald fought like a true Orc of the Empire, disciplined and trained, a brilliant swordsman. He scored a line across the chieftain's forehead and landed a deep cut in one of his arms, as well as pounding on his armour a few times - but he made the mistake of youth, and attacked too often. He left an opening, and the ferocious barbarian knocked him from his feet with a mighty sweep and ran him through on the ground.

The chieftain gave a great, incoherent roar, lifting his jagged sword high in his good arm.

Kallak, who had begun her spellcasting as she ran, burst through the ranks and gave Rald a none-too-gentle tap with the tip of her Bloodsilver Spike. His eyes shot open and he yelped in pain as magic coursed through him, knitting arteries and veins in an instant and closing up skin and bone over the top of them.

Kallak helped him to his feet, and he clapped her on the shoulder in thanks as he headed back into the fray.

She saw the fear in the barbarian's eyes as he saw the Ironheart Legion's finest swordsman facing him for a second time, bloody but uninjured, and seconds later he fell. For all the violence he had done to impress his tribe with his might, the barbarian chieftain had no magician who could support him so well. Moments later, Rald hefted his head high into the air, and with a great cry of dismay, the enemy broke.

Kallak stayed behind to patch up the fallen as the front rank of the Legion set off after the fleeing barbarians, leaving the chasing and butchering to the younger and swifter warriors. Her Bloodsilver Spike had gained much worth from her acts today, and she'd played her part in a fine story indeed.

Bloodsteel Barb

Description

Vicious barbed spears, the Bloodsteel Barb is patterned after a fishing spear, with wicked protrusions designed to tear flesh and scrape bone, or to hook clothing or skin and allow a sharp twist to snap or fracture a limb. At its most effective it easily penetrates light leather or padded cloth and inflicts catastrophic damage on the soft meat beneath.

While the orichalcum alloy head of a Bloodsteel Barb is often reddish-gold in colour, the weapon takes its name more from the traditional method of forging and tempering the metal. Once the metal has been purified in a bath of beggar's lye, living blood is mixed into the alloy. In certain darker times, the final quenching of the spear would be in the body of a living orc to give the weapon a taste for orcish blood. If the orc prisoner was not killed in a single thrust the weapon would be melted down and the crafting process begun again. This cruel practice has fallen out of favour in these more civilised times; perhaps more importantly, there is evidence that it gave rise to hateful, twisted weapons whose bloodthirsty hunger tainted the wielder and tempted them into barbarism and ultimately drove them to madness. In some cases the weapon failed to strike at a vital moment, dragging the wielder to their death at the hands of the orcs.

Today, it is much more likely that an artisan will allow several drops of their own blood to run into the metal. Anyone who actually committed a murder while creating a Bloodsteel Barb would face the full fury of Imperial Law.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of a one-handed spear. You must be wielding this weapon to use its magical properties.
- Requirement: You must have the weapon master skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: Twice per day, you may call CLEAVE with this one-handed spear.
- Materials: Crafting a Bloodsteel Barb requires ten ingots of orichalcum, three measures of beggar's lye, and three measures of ambergelt. It takes one month to make one of these items.

“So this weapon was quenched in the blood of one of my kin, fresh from the forge?”

The League merchant's affable grin had frozen into a rictus that didn't dare so much as twitch. Tammat took the barbed spear in one hand, felt its weight – light, but with enough heft to strike hard and fast if she put her weight behind a jab.

She did so, testing the motion, and grunted with satisfaction. The merchant actually jumped as she did so, flinching back, and Tammat had to stifle a snort of disgusted amusement. What did he think was going to happen – did he really believe she'd impale him on his own wares in a fit of rage, like some sort of savage?

The orc cast her gaze along the weapon rack, eyeing the other fine spears that the armoury had produced, but none of them called to her like this old weapon. It hadn't been cared for much, just left propped against the wall at the back – as if the armourers were ashamed of its provenance in this enlightened modern age but still loathe to simply toss away a weapon that had been infused with ilium.

But the barbed head was still sharp enough, and Tammat figured she'd just need to add a twist to the end of a jab to let the vicious little hooks do their job in the guts of a skewered foe. Under her fingers the residual energy of the spear, that lingering sense of battle-hunger, tingled gently and alluringly.

“Er, yes,” he admitted, taking sanctuary in the truth.

“A slave taken fresh from the barbarians, or one who'd laboured for the Empire?” she pressed, watching his brow furrow as he desperately tried to think.

“Er, a, er, a mining slave. It was how it was done, back then. They took old slaves who were worn out and, er...” The merchant tailed off, looking genuinely upset at the notion. Not upset enough to get rid of the weapon and give up the profit, though, Tammat thought to herself.

“Good. I'll take it, then. What's the price?”

Relief dawned like sunrise on the little man's face. "Really? You're sure? It's quite expensive ..."

"Of course I'm damn sure. Why else do you think I'd say what I did? The price, man?"

And as he hurried to flip open the trade-ledger with ink-stained fingertips, and as Tammat counted out the coins from her pouch, she watched the spear with wary respect. You died in service to an empire that's embraced us now. I'll give your sacrifice meaning, even if you'd never have seen this outcome. We need you now – we need the help of those who have come before us. If you're across the Howling Abyss, I'll make you proud with the victories I'll win with this spear born of your blood.

The deal done, she took firm grip of the spear, looking closely at the runes etched down its head – runes once doused and cooled in an orc's seared innards.

And if you're not proud of that, well, then I'll have to blaze my own path across the Abyss and knock some sense into you.

Bloodwoven Braid

Description

A bloodwoven braid is usually crafted to appear as at least three thin rods woven together. Sometimes the braids interweave, sometimes it takes the form of two strands weaving around a third. It is commonly made of precious metal and weltsilver alloys, although a core rod of carefully shaped and stretched ambergelt is also a common feature. The wand is often wrapped with the hair of a loved one, especially in Navarr or Varushka, or bound with a beautifully woven favour in Dawn. In the Marches it is common to craft the wand to resemble stalks of wheat, and to weave fresh stalks of wheat, blades of grass or supple orchard twigs around the wand.

The woven strands that make up the wand are sometimes fancifully carved; in some places it is called a hydratongue wand and the various strands are carved at each end to depict serpents' or dragons' heads, drawing on the legendary healing power of that many-headed legendary beast.

A unique artefact example of this wand was crafted for the Urizen healer-magician Sithicus by his wife from eight strands of white-gold and a single strand of ilium. Called the Fountain of Life, in honour of that constellation, it was lost along with Sithicus' entire expedition somewhere in the depths of Spiral in 334 YE.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of a wand.
- Requirement: You must have the magician skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: Three times per day you may cast the heal spell as if you know it and without spending any mana.
- Materials: Crafting a bloodwoven braid requires seven ingots of weltsilver, three measures of iridescent gloaming, five measures of ambergelt and three measures of beggar's lye. It takes one month to make one of these items.

Big Henry was having a fine day indeed. The burly Marcher couldn't suppress the smile that demanded pride of place on his bearded face; wherever he looked, there seemed another reason to be glad.

The dry dirt of the track kicked up in little clouds of dust as Henry strode along it, each puff stirred and tugged by the pleasant breeze that danced across the countryside. Overhead the sun shone bright and proud, a pride that the Marcher shared as he looked out across the farmsteads that cut a patchwork into the forests. Rich earth, the swaying ranks of golden crops, the woodlands' shadows filled with the flitting shame of abundant game; Big Henry could see the virtuous prosperity of the Marches everywhere he looked. Nowhere more so, in fact, than the heavy coin-purse that hung from his belt, rich with his takings from the market-deals in Wayford.

As he reached the turn in the track, the place where the wagon-ruts swerved across onto the winding path towards his own farmstead, Henry found that something threatened to upset his sense that all was right and good in the world. Squinting, he couldn't see Alfred or Thomas in the fields where they should have been hard at work with hoe and shovel. That alone would have been irritating – he'd sworn that this summer would be the defeat of the great stone that squatted in the upper field and took up space that should have gone to good wheat, and the pair were supposed to be using oxen and the new rope he'd bought to shift it. But while he muttered an annoyed curse at the brothers' laziness, he noted he couldn't see Agnes either. In this weather, nothing would have stopped his diminutive wife from setting about her work under the open sky of the yard, even with little Margaret stumbling around in her wake.

So Big Henry frowned and hurried his pace a little, wondering what might have happened. Half-way down the wheel-rutted path he saw young Becca, Branden's girl, perched on the fence, playing with her poppet. It looked like she was weaving together grass, wheat and bark into a little wand for the tiny figure.

Despite his disquiet, Big Henry stopped to greet his neighbour's child and to admire her delicate work. The girl beamed up at him as the big man stooped to take a closer look. "You've made her look like a little Landskeeper," he said with an indulgent smile. "Is that a wand?"

Becca nodded happily. "A man with no hair ran past with one in his hand," the little girl said, holding the 'wand' up so that Big Henry could better see her handiwork. "It was silver and gold and brown. He was going to do important magic with it." She nodded sagely.

Henry thanked the virtues that the child didn't notice how he paled. The bald man she spoke of could only be Gregor the Landskeeper, and the wand – that gleaming wand of weltsilver, amber and willowbark – that could only be the magician's most potent healing tool.

And stiff-jointed old Gregor would never run anywhere if it wasn't an emergency.

“Which way did the man with the wand go?” he asked Becca, trying to keep the rising panic from his voice. It was to no avail when, with the inevitability of a nightmare's beginning, the girl pointed at his farmstead. He swore loudly.

Bloody murder

Yulis tapped politely, and waited for a moment, then swung the door open.

"It's nearly midnight," he began without preamble. "I've brought you a hot toddy and some roasted sesame seed cakes and after supper I think it is time we ..."

He stopped as the smell hit him. It reminded him of helping his father make blood sausage back on the farm. He felt cold, suddenly. There was a distant clatter of something hitting the ground, breaking, spilling. He sat down heavily. He absently chided himself for making a mess, spilling the tray. He distantly wondered how he was ever going to get the blood out of the curtains - he'd have to do it by hand, there was no way he was trusting such delicate fabric to a laundry.

It was about then he realised he was crying,

Arnaud lay face down over his desk. Yulis had found him like this many times before, exhausted from long nights pouring over books and documents and handwritten transcripts by candlelight. Tonight, though, all the candles were extinguished - the icory wax spattered with crimson droplets. Even the lightstone Arnaud kept on his desk was dim, shrouded in congealed blood.

It was everywhere. It pooled around Arnaud, spread across his paperwork; it soaked the rug beneath his feet, soaked the golden horses on his purple tunic; it spattered on the ceiling above his desk, and the bookcase opposite his seat. It looked as if someone had been dabbling in it, even, smearing it on the walls. There were bloody footprints and handprints everywhere. Not Arnaud's. Arnaud would never make such a mess.

He knew without looking that Arnaud's throat had been cut from ear to ear, probably from behind, probably several hours ago..

Somewhere nearby someone was screaming, shouting for help. He felt a quirk of irritation - it was very late to be making that kind of racket! Some people were so inconsiderate ... then he realised it was him making all the noise, and then it all became very confused indeed,

Overview

In the last three months, four more civil servants associated with the department of historical research have been bloodily murdered.

The first victim died three days after the Spring Equinox. Calladan of Widow's Walk was murdered while travelling to his family home in Sybella. He is survived by a wife and four children.

The next, Douglas Wyrdwatcher, was a 68-year-old veteran of numerous military campaigns and a man "built like a bear". Not a man to die easily, claim his colleagues. Despite this he was found dead by colleagues while visiting Canterspire in Morrow.

The third was Bridget Windsdottir, a Suaq cunning hunter but a sworn pacifist who had chosen to devote her life in service to the Empire as a civil servant, she was said to be one of the department's finest minds.

The most recent death, was Arnaud di Sarvos, an elderly man already in his twilight years, he was well-known for his attention to detail - a trait honed during his time at the School of Epistemology in Tassato and in his twenty years of service as an aide to the Imperial Syod.

All four were actively involved in researching the origins of the vallorn, work commissioned by the Advisor on the Vallorn. It is not clear how much of their research was completed, or was in a usable form following their bloody murders.

Their deaths add to the murders of several civil servants from the same department who were slain in the months leading up to the Spring Equinox.

In each case, the victims were attacked when alone and killed with an edged weapon or weapons. The murder scenes were drenched in blood - not just from the arterial flow of their severed throats, but as if the murderers had made a point of making sure to spread as much blood around as possible. In many cases there was no obvious method whereby the assassin or assassins gained access to their victims. Friends, family and assistants heard no sound of a struggle, and there were no signs of doors or windows being forced.

Their loss is a bitter blow for the Empire. Training a replacement takes years, so replacing the losses will likely take a decade or more even if the murders can be stopped. Regrettably many of the civil servants who work as researchers for the Empire are elderly and several have opted to retire rather than continue with their work further compounding the losses.

Investigations by the magistrates are ongoing.

Significance

As a result of these murders, and the retirement of several prominent civil servants, at the start of the Summer Solstice 379YE, the Senate ability to commission Historical research has been significantly reduced - the number that can be performed each season has permanently dropped from five to two. If the murders continue at the current rate, then the department will effectively cease to exist within another season.

This reduction in capacity will certainly effect the Imperial titles with the ability to commission research. The Minister of Historical Research; the Advisor on the Vallorn; and the Dredgemaster of Feverwater will now be competing with scholarly-minded senators to deploy the limited resoures of the department. As before, however, the Civil Service will deal with commissions on a first-come, first-served basis, based on when the research is announced in the Senate.

Resolution

During the Summer Solstice, the Senate raised a motion intended to provide full time protection for the remaining civil servants concerned with historical research.

Blossoms a rose in the deeps of my heart

Startled, the woodsman looked up at the creature in front of him, his hand going to his axe. Then he relaxed slightly. Not a creature. A person. One with strong naga lineage. Why did he think creature?

'Hello there.' he said. The naga cocked its head. It moved closer.

Naga said his eyes. Creature said his brain.

It was dressed in the manner of a Freeborn, in deep scarlet and ... black? Not Freeborn then. It had a shock of bright red hair, and the scales on its face and neck glittered in the forest gloom like rubies. It reminded him incongruously of a fanciful image of an exotic beast of distant lands - a flame salamander they called it. As it closed with him, he realised it was much taller than he had at first thought. It seemed to thrum with nervous energy.

'Hello?' he was less certain. There had been some idle conversation about the forest recently, about it being darker. A few reports of strange fires starting from nowhere and burning out just as quickly.

"You smell of fear but also are curious and bravery and just a little excitement" said the naga in a sing song voice as it came still closer.

'Look....' he replied, backing away. The naga cut him off.

"I like you! You are funny! I will keep you!" Its voice was deep, almost purring, and its eyes narrowed until they were little more than slits. The woodsman found he could not look away, could not move. The "naga" reached out long nimble fingers to trace the curve of his jaw.

'Enough,' came another voice.

Whatever spell the naga was weaving broke. A figure emerged from the shadows beneath the trees from the same direction the naga had approached. Clearly a warrior, it wore breastplate, greaves, and gauntlets of blackened steel, and its eyes burned like living embers. Flames danced and wove across its body where its skin was visible between the plates. Over one shoulder the woodsman could see the haft of a great two-handed sword.

As it emerged from the shadows, its appearance shifted and changed. Its features resolved into those of a striking woman, dressed in long black and red robes. It addressed the naga with a firm voice full of conviction.

"Freedom, the Shadowed Flame does not constrain, but this is neither the time nor the place."

The creature that was in truth nothing like a naga shrugged its shoulders languorously, stretched like a cat, and pointedly turned its back on the woodcutter. Feigning disinterest, it began to gather spring flowers.

The newcomer considered the woodcutter carefully.

"I am the first of the knights of Janon." it said. "The fire that dances in the dark desires that the night magicians, the artists, and the priests of the Empire come to it here beneath the trees to attend court with it and its brother the prince of toads. The Muse of Fire will open the way, and pledges safety for any who come with honest intention and open hearts. Do you understand? Will you take this message?"

The woodcutter stammered something and backed up. Another armoured figure stepped from the forest, and a little more of the late evening light drained away as it came. Then another. And another. Through the branches of the trees, the woodcutter could see stars. He could hear music. He turned and fled as the darkness gathered around him.

"Pretty" hissed the creature that was not a naga, as the posey of snowdrops she had collected withered and turned to ashes in her hands.

Overview

The eternal Janon, called (among other things) the Shadowed Flame invites the people of the Empire to a gathering in the forests of Astolat on the third night of the Spring Equinox. The Rosered Woods lie several miles south-east of Laroc and have long been known to be the site of a potent regio aligned with the magic of the night realm. Janon intends to open the regio at its heart, and the chamber beyond, to any who wish to attend.

The eternal has specifically invited magicians versed in the lore of night, artists, and priests but anyone who can pass through the Sentinel Gate should be able to attend. Musicians and performers of all stripes are likely to receive a warm welcome in the court of Janon, especially if they come ready to perform for the eternal and its guests.

There is also an open invitation for visitors to bring samples of fine food and drink, to be shared by the eternal and their guests alike. Other contests have been hinted at, as well as the suggestion that Janon will listen to petitioners who desire boons from it - especially if those petitioners first attract its attention with their passionate intensity.

According to the knights of Janon, the prince of toads will also be in attendance for some or all of the audience. This is very likely a reference to Janon's fellow night eternal Sadogua, although why the brother of wizards would be guesting with Janon instead of hosting his own audience is unclear.

Significance

By holding audience in a chamber connected to a regio within the Empire, Janon has made it possible for those who are not magicians to meet with it. A way must still be found to get to the Snowdrop Glade, but the eternal seems blithely confident that the Sentinel Gate will open to the Rosered Woods near Laroc, in the territory of Astolat. A magician will still be needed to open the gate but once there, Janon's invitation should allow anyone who wishes to enter the regio - and presumably leave again freely.

The Lover Tells of the Rose in His Heart

*All things uncomely and broken, all things worn out and old,
The cry of a child by the roadway, the creak of a lumbering cart,
The heavy steps of the ploughman, splashing the wintry mould,
Are wronging your image that blossoms a rose in the deeps of my heart.*

*The wrong of unshapely things is a wrong too great to be told;
I hunger to build them anew and sit on a green knoll apart,
With the earth and the sky and the water, re-made, like a casket of gold
For my dreams of your image that blossoms a rose in the deeps of my heart.*

W B Yeats

Visitors should be a little careful however; those without the ability to open a portal themselves leave a magical chamber such as this at the sufferance of the eternal who has opened it.

Janon's audience is set to begin at nine o' clock at night on Sunday and it is likely that the Sentinel Gate will open at or around this time. How long it will remain open is unclear, but it should be a simple matter for visitors to determine how long they have once they have passed through it to Astolat, even before they enter the regio in the Rosered woods.

Blow the Candles Out

Traditional. Manuscript by Aneurin Redman-White PDF here

An old Marcher song of courtship.

Blow the Candles Out

When I was apprenticed in Stockland, I went to see my dear
The candles all were burning, the moon shone bright and clear I knocked upon her window to ease her out of her pain
She rose up to let me in, then barred the door again

I like well your behaviour and this I often say I cannot rest contented when I am far away
The roads they are so muddy,
we cannot walk about So roll me in your arms, Love, and blow the candles out

Your father and your mother in yonder room do lie A-hugging one another, so why not you and I?
A-hugging one another, without a fear or doubt So roll me in your arms, Love, and blow the candles out

I pray thee speak more softly of what we have to do Lest that our noise of talking should make our pleasure rue
The streets they are so nigh, Love, the people walk about They may peep in and spy, Love, so blow the candles out

And if we prove successful Love, please name it after me Treat it neat and kiss it sweet and daft it on your knee
When my two years are over, my time it will be out And I will pay my debt to you by blowing the candles out.

Blue seas, white stone

Alonso Tarquinius raised the hatchet above his head and brought it down with all his strength against the staves of the beer barrel. Once, twice, a third time. Smashing it open and allowing the dark liquid inside to froth over the deck and over his shoes, and cascade over the side of the ship into the wine-dark waves beneath. The sailors watched in silence as the offering was made, then raised their voices in a paean to the god of gentle winds and fortunate passage, lead by the priest.

Alonso joined in, mumbling in places, quiet during the verse, loud and enthusiastic during the chorus. He idly wondered where he should put the hatchet. He could feel the eyes of the Sarvosan dockworkers on his ship. He wondered how many of them spoke Asavean; how many of them understood what had just happened; how many would care.

"Gentle Bahlo has kept you safe in her bosom," said the priest self-importantly once the song was over. "You have reached your destination due to her good-graces, and the protection of the Black Bull! Be thankful young man!"

Alonso smiled and nodded, and ignored the fat little man until he went away. He turned to look out to sea, towards the warship the Plenum had sent to accompany the two trading vessels. He'd been glad of its protection when the lookout spotted the orc ship as they rounded the coast into the Bay of Catazar. Maybe the Black Bull really was looking out for him. He snorted and shook his head.

He was aware of the captain suddenly at his side, turned to give the woman his full attention.

"We are ready to begin unloading," she said calmly. "We will need to pay the labourers who carry the stone to the warehouses; here in the League they are free guilders and expect it. Also, there are dock fees. Many dock fees.

"If you are happy my brother and I will see to it all." She gestured with a jerk of her head to the other trading vessel, where another paen was just coming to an end. "We will have your things brought to you - to the embassy yes? Where the ambassador is?"

She seemed bored. Alonso gave her his approval, and made his way down the gangplank to the docks.

The city was big enough, he mused, but it lacked the sophistication of Nemoria. The ships lacked grace. The entire place was ... someone knocked into him, nearly knocked him flat. He bridled, but they didn't stop walking. His outraged "Do you know who I am..." died in his throat.

He was not used to going about alone, but Lady Madrianna and his father had been quite clear in their separate ways that he could not take slaves with him. He knew it was true; he had studied the ways of the Empire during his training. It was why the warship had to stay so far out to sea, to avoid the Imperial lawmakers taking the rowers away.

Perhaps the ambassador could arrange a bodyguard. Perhaps one of the exotic League folk would be appropriate - he had read of their cisisbeo in a particularly lurid account from the eighth century and could not deny himself a glimmer of interest in the idea.

He continued along the dock, and at the top of the stone steps looked back. The dockworkers were already unloading the first of the many blocks of white granite from the hold, using an ingenious crane and a lot of swearing. He smiled, his anger forgotten. The docks and the people working them were loud and dirty, but they were industrious. Perhaps it would not be as hard as he was expecting - he would speak to the ambassador about the best way to present the pleasing aspect of the Tarquins, the Plenum and the Lady of the Blue Stones.

About three feet from him a drunk started urinating loudly off the dock while whistling discordantly. He winced. On second thoughts perhaps it was not going to be easy dealing with these barbarians after all.

Overview

Two trading vessels from Asavea, laden down with blocks of white granite, have arrived on the docks at Sarvos. In addition to the stone, they bring Alonso Tarquinius, an Asavean nobleman and agent of Lady Madrianna of the Blue Stones - the powerful trade advisor to the Asavean Plenum. He has spent the last week or so acclimating himself to the cold, staying at the Asavean embassy as a guest of the ambassador from Asavea.

He has expressed an intention to visit Anvil - he is interested specifically in meeting the Imperial Ambassador to Asavea to discuss matters on behalf of the Lady of the Blue Stones, and the powerful Tarquinius noble family - a potent force in the Asavean plenum. He has also expressed an interest in seeing Anvil and perhaps speaking to representatives of the Imperial Synod, among other matters.

He has not come alone, and not without some controversy. While the trading vessels docked at Sarvos are the property of the Tarquinius family, their crews are apparently free men and women - or what accounts for such in the archipelago. However, they were escorted by an Asavean warship, a galley sent by the Plenum to guard the precious cargo. The ship has anchored perhaps half a mile out to sea. While a few of the sailors have come ashore to buy supplies and to take advantage of the diversions of the City of Jewels, the vessel itself stays well away from the Imperial shores.

According to the rumours, this is because below decks it is full of slaves. Pitiful, unlucky sods chained to the oars who live most of their short and unhappy lives in darkness and water up to their ankles. Obviously the Asaveans know better than to insult the Empire by trying to bring a ship full of slaves to an Imperial dock, but likewise they have no intention of allowing a cargo as valuable as that carried by these trading vessels to make the journey from the far west to the Empire (and back) without a significant escort.

Significance

Young Tarquinius will be visiting Anvil for most of the coming festival, but will be available only during the evenings due to pressing business during the day. He is as likely as not to at least start out in the company of the Imperial Ambassador to Asavea, should anyone wish to speak to him about this or any other topic.

A state of peace exists between the Asavean Archipelago and the Empire, so Alonso Tarquinius is protected by - and expected to abide by - all the laws of the Empire. He also represents a significant political faction in Asavean politics - and his experiences in Anvil could sway the opinion of the Plenum for or against the Empire.

Resolution

Alonso Tarquinius visited Anvil during the Summer Solstice. His visit was marred by curses from Imperial citizens and it is unclear what this will mean for future Imperial-Asavean relations.

Boarskin Vest

Description

To call this thick leather armour a 'vest' is misleading. Most often it takes the form of a tough leather breastplate, greaves and bracers worn over layers of either thin chain or lighter leather. It takes its name from the traditional materials used to make them, although it is also known as a Bearhide Vest or very occasionally a Mammoth-hide Hauberk in places where mammoths are hunted. The bearer is said to enjoy some of the legendary fortitude and bloody-minded stubbornness of the animal the armour is made from. It is common for the armour to include a helmet decorated with the tusks or made from the head of the creature that provided the armour. Like many such pieces it is considered good luck for the warrior who will wear the armour to hunt and kill the animal in question themselves.

In the Marches this armour is considered quite primitive, but is popular with beaters and with those who are capable of single-handedly taking on and defeating a boar. It is considered very good attire for a Dawnish yeoman or poor knights looking to make a name for themselves.

In Urizen, they make a similar armour by alloying weltsilver and mithril to produce articulated plate armour usually called a Mountainfall Carapace that is usually polished to mirror-sheen brightness with ambergelt resin. Sentinels in Mountainfall Carapace are often advance scouts or mobile infantry, and small groups of them serve as covert messengers carrying important documents between spires.

Rules

- Form: Armour. Takes the form of a suit of medium armour. You must be wearing this armour to use its magical properties.
- Requirement: Any character can bond to this item.
- Effect: Gain two additional ranks of the Fortitude skill.
- Materials: Crafting a Boarskin Vest requires six ingots of weltsilver and three measures of ambergelt. It takes one month to make one of these items.

As if by some unspoken command, the other patrons of the drinking hall had made space round the roaring fire for the three scarred veterans. Each had been eyeing the other two with surly challenge since they had arrived amongst the other mercenaries, and the tension was obvious even to the villagers. By now, everyone was eager to see just how the triumvirate were going to settle the matter of dominance between them.

The little Marcher village usually saw no more violence than that of a farmer wringing a chicken's neck, but since that Urizen general had arbitrarily inked a line of no retreat against the orc invaders, the place had become a key forward post with a swelling garrison of Marcher soldiers and mercenaries from farther provinces of the Empire. One little village simply wasn't big enough for these three muscular, swaggering thugs and their vastly bloated egos.

The first to break the silence was the biggest of the three, a Marcher himself, his skin a patchwork of impressive scars and one leg crooked from a badly-set break. He hauled himself up from his seat to the cheers and muttered encouragements of his fellows, slammed down his flagon and lurched over to the fireplace, offering the other two veterans a glowering snarl as a prelude.

"I'm Mangler John," he bawled. The tavern's smoky air bore witness to a moment where the mercenaries and soldiers all spat jeers or shouted affirmation, then the villagers were hushing them; the farmers wanted to hear what the thug had to say. "Mangler John! You better remember that name! I'll spill the most orc blood in this war, aye!"

He limped back and forth before the fireplace, spittle frothing at the edges of his mouth. "I hunted the Snaggle-Tusked," he snarled, slapping his calloused palms against the leather of his armour. "Hunted him over three days and nights after he killed Old Yelm in Rutherford, when the Beaters were too afraid to do it! I took him down with spear and axe, and made the old tusker do some good for the damage he'd caused – made him into this!" He bellowed with laughter as he tugged at the gnarled, twisted boar-tusks that jutted out from his helm. "I killed the most bastard-tough old boar in the Marches, and no orc'll stop me!"

The sound of a chair clattering against the floor came as the Dawn woman stood up, face scornful. "Some old boar? That's all you managed? Damn pig was probably half-dead by the time you found it – no way you'd catch up with a lively young one with that leg of yours." Mangler John scowled, but it was clear that his rival had the floor now.

She strode up before the fire. "I am Knight-Errant Isolde and it is I who the orcs will learn to fear the most, not some broken old has-been. You see these furs, these teeth?" She plucked at the leathers that hung over her gleaming chain armour, and the dangling, scrimshawed teeth that dangled from them. "Wolves, the hungriest and most vicious of the winter season's dark, that came from the mountains to maraud Dawnish yeomen! Orcs are not like grunting, waddling pigs of the forest! They are hungry for blood, fast, vicious, and they work in packs! I have hunted creatures of their ilk before, and my armour tells the tale of it!"

Isolde stepped back to her seat where the other Dawnish met her with grins and cheers, then silence fell and all eyes went to the last of the three – the orc. The lean muscle of his bare arms rippled as he pulled himself to his feet and strode to the fireplace, a massive cascade of bear-fur hanging from his shoulders over the boiled leather that encased his torso. His forehead was framed with the upper jaw of the bear, its dead face pinned in mimicry of a snarl atop his scalp.

He hadn't even spoken yet, and the villagers were impressed. But even as he took a breath and opened his mouth, the tavern's door clattered open.

A slight-framed woman snorted irritably as she tried to navigate the doorway, but the great curves of trophy mammoth-ivory that were bound to her shoulder-plates made the whole affair rather tricky. Finally in the warm embrace of the hall's interior, she stomped across the intervening space to the bar itself, her armour covered in layers of thick mammoth-hide leather with clattering ivory-charms dangling from every hem. The Winterfolk woman gruffly ordered a drink, and it was only when the innkeeper had laid it down before her and she'd had a chance to gulp back a refreshing swig that she realised the whole place was staring at her. When she turned in her seat, the bear-clad orc was actually still gaping.

"What?" she demanded, confused.

When it became clear that their gazes were on the great rack of mammoth-tusks bound across her shoulders, the Winterfolk shrugged.

"It got in my way."

Then she turned back to her drink. The orc, chastened, quietly sat back down, and the other two veterans stared into their flagons without a further word.

Boggarts in Morrow

Unwelcome Discovery

The rocks were slick and slippery with rainwater, but Clytemnestra stepped lightly and her balance never faltered. She paused momentarily, eyes closed, to feel the moisture against her skin, before shaking her head to dislodge droplets from her barbels.

The route was well-worn as Clytemnestra - and many before her - had walked it to the location of the Spire's mana site. A perfect spot that, almost like a rockpool on the coast, gathered flows of magic to the point they crystallise.

Cresting the rise, Clytemnestra paused again, this time eyes open and alert. Figures were gathered by the small stone shallow where the mana gathered; three of them, on their hands and knees. They had the look of naga yeoman about them, but they were many miles from Dawn or the Marches. Clytemnestra reached behind her back and pulled forth two ornately carved, and yet visibly well-used, rods. Adopting a battle-ready stance, weapon in either hand, Clytemnestra advanced. "Identify yourselves," she called out, without any waver in her voice.

The three figures jumped to their feet immediately, faced Clytemnestra and hissed, before fleeing.

Clytemnestra advanced on the mana site carefully, but also resigned to what she would find. Fragments of broken crystal lay scattered about the bowl, and in smaller number than usual.

"Boggarts," hissed Clytemnestra .

Civil Service Report

Citizens across the Urizen territory of Morrow are reporting sightings of boggarts. These vermin, believed to have originated from the Realm of Night, are manavores and deliberately seek out flows of magic, and the places they pool, to feed upon. Possessing an inherent magic akin to the ritual The Twilight Masquerade, their primary defence is camouflage, and they rarely approach or attack citizens.

Past experience has shown that territories infested with boggarts experience a significant decline in mana production. Conversely, in more positive news, boggart faeces are also known to enrich - or perhaps transform - soils and enhance their fertility. Consequently, this rarified manure is sought after by citizens who can use it to enhance production of herb gardens or farms in the territory. These faeces sadly cannot be stored or transported well, as their potency swiftly fades.

Swarms of Boggarts are a known phenomenon and across the Empire's history; a number of responses have been tried to varying degrees of effect:

- The civil service estimates that the consequences of doing nothing about this boggart infestation will be a massive^[1] reduction in Morrow's mana site supply, accompanied by a moderate increase in herb garden^[2] and farm productivity^[3] in Morrow.
- As manavores, boggarts pose little threat to the lives of citizens and only threaten Imperial resources. Consequently, the Academy has, in the past, taken the opportunity to arrange boggart hunts for younger citizens keen to practice their martial skills. The outcome of a successful boggart hunt would mean less mana would be lost to the vermin^[4]. This would have no impact on the benefit to farms and herb gardens.
- The Senate during the reign of Empress Mariika hit upon a scheme where - using scares, lures, and mana as bait - boggarts could be coaxed from one territory into another. In this way, the boggarts were relocated from Astolat to Miaren, which benefitted from the increased herb production and was mana poor at the time. This action could be carried out by the Senate for a cost of 10 Thrones or by a Conclave Gambit of 21 Mana. The motion or gambit must specify a single territory adjacent to Morrow the boggarts were being relocated to, otherwise it could not succeed.
- Before becoming Emperor, Nicovar proposed to the Senate that boggart lures could be improved upon to become boggart traps so that the mana supply could be protected, and the boggart faeces harvested for the enhancement of herb gardens. This proved very popular. This action could be carried out by the Senate for a cost of 25 Thrones or by a Conclave Gambit of 40 Mana. This would significantly reduce the mana lost to vermin^[5] and, if the Academy completed a successful boggart hunt, would ensure no mana was lost.

- There is also the belief that as manivorous Night-creatures, the boggart population could be directly affected by the intervention of Sadogua. There is a story from the First Interregnum that the then Archmage of Night demanded Sadogua remove boggarts from Kahraman, and whilst Sadogua agreed, the outcome was that they were relocated to Madruga with their numbers swollen. It is unclear what price Sadogua sought for his aid on that occasion, or even if the story is true.

The above options are the lessons learned across the history of the Empire. The civil service does not expect that this is an exhaustive or absolute list. Costings for Senate Motions, Conclave Gambits or Synod Rewardings can be requested from the civil service at the Hub.

Bold Navarr Men

Original Song: The Bold Fenian Men (Trad) - <http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=qrmWwe6EprM>

New lyrics by Joanna VanderHoeven

'Twas down by the glenside, I met an old woman She was picking young nettles and she scarce saw me coming I listened awhile to the song she was humming Glory O, Glory O, to the bold Navarr men

'Tis fifty long years since I saw the moon beaming On strong manly forms and their eyes with pride gleaming I see them again, sure, in all my daydreaming Glory O, Glory O, to the bold Navarr men

Some died on the glenside, some died near a stranger And wise men have told us that their cause was a failure They fought for the Empire and they never feared danger Glory O, Glory O, to the bold Navarr men

I passed on my way, Empire be praised that I met her Be life long or short, sure I'll never forget her We may have brave men, but we'll never have better Glory O, Glory O, to the bold Navarr men

Bolholt Song

Tune by Kathryn Wheeler, lyrics by Jude Reid

Bregaslanders, blood and bone Bolholt! Bolholt! Strong as iron, hard as stone Bolholt! Bolholt! Hard at work by day and night Never beaten in the fight Courage, pride and loyalty Marcher yeomen are we

For the land we'll tireless toil Bolholt! Bolholt! Golden corn and rich brown soil Bolholt! Bolholt! By our oath and duty bound Loyal as a hunting hound Courage, pride and loyalty Marcher yeomen are we

Bolholt maids have beauty rare Bolholt! Bolholt! In all the Empire none so fair Bolholt! Bolholt! Bolholt lads are stout and strong Handsome as the day is long Courage, pride and loyalty Marcher yeomen are we

Fearsome foes wait on the field Bolholt! Bolholt! Still we'll fight and never yield Bolholt! Bolholt! Raise the banner up on high Now they'll hear the battle cry Courage, pride and loyalty Marcher yeomen are we

Time to put aside your plough Bolholt! Bolholt! March with me to battle now Bolholt! Bolholt! On to victory or death Never fail while we draw breath Courage, pride and loyalty Marcher yeomen are we

Bolstering Bill

Description

The Marcher yeomen make use of these practical polearms in their fighting lines to help reduce casualties. A couple of soldiers armed with these weapons can provide speedy assistance to fellow warriors who have collapsed due to injuries, allowing them to move back out of the press under their own steam. A warrior armed with a Bolstering Bill may be a trained physician themselves, but more likely they are expected to keep fighting to cover the retreat of their comrade and keep the line solid.

The character of Bolstering Bill appears in a number of comic songs, stories and poems in various parts of the Empire as a simple yet well-meaning soldier-boy who helps his companions through any number of amusing or hair-raising scrapes with a combination of good humour, honest camaraderie and more than a little tough love. While these tales are generally accepted as being made up, the character of Bolstering Bill is sometimes mentioned as being an exemplar of Loyalty

In Highguard and Wintermark especially, it is common for a pair of champions to fight side-by-side, each equipped with one of these weapons (and occasionally other similar items such as the Bondring). In this case, the weapon is generally called a Brother's Beacon (Highguard) or a Brothers' Bulwark (Wintermark), regardless of the genders of the warriors involved. In other nations one of these weapons may be called variously an Indomitable Hook or a Good Neighbour.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of a polearm. You must be wielding this weapon to use its magical properties.
- Requirement: You must have the weapon master skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: Once per day while wielding this polearm you may use stay with me as if you knew it without spending a hero point.
- Materials: Crafting a Bolstering Bill requires eight ingots of weltsilver and six ingots of green iron. It takes one month to make one of these items.

"You've done me an immeasurable honour," the exarch said. "You've done this whole chapter an honour. Your impeccable service, your tireless devotion... these serve as a shining example for your comrades and for all of us."

The sisters each bowed their head in humble acceptance of the exarch's praise. Both were resplendent in their armour, the articulated plates polished to a dazzling sheen that shone beneath the sun's warm glare. The warm wind plucked at the pennants that hung over the courtyard's expanse, dappling the gathered chapter-folk beneath in dancing patches of shadow.

The exarch cleared his throat and carried on, projecting his voice as best he could across the assembly of his people. "With each of your victories, your virtues are made more clear. With each of your wise words to your fellows, you strengthen our whole chapter."

He tucked one wisp of loose white hair back within his cowl, and nodded towards where the magister waited, bearing two silk-swaddled lengths. "In turn, we wish to honour both of you. The loss of either of you would be a loss as grievous to any of us as that of our own children, a loss to this chapter's very soul."

Around the courtyard arose a quiet affirmation of the exarch's words. It wasn't a chant or a cheer, just dozens of good, true-hearted men and women speaking their own agreement with what was being said.

The younger sister was clearly feeling the emotion of the moment, but her cataphract training kept her expression firm and humble. Her elder sibling, though, was sniffing back the tears, and the exarch gave her a warm smile of encouragement.

"More than that, your virtues are so widely known now that when others speak of our chapter, they praise us for your work. As such, it would be churlish were we to show other chapters that we ourselves did not honour your devoted efforts. Because of this, I have had two sister-weapons commissioned for your panoplies, armaments to bear with you on your duties. These two weapons share the same love that you have for one another, and that we have for you. With these in your grasp, no foe will take you from us or from each other.”

The magister took his cue and strode forwards, struggling a little under the weight of his burden. The exarch took one at a time, drawing off the silk wrappings to reveal the patterned silver-and-green of the metal beneath; two fine glaives, Brothers' Beacons wrought with skill and artifice. The sisters, solidly-built cataphracts, accepted the weapons as he offered them with no heed for their weight.

The elder sister met his gaze, tears still bright in her eyes but matched by the smile upon her face. He'd never seen her so happy.

“Cataphract Jedidah, Cataphract Mehetabel, you are both examples that the rest of us would do well to follow. With these glaives, I ask only that you guard each other as you have guarded us, that we may never be robbed of your virtue by the Empire's foes.”

Bolstering Bill (Exemplar)

This page details the exemplar; for the magical polearm, see Bolstering Bill

Virtue

Bolstering Bill was recognised as an Exemplar of Loyalty by the Highborn Assembly of the Virtuous following his stories and legends being brought to Bastion by pilgrims and Wayfarers.

Biography

He is a character generally believed to have been a Marcher - if he existed at all - who appears in a number of comic songs, stories and poems in various parts of the Empire. He (or sometimes she) is presented as a simple yet well-meaning soldier, usually wielding a polearm, whose companions encounter any number of amusing or hair-raising scrapes and who survive or triumph with the aid of their companion, Bill combines good humour, honest camaraderie and more than a little tough love with an absolute commitment to never leaving a friend behind.

While the truth behind these tales is contested, the character of Bolstering Bill is often considered to be an Exemplar of Loyalty. Even the critics of the Bolstering Bill stories note that it is likely that many of them recount the adventures of real people, and have simply been ascribed to Bolstering Bill by later generations of storytellers to make them more accessible to their audiences. (see also the Good Neighbour, a polearm occasionally called a bolstering bill).

Signs

- Bill is without a doubt an inspiration to people across the Empire.
- Bolstering Bill has left a legacy in the form of the weapon that carries his name. While some scholars dispute whether Bill had a specific polearm, or used a succession of weapons, reports of a battered-appearing bill that evidences powerful abilities in a crisis are commonplace in the Marches. According to these tales, the pole-arm disappears of its own accord after a short time - actively seeking out someone else who is in need of its assistance.
- There is little doubt, in the Marches at least, as to Bill's benevolence. While his actions help individuals, those individuals often go on to inspire others, and in some cases perform great acts that help their people.
- Bill is credited with the salvation of many citizens by spreading the teachings of loyalty (and to a lesser degree Prosperity, Courage, and Pride) throughout the early Empire, especially in the Marches, in Wintermark, and in the Brass Coast.

Contentious Signs

- Several stories about Bill include miracles but this is a contentious sign. The stories are difficult to prove, and evidence of actual miracles is difficult to secure. Whether it is stories of lost travellers crossing the entire Empire in a single night; a torch that miraculously lasts an entire night to keep wolves at bay; or a story of providing nourishing food for an entire army using only two turnips and Tom Drake's second-best pair of boots, if even one of these tall tales has a grain of truth it would be proof of Bill's miracles.
- There is no record of anyone in the Empire, or in the Sumaah Republic, having a vision of being Bill in their past life. It is not clear if this is a sign of liberation, or simply proof that "Bolstering Bill" is a construct made up of several heroes. Obviously, proof either way is difficult to secure.

Stories

Bolstering Bill lives today in the stories told about him (or possibly her). According to some of the stories, Bolstering Bill occasionally appears in person to aid lost and desperate Marchers, although such stories are often taken with a pinch of salt - some believe that reports of "Bill" appearing out of nowhere to help people is proof of a sect of beaters dedicated to following his example and keeping his legacy alive.

This tale, and ones like it, crop up from time to time in the Marches and elsewhere. Bill turns up, offers aid that is remarkably successful, and then disappears again. Some scholars have compared these stories to those of Jonah Gold, the miner

Captain Tom took a large swig of beer and wiped his lips.

"Look, that's how it happened and no mistake. We were trying to light a campfire - difficult given all that dense creepy fog - and cursing the day the Feni ambushed us in the night, scattering the company to the four fields. The three of us were just about resigned to cold rations and a sleepless night when Harriet here" - he motioned to the smiling young archer now trying to wrestle the tankard from him - "heard a stick snap nearby. then we sees a figure approaching us from out of the fog, so we reach for our pikes and ready alert. Only it ain't no Feni scout, it's one of us.

"Looks like you three have gotten right lost!" he says cheerily. "Need some help with that fire?" And then quicker than a hen's cluck he's got the wet kindling burning on the fire and he's skinning a rabbit for supper. "Just got the knack, ain't I?" he says. "You three stick with me and I'll see you home right as rain!"

Dick chimed in now. "He sure did! When we were fed and rested, we followed his tracks back through the forest, the fog clinging to our tired bodies." He paused for effect and took a beer offered by someone in the crowd. When we got tired, he cheered us up with a 'march on, soldiers!' and a cheery chirping whistle. When we got tired again, he took all our packs and carried them himself. 'Reckon as how I can manage all of these for a while, but don't you go slacking on me now!' All the while he's smiling and laughing."

"Well, sure as eggs" interjected the archer Harriet, "he promised to get us safe and here we are. All the way to Stoke Heath from the woods in one day! I've never managed that at a march before. The last thing he said was 'Blimey, I only meant to get you back to your unit, looks like I got turned round as well and ended up here instead! No wonder me feet are tired!"

The three of them looked out at the crowd, clearly expecting applause, but the crowd were expecting something different. "Oh, he aint here!" Tom added. "Sorry. Right after we got here he said he had another job to do. Then he walked round the edge of Ma Greenly's henhouse and back into the fog. All we know is his name - Bill."

Under Fire

One of the typical formats of Bolstering Bill stories features the Exemplar rescuing others from dangerous situations. Critical to these is the notion of not leaving anyone behind.

Tom, Dick and Harriet had been on a scouting mission when the orders came through from command for a general retreat. There was no time to send further runners out to find and retrieve them, but one person volunteered for the task - a pikeman named Bill. He impressed the value of loyalty on the commanders, speaking quite out of rank, until the decision was made to let him try and find the scouts.

Sure enough, Bill found them just in time, under fire and crouching behind a low wall right in front of the Jotun advance. As she approached, a Jotun arrow whizzed past the three scouts and bounced off Bill's helmet. She immediately threw herself to the ground and crawled over to the wall where the three scouts were pinned down. "Move out, all! Orders have come through for a retreat!"

Dick addressed the newcomer sarcastically whilst notching another arrow to his bow. "Gee, we would love nothing more. Except that we're a little busy with these Jotun right now. Perhaps you can help?"

"Now, now, Dick! It's clear she's here to help. You can help. right? They will be here any minute, if we move then they'll pick us off for sure."

Bill removed her helmet and scratched her head, inspecting the dint where the arrow had hit as she did so. "Reckon as what we need is some sort of distraction. Hold here for a moment, I'll think of something!."

As she stood to try and get a better look at how many barbarians were approaching, she swung her pole arm low and managed to knock Harriet over in the process - mere seconds before another arrow landed where she had been crouched just a moment before.

"Blimey, that was close! Good job I'm so clumsy with this pike!"

Harriet just stared at her, somewhat flabbergasted but also too weary to say anything.

"I've got it! We'll use my helmet as a distraction. I'll put it on the end of my pikestaff and we'll raise it up over the wall to concentrate their fire whilst we all crawl back. We'll have to go quite a way on our bellies, but there's safety to stand once we get beyond the ridge. Well, what are you waiting for, soldiers?! Don't you worry about me, I'll be right behind you. I wasn't about to leave you behind, I'm sure you won't do the same for me!"

Bill winked, and rose the helmet above the wall on the end of his pikestaff. Very soon, there were arrows flying left and right and no less than three sticking out from his helmet. Tom, Dick and Harriet began crawling away from where the Jotun were aiming. It wasn't until they reached their place of safety that any of them looked back to see if Bill was still there, but she was nowhere to be seen. Cursing under their breath, they were about to turn round and go back for him when they heard her voice. "Covering fire, soldiers! Covering fire!" Bill was running toward them, followed by a whole band of angry Jotun who had finally discovered her trick.

With their expert bow work, the three of them made short enough work of the enemy that the others thought better about continuing and stopped for their fallen.

"Right." said Bill, not waiting for a moment. "That's that dealt with, let's get back to the others!"

Bondring

Description

Sometimes called a Dragonbone Ring, a Bondring is a piece of magical jewellery favoured by anyone who links their life to that of another. They are used extensively by League cicisbeo, by trusted Dawnish retainers, by bodyguards across the Empire, and by sworn comrades-in-arms and battle partners from all nations. They are also a popular gift between lovers, and it is not uncommon for a wedding to include an exchange of Bondrings and the ceremonial bonding of the partners together.

The magic of the Bondring works through the power of the bond. It allows the wearer to offer aid and succour to their partner - the person they are bonded to. In some cases, two such wearers are bound together with mutual bonds but this is not a requirement (for example, while a bodyguard or cicisbeo is likely to be bonded to a patron or client, the reverse is rarely the case). While a Bondring does not offer dramatic healing power, it cannot be denied that these talismans save lives across the Empire every year.

A Bondring is almost always a ring, or less commonly a bracer, either made from dragonbone or decorated with dragonbone inlays. They are frequently decorated with symbols of love, commitment or Loyalty (such as hounds, hawks or falcons); runes such as Zorech, or Lann; or stones that evoke the image of the Three Sisters or the Chain.

Rules

- Form: Talisman. Takes the form of a jewellery. You must be wearing this item to use its magical properties.
- Requirement: Any character can bond to this item.
- Effect: To use this item you must be bonded to another person with a special bond. Once per day you may use either stay with me or get it together on the person you have bonded to as if you knew them without spending a hero point. The Bondring allows the create bond spell to be cast to connect you to a single willing target; you can be bonded to only one person at a time, and if you stop being bonded to the bond ring, your personal bond breaks. The target character cannot break this bond, but neither do they count as being bonded to you.
- Materials: Crafting a Bondring requires seven measures of dragonbone. It takes one month to make one of these items.

Bonesetter of Torfast Trading Post

Overview

The Bonesetter of the Torfast Trading Post is an Imperial title awarded to an Imperial Orc citizen. It is part of the Northern trade network which effectively came into being shortly before the Autumn Equinox 380YE, with the construction of the offices of the Overseer of the Westward Road in Delev.

In the past, the Winterfolk maintained trade routes south and west from the town of Torfast in southern Skarsind. In the years since Skarsind was recovered, the roads were repaired and some work went towards re-establishing trade, but the Winterfolk focus was more on the routes through the passes into Hahnmark in the north-east. When the Winterfolk withdrew from Skarsind, and the Imperial Orcs claimed it, several of their bonesetters began to look east and south, eager for the opportunity to restore the valuable trade routes with Hercynia, Temeschwar, and Karov.

Similar trading posts were established in the Glen of Shadows, in Temeschwar city, and eventually in Delev in Karov (the Treji Northern Wayhouse, the Northern Traders Guild, and the mercantile office of the Overseer of the Westward Road respectively). These improved the opportunities in Torfast, widening the range of goods that could be acquired to include herbs from Hercynia, metals from Temeschwar, and the bounty of the forests of Varushka.

In Summer 381YE, in response to an opportunity offered by the Thule orcs of Otkodov, a new partner joined the Northern Trade Network bringing valuable crystal mana to the markets of the northern Empire. This crystal mana, of course, remains available only while the Empire remains at peace with the Thule.

Responsibilities

The Bonesetter is expected to keep the trade flowing along the roads that lead from Skarsind south through Temeschwar, east into Varushka, and west into Hercynia. The close contact with the traders allows ample opportunity for the Bonesetter to acquire supplies at bargain prices. If one of the three existing trade routes were endangered, the production of the Torfast Trading Post would be endangered, and the Bonesetter would likely be responsible for working with representatives of the other nation to restore it.

Powers

Ministry

As a ministry, the title of Bonesetter of Torfast Trading Post allows the holder to purchase quantities of special materials at a set price. The Bonesetter makes their decision on how much money to spend during downtime from their character page. Money is removed from, and resources are placed into, the character's inventory when the downtime is processed.

Unlike a standard ministry, the Torfast Trading Post deals with merchants from four neighbouring territories - Hercynia, Temeschwar, Karov, and Urdur in Otkodov. As such, the Bonesetter has not one but four streams from which they can purchase material. The Bonesetter can spend differing amounts on each stream - for example, they could spend 17 crowns on one, 7 on another, and none on the third and fourth.

Appointment

This title is appointed during the Spring Equinox by Imperial Orcs who control military unit personal resources. The larger the military unit an individual has, the more votes they can allocate in support to a candidate. The voting is handled by the civil servants in the Bourse.

Only an Imperial Orc character may hold this title. They do not receive a seat on the Bourse. They cannot be revoked by the Imperial Synod.

The Title in Play

The role does not provide additional information about events in the Empire, nor allow the player holding it to request special reports or downtime actions. These details are assumed to be below the abstraction layer. The title holder is encouraged to create their own stories about their activities within reasonable limits and to get involved in events appropriate to their title during the game, but they do not have any powers beyond those explicitly listed in the section on powers.

These details exist partly to provide context and character to the role - and partly to allow our writers to use the title as a plot hook. Plot that involves the position will be rare - but all the campaign positions in Empire have these details to create the potential for it to happen.

Boneweaver

Description

These powerful adjuncts to a magician's healing arts are most often made of bone. They repair arms and legs that have been crippled by cleaving strikes or pierced with arrows. They are especially popular with Imperial Orc shaman, who can bring the legion warriors back to full fighting strength quickly while conserving their personal mana for emergency healing or offensive spells. In all nations, they are a common tool of stretcher-bearers, allowing them to get warriors walking again and able to head to the surgeons unassisted. This has won the wand the name Cripple's Delight.

Finding bones long enough to form the core of these wands can be problematic as the best results are achieved with single bones without any fractures or cracks. Horse leg bones were once used, but since their extinction, the long bones of oxen are the most common materials in many lands. In Varushka, the bones of bears and boar are used due to their size and association with the virtue of Courage, to inspire the injured to overcome hardship and claim victory. Careful application of amberbelt can provide additional length, encasing the bone like a fly in amber. In some examples, tiny fractures appear in the bone every time they are used, taking on the injuries they cure, eventually causing them to shatter at the end of their lifespan.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of a wand.
- Requirement: You must have the magician skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: Three times per day when you cast the restore limb spell you can do so without spending any mana. You must be able to cast the restore limb spell to use this power.
- Materials: Crafting a boneweaver requires seven measures of amberbelt, five ingots of weltsilver and five measures of iridescent gloaming. It takes one month to make one of these items.

The human's blood was drizzling out from between Durn's fingers, staining his white wrist-wrap a carmine red. He felt his grip slither and slip from the flowing red fluid, and grunted as he tightened his grasp around Tancred's upper arm.

Everything below the Dawnish soldier's elbow was a ragged mess, but his shoulder wasn't looking much better either. Tancred's face had paled and Durn could tell he'd gone into some sort of shock, the human mind's way of trying to deal with the intense agony he must be suffering.

That and his Abyss-damned jokes. It was an old ritual between the two friends.

"W-What do you call it when an orc tries to sing?"

"Attempted murder," Durn grunted. He reached to his side where the wand was tied, working to extricate it from the knots there. "What do you call a band of humans running away?"

"I... I don't know." Tancred spasmed and coughed, wincing as he did so, and the shaman frowned at the fresh spatter of blood running between his fingers.

"An army." He had the wand free now.

"Hah! G-good one. What do orcs call their enemies?" A beat. "Dinner."

Durn raised an eyebrow as he held the wand aloft. "How do you tell if a human is a great warrior?"

Tancred frowned through the haze of pain. "No idea."

"Me neither, I've never met one." That got his friend laughing. Durn quickly muttered the incantation then tapped the wand to the human's wrecked limb.

"That... that's a good one, I th-agh Ways-damnit that hurts aargh!" Tancred clenched his jaw as the bones of his arm reset with a crack, flesh and tendon knitted back together and nerves flared with fresh agony.

And then the spell was done and the nobleman was sitting up, flexing his repaired limb with a slight look of wonder on his face. The flesh still bore wounds, but the magic had done enough to give Tancred back the use of his sword-hand.

“Now get back up and into that fight,” Durn ordered him. “We’ve a battle yet to win, and I don’t think those things care whether it’s orc or human flesh they’re eating at the end of the day.”

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets an Imperial army. The general responsible for the army must be present throughout.

This spell is an enchantment. A target may only be under one enchantment effect at a time.

Effects

This ritual dramatically increases the logistical cohesion of a campaign army. The campaign army gains an additional boost to its combat ability dependant on the number of additional military units that are assigned to fight alongside it. The bonus is subject to diminishing returns. The first 15 units add 50 effective strength each; the second 15 add 40 effective strength each; the third 15 add 30 effective strength each; the fourth 15 adds 20 effective strength each and the final 15 add 10 effective strength each to a maximum bonus of 2,250 additional strength for 75 additional military units.

The additional army strength granted by this enchantment is affected by the orders given to the army. While the effect is expressed as being equivalent to additional soldiers, this enchantment never reduces casualties suffered by the army..

While the enchantment persists, the general responsible for the army experiences a roleplaying effect: they are never satisfied with the size, strength, military readiness or agreed tactics of their army, band, nation or Empire; they seek to improve things, doubting the opinions of others and being driven to find new ways to improve their army and the capacity of the soldiers under their command.

The effect lasts until the start of the next Profound Decisions Empire event.

Description

This ritual empowers and enhances an army, using the Imperial general as focus. The enchantment improves the internal logistics of the campaign army, and harmonizes it with the logistical needs of smaller units. The net result is that it becomes easier for independent units to join that campaign army and fight alongside it with enhanced ability. Nobody misses a meal, nobody goes hungry, everyone has dry clothes, good boots, sharp weapons, clean armour ... the ritual serendipitously arranges things so that temporary auxiliaries fight effectively alongside the main body of the army. It even serves to minimize and quell inter-unit rivalries, or at least turn them towards a desire to fight the enemy better than a rival, rather than engage in drunken fistfights. Consequently, this ritual is something of a boon to mercenary commanders, whether serving as generals or leading smaller units. The ability to integrate disparate military units into a larger body helps keep the Imperial troops cohesive and this magic enhances that even further.

This ritual is both weak and powerful when it comes to enhancing the effectiveness of an Imperial army. Weak because it provides no advantage at all to an army that has no auxiliary units attached to it; strong because with enough negotiation or money, an army can gain a significant increase to its effectiveness not only due to the enchantment but due to the presence of all the additional military units.

Common Elements

This ritual enhances a campaign army, and the general of the target army serves as a vital focus for delivering the magic. It is common to include a banner or standard that will be used by the target force as a focus for the ritual. Other common elements include the invocation of Paragons and Exemplars of Wisdom and Loyalty. Other elements include girding or crowning the military leader, the rhythmic beat of military drums, the presence of warriors from as many different nations as possible as witnesses especially if those warriors swear oaths to fight alongside the general in battle.

The rune of bargains, Lann, is favoured for this ritual as the Day rune Aesh which represents thought and clarity. Imperial Bourse (Redirected from Bourse)

Overview

The Imperial Bourse is the economic hub of the Empire. Its role is to ensure the prosperity of the Empire and to provide access to much needed resources to those who can afford them.

Role within the Empire

The Bourse is designed to ensure that Ilium, mithril, weirwood and white granite are directed to where they can provide the most economic benefit, rather than being assigned by political or military patronage. Merchants bid for a position on the Bourse and those that are successful gain control of one of the Bourse positions that control production. It is then left to them to sell the resources at whatever price they can. Although there are frequent accusations of profiteering, when the market functions as intended it ensures that significant sums of money are paid to the Bourse for use by the Empire.

Decisions within the Bourse are taken by auction, with members placing money in the Bourse coffers to register their support for or against a motion. Such auctions are rare however, most of the Bourse activity is economic in nature and takes place without central organisation. The money collected by the Bourse, as part of the process of selecting members and making decisions becomes the property of the Empire.

The Bourse has gained two other roles over the years, operating the public and private auctions. The public auction is open to anyone present; most goods sold are herbs, mana crystals, resources, building materials and occasionally even Ilium are sent to the Bourse by Imperial citizens who want a good price for their goods but have neither the inclination nor the time to attend the meetings at Anvil. The private auction is for Bourse members only and sells rare and unique items that agents of the Bourse have sourced from across the Empire and the World.

Entry requirements

There are over a score of different Bourse positions, the majority of which are auctioned off once a year. Although a citizen may bid for as many positions as they choose, an individual can only hold one Imperial title. The auction itself uses an open bidding system and payments must be made immediately.

There are a handful of Bourse positions which are not auctioned off. These positions reflect the relative economic wealth and priorities of nations like Varushka. As a result these resources are controlled by vote of members of that nation based on what resources they control. These positions are identified separately below.

You can find details of who holds which seat here.

Elections and Appointments

During each season, all the Bourse Seats (both Imperial and National) that produce a single material are re-elected or re-appointed. During the event that a seat is due to be re-elected, the current holder does not receive any materials. Once the seat has been re-elected, the new holder receives that season's production, and secures the production until the next time the seat is due to be re-elected.

- Weirwood seats are re-elected at the Winter Solstice.
- Ilium seats and the Master of the Imperial Mint are re-elected at the Spring Equinox.

Losing the title

What happens when a Bourse seat loses their title depends on how they lost it.

- If the holder of a Bourse seat dies, the seat is re-auctioned (or appointed). The new holder of the seat does not receive any wains or rings of Ilium until the start of the next event. The money raised by the auction (if any) becomes part of the estate of the dead character, and the Magistrates do their best to ensure that money goes to the seat's beneficiaries.
- If the holder of a Bourse seat resigns their position, the seat is also re-auctioned (or appointed). Again, the new holder of the seat does not receive any wains or rings until the next event. The money raised in the auction is paid to the character who resigned their seat.
- If the holder of a Bourse seat receives a Writ of Excommunication, they are stripped of their Bourse seat. It is re-elected (or appointed), and the money raised is claimed by the Imperial Synod.
- The holder of a Bourse seat cannot be revoked by the Imperial Synod.

In all cases, the money initially paid for a seat remains as part of the annual budget of the Imperial Senate.

Proxies

Any member of the Bourse, may appoint a proxy. It is not uncommon for Bourse members to auction the right to stand as their proxy to another party - as this allows the proxy to bid in the private auction.

History

Mithril, weirwood and white granite are essential to the prosperity of the Empire and its citizens. Deposits of these materials tend to be large but few in number so they are carefully protected. Ilium is also rare and almost priceless due to its arcane powers. When the Empire was formed control of key supplies of these materials was placed in the control of the Bourse; it was explicitly designed to keep control of these precious materials out of the direct control of the Empress and the Senate.

Over time the role of the Bourse has grown, its members instituted a private auction to give them access to some of the most valuable items in the Empire. This was so successful it was eventually copied and a second public auction was introduced to allow citizens of the Empire to sell basic goods at the Bourse.

Powers and functions

Control of Ilium and Building Materials

Mithril, weirwood and white granite are essential to upgrade a personal resource to make it more productive. They are also needed for the large projects authorized by the Senate such as the creation of new armies or the building of bridges and fortifications. Ilium is used by artisans and magicians to make rituals and enchantments permanent. Each Bourse member has control of a single resource, for a single year (unless they are replacing an existing position which has become vacant). They can dispense this resource as they choose.

Access to the Private Auction

The Bourse holds a single private auction, only Bourse members can attend and bid on the items auctioned. Bourse agents scour the Empire and the world looking for rare and potentially valuable items to bring them to the Bourse where they are auctioned off to the highest bidder. Details of the handful of lots are usually posted in the Bourse several hours before the auction begins.

Operation of the Public Auction

Although not formally one of the powers of the Bourse, the public auction takes place in the Bourse and is operated by the civil servants who run the Bourse. The auction is open to all and supplies of herbs, mana crystals, resources, minor magical items and small lots of weirwood, mithril and white granite are auctioned to the highest bidder. It is relatively rare, but not unknown for more valuable items like Ilium, true liao or powerful items to appear in the public auction. Details of the lots are posted in the Bourse one hour before the auction begins.

Auction of Appointments

Over the years the Bourse has helped to create various minor Imperial positions and officers to help the Empire function. Individuals are appointed to these positions by auction - Bourse members commit funds in support of their preferred candidate. The candidate that receives the most support is appointed - and all bids by their supporters become the property of the state.

Imperial and National Bourse Positions

Imperial Seats on the Bourse are assigned to the highest bidder. These positions are available to any citizen of the Empire who does not already control an Imperial title or position. This means that members of the Synod, military or senate can bid for one of these Imperial Bourse position, but must resign their position if they are successful.

National Seats on the Bourse, by contrast, can only be filled by a citizen of the appropriate nation. In addition they are not auctioned off, as Imperial Bourse positions are, but voted upon by resource owners from that nation. The larger the personal holding an individual has, the more votes they can allocate in support to a candidate. The voting for national Bourse positions is handled by the civil servants in the Bourse. National Bourse positions are otherwise identical to Imperial Bourse positions.

Mithril Seats

All mithril seats are re-elected during the Autumn Equinox.

Imperial Mithril Seats

There are currently five Imperial Bourse Seats that produce mithril. One of the Seats (the Great Pits of Ennerlund) is not currently producing mithril, having been collapsed by the Druj barbarians; it is also possible that when reconstruction work is complete it may be reassigned as a National League resource.

- The Singing Caves in Mournwold produce 28 Imperial wains of mithril every season.
- The Fortress of Salt in Temeschwar produces 25 Imperial wains of mithril every season.
- The Brilliant Star in Redoubt produces 24 Imperial wains of mithril every season
- The Great Mine of Briante in Kahraman produces 22 Imperial wains of mithril every season.
- The Great Pits of Ennerlund in Holberg produced 27 Imperial wains of mithril every season. It is unclear how much, if any, production now remains, although work has begun on re-opening the collapsed mine. The Pits are currently unassigned; it is not clear if it will remain an Imperial Seat or become a League National Seat.

National Mithril Seats

There are two National Bourse Seats that produce mithril, although one (the Legacy) is currently in the hands of barbarians.

- The Eternal Shafts of Time in Karov produce 27 Imperial wains of mithril each season. Control of the Shafts is assigned to whichever Varushkan candidate receives the most support from Varushkan owners of mine resources.
- The Legacy in Spiral produced 22 Imperial wains of mithril each season. The Legacy was assigned to whichever Urizen candidate receives the most support from Urizen owners of mana sites. It is currently in the hands of the Grendel and is neither allocated, nor producing mithril for the Empire.

Weirwood Seats

All weirwood seats are re-elected during the Winter Solstice.

Imperial Weirwood Seats

There are six Imperial seats that produce weirwood. One of the seats (the Great Forest at Reikos) is currently not in Imperial hands, and might be reassigned as a National resource when it is liberated.

- The Golden Trees of Seren in Miaren produce 28 Imperial wains of weirwood each season.
- The Hunt of Alderei the Fair in Volodmartz produces 26 Imperial wains of weirwood each season.
- The Heartwood of the Great Vale in Hercynia produces 25 Imperial wains of weirwood each season.

- The Weirwater Vales in Weirwater produce 23 Imperial wains of weirwood each season.
- The Canterispire Circle in Morrow produces 22 Imperial wains of weirwood each season.
- The Great Forest at Reikos in Reikos produced 25 Imperial wains of weirwood each season. This Bourse resource is not currently under the control of the Empire.

National Weirwood Seats

There is currently only one National weirwood Bourse Seat.

- The Thimble in Therunin produces 24 Imperial wains of weirwood each season. Control of the Thimble is assigned to whichever Navarr candidate receives the most support from Navarr owners of herb gardens.

White Granite Seats

All White Granite Seats are auctioned or appointed during the Summer Solstice.

Imperial White Granite Seats

There are four Imperial Seats that produce white granite:

- The Damation Cliffs in Kahraman produce 27 Imperial wains of white granite every season.
- The Night Quarry in Miekarova produces 26 Imperial wains of white granite every season.
- The Arratan Gamble in Tassato produces 25 Imperial wains of white granite every season.
- The Sutton Stone Quarries in Upwold produce 23 Imperial wains of white granite every season.

National White Granite Seats

There are three Nation Seats that produce white granite. One (the Vigilant Swan) could be reassigned as an Imperial Seat when the territory of Reikos is finally liberated from the barbarians.

- The Granites of Veltsgorsk in Volodmartz produce 26 Imperial wains of white granite every season. Control of Veltsgorsk is assigned to whichever Varushkan candidate receives the most support from Varushkan owners of forest resources.
- The Brilliant Shore in Skarsind produces 26 Imperial wains of white granite every season. While control of the Shore was previously assigned to whichever Wintermark candidate received the most support from Wintermark owners of military units, the reassignment of Skarsind has left it's status confused.
- The Vigilant Swan in Reikos produced 25 Imperial wains of white granite every season. Control of the Vigilant Swan was assigned to whichever Highborn candidate receives the most support from Highborn owners of congregations. While it was liberated by Highborn and Navarr forces, the decision about its future is still uncertain.

Ilium Seats

All ilium seats are re-elected during the Spring Equinox.

Imperial Ilium Seats

There are two Imperial Seats that produce ilium.

- Syrene's Wisdom in Casinea produces 7 rings of ilium each season.
- The Scorrero Nets in Feroz produce 5 rings of ilium each season.

National Ilium Seats

While in theory there are four National ilium Bourse seats, the Stonefield Ice Caves has been ceded to the Thule and is not in Imperial hands. All ilium seats are re-appointed during the Spring Equinox. Bourse seats that are allocated on the basis of raids conducted by military units, piracy by fleets, or similar are based on the total effective size of all the contributing resources over the last four seasons.

- The Steel Fist provides 8 rings of ilium each season. it is allocated to whichever Imperial orc legion provides the most assistance to Imperial armies on campaign.

- The Broken Shore Bounty provides 7 rings of ilium each season. It is allocated to whichever Freeborn fleet performs the biggest raid against the Grendel port of Dubhtraig.
- The Regario Dossier provides 4 rings of ilium each season, along with an annual report relating to the activities of foreign powers. It is reserved for the League citizen who presents the largest bid.
- The Stonefield Ice Caves provided 5 rings of ilium each season. It was allocated to whichever Wintermark military unit performed the biggest raid against the barbarian orcs. The Stonefield Ice Caves are not currently in Imperial Hands, having been ceded to the Thule.

Other Bourse Seats

These appointments come with a Seat on the Bourse, but are not tied directly to the production of mithril, weirwood, white granite, or ilium.

The Master of The Imperial Mint

The Master of the Imperial Mint is a Bourse Seat reserved for the citizen of the League who presents the largest bid. The Master does not receive an income of Bourse resources, but is privy to privileged information about the Imperial economy and has powers to speak and address the Imperial Senate.

Castellan of Spiral Castle

Until 368YE, the Castellan of Spiral Castle is a Bourse Seat held by a [\[Dawn|Dawnish\]](#) citizen, appointed with the support of Dawnish military units. The Castellan has powers to order the resupply of Imperial armies stationed in Weirwater. The Seat spent many years vacant, but a new Castellan has recently been appointed following the return of Castle Spiral to the mortal world.

Other Titles

A number of other titles are also appointed through the Bourse. Any title that has economic power or responsibilities is likely to be bound to the Bourse. Unless the position includes administration of a supply of mithril, weirwood, white granite, or ilium however it does not bring with it a seat on the Bourse or access to the private auction. The appointment of all these titles is organised and processed by the civil servants attached to the Bourse.

A list of other titles bound to the Imperial Bourse can be found here

Bow safety

Overview

Bows and crossbows are one of the more dangerous weapons in LRP, if they are used inappropriately. If you are planning to play an archer at Empire then you must make sure that you follow all these safety rules. Failure to do so will result in you being excluded from the battlefield. This page refers to arrows, but all relevant information applies to crossbows and bolts as well.

To be a safe archer, you need to be a competent archer. Knowing one end of a bow and arrow from the other, and being able to generally hit what you're aiming at is competent. If you have never shot a bow before, then take some lessons from someone who knows what they're talking about with respect to archery before you start shooting at people with LRP arrows. Shooting a bow is not as easy as shooting a gun. It will take you a little time to get the hang of it, but if you're keen enough, you'll grasp the concept soon enough...Have patience, and have fun.

Nothing in this world is guaranteed. Bows and arrows are killing tools and must be treated with the utmost seriousness and care. Once you let that arrow fly it's out of your hands, and no matter how good you are at archery, fate will play its part one way or another. Check your arrows before every shot!

Poundage

- See the weapon checking guidelines

There are strict limits on the poundage of any bow or crossbow used at Empire events - as well as the construction and condition of the bow. Please read the weapon checking guidelines for bows to ensure that your bow will be legal to use at our events.

Weapon Check

You must take your bow to the weapon checking team and have it checked before you use it. When you take a bow to weapon check they will ask you to string the bow and then fire it at a nearby target. The aim is to ensure that you know how to string a bow safely and how to pull your shot when firing on nearby players. If the weapon check team are not satisfied that you are able to use a bow safely then you will receive a quick demonstration lesson in how to use a LRP bow safely.

IDV Arrows

IDV tear-drop arrows are not usable at any Profound Decisions events.

Bow Safety

- Ensure that your bow is correctly and securely strung
- Take the distance to your target into account before firing. DO NOT full draw a long bow at a target 10m or less away.
- You must not aim a bow or crossbow at the head.
- Do not parry or strike with your bow! It is NOT a melee weapon

An incorrectly strung bow is a danger to you and other players as well as demonstrating a lack of experience with a bow. You must know how to string a bow correctly.

Modern LRP bows and crossbows are capable of firing a LRP arrow much further than most of the older equipment in use by the hobby a decade ago, even though their poundage at full draw has not changed. It is not safe to fire an arrow at high speed at a close target. If you have a bow you must reduce you draw when firing at nearby targets. You must not draw the bow to normal extension when firing at a target that is 10m or closer to you, you must reduce the draw proportionately.

Crossbows fire much slower than a bow with equivalent poundage. As you cannot reduce the pull for a crossbow you must not fire it at a target closer than 3m.

Using your Bow

- You must check the head, shaft and nock of any arrow or bolt you are given or recover yourself before shooting. Failure to do so may see you removed from the battle or skirmish you are on.
- If your bow has a high poundage, ensure that the limbs are warmed before a large fight

Arrows must be checked every time they are used. It is particularly important to check every arrow before you reuse as an arrow recovered from a battlefield has a high chance of being unsafe. You must choose to either check every arrow before you put it in your quiver - OR - choose to check every arrow before you nock it to fire (you must not switch between these two methods on the battlefield).

The guidelines for all archers checking their arrows are below; if you are unsure then ask a ref or a member of the weapon checking team.

Checking Arrows

- Check the head is secure and free from debris
- Check the shaft is not cracked or split
- Check the arrows does not have missing or loose flights
- Check if the nock is loose or split

New Restrictions

As the incidence of Archery related injuries is still too high at PD events, we have made the following changes to arrows. These new restrictions now apply to all our events.

The arrow head will have a diameter of at least 45mm. Any smaller, eye injuries are a distinct possibility. Arrowheads must have two stage foam construction, fronted by spongy foam at least 20mm thick. The second layer should be 25mm thick. The thick rubber layer (can also be leather) must be at least 3mm thick. The cap must not be brittle and be able to withstand repeated impacts.

The head of an LRP arrow must be soft enough for a close range shot not to damage delicate areas of the body (to account for unforeseen accidents). It must be constructed to be robust, long lasting, and eliminate all possibilities of the arrow shaft punching through the foam to the outside world.

Arrows with round heads will still be permitted, provided that it uses a two-part foam construction as shown.

If you are making your own arrows, then follow these guidelines. Arrows remain the most dangerous element on the battlefield, please make sure that you make them correctly and with care - or don't make them at all.

Arrow Amnesty

To try and ensure the least possible impact for our players, we'll have an amnesty on any "golfball head" arrows you have left at the start of 2017. Bring them to GOD and we'll swap them for £6 of credit on your PD account, usable against any PD event.

Braies are a type of trousers used as undergarments. They are a baggy boxer short style garment, generally hanging to the knees or mid-calf, resembling what are today called shorts.

Brand

Some Navarr choose to dedicate themselves to the service of the people. Those who make this public commitment are called Brands because their oath of service is marked with an actual brand, an indication of how seriously they take the matter. They bear this brand on their left cheekbone, and the design varies with the individual. The brand serves to remind them of their oath, but also to single them out, so that people who are looking for a Brand can easily find one. This life of service can be arduous and difficult, but most Brands shoulder it willingly. Their reward is the acknowledgement and respect they receive from other Navarr.

The remit of a Brand's responsibility may be as large or as small as they choose. Some Brands consider themselves to have pledged their service to the fellow members of their Striding or Steading. Others take a grander view, seeing themselves as servants of the Navarr people or even the entire Empire.

Brands work tirelessly to help their chosen community prosper without charge. They employ their skills to aid others when requested and the best of them seek out ways to help. When a task is too difficult to be accomplished alone, the Brand will ask others for help. When asked to help by a Brand it is implicit that the aid requested is in everyone's best interests.

The Navarr choose who they want to follow, picking their leaders accordingly. In theory anyone who can offer effective leadership and wisdom might attract Navarr to follow but in practice they expect their leaders to be Brands. The Navarr believe that leaders should be servants of the community, so they expect those who would act in that role to swear an oath accordingly. They can be very suspicious of those who seek to lead without first undertaking the Brand's pledge.

There is a great deal of similarity between the oaths of the Brand and those of the Thorn or the Vate. As a result those Brands interested in martial matters are usually also Thorns, whilst those with some mastery of magic may become a Vate as well.

The Brass Coast (Redirected from Brass Coast)

The Freeborn of the Brass Coast are travellers, traders, lovers and poets. They are exuberant and flamboyant; when they laugh their humour is infectious and without spite, when they love they do so with a passion that is without guile and when they're angry, their wrath is like a summer storm – terrible to behold but swift in passing. To be Freeborn is to be driven by a hunger for life, to see the world, to taste every delicacy, sample every wine and tell every tale. Success is measured in wealth, family and influence, not out of greed, but for the joy success brings.

The Freeborn prize individual freedom and responsibility. Although they are capable of serving a cause they have little respect for authority. Pompous or self-important individuals, especially those who think that titles and positions have made them important, are ridiculed on the Coast. Respect is earned, it cannot be bought or appointed.

While others see them as outspoken and brazen, their honesty is without arrogance, for to aggrandise the self is vulgar, while to praise the deeds of another is an art. Their tales are bawdy enough for a common tavern and grand enough for a lordly court alike and can fill a room with laughter, tears or gasps of horror.

Their wagons and ships cross the world bringing exotic goods that command the finest prices. They are renowned for their corsairs, who operate out of the Bay of Catazar. These daring privateers risk everything ensuring that the Empire's enemies are unable to threaten her shores and earning a fortune in gold in the process. It is a dangerous life but one that perfectly suits the Freeborn passion for high adventure.

Five things to know about the Freeborn

- They are notoriously candid. Brazen in person, and disarmingly frank in negotiation, they are never afraid to speak their mind when they want to.
- All things can have a price. The Freeborn believe the fairest way to reckon the worth of something is to put a price on it.
- They prize freedom and responsibility and disdain arrogance. The Freeborn philosophy is that society is best served when every individual is responsible for themselves and to themselves.
- They crave adventure and excitement. None more so than their corsairs who are the terror of the high seas.
- They like agreements to be explicit. The Freeborn like everybody to know exactly what has been agreed to.

What the Freeborn are not

- Desert dwellers. Grassy plains, rocky mountains and shipboard on the ocean are where the Freeborn live.
- Dodgy camel sellers or slave traders. Freeborn traders are upfront and scrupulously honest - the very opposite of the stereotype of the obsequious, wheedling trader.
- Matriarchal or patriarchal. The Freeborn are matrilineal, they take their mother's family name, but other than this their society is completely gender blind. There are no harems or seraglios in the Empire.

The Brass Coast economic interests (Redirected from Brass Coast Economic Interests)

Money is the most versatile tool in existence. Every Freeborn is to one degree or another looking to “make their fortune” because wealth brings status and luxury and it gives you a freedom that is denied to the poor.

Freeborn traders go beyond the frankness that is normal for everyday Freeborn and strive for a degree of honesty that would shame a priest. They regard it as a matter of skill to obtain the best possible price while being utterly open about the goods they sell. This probity is not driven solely by moral concerns, but also practical ones. The Freeborn have achieved an extraordinary reputation for not cheating their customers - a reputation that drives business to their door. Any Freeborn trader who stoops to lying about their merchandise for the sake of a better deal, puts the prosperity of all Freeborn at risk. As a result they protect this reputation very aggressively. Freeborn traders who do seek to twist a deal or sell a light load are dealt with without mercy.

About the only things the Freeborn do not buy or sell are slaves. Slavery of Imperial Citizens is illegal in the Empire, and the Freeborn take no part in the trade even when overseas. While the Freeborn do not hold with slavery, they approve of the idea of hard work as punishment, treating the wages a criminal might have earned doing a job honestly as payment towards the resolution of their crime..

Contracts

When it comes to making financial agreements more complex than a direct exchange of goods, Freeborn are most comfortable dealing through contracts. As a consequence, Freeborn merchants usually seek out the services of a professional scrivener to formalise their relationships. A discreet, neutral scrivener can work out and witness a contract that satisfies both parties, and they are very much in demand. Combining the skill to express ideas simply and clearly in writing with a talent for arbitrating between individuals to help them express what they actually want, these scribes are the backbone of Freeborn economic life.

The Freeborn prefer to abide by the letter of a contract, rather than the “spirit”. Arguments about what was “meant” by the contract are inevitably circular and unhelpful. Where the meaning of a contract must be discussed or clarified, it is again to the professional scrivener that the Freeborn merchant turns. The best scribes are also artists, or employ someone capable of making their contracts look attractive and professional with fine calligraphy and colourful flourishes. A disproportionate number of scribes are of the cambion lineage. Common superstition suggests that their connection to the Autumn realm helps them to instinctively understand how to frame a contract, and their blood marked on a document is traditionally held to grant good fortune to the enterprise involved.

Paradours

When an outsider thinks of a Freeborn trader, they are often thinking of the proprietor of a paradour. Brass Coast towns always have at least one paradour, a communal social house of music, story-telling, drinking and dance. At the end of a hard day of work the people of the Freeborn can often be found here discussing their latest ventures or telling extravagant and grand tales of their ancestors, friends and relatives.

As with most Freeborn businesses, a paradour is traditionally owned by an extended family which may maintain more than one structure, or operate a “travelling paradour” akin to a circus or fair. In addition to the services and entertainments they provide, the best paradours are places of trade. While a lot of formal business takes place at the bazaar, the paradour is where merchants go to relax and it is often where the real business of complex trade takes place. The paradour is where merchants can informally come to an agreement concerning more risky ventures, bulk deals and investment opportunities over chilled fruit and wine.

Corsairs

The Freeborn are not the strongest military in the Empire, but there is one area where their strength is uncontested – on the open seas. Every Freeborn tribe includes dozens of families who make their living as corsairs, sea-borne raiders who prey on barbarian shipping passing through the Bay of Catazar. The Freeborn detest piracy, but they regard privateering as a perfectly legitimate form of warfare, albeit a highly profitable one. Corsair groups are usually Freeborn families who own one or more seaworthy vessels. Corsairs are not just privateers, they commonly engage in foreign trade. A common saying suggests that the only difference between a privateer and a merchant is that the privateers get their goods cheaper.

In the early days of the Empire, the Freebornn often vied with the League to be the first to forge trade links with the foreign nations who are not hostile to the Empire - and the corsairs regularly acted as guards and escorts to Imperial merchant ships off all nations.

Brass Coast Egregore

Dust, Flame and Glass

The Egregore of the Brass Coast carries three names, Dust, Glass, or Flame. Which it answers to seems to depend on the mood of the host, the whims of the egregore, or the needs of the nation.

- Dust dresses comfortably and luxuriantly and talks about the importance of family and plain honest speaking.
- Glass is a quiet philosopher, dressing practically, and likes to talk about the soul and what it means to be Freeborn. Glass also occasionally appears dressed as a kohan.
- Flame prefers the exuberant styling of a sutannir, encouraging parties and celebrations, and to inspire those going to war.

All three are fond of dancing and sharing tales and life. A host may favour one of the three forms or change between them as mood and need arises. They can often be identified by the colour of their tagelmust: Dust favours sandy yellows, Flame favours reds, and Glass favours blues and greens.

Current Hosts

Marcela i Erigo

Marcela i Erigo is one of the current hosts, Marcela hails from the coast. She grew up amongst the traders and corsairs who berthed their ships there, bringing all that was best in the nation, and dealing with travellers from within and without the Empire. She speaks very little of her life before becoming the egregore preferring instead to focus on listening and encouraging the stories of others. What is known is that she has an extensive family, including a younger brother of about 11, and many Aunts and Uncles, that she was a corsair or sailor for her family and is no stranger to fighting (but has suffered a war wound that occasionally flares up) and that she has visited or dealt with Suumah sufficiently to speak the language for trade purposes.

As per Freeborn tradition, when she became egregore, she put aside her family name, taking the nation as family.

Jaime i Guerra

Jaime i Guerra's family was mostly killed during the barbarian attack on Segura. Jaime fled with his younger brother to safety in Madruga but never really settled down: he developed a fascination with the sea that led to him being a corsair, forever travelling over the oceans. Although at times he takes on all three of the faces of the egregore, it is the fiery emotions of Flame that burn brightest in him: he loves laughing, music, partying, and fighting. As he has forged links to more members of the nation through his roles as egregore, he is also starting to become Dust more often.

Sol i Riqueza

Sol i Riqueza is the most recent host of the egregore spirit. A young hakima who has spent 20 years growing up between the northern mountains of Kahraman and the plains of Rojota, developing a love for this land and its fractious families. He has yet to settle truly within each of the faces of the spirit, still learning the moods that fit him best but he has shown clear preferences for embodying the aspects attuned to those Freeborn that are without families, both hakima and kohan.

The Brass Coast culture and customs (Redirected from Brass Coast culture and customs)

Family

Family is important to the Freeborn. They live in extended family groups covering several generations with a strong emphasis on helping and supporting each other. Occasionally Freeborn will extend the privilege of family membership to valued friends, long-term employees or waifs and strays - these adoptees are wholeheartedly welcomed and are treated no different from blood relations. To the Freeborn, betraying your family is unforgivable.

The responsibility that the Freeborn feel for family members does not extend to others. The Freeborn make a point of disclaiming any responsibility for the wellbeing of others. They do not regard themselves as obliged to help the poor or the sick, the dispossessed or the homeless. They may be as charitable as they please, but they refuse to accept that it is their responsibility to care for others.

Hospitality

On the Coast, food and drink is only offered freely to family. Since most Freeborn habitually avoid favours and social debts but all Freeborn enjoy hospitality, both giving and receiving, the custom is always to offer to pay before receiving refreshments. A Freeborn approaching a tent of revelry might ask the price for a seat at the table. A token price of a ring or two indicates that they are very welcome to join, a price in crowns indicates that the meeting is private and the Freeborn should look elsewhere, but an exorbitant price in thrones is a deliberate insult.

Despite the ritualized nature of the exchange, actual payment is required. To the Freeborn mind, it is the payment that ensures that no further obligation exists on the part of either party. For close friends or clearly impoverished a Freeborn might offer a fine meal for help with the dishes or even an afternoon's work. It is easy to be itinerant in Freeborn society, so long as you don't mind working for your supper.

Syrah

Syrah is the ritualized drink of the Freeborn, habitually offered to guests, business associates and drunk during family affairs. Each family carefully guards their own recipe for syrah, and there is a common belief that to give away its secret is to give some of your good luck to another. Syrah can be almost anything, a brew of coffee or tea sweetened with honey or sugar, a fruit juice or a fine wine, but should be pleasant and appealing. It is not strongly alcoholic, since it is intended to be drunk as a family and when business is being discussed. Offering Syrah before the opening of trade negotiations is considered not only polite, but beneficial to the coming talks.

Contracts

Written contracts are exceptionally important in Freeborn culture. The best contracts are short and succinct but clearly identify the obligations of both parties. To the Freeborn mind, making an agreement commits the integrity of their soul to the deal. If they contract to do something their reputation is at stake if they cannot carry out the letter of the contract. For this reason, almost all enduring contracts include fiscal clauses for default. This is not meant as a lack of commitment, but simply to avoid being a hostage to fortune should circumstances change and make it impossible for the parties to complete the deal. The Freeborn see no shame in going back on contracts provided the default bonds are paid - since such defaults are, of course, a part of the letter of the contract.

A scrivener is often employed to help make sure that a contract is clear and that both sides understand their obligations. These professionals also serve as witnesses who can help confirm the validity of a contract. Many scriveners are cambions, and there is a superstition that the blood of a cambion (usually a thumb print) upon a document of trade will bring good fortune to the signatories - or dire circumstance to one who breaks the contract.

Contracts are also a common hearth magic on the Brass Coast.

Art

Calligraphy is highly valued along the Brass Coast. They value books but treasure those that are beautifully illuminated. To the Freeborn, every aspect of writing is an important artistic statement. The language used should be articulate and possess a lyrical quality; the letters and words should be written with bold ink strokes on beautiful paper or parchment that is then decorated and illuminated. Given their emphasis on deals, it is no surprise that the Freeborn prefer their contracts to be beautifully inked. They often display particularly fine examples on the walls of their homes, especially ones that have great sentimental or fiscal value.

Music and dance form the heart of nearly any Freeborn celebration. Passion and enthusiasm are valued over technical precision, and it is common for any musical performance to include well-known songs with which the entire audience can join in.

Marriages and relationships

Freeborn society does not favour men or women but tribal and familial lines are always matrilineal. Because of this while men may marry into a Freeborn family and tribe, women can not. If a Freeborn woman marries then her spouse joins her tribal family. On the rare occasion when two Freeborn women from different tribes marry, they live together but formally remain members of different tribes.

Marriage outside the tribe is relatively rare. Much more common is for Freeborn men and women to form temporary attachments. These attachments are romantic or physical in nature, but with no assumption that they will last for life. In fact with some pairings there is no assumption that they will last more than a night.

All marriages – and indeed most extended attachments – are formalised with a contract in which each participant lays down the parameters of the relationship. A marriage or relationship contract commonly covers matters such as the duration of the relationship, the rights and responsibilities of the participants, the expectation of fidelity and the options for marriage and relationship contracts with others, the division of shared wealth both during and after the relationship ends, and at least one clause covering how the relationship may be ended prematurely by either party. This rather cold-blooded practicality around matters of the heart is just another manifestation of the Freeborn's fiscal approach to life. These contracts ensure that both parties know the value the other places on the attachment. Not all attachments require a contract, but if a relationship is going to last for more than a few weeks, it is considered a sensible precaution against misunderstandings.

Funerals

Freeborn dead are wrapped in spice-infused wraps of black cloth and then burned. The resulting ashes are scattered on the sea, or on the winds of the plain, depending on the family's wishes.

A funeral is rarely a sombre affair. The Freeborn take joy in a life well-lived and they consider it an insult to mourn its passing. Attendees wear brightly coloured robes, and focus on celebrating the life of the deceased. It is normal for the will to be read by a Sutannir at the height of the party. The will is a last chance to share a joke with loved ones and it is traditional for it to be as humorous as possible, akin to a best man's speech at a wedding. On the rare occasion when grief is appropriate, such as with the death of a child, the grieving is much shorter but just as open and intense.

Old tradition says that those lost at sea take new form as dolphins who will guide and guard lost ships. While no-one really believes it these days, it is a stock element in many stories involving sea travel.

A personification of death sometimes appears in Freeborn stories, and is especially popular in plays and as a dramaturgic archetype. As a character, Death is usually mocked as a figure of fun, a bumbling idiot and a clown who can easily be outwitted through courage and cunning. The counterpart of death is Fortune, who personifies ideas of luck and chance as well as fate or destiny. These literary tropes have a deeper philosophical context; such stories often explore the idea that death may come suddenly and without warning, as a result of happenstance or bad luck. This is especially important to a people as dedicated to getting as much out of life as the Freeborn are.

Cambion have a special place in Freeborn society, a tradition that dates back to the murky prehistory of the Freeborn. According to legend a particularly clever cambion (whose origin is usually tied to the teller in some way) convinced the founders to sign a cleverly worded trade agreement. This binding oath is allegedly what has kept the Freeborn together as a people. This story has created a superstition that the blood of a cambion (usually a thumb print) upon a document of trade will bring good fortune to the signatories. As a result Freeborn cambion often study to become scribes.

The calm nature of the merrow is at odds with the fiery Freeborn way of life. Merrow rarely find themselves comfortable in Freeborn society and there are few to be found. Many Freeborn parents of a merrow child will take that child to a spire in Urizen, where the child will find a better life. There is no shame in this; the Freeborn recognize that a merrow will struggle to find a life in the tribes and encourage the parents to make a decision that is seen as being in the best interests of the child. The parting song Without You is traditionally associated with this custom.

The Freeborn Emperor Ahraz i Contero i Guerra, freed the orc slaves and was instrumental in bringing them into the Empire. As a people, they have a great deal of time for the Imperial Orcs, encouraging them to make a place for themselves. On the whole the Freeborn prefer to deal with people honestly - whatever they may look like - and consequently they are amongst the folk most likely to treat a non-human individual as an equal.

Magic is a source of wonder and pleasure to the Freeborn. They expect people performing magic to entertain, and many Freeborn magicians will enhance their rituals with stage magic tricks simply to please the crowd. Some Freeborn learn a handful of non-magical sleight-of-hand tricks or illusions while a few entertainers specialize enough to develop a whole act.

Within a family there is often at least one individual who has made a more serious study of magic. These individuals accept a responsibility for teaching relatives who are interested in learning a few magical knacks, and use their magic to help their family and harm their enemies as well as try to scry the vagaries of fortune and fate. These magicians tend to be practical, and often combine their study of magic with crafting or medicinal lore.

Freeborn ritualists practice a tradition that says ritual magic is the act of building up power from the participants and creating a connection to the Realms, rather than the more traditional assumption that the magician draws power down from the Realms to the world. As such, all their rituals attempt to include their bystanders as participants whether that is chanting, clapping or singing. Magicians of each tribe bring a unique perspective to their magical arts. The Riqueza perform ritual magic using loud, rhythmic, energetic drumming; the Guerra prefer physical movement combined with fire and light. The Erigo use a less energetic style, often accompanying their rituals with soothing, harmonious music. Most Freeborn ritual groups prefer to work magic at night, in the open air, in the same way their founders did.

While ritual magicians within a family are hardly unknown, the more powerful and organised magicians in Freeborn society are the Hakima. These politically active covens view other Freeborn magicians as unsophisticated dabblers at best, and ignorant meddlers at worst. The Hakima are highly skilled practitioners of ritual magic and custodians of magical lore handed down to them by the founders of the tribes. They are dedicated to preserving the integrity of the nation as a whole and regularly look to recruit competent ritual magicians from the tribes into their own circles.

More than being just magicians, the Hakima exemplify a connection to the founders of the tribes and the history of the Freeborn. They are traditionally held to be wise, able to perceive the larger picture more effectively than most Freeborn who are anchored in more mundane activities. They may be consulted when important decisions need to be made within a family, or when magical assistance is sought. They rarely wait to be consulted however – a Hakima is likely to be poking around any important business ready to offer a suggestion as to what to do next.

While the Freeborn nation supports two Imperial armies, organized along traditional lines, most Freeborn families encourage their children to practise some martial skills. The Freeborn remember a time when the families were responsible for their own defence and they try to remain prepared in case that day should come again. Those Freeborn who are not career soldiers are by day traders, farmers and labourers, only turning to martial matters when required, though all are ready to do so.

Many families maintain a small dedicated fighting force, usually family members who have shown a capacity for martial excellence. These warriors protect Freeborn caravans and settlements from bands of raiding orcs or adventurous bandits. Families take pride in equipping their warriors with the best equipment they can afford. These family warriors often train to fight in heavy armour in close formation.

Kohan

Centuries ago, the hakima began to gather Freeborn who had been disowned and turned them into a fighting force. By serving their tribe the Freeborn were able to find a way to redeem themselves. These groups were called kohan, meaning without family, and their number has grown considerably over the years. Although they still accept those who have been cast out, most kohan are volunteers, individuals who find such joy in battle that they cannot give it up. They fight for the joy of battle, flinging themselves into combat with a blood-thirsty relish that can easily dispirit an enemy. Kohan often adopt flamboyant costume and grotesque body paint, the better to unnerve their enemies. When they are not fighting they are usually found celebrating their continued survival with that same intensity.

Groups of kohan usually form loose bands of soldiers who live and fight together, the group serving as a surrogate for the family they have left behind. Groups of kohan are driven by very different reasons but the traditional ones pledge their service directly to a group of hakima. They regard this devotion as a higher calling and see their path as a spiritual one. A “family” of kohan is generally quite loose, and its membership fluid. Indeed, members may come from any of the three tribes, laying aside tribal rivalries for as long as they are part of a kohan band. Kohan who cannot fight due to pregnancy or injury generally return to their birth family either until they are ready to fight again, and sometimes kohan choose to rejoin their original family permanently.

Imperial Armies

The Brass Coast currently fields two imperial armies; the Red Wind Corsairs and the Fire of the South.

The Red Wind Corsairs

The core of this army is made up of corsairs and is in some ways the closest the Empire currently has to a naval force. Many of the soldiers who serve with this army have experience serving as sailors, and the force is supported by a number of boats and ships. The army often takes advantage of this to reinforce and support difficult positions, or move quickly to areas where it can do the most good. The experienced privateers who often serve as officers excel at foraging for supplies in enemy territories, and a portion of the booty they acquire is tithed to the general of the army. The first Brass Coast General leads the Red Wind Corsairs, and is appointed (or re-appointed) at the Summer solstice each year.

The Fire of the South

The soldiers of this army are trained in tactics appropriate to flat, open land. Often recognised by their brightly polished armour, their warriors and supply lines are trained to be especially mobile and responsive to attacks from any direction. This gives them a marked advantage over less adaptive armies, allowing them to cover great distances very quickly. The Music of The Brass Coast

Contents

Style summary

Like the Freeborn themselves, their music is rhythmic, vigorous and fiery. Waily reeded or brass instruments, rich vocal harmonies and the strumming of strings resound in counterpoint with the ever-present syncopation of drums, tambourines and claves. It is said a Freeborn will make an instrument out of anything - hands, cutlery, tables and crockery are all used to enthusiastically accompany performers. Their vocal tradition involves not only the singing of complex melodies and accompaniment, but also encourages others to join in ululating harmonies, drones and chants. The overall impression is vibrant, noisy and enthusiastic - music, like everything in their lives, is to be savoured to the utmost.

Brass Coast music draws on the real world inspiration of Corsican music, Spanish Pilgrim songs, Italian lauda, and New World sea shanties. Although they are a seafaring nation, more traditional English shanties (such as Poor Tom Bowling, The Mermaid etc.) would be better suited to the musical tradition of the Marches.

Commonly known songs

- Riqueza's Dream Telling one version of the tale of the founding of the Brass Coast this song is popular in taverns and Alcazars. It has sparked off several diplomatic incidents by 'accidentally' offending Highborn visitors.
- Sail Away Across the Sea This popular song expresses the Freeborn's joy in a seafaring life.

A musical tradition

Various kinds of performance are inherent to the practice of magic in the Brass Coast. See Brass Coast Magical Traditions for more information.

How to adapt your repertoire

- Never perform without giving your audience a way to join in. Get them clapping or stomping, or tell them to cheer or repeat when they hear certain words. If you are ambitious teach them a simple ostinato to go under the song. It's all about the participation!
- Rhythms could be much lighter than other nations, keep them syncopated (off beat), and on tambourines, castanets, shakers, or light drums. Keep your playing light and bouncy!
- Don't be afraid to ornament when you are singing, have a listen to some waily Spanish or Arabic medieval music and copy the style into the songs you are choosing.

The Freeborn believe their people are shaped from the elements of dust, fire and glass. The eternal wind-blown dust of the plains is their history, the loyalty for family and continuity of their people. The ferocity of fire is their burning passion for life and their bright and unquenchable spirit. The purity of glass is their soul, the reflection of their transparency and once broken can never again be mended. Dishonesty and wickedness shatter your soul and pieces of it are lost with each act of deception.

This belief underpins a very personal relationship with matters of faith and the spirit, one that is rarely articulated directly outside of poetry or song. From the outside the Freeborn seem impious and disrespectful. However the Freeborn have great respect for the Paragons and the Way of Virtue, but they have little time for the priests and Synod that exist to mediate – or dilute - their message. The Synod, with its Doctrines and Heresies, is often seen as being full of pomposity and self-importance, whereas a truly faithful person understands what is true and what is false in their soul. There is a Freeborn Assembly, but it generally has no formal structure outside of the Synod, being more a collection of individuals. The Freeborn Assembly only tends to come together when there is a matter serious enough to warrant the use of its powers.

As a result Freeborn religious ceremonies tend to place their emphasis on celebration rather than sermons. They celebrate sacred festivals with entertainment, feasting, parties and dancing. Many families include a devout priest or spiritual family member who can be relied on to oversee these indulgences, but for the largest and most important festivities the Freeborn seek out the services of a sutannir.

A cross between a professional priest and a party organizer, sutannir conduct important ceremonies such as the coming of age or a wedding, and see to the spiritual needs of the Freeborn as a whole. Before the ceremony many paint their face and limbs with stylised flames in bright colours and dress in flamboyant costumes. A good sutannir will keep their words short and evocative, knowing audiences prefer to be inspired to virtue rather than lectured. When not speaking they manage the entertainments to make sure that everyone attending is drawn into the celebrations. While it may be the festivity that the Freeborn remember rather than the ceremony, the best sutannir are able to provide religious instruction and support without labouring their point.

Coal-walking, fire breathing, fire dancing and other symbolic performances that represent the Freeborn passion for life are always popular at Freeborn religious celebrations. Lone sutannir will hire sufficient entertainers and artisans skilled at these activities to fill the night's entertainment, concentrating on managing their performances to ensure the best overall impact. Sutannir groups usually include numerous talented performers in their ranks who can cover most of the skills most commonly in demand.

Sutannir also perform funeral ceremonies.

Feast of the Broken Wheel

The only festival the sutannir do not perform is the Feast of the Broken Wheel, known by many as Fool's Day. On this day, the Freeborn turn virtue on its head and celebrate the contrary. The festival takes place on the second day of the Autumn Equinox, and starts at sunset and lasts until midnight. The proud become humble, ties of loyalty may be ignored, the prosperous become ascetic and the wise act as fools. It is a time of foolishness, pranks and trickery that begins with a symbolic chase, where seven effigies of the Paragons are chased from the camp in a gleeful and chaotic parade. Everyone is encouraged to try harmless skills like juggling and music – the more terrible the performance the more it is applauded. The festival usually ends in a drunken stupor. On Fool's Day, even the most moral Freeborn try their hand at telling untruths and lies - often with comical degrees of success.

The festival is considered blasphemous by some in the Imperial Synod but, to date, the Freeborn Assembly has done little to discourage it, or penalise those involved. Some have argued that, by permitting it, it helps the Freeborn embrace The Way more readily for the rest of the year.

Last night, Ramak invited me to what he said was a religious ceremony. This morning, my head is pounding and I will never eat again. We did not talk about Courage, but we danced on fire. We did not contemplate Prosperity, but we enjoyed the finest things from many lands. We did not read about Pride, but sang the songs of our homelands till our throats were hoarse. I can attest the Freeborn care deeply about the fate of their souls – but they just do not speak of it as we do.

Bravash

The Seedpod, Rune of Fertility

Affiliated with the Realm of Spring

Bravash is the Seedpod, and represents nature in uncounted variety; it represents the drive to procreate and the cycle of growth from seed to tree to fruit to seed again. It is symbolic of life's ability to beget life in its own image as well as the unthinking and unending urge to create new life in a thousand different forms. It is strongly affiliated with agriculture; when evoked to enhance the fertility and abundance of a field it is called the Plough.

It is also commonly called the Goat, representing the savagery of the natural world. It is the instinct to drive off competitors, the cruelty of nature and the drive to spread and occupy every niche. Combined with Hirmok the Scythe, the Autumn Rune of Dominion, it represents domesticated beasts whose fertility serves their human masters.

This rune has special significance in The Marches. Farmers might evoke it as they sow seed, and it is usually inscribed on the dolmens that dot the fertile countryside. In Highguard Bravash is sometimes associated with the propagation of the Way of Virtue, and in Urizen and Navarr with the spread of ideas, recognizing the chaotic way that thought spreads and develops over time.

Using Bravash in magic

Bravash is evoked with magic that causes living things to become fruitful. It can also be used to enhance the general health and vitality of a living person or natural place. It is often used with magic that is intended to spread in a predictable fashion, or that is intended to encourage wild growth.

Crafting with Bravash

Couples throughout the Empire inscribe the rune of Bravash on their beds, either upright or inverted, depending on whether or not they wish for a child (although relying on the rune alone is a risky proposition at best). It is also inscribed on farm tools, or over the lintels of animal pens for the same reason. Many apothecaries use the rune to mark preparations that are intended to enhance or restore virility or vitality, or occasionally inverted to signify preparations that cause lethargy or prevent conception.

Brave Varushka Forth

by Stephanie Heath and Anna Clifford-Tait

Recording here: Brave Varushka Forth

A cry that echoes in the valleys Heed the call from beyond the sea
Though the baying wolves are gath'ring Now must start the first journey

Chorus: Strangest lands await us Brave Varushka forth Set your course before the winter
Keep a watch upon the North

Sons and daughters of the mountains Chase the dream, abate your fear
Brave the shadows, fight the darkness Those you leave will shed no tear

Travel fast, the Wardens guarding Step not first among the trees
Bring us back your tales of gladness Songs of life to stir the bees

Sons and daughters of the mountains Forge your name upon the field
Though some may fall beneath the shadow With shattered sword and splintered shield

Those you leave will call you homeward Those you leave will sing your names
We will keep the hearth fire burning Bravest heroes, seek your fame.

Bravo

When employing soldiers, their possession of good manners is slightly less important than their ability to regurgitate cooked lobsters.

Military heritage

Many bravos start as ruffians, thugs and even petty criminals on the streets of The League cities. They come to the attention of a free company or guild through a combination of bravado and raw talent. Aping the attitudes of the free companies, gangs of aspiring bravos engage in fights and acts of petty vandalism and disobedience. Some end up dead, some end up falling foul of the law and some are lucky enough to attract the attention and patronage of a guild or free company. Even those who fall foul of the law may find themselves in a free company - it is a common punishment for unruly men and women with some level of chutzpah to be sentenced to life as a soldier of the League.

Bravos are men and women known for their swagger. Their behaviour is loud and loutish - they drink, carouse and fight among themselves when they are off duty. They are not simply thugs - they are unruly and boisterous, but they reserve their violence for each other and members of rival free companies. When they are in the field, an element of this braggadocio remains, but it is tempered by the seriousness of war.

The behaviour of off-duty bravos is seen as an useful safety valve - an opportunity for fighting men and women to blow off a little steam. They often refer to being "at licence" - they literally are given permission by their commanding officer to squander their money gambling, drinking and whoring as long as they remember that they are representing the honour of their free company. As long as nobody is killed or permanently maimed, and as long as property damage is kept within manageable limits, the rest of League society tends to turn a blind eye.

This unruly, swaggering behaviour serves a dual purpose. In addition to relaxing or blowing off steam, it serves as an advertisement for the free company. If a drunken brawl results in one free company trouncing the bravos of another, the victors are more likely to win lucrative contracts. By the same token, if a bravo murders someone or shows disrespect for the rules, it reflects badly on the entire free company and the likelihood of employment is reduced. In a way, it is a military expression of the same drive that causes other citizens of The League to engage in displays of wit and savoir faire - it keeps them sharp, and leaves others in no doubt as to their skills.

In many cases, the reputation of a band of bravos is enough to ensure that their employer is untroubled. In part, a free company is often paid to be larger than life, and even bravos stationed in a city to protect the interests of a merchant prince are likely to spend some time being seen, and ensuring everyone remembers their reputation and skill with casual violence.

If a band of bravos - or more than one band - damages property or possessions, it is traditional for their commanding officer to ensure that all losses are covered in cash by the next evening. Provided the payment is forthcoming, magistrates are generally not involved. If more than one band of bravos is involved, it is traditional for each company to offer full payment, meaning that when two bravos smash up an inn or brothel, the owner ends up with twice as much money as the damage that has been done, further discouraging the populace from complaining about the behaviour of the bravos.

All of this can occasionally cause problems when a free company comes into contact with a military unit from another Nation. Soldiers and warriors from outside The League are often unaware of the unwritten rules of bravo behaviour and mistake an invitation to a brawl for a serious threat to life and limb.

Creating a bravo

Bravos are fighting men and women, first and foremost. The most common way to play a bravo is to design a free company. Free companies move around, and so bravos may come from any part of the League, or even beyond. A bravo is likely to still feel some loyalty to their city of their birth however, and balancing loyalty to your city and your free company could create interesting tension for your character.

Almost all bravos fight. Younger bravos tend to focus on combat skills, while officers and older bravos may pick up a few other areas of interest.

Free companies often include members who are not bravos, especially medical characters, and are likely to have at least one character who handles contracts and money. These characters may or may not buy into the bravo lifestyle.

It is possible to play a bravo who is not part of a free company. The swagger and bragadoccio of the bravos is adopted by warriors all over The League, and the personal guards of a merchant prince or bishop, the streetwise protectors of a mountebank or even the boisterous "stage hands" of a troupe of magicians can all be interesting options for a bravo.

Playing a bravo

Bravos are expected to be boastful, larger-than-life characters, who display a cocky and swaggering attitude. They squander their money gambling and having a good time, and take advantage of the informal attitudes of The League to cause a little trouble. They brag about their successes, sometimes exaggerating them out of all proportion, and disparage the achievements of other soldiers to goad them into a fight. At the same time, though, they know on some level that they only get away with this because it is largely harmless, and because they make up for any bad feelings they might cause by being relatively disciplined soldiers when it comes to the crunch.

Being able to provide the rough and dirty insult that sparks off a fight between rivals is a valuable skill for a bravo, but there is a line between having fun and being offensive. The violence that bubbles below the surface of a Bravo should still be used as an excuse to roleplay with others rather than slip into out-of-character bullying.

The idea that the bravos are walking advertisements for their free companies extends even to those who are part of other group structures - by displaying the right attitude, you draw attention to your merchant prince, troupe or bishop. By the same token, if you are a criminal it reflects badly on your companions.

The bravo should rarely pass up an opportunity to show off. Actively challenge other bravos to contests of physical prowess and combat skill, and feel free to extend this attitude to warriors from other Nations. If you discover that a certain bunch of Marcher yeomen likes to sit at a certain table in the bar, occupy it with your friends and challenge them to make you move. If you find out that a certain Dawnish knight likes a quiet cup of tea at a Highguard teahouse, crash their party and see if their companions have the stones to ask you to leave.

When it comes to the battlefield, keep the attitude but remember that at the end of the day you need to survive and defeat your enemies to be taken seriously.

Some of the early scenes from The Three Musketeers (1973) film, between the musketeers and the Cardinal's Men, capture the spirit of competing bravos, as do any number of other military-themed films featuring larger-than-life characters full of machismo up to and including the space-station brawls in Starship Troopers or the rough interplay of the marines in Aliens.

Bravo's Blade

Description

The Bravo's Blade is a savage weapon, capable of inflicting devastating damage on an opponent. It is said that even those not from the Free Companies develop the bravo swagger with one of these swords on their belt. However, bravos themselves are unlikely to draw one of these blades in one of their all-to-common tavern brawls because the blade is too lethal. This has led to the belief among warriors in other nations that a bravo only draws such a blade to kill – a story the bravos themselves only encourage!

There are tales in Sarvos of an infamous mage-assassin who wielded a Bravo's Blade and rod. They first cast the venom spell then followed up with a blow from the Bravo's Blade. The assassin wore a mask and was never identified, and became known as the Maledict, from the potion bottle left behind at the scene of every crime.

In some Varushkan histories the tyrant-boyar Alderei the Fair was said to have wielded an artefact-quality blackened sword with the properties of a Bravo's Blade. This had led some schlacta to believe that they should never follow a commander that bears a Bravo's Blade, lest they play some part in the return of the dark king. This, of course, does not stop them being popular in Varushka. They are particularly valued among the wardens.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of a one-handed weapon.
- Requirement: Any character can bond to this item.
- Effect: You may spend a hero point to call IMPALE with this one-handed weapon.
- Materials: Crafting a Bravo's Blade requires twenty ingots of tempest jade, seven ingots of orichalcum, seven ingots of green iron and five measures of dragonbone. It takes one month to make one of these items.

The heavy set Yeomen thumped after me. They were all trussed up in heavy leathers and light mithril chain hauberks. There were five of them and one of me.

"Pay up, you was cheating us" said one of their big dirty faces.

I reached the end of the alley. I'd taken a wrong turn. It was a dead end.

"Now, now, ladies and gentlemen, I'm sure we can settle this reasonably. All I was doing was winning," I replied and gave them one of my finest smiles.

"Yeah," they said while brandishing heavy cudgels and wicked looking daggers "with these."

Now normally I could have taken all eight of them, but I was wearing my best dress and I didn't want to get too much muck on it. I drew my blade. The tempest jade foil glistened in the moonlight. I gave them my award-winning smile again.

"Well then, en garde," I held the thin rapier out towards the brutes, even in the half light they could see what it was.

They took a step back, one ran and then they all ran. One tripped and fell into the gutter. I swear on my rings he wet himself. I kicked him in the ribs for good measure and left for the next tavern.

Now how about that drink you owe me?

Braying Horns of War

Rules

Autumn Magnitude 20

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets a banner; at least two members of that banner are required. Each character must be present throughout.

The ritual also requires a physical standard which must be present during the ritual.

This spell is an enchantment. A target may only be under one enchantment effect at a time.

Effects

All characters in the banner gain the ability to travel together to a battle or skirmish that their national banner is not attending. The effects automatically extend to new characters who join the banner, and are lost if a character leaves the banner. This does not allow characters or banners to attend more battles or skirmishes than normal.

The ritual enchants the shared bond possessed by all members of the banner; it does not count as an enchantment on the individual members of that banner.

The effect lasts until the start of the next Profound Decisions Empire event.

Description

This enchantment is very similar to the effect of a magical Mercenary Banner. It is most popular in The League where it is seen as a viable alternative to relying on that magical standard - allowing members of a Free Company to select an enchanted standard that better suits their fighting style. Some magically-adept Imperial Orcs see this ritual as a possible way to advance the plan, by allowing legions to fight on various fronts - although others protest that this may stretch their forces too thinly.

It is also somewhat popular with the Freeborn, whose restless and individualist leanings mean that they often have good reasons to attend battles other than those chosen by the Freeborn general; in these cases the entire family often gets together for an evening of feasting and celebrating before the Hakima perform the ritual, generally following a reassurance that the targeted banner will fight in the interests of the Brass Coast - or its philosophies.

The ritual is likewise useful to both Navarr and Urizen warrior contingents. Being able to offer assistance in return for political aid, or to provide vital skills or magic on a battlefield, are both good reasons to perform this ritual; while it targets a banner, there is no reason that such a banner could not be made up entirely of magicians, doctors, scouts or ritualists.

Common Elements

When performing this ritual, an actual standard or similar item that represents the unity of the target banner forms the focus. The standard is usually held by a soldier from the banner, and serves as a symbol of the bond that unites members of the target band. The ritual often involves recitation of the banner's oath, and while it requires only two members to be present it is common for the entire band to attend the ritual. As the title suggests, martial music such as marching drums, the sounding of horns or trumpets and the songs of soldiers are a common accompaniment to this ritual.

The rune Lann is often evoked with this ritual, but so is the rune of conspiracy; the constellation of The Chain or The Web may be evoked, and a dramaturgical performance (or tale) involving The Captain or The Bishop and The Counting House is common.

Brazen Claws of the Lictor

Rules

Autumn Magnitude 14

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets a character, who must be present throughout. The target character must have the magician skill.

This spell is an enchantment. A target may only be under one enchantment effect at a time.

Effects

The target gains the ability to cast the entangle spell four times per day as if they knew it without spending any mana.

They also experience a roleplaying effect: you are reminded of every favour or debt you owe, or are owed, and of every grudge you bear against people who have wronged you. It is hard to resist the urge to settle grudges, especially if those people are nearby.

If the target regains all spent personal mana by resting in a magical aura such as that provided by the Chamber of Delights, or drinks an Elixir of Empyrean Art, they also regain all spent uses of this ability at the same time. Other methods of restoring personal mana do not restore uses of the ENTANGLE call.

The effect lasts until the start of the next Profound Decisions Empire event.

Additional Targets

This ritual can affect additional characters from the same coven. Each additional character increases the magnitude by 11. Additional characters must be present throughout.

Option

Any caster who has mastered the ritual may choose to substitute green iron for crystal mana when contributing to it. Every 2 ingots of green iron spent counts as 1 crystal mana when contributing to the ritual.

Description

This enchantment allows the target to wrap their enemies in invisible chains, As with Stance of the Constricting Scourge this ritual allows the target to restrict the moment of their opponent with a simple strike from a weapon or implement, without requiring additional spellcasting. It is useful against skirmishing opponents on the battlefield, but it is also sometimes used to help capture gangs of fugitive criminals.

The ritual evokes themes of ownership, punishment and control. It encourages the target to take vengeance on those they consider to have wronged them, meaning it is often viewed with suspicion by followers of the Way. At the same time this reminder of past offences against the target or their family is seen as a bonus in some parts of The Marches, where the people have long memories. It also reminds the target of debts owed or owing; this gives it particular resonance with the dead reckoning of The League, and coincidentally ensures that the targets become aware of any debts they incur or that are incurred while under the influence of the enchantment.

The Autumn Eternals known as the Lictors are not themselves directly invoked by this ritual, despite the fact that it delivers similar powers to those these creatures are said to wield. The Lictors hunt oath-breakers, and those who refuse to honour agreements, contracts or obligations. They are said to resemble hooded figures wrapped in heavy iron and green iron chains, with razor-sharp brass claws and horns, and iron face-masks. Armed with scourges, whips, flails, ropes and nets they stalk the dark places of the Autumn realm. According to some stories, they can be summoned to pursue, capture and punish those who have broken important oaths or refused to honour their debts.

Common Elements

This ritual invokes powers of binding, capturing and punishment. It often includes instruments of restraint such as chains, ropes, nets and even ribbons. Targets may be wapped in chains or ropes by the ritualists. Invocations of heros, Paragons and Exemplars whose stories include tracking, chasing and capturing fugitive (such as the Paragon Vardas) are a common element. The rune Hirmok may be painted on the targets, and the trappings of judges, thief-takers, bounty hunters and badgers may all be used. In The League it is common to place metal masks on the targets, or ask them to recite a list of debts they wish to collect. Similarly in The Marches a series of grudges might be recounted.

Tokens of green iron are often used in this ritual - even if the metal is not being used to empower the target directly tokens made from these materials may be given to the targets.

Brazier of Benediction

Description

These talismans may consist of anything from a simple earthenware bowl or fire pots to an intricately carved silver or gold vessel. Also known as a Censer of Benediction, this is a religious talisman used to offer additional potency to ceremonies of consecration. At its most basic it takes the form of a vessel used for burning incense or aromatic herbs as part of a ceremony. Generally the liao used as part of the consecration is added to the material burnt in the item and the resultant fumes inhaled - some mystics will also pour any potion they are using into the flames.

A priest who uses one of these handy talismans is able to create - or remove - significantly more durable auras than normal by using additional liao. In Highguard and Urizen particularly, one of these items may be called a Brazier of Purification, partially in reference to the idea of filling an area with "pure" virtuous power but also in reference to its usefulness in dismantling corrupt or malign auras that may have infused an area. Some specialist Stewards of the Dead combine this regalia with a suitable vestment, such as a Wayfarer's Robe, allowing them to cleanse haunted areas of extremely potent malignancies.

As with almost all priestly regalia, a Brazier of Benediction is often hallowed with an aura that helps the priest to fulfil their chosen role. Popular choices include all those hallows which encourage a priest to rouse, recruit, exalt, or empower other people in the name of Virtue.

Rules

- Form: Talisman. Takes the form of ceremonial regalia. You must be wearing this item to use its magical properties.
- Requirement: You must have the dedication skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: When you perform or cooperate with the performance of the consecration skill, you may spend up to three additional doses of liao to increase the strength of the ceremony by the same amount.
- Materials: Crafting a Brazier of Benediction requires five measures of ambergelt, five ingots of green iron, three ingots of orichalcum, and five measures of dragonbone. It takes one month to make one of these items.

Bregasland

The Dour Fens

Sandwiched between the barbarian-held woods of Liathaven, the southern Jotun kingdoms, and the sea, lies Bregasland. The territory is primarily made up of freshwater fenland. Home to “Bregas” (fenlanders), this is a place of small islands of abundantly fertile soil, surrounded by seemingly endless marshes where eels are caught. There are several households here made up entirely of merrow, and several settlements populated by people who have been shunned but cannot bring themselves to leave the Marches.

Bregasland is home to partially sunken ruins, including several stone circles that pre-date Marcher possession of the land. For some reason the marshwalkers that are comparatively common in the marshes tend to leave these ruined structures alone. It is also home to dangerous man-eating lizards, giant insects, flesh-eating plants, bottomless bogs and strange lights that seek to lure the incautious into deadly situations. Those who explore the depths of the marshes here sometimes disappear without trace ...

Recent History

Since the Jotun took Liathaven there has been an increase in raiding along the southern borders of Bregasland. Many residents are concerned that the barbarians will launch a major assault through the Rushes and Gravenmarch. Bregasland has a few forts, but they are generally small, isolated, and mostly located along the western borders. Building a major fortification is hampered by the boggy ground. In recent years, the area has seen regular emplacement of magical fortifications, raised against potential Jotun invasion by Imperial magicians.

Shortly before the Spring Equinox 381YE, and following on from the disasters that plagued the marches during late 379YE and early 380YE, work was completed on a network of granaries and storehouses across Bregasland as part of the Imperial Breadbasket great work.

Points of Interest

Graven Rock

This enormous smooth flat grey-stone plateau approximately 4 miles in each direction, extends from the ground with a gently sloping face of only fifty metres or so. From a great height it has the appearance of a large flat pebble buried in the ground with only its upper-level surface exposed. This unusual stone deposit sits in some of the largest expanses of dry, fertile territory in Bregasland, in the region of Gravenmarch. The outer surface of the rock is covered in various entrances and doorways, which are the evidence of many hundreds of years of mining and excavation of the rock's rich mineral core. The ore deposits are largely played out today, but there are still mine workings beneath Graven Rock that are in use. It stands near the town of Graven, one of the largest settlements in Bregasland, and contributed directly to the wealth of the citizens there. Shortly before the Spring Equinox 381YE, work was completed in one of the deeper caves to create a sinecure that provides mana to the Keeper of the Dour Fens.

Fisher's Rock

Another eerie stone protruding from the marshes, Fisher's Rock is black stone mound that emerges from the North Fens near Greywater. Atop it is a ruined tower ascribed to the Sentinel. It is said to be haunted, and there are many local stories of strange lantern lights around the rock that lead people astray. The immediate area sometimes yields peculiar treasures - old cups, coins, and sometimes more significant artefacts. As a result, some of the local clannish merrow spend their time as prospectors; although they are as likely to return bloated with giant marshspider poison as they are to return with something of interest.

Rushring

A partially submerged stone circle, the notorious site of a number of ritual killings in 365YE. It stands at the centre of one of the so-called dead meres of the Grey Fens, and both local Marchers and Feni alike give it a wide berth. Local legend claims that there are thirteen stones in the Rushring, but accounts differ wildly, in some cases claiming there are as many as thirty-nine. There are likewise many stories about what the circle represents. Some claim it is a band of Jotun orcs turned to stone by a canny landskeeper, while others claim the stones mark the site of some terrible crime or ancient magical accident, perhaps that associated with the formation of the dead meres themselves.

Rum beasts

The Marches are not Varushka, but that is not to say that it is a nation devoid of magical threats. Many Marcher sailors and fisherfolk are familiar with the dangerous shapeshifters that can be found in the Gullet, for example. Ghosts and hauntings are uncommon, but known across the Marches. Strange creatures of the realms may be found anywhere there are regio.

Nowhere else in the Marches, however, are there quite so many stories of odd beasts and dangerous spirits as Bregasland. How real these creatures are is hard to say for certain. Western Bregas swear that the fens are home to eerie nocturnal ebon hounds that spell disaster for anyone who looks at them too closely. Wherever there is deep water, hungry bogs, or shifting paths there are stories of floating lights that lead travelers astray which are said to be the hateful spectres of men and women who drowned alone in the swamps. There are said to be certain trees that hate humans, and kill lone travellers with magical lures and strangling roots. Some of the people allegedly falling prey to these threats are likely the victims of Feni, or bandits, or their own poor luck traversing trackless marsh. Yet there are dangerous mundane creatures as well - the most common natural threat to Bregas are the giant marshspiders whose natural ability to camouflage themselves against the mud and the rushes and lethal venom makes them an uncommon, but potentially fatal, threat to the unwise.

Marcher characters from the fen are encouraged to come up with local folk tales of dangerous monsters from the deep fens, with an eye toward eerie, misunderstood threats appropriate to folklore rather than more traditional tabletop roleplaying monsters.

Regions

Gravenmarch

Gravenmarch borders Mitwold, Mournwold, and Liathaven, and is sometimes called "the only dry spot in Bregasland" (OOO Note: Unlike the rest of Bregasland, Gravenmarch does not have the marsh quality). The soil here is fertile, and the gentle eastern hills and well-irrigated western fields are dotted with farms, villages, and hamlets. The largest settlement in Bregasland, the town of Graven is found here, in the shadow of Graven Rock. The town grew rich from a combination of high fields and the mineral wealth extracted from the Rock. In happier times Navarr merchants and stridings regularly passed through on their way north from Liathaven, with news and trade-goods from far afield. As with many parts of Bregasland, the people of Graven have a reputation for being odd - but in this case it is due to the number of them who started their lives far away and were brought here by a Navarr guide. Today, Graven is known for the good quality stone it supplies to construction efforts across the Marches, and for the garrison that keeps a wary eye on the orcs of the forest and the Mourn.

Grey Fens

Quality: Marsh

The Grey Fens are the deepest, darkest parts of Bregasland. The exact location of the western border is a matter for some debate - it is impossible to say where Bregasland ends and the Blutgahn marshes of Hordalant begin. The area is one of the least populated parts of the Marches, with a scattering of isolated hamlets that very much keep themselves to themselves. There is believed to be at least one large clan of Feni in Grey Fens, although the nature of their relations with the Imperial citizens in the area is largely unknown.

The Grey Fens have a number of so-called dead meres - open areas of standing water where no fish are found. The water is clear and appears fresh, but drinking it leads to crippling stomach cramps and, if the imbiber is already weak, may result in death. Landskeepers have studied the dead meres in the past, but about all they have discovered is that they are the result of some ancient curse. Locals know to stay away from the dead meres; on nights of the new moon the water is said to glow with an eerie, pale effulgence that is said to cause madness in anyone exposed to it. One of the best known of the dead meres is the one that surrounds the Rushring stone circle.

North Fens

Qualities: Marsh, Coastal

To the west of North Fens lie the southern Jotun kingdoms, while its northern border runs along the southern coast of the Gullet. The shore is scattered with small fishing villages. As one travels west, each village is said to be a little more insular until the westernmost villages and farms of North Fens are said to border on the xenophobic. North Fens is the site of Fisher's Rock.

The largest settlement in North Fens is Greywater, which is said to mark the furthest west that any wise Marcher will go. The locals make their living primarily from eel-fishing, but since this isn't a trade that leads to many exports, some of the more daring among them will scour the surrounding marsh for unusual plants and flowers. These are dried, and sold through the markets at Meade for study across the Empire. The small town takes its name from slip clay stirred up by frequent storms: it's not the best water to drink. A thriving market in pure water exists here, with fresh water from the estuary left to settle in vast oak tanks and then carefully decanted. "Too poor to drink water" is a local phrase applied to the truly destitute, who are forced to drink dirty water.

Ottermire

Quality: Marsh

Along the shores of the Westmere stretched Ottermire. The yeomanry here are roughly split between fishing the deep waters of the Westmere, and tending to herb gardens and mana sites deeper in the marshes. The most populous settlement in Ottermire is Ottery which stands at the western end of Odd's Way, and at the northern end of the Sallow Walk. Both roads are notable because they are built atop thick packed-earth causways, crossing the marshes to Odd's End in Oddmure and Sallow in the south respectively. Locals, of course, refer to both causways as the Otterway, differentiating between the two by stressing the first or second syllable, this causes endless confusion among outsiders. The town itself is a small fishing port that trades the produce of the marshes to Meade and, has a history of sending boats across the Westmere to trade with the Winterfolk.

There are many local stories of boats travelling across the Westmere to Kallavesa, and a number of the Marcher families here show signs of having Wintermark blood in their ancestry. Indeed, the area is notable even among the notoriously eerie Bregas for adoption of certain mystic practices - albeit seen through the lens of stubborn Marcher tradition and allegedly distorted enough that they are barely recognisable to their northern practitioners.

The Rushes

Quality: Marsh

The Rushes are marshy, like most of the rest of Bregasland, but the further south one goes the more solid the ground becomes. In southern Rushes there are a few more traditional farms, raising crops not unfamiliar to Marchers from Mitwold and Upwold. The most common industry in the Rushes, perhaps unsurprisingly, is cutting and drying rushes for use in roofing and flooring across the Marches.

The only settlement of note here is Sallow, which lies at the southern end of the Sallow Walk that connects the region with Ottermire in the north. Sallowfolk keep themselves to themselves to a degree found off-putting even by other Bregaslanders. Behaving in a manner the folk of Sallow find too familiar, or prying too closely into local affairs, can sometimes result in long knives being drawn - the same long knives they use to cut the rushes that are the main export of the area. Someone bearing a Sallow-cut is recognised across Bregasland as someone who takes liberties, or has a little too much interest in the doings of their neighbours.

A common slur directed at the people of the Rushes, and at Sallowfolk in particular, is that they have closer relations with the Feni than is either wholesome or legal. People of the Rushes take such accusations extremely personally although many of them do not even bother to refute them before reaching for their rushing knives.

OOC Notes

- All the regions of Bregasland are under Imperial control
- Attempting to build a permanent fortification in Bregasland anywhere other than Gravenmarch is likely to encounter some difficulties.
- Under normal circumstances, the Imperial Breadbasket great work gives every Marcher character who owns a farm a share of 1080 rings. As of the Senate decision to amend the use of the Imperial breadbasket in Summer 381YE, the benefits are not being received as the effects are being funneled to support the Mournwold.
- Some of the prominent households of Bregasland are detailed here.

Resources in Bregasland

As with all Marchers, residents of Bregasland are likely to control farms, or businesses if they are residents of a market town. Unlike the other Marcher territories, however, the yeomen of Bregasland (outside of Gravenmarch) are much less likely to farm traditional crops. In Bregasland, a farm might represent an eel-farm, or an area where rushes or peat are gathered. A character who lives along the Gullet or the Westmere might even use a farm to represent a small number of fishing boats - vessels that stay close to the shore rather than the kind of vessel a trader may use to visit foreign ports,

More common in Bregasland than perhaps anywhere else are herb gardens and mana sites. Bregasland is an eerie place, and the people who live there have a well deserved reputation for mysterious lore and uncommon wisdom.

The least common resource in Bregasland is likely to be a mine - outside of Gravenmarch, the marshes are simply too wet and too lacking in mineral wealth to easily justify a mine. Of course, any character can choose any sort of personal resource - its simply easier to explain some choices in Bregasland than others.

Briar liar

"When they saw what I was, they attacked me, beat me senseless, punching and kicking me when I were down - and then the biggest of them split my skull open with four blows of his cudgel! Even that weren't enough for them - they wanted to see me dead, so they dragged me to the river and threw me in. I woulda drowned too - if not for my sister pulling me out."

The Marcher crowd stirred to the words of the passionate young Briar. At one side a pair of old Landskeepers stood shaking their heads, but the lad and his sister had gathered a large group. It was clear that the people he wanted to talk to were hanging on his words."

"Don't you see - we're all drowning here. Them in charge are beating us all down. The Carstokes tried to murder me - just for being a Briar - because that's what them in power think of us. We have to stop letting them beat us down - we have to fight back!"

The lad's speech had attracted more than a few briars and several of them cheered the last, but it was clear that this talk of fighting back was upsetting the crowd. A few were looking around nervously as if worried that they might be seen here.

Before the lad could speak again a girl, dressed in Bolholt colours, but with the blazon of the militia stepped out of the crowd to challenge him.

"Carstokes did this you say? Where's your proof?"

The crowd fell silent, watching the confrontation. The boy look surprised to be called out, but his face brightened half way between a smile and sneer - as if glad to be challenged. He pulled up his shirt and slowly revolved to show a body covered in Briar patches. The crowd gasped, the evidence of the Carstokes violence compounded by their fear of the Spring infection. He cast a triumphant look at the Bolholt girl, but she was clearly uncowed by his display

"It's a good story Tobin - or whatever you're calling yourself this week. But it can't have been the Carstokes who did this to you. Because two weeks ago, you were up at Tower March and that day you claimed it were the Trammels who did this to you. And if folk want to know why I've been following you round the March, it's because half a moon earlier you were in the market place five miles from my uncle's farm claiming it were the Bolholts did this to you. And funny thing is - your appearance matches a report from Anvil of a Briar there claiming that the Talbots beat him half to death and then tried to finish the job with a drowning."

The sneer fell from the boy's face like winter ice sliding off a spring roof. "Lies" he shouted, but his guilt was painted on his face like a Dawnish shield. "This ain't militia business - I've broken no laws."

At this the girl smiled as she renewed her assault. "Bruised apples have black cores. You're right that I can't arrest you for being a damn liar and I can't arrest you for being a dman fool. But being a thief is a different matter. Two nights ago, the Carstokes lost a young sheep from their farm, not from the fields by a wolf - but from the barn. But this morning I see you and your sister sharing a meal of prime mutton... So Briar Tobin - I am arresting you and her on suspicion of theft."

Afterwards nobody could quite agree on what exactly had happened next. A few witnesses at the front say the briar lept at the Bolholt girl with a knife, but the two landskeepers say it were the other way round - that the girl went for the briar with a knife in hand. Everyone agreed that amid the screaming and the panic it was difficult to be certain who stabbed who. What was certain is that Tobin and his sister had fled, and young Margary Bolholt, barely a citizen and still the youngest member of the militia at 15 was dead - stabbed twice, once in the ribs and a second in the neck.

Overview

A young briar has been travelling the Marches making black claims of everyone with any connection to power in the Marches. He was tracked to Birchland and confronted there by a young member of the militia - but he killed the young woman and fled the scene. Magistrates have asked all law-abiding citizens to keep an eye out for the suspect and pass word to the militia as soon as possible.

Significance

Attempts to expose the falsehoods spouted by this ne'er-do-well have had mixed success. Those who accept his outrageous stories are being fed a palatable meal of wrongs left unrighted, of traditional bias. Worse, he couples his rhetoric with more subtle calls to "his people" to stick together and help each other to stand up for themselves against what he describes as an oppressive system dedicated to keeping them down. .

By himself, this young firebrand is only a small threat to the stability of the Marches. Unfortunately, the longer he remains at large, the more people will hear his poisonous lies, and the more dangerous he might become.

Resolution

The Briar demagogue remains at large.

Brigandine

A Brigandine is a coat of armour consisting of a series of overlapping metal plates inside a fabric shell. It is a good option for many Marchers with a bit of money.

Brigandines can be home made, though require equipment to cut and rivet metal and take a lot of time and patience!

Bright Eyes Gleam in the Depths

Rules

Day Magnitude 160

The magnitude of this ritual may fluctuate as the Empire expands or contracts.

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 10 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets the entire Empire. It must be performed at the Imperial regio at Anvil. The ritual requires a map of the entire Empire which is used to harness and focus it's power.

This spell is an enchantment. A target may only be under one enchantment effect at a time.

Effects

The ritual enchants the entire Empire. Every mine in the Empire produces two extra measures of special materials. These additional materials will match the base type selected when the mine was created.

In addition, many inhabitants of the Empire experience odd incidents of deja vu and find themselves remembering things they had thought were forgotten, especially the location of lost items and things they have read or witnessed, often many years in the past.

The effect lasts until the start of the next Profound Decisions Empire event..

Description

This old and dramatically powerful ritual enchants the entire Empire for a short time. It effects every mine resource in every region within the Empire. Much like Revelation of the Jewel's Sparkling Heart, the ritual is about helping miners to locate deposits of raw materials rather than creating substances out of nothing,

During a season when this ritual is in effect, there are increased incidences of people encountering Day regio, or the Heralds of Day Eternals. Indeed, the Eternals of Day themselves seem to become more active after periods when this ritual is performed, and more interested in the activities of Imperial citizens. There is a superstitious belief that more merrow are born during this period, but there is no evidence for that. There is some anecdotal evidence that especially high-lineage merrow feel especially energized to pursue their goals during this period, but that is all.

Common Elements

This is a powerful ritual, and few covens can perform it by themselves. When this ritual has been performed in the past, it has often been achieved with the use of at least one Web of Celestial Attunement and with supplies of crystal mana from the Imperial Conclave. A coven that plans to perform it often spends several days in preparation, knowing that the eyes of the Empire are likely to be on them.

Symbols of divination and discovery are used throughout. The ritual is almost always performed under the open sky, in front of an audience - there is rarely any room for secrecy in a Day ritual of this magnitude. The map that is a central focus for the ritual is often carefully marked with ink or painted or inscribed with the runes of Day. It is usual for one or more of the ritualists to recite the names of the Imperial territories or even regions throughout the casting as a counterpoint to the ritual invocation.

Music is common, often gentle and carefully scored, to further counterpoint the invocation. The names of Day Eternals may be used, but this is less common than invocations of popular historical characters from around the Empire, especially those whose stories are concerned with prosperity, wealth, engineering and planning.

Bright Lantern of Ophis

Rules

Day Magnitude 6

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. The ritual targets a single character or ribboned item, which must be present throughout, or the immediate area around the ritualists.

Effects

This ritual analyses magical effects on the target person or object, or in the immediate area.

The ritual reveals information about magical enchancements, wards, or shrouds. It answers some or all of the following questions about each such effect on the target:

- What magical effects are present?
- What do these magical effects do? How long will they last?
- How can these magical effects be interacted with?
- Can they be ended early? If so, how?
- What is the source of these magical effects? If the source is a ritual, it will provide the realm and magnitude. If the source is an Eternal, it will indicate the realm the eternal is from.

If cast on an area, it may also answer some specific additional questions:

- Is there a magical regio in the immediate area (within a short distance, up to 30 feet)? What realm is that regio aligned to? Is it a strong regio?
- Are there any special effects for performing a ritual in that regio?

Each contributor receives the same information.

The ritual will provide no information about a curse. Wisdom of the Balanced Blade is required to gain any information about a curse - it will not even detect its presence. Likewise it is no use in analysing purely spiritual effects, such as those created by the hallow, consecration, or anointing ceremonies. Again, it does not even register the existence of such effects.

Casting the divination version of the detect magic spell on a legal target will reveal if there is any information that can be gathered with Bright Lantern of Ophis.

Additional Magnitude

You may increase the magnitude of the ritual to penetrate more powerful shrouds or masks. However, the Bright Lantern will always discover all the pertinent information about the shroud itself even if it is not performed at a high enough magnitude.

OOO Information

The ritual is least useful when used to analyse the effects of rituals that are in Imperial lore. It is most effective when used to examine mysterious effects. It rarely provides any information when cast on an object - the innate powers of magic items are not considered magical effects, and many special effects attached to objects will be curses or spiritual effects. It is perhaps most useful for analysing magical puzzles, wards, and barriers encountered on quests.

It can be used in a territory under a magical effect to determine details of that effect. For example if a territory is covered by a magical shroud, or a mysterious enchantment is effecting all the farms in that area. This effect cannot be achieved by performing the ritual at the Anvil regio - attempts to do so simply provide information about the Anvil regio and any magical effects on Casinea.

- 3 Description
- 4 Common Elements

Common examples of where it can be used are to understand the effect of an enchantment, shroud, or ward created by non-Imperial ritual magic, or to examine the boons created by an eternal. It will also provide information about magical traps, wards, and puzzles. When performed in a territory under the effect of a large-scale magical effect, it can also provide information about that magical effect.

Description

This ritual allows the contributors to examine and gain information about a broad range of magical effects. It is an invaluable aid to those who explore dangerous ruins, or areas touched by powerful magic. Common uses include detecting magical traps and - just as importantly - the conditions that will trigger or remove them; examining magical seals and wards to ascertain their functions and limitations; studying the unique magical boons of eternals, to identify unexpected loopholes; and precisely understanding the effects of peculiar magics of all kinds.

It will only work on a magical effect that is actually present, and close enough to touch. For example, to gather information about a magical ward at least one of the contributors must be close enough to touch the effect throughout the performance.

When using the Bright Lantern on an object, it is important that the magician understands the difference between a magical enchantment and the innate properties of a magic item. Bright Lantern will not discern anything about the properties of a magic item that is part of that item's functioning - for example, if performed on an otherwise unremarkable Biting Blade it reveals nothing, despite the blade's preternatural composition and sharpness. Only if the blade has been separately affected with magic - for example if its properties have been shrouded - will the Bright Lantern reveal anything and even then it will only reveal information about the shroud, not the capabilities of the magic item.

The ritual will also divine the provenance of a magical effect. The most common provenance is a ritual of some sort, or the actions of an eternal or other creature of the realms. In both cases, the Bright Lantern provides only broad details - the realm involved, and the magnitude of the ritual effect. On a few rare occasions it has determined the precise identity of the eternal involved, but in such cases the diviners have reported the sensation that the eternal wanted that information to be discovered - as if they had "signed" the effect. Uncommonly, the ritual may discover that the source of the magic is something else - the information determined in such cases is difficult to predict but always gives some context to where the magic has come from.

An interesting element of the Bright Lantern is that while it is stymied by a shroud or obscuring effect in the same manner as any divination ritual, it can always discover information about the shroud itself - its provenance, realm, magnitude, and so on.

Some arcane scholars compare Bright Lantern of Ophis to Wisdom of the Balanced Blade; both rituals analyse specific effects and provide in-depth information about their function, limitations and provenance.

Common Elements

This ritual often involves active divination, sometimes with runestones or cards. Lenses and mirrors are often used to closely examine the target, as are crystals that the contributors can peer into or through.

The area where the ritual is performed is usually well-lit, either by sunlight or by multiple lamps, lanterns, light-stones or fires. Some ritualists however prefer to study the target in relative darkness, illuminated by a single source of light. As the light source (often a lantern) is moved around the contributors examine the way the light changes the appearance of the item, or the shape of the shadow it casts.

The runes Sular and Ophis may be evoked - the former by covens who actively examine and seek information during the performance, the latter by covens that prefer to rely on sudden revelation to deliver information to them. The former group are usually active in handling the target, while the latter focus more on drawing up (or down) magical energies and may use incense, water or even some narcotics to empower their ritual.

Brilliant Shore

Overview

The Brilliant Shore stands near Gildenheim, in the Imperial Orc territory of Skarsind. Custodianship of the Brilliant Shore grants an Imperial title; a seat on the Imperial Bourse; and a seasonal bounty of valuable white granite.

The Resource

When the sun reflects on the workings on the cliff faces near Gildenheim, the reflection is blinding and it is this phenomenon that gives the white granite quarry its name. The deposits of white granite in the Brilliant Shore were discovered centuries ago by a young icewalker who took shelter in the area while the region was assailed by a magical storm conjured by the Thule. When the magician noticed that the storm passed over the cave where they were sheltering, they realized that something in the area must be weakening the curse. Further investigation of the cave discovered the white granite deposits, and provided the Wintermark people with a valuable resource.

In the early years of the Empire, the Brilliant Shore was assigned as an Imperial seat, and could be held by any citizen. It was one of the first areas seized by the Thule when Skarsind fell, and reclaimed at the turning point of the recent war. At the summit of Winter 377, when the status of the seat was debated; the Imperial Senate declared it a national resource in the control of Wintermark but the Imperial Synod exercised their veto to make the Senate reconsider. The position was confirmed as a national resource in the control of Wintermark at the Spring summit of 378.

Following the relinquishment of Skarsind, and its subsequent assignment as the new homeland of the Imperial Orcs, the Brilliant Shore became an Imperial Orc national bourse seat in Summer 380YE.

The Bourse Seat

Responsibilities

The Seat has no particular responsibilities; they simply receive a bounty of white granite which is theirs to do with as they will. If the Brilliant Shore were to be threatened in any way, it would be the responsibility of the Seat to deal with those threats. Likewise, if any particular opportunity were to arise related to the Brilliant Shore, the Seat would expect to be consulted as to how that opportunity might be resolved.

Powers

Seat on the Bourse

Custodianship of the Brilliant Shore comes with a seat on the Imperial Bourse. For the most part, this Seat comes with no additional responsibilities. It is an Imperial title that grants the right to participate on the rare occasion when the Imperial Bourse as a body is required to make a decision.

Bounty of white granite

The Seat has control of a source of white granite and receives Bourse certificates to represent that control. They can dispense this resource as they choose. Production is 26 Imperial wains of white granite every season.

Appointment

As with all white granite Bourse seats, the holder of the title is determined during the Summer Solstice. The Brilliant Shore is an Imperial Orc national seat, and custodianship is allocated by a vote of all Imperial Orc citizens who control a military unit. Votes are recorded in private in conjunction with the civil servants who support the Bourse.

Brilliant Star

Overview

The Brilliant Star is located in Tomari in the Urizen territory of Redoubt. Custodianship of the Brilliant Star grants an Imperial title; a seat on the Imperial Bourse; and a seasonal bounty of valuable mithril.

The Resource

The Brilliant Star consists of a network of tunnels beneath the peaks of Tomari, overlooking the Urizen spire of Delving. Hailed as the most beautiful of all the star shaped tunnel complexes that underlie the south-eastern mountains, the walls of the Brilliant Star gleam slightly even when there is no other light. This eerie phosphorescence attracts scholars from all over Urizen; experiments have shown that the pale light from the walls actively promotes reasoned thought, and eases the understanding of difficult theoretical principles not only in magic but in all advanced disciplines including mathematics and natural philosophy.

Unfortunately, the tunnels are also part of an active mine, and do not welcome casual visitors who wish to study in the lucent effulgence of the tunnel walls. Over the centuries, this has led to a number of unfortunate accidents, and both would-be scholars and miners alike have paid a tragic price for interference in the mine workings. On occasion these trespassers have actually interfered with the mine's production, whether accidentally through their unsanctioned presence; through the use of misplaced magic (the mines have an affinity for the realm of Day); or even through intentional interference.

According to the scholars who have studied the light, it becomes dimmer and "less conducive to thought" the less mithril ore there is in its vicinity. This means that the light is strongest in those areas where the mine workers are most active in extracting the mithril ore. On at least one occasion (during the reign of Emperor James), militant magicians have occupied lower sections of the mine and attempted to prevent workers from removing the precious ore. Unsurprisingly, this occupation led to a near riot and led to the tight security measures that persist to this day. Despite the presence of sentries and regular patrols, barely a season goes by without an ambitious student, or a wily master, sneaking past the workers to explore the Brilliant Star.

The Bourse Seat

The Seat has no particular responsibilities; they simply receive a bounty of mithril which is theirs to do with as they will. Bringing in the Sheaves

Bringing in the Sheaves by Jim Boyes

A great version available on "Funny Old World" by Coope Boyes and Simpson.

Harmony recording sung by Glasgow Madrigals: Media:bringingintheshaves.mp3

Solo Youtube version.

Sheet music available here

Though it's way past harvest time
Some still toil and work and wagons rattle
Corn still stands in rank and line
And defies us all
We can see it in our past
Blood will out and joy will battle
Though we work in different ways
we're bringing in the sheaves

(Chorus) - Bringing in the sheaves, we're bringing in the sheaves.
Though we work in different ways
we're bringing in the sheaves

Though we started from the land
Some of us do roam abroad
The hand upon the gliding plough is not for everyone
Changing seasons help us see
Those who hear a different drummer
Though not in one harmony,
we're bringing in the sheaves

(Chorus)

What lay dormant in the soil
Is wakened by the kiss of summer
So the fruits of yesteryear become the years new corn
Every stem has at its core, part of those who went before
In turn they will be kept in store
by bringing the sheaves

(Chorus)

In conclusion bear in mind
What example has begun
What today you do in kind has power for everyone
True strong aims will pass along
To your daughters and your sons
So may they in years to come be bringing in the sheaves

(Chorus)

Britta's Glory

This has been adapted by Rosie Goldsmith from The Chemical Worker's Song by Great Big Sea as sung here.

A pdf of the lyrics and tune can be found here.

A solo voice recording can be found here.

*And it's Charge, Dawn, Charge, We'll fight with every breath And every step we take today is one step nearer death
But we'll charge* Oh she marched across the Empire and she blazed into each heart Warrior and general, bright as flame she stood apart With thunder all around her and with fire upon her brow To keep our Empire free from harm she made her solemn vow

Chorus

The Jotun threat had hit them hard, but still the west she won Out to the East so fast she flew, she shone just like the Sun
Side by side with Dawn she stood, at bloody Summerholm And crystal clear it was to all our Empress had come home

Chorus

Her Virtue strong and splendid, made an Empire's life-blood beat With fire and steel and fury, all her foes they met defeat Until one bitter winter when at Skarsind battle found The Young Empress had perished, lying dead on frozen ground

Chorus

Now we're marching out from Anvil underneath a weeping sky For Glory and for Vengeance with our banners raised up high We'll make them fear her memory, cast them down into the mud For Throne and Crown and Britta, we will make them pay in blood!

Britta's song

Lyrics by Claire Bowden and David Sheridan, music by Bob Dylan (Percy's song) as sung here.

A pdf of the lyrics and tune can be found here.

Bad news, bad news came to me where I sat, Turn, turn, turn again, The Empress' army are not coming back, Turn, turn, to the rain and the wind.

The Empress' army were gallant and true, Turn... They went off to war and they would see it through, Turn...

They had mages with mana and warriors with swords, Turn... Shieldsmen and pikemen would have their reward, Turn...

To protect our Empire from the Thule out beyond, Turn... With axe and with arrow, with rod and with wand, Turn...

They raised up the banner and raised up the cry, Turn... Out into the mountains and grey snow-hung sky, Turn...

Their scouts they were cunning, their fighters so brave, Turn... In the hope that this territ'ry to finally reclaim Turn...

But the Thule they were ruthless; they called down a storm, Turn... Of snow, hail and chill winds all magically-borne, Turn...

Our Britta was sure they had not come in vain, Turn... Determined that Skarsind would be ours again, Turn...

Stout resolve was gifted to all, Turn... So the army would fight on and not too soon fall, Turn...

But it was not enough against such a foe, Turn... And out in the mountains the bitter winds moan, The old song, the rain and the wind.

So you now, and I, friend, must make the attack, Turn, turn, turn again, The Empress' army are not coming back. Turn, turn, to the rain and the wind.

Brock's Toll

Overview

Custodianship of Brock's Toll is an Imperial title awarded to either a Marcher or Dawnish citizen. It is a National position, appointed through a unique method, granting custodianship of a sinecure in a Navarr territory.

Responsibilities

The title holder is expected to ensure that Brock's Bridge remains open to Dawnish and Marcher yeomen alike. The actual job of maintaining the bridge falls to civil servants and local labourers, the majority of them Navarr. They charge a small toll for yeomen of whichever nation does not control the bridge, which both provides the sinecure for the title holder, and goes toward the irregular repairs on the bridge and the paths leading to it.

Powers

Small Income

As a sinecure, Brock's Toll provides an income drawn from the tolls paid by yeomen using the bridge.

The holder of the sinecure receives 16 Crowns and 4 Rings in income each season.

Appointment

The title is selected by a tourney during the Summer Solstice. Five Marcher yeomen face five Dawnish yeomen in a brutal, non-lethal fight with the last competitor standing claiming the proceeds of Brock's Toll in the coming year.

The title can only be held by a Marcher, or by a Dawnish yeoman. In the event that a Dawnish yeoman holder of the title becomes a noble, they are expected to immediately surrender the title.

The title is appointed annually. The Keeper of Brock's Toll can be revoked by the General Assembly, the Assembly of the Nine, and by the National Assembly of either the Marches or Dawn, depending on the nationality of the title holder

Brock's Toll

Brock's Toll is a famous toll bridge situated roughly halfway between Dawn and the Marches, but historically claimed by both. While it isn't much used by wealthy merchants or nobles, the road that this bridge lies on carries most of the agricultural traffic between Dawn and the Marches. Traditionally, the operator of the Toll was allowed to claim one sack from each cart's load but in 295YE this was adjusted in favour of a small toll paid by the yeomen of whichever nation did not win the tourney.

The bridge is so old that when it was first constructed the Vallorn still controlled most of Miaren. In the early days of the Empire this site changed hands between the two nations several times, often with violence. Even when Earls and Stewards forbade their people to fight, rowdy yeomen would often take matters into their own hands and the Navarr soon became sick of breaking up scuffles over ownership.

Eventually the Imperial Senate took matters into their own hand and decreed that ownership of the Toll would be decided by an annual competition of arms between the yeoman who were so eager to fight. In time this evolved into the modern practice of the Brock's Buffet - a brutal (nonlethal) five-aside melee with only one winner left standing to claim ownership for the coming year.

Since 372 YE the Buffet has been won by the Marches. This is something of a thorn in the pride of the Dawnish yeomen.

Brocéliande

This is a placeholder page for content that PD are actively working on.

Overview

Lush Brocéliande, on the border between Dawn and Highguard, is considered by the Navarr as ancestral homeland and is the single largest forested expanse in the Empire. This is where Navarr and Thorn first danced. The Navarr have been unable to make any significant gains in this territory against the Vallorn, and there is limited Navarr presence here.

The majority of Navarr steadings in Brocéliande are centred around Boar's Dell in the north, and around the Broch in Vallorn-infested Black Boughs. While all steadings fight against vallornspawn, those in Brocéliande generally see the most "action" - especially the Broch situated as it is deep inside the circumference of the Brocéliande infestation. Green lung is a constant threat in much of Brocéliande.

Much of the interior of the territory is still unknown to modern scholars, both within the Navarr and without. The vallorn covers the vast majority of the land here, choking any Terunael ruins or artefacts, and drowning those who venture too far with its powerful, deadly miasma.

Recent History

Over the last fifty years, much of the forest was infiltrated by barbarian orc communities settling from the Barrens. They largely avoided the Navarr, although there were rumours of some limited trade between isolated steadings and groups of barbarians. The orcs in the south were brutally conquered when the Druj took and held Elereal, but the orcs of the Mallum made no effort to push for further control of Brocéliande. Indeed, they seemed more interested in keeping the vallornspawn at bay than in engaging with the Navarr.

After the Druj hold of the Barrens was temporarily broken, most of the orc settlers from retreated out of Brocéliande, leaving their makeshift camps to fall into disuse or be overrun by vallornspawn. They rejoined their original tribe - the Great Forest Orcs.

Major Features

The Broch

The largest collection of steadings of the Navarr, well-defended and constantly guarded. It is the western edge of the Navarr's watch on the barbarians and darker horrors of Brocéliande. It is both fortification against the orcs, and a place of ritual where Vates gather when necessary to counter specific magical threats. The First Dance steadings are based in the Broch and seek more than any to investigate new ways to fight against the Vallorn. Buried deep within the miasma at Black Boughs, the Broch is perhaps the stading most at risk of being overrun at any moment. Few can spend too much time here - even if the danger were not sufficient, there is the ever-present risk of green lung.

Regions

Elerael

Quality: Forest

Elerael was one of the few regions of Brocéliande initially under Navarr control. The most prominent stading here, Eleri's Stead, was once a comparatively peaceable place, a Navarr counterpart to High Chalcis where herbs and forest plants were studied. It was swept away as orcs flooded from the Forest of Peytaht.

The orcs were most likely Druj from Reikos, but it is not clear how much of a presence they still maintain here. Some Navarr scouts have reported an increase in vallornspawn attacks into Elerael, increasing in severity dramatically after the Reikos trods were damaged in 378YE.

Elerael is the home to the large and influential Brackensong Steading who give sanctuary for those who walk the dangerous Trods that weave through the Vallorn of Brocéliande. The Splitroot Striding use Elerael to walk the Trods into Dark Ranging where, up until the declaration of war in Winter 378YE, they were one of the few stridings to trade with the Orcs of the Barrens.

Black Boughs

Qualities: Forest, Vallorn The Broch is a small enclave of safety inside the miasma of the the Vallorn.

Boar's Dell

Qualities: Forest The northernmost region of Brocéliande is the site of Greenstead, a stone-walled steading built with support from Rucastle as Dawn and the Navarr threw a ring around the dark heart of the forest there. It is often assaulted, but with Dawnish support it has always held. There has long been a bond - and several intermarriages - between the two settlements.

Dark Ranging

Qualities: Forest, Vallorn

Greenweald

Qualities: Forest, Vallorn

Terunael

Qualities: Forest, Vallorn This is the heart of the Vallorn in Brocéliande, and the most storied of the ancestral cities of the Navarr.

Vale's Lament

Qualities: Forest, Vallorn

OOCC Note

- As of Autumn 379YE, the Vallorn occupies Back Boughs, Dark Ranging, Greenweald, Vale's Lament and Terunael. The Navarr (and thus the Empire) holds Boar's Dell and Elerael.
- To claim Brocéliande, the Empire needs to hold four of the seven regions. This is currently impossible without reducing the power of the Vallorn.

Broken Shield Guardian

Overview

The Broken Shield Guardian is an Imperial title created by the Civilian Commissioner of the Imperial Orcs in Winter 380YE. The position is a sinecure, requiring minimal responsibility but offering a regular income of herbs to the title holder.

Responsibilities

As a sinecure, the Broken Shield Guardian has few responsibilities. If the Home of the Broken Shield were threatened, it would be the responsibility of the Guardian to deal with that threat - but also to deal with any opportunity to expand the Home, or to make any decisions about its operation.

Powers

Bounty of Herbs

The residents of the Home of the Broken Shield maintain several herb gardens. The Guardian receives a share of those herbs, which amounts to 6 doses of Imperial Roseweald, 5 doses each of Marrowort and Bladeroot, and 2 doses of Cerulean Mazzarine each season.

Appointment

The Broken Shield Guardian is appointed by unanimous decision of the Imperial Orcs senator. If a unanimous decision cannot be reached, the title may be appointed by the Imperial Senate instead.

The title can be held by any Imperial Orc citizen. The Guardian has tenure, and serves until they die or step down, and they can be revoked by the General Assembly, the Imperial Orc National Assembly, and by the Assembly of the Nine.

House of the Broken Shield

The House is the home of a banner of Imperial Orcs who are too "broken" to fight on the front line, but are still driven to serve the Empire. It accepts orcs from other warbands who wish to "retire" but still work in support of their people and their Empire. Several residents are civil servants, while others serve as scribes, teachers, and preachers, all over Skarsind. Among their prominent members are Broken Shield Talik, who served at one time as Speaker for the Senate. Their symbol is a white circle marred with black cracks.

The structure itself stands in Solvihill, and incorporates parts of the old Irontongue Hall. The Hall itself was significantly damaged by the Thule but has been rebuilt and repurposed. It now has a central courtyard where herbs are tended, and the many items of worth collected by the residents during their battles are hung on the walls. A small memorial to General Dustan Irontongue, and to Empress Britta, and the soldiers who fell alongside her (orc and human alike) is maintained in a quiet wing of the House.

The residents are primarily ex-soldiers who can no longer fight due to age or injury. Some stay at the House temporarily, but most are permanent residents. They maintain good relations with the Fellowship of the Red Blade, who visit regularly. Many of the residents also serve as teachers, offering their hard-won expertise to the next generation of Imperial Orc warriors.

Those with more limited mobility, or who are done with traveling, tend the gardens here. The House produces a bounty of healing herbs, and is already making a name for itself for Broken Shield Tea - a particular blend of Imperial Roseweald and other herbs that "warms the blood" of orc drinkers in a pleasantly narcotic fashion. There are even a few carefully cultivated patches of Cerulean Mazzarine, grown indoors to protect them from the poor climate of the northern Empire - sadly the herb grows very poorly in the north - it is better suited to the warmer climes around the Bay of Catazar. The only herb not grown at the House is True Vervain. The only comment on this comes from one of the first Orcs to take

Broken Shore Bounty

Overview

The Broken Shore Bounty is technically located near Cazar in the territory of Feroz. Custodianship of the Broken Shore Bounty grants an Imperial title; a seat on the Imperial Bourse; and a seasonal bounty of valuable ilium.

The Resource

The Grendel represent a powerful threat to the Empire, and there are always a few groups of disgruntled criminals or barbarian orcs who view Imperial boats and ships as easy prey. Only constant vigilance by Imperial fleet owners, especially those among the corsair families of the Brass Coast, protect the livelihoods and lives of Imperial boat people and fisherfolk. Without an armed presence in the Bay of Catazar, coastal settlements and foreign trade alike would be endangered by opportunistic pirates. The Broken Shore Bounty is intended to reward the Freeborn ship captains who commit themselves to the defence of local waters, rather than to trade with distant nations.

The ilium that the Seat provides is claimed from the fishing nets of the boats that ply their trades along the coast of the Bay of Catazar; a portion of all such finds are claimed by the Broken Shore Bounty. While some fisherfolk resent the claim, the majority appreciate that the Freeborn are instrumental in helping to keep opportunistic raiders out of Imperial waters - that a portion of any ilium found is a minor loss compared to the complete loss of catch, ship, livelihood, and liberty that an encounter with a Grendel raiding vessel would represent.

The seat comes with a well-protected villa in the port-town of Cazar, in Feroz. The corsairs families of the Brass Coast see it as a point of honour to control the Broken Shore Bounty. The ilium is collected and overseen by members of the i Orieni i Riqueza family, who have extensive ties with fishing families and mercantile ship owners throughout the Brass Coast, and the southern territories of the League, Highguard, and Urizen. The current dhomirol of the i Orieni family is named Riguel.

Appointing the Seat

Every time a citizen of the Brass Coast chooses the privateering action for their fleet they receive votes. A typical fleet provides 10 votes, plus an extra 2 votes for each time it has been upgraded. Any enchantment that directly increases the effectiveness of a privateering fleet will grant additional votes. When the seat is allocated (usually during the Spring Equinox), the number of votes each citizen has accrued over the previous year is tallied. The owner of the fleet records which Freeborn character they wish to support, and the one who receives the most votes takes the Seat. Votes are recorded in private in conjunction with the civil servants who support the Bourse.

While privateering does not have a direct effect on the outcome of military campaigns, it does have an in-character effect on the setting. The actions of the Freeborn Corsairs and others protects the people and settlements around the bay of Catazar. Privateering keeps the coastal waters of the Empire clear of pirates and other maritime dangers. It does not have a mechanical effect on the Grendel military, but attacking enemy shipping in the Bay does have a narrative effect, without it, Grendel raiders and pirates alike would be free to attack civilians.

The Bourse Seat

Responsibilities

The Seat has no particular responsibilities; they simply receive a bounty of ilium which is theirs to do with as they will. If the Broken Shore Bounty were to be threatened in any way, it would be the responsibility of the Seat to deal with those threats. Likewise, if any particular opportunity were to arise related to the Broken Shore Bounty, the Seat would expect to be consulted as to how that opportunity might be resolved.

Custodianship of the Broken Shore Bounty comes with a seat on the Imperial Bourse. For the most part, this Seat comes with no additional responsibilities. It is an Imperial title that grants the right to participate on the rare occasion when the Imperial Bourse as a body is required to make a decision.

Bounty of ilium

The Seat has control of a source of ilium which they receive directly. They can dispense this resource as they choose. Production is 7 rings of ilium every season.

Appointment

As with all ilium Bourse seats, the holder of the title is determined during the Spring Equinox. Control of the Broken Shore Bounty is assigned to whichever Brass Coast candidate receives the most support from Brass Coast fleet owners that have earned votes over the past year by privateering. Votes are recorded in private in conjunction with the civil servants who support the Bourse.

Custodianship of the Broken Shore Bounty is retained for a year, or until the citizen holding the seat dies, or steps down. An Imperial Bourse seat cannot be revoked by the Imperial Synod.

Broker of Treji Wayhouse

Overview

The Broker of Treji Wayhouse is an Imperial title awarded to a Navarr citizen. It is part of the Northern trade network which effectively came into being shortly before the Autumn Equinox 380YE, with the construction of the offices of the Overseer of the Westward Road in Delev.

In the years since Skarsind was recovered, the roads were repaired and some work went towards re-establishing trade, but the Wintermark focus was more on the routes through the passes into Hahnmark in the north-east. Over Winter 379YE, work began on restoring a trading network along the northern territories with Torfast Trading Post in Skarsind as a central hub, and subsidiary offices in Temeschwar and Karoy.

In Summer 381YE, in response to an opportunity offered by the Thule orcs of Otkodov, a new partner joined the Northern Trade Network bringing valuable crystal mana to the markets of the northern Empire. This crystal mana, of course, remains available only while the Empire remains at peace with the Thule.

Responsibilities

The Broker is expected to keep the trade flowing along the roads that lead from Skarsind west through Hercynia and to the rest of the Empire. The close contact with the traders allows ample opportunity for the Broker to acquire supplies at bargain prices from merchants heading both to and from Skarsind.

Powers

Thule Trade (Urdur)

Ministry

As a ministry, the title of Broker of Treji Wayhouse allows the holder to purchase quantities of special materials at a set price. The Broker makes their decision on how much money to spend during downtime from their character page. Money is removed from, and resources are placed into, the character's inventory when the downtime is processed.

Total Money Spent	Production
7 Crowns	5 Green Iron, 3 Orichalcum, 2 Weltsilver, 2 Beggar's Lye
17 Crowns	10 Green Iron, 6 Orichalcum, 4 Weltsilver, 4 Beggar's Lye
35 Crowns	15 Green Iron, 9 Orichalcum, 6 Weltsilver, 6 Beggar's Lye
48 Crowns	20 Green Iron, 12 Orichalcum, 8 Weltsilver, 8 Beggar's Lye

Thule Trade (Urdur)

Total Materials Spent	Production
8 Dragonbone	8 Crystal Mana
19 Dragonbone	16 Crystal Mana
39 Dragonbone	25 Crystal Mana

The Treji Wayhouse welcomes Thule merchants from Otkodov, as well as Imperial merchants. As a consequence, the broker has not one but two streams from which they can purchase material. The Broker can spend differing amounts on each stream - for example, they could spend 17 crowns on one, and 8 ingots on the other.

Appointment

This title is appointed during the Summer Solstice by Navarr who control herb garden personal resources. The larger the herb garden an individual has, the more votes they can allocate in support to a candidate. The voting is handled by the civil servants in the Bourse.

Only a Navarr character may hold this title. They do not receive a seat on the Bourse. They cannot be revoked by the Imperial Synod.

The Title in Play

The role does not provide additional information about events in the Empire, nor allow the player holding it to request special reports or downtime actions. These details are assumed to be below the abstraction layer. The title holder is encouraged to create their own stories about their activities within reasonable limits and to get involved in events appropriate to their title during the game, but they do not have any powers beyond those explicitly listed in the section on powers.

These details exist partly to provide context and character to the role - and partly to allow our writers to use the title as a plot hook. Plot that involves the position will be rare - but all the campaign positions in Empire have these details to create the potential for it to happen.

Brother Blades

Description

The Brother Blades are most commonly crafted as a pair, whether of swords, axes or hammers. Pains are taken to ensure the weapons are as similar as possible, and traditionally the materials used to create the best of them are taken from the same ore quarried in the same mines. That is not to say that 'unbalanced pairs' don't exist, but they are in the minority. Even unbalanced pairs tend to be similar, save for size, such as a longsword paired with a shortsword in the off-hand. A rapier paired to a stiletto is a combination popular among bravos determined to be armed under all circumstances, sometimes called "Pins and Needles". So valuable is the idea of the weapons as twins that wielders take great pains to make sure that they remain reflections of each others, ensuring that any decoration of one is mirrored on the other.

It is possible to permanently mark or change the appearance of these weapons; to do so the wielder has one of the weapons altered and then uses their magical power to "copy" that change to the other weapon. This process is unreliable, and is ineffective at copying anything other than cosmetic changes to the physical shape of the weapons.

Means of invoking the pair's power varies greatly. Navarri paired hand-axes sometimes have oaths impressed into the leather wrappings of the handles, proclaiming the weapons' devotion to each other, which is repeated by the wielder to restore the shattered twin. All across the Empire, soldiers press together the intact blade with the remnants of its companion and invoke the rune Pallas, which has power over crafted goods.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. A pair consisting of two one-handed weapons.
- Requirement: You must have the ambidexterity skill to bond to these items.
- Effect: Once per day you can repair one or both of these weapons with ten seconds of appropriate roleplaying.
- Materials: Crafting a set of Brother Blades requires nine ingots of orichalcum and three measures of ambergelt and three measures of iridescent gloaming. It takes one month to make a pair of these items.

The Brass Coast trader lifted up the sword, and weighed it in his hands. It was a fine blade, alike to its brother as ordered, and now was the moment of truth. The price had been low, he thought, but he was just finishing a Conquerors' Sword like the one wielded by his illustrious tribes-mate Jone i Arco and that had taken every scrap of rare stuff he'd been able to lay hands on. On average, he thought, he'd make more over three months than if he'd made three common blades. The other side of the tavern table was his customer, known to him, from a nation known to him, and without any of the honesty that the Freeborn would show. Would he press for still lower?

The Temeschwari took the blade. It was, as promised, the twin of the one he'd already had delivered. Imperial horse in gold relief on the blade, red leather hilt. It would match his Merchant Prince's brigandine and robe perfectly.

The Freeborn's hand drifted down, under the table, and wrapped round the reassuring steel of his knife.

"So, the price..."

"Eight crowns the pair. As contracted. The balance of four is due." said the Freeborn. Amethyst and topaz gleamed on the Temeschwari's fingers as two stacks of coins were pushed over the table: transaction done.

And as he left, the Freeborn's grip relaxed.

Autumn Magnitude 120

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets an Imperial army. The general responsible for the army must be present throughout.

This spell is an enchantment. A target may only be under one enchantment effect at a time.

Effects

This ritual improves the logistics of the target army. It can quickly distribute resources and assign new soldiers. Bureaucratic procedures are supernaturally efficient, and quartermasters and provisioners display an uncanny ability to predict shortages, or to intuitively understand where new equipment will do the most good. When the army benefits from natural resupply, it recovers an additional 250 fighting strength. Emergency resupply is unaffected, and the army must be eligible for natural resupply.

While the enchantment persists, the general responsible for the army experiences a potent roleplaying effect: They want to understand the effects and implications of everything that might effect the capabilities of their army – all enchantments, curses, or other effects that change how the army relates to other armies and the wider campaign. At the same time, they feel the driving need to understand the strategies of both allies and enemies – but are extremely suspicious of risky or innovative strategies. Traditional, tried and trusted strategies are the most effective strategies. It is difficult for them to see any value in creative strategies, especially any that are not obviously based on the six standard army orders (balanced attack, cautious attack, overwhelming assault, give ground, solid defence, or heroic stand).

The effect lasts until the start of the next Profound Decisions Empire event.

Description

This ritual was codified from an arcane projection first developed by the Urizen magician Edmundo of the Concordium of Pallas. Work began under the guidance of Eudaemon of Halcyon Spire, beginning after the Winter Solstice 378YE. When the Urizen magician lost the title of Dean of the Lyceum to Simargl, of the Circle of Zulgan-Tash, the Varushkan kindly agreed to complete codification of the ritual. When the project was begun, it was referred to as "Thousand Swords Drawn Together" but Simargl suggested that the name be changed to better reflect the nature of the ritual.

The ritual works by enhancing the ways that an army naturally recovers from the stresses and losses of conflict. Even barbarian armies have procedures in place to allow them to resupply themselves – whether healing injured warriors, drafting new soldiers in to replace casualties, or simply ensuring that all those who fight for the army have dry boots, a weapon, and at least some token armour.

The story of this ritual is the story of another man's ambition. You all know the tale of Tian. Tian, who climbed to the top of the tallest peak and pulled down fire from the sun to keep her people warm and safe. Inspired by Tian's story, Eudaemeon of Halcyon Spire in Urizen set out to protect the people of the Empire. Although the idea for the ritual may have come from elsewhere, and although I have finished it, the bulk of the work was done by Eudaemon and the credit for it is owed to him. In many ways, I have come to see Eudaemon as the spiritual brother of Tian, and so I have named this ritual Brotherhood of Tian in his honour. This is his legacy, and I ask you to accept it into Imperial lore.

Simargl the Empty One, in his speech before the Conclave

With an Imperial army, these procedures are much more complex. Tents and sleeping materials must be provided. Food and drink not only supplied but transported and distributed. Is the army traveling through cold terrain, or during the Winter? In that case, thought needs to be given to how every soldier will protect themselves from the cold, and the fatigue that comes from trudging through snow. Is the army traveling in the arid hills of the Brass Coast? Then extra thought must be given to water supplies, and to ensuring soldiers shield themselves from the unforgiving sun.

When an army is resting – on furlough – or defending a “safe” territory, new problems arise. Are there sufficient supplies that every soldier can get some rest and restore their health and will to fight? If not, some of the less disciplined armies may find that their warriors are taking matters into their own hands, taking more from the local population than they wish to give. This is rarely a problem for Imperial soldiers, but resentment between the local populace and the soldiers can still grow if their commanders expect too much from the civilians.

To a degree the ritual enchantment takes all these considerations into account – and many more besides – but it still faces limitations.

The magic requires a certain level of rest to function. The army must already be resupplying to benefit at all – which means they must be in an Imperial territory with no opposing forces present during the entire season. Natural resupply does not occur – and the ritual has no effect – if there is an enemy force attacking or defending any part of the territory.

Certain armies will benefit slightly less from this enchantment than others. The large forces of the Imperial Orcs, for example, receive proportionately less benefit from the enchantment than the standard armies of the other nations.

By contrast, some armies will actually benefit more from the ritual due to their existing qualities. The Eastern Sky of \[\[Dawn\[\[, and the Drakes of the Marches are fine examples here – their supply procedures are so robust that the ritual will still prove useful regardless of what territory they are in, as long as they are not actively engaged by an enemy force.

As with many such rituals, the Law of Dominion (the general responsible for the army) is used to circumvent the Law of Presence. The ritual is performed with the general as the target, removing the need to perform it directly on all the soldiers of the army at once. It is not a requirement of the ritual, but performing the magic in the Imperial regio not only helps the magicians involved wield the magic effectively but reinforces the Law of Dominion.

The Law of Scale is relevant here – as experimentation during the codification process indicated, the effective fighting strength restored by this ritual is the most optimal amount for the magnitude. Attempting to create a ritual to provide greater support to an army quickly moved the ritual beyond the realms of feasibility, while theoretical discussion of a less effective ritual showed that the magnitude did not dip much below a hundred and twenty.

The bulk of the magic is driven towards warping serendipity, and influencing the minds of the soldiers in the army without causing them to become dangerously obsessed with the distribution of resources and soldiers. Padme I Erigo, a scholar of the lores of both Night and Day, made an interesting observation during the initial phase of the formulation that if the safeguards were removed from the ritual, and the element of influence enhanced, a similar effect might make an intriguing large-scale curse on an army (using the Law of Dominion to allow the general to serve as the focus, of course), damaging their ability to operate by focusing the minds of their officers on logistical concerns over practical, immediate threats.

The ritual is interesting in that it draws both on the positive Autumn resonances for bands and groups, communication, and craftsmanship, and on the well-known negative resonance - dissonance - where individual creativity is concerned.

An army is in many ways a large “banner” made up of dozens of smaller groups with interlocking allegiances and loyalties, all bound together with a single powerful affiliation for the army and its general. The magic exploits those bonds to spread its effect through the entire army but it also creates a web-like theoretical magical construct. Because the quartermaster is part of a group, and because that part of a group is connected to other groups by the over-arching construct of the army, the quartermaster can sense the needs of soldiers she has never met.

The craftsmanship resonance helps to use resources more efficiently to repair and create equipment while the resonance of communication allows the various parts of the army to better speak to one another about their requirements. Combined together, the ritual is consummate tool for achieving a desired end. Yet at the same time, the dissonance of creativity is invoked. While subtly influencing the perceptions and capabilities of the provisioner, it discourages too much improvisation or risk-taking. It focuses more on smoothing existing chains of supply rather than creating new ones, and warps serendipity to make existing conditions more favourable rather than creating too many bold new coincidences.

Regarding Tian

Tian is an ancient paragon of Ambition. Her legend has inspired believers world-wide for generations, especially pious magicians – even those who do not follow the Way know tales of Tian. Her epic recounts how she took fire from the sun to keep her people safe and warm, but forever burned her hands in doing so. Her stories were old when Terumael was young, and even now the legends that surround her are incomplete.

One of a pair of twins, Tian was ambitious from birth – pulling her twin Jian back into the womb so that she could be born first. She refutes wealth and inherited privilege, insisting on striving for everything she gains. In the stories, this is a world without fire – Tian vows to do the impossible and bring the warmth of Summer into Winter. In the story, she ascends the highest mountains in the world and takes the fire from the sun, carrying it down to her people in her bare hands which are horribly burnt in the process.

While she is engaged in her heroic pursuit, her brother Jian usurps her position as leader of her people – and rules poorly. She takes the gift of fire to all the people, even those with whom her folk are at war. In some version of the tale, she uses the fire to burn her own brother, punishing him for his presumption in attempting to usurp her place.

In some versions of the story, this tale is a metaphor for the mastery of Summer magic. Of course, a more well known controversy arises from the Krydaccian Blasphemy, in which an early Imperial Orc claimed to have had a past-life vision of being Tian. No credible evidence has ever been found to support this wild, blasphemous assertion. There is some evidence that the Faraden exemplar of Justice Ti-ji-tan, is based on a muddled interpretation of this tale – one that is particularly problematic because it is often used as a parable decrying Ambition in favour of familial loyalty.

Tian resonates with the power of this ritual for a number of reasons, but a subtle one is the connection between the motivation for her climb up the mountain and damaged hands. She seeks to promote the well-being of her people – their physical and practical needs. The magic of the ritual seeks to promote the physical well-being of the soldiers in the general's army in a similar way.

Common Elements

As with many such enchancements, the general who is the focus of the ritual is a key element in its performance. It is common practice to include a banner or standard that will be used by the target army as an additional focus for such magic. The history or other symbols associated with the army are also appropriate elements to include.

Girding the general is a strong image – the act of equipping the military leader with weapons and armour symbolically reflects the equipping of the army itself. At the same time, fresh water and wholesome food can symbolise the provisioning of the army itself. Obviously, it is a good idea to rehearse the use of these symbolic acts – confused or ineffectual girding or provisioning will weaken the impact of the ritual.

Including captains who have fought alongside the army in the past, or who are part of the retinue of the army may also be helpful. By the same measure, if the army is recuperating in a specific territory, the willing participation of people from that territory – especially the Senator if it is an Imperial territory – can help to mould the magical effect. This is additionally useful if the territory is not part of the nation the army belongs to.

Evocation of the paragon Tian is recommended with the ritual, passing magical power from the ritualists to the target general and from the general to the army. As a result, open flames, bright lights, and reflective surfaces reminiscent of the sun will all help to focus the power of the magic – much more so than is typical for rituals of Autumn magic.

The rune of Wealth is a suitable image, as is the rune of Trade. An astronomancer might evoke the constellation of the Chain, and possibly the Chalice (things coming together is a powerful image for co-operation). Dramaturgy might involve an interaction between the Captain (military endeavour) and either the Prince (influence, authority) or the Bishop (strengthening), especially in the Counting House (money, power, objects and possession).

A Note About Magnitude

Initial estimations placed the magnitude of this ritual at eighty – but as time went on it became clear that this was a low estimation. The methods of actually weaving and controlling the magic were comparatively straightforward, as was incorporating the Law of Dominion to allow that magic to be focused on an Imperial army. Unfortunately, towards the end of the codification a significant stumbling block in the shape of the Law of Scale reared its ugly head. The professors of the Lyceum debated the issue of how to constrain the magic so that it could have the desired effect, rather than accepting the risk of the influences it raised running amok through the army.

The issues arose from the number of variable factors that had to be addressed. For a start, the armies of different nations handle their logistical demands very differently. The circumstances faced by any given army could vary dramatically from one season to the next, and the “best practice” for the quartermasters and provisioners on whose skill the effectiveness of the magic rested needed to be accounted for by the Autumn magic – and the realm always has a few issues with creativity and improvisational elements.

Initial research had suggested that Bound by Common Cause would be an excellent template for the codification of the ritual – but as season turned it became apparent this was a theoretical dead end. In the end the League magician Sierra di Temeschwar broke the blockage that was preventing the completion of the ritual, using thematic elements drawn from Rivers of Gold to bind positive energies of serendipity and synchronicity into the pattern of the completed ritual that were capable of nudging local events toward the desired outcome – supernaturally efficient resupply of a large force of troops from any nation, in any battlefield or peace-time situation.

The breakthrough allowed the ritual to be codified in good order, but the raw amount of power required to complete the effect has roughly half-again as much as had been allowed for in the original arcane projection. Several noted astronomancers associated with the Lyceum have committed to uncovering precisely which conjunction of stars first empowered the arcane projection's much lower magnitude, but at the moment nothing concrete has been uncovered beyond a theory that the Wanderer may have been in inverse line with the Mountain or the Chain.

Budded roses

Pelleas stared at the float willing it to move. He wished he could do magic - then he could use it to catch fish for sure. Instead he was stuck here, fishing. Stupid float. Stupid bait. Stupid fish.

He put the rod down, leaned back and stared at the sky. For about the hundredth time that day he wished he had been old enough to go off to war with his elder sister Prydwyn. She could do magic - she was going to be a proper war witch one day. She could do spells that made your blood run cold. It was proper glorious. But he couldn't even tie a favour properly let alone do actual magic, so he was supposed to be training to be a warrior. But he wasn't strong enough to lift a sword yet. And so instead he was stuck here... fishing. It was just not fair.

Mum had got a letter from Prydwyn. She was fighting with the Golden Son - which was the best army in all of Dawn, in all the Empire... although he wasn't really sure whose son it was supposed to be. It sounded amazing... She was having all these adventures and killing Drooj. He didn't want to admit to anyone, but when he'd heard that they blown the gate up he had been proper scared. But he wasn't scared now... not now the Golden Son, and all the other Dawnish armies were here.

Unwatched the float bobbed and danced sending ripples across the surface of the Semmerlak.

Pelleas couldn't believe how glorious it all sounded. None of the generals were holding back - they were sticking it to the Drooj with everything they had. Prydwyn said it was scary and ex-ill-erating at the same time. Pelleas didn't know what that was but it sounded pretty glorious. Before she left Prydwyn had told him it was ok to be scared - that even nobles get scared - being glorious is about doing it even though you're scared. Prydwyn was super-smart - she was going to be the best witch in Lacre one day.

A strange white fog hovered over the surface of the water. The float disappeared from view, obscured by the wisps as they moved closer to the shore.

Everyone in Lacre was talking about the war. The nobles had saved the town and all of Semmerholm and probably Dawn and the Empire as well. Everyone was so excited and proud. There was a big feast planned for the end of the season - to celebrate how glorious the fighting had been. Even Ma Lettle who terrified everyone and never smiled was making red and gold bunting now. It was going to be the biggest celebration ever - on account of how this was the most glorious thing ever that anyone could even think of.

He cursed again. He was stuck here... fishing! It was not fair - he was ten - nearly eleven now! He could be off be fighting with Prydwyn and killing drooj and risking everything for glory. And instead he was stuck here fishing. There's no glory in fish.

The smoke roiled and thickened as the waters of the great lake parted. The lad staggered to his feet staring at the unearthly beauty now stood where the water had been but moments ago. She was clad in a raiment of tiny silver scales, the sun glittering off each tiny shield. She reached out and beckoned him to come closer. He stared dumbstruck, jaw agog, but his feet moved as if commanded by the lady.

"My mistress requires a mortal to carry her words to your Earls. You are called to the court of the Lady of the Semmerlak, Pelleas of Lacre."

He shook his head, terrified. He'd heard about faeries carting people off - they were dangerous - you shouldn't go with them. He ordered his feet to turn and run, but his feet weren't listening. They just kept dragging him closer to this awful woman.

They found the rod late that night, the float still bobbing in the water. But nothing was seen of Pelleas for the best part of a week. At first there was great relief when he did return... but he was all armoured in mithril scales and carrying a fancy sword. And a message apparently... for the earls of Dawn...

For months they waged a bitter campaign against the invaders, hurling themselves against the enemy. The losses were terrible, but they did not falter. They did not stop to count the cost but focused only on victory - on glory. The hateful Druj countered with everything they had, but it was not enough. In a single glorious season, Dawn has reconquered almost everything that had been lost.

Just as they dealt with the shambling horrors out of Varushka that sought to conquer Weirwater, the Dawnish people routed the Druj and saved Semmerholm. The Druj are defeated, but they are not yet broken - even so the scale and the nature of this extraordinary Dawnish victory has caused an outpouring of patriotic fervour that is unprecedented in recent times. Since Dawnguard fell, the yeomanry have been riven with uncertainty; now that confusion is at an end. Nobody in Dawn doubts for one second that the Druj are going to be driven from Semmerholm, and then from Dawnguard, and then from the Barrens and then - perhaps - from existence entirely. As a result there are a number of unique opportunities to channel that raw enthusiasm and put it in service to the glory of Dawn.

The people of Dawn are not the only ones impressed by the ferocity of this victory over the Druj. The nobility of the Summer Realm, the traditional allies of powerful Dawnish enchanters, have let it be known that they are well pleased at the victories won by their cousins. And there too hangs an opportunity.

For the Glory of Dawn

Renewed Pride

- The Dawn national assembly could help the yeofolk channel their renewed pride into support for the war effort

The invasion of Semmerholm raised doubts for the safety of all who lived here. At the same time, the unliving horrors that plagued Weirwater left many facing unspeakable horror, forced to fight their own ancestors reborn as flesh-starved beasts. Yet out of fear and horror has come renewed Pride; just as they forced the dead back into the ground, so Dawn has driven the Druj back.

There is a groundswell of approval for the way that this war has been conducted, spearheaded by the four patriotic Dawnish generals who pledged their armies to a single cause. As a result the yeomanry of Dawn, the people who toil, are now keen to play their part to in this victory. Across all of Dawn there is a growing determination to do what anyone can to help the war against the Druj, to ensure that this time the victory is total.

The triumphant defence of Semmerholm is an inspiration to glory for every true Dawnish person. We send x with 25 doses of liao to carry the inspiring songs of our victory to every corner of the nation so that all may hear the good news. We implore the yeoman of this land to work the (mines/forests/herb gardens/farms and businesses) of Dawn to produce the resources we need to press on to final victory!

Synod Mandate, Dawnish Assembly

But this potential will remain untapped without direction and guidance from the nobility of Dawn. Of course the yeofolk will listen to the orders of their earls, but what will actually drive them to strive far beyond their normal labours is the uplifting songs of the troubadours. If the Dawnish assembly approves this mandate then they could direct the yeomen to produce more of the most essential materials by choosing one of mines, forests, herb gardens, or both farms and businesses (as detailed in the mandate). The output of every one of the selected resource in Dawn would improve by the equivalent of one rank for the coming season.

What would really motivate people though is if a suitable song memorialising the triumph in Semmerholm were created by a skilled troubadour. If the liao for the mandate is accompanied by a suitable song that reminds everyone of the nature of this great victory then the bonus provided by the mandate will last for an entire year rather than single season.

The named priest would be responsible for choosing or composing the song, which would be spread along with the mandate. (OOC Note: the named priest should include the text of the song and a recording if they have one - for the wiki - in the e-mail they send to Profound Decisions after the event).

Three Gifts

While the glorious defeat of the Druj is uppermost in the minds of the folk of Semmerholm, the people of Weirwater have also seen first-hand the strength of the nobles and their retainers. When the unliving threatened to devour them, the nobility rallied their allies and faced them in battle for the protection of their people. The witch weavers of Hawthorn and Appelfel know that better than any. In conjunction with allied circles across the territory they have worked to completed three powerful magical items which they intend to gift to the nation. Their magic will last but a year, but a year gives countless opportunities for glory.

- The weavers of Hawthorn have created the Crown of Glorious Fire, a talisman that will help protect the wearer from the venomous weapons of the Druj.
- The weavers of Appelfel have woven the Belt of Knighthood, a talisman that will inspire allies to fight when their spirits flag.
- The weavers of Culwich have woven the Shield of the Seeker, a shield that will greatly enhance healing received by the bearer provided they are dedicated to the paths of virtue.

The three items will be presented by the Dawnish egregore to the troubadours of Dawn at the Winter Solstice with a request that they find three champions to bear them the gifts for the coming year. The troubadours are further asked to hallow each gift with the aura they think will best help the bearer to seek glory through virtue - after all, the Dawnish assembly recently made clear that virtue was a key element of the path to true glory.

Of course the weaver circles expect the chosen recipients to be glorious, but their representative - Evaine of the White Thorns - also gives precise instructions for the dispensation of the gifts. She requests the troubadours identify:

- The earl whose leadership best inspired the Dawnish to glory in the past year
- The noble whose virtue caused them to make the greatest sacrifice in the past year
- The knight-errant whose has most embodied the ideals of glory in the past year

The Rose Towers

- The minor defences at Semmer's Rose could be replaced with a beautiful place of pilgrimage

The beautiful town of Semmer's Rose is of historic importance in Dawnish history and has played a pivotal role in the defence of the territory on more than one occasion. When the Druj surged out of the Barrens, many people fled here hoping to find aid or at least a place to make a stand. Now that the territory appears secure, people are clamouring to construct an appropriate monument to recognise this glorious accomplishment.

Lord Caradoc of House Arien once held a reputation as one of Dawn's finest architects before he retired to live out his days at Semmer's Rose. The construction that made him famous was designed and built as his test of mettle, a commission from the Earl of House Arien to create a beautiful palace in which every room would contain at least one window that faced the south garden. Although over eighty now, the Lord has worked tirelessly to create a design for a new tower to be constructed at Lacuve.

Caradoc's plans make brilliant use of the existing minor defences commissioned by the Senate if 377YE, but rather than complete the work to create a cumbersome fortification, Caradoc chose to completely re-purpose them to create a series of beautiful towers. Each tower will contain countervailing stairs laid out so that it is possible to ascend by one stair well and then descend by the other. The walls will then decorated with a set of tapestries, each depicting scenes of Dawnish triumph from the recent Semmerholm campaign. In this way, a hearty individual strong enough to climb and descend each tower in turn might revisit the story of the entire campaign in the course of their journey.

To create such a monument to Dawnish glory would require a suitable commission be approved by the Imperial Senate or else announced using a wayleave. The construction would require 15 wains of white granite and 30 crowns and would replace the very minor benefits provided by the existing defences.

When completed the towers would become a singular marvel, a testament to the Dawnish accomplishment. An Imperial title would be created - The Rose of Lacuve as Caradoc has suggested - with custodianship of this place of pilgrimage. Appointed by the Dawnish national assembly, they would receive 12 doses of liao and 24 votes in the Synod in perpetuity.

The Harps of Astolat

- A great work could be built in Astolat using weirwood and mithril to provide additional crystal mana to mana sites in the territory

While Weirwater and Semmerholm have been directly threatened, the people of Astolat are no less enthused by the tales of glory the troubadours are spreading. At Weaving, the town of many inns, enchanters and representatives of weaver cabals alike come together from all over the territory to discuss how they can aid their nation. In the end they recognise that the witches already supporting the armies are more than a match for the Druj sorcerers - all they need is a ready source of power to wield their magic on the battlefield, or to weave the enchancements that will help the knights achieve victory.

As such, Lord Joshua of House Cadence has come up with an ambitious plan - to construct a series of grand aolian harps at key locations throughout the territory. Six feet tall or more, these harps would respond not to the wind but to the currents of mana, producing not only eerie ethereal music - the Music of the spheres - but harnessing, directing, and focusing the flow of magic itself.

The weavers, witches, and enchanters can design and locate the harps, but they still require a suitable commission by a Senator or Bearer an Imperial Wayleave. The great work will not be cheap - it will cost 35 wains of weirwood, 15 wains of mithril, and 100 crowns, and will take a season to complete. The result will be that every mana site in Astolat owned by a Dawnish citizen will receive a share of 45 additional crystal mana each season as long as the central harp at Weaving remains unmolsted - and all without any need for peculiar foreign muck from Jarm, as Lord Joshua does not tire of undiplomatically announcing.

The Promise of Summer

The lords and ladies of the Summer Realm have indicated to those enchanters who have spoken with them that they are every bit as impressed by the victory in Semmerholm as their mortal counterparts in Dawn. Two eternal in particular, Queen Eleonaris and King Adamant, have been swept up by the fervour of the triumph and are determined not to be outdone by the Dawnish plans to mark the occasion.

A Gate of Adamant

- King Adamant wishes to see the Gate rebuilt - preferably bigger and more durable than before

King Adamant delights in large stone structures and has been moved to wroth by the destruction of the Gate. Via his koboldi, he has let it be known that he is keen to see the great fortification rebuilt, only bigger and more impressive than ever. To this end he has asked the Dawnish to work with him on the construction of a new Gate, one he claims would be unbreakable. The vast structure would be a huge undertaking, the commission would need to be approved by the Imperial Senate, and it would require 160 wains of White Granite - but it would not count against the normal Senate limits for the number of commissions and there would be no cost for workers. Adamant is incapable of providing Dawn with the necessary building materials, but he has no trouble providing all the skills and expertise needed as well as a veritable army of koboldi to carry out the construction work.

Adamant insists that if Dawn are prepared to create this great fortification then it will be unbreakable - though he refuses to elaborate on what that means - and that with the aid of his servants it could be completed within a year (although no other method of speeding production would be effective).

If such a great construction cannot be realised, then Adamant will be disappointed but not offended. If they simply rebuild the Gate to the same size and proportions that it previously occupied then it would need 80 wains of white granite and they will need Imperial civil servants to help oversee the work (so it will count against the Empire's maximum commissions) but Adamant will still send his koboldi to carry out the work, so no money will be needed for the commission to pay any workers.

The only potential drawback to taking advantage of one of these opportunities would be that if the Imperial Conclave were to declare Adamant an enemy of the Empire for any reason before the fortification was completed, the koboldi would be unable (and unwilling) to continue working and the remaining work would need to be done with paid labour, and at the standard speed.

Either opportunity would have the usual upkeep for a fortification of its size.

The Favours of Eleonaris

Eleonaris shares her brother's enthusiasm for this latest triumph, but her interest lies in the prowess of those who have fought alongside her elfin knights. She has informed the Dawnish egregore that she has fashioned four favours, one for each of the Dawnish armies that led the charge. She has asked the egregore to help her identify four champions to gird on the final day of the summit. These four should be war witches or knights - she does not care which provided they are the most courageous, the most glorious, the most furious combatants in Dawn.

The Lion of Summer has bestowed such favours before to the nobles of Dawn. At the conclusion of the girding ceremony, those upon whom the favours were bestowed became the recipients of powerful and durable personal enchancements that greatly enhanced their nobility, prowess, or majesty.

The egregore has indicated that she intends to ask the Earl's Council to choose one of the champions, and to ask the troubadours of Dawn to choose another. The third will be chosen by the four generals who oversaw the victory over the Druj, and the fourth by the egregore herself.

Golden Causeway

- The Lady of the Semmerlak offers an opportunity to secure a magical causeway across the Semmerlak

One final boon is offered from the lords and ladies of the Summer realm. The Lady of the Semmerlak is a powerful herald, now a courtier on the Fields of Glory. The people of Dawn, along with the aid of wise Varushkan allies, not only freed the lady from a grim curse but also provided her with good advice that helped her to quell the turmoil in her heart that had tormented her for centuries. She has left the service of Hayaak, and now stands high in the councils of Queen Eleonaris.

She still seeks to reward the people of Dawn - and seeks a vengeance of her own against the Druj. One of her servants, a pale skinned maiden with long black hair and webbed hands - had brought her message to the nobles who live on the shores of the Semmerlak. If the people of Dawn construct a gate of white granite and mithril on the shores below Lacre, then whenever they wish she will bring her power to bear to create a magical causeway across the Semmerlak, wide enough for a dozen soldiers to march abreast.

The gateway she describes will cost 25 wains of white granite and 15 wains of mithril, cost 10 thrones, require a senate motion (not a Wayleave). Once it is complete any Dawnish army will be able to march from Lacre to the region on the opposite side of the Semmerlak - and return the same way. The causeway would not permit anyone else to use it - and indeed the Druj would likely remain unaware of its presence until the Dawnish used it to invade.

There would be upkeep on Golden Causeway. The only potential flaw in this commission would be that if the eternal the Lady of the Lake serves - currently Eleonaris - were to be placed under enmity by the Conclave, the causeway could not be called into being until the enmity was lifted.

Limited Opportunity

With one exception, all of the opportunities listed here are a result of the glorious victories of the Dawnish over the last year. They must be commissioned this season, or not at all. The exception is the Golden Causeway: that opportunity remains as long as the Lady of the Semmerlak, and her Queen, remain allies of Dawn.

Build The Fires High

Original Music & Lyrics by Anna Clifford Tait and Stephanie Heath

RECORDING of this song : Build The Fires

Darkness comes, the snow is falling Check the herd, make sure they're all in Build the fires high tonight And may the wolves go hungry

We are the heart that burns in the cold We are the shepherds guarding the fold Build the fires high tonight And may the wolves go hungry

Chorus: This is the land of our father's children Dark and hungry, secrets hidden Here we stand and this land we'll hold 'Gainst the fear and the cold

We are the mothers, fathers and brothers We are the sisters, husbands and lovers Build the fires high tonight And may the wolves go hungry

We are the Wardens, clearing your way We are the ones holding darkness at bay Build the fires high tonight And may the wolves go hungry

Bullroarer's Shout

Description

A bullroarer is a simple musical instrument, a piece of shaped wood swung around the head to create an eerie, echoing moan. The Kallavesi warriors who favour these weapons often mimic that behaviour, swinging them in great circles while roaring or moaning. Most often the Winterfolk make these weapons in the form of long-hafted heavy axes, and batter their foes into submission, and they are very popular with the Steinr as well as their more mystical cousins.

The Urizen, Navarr, and Freeborn favour more fluid, flexible versions of these weapons, commonly referring to one as an Onrushing Tide - an irresistible weapon that sweeps enemies before it but is valued especially for its ability to dominate the battlefield. These weapons are often take the form of spears or glaives, and marked with the rune Hirmok.

This powerful weapon combines the responsiveness of green iron with the raw power of tempest jade, enhancing every swing from the wielder. It is a devastating tool in the hands of a competent wielder, capable of breaking enemy lines to pieces, slaughtering powerful champions in single combat, and allowing great control over the warrior's immediate vicinity.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of a polearm. You must be wielding this weapon to use its magical properties.
- Requirement: You must have the weapon master skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: Three times per day may call STRIKEDOWN with this polearm.
- Materials: Crafting a Bullroarer's Shout requires thirteen ingots of green iron, eight ingots of tempest jade, five ingots of orichalcum, and five measures of beggar's lye. It takes one month to make one of these items.

Marko roared, spinning his long axe around his head as he charged. He took the first orc in the chest, lifting him off the ground, and followed through with three bone-crushing blows. To the left and right of him, Gytha and Dunstan fought axe-and-shield, more cautious. Not Marko - he bellowed, and struck out, knocking the orc fighting Gytha on his arse.

The thane took advantage of the opening, shearing her opponent's arm at the elbow. Dunstan wheeled, his shield ready, and the three of them took a moment to pick their next opponents. Marko threw back his head and let out another terrifying bellow, pawed the ground and lowered his head, his horns pointing towards a tight group of shield-bearing orcs to the left. His companions shouted their assent, and they were off.

Steaming in the winter chill, Marko swung his axe into one of the orc shields. The barbarian tried to brace himself for the blow but the force of the warrior's charge, and the power of his axe, sent him sprawling. The orcs to either side closed in, but Gytha and Dunstan gave them no opening.

A third got in a lucky stab, but Marko knocked his weapon aside with the haft of his axe, then reversed his blow and hacked the orc's legs out from under him. Before the enemy could rise, the Kallavesi slammed his weapon down once, twice. The orc, a champion of his kind, pulled himself to his feet, his armour dented but not broken. He brought his shield round to protect himself, and again Marko slammed him to the ground, knocking the shield aside and aiming a devastating blow to one of his legs, fracturing bone and leaving the orc writhing in agony, desperately trying to fight from the ground.

His suffering was soon ended.

Surrounded by fighting, Marko swung his axe around his horn-masked head again, threw back his head, and bellowed his defiance and his victory to the twilight sky.

Burnished Orb

Description

Few ritual tools are as splendid as those associated with the practice of Summer magic. This valuable item is usually crafted in the form of a metal orb inlaid with tempest jade and usually decorated with gold, silver and precious gems. It is infused with potent enchantments and attuned to the realm of Summer. A coven can use it to draw on the power contained in ingots of orichalcum and align it with their own magic, allowing them to reduce or in some cases replace the need for crystal mana when performing Summer rituals.

A Burnished Orb most often takes the form of an actual 'covenstone' wielded by one of the magicians in a ritual, but it is not the only shape appropriate to this item. Some covens possess burnished orbs that take the form of a bowl or chalice, while others possess a literal crown that is worn by one of the ritualists to display the aspects of majesty and potency that are core to many Summer rituals. The item is often marked with runes; or with images associated with power and strength such as physically strong animals (stags and eagles being the most common); clenched fists; castles; or the accoutrements of war. Regardless of the precise form it takes, a coven that uses it is careful to ensure that it plays a central role in their ceremonies - in addition to its ceremonial use it is a symbol of their unity of purpose and their coven oath.

Rules

- Form: Paraphernalia. Takes the form of a piece of ritual paraphernalia. The item must be present in the ritual to use its magical properties.
- Effect: Members of the coven who are performing a Summer ritual they have mastered may use orichalcum in place of crystal mana. Every two measures of orichalcum spent count as one crystal mana.
- Materials: Crafting a Burnished Orb requires seven ingots of tempest jade, four ingots of orichalcum and three measures of dragonbone. It takes one month to make one of these items.

Burnished Rampart

Description

A burnished rampart, sometimes called an Undying Shield, a Brazen Shield or occasionally even an Orichalcum Shield is most often made of metal, with an iridescent gloaming finish. The shield itself is difficult to destroy without the use of magic.

It was first devised by the runesmiths of the Steinr to test the resolve of young warriors. Many cocky youngsters would claim that if only their shields had not been shattered by the hammers of the trolls, they would have held the line until their deaths. Tired of such boasting, a Runesmith named Thyra created the first Undying Shields and offered them such warriors, telling him that if true heroism burned in their souls, then such a shield would never fail them. Some were worthy of the shields' magic while some fled with little but splinters.

A burnished rampart may be engraved with the rune Pallas, often inlaid in gold or a gold-orichalcum alloy. Some bearers will mark their shields with paint to show how often it had been broken and repaired, as a display of their determination and dedication to the Virtue of Pride.

Rules

- Form: Talisman. Takes the form of a shield. You cannot make one of these items that is a buckler.
- Requirement: You must have the shield skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: You may repair this shield by expending a hero point and spending at least five seconds of uninterrupted appropriate roleplaying involving handling the item. If the shield is struck with a blow while using this ability, the blow is considered to have struck your arm as usual and you must begin the appropriate roleplaying again. If you are attacked or make an attack while using this ability the attempt fails and you must begin the roleplaying again.
- Materials: Crafting a burnished rampart requires fourteen ingots of orichalcum and three measures of iridescent gloaming. It takes one month to make one of these items.

Dafyth rocked backwards under the strength of the blow, the orc's great weapon swept thunderous blows as the Navarri warrior struggled to raise his shield to block each strike. The shield was a fine piece of work, the metal embossed with twisting roots and flowering vines picked out along it in shining ambergelt. He was sure something had broken in his arm from the last block though and he wasn't sure how much longer he could go on.

The orc could see the human warrior was tiring and followed a sweeping blow of its sword with a swift elbow to the face, shattering teeth with the armoured limb and sending the Navarr sprawling to the ground. Dafyth looked up at the orc, spitting broken teeth and blood, as it raised its weapon for one final strike. With a feral roar it brought the sword down, the Navarr warrior barely had time to pull his shield over his body before the blow fell. The shield split neatly in two pieces, surviving just long enough to protect the young Thorn from a killing strike.

Dafyth rolled away and grabbed a handful of dirt from the floor and flung it into the eyes of his attacker earning him precious seconds. With that he ran, carrying both pieces of the broken shield with him.

After a hundred yard sprint, he ducked behind a thorny bush, the clanking sound of rusted orc armour lumbering after him. He looked at his broken shield and silently thanked the distant artisan who had crafted it for him. He tugged sharply on the fine roots around him yanking them from the ground and hastily wrapping them around the two halves of the broken shield and reciting the words that the crafter had drilled into him.

In an instant the two halves clicked back together as if time was rewinding, the knotty roots melding with the shield until they seemed as if they had always been part of it. Dafyth smiled a crack-toothed smile which coupled with the bloody war paint gave a visage as ugly as any orc.

He turned to face his pursuer and with a furious war cry he charged ...

Bursar of the Conclave

Overview

The Bursar of the Conclave is an Imperial title bestowed on a magician. It is appointed through the Conclave.

The position was established by unanimous vote of the Imperial Senate in Summer 377YE. The vote followed extensive political maneuvering within the Conclave, and a Declaration of Concord laying out the responsibilities and powers the magicians wished the Bursar to possess. During Autumn 380YE, the Bursar's ability to participate in the gambits of the Conclave was rendered moot when certain errors that had crept into the Conclave procedures were corrected. At the same time, new opportunities to acquire crystal mana from magicians who did not attend Anvil arose, offering the Bursar an alternative way to increase the wealth of Imperial magicians.

Responsibilities

The purpose of the Bursar is to help the Conclave raise money to acquire resources for Conclave members and to arrange the purchase of materials and items that the Conclave wishes to acquire. They are expected to liaise closely with the archmagi and the grandmasters of the orders to identify what is available and what is required.

Powers

Addressing the Conclave

Once per summit, the Bursar can raise an address to the agenda of a Conclave session for free. This power is intended to be used to allow the Bursar to appraise the Conclave of the current financial status of the Conclave, the contracts in progress and the opportunities available - but the Bursar is free to address the Conclave however they wish.

Total Money Spent	Production
15 Crowns	12 crystal mana
35 Crowns	24 crystal mana
60 Crowns	36 crystal mana
90 Crowns	48 crystal mana
125 Crowns	60 crystal mana

Funding the Conclave

The Bursar has the ability to spend money to buy crystal mana. They can spend money each season as if they controlled a ministry. Money spent in this manner is used to buy directly from other Imperial citizens who have access to crystal mana, with the assistance of several civil servants. The mana is provided to the Bursar at the start of the next summit.

The Bursar is the sole arbiter of how this mana is to be used, within the remit of their responsibilities.

Appointment

The appointment, replacement, or removal of the Bursar is made by the declaration of candidacy as part of a Conclave session. A candidate can be presented for the post of Bursar only once a season.

The Bursar serves until they are replaced by another magician using the Declaration of Candidacy. As a title in the Conclave, the Bursar cannot be revoked.

In Winter 378YE the Senate amended the title to be a lifetime appointment, and the stipend was changed to its current form.

Responsibilities

The Bursar receives funds from the Imperial treasury which are intended to be used to purchase tools and materials to be used in the education of the future heroes of the Empire by the Academy at Anvil.

Powers

Stipend

The Bursar receives a stipend of 6 Thrones annually from the Senate budget.

Appointment

The Bursar of the Imperial Academy is an Imperial position appointed by the Senate. Any Imperial citizen may hold the title. The Bursar has tenure, and serves until they die or step down. They can be revoked by the General Assembly and by the Assembly of the Nine.

Business

Definition

A business can represent almost any structure or property that could produce an income, such as inn, a smithy, a brothel, theatre or similar structure. It shouldn't be land or a farm - if that is what you want to take then we would recommend you choose the farm resource instead. But it can represent a trader who buys and sells goods within the Empire (if you want to represent a character who travels overseas to trade then choose a fleet).

Production

A business produces 9 crowns.

Downtime Options

There are no downtime options for a business. It produces income automatically.

Upgrades

A business can be upgraded using white granite obtained from the Bourse. Each time a business is upgraded, the owner receives an additional income of 36 rings from then on.

To upgrade a business requires Imperial wains of white granite equal to the level the business is being upgraded to. So the first upgrade of a starting level 1 business costs 2 Imperial wains of white granite, from 2 to 3 costs 3 Imperial wains, etc.

Diversification

A business can be diversified to sacrifice income for resources. To diversify a business requires one Imperial wain of mithril and one Imperial wain of weirwood. Each time a business diversifies, the owner chooses one resource produced by a mine; the business produces 2 ingots of the chosen metal but produces 36 rings less income.

National Implications

Senators in the League are chosen on the basis of who can command the most support of individuals with substantial investments in the city. This is represented by the business personal resource. A League character who has been operating a business personal resource in a League city receives 10 votes for that city's senatorial elections. If a business is upgraded - then the character who operates that business receives 2 additional votes for each upgrade.

Butcher's Bill

Description

These polearms are comparatively cheap to craft, and this helps to make them popular among both Marcher households and League free companies. They can be bought in moderate numbers, and used to add additional strength to a unit of skilled soldiers, or allow a recruit to fight nearly as well as their more experienced colleagues.

Their extensive use on the battlefield as part of tight formations has given them a brutal reputation that is not entirely deserved. They take their name from the "butcher's bill", the list of casualties after a battle. Several generals have referred to the use of these weapons as "balancing the butcher's bill" by ensuring there are more casualties on the enemy side than on the Imperial side.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of a polearm. You must be wielding this weapon to use its magical properties.
- Requirement: You must have the weapon master skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: Once per day you may call either STRIKEDOWN or CLEAVE with this polearm.
- Materials: Crafting a Butcher's Bill requires eight ingots of orichalcum and three ingots of iridescent gloaming. It takes one month to make one of these items.

"An answer, if you please, ma'am!"

The sutler looked up from her ledger at the servant in front of her, and replied: "Do me the honour of informing the Merchant Prince that his business may provide him with a solid income, but he will need to extend his reach if he wishes to arm one in five of his company's recruits with even the cheapest of artisan-crafted weapons."

"But the reputation of the soldiery of Tassato!"

"...will survive this minor setback. Train them harder, and longer. I can profit better in Overton, and my concern is the Prosperity of my Guild."

Butcher's Cleaver

Description

A Butcher's Cleaver is a practical weapon that allows the wielder to deliver crippling blows to an enemy. The weapons exist in various forms and by different names across the Empire and beyond, but are often shaped as somewhat crude, heavy butcher's cleavers in honour of Kaisa Battle-Butcher. The saga of this legendary Suag warrior recount many tales where her brutal blows not only dispatched her opponents (both barbarian orcs and dangerous creatures such as the great white dire beast Penju), but also terrified their companions into fleeing.

These weapons gained great popularity among the Imperial Orcs after they were introduced to the legions by Wintermark runemiths, as the heavy style appealed to the orcish tastes. Some called them "Thrace's Bounty" after the rumour that the leader of the rebellion acquired one of these cleavers among the first weapons the rebels looted. The Worth of that cleaver, if it were located, would be staggering.

In the Marches, these take the more orderly form of long axes and are known as Wayford Axes after the town in Mitwold, where several were made and sold to notorious bandits. One of those same axes was later used to behead members of the gang, once it was bonded to the town executioner as a fee for her work. This did not tarnish the design's reputation as much as expected, as yeomen are too sensible to dismiss a useful weapon on such grounds.

Finally, they are also known by much cruder epithets of which Limb Breaker and Orc Killer are very much the mildest. Across the Empire they are called Orcbane or Orcslayer weapons. This is not just bravado - in many orc tribes the rank-and-file warriors wear light chain, mithril breastplates, or heavy leathers rather than the heavy chain or steel plate popular in most Imperial nations. This means that a well-placed blow from a Butcher's Cleaver can quickly take these opponents out of the fight. Needless to say, these names have become a little awkward to employ since the Imperial Orcs joined the Empire.

Jotra, the Rune of Battle, is a common feature of these weapons but a few bear Yoorn, the Rune of Ending, to emphasise the deadliness of the wounds delivered.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of a two-handed weapon.
- Requirement: You must have the Weapon Master skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: You may spend a hero point to call IMPALE with this two-handed weapon.
- Materials: Crafting a Butcher's Cleaver requires no special materials. It takes two months to make one of these items.

How Kaisa became the Battle-Butcher

In years which followed the founding of the kingdom of Wintermark, barbarian bandits still prowled the sparsest parts of the land and preyed on the smaller halls, like runtish dogs snapping at a wounded deer. Kaisa was a young Suag, dwelling in one such hall in deep woods of Sermersuaq, when one night came the report that a band of orcs was fast approaching the settlement. The thane told his people to brace themselves for death, for they lacked the strength of arms to see off such a threat.

Kaisa stepped forward and said, "Do not despair so quickly! I can drive off this horde, if you will grant me a single boon."

The thane snorted and said, "I do not see how one young magician can face such a band and hope to win, but we have little left to lose now. What do you wish to ask of me?"

"Grant me that axe you have been forging, my thane, and I shall get rid of them all," she asked with a smile.

"That axe? But it is barely finished. The magic has settled but it still needs shaping. It looks little better than a butcher's cleaver."

"That will serve me well, my lord. It is all I ask of you."

With a shrug, the thane granted her the weapon. Kaisa bound it to her with a swift spell and set off to find the bandits. That proved simple as the orcs did not try to hide their path. Kaisa stepped out before them and challenged them to send their best warrior to fight her. Thinking to make some sport out of the silly human, the orcs agreed.

Kaisa had learnt to wield such a weapon but was no great warrior. Still she found the single opening she needed to put the enchantment to good use, throwing her heart and soul into a fearsome blow. The orc champion fell at her feet and at once she cut off his head.

The other bandits were astonished.

"Are you that hall's finest warrior?" their leader asked. "Is that your finest weapon?"

"Oh no," replied Kaisa. "I am but a lowly butcher and this is but my butcher's cleaver. I use it to cut up goat meat. The others are all far greater warriors than I and armed with blades far more brilliant. They sent me to see if you were worth their time."

The orcs pondered what kind of people would think such a weapon suitable only for chopping up goats. As one, they decided that they did not wish to meet such people in battle. As one, the orc bandits fled.

And that is how Kaisa became known as Kaisa Battle-Butcher.

By Chance It Was

Trad

Clannad do a rather pretty version here: <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=8j9HkMBdero&feature=kp>

Simple chords. Guitarists: If you want to avoid the bar chord, capo 2 and play Dm Am.

[Em] By chance it was I met my love It did me much surprise Down by a shady myrtle grove Just as the sun did [Bm]rise. [Em]The birds they sang right gloriously And pleasant was the air And there was non save she and i Among the flowers fair.

In dewy grass and green we walked She timid was and coy How can'st thou choose but pity me My pretty pearl, my joy
How comes it that thou stroll this way? Sweet maiden tell me true Before bright phoebus' glittering ray Has supped the morning dew?

I go to tend the flocks I love The ewes and tender lambs That pasture by the myrtle grove That gambol by their dams
There I enjoy a pure content At dawning of the day Then, hand in hand, we lovers went To see the flock at play.

And as we wended down the road I said to her, "sweet maid, Three years I in my place abode And three more must be stayed The three that I am bound so fast O fairest wait for me And when the weary years are past Then wedded we will be."

"three years are long, three times too long Too lengthy the delay" And then I answered in my song "hope wastes them quick away Where love is fervent, fain and fast And knoweth not decay There nimbly fleet the seasons past Accounted as one day."

Call Down Lightning's Wrath

Rules

Spring Magnitude 8

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets a character, who must be present throughout. The target character must have the battle mage skill.

This spell is an enchantment. A target may only be under one enchantment effect at a time.

Effects

The target gains the ability to call strikedown when wielding a staff. The target must follow all the rules for casting an offensive spell including spending a point of personal mana. .

The effect lasts until the start of the next Profound Decisions Empire event.

Additional Targets

This ritual can affect additional characters from the same coven. Each additional character increases the magnitude by 6. Additional characters must be present throughout.

Description

This ritual harnesses natural forces to grant a magician a potent attack. When the power of this enchantment is invoked it does not literally call a bolt of lightning down to strike an opponent; rather, the force of the staff-strike is greatly enhanced, lifting the target off their feet and slamming them back down to earth. In some cases, especially when the magician's staff is made of wood or bone, the implement might seem to twist around the ankles or legs of the target and wrench them off their feet.

Many magicians find that while under the effect of this ritual their staff becomes a little unruly, occasionally seeming to shift or twist of its own volition. There are also folk-tales in which magicians who use this ritual attract storms, sometimes with dangerous implications for their friends and family - although the magician herself is usually left unharmed even when the story recounts how bolts of lightning are attracted to their staffs.

Common Elements

When performing this ritual, the coven often invokes storms, hurricanes and typhoons. Some magicians, especially Suag icewalkers prefer to use animal imagery with the spell, evoking the spirit of the wolf-pack, the leaping hare or the charging bull. Among the Urizen the invocation tends to focus more around the idea of disrupting the poise of an enemy - unbalancing them with a perfectly timed strike that causes their own momentum to cause them to fall over.

Regardless of the invocation, it cannot be denied that this is a violent, disruptive ritual. As with many rituals that invoke the destructive forces of nature, clashing, discordant music, thundering rhythms and violent movement are key elements in this ritual. Copper cymbals, especially among Freeborn ritualists, are regularly included in the performance of this ritual - copper is a material that is believed to attract lightning and may feature in other forms in a ritual.

Other elements might include the runes Mawrig or Verys (often accompanied by the rune of dominion; the evocation of The Claw or The Stallion; a violent scene in which characters are at the mercy of powerful storms; or images of horses, bulls or chimerae.

The storm that raged overhead was not natural, Hugo was sure of it. Even embroiled in the heat of battle, the war-witch could feel his staff lurch in the direction of each lightning-strike, while he tried to keep it tightly focused on the enemy before him. Even through his heavy leather gloves, patterned with the rampant gryphon of his House, he felt it jolt as if with lightning of its own every time it hit the enemy. The battle was going well, and all he had to do now was keep fighting hard and not get struck by lightning.

Out of nowhere, a pair of spear-wielding orcs thrust forward out of their line, and by some dire circumstance, struck grievously at the warriors either side of him. Both fell to the ground, one screaming, the other silent. He had a second to act.

Left. He struck, and as he did, the world burst into terrifying brightness. The staff slammed into the orc with a force far greater than any mortal hands could grant it, and a bolt from the heavens flung him to the ground. The moment seared itself into Hugo's brain forever: the hate on his enemies' faces, the axes and spears raised in battle, the dead and the dying on both sides. More than just the sight: the heavy weight of the wood in his hands, the seeping cold of the rain, the shock which ran through him into the thick mud beneath.

If the strike was awesome, the peal of thunder that accompanied it was appalling. The whole battle paused for a moment as each and every warrior, Dawnish and barbarian, winced in pain and shook their heads to clear them of the terrible thunder. At the centre of it, Hugo yelled in pain without hearing himself.

The orc to his right looked at him like a monster, and he roared as if he were one. He raised his staff high over his head, preparing to strike. Then he fled, leaping out of the way of the staff and putting a few more feet between the two of them. He jabbed cautiously, but there was fear in his eyes now. The rest of his group kept a respectful distance.

Hugo glanced over his shoulder and cried out for a healer, and stood guard over his fallen comrades. Soon, they would break. For now, he still had glory to win!

Call Winged Messenger

Rules

Autumn Magnitude 2

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. The ritual targets a single specially prepared letter which must be present throughout.

Effects

This ritual requires a specially prepared, single page letter. At the completion of the ritual the letter vanishes and is conveyed to a single named character at a known location in the mortal realm. It can take anywhere from several hours, to several days, for the letter to be delivered. There seems to be no relationship between the physical distance to the target and the time the letter takes to arrive.

If the letter is sealed inside an envelope or similar then the outer covering is usually left behind when the ritual is performed - only the actual letter reaches the target. If the letter is inside an envelope then the referee will open and take just the letter away.

The process of preparing the letter includes clearly identifying the intended recipient by name (and title if appropriate), and by their location. If this information is incorrect or incomplete, the message will fail to be delivered. Should the letter fail to arrive for any reason - perhaps the recipient is dead or they are not to be found at the named location during the next three months - then the letter will be returned to its author at the start of the next event they attend. The letter always returns to the person who prepared it, not to the ritualist who performed the ritual.

The ritual cannot send a message to an eternal or herald, to a creature in a magical realm, to a ghost, or to the inhabitant of a regio chamber. Any attempt to send a winged message to such a target will fail - even if they are in the mortal realm.

It is not possible to send pamphlets, scrolls, arcane projections, money, materials, or crystal mana, bourse notes or anything similar with this ritual. The ritual only targets a single specially prepared page of writing.

Description

This ritual allows a properly prepared letter to be sent anywhere in the mortal realm. The letter vanishes at the completion of the ritual, as if grabbed by a fast-moving unseen presence. Ritualists will often hear the swift beating of wings, or the clatter of claws immediately before or after the letter vanishes

There is some disagreement among ritualists as to how precisely it works, but the accepted belief is that it somehow calls forth an actual invisible, incorporeal messenger to carry the letter. The nature of the "spirit" is unclear - some speculate it is a minor creature of the Autumn Realm, while others posit that it is actually an inhabitant of the mortal realm (explaining the inability to send letters to eternals), while a few claim it is nothing more than a temporary construct formed of mana and the will of the ritualist. Attempts to catch or see the spirit, assuming it even exists, have proved universally unsuccessful. Regardless, ritualists report sudden winds, whipping breezes, the sound of fast-beating wings and the 'awareness of an invisible presence' at the completion of the ritual, and recipients have reported similar sensations on occasions where they have been aware of the letter arriving.

The ritual does not create any special ability for the recipient to reply. If the letter is important enough, the recipient may arrange for this spell or a variant to be used to deliver a message of their own, or they may (depending on how far away they are) ask a merchant, or dispatch a messenger or courier to deliver a letter on their behalf.

Experiments have indicated that the process of transporting the letter erases any additional words, pictures, or annotations. Only the actual text prepared by the writer is ever transported with this ritual. Indeed, every letter prepared for use with Winged Messenger ends up evidencing a certain uniformity in writing style, and presentation. There is no commonly accepted explanation for this.

Using the ritual to send a message to an Eternal has proved ineffective; the letter is invariably returned a few months later.

It is not possible to transport goods with this ritual. Anything other than the specific specially prepared letter simply causes the ritual to fail, and no mana to be spent.

Common Elements

The focus of this ritual is a specially prepared letter - a single side of text infused with iridescent gloaming. Often the name of the recipient and their address are recited loudly and clearly during the ritual - but there is no requirement for this information to be correct and it is common for a ritualist to use a fanciful title and description rather than a prosaic name and location.

The letter targeted by the ritual must be in the open - if it is in a box or a pocket the ritual fails. It is usually placed on a table before the ritualist, or held up in one hand for the spirit to 'grab' as it flies past. It may be inside an envelope, or tied up tightly with string - especially if the contents are sensitive. Such precautions are generally left behind when the letter is transported, however.

The runes Queros or Sular are often evoked with this ritual, as are totemic spirits of fast or winged creatures such as ravens or hawks, or legendary beasts such as gryphon or some form of pegasus.

OOC Elements

Preparing the letter

Call Winged Messenger will only transport a letter than has been properly prepared. Any character can prepare such a letter - they do not need to have mastered this ritual, or even to be magicians to write a letter for use with this ritual. In character, the letter is carefully composed on pristine vellum using ink infused with iridescent gloaming.

You can prepare a letter at an event or before it, provided you have the three measures of iridescent gloaming required in your inventory. If you go to GOD at the event, you can hand in three measures of gloaming, and you can then create a message by logging in to your account once the gloaming has been logged.

A letter may be up to 2,500 characters at most. If you absolutely must write more than this... you will need to send two messages. However all characters you are likely to write to will expect a winged message to be concise and to the point since they know in-character that such communication is expensive and limited in length.

You must detail the name (and title if appropriate) of the recipient, and enough information about their location that we can confirm that it is correct. When sent to a target within the Empire, the location should include the name of a specific settlement (such as "Tassato Regario" or "Meade" or "The Village of Nuln"), as well as the region and territory. When sent to a target outside the Empire, similar level of detail is required, e.g. "The House of Princes, Jarm" or "The Tower of Crows, Sarcophan Delves, Sarcophan".

Each letter you compose will use three measures of iridescent gloaming from your account. Any letters you create before the event will be folded and placed in your pack. Any letters you create at the event will be printed out on parchment on request at the GOD desk.

Each letter prepared in this way has a unique ID number which is used by the referee when the ritual is performed. The limitations of the ritual mean that once the letter has been printed, no further changes to the content are possible. Anything added to the letter after the ritual is performed is erased when the message is sent - including pictures, signatures, or corrections. Only the text prepared using iridescent gloaming is communicated to the target using this ritual.

Known Correspondents

The Empire is aware of a list of specific foreign correspondents whose role is to represent their nation in communication with the Empire. These are the targets most commonly written to by an ambassador. While it is possible for a citizen to send a winged messenger to these people, it is not common for them to reply directly to the writer. They are much more likely to respond to the appropriate ambassador - even when a letter is of interest they may choose to operate through the appropriate Imperial ambassador rather than contact an unknown correspondent directly.

As of Autumn 381YE, the commonly known correspondents, by nation, are:

- the Asavean Archipelago - Lady Madriannia of the Blue Stones, Nemoria, Asavean Archipelago
- The Commonwealth - Militärattache Ludkhannah Schöningen, die Stahlhalle, Volkavaar, Commonwealth
- The Principalities of Jarm - Lord-Magister Anton Trescher of the Hidden Hook, Who attends at the House of Princes, In the City of Jarm, Principalities of Jarm
- The Sarcophan Delves - Bedelaar Huisbaas Annike, The Tower of Crows, Sarcophan, Sarcophan Delves
- The Sumaah Republic - Heln Stianser, Censor of wood, metal and stone, The High House of Prosperity, Sumaah Republic
- Axos - larch Maxatios, The Towers of Kantor, Axos
- Faraden - Lady Saretta of the Red Moon, Advisor on Imperial Trade to the Lord of the Four Winds, The Court of the Four Winds, Faraden
- Iron Confederacy - Jeanne de Hibernat, High Priestess of Evra the Smith, The Temple of Iron Hammers, Robec, Iron Confederacy

Letters to PCs

This ritual is most useful for sending a letter to an NPC; while it could be used to deliver a message to someone on the field at Anvil, it is paradoxically most likely to arrive just before the start of the next event. In almost all cases, when sending a letter to a player-character the ritualists would be better served paying someone to deliver it by hand on their behalf.

Notes

In every case, the text that is transported will be the text that was written on the computer by the correspondent. This is fixed at the point where the letter is printed - as are the recipient and their address. When the ritual is cast, the referee connects the unique ID number of the letter to that of the ritual, and this is what the plot writer sees when they check the details of the letter.

You must have the targeting information for a letter correct before printing it. The iridescent gloaming is consumed at this point, and if there are mistakes with the letter it is a costly proposition to correct them. While it is possible to deduce an address - for example a Wind of Fortune may mention a certain character as being in a certain location - sending a winged messenger without confirming this address in-character is a risky proposition that will commonly fail. If that happens you iridescent gloaming will be lost, but you will get the letter back in your pack at the start of the next event you attend.

The ritual is most reliable when used to write to characters who are expecting a letter, either because they are firmly established in the setting or because they have explicitly provided "contact information" to a character. While it can be used to preemptively contact an NPC, it is much more likely the letter will return unread than if it is sent to a character whose details have been confirmed.

Callidus

Eternal of Autumn

Sobriquets

Known as the Prince of the Argent Tontine, Callidus is most concerned with greed.

He is also called Sovereign-Lord of the City of Chains, a fanciful reference to the many deals and agreements he has made - as far as anyone knows he does not rule an actual city at all (despite rumours that he owns a portable citadel of iron and white basalt), preferring to remain a peripatetic instigator.

Appearance

Callidus is a potent horned male with fine clothing. He is rarely encountered without a ledger or two, and never without the ability to create a contract.

He is usually accompanied by one or more of his secretaries - clever eternal in their own right who serve as his proxies and advisors. His massive appointment tome, the Iron Ledger, is kept by his meticulous heralds, who often appear as Freeborn cambions. Scrupulous and precise, Callidus sometimes sends heralds to offer bargains, or to follow-up on bargains made by others.

Concerns

Callidus seeks to control everything through greed and desire. He exemplifies the idea that everyone wants something, and that by identifying their desires and being able to supply their needs, an individual can wield immense power. He also sees greed itself as the primary motivating force of living things, and supports and extols philosophies that highlight the influence of avarice and wealth.

While all Autumn eternal enjoy bargains, Callidus revels in them. He invariably creates a contract to cover any agreement he makes, and is the Autumn eternal most likely to invoke the Lictors to witness an important agreement. He invariably sticks to the letter of a contract, and some bargainers have met unfortunate fates due to not reading their agreement carefully enough. He can and has been bested in his bargains, and tales are told of heroes who dealt with the Silver Prince and came away rich, but his nature is such that a bargain that seems fair at first often grows more constrictive and dangerous as time goes by.... Callidus is quite pragmatic; he does not hold those who best him in contempt; he often tries to arrange an audience with them to discuss how they bested his contract, so that he can avoid the same mistakes another time. However, he is absolutely ruthless in hunting down anyone who breaks a bargain they have made with him.

Callidus has no single home within the Autumn realm, but instead cultivates an ability to be in the right place at the right time. While his movements seem random, through synchronicity he often finds himself in the right place at the right time to offer someone what they desperately want. His secretaries share this ability to some degree, but for some reason they are limited to appearing a crossroads; literal crossroads as well as figurative crossroads, however.

While the massive amount of business engaged in by his army of scribes and secretaries would necessitate a palace of bureaucracy, instead all such paperwork is contained within the single Iron Ledger. The Ledger itself seems to operate on much the same principles as Callidus himself; simply by inserting his hand he seems to be able to pull out the document he is seeking.

Callidus must surely have an enormous collection of religious items, after centuries of buying such things from mortals, but where he keeps this vault is unknown. Fanciful tales claim that his immense wealth is stored by the Lictors, while others say that his Ledger can be "unfolded" to reveal a massive citadel of iron and white basalt that is his true domain.

While undoubtedly the equal in power of any of the rulers of the cities of Autumn, Callidus does not compete with them directly. Rather he acts as a broker for such beings, supplying their desires, acting as a notary and occasionally offering advice. Beings of such scope are too clever to deal with Callidus lightly, and only utilise his services when completely necessary. However, by long standing tradition Callidus is generally free to meet and bargain with any of their underlings, and thus passes across the Labyrinth unmolested.

Traditionally Callidus uses a Fleur-de-Lys type symbol as his seal, the three points symbolising the three Secretaries that he is currently using. Competition to remain at such a level is fierce, and his underlings constantly scheme to advance themselves.

The Prince of the Argent Tontine is fascinated with mortal religions. Callidus understands that faith is a powerful force, but one that is extremely ephemeral. One of his personal desires is to understand the value of faith, and the need it satisfies in the faithful, the better to manipulate others using their beliefs. An extremely patient eternal, he has been studying mortal religion for centuries, and often appears to tempt or bargain mortals away from their faith. Over this time he has amassed a great trove of lore on faith, and is said to possess several relics of the Imperial religion. His knowledge is best described as being 'technical' - he understands the politics of religion much better than he does individual faith.

Callidus is associated with both the rune Lann, and the rune Queros.

Boons

Bargains themselves fascinate Callidus, and he has several supernatural powers relating to creating and sealing them. He is known to possess many favours with other eternals, and to draw on them to fulfil bargains on his behalf. He is particularly keen of getting bargainers into his debt, and reinforcing his ability to call those debts due with curses. His bargains are more likely to involve the bargainer doing or not doing something in return for a favour or service - it is less likely to involve mere payment with materials.

His most potent abilities deal with the manipulation of desire and greed, and guiding serendipity to increase wealth. He also possesses several abilities that deal with bonds, especially bonded items, and is said to be able to locate highly desired items in the material world with sufficient inducement, especially those that are unique or exotic.

Some priests are interested in the religious artefacts Callidus has gathered, but they tend to be very leery about entering into a bargain with the eternal. Callidus appears to take particular delight in challenging and testing priests and other strongly religious characters who come to deal with him.

The Secretaries of the Argent Tontine

Unlike eternals such as Basileus Kade, Callidus runs a tight ship. The eternals who serve him do so out of a belief in his creed and a desire to increase their own wealth and service their own needs. There are few stories of incidents where one of them attempts to overthrow or betray Callidus, and many scholars theorise that all the eternals of the Argent Tontine are bound with oaths and contracts that keep them loyal.

The Secretaries - literally secret keepers - who serve Callidus are lesser eternals rather than heralds. They sometimes deal with the Empire directly, either pursuing their own agenda or operating as proxies for Callidus. They may arrange audiences in the Hall of Worlds, or send heralds on their own business. The three best known of Callidus' secretaries, who have dealt with the Empire in the past, are Numis, Malleas and Zand.

Numis

A female eternal who is fascinated by the role of coins and hard currency in agreements. She occasionally likes to take credit for inventing the idea of currency, or spreading it across the mortal realm - it is not clear if she expects this claim to be taken literally. She is the longest serving of Callidus' secretaries and is acknowledged as the entity who designed the iron coins used in many parts of the Autumn realm.

Malleas

A male eternal who favours gamblers and wagers. He is known to send heralds to arrange wagers on important events, and often creates bargains that involve gambles or risky ventures - he is also known to lend money but demand extortionate rates of interest for the repayment of the debt with dire consequences for forfeiture. He has been Callidus' secretary for the shortest time (barely longer than a century or so) and is known to favour both gaudy displays of wealth and allowing others to make a pitch as to why he should invest some of it in them. He often seems to lose out on deals, but never seems to grow any less wealthy.

Zand

Calling the Drottningbjotha

"Hear the words of Hiram the Huntsmaster!

Who speaks with the voice of the Frozen Throne!

The Drottningbjotha is called. The royal challenge of Cathan Canae.

A test of champions; a battle of heroes. A contest of prowess, stamina, and might."

Hiram the Huntsmaster, challenge-keeper of the Summer Tyrant Cathan Canae lays down this challenge.

Every nation of this land is invited to present a single challenger. Let them come together at the Square of Glory in the camp of the knights of Dawn. Let the challenge begin at the third hour after noon on the second day of the Solstice-gathering.

It is the will of Cathan Canae that each champion will be presented by a herald - someone to announce the strength and glory of the chosen champion, to let all present know the virtues they possess. Let the strong herald fill the bowels of the enemy heroes with fear; let them stiffen the sinews of their peoples' chosen warrior.

It is the will of Cathan Canae that, under the Law of the Empire, champions from other lands will come also. Already the call has gone to those to east and west, north and south. As chosen heroes they come; from the lands bordering the Empire and from further afield, to fight in the name of Cathan Canae.

It is the will of Cathan Canaea that these champions fight one-and-one until only one remains. Let that one be crowned as victor and champion of their people. To that one Cathan Canaea will give a gift, and they will stand within her good grace in the coming year.

"A duel of words; a clash of will. A war of spirit, skill and strength.

The Lady of the Blizzards has spoken, The Drottningbjotha has begun.

These are the words of Hiram the Huntsmaster!

Who speaks with the voice of the Frozen Throne!"

Overview

The Summer Eternal Cathan Canae has thrown down a gauntlet. After the successes of Dawn against the Jotun during the Spring Equinox, she has invoked the Drottningbjotha - the Queen's Challenge - and offers the Empire a chance to participate. With the presumption of a Queen of the Summer Realm she has announced her plans to hold the contest in the Dawnish Glory square during the Summer Summit.

Each Imperial nation is invited to present one champion and one herald-announcer; each bout will be a one-on-one fight with a randomly determined opponent, and will be preceded by short announcements from the champions' heralds. Each duel continues until one side yields or is clearly unable to continue fighting. Once each champion has fought once, victors move on to the next round and so on until only one champion remains.

The ultimate winner receives a crown, and an undisclosed boon from the Queen of Ice and Darkness.

Significance

The Drottningbjotha (Pronounced: Drott-ning-BEE-yo-thar) is to begin at three o'clock on Saturday. Each of the ten nations of the Empire can put forward one champion, accompanied by a herald-announcer. How a nation picks a champion is up to them - in the event that two people turn up claiming to be from the same nation, the Huntsmaster will decide which one will fight.

This is not just an Imperial challenge - Cathan Canae has invited champions from other nations including the Thule, Jotun, Druj and Grendel but there are rumours of other participants from Faraden and Axos and perhaps even further afield. The assumption appears to be that these champions will be protected by the law of delegation protection, as

The law of delegation protection (as amended by the Imperial Senate during the Winter summit of 378YE) clearly states that "Any delegations from barbarian nations who arrive on the field of anvil under a flag of peace shall have protection under the law as if they were imperial citizens for the duration of their visit and for their direct passage out of the empire."

The intent is clear - while the Druj are on the field at Anvil, they are protected by all the laws of the Empire. Likewise, they are expected to respect and uphold those laws. Any violence against them will be treated by the magistrates as if it were violence against an Imperial citizen.

Resolution

Champions from several foreign and barbarian nations contended with the ten chosen champions of the Imperial nations. The Drottningbjotha was won by the Dawnish Questing knight Vulgaris Vicarious of House Orzel.

Campaign outcome

Overview

The Empire military downtime system uses a simple mathematical framework to calculate the outcome each season of a campaign. The values are presented below, along with some worked examples, so that players who are interested can understand precisely how the results are derived.

Fighting Strength

Each army has a fighting strength, a number that reflects the raw military strength of the army. Most armies begin with a fighting strength of 5,000—roughly one point of effective strength for each soldier. As an army suffers casualties the fighting strength is reduced to reflect this.

Rituals

Ritual	Victory	Casualties
Clarity of the Master Strategist	+2000	0
Knights of Glory	+3000	+3000
Quickening Cold Meat	+1000	+1000

- Rituals that increase the fighting strength of an army are added on first

Some rituals increase the effective fighting strength of an army, either for purposes of calculating victory, casualties, or both. If such a ritual is in place, then this is the first modifier added.

The table shows the rituals in Imperial Lore with the modifiers they provide.

Military Units

- Imperial armies benefit from having military units assigned to support them
- A starting military unit adds 100 fighting strength
- The fighting strength for military units is added second

The fighting strength of every military unit that is assigned to support an army is added to the total effective fighting strength for purposes of victory and inflicting casualties. A starting military unit has a fighting strength of 100. Each additional rank of improvement increases the fighting strength by 20.

Military units do not suffer casualties like an army, they are always at full strength regardless of any campaigns they participate in.

Orders

- Orders change the effective fighting strength of an army
- The effects of orders are added third

The fighting strength of an army is then modified based on the orders submitted by their general. Orders may change the fighting strength for purposes of calculating victory, casualties, or both.

Type	Order	Victory	Casualties
Attacking	Cautious Advance	-20%	-20%
	Balanced Attack	0	0
	Overwhelming Assault	+20%	+20%
Defending	Give Ground	-40%	-50%
	Solid Defence	0	-20%
	Heroic Stand	+30%	+20%

There is no requirement for all the armies in a campaign to submit the same orders. The modifier an army receives is based on the order submitted for that army only.

Fortifications

- Fortifications in a territory add their fighting strength to the side that controls them
- A fortification that isn't attacked adds its fighting strength only for calculating victory
- A fortification that is attacked adds its fighting strength for casualties and twice its strength for calculating victory

A basic fortification has a maximum of 3000 fighting strength, larger fortifications are stronger. If the region the fortification is in is not attacked, then whichever side controls it adds the strength of the fortification to their total but only for calculating victory. The fortification does not cause any casualties if it is not attacked.

If the region the fortification is in is attacked, then it adds its fighting strength to the total for causing casualties and adds twice its fighting strength to the total for the side that controls it for calculating victory.

A fortification takes a share of casualties as if it were an army, but only if the region it is in is attacked. Any fortification that falls below 1000 fighting strength is destroyed, regardless of its size.

Total Strength

- The effective fighting strength of all armies on the same side is added together.

If an army on either side has submitted an attack order, then the resulting campaign involves all opposing armies in the territory, regardless of what orders they have submitted. The effective fighting strength of every army fighting on the same side is added together to calculate the total strength of each side.

Victory Points

- The side with the highest effective fighting strength is victorious.
- They gain 1 victory point for every complete 1000 points differential.
- It requires 10 victory points to take a region.

The fighting strength of the two sides is compared, the victor is the side with the highest total strength after adjustments for orders, military units, and any rituals that are in place.

The scale of the victory is equal to the difference in the two sides total fighting strength. Victory is quantified using victory points; one victory point is accumulated for each full 1000 points of difference in fighting strength.

If the victorious side includes armies that have submitted orders to attack, then the victory points translate into land captured by the side. It requires ten victory points to take control of a region. A partial capture is possible, victory points are recorded between campaigns, so no victory points are "wasted".

If the victorious side includes armies that have submitted orders to defend, then the victory points translate into reduced casualties. Each victory point translates decreases the casualties taken by an army by 1%.

If the victorious side includes some armies with attack orders and some armies with defend orders, then the victory points are split pro-rata based on their effective fighting strength between the two sides to determine land captured and casualties reduced.

Casualties

- An army inflicts 10% of its effective fighting strength as casualties
- Casualties are divided amongst the armies based on the orders submitted
- Some orders and some rituals affect the number of casualties taken

Both sides in a campaign will inflict casualties on each other. The total effective fighting strength of each side is recalculated using only the modifiers that apply for causing casualties. The base figure for the total casualties inflicted is 10% of this score.

If the enemy force includes more than one army, then the casualties are divided between the armies according to the orders submitted. Armies that submit attacking orders will take a greater share of the casualties than armies which are defending. The final ratios are based on a qualitative judgement of the in-character description of the orders submitted.

Casualties are then adjusted based on the orders submitted and the presence of any appropriate rituals. Modifiers to casualties are stated in percentage adjustments. All percentages are added together and then applied as a single adjustment to calculate the final total for the number of casualties incurred.

The final casualties incurred are applied to each army, reducing its remaining fighting strength.

Calculations

- All positive modifiers are added together and then added to the base number
- Next, all negative modifiers are multiplied together and multiplied against the base number

All positive modifiers are applied first. They are all added together and then added to the base number.

Following this calculation, all negative modifiers are then applied. All negative modifiers are multiplied together and applied against the result of applying all the positive modifiers.

Disbandments

- An army which falls below 20% of its maximum value automatically disbands

The fighting strength of any army that falls below 20% of its maximum value automatically disbands. A normal army that falls below 1000 fighting strength disbands (1500 for a large army). The army routs from the territory and is completely destroyed.

Example 1

- Imperial army 1: 3500 fighting strength, overwhelming assault, Clarity of the Master Strategist
- Imperial army 2: 1500 fighting strength, Cautious Advance, 40 starting military units supporting
- Barbarian army 1: 7500 fighting strength, heroic stand, Quickening Cold Meat
- Barbarian army 2: 4000 fighting strength, solid defence
- Barbarian army 3: 2000 fighting strength, give ground
- Territory Curse: Rivers Run Red

Victory

- Imperial army 1: $6600 ((3500 + 2000) * 120\%)$
- Imperial army 2: $4400 ((1500 + 4000) * 80\%)$
- Barbarian army 1: $11050 ((7500 + 1000) * 130\%)$
- Barbarian army 2: 4000
- Barbarian army 3: $1200 (2000 * 60\%)$

The total Imperial fighting strength for purposes of victory is thus 11000. The total barbarian total is 16,250. The barbarians win by 5250 - gaining 5 victory points. All of which are spent reducing casualties. The Imperial side do not gain any victory points.

Casualties

- Imperial army 1: 3500 fighting strength
- Imperial army 2: 5500 fighting strength (1500 + 4000)

- Barbarian army 1: 8500 fighting strength (7500 + 1000)
- Barbarian army 2: 4000 fighting strength
- Barbarian army 3: 2000 fighting strength

The Imperial total is 9000, so the baseline figure for casualties inflicted is 900. The Barbarian total is 14500, so the baseline figure for their casualties inflicted is 1450.

The plot team decide to split casualties evenly to the Imperials, inflicting 725 casualties to each attacking army. The casualties suffered by the barbarian forces are divided evenly between the barbarian armies. The effects of the orders and the Rivers Run Red ritual are then applied to find the final casualty figures.

The victory points gained by the defending barbarians reduces their casualties by a further 5%.

- Imperial army 1: 1595 (725 * 220%)
- Imperial army 2: 1160 (725 * 160%)
- Barbarian army 1: 627 (300 * 209%)
- Barbarian army 2: 456 (300 * 152%)
- Barbarian army 3: 285 (300 * 95%)

The casualties suffered by Imperial army 2 are so severe that it falls below 1000 fighting strength and is disbanded.

Example 2

- Imperial army 1: 5000 fighting strength, overwhelming assault
- Imperial army 2: 4000 fighting strength, overwhelming assault
- Barbarian fortification: 3000 fighting strength
- Territory Curse: Rivers of Life

Victory

- Imperial army 1: 6000 (5000 * 120%)
- Imperial army 2: 4800 (4000 * 120%)
- Barbarian fortification: 6000 (3000 * 200%)

The total Imperial fighting strength for purposes of victory is thus 10800. The total barbarian total is 6000. The Imperial forces win by 4800 - gaining 4 victory points. They will need to accrue 6 more victory points to take the fortification.

Casualties

- Imperial army 1: 5000 fighting strength
- Imperial army 2: 4000 fighting strength
- Barbarian fortification: 3000 fighting strength

The Imperial armies take 300 casualties divided evenly between them. The barbarian fortification takes 900 casualties.

- Imperial army 1: 90 (150 * 60%)
- Imperial army 2: 90 (150 * 60%)
- Barbarian fortification: 900

The River of Life ritual does not affect the casualties taken by the fortification.

Campaign outcomes

Overview

The outcome of a campaign is found by comparing the total army strengths of both sides in the territory. Even though individual armies are given specific orders, the outcome of the entire campaign as a whole is determined by all the armies on both sides. The side with the higher effective army strength wins.

The scale of the victory and the number of casualties each side suffers is determined by the opposing army strength. The nature of any victory and the allocation of casualties is based on the orders submitted by the generals on both sides.

The initial outcome is contingent on the comparison of the relative army strengths of the two sides - the greater the difference between the two army sizes, the more effective the victorious side has been. But this possible outcome is then significantly affected by the battles and skirmishes linked to that campaign that take place at the event.

Philosophy

We have an extremely simple system to determine which side is winning in a campaign. This system is a crude mathematical framework - it is not intended for use by players when they are roleplaying and there is no need for most players to understand it. It's primary purpose is to give us a mechanism to calculate the scale of the victory achieved by the winning side that is simple, easy to calculate and can be consistent from campaign to campaign, year to year. We present the basics here so that those players who are interested can read them and have confidence that PD are being as fair as is possible in determining the outcomes of different campaigns.

Framework

The total army strength of each side present in a territory is calculated and compared. The side with the largest army strength is considered to be winning and generates a number of victory points for that side. These points are converted into outcomes by the battle plot team based on the orders submitted by the generals on both sides.

E.g. The Imperial forces have three armies present, a total army strength of 10,000, while the Druj forces in the territory have a total army strength of 22,000. The Druj force is stronger - so they are winning the campaign. The margin is 12,000 - accruing 12 victory points for the Druj. These victory points are expended to gain control of a region (10 points) and the remaining two points are spent decreasing the casualties taken by the Druj. The battle plot team then create the narrative that describes the campaign and the current outcome.

Additional victory points can be assigned, at a cost to the armies involved. For example if a general has given orders for her army to fight a defensive withdrawal, we might give the enemy force bonus victory points towards their goal of taking control of a region but offset this against the reduced casualties taken by the retreating Imperial army.

Victory points can be expended to gain control of a region, to increase the number of casualties inflicted, or to decrease the number of casualties taken. Points are allocated between these core outcomes based on the orders submitted by the generals of both sides.

The outcome need not be binary; individual armies may still achieve some of their goals even if the campaign as a whole is not going well. Usually, though, they achieve these goals either through direct player action at an event or at greater cost to the individual armies involved.

Claiming a region

When an army claims a region, it falls under the control of that army's side. In the case of a region with a special quality, such as a terrain keyword or a fortification, all the armies on the same side benefit from the region anywhere in the territory from that point on. For example, if an Imperial army takes control of the Forest of Shadows, all Imperial armies in the territory with the forest keyword gain the advantage of that keyword.

 - 4.2 Claiming special resources
- 5 Increased casualties
- 6 Decreased casualties
- 7 Further Reading

Establishing a beachhead

It is much more difficult to claim a region in a territory where your side does not already control a region. This is one of the reasons the Empire and barbarians alike take pains to conquer an entire territory rather than permit their enemies to keep control of some of the land.

Claiming special resources

If a region contains a physical campaign resource such as a white granite quarry, a library or a large named green iron mine, then the Imperial Senate is responsible for assigning control of those resources. The Imperial Military Council may offer suggestions, but ultimately the distribution of the spoils of war is a political matter.

Increased casualties

Rather than attempting to conquer regions in a territory, a general may issue orders to engage and destroy the enemy forces. In this case, victory points will be expended to increase the casualties taken by the opposite side.

Decreased casualties

Generals who issue orders to avoid engagements, retreat or to defend a region may experience less casualties than predicted. Victory points are expended to reduce the casualties taken.

If both sides in a campaign are defending fortifications - or otherwise acting to decrease casualties - then it is possible for neither side to take any casualties. In effect the campaign has been a stand off with little or no direct fighting taking place. It is still possible for battles or skirmishes at the event to bring additional benefits to the Imperial forces, even if the campaign was a stand off.

Campaigns of Emperor Guntherm

Overview

A document was compiled by the civil service in Spring 378YE at the request of the Minister of Historical Research, focusing on the military campaigns of Emperor Guntherm. After the Autumn Equinox 381YE, details of their research were made available to interested Imperial scholars.

The Jotun Offensive

In 235YE, a major Jotun offensive began into western Wintermark. This was perhaps the defining campaign of Guntherm's early career.

The Jotun first came down the Gullet into West Marsh, sweeping aside the Kallavesi patrols and smashing a foothold into Kallavesa, extending their reach throughout Skymark. From there, they tested the Empire's defences to the north in Stark, but quickly pulled back after the Navarr defended Rest with great tenacity; instead they pushed across into the plains of Kronemark, whilst raiding south into Bregasland and Mitwold over the Westmere.

Before the Empire could rally and push them back, the Jotun were already building a great fortification in West Marsh and a smaller outpost in Kronemark. Imperial hesitation was often blamed on the timidity in military financing that [\[\[Empress Mariika\]\]](#) had encouraged and her death having left a power vacuum in which bickering could slow the Imperial response to such a threat, especially as her enemies had poisoned the generals against Wintermark in particular.

Eventually, the Wintermark, Marcher and Freeborn armies were deployed to counter the offensive; however, they spent some time split between defending Bregasland and Mitwold against any incursion, keeping the Jotun away from Kalpaheim, and ensuring the roads to the ancestral swamps were kept open in Kallavesa, and the Jotun had time to complete their fortifications.

The histories generally agree that Guntherm eventually persuaded the Marchers to fully commit to driving the Jotun out of Wintermark by demonstrating the magic of the circle of runesmiths known as the Bloodgold Hammer, who used Summer magic to empower the Green Shield in crushing the fortification at Kronemark. Details of the magic they used are sketchy, but the Marchers were convinced.

The larger fortification in West Marsh proved more resilient, however, and a slow grinding campaign seemed assured until the Western Wind hakima emerged, using the power of Spring to ruin key points in the vast fortification so that the Summer-empowered troops could finish the task. The Jotun appear to have been caught somewhat off guard by the extensive use of ritual magic, and with the loss of their second fortification they fell back across the Gullet.

In the wake of their defeat, Guntherm petitioned the Imperial Senate to construct fortifications in Wintermark and the Marches to prevent a repeat occurrence, but the Senate was still extremely conservative with spending at the time and refused his requests.

Invasion of Jotun

In 238YE, Guntherm led the victorious Imperial armies west of Wintermark, taking the battle to the Jotun on their own ground. The Imperial forces split in several directions to harry the crippled Jotun armies wherever they ran. Orders record that Guntherm led the Green Shield north into Kalsea, followed by the Fire of the South, which could afford to be led so far afield due to its great speed.

The Green Shield headed up into the territory that the Jotun name Skallahn, and took the low-lying farmland and fisheries of Greenwall along the northern shores of the Gullet as the Jotun tried desperately to unload their forces from their ships, before chasing the wounded armies across the great plains of the Iron Stand. Meanwhile the Fire of the South pressed even further north into the territory that the Jotun name Tromsa, and made their foothold in the forest of Icewood; they took no further territory, carefully balancing the retention of their foothold with damaging the Jotun without running out their tenuous supply lines. The Marchers headed down the southern coast of the Gullet, into Narkyst, and made a spirited attempt to capture the territory named Hordalant on the border of Bregasland; they successfully overran the marshes of Blutgahn and the plains of Ashahohn but were incapable of making further progress.

These actions enabled the Empire to recapture a great many prisoners taken from Wintermark and the Marches during the invasion, but there is some evidence that efforts to liberate the humans of Kalsea and Narkyst did not go so well. The human thralls were found to be unexpectedly loyal to their Jotun masters, and slowed the advance and capture of Jotun territory. The armies had no choice but to treat those who had chosen to become Jotun "citizens" as enemies, and were forced to drive them out of Imperial-controlled regions. They were replaced by adventurous settlers from Wintermark or the Marches as appropriate.

While this offensive was being undertaken, the rest of the Imperial armies were engaged with the Thule in Miekarova and Volodmartz - indeed, there was some considerable unrest that Guntherm and those loyal to him were engaging in military adventures along the coast of the Gullet when long-held Imperial territories were in danger.

Against the Thule

In 239 YE, having pursued the defeat of the Jotun as far as it would reasonably go, Guntherm finally agreed to contribute to the campaign against the Thule, so long as decisive action was taken rather than the grinding stalemate that the Thule magics had brought to the main front.

The Marchers and the Brass Coast held the Jotun front while Guntherm took the Green Shield across to join up with Highguard and the League gathering in Karsk. Orders from this time show them committing strongly to a heavy offensive pushing into Skuld.

The Thule were forced to spend some of their attention repulsing this advance, and the Varushkan, Urizen and Navarr armies committed in Miekarova and Volodmartz successfully pushed their assailants back over the mountains.

However, tragedy struck - an intervention through the Sentinel Gate to smash a key Thule fortification in Miechernya ended in disaster after it turned out to be a trap set by the Thule for the hakima of the Western Wind. The Thule threw everything they had at the coven, and they were slaughtered in their entirety, their kohans overrun by the sudden assault. The Imperial forces destroyed Thule resistance in the area, as the forces had no plan for a retreat, but the Empire had lost a vital military asset.

Seeking the Throne

After the victory against the Thule, the Varushkans added their support to the voices of Wintermark and the Marches who had been clamouring for Guntherm's accession to the Throne. There is some evidence that the Varushkans in particular were enamoured of opportunities to gain new national Bourse seats based on mithril and ilium resources in Verthandi and Skuld, and saw Guntherm as a way to gain them.

Immediately after his coronation, he used his power to continue to serve as general of the Green Shield, and wrangled with the Senate in favour of reforms that would grant more power to the Military Council to pursue the conquest of barbarian territory.

Invasion of Otkodov

In 241YE, Varushkan armies, supported by the generals of Dawnish, finally managed to secure a foothold in Verthandi. Together they captured a significant mithril mine. Unfortunately, the Varushkan intention to claim the mine as a National Bourse seat was denied by the Senate. Their stewardship of the Eternal Shafts of Time is often cited as a reason for this failure, and resulted in outrage from the Varushkans. This incident inspired several generations of maneuvering by Varushkan senators to try and have the other Bourse seats physically within the borders of their nation reallocated as national seats - without success largely due to the complex constitutional issues around such a move.

The Varushkan armies grimly hung on to their foothold, but the Thule seemed quite happy to curse the whole of Verthandi so long as the Varushkans were suffering from it - and appeared to be able to predict their every move almost before the Varushkans knew it themselves.

The Jarl of Kierheim

In 242YE, the Jotun launched an assault across the frozen Lake Nutjuitoq, bypassing the Empire's holdings entirely, and carving out a beachhead in the Suag Fount. They were led by Kjorvak, Jarl of Kierheim, whose willingness to risk the untested ice allowed him to take the Wintermark defenders by surprise.

Guntherm moved to engage, again leading the Green Shield army. Once both Imperial and Jotun forces were heavily committed however, a Thule army named the Shard of Winter attacked both sides under cover of a great storm of snow and ice summoned by the orc warlocks. The Shard of Winter were also reported to have a 'great rune-clad Artok' accompanying it. Many military intelligence reports disagree strongly on the rune-markings, or the number of such beasts. However, what is clear is that at least one of them is tamed enough to be ridden by a Warlock, because this is the one which they use to try to assassinate Kjorvak.

In the storm, Kjorvak was separated from his Skjaldborg warriors and by chance ended up facing the Emperor directly. Instead of slaying his enemy while he was distracted by the Thule, Guntherm saved his life. The details of their alliance are a matter of song and story, but the outcome is generally agreed by historians - as the storm cleared, the Artok and its warlock master lay dead. The Thule fled north back into Otkodov, and shortly after the Jotun armies retreated back across the lake.

The grimnir Haalstan the Green attended Emperor Guntherm immediately after the battle; it is from his diaries that we know that Guntherm told him about the encounter with the Jarl, and with the Artok and its Warlock master. After the fight, Kjorvak swore a blood-oath to Guntherm, on Guntherm's sword - if a Steinr calls on the debt with Guntherm's sword in hand, "the blood of Kierheim will come to their aid against the Thule". Haalstan wrote that he was very interested in the precise phrasing of the oath, and records that it was to be carried "in the blood of Kierheim".

Guntherm is widely held to have kept in contact with the Jotun by Winged Messenger extensively after this incident, particularly the northern Jotun, even though he still held footholds in their territories. For his part, Kjorvak was reasonably successful at home despite the failed invasion, and his bloodline still rules Kierheim today - the current Jarl, Ustigar, is a direct descendant.

Failure in Otkodov; the Druj stir

In 243YE, the Varushkans finally lost their foothold in Verthandi. As the armies retreated, the Thule invaded Karsk and Skarsind in force. At the same time, Guntherm continued the campaigns along the coast of the Gullet, seeking to comprehensively deny the inlet to the Jotun.

In 244YE the situation worsened further. The Druj begin to send raiding parties into Therunin. Despite the potential consequences, these raids were mostly ignored at the time - dismissed as being a response to Navarr incursions into the Mallum. Within a year, however, the Druj caused a major embarrassment by ambushing a trading caravan run by a Brass Coast family at the border of Holberg, slaughtering not only the Freeborn but also their League guards. The scandal quickly escalated when it became apparent that the Freeborn were trading with the Druj, allegedly with tacit support from the popular Senator for Holberg. While questions were being asked in the Senate, and several important citizens in both nations were facing serious questions from the Magistrates, the Druj launched two massive invasions into Holberg and Therunin, and sent significant raiding parties sweeping across the Semmerlak into Weirwater and Semmerholm.

The Ceasefire

In 246YE, Guntherm arranged a two-year ceasefire with the Jotun, ratified by the Senate, Handling much of the negotiations personally (albeit with the support of several skilled diplomats from other nations). According to the treaty, the Jotun demanded no concessions - they were happy to fix the borders as they existed at the time, leaving several regions of Kalsea and Narkyst in Imperial hands.

Mysteriously, the Thule offensive in Karsk and Skarsind also wavered and ultimately withdrew around this time. Contemporary investigations suggest that the Thule may have become embroiled with a Jotun offensive along the north-western coast of Urdur. Modern historians question the likelihood of such an offensive - the Jotun are after all known to despise naval tactics, and the coast of Otkodov is extremely hostile to such assaults.

In order to avoid any accusation of appeasing the Jotun, Guntherm also pressed on with the construction of two fortifications in Jotun territories - the Nail in Ashahohn, and the Iron Banner on the Iron Stand.

Against the Druj

In 247YE, the Empire threw every army they could against the Druj in Holberg and Therunin, pushing them back into the Barrens and the Mallum. Guntherm refused to let the Imperial armies take the Barrens, or any territory in the Mallum. Instead, the armies focused exclusively on inflicting horrific casualties on the Druj - and suffering significant losses in return. This strategy earned Guntherm the sobriquet "the Bloodthirsty".

The Throne ended up facing an Inquisition by the Imperial Synod regarding his insistence that not only would no Druj prisoners should remain alive, and that they should copy the terror tactics of the Druj and turn them against themselves - denounced at the time as a major offence against the virtues of Prosperity, Courage, and Pride and dangerously close to encouraging the malign powers of Fear, Vengeance, and Hatred.

Records of this Inquisition are patchy, but the main narrative that emerges is that Guntherm did not want the Empire to get attached to territory on the eastern front. Not only did he believe it would be costly to defend, but he saw little value in splitting Imperial forces between the east and the west - he still intended to conquer as much of Jotun nation as he could once the ceasefire ended.

Historians have speculated extensively about this decision to drive the Druj off, but to eschew conquest. Two main theories have emerged. The first is that Guntherm, contrary to his nickname, was sickened by the waste of human lives involved in the attempted conversion of the Jotun thralls, and did not want to have to repeat the experience on the Eastern side of the Empire. The second is that Guntherm simply did not care about expansion which did not directly benefit Wintermark.

Another Jotun Invasion; the death of Guntherm

In 248YE, the ceasefire with the Jotun expired, there was no attempt to extend it. The Jotun immediately launched a thorough offensive against the Imperial-held areas of Narkyst and Kalsea. to their surprise, they encountered lands that had largely been denuded of Imperial settlers. The Wintermark and Marcher civilians who had made an attempt to carve out new lives in the conquered regions had been quietly evacuated back to their original homelands to avoid them falling into the hands of the Jotun. All that remained were the fortifications, their garrisons, their supply chains - and the Imperial armies moving into position to defend them.

The Jotun were prepared for the fortifications too, however. The Iron Banner was allegedly destroyed by ice giants, summoned from the cold Summer domain of Cathan Canae to fight alongside the orc armies. The Nail was besieged for several months, and on the point of starvation the Jotun granted its garrison safe passage back to the Marches, on the condition that they left the fortification intact - and also that they left all their weapons behind them when they went.

Guntherm was recorded as having been confident that the Jotun would be content with regaining the Gullet - but he was proven wrong. Once they had cleaned up the coastal regions, the Jotun swept into Sermersuaq with thirty thousand orcish troops ready to return the Empire's challenge to their homelands.

This invasion marked the end of Guntherm's campaigns against the Jotun. He was killed on the Suaq Font defending the coastline of Sarda against the Burnt Claw tribe, who took several trophies of their victory, including his sword, back to their lands far to the west.

Candidacy

Overview

The Conclave can declare someone to hold a specific Imperial title controlled by the Conclave such as archmage, Warmage or Dean of the Lyceum. Occasionally, this declaration has been used to simply remove someone from their position, by declaring that their post should be filled with nobody.

Declaration

A declaration of candidacy must explicitly name a single Imperial citizen who will appointed to the chosen title. It is possible to raise a declaration of candidacy for someone else, but only the person who raised the declaration can speak on their own behalf.

It is typical for the civil service to group together all declarations of candidacy for a single title. They are dealt with as a single item on the agenda at the point where the last declaration was raised.

In this case, each individual who has raised that declaration makes a presentation in the order they raised their candidacy, then a single discussion takes place followed by a single vote. The candidate with the most votes takes the title.

The incumbent does not automatically get to make a presentation - although there is nothing to stop them raising themselves as a candidate if they realise someone is challenging for their title. Even if they have not raised a separate declaration, the incumbent is automatically presented as an option during the voting process, and they may speak during the discussion period following the normal rules.

Resolution

The chosen candidate assumes all the responsibilities and powers of the title at the end of the Conclave session. It is the responsibility of the previous holder of the title to ensure that all regalia passes to the new title holder speedily and with the minimum of fuss.

Every Imperial title appointed by declaration of candidacy has tenure; they remain in position until they die, resign the title, or are replaced by a new declaration.

When Urizen joined the Empire they were instrumental in the formation of the Conclave. As a result of their actions, the constitution was amended to lay out the duties of the Conclave and stated that "it shall be guided by fraternities of magicians under the general aegis of the Senate, and without interference from the Synod." As a result it is not possible for the Imperial Synod to revoke an Imperial title appointed by the Conclave.

Canteraspire Circle

Overview

The Canteraspire Circle (or more correctly, Circles) are located on the slopes of the Operus mountains in the Urizen territory of Morrow. Custodianship of the Circle grants an Imperial title; a seat on the Imperial Bourse; and a seasonal bounty of valuable weirwood

The Resource

The lower slopes of Canteraspire are marked by strange circles of weirwood that grow rapidly despite the barren soil. All the trees grow in this circular pattern; despite a great deal of research no rational explanation has ever been found for this phenomenon. There is some agreement that whatever it is, it is not magic - even allowing for the fact that magic rarely has any effect on living weirwood, there is no sign of any lingering enchantment or aura that can be discerned by the magicians who study the groves. The workers are careful never to "break" a circle - they never take more than half the trees in a given ring at any time. This is not mere superstition. In the early days of Imperial control, three-quarters of the trees in one of the rings were felled by mistake, and no new weirwood trees have grown in that area since. Indeed, nothing has grown in the vicinity to this day - the half-dozen ancient trees still standing are mute sentinels over a roughly circular area of empty, open soil.

Between the trees, little grows save grass and a particularly rich snow-white heather. Some farmers graze small herds of sheep and goats between the rings, harvesting the heather to make fine yellow dyes for which the region is justly famous. The hills around the weirwood trees are notable because of the rich groves of beggarwood that prosper there - providing a dark ring of faster-growing trees that completely encircles the Canteraspire Circle. Several of the local spires have the rights to one grove or another, and this enhances their reputation for quality cloth and leather.

According to local stories, when Urizen joined the Empire the spire responsible for the weirwood groves enthusiastically welcomed the opportunity to cede their control to the Empire. The Spire of Golden Wood arranged a very equitable deal with the assistance of Emperor Giovanni and to this day control some of the richest farms and beggarwood groves in Urizen, in return for which they offer magical support and hospitality to the workers who maintain and harvest the Canteraspire Circle. They are known more for their prosperity than for their magic, although the consummate excellence with which they prepare their signature yellow dyes, and their mastery of herb lore, are well known and well respected.

The Bourse Seat

Responsibilities

The Seat has no particular responsibilities; they simply receive a bounty of weirwood which is theirs to do with as they will. If the Canteraspire Circle were to be threatened in any way, it would be the responsibility of the Seat to deal with those threats. Likewise, if any particular opportunity were to arise related to the Canteraspire Circle, the Seat would expect to be consulted as to how that opportunity might be resolved.

Powers

Seat on the Bourse

Custodianship of the Canteraspire Circle comes with a seat on the Imperial Bourse. For the most part, this Seat comes with no additional responsibilities. It is an Imperial title that grants the right to participate on the rare occasion when the Imperial Bourse as a body is required to make a decision.

Bounty of weirwood

The Seat has control of a source of weirwood and receives Bourse certificates to represent that control. They can dispense this resource as they choose. Production is 22 Imperial wains of weirwood every season.

Appointment

As with all weirwood Bourse seats, the holder of the title is determined during the Winter Solstice. As an Imperial seat, any Imperial citizen may participate in the auction and hold the title.

Custodianship of the Canterspire Circle is retained for a year, or until the citizen holding the seat dies, or steps down. An Imperial Bourse seat cannot be revoked by the Imperial Synod.

Captain's Command

Description

The sentinels of Urizen and the cataphracts of Highguard alike appreciate the tactical versatility granted by these powerful weapons. Whether sweeping a foe's legs out from under them, or driving an enemy back with a mighty blow and an intimidating shout, the Captain's Command offers a greatly enhanced range of options.

The Freeborn often call these weapons Tempest Blades because the kohans who wield them use them to devastating effect when moving quickly through the massed ranks of opponents, spreading confusion and scattering their enemies in disarray like powerful winds.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of a two-handed weapon.
- Requirement: You must have the Weapon Master skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: You may spend a hero point to call STRIKEDOWN or REPEL with this two-handed weapon.
- Materials: Crafting a Captain's Command requires twelve ingots of tempest jade, eleven ingots of green iron, seven measures of dragonbone and four ingots of orichalcum. It takes one month to make one of these items.

When asked to solve the riddle of the Mysterious Knot by the adepts of ancient Tsark, the sword-scholar Sulemaine simply took up her blade and cut the adepts in two.

"Mystery only exists when someone is interested," were her final words on the subject.

Captain's Garb

Description

The Captain's Garb is a suit of magical clothing with a distinctly martial look, infused with a little of the power of the dramaturgical persona of the Captain. A ritual magician who wears this clothing can draw on the power it contains to empower their ability to perform Summer magic. In addition to providing additional magical power, the robes also infuse the wearer with some of the personality of the Captain.

As a garment infused with the essence of the Captain, the robe also empowers the wearer's awareness of their own heroic qualities, helping them to stand firm and giving a gentle reminder of what is important – their friends.

The raiment itself is generally woven from wool, carefully bleached and dyed with vibrant colours, and decorated with sungold embroidery. They invariably include an amount of both soft leather and dragonbone incorporated into the embellishments or used to provide additional shape for the costume. The clothes tend to have a martial cut, designed to allow the wearer to move freely, reflecting the role of the Captain as a figure who takes action. The Captain's Raiment tends to reflect the fashions of the League and Dawn, but designs also exist for an even more practical outfit employing Marcher style, dubbed the Mummer's Yeoman, and a version cut to fit the aesthetics of a wealthy Stein dubbed the Hero's Tunic.

While the Captain's Garb provides no protection in itself, it is an easy matter for the costume to be created with an eye to being worn under a suit of mage armour, leaving space to integrate pauldrons, pectoral, belt, circlet, vambraces, gorget, or greaves. In this way, a magician who also fights the enemies of the Empire with rod or staff can continue to draw on the power of the Captain infused into the robe.

Rules

- Form: Armour. Takes the form of a robe. You must be wearing this robe to use its magical properties.
- Requirement: You must have the magician skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: Once per day you may use this robe to gain two additional ranks of Summer Lore for the purposes of performing a single ritual, subject to the normal rules for effective skill.
- Roleplaying Effect: While wearing this robe you feel an urge to behave in an honourable fashion, and to risk any danger to aid your friends and allies.
- Materials: Crafting a Captain's Garb requires twelve ingots of orichalcum, five ingots of green iron, five measures of dragonbone, seven measures of beggar's lye, and eleven measures of iridescent gloaming. It takes one month to make one of these items.

OOO Note

This is one of six sets of ritual robes designed by House Bourné, a Sarvosan guild formed by the union of League master-artisans and a Dawnish weaver cabal. Their unique designs combine the power of dramaturgy with a deep understanding of the hearth magic of girding. During Winter 380YE, in conjunction with popular publication The Looking Glass, the Merchant-Prince Genia Bourné di Sarvos announced that the guild would allow any Imperial artisan to visit their estate in Sarvos and study the schemata detailing the six raiments, free of charge.

Any character can learn how to create this raiment following the normal rules - either by selecting the robe as one of their starting items, or learning it as an extra item pick. The only restriction is that anyone who knows how to make one of these robes must have spent a week or two studying at House Bourné in Sarvos - there is currently no other way to master the patterns which remain the proprietary knowledge of the Bourné guild.

Captain's Mask

Description

The Captain's Mask empowers a ritualist with the ability to confer additional toughness. The mask is often in the shape of a polished steel mask that covers the forehead and cheeks, reminiscent of a helmet, and is often emblazoned with thunderbolts. Another common form, particularly favoured by Dawnish magicians, is a full- or half-face sun mask.

The mask often incorporates the Rune of Battle, sometimes openly and sometimes on the inside so that it rests against the brow of the wearer. A martial animal such as a lion, or the bear and the boar popularised as symbols of Courage by Varushkan storytellers. Likewise, a Wintermark-made mask is likely to represent a hawk or falcon - birds associated with the virtue of Loyalty.

While this is most often crafted in the form of a mask, it is sometimes created as a brooch or large amulet depicting crossed swords upon a bright shield. A few League magicians favour an orichalcum ring, set with a red or amber stone, and engraved on the inside with a martial motto or inspirational phrase from their coven oath; such a ring often specifically represents their loyalty to their coven.

As with all the magical masks, these foci are used to grant additional power to perform ritual magic. In this case, it enhances Splendid Panoply of Knighthood; and Strength of the Bull. A lone Summer ritualist can use the power of the mask along with the Imperial regio to enchant their allies without the aid of a coven, while a committed band of magicians might use the mask to help them enchant large numbers of warriors with a single performance. The mask can even allow a magician who has no ritual knowledge at all to contribute their presence to their covens ritual, drawing on the regio to further empower their contribution.

While the mask is useful, there are rumours of a much more potent version whose use allows additional warriors to be enchanted with a single ritual. If such a mask exists, the secrets of its construction are not common knowledge.

Rules

- Form: Talisman. Takes the form of a ritual focus. You must be wearing this item or holding it in hand to use its magical properties.
- Requirement: You must have the magician skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: Gain 2 ranks for Splendid Panoply of Knighthood; and Strength of the Bull, subject to the normal rules for effective skill.
- Materials: Crafting a Captain's Mask requires eight ingots of orichalcum, three measures of dragonbone, and five measures of iridescent gloaming. It takes one month to make one of these items.

Captain Decius' Song

Words and tune by Claire Sheridan

A song by Nicassia of Phoenix Reach after the death of Decius Cascade.

Now inside the Spire, There sits an empty chair, For Courageous Captain Decius No longer sits there.

Decius was brave and bold, He wore the General's sash, Though it was voted off him, For his actions were too rash.

He fought our foes with life and limb, He gathered many friends, We took great Pride in Decius, Until he met his end.

His Loyalty sustained us, His face in battle grim, He took such grievous injuries, Our surgeon's sustained him!

Bandaged Captain Decius, Always quick to smile, He counselled with humility, He went the extra mile.

Now inside the Spire, There sits an empty chair, For Courageous Captain Decius, No longer sits there.

Captain of the Senate Guard

Overview

The Captain of the Senate Guard is an Imperial title with responsibility for protecting the senators and the public gallery whenever the Senate is in session. The title was created at the Winter Solstice summit of 377YE, and Irontide Isk appointed to the position by the Senate.

Responsibilities

The Captain is expected to protect the Senate and public gallery whenever the senate is in session. The Captain does not have any official legal jurisdiction or powers, but the magistrates recognize the Captain's right to treat the Imperial Senate and public gallery as if they were their camp for purposes of the unwelcome visitor defence while the Senate is in session.

Unwelcome Visitor

There is a traditional defence to an assault charge which applies where unwelcome visitors who refuse to leave your camp are cut down, removed from camp and then provided with sufficient medical assistance to avoid permanent injury. One who is accused of assault but wishes to claim this defence should plead not guilty if it goes to trial. However, if the magistrate decides that the accused's behaviour was unreasonable they will be found guilty.

Powers

The Captain of the Senate Guard has no legal powers.

Appointment

The Captain of the Senate Guard is appointed by the Imperial Senate through a motion of appointment.

Any Imperial citizen may hold the title. The Captain serves for a term of one year and they can be revoked by the General Assembly, the Loyalty Virtue Assembly, and the Assembly of the Nine. Under normal circumstances the Loyalty Assembly would not be able to revoke an Imperial position; when the title was created, the Senate explicitly chose to allow this exception.

Cardinal

Overview

Each of the eight virtue assemblies appoints a cardinal to represent and lead them. They are generally referred to as "Cardinal of (Virtue)" or "Cardinal of The Way". Together with The Throne, they form the Assembly of Nine, arguably the most important assembly of the Synod.

Responsibilities

A cardinal is assumed to provide leadership to the priests and pilgrims who follow their virtue. They are expected to be well versed in matters of virtue and The Way so that they can speak with authority on matters of doctrine. Prominent citizens who are guilty of breaking the law but believe their actions were rooted in virtue will often request a cardinal to plead clemency on their behalf, so a familiarity with the law may prove helpful.

As a member of the Assembly of Nine, a cardinal can wield considerable influence over the politics of the Empire. In particular the Assembly has the power to veto any constitutional motion passed by the Imperial Senate. This allows the Assembly to uphold their constitutional obligation to "ensure the virtuous behaviour of the Empire".

The cardinal is empowered to appoint their virtue's gatekeeper, an important position that controls the distribution of true liao.

Powers

Religion is the best armour but the worst cloak.

Member of the Assembly of Nine

Marcher Proverb

Each cardinal is a member of the Assembly of Nine. As with all priests, they can raise a single judgement each summit with any one of the assemblies to which they belong. Every member of the Assembly of Nine may cast a single vote on any judgement brought before the Assembly. Unlike the General, virtue, or national assemblies the size of congregation a Cardinal has does not change their votes in the Assembly of Nine - each Cardinal (and The Throne) has one vote.

Further Scrutiny

A normal judgement requires at least three hours of scrutiny before the voting can be counted. If a cardinal is not satisfied that there is sufficient time for an issue to be considered then they may instruct the civil service to push back the voting deadline for the judgement to allow further scrutiny. Each cardinal may use this power once per summit, but only on a judgement submitted by a member of the Synod. They may not delay a judgement submitted by the Tribune of the Synod.

Judgements submitted by the Tribune of the Synod may not be extended nor may a judgement be delayed beyond the end of the current summit in which it was submitted. This power must be used before the judgement reaches its deadline - once that deadline is passed it cannot be changed. A judgement may still pass with primacy at any time, regardless of any change of deadline.

The limitation on this legal power is on the title, not the occupant. If a new citizen is elected to the title, they cannot use the ability that summit if it has already been used.

Appoint the Gatekeeper

Each of the seven cardinals of virtue are responsible for appointing the gatekeeper of their assembly. The cardinal is entitled to appoint a new gatekeeper at any summit where they are elected or re-elected. Once chosen, the cardinal has no formal power to influence the gatekeeper who may only be revoked by formal judgement by the appropriate assembly of the Synod.

The gatekeeper is an important position, entrusted with choosing who will receive True Liao. It is traditional for the cardinal to appoint a citizen from another nation to be the gatekeeper of their Virtue wherever possible. This practice is considered important to ensure that the gatekeeper is able to act independently of the cardinal. Cardinals who ignore this custom risk censure by the rest of the Synod.

The Cardinal of The Way does not appoint a gatekeeper. Instead, they are responsible for appointing the Conscience of the Senate.

Virtuous Appointments

Some cardinals are also responsible for appointing other titles, such as the Virtue Inquisitor of their assembly, or the Curator of the Printer's Guild Museum, a sinecure appointed by the cardinal of Prosperity.

Where a cardinal is responsible for appointing a title, that title can be reappointed whenever a new cardinal is chosen.

Appointment

Each cardinal is appointed by the appropriate virtue assembly. Only a member of the virtue assembly can serve as its cardinal. Selection is by a judgement of appointment raised by the Tribune in the standard manner.

The laws for Imperial elections state that, if eligibility to vote in an election is restricted in some way, then you cannot vote if you were eligible to vote in an equivalent but different election in the last twelve months. For example, if you were eligible to vote for the Cardinal of Prosperity at the Winter Solstice - and you change faith to be part of the Ambition assembly - you cannot legally vote for the election of the Cardinal of Ambition until twelve months have passed from the date of the first election.

The elections for the cardinals are considered to be legally equivalent positions restricted by virtue. This means that if you change your virtue assembly then you must abstain from voting in a election if it occurs less than four events after the previous election in your previous virtue assembly. If you are in any doubt about your eligibility then you should consult the Tribune, or Merlot the civil service overseer of elections who can advise you.

The judgement to appoint a cardinal will typically close at 6pm on the Saturday of the summit. These times may differ if an unscheduled appointment is required but there is always at least four hours for nominations and four hours for voting. After that time, the candidate with the most support is declared cardinal.

A cardinal serves until the next election for the title. A cardinal can be revoked by the General Assembly, or by the appropriate virtue assembly.

Caress of Arhallogen

Description

This wooden staff is often marked with the shape of spiders, scorpions and other poisonous bugs. It sometimes seems sticky to the touch, and several owners have commented that the staff sometimes seems to be watching them. It is named for the eternal Arhallogen, who has dominion over many forms of insect and arachnid. Some scholars believe that the knowledge of how to make these magical implements was first derived from that eternal, and that each one that is made is somehow connected to the King of Spiders. It has been noted by some Urizen stargazers and Dawnish enchanters in particular that the eternal and its heralds seem better disposed towards magician-diplomats who are bonded to one of these items.

The Synod used their influence to ban the creation of this item during the reign of Empress Teleri, but the Empress Varkula had that decision reversed, claiming with characteristic practicality that she largely did not care where a magician got their power from as long as they used it in the service of the Empire. Still, creation or possession of one of these staffs may cause concern in the Synod, and result in an individual being called before one of the assemblies (especially the assembly of Vigilance.)

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of a staff. You must be wielding this implement to use its magical properties.
- Requirement: You must have both the magician and battle mage skills to bond to this item.
- Effect: Three times per day you may cast the venom or paralysis spell as if you knew it without spending any mana.
- Materials: Crafting a Caress of Arhallogen requires nine measures of beggar's lye, nine measures of ambergelt and nine measures of iridescent gloaming. It takes one month to make one of these items.

"You want to beat orcs then you've got to understand how they think. They aren't afraid of dying on the end of a sword or a spear. Torture don't scare them - they'll just spit in your eye and fight you with every breath. But the idea of just being helpless, pissing yourself with anger as the enemy chain you up and drag you away to be a slave for the rest of your life, now that's something that gets them where it hurts. Let 'em know that if they come near us then their precious families and tribes will be labouring as our slaves until the end of time. That's where these come in, because the real power they've got isn't magic, it's fear."

Caretaker of New Dunhall

Overview

The Caretaker of New Dunhall is an Imperial title awarded to a Wintermark citizen. New Dunhall was commissioned by the Imperial Senate in Summer 381YE following a natural disaster that claimed parts of south-eastern Hahnmark. The opening of Lorenzo's Deep Pockets (as the sinkhole is known) displaced a significant number of Winterfolk including the residents of Dunhearth Hall. New Dunhall both provides a new home for these people, and a place for the Winterfolk to keep a close eye on the sinkhole.

The Caretaker looks after New Dunhall, as well as gaining custodianship of a sinecure which provides a bounty of coin.

 - 3.1 Levies and Bounties

Responsibilities

The Caretaker has no official responsibilities; they simply receive a bounty of coin. Unofficially, they are expected to maintain and expand the prosperity of New Dunhall and the people who live there. If the hall were to be threatened in any way, it would be their responsibility to deal with those threats. Likewise, if any opportunity relating to New Dunhall presented itself, they would make any decisions needed to take advantage of it.

Powers

Levies and Bounties

The Caretaker receives an income of coin levied from the large marketplace and partly paid for with contributions from traders enjoying the protection of New Dunhall and its Redfeldr warriors. The sinecure provides the Caretaker of New Dunhall with a little over 16 crowns each season (324 rings to be precise).

Appointment

The title is selected by unanimous decision of the Wintermark senators. If a unanimous decision cannot be reached, the title may be appointed by the Imperial Senate instead.

The title can be held by any citizen of Wintermark. The caretaker has tenure, and serves until they die or step down. They can be revoked by the General Assembly, the Wintermark National Assembly, and by the Assembly of the Nine.

New Dunhall

Long before The Empire and even Wintermark, the Dunnings lived in and defended the southern region of what now is Hahnmark. Their hall - Dunhearth - was built near Woodhall in Wood Heath, not far from the settlement of Arnburh. With the foundation of the Empire it became an important stopping point for caravans moving the vast resource wealth of wood, charcoal, furs and metals out of Wintermark, primarily into Upwold. At the same time, traders brought the bounty of the Marcher farmlands, grain, fruit and cattle to Hahnmark, as well as goods from further afield (including Temeschwar and Miaren). The Dunnings maintained a significant military presence in the area - the Redfeldr - who provided security across this sparsely populated border area. As well as a martial legacy, the Dunnings are renowned for artifice, with a portion of the materials passing through Dunhearth being turned to fine woodwork, clothing, weapons, armour, pottery, glassware, jewellery, and famous ales and meads.

In 381YE Arnburh, the Dunhearth Hall and neighbouring Woodhall fell into a massive sinkhole. Forewarned by the Navarr, the Thane and Redfeldr mobilised the town and cleared out all peoples and materials that could be moved. Nearby Hendl Hearth offered succour which was gladly accepted and a tent city was erected by this settlement.

During the Summer Solstice summit of that year, the Dunnings decided that the virtuous path was to turn disaster into opportunity. They made plans for a grand Wintermark trading town to re-establish the flow of goods between Wintermark and the Marches, and to protect the new trade routes around the hole. Likewise it could serve as a base of operations for mining into the hole and any further exploration of ruins below - and potentially a defence against any fell creatures that might come out of the depths of the earth. Work was begun almost immediately, and the majority of the construction completed shortly before the Autumn Equinox.

At the heart of the new town is a large market intended for commodity trading and the sale of the Dunning's fine artisan goods. A new Dunhearth Hall was built, larger and richer than the old hall, destroyed in the collapse. Along with the various barracks, supporting buildings, and defensible walls, New Dunhall is a fine example of a Wintermark town, dedicated to the continuing security of the area. The displaced population of Arnburh helped to ensure that the construction was completed quickly, and most now call New Dunhall home.

Caricomare

Overview

Caricomare is a district of the League city of Sarvos. In 348YE it was devastated by a terrible tempest; in 378YE it was restored and reinvigorated thanks to the generous donations of the citizens and the tireless work of its Senator.

History

Caricomare was a vibrant trading hub for the empire, famous for its miraculous quays. Ships from across the Bay of Catazar, and the wide world beyond, were regular visitors to the jewelled city and their engagement with League society often began there.

The tomb of the Empress Giselle once stood in the ruins of the Alivetti guild estates here (before being moved to Temeschwar), but the ward was better known as the site of the wondrous Caricomare Quays, a great marvel unmatched elsewhere in the world. The mechanical quays were devastated by the storms that flooded this part of the city. The repairs were considered too costly and the floods created a displaced populace, compounding the overcrowding in the city. Caricomare spent three decades as an abandoned, dangerous place, a maze of flooded streets and waterlogged buildings, but it was said that riches could still be found in the depths, for those brave enough to investigate.

Destruction

In 348YE, the city was struck by a terrible tempest that did significant damage to many coastal parts of the city and led to the flooding and eventual sinking of the southern district of Caricomare. Reclaiming the ruined quarter of the city was deemed "too expensive" by the Senate - a move that some bitter Sarvosans believe to have been intended as a punishment for the League and the city of Sarvos in particular, in the wake of the unpopular Empress's death.

Rebirth

It seemed as if Caricomare was doomed to remain a haunted ruin forever. But in 378YE a decision by the Imperial Senate saw the beginning of a major reconstruction effort in Caricomare, to drain the flood and to appoint a Mayor to oversee the district. Thanks to these efforts, the area is once again a thriving district of Sarvos despite thirty years of neglect. Many sections had to be built over, using the sunken ruins as the foundations for new structures, but great pains were taken to include as much of the original architecture as possible. The tomb of Empress Giselle in the Alivetti guild estates was one such area; painstakingly raised from the waters and returned to its former glory. Other historic buildings have also been raised and restored or rebuilt in their previous image with numerous families and Cartas reclaiming lost property throughout the district.

Some of the sunken roads have been left underwater and cleared of wreckage, leaving simple water ways that serve as canals and as a memorial to those who were lost to the storm. Many of the bridges built to span the waterways are adorned with memorial plaques and mementos. The districts of the Caricomare have been redesigned to keep trade, the district's life blood, flowing smoothly. Wide roads and canals now run through the district from the quayside like the spokes of a wheel, allowing people and goods to get where they need to be quickly.

Among the many new additions is the Notturmo district, the official home of the Caricomare Night Market. During the day it is another bustling market place, however as the sun sets it really comes alive. Some outrageous claims have been made that the Night Market is lit by more lights than there are stars in the sky, but it cannot be denied that the grand marketplace is an unceasing riot of colours and sounds whether it is noon or midnight. Anyone and everyone is welcome, whether they want to trade, entertain or be entertained.

The quayside is trading again, but the mechanical quays are still too badly damaged to function and whole sections had to be dismantled in the restoration process. Until the docks are fully rebuilt the Caricomare won't be the trade hub it once was.

An obvious new addition is the gleaming white statue that adorns the quayside depicting Senator Miroslav of Sarvos, who championed the rebuilding in the Senate and now watches over the results of his hard work.

The Mystery of the Shifting Statue

Over the Winter of 378YE, the statue of Miroslav underwent a dramatic, unexpected change. The statue itself was quickly concealed behind a wall of scaffolding and dust-sheets ... but not quickly enough. Gossip initially suggested that the entire statue had warped and shifted like hot wax, changing from a depiction of the proud Senator into an effigy half-goat, half-serpent with twisted features, cloven hooves and impious horns.

Even with a few guards preventing access to the statue, any number of urchins and interested citizens have uncovered the truth - the statue has "only" changed so that the facial features reflect those of a snide naga. Rather than gazing out across the bay, the statue leans slightly forward, whispering conspiratorially behind one raised hand, forked snake-tongue protruding and an expression of malicious glee. Casual examination by magicians suggests this vandalism is not the result of a mundane attack; a weak aura of Night magic could be easily discerned around the sculpture for the first month or so.

The sculptor who was initially engaged to create the statue, Anatrice di Sarvos, has made little secret of the fact that she is not interested in returning to a finished piece and considers the fact that the statue has altered to be "not my problem." In private she has amended this to "not my problem - I've been paid."

The statue remained covered until the Grendel invasion of Spring 380YE. The orcs removed the tarpaulin, and there was allegedly some interest in removing the sculpture as a gift for one of the Salt Lords. In the end, the Grendel left the jewelled city without the statue. Then, during the celebrations following the coronation of Empress Lisabetta, the statue underwent a second marvellous transmutation.

Losing all its ophidian characteristics, the statue instead took on the mien of smiling triumph, and went from whispering behind its hand to mounting a set of stairs. It now bore an oddly reflective coin in one hand and a lantern in the other. No sculptor claimed credit for the alterations, and so it has been simply chalked up as yet another miraculous occurrence by the residents of Caricomare. Rumours quickly spread - two in particular have proved popular with the citizens of the League.

One says that if you gaze into the surface of the metal coin my moonlight, you can gain a glimpse of your heart's desire - that goal or thing that would be the finest expression of your ambition. The other says that the statue itself measures the fortunes of the Empire (or the League, depending on who one asks) and that where it once suggested dark conspiracies and treachery, it now reflects an Empire entering a new age of ambitious destiny. Indeed, priests who preach the path of Ambition have already begun to congregate in the square on market days, and deliver sermons from the steps at the base of the statue.

The Mayor of Caricomare

With the restoration of the district, the Imperial title of Mayor of Caricomare has once again become available. Responsible for overseeing the district and representing its cosmopolitan citizenry to the Senator; those same citizens trust the mayor to vote on their behalf in the Sarvosan senatorial elections each summer.

The Blood Red Quays Art Gallery

Built toward the end of 380YE the Blood Red Quays Art Gallery was commissioned by Magdalena Alanga di Sarvos and paid for by The Bloody Butchers Guild of Temeschwar. In addition to serving as a gallery to display fine works of art, it provides inspiration to, and serves as a source of Pride for, the citizens of Sarvos.

Cartographer's Eye

Description

A cartographer's eye may take a number of forms; a sphere of glass or crystal, often contained within bands of metal; a set of actual map-maker's tools; or a beautifully inlaid and detailed map are all common forms. The item is usually set with tempest jade and often has precise measurements laid out in weltsilver around the edges to help focus the minds of the magicians who use it on the wider geographical scale.

The first cartographer's eyes were used by Marcher landskeepers to extend the influence of rituals such as Blessing of New Spring, Strong Ox, Golden Sun and Gathering the Harvest. They were quickly adopted by magicians in other nations, however, especially in Varushka, The Brass Coast and the The League. The ability to extend the power of rituals to cover far-flung businesses and farms is especially valuable to magicians of those nations. While the similar Orator's Chalice is commonly used for the benefit of warriors and armies, the cartographer's eye is much more valuable to economically minded magicians; they are rarely shy about charging for the added versatility that comes from its use. Some magicians lament the fact that there seems to be no way to combine the power of the cartographer's eye with that of the orator's chalice; the coven must always choose between using their rituals on members of two bands, or on targets in two regions, never having both options.

It should be noted that while this is a powerful tool, it is useless when combined with rituals that effect entire regions or territories; it cannot be used to enchant or curse two regions or two territories. The restriction is subtle, and often hard to explain to non-magicians, but it boils down to the fact that it only effects rituals that affect a distinct range of targets within a geographical region by extended the area within which those targets may be selected.

Rules

- Form: Paraphernalia. Takes the form of a piece of ritual paraphernalia. The item must be present in the ritual to use its magical properties.
- Effect: When your coven performs a ritual that targets resources in a single territory, they can also include resources from a second territory provided both are part of the same nation.
- Materials: Crafting a cartographer's eye requires seven ingots of tempest jade, five ingots of weltsilver and four measures of dragonbone. It takes one month to make one of these items.

Carts Come Home

Carts Come Home was written by Jennet of Mourn, to commemorate the Marchers lost in the battle for Karsk.

OOO it was written by Daisy, loosely based on the trad tune The Water Is Wide. Recording is here.

Sheet music is available here

The carts come home, the oxen heavy laden With Marcher bones, brought from another nation Our girls come home, in fallow fields they're lying And all alone, I see the farmer crying.

The carts come home, the oxen heavy laden Our orchards grown, will hang heavy in the autumn Our girls come home, in fallow fields they're lying For seeds are sown, where other flowers lie dying

Carve the Crystal Guardian

Rules

Day Magnitude 20

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets a mana site. The character who controls the target personal resource must be present throughout.

This spell is an enchantment. A target may only be under one enchantment effect at a time.

Effects

This ritual conjures a band of warriors drawn from the crystals of the mana site, and imbued with vital essence from the magic that gathers there. The warriors form a powerful military unit under the control of the character who controls the target mana site, and fight under that character's command during the coming season.

The target mana site produces no crystal mana during the coming season. At the end of the season, or if they are destroyed, the warriors return to the mana site and dissolve back into it, restoring its production to normal.

The military unit created consists of supernatural troops that can be assigned any of the tasks that a normal military unit can undertake. While they are effective at all these tasks, the warriors are especially well suited to fighting as part of a campaign army and receive a five rank bonus (equivalent to an additional 100 fighting force) when they do so.

Additional Targets

This ritual can affect additional mana sites in the same territory. Each additional mana site increases the magnitude by 15. The character who controls each mana site must be present throughout the ritual, and each receives control of their own military unit.

Description

The crystal warriors called forth by this ritual draw themselves together from light, raw mana and the minerals found at the mana site. They begin as rough crystal shapes but quickly become more complex until they eventually take humanoid form. Scholars who have studied the magic believe that they are imbued with the spirits of certain lesser creatures of the Realm of Day, and that is why their consciousness is so well suited to obeying orders and fighting alongside an organised army. They are usually accoutered with staves and mage armour or with pole-weapons with the appearance of medium armour. Regardless of the appearance, their armour or lack thereof does not seem to restrict their ability to fight or the ability to use their supernatural abilities. The majority of these crystal warriors are capable of performing a limited repertoire of battlefield spells, often related to the nature of the mana site from which they are formed. Observers have seen crystal warriors channelling mana to duplicate effects such as heal and repel to aid their allies, restore their own numbers, or harry their enemies. Careful interrogation of these warriors has suggested that their magical abilities are much closer to the innate abilities of eternal and heralds, or the functions of magical items, than to true spellcasting.

These supernatural warriors can speak, and appear to be intelligent although there is something ... distant about them, as if they are not entirely focused on the present or the conversation. They follow orders well, but tend to become confused by strong emotions and unruly celebrations, and do not seem to have individual names (although they clearly have individual identities). They maintain a slightly angular or jerky quality that harks back to their supernatural origins, and often appear to be composed of crystal or metal rather than flesh; they can be hurt and even disrupted by blows as easily as any other warrior, however. They can be healed by magic, but the chirurgeon and physick skills are often of limited use once they have taken sufficient damage to incapacitate them.

Magicians who have spent time in the courts of the eternals of Day have reported encountering very similar beings as guards and servants. The stargazer Lydia of Beacon's Hollow claimed in an address to the Imperial Conclave that these creatures were actually constructs similar in principle to the ushabti but animated by a more complex form of magic that gave them the appearance of being living creatures with personalities. She further theorised that this was why the destruction of the warriors had no effect on the mana site itself - that it simply tied up the energies of the location in the form of crystal constructs, and that the magic 'snapped back' when there was no more need to maintain the warriors' pseudo-personalities. Regardless, it is reasonably well-known that some Day Eternals are prepared to offer materials or items that assist with the performance of this ritual, although they rarely do so lightly.

In Highguard this ritual is viewed with some suspicion; as with Conclave of Trees and Shadow there is concern that some of the crystal warriors are capable of remaining beyond the duration of the ritual, for their own reasons. The Freeborn express concerns also, that the crystal warriors are somehow enslaved by the one who controls them, because it is much less clear where the motivating spirit comes from than it is with the Conclave ritual. Regardless, the enchanters of Dawn, the Marcher landskeepers and the Urizen magi are all known to make good use of this spell. Many enchanters see it is a powerful way to reinforce their troops with well-disciplined, resplendent warriors; the landskeepers see it as drawing on the energy of their territories to support the household troops; and the Urizen, unsurprisingly, see it as a marvellous, if expensive, alternative to relying on mundane soldiers to fight their battles.

In the past, this ritual has been used to call up warriors to take part in a tourney or to test the mettle of soldiers or knights. The expense of performing the ritual means that this is a rare, magical activity that attracts warriors from all over when it is attempted, especially in Dawn. Like several other summoned creatures, the crystal warriors cannot pass through the Sentinel Gate at Anvil. As with creatures such as the husks conjured by Quickening Cold Meat, magicians theorise that this is because the gate cannot latch-on to the spirits of Day (or magical construction, depending on which theory one ascribes to) that empower them; when they try to travel through the gate their spiritless 'bodies' simply shatter into dull chunks of material and their now bodiless spirits flare, and are extinguished (or return to the Realm of Day).

(OOC Note: Under most circumstances, the crystal warriors summoned during Profound Decisions events will, unfortunately, have to remain primarily as a downtime or plot resource rather than something that can be used on the field. At player events, this might not be the case; but we cannot commit to phys-repping crystal warriors at short notice nor can they be used in uptime battles due to their inability to pass the portal.)

Common Elements

The ritual often involves a map of the mana site to be enchanted; in the case of the Urizen a map of the entire area may be studied, and that information woven into the invocation itself. Where possible the ritual is performed using crystals that come from the mana site in question although this is not a requirement. Other common features include minerals from the target area; valuable crystals of gemstones; symbols of Loyalty; or weapons and armour (or implements and mage armour), especially enchanted version of those items.

As with many Day rituals, mirrors, light and careful invocations are common elements. The character who will control the summoned crystal warriors may be symbolically girded as a warrior or general, or crowned in some fashion, especially with a crystalline crown. The name of the eternal Zakalwe is often evoked during the performance of this ritual.

Casinea

Overview

In Highguard's northwest, Casinea is an old and wealthy territory as well as the site of the town of Anvil, the political heart of the Empire. Once entirely forested, the woodlands have slowly been felled until only Greatwood and Woodwych are still covered and within a few generations it is likely the trees of Woodwych will be gone as well. Still, the scattered hills and low mountain peaks of Syrwatch and Marehom are rich with mines and quarries that show no signs of running out any time soon. In addition to fine marble, gold, and silver, Casinea produces excellent quality weltsilver, tempest jade and precious stones have been mined here for centuries. Several wealthy chapters protect the quarries and mines to ensure the protection of the vital assets against barbarians and bandits.

Modern Casinea is reasonably peaceful - at least on the surface. Behind the tranquil façade there are still echoes of conflict from events that happened centuries ago. Recent threats from the Druj and the creatures of Brocéliande, have brought some old disagreements bubbling back to the surface. The fallout from political events at Anvil have inspired other chapters to take a closer look at Highguard's role in the Empire - and at their own role within their nation.

A Turbulent History

Casinea has a turbulent history. The first settlers arrived here shortly after the Highborn arrived on the shores of the Bay of Catazar, but the territory was not completely conquered for several decades. The Highborn focused primarily on civilizing Pharos, and then securing the frontier in Bastion. Casinea was heavily forested, a wilderness dominated by savage orcs who fought viciously against human settlers. Eventually tiring of raids from the north-west the patricians turned their attention to the rich woodlands and mobilized their armies to deal with the barbarians as they had dealt with those in Pharos and Bastion, They were only partially successful. Even after the eastern regions were conquered, bands of scattered orcs remained to harass settlers - indeed there are reports of orc raiders attacking into Casfall and Syrwatch as late as 150YE.

After the armies came the settlers. Casfall (originally called Newland) was quickly dominated by farms and timberyards. Within a generation, construction began on the fortification in Marehom that would protect against the orc presence in Reikos. While clearing forest and finding stone and metal in Syrwatch (or Northwood as it was then), scouts discovered the Pool of Syrene, and the powerful Tutamen patrician family claimed the region. Their claim was contested by the Kehment family, and political wrangling eventually boiled over into armed aggression. Some historians point to this short-lived conflict as the first real sign of the corruption beginning to take root in the patrician families. The Tutamen were ultimately victorious, leaving the Kehment broken and bitter - they would eventually quit Highguard altogether for the nascent city of Sarvos to the west. The Tutamen moved their entire household to Syrene's Wisdom, and renamed the entire region after their patrician. Their presence the pace of colonization - in the east at least. While the woods were slowly cleared from Syrwatch, Marehom, and Newland, the western woods remained wild and completely unsettled until the time of the Revelation.

When the Virtuous first began to abandon the heartlands of Highguard, a significant majority built their chapters on the frontier. For most this meant Bastion, but several chapters were established in western Marehom and Newland. A handful of the most Ambitious and Courageous, however, sought the freedom to expand into the western woods. Several wanted isolation not only from the corrupt patricians, but even from other chapters - the solitude necessary to explore their relationship with the virtues without distractions. These rugged chapters carved out demesnes from the woods, driving the remaining orcs west and north as they did so. Even today, the chapters of western Casinea have a reputation for being insular and standoffish.

By the time of the Highborn civil war, then, Casinea was split roughly in two. The eastern regions - Syrwatch, Casfall/Newland, and Marehom - were settled and prosperous, dominated by the patrician families, and protected by the Silent Sentinel. The wild forest regions of Greatwood and Woodwych were sparsely settled until the first exodus of those who had embraced the Revelation of Virtue. The first battles of the civil war were fought here, as the western chapters fought the patrician armies along the edge their forest in a vicious campaign that eventually saw the virtuous victorious but not without terrible losses on both sides and the near destruction of the Silent Sentinel.

Following the end of the civil war, Casinea remained a place of conflict. Highborn soldiers fought against Dawn over the northern borders, and with expeditionary forces from the independent cities of Sarvos and Tassato, as well as with vallornspawn out of Miaren and Brocéliande and orc raiding parties from Reikos. Long after peace settled over Bastion and newly-christened Necropolis, Casinea remained tumultuous right up until the Foundation of the Empire and the final conquest of Reikos in 56YE.

Recent History

As with Bastion, Casinea saw an influx of refugees from beleaguered Reikos when it fell to the orcs in 367YE. For the most part, the refugees lived as guests of the existing chapters rather than creating their own. Following the final liberation of Reikos in early 380YE, the majority of these exiles chose to return across the border to the east and begin rebuilding their lives.

While the threat of the Druj in Reikos is ended, the vallorn of Brocéliande remains dangerous. In Summer 378YE, unknown forces attempted to spawn a vallorn in the Greatwood. Fortunately for the people of Casinea, Unconquered scouts from the Seventh Wave under orders of General Cuth uncovered the infestation before it could establish itself, and the threat was contained and ultimately destroyed. There are still occasional stories of unnatural creatures in the Greatwood, but the threat of a new vallorn consuming Casinea appears to have ended.

A little over a year later, however, a second major incursion took place. Just after the Summer Solstice, thick clouds of vallorn miasma spread from into Casinea, accompanied by bands of abominable insect-like ettercaps. They attacked farms and settlements near the outskirts of the dark Navarri forest. The ettercaps were little more than a nuisance, quickly dealt with by the garrison at the Silent Sentinel and Varushkan soldiers from the Northern Eagle. This incursion was only the most obvious symptom of the danger however; reports flooded in of farm and forest produce twisted and made unwholesome by the influence of the vallorn. For the most part, the threat was contained and the twisted vegetation destroyed, but some of the plants in Casinea, especially in the north, still bear the mark of the vallorn's corruption.

Since then, there have been no further threats from the vallorn, but the chapters of Casinea nonetheless keep a wary eye on their north-eastern and eastern borders. With the recent annexation of Tamarbode by the eternal Llofir, their Vigilance may prove even more important.

In Spring 380YE work began on the Blood Red Roads, a major building project sponsored by the League. The road passes through Casinea, linking Sarvos to Astolat, and ultimately through Semmerholm to Holberg. Completed shortly before the Winter Solstice 381YE, the road passes through Woodwych, Casfall, and Marehom and is a major boon to the farms and businesses of Casinea. It has not been universally welcomed however; several of the more conservative chapters, especially the insular hermits of the Greatwood, mutter that the road will not only bring merchants but also the lose morality and licentiousness of the League to the heart of Highguard.

Major Features

Anvil

Location of the Senate, and the Sentinel Gate. Four times a year the powerful citizens of the Empire meet here to determine the future of their people. The ruins of the old smithy in which the First Empress took shelter from her enemies when a young woman, Anvil is said to be where the first open declaration of the dream of Empire was made. After her ascension to the Imperial throne, the Empress declared that the small settlement would be preserved for the lifetime of the Empire in memory of sacrifices made by those sheltering her. Since then Imperial parliaments have been held there, but the town itself has never been allowed to grow.

Among other things, Anvil is also the site of the Imperial War Memorial, and Long Tom's Brewery.

The Silent Sentinel

Standing in north-eastern, Marehom this castle is considered one of the ugliest in the Empire, but it is also known to be one of the strongest. According to myth, the foundations of this castle were lain by the Paragon known as The Sentinel. The lower parts are made of black basalt and granite, with upper levels of later construction reinforced with white stone. The garrison is primarily Highborn, but there are detachments from all of the Imperial nations stationed here - indeed it is a common for armies on furlough in Casinea to camp in and around the castle.

Construction on the fortification began in the first few decades after the Founding, and the castle initially served as a base-of-operations for the settling of Casinea. Later, it served as a symbol of the power and dominance of the patrician families over the people of the territory. During the civil war, the castle was nearly destroyed in a terrible battle between the remaining patrician garrison and the forces of the virtuous chapters of the western woods. It was rebuilt after the war, returned to its original purpose of protecting the people of Casinea from orc bandits - and to defend against the threat of invasion from Astolat to the north. It potentially provides military support to the people of Anvil should any enemy force threaten the heart of the Empire.

Syrene

In contrast to the more industrious chapters in the rest of Syrwatch, Syrene is a quiet, reasonably peaceful community. Situated in the hills west of Anvil, in the shadow of Mount Uphaz, it is guarded by a number of watchtowers and beacons including two structures apparently built by the paragon known as the Sentinel. There are several chapterhouses in and around Syrene, most of whom are dedicated to the study and application of magic, or to exploration of the virtues of Vigilance and Wisdom. Syrene is best known however as the location of the Pool of Syrene, which lies at the heart of the town. The pool has powerful, slightly sinister, magical properties and is carefully watched both by the guardians of Wintergard chapter that oversee it, and by the vigilant members of the other chapters built in and around the town.

It is tradition in Syrene that no draughir can remain in the settlement for more than three days in any given season. This is in spite of the fact that records show a significantly higher chance of draughir children being born to parents living in Syrene. Draughir are explicitly forbidden to drink or bathe in the waters of the Pool of Syrene and any draughir who are born here are quickly fostered to chapters in other parts of Casinea. This is doubly odd as the town also receives a significant amount of attention from the eternals of the Winter realm who often send their heralds to visit the pools to speak with Imperial citizens. The area seems to hold a particular interest for Sorin, Wise Rangara, and Kaela, each of whom is known as the sovereign of one of the three strong Winter regio found near Syrene.

The Pool of Syrene

The town of Syrene is a quiet community built around a small pool with potent, poorly understood magical properties. The water is fresh, clear, cool, and refreshing. Those who drink it describe the experience as uniquely soothing, allowing them to easily master their emotions and maintain a cool head in the face of provocation. More significantly however, those who bathe in the waters of the pool at least once a week enjoy improved longevity. The pool was jealously guarded by the Tutamen patrician family who carefully controlled access to it; stories from the pre-Imperial times suggest that the patricians of Syrene regularly lived to be a hundred years old, but suffered quick and painful deaths if they ventured too far from the pool that sustained them.

After the civil war, the magisters and priests of Highguard met to discuss the future of Syrene and came to the conclusion that its magical powers needed to be carefully monitored - there were dangerous unanswered questions about precisely what it was doing. The chapter of Wintergard was established and given custody of the pool. To this day they carefully guard access and Syrene is kept under close scrutiny by both magisters and the Conclave. The pool has also been linked to the fact that significantly more children born in the vicinity express the draughir lineage - indeed it is common practice for parents planning to have children to leave Syrene until after the birth.

Carefully bottled in glass vials silvered with weltsilver, the waters are known to enhance the capabilities of magicians practising certain Winter magic rituals relating to preservation and survival. A small number of vials of water from the pool are occasionally sold or (more rarely) provided as gifts by the Wintergard chapter.

Syrene's Wisdom

Syrene's Wisdom is a Bourse resource located in Syrwatch. Custodianship of Syrene's Wisdom is an Imperial Title that brings with it a Seat on the Imperial Bourse. It produces 7 rings of ilium every season. Control is allocated to any Imperial citizen by open auction during the Spring Equinox.

Regions

Casfall

Eastern Casfall is fertile farm land, scattered with prosperous chapters. Western Casfall is gently wooded - not the wild forests of Woodwych and Greatwood but carefully maintained by the chapters that live there. The trees have more of an air of rolling parkland than wilderness, although there are exceptions of course. Several of the older chapters here are built around the remains of patrician estates, often incorporating much of the original architecture - the estates were quite well fortified for pre-Imperial times given the proximity of the orc-haunted woodlands.

Originally named Newland, Casfall was renamed in the early days of the Empire. According to stories, Casca herself was a powerful Highborn magister who was ordered to perform a mighty work of magic to shake the ground beneath the feet of an invading orc army. Despite reservations, the ritual went ahead at the command of the Imperial Senate. Legend has it that she continued to chant even when the power grew too much and the ritual failed, splitting the ground and burying her in the rubble. Her doom is considered a lesson by many magisters in Highguard today, although some disagree about whether the message is that Loyalty must be tempered with Wisdom, or that a magician must understand the high price that some magic claims from its wielder. The settlement of Casca's Fall was built in honour of her around a shrine to Loyalty, tended to by a small chapter of the same name.

Greatwood

Quality: Forest

Perhaps the wildest part of Highguard, the Greatwood has never been densely settled. The few chapterhouses established here tend to be inward looking and insular. Among some of the oldest, they were also some of the last to rally under the banner of the Virtuous Assembly during the civil war - in some parts of Casinea saying someone has "a Greatwood heart" is another way of accusing them of being over-cautious. Today the chapters of Greatwood continue to enjoy their privacy and discourage visitors, preferring to pursue their own understanding of the Virtues in relative solitude. A number of the chapters of Greatwood are dedicated to study of Pride and Vigilance and over the years have provided several Cardinals to the assemblies of both virtues.

In particular, the chapters here are very reticent to allow any extensive logging of the Greatwood - perhaps understandably as during the civil war the thick woodlands provided additional protection to the chapters here. This reticence exacerbates the brooding tension between the Greatwood chapters and their cousins in Wychwood. As far as the Greatwood chapters are concerned, the southern chapters and their League allies covet the ancient trees that grow in the Greatwood and are constantly conniving to find some way to extend their money-hungry lumber businesses into the north. The construction of the Blood Red Roads in particular is seen as a potential threat to the Casinean way of life - bringing with it as it does an influx of travellers from the League and even further afield. The chapter of Beacon Ridge has been especially critical of the lack of Vigilance in the decision to encourage the intrusion of non-Highborn culture into Casinea.

Mareholm

For the most part, Mareholm is a relatively quite, civilized region that has much in common with the more densely settled Bastion to the south-east. The hills and mountains are beautiful and rich with ore, and the soil here is rich and fertile. Defended by the Silent Sentinel, many of the chapterhouses here are likewise fortified. This is perhaps understandable - after all. Mareholm is the site of Anvil, the de facto Imperial capital.

The atmosphere here is not entirely peaceful. Until very recently neighbouring Reikos was occupied by vicious Druj invaders. Even with the Druj gone, there are still potential threats to the east. The powerful vallorn haunted forest of Brocéliande broods to the north-east, and the eternal Llofir has claimed bordering Tamarbode as part of its domain. While there seems to be no immediate threat from either quarter, the presence of two such unpredictable entities only a short distance from the capital of the Empire gives many cause for concern. There have been scattered signs that the Brocéliande vallorn is not as quiescent as might be hoped, and relations between the Empire and Llofir apparently remain tense.

Syrwatch

Parts of Syrwatch are quite hilly, and have been home to Highborn mining concerns for centuries. The chapters here have a reputation for being rugged, and practical people of a martial bent - the proximity of the border with Dawn meant that even in the time of the patricians the people understood the importance of remaining Vigilant not only against orcs but against the ambitions of their fellow humans. A number of the chapters protect mineworkings, or enjoy good reputations for making weapons and armour - another reason that Casinea is considered a good place for refitting and resupplying Imperial armies.

The great quarry of Syrene's Wisdom is found in the hills near the small town of Syrene, which is best known as the site of a magical pool with powerful properties seemingly tied to the Winter realm.

Woodwych

Quality: Forest

While not as dense as Greatwood to the north, Woodwych is still heavily forested. Some of the oldest chapterhouses in Casinea - and by extension, in all of Highguard - were built here in the time before the civil war. Isolated from the patricians by the woodlands - thicker and wilder in pre-Imperial times - the chapters here were some of the first to call for open rebellion in support of the martyred Permion.

The region is known both for fine timber and for rich dragonbone deposits. Several of the chapters of Woodwych maintain extensive forest reserves, or make a reasonable profit trading along the woodland road that links the League to Casca's Doom (and to the rest of Highguard). This trade serves as a source of some tension between the chapters of Woodwych and those of the Greatwood. According to some, the more insular chapters in the north resent the Prosperity enjoyed by their southern cousins, and accuse them of having embraced the "love of money" that they say infects the people of the League.

Woodland Tensions

It is no secret that relations between some of the older chapters of Woodwych and Greatwood are cool at best. Obviously, the mutual suspicion is not shared by every chapter in the two regions but it is widespread enough that it is occasionally used as a source of amusement by other Casineans. It most likely traces its roots back to the very beginning of the Virtuous Assembly, when there was a much closer relationship between the chapters of the two woodland regions.

When Permion first called for the Virtuous to guide the Highborn, there was significant disagreement between the chapters in the northern and southern forest. The Woodwych chapters broadly supported Permion, and welcomed a chance to help the Navigator to rebuild Highguard. The Greatwood chapters, heeding the cautious voice of the respected Theresa of Beacons Ridge did not agree. Theresa warned that the only possible outcome of an attempt to bring the Virtues to Highguard would be war - that the patricians would never relax their stranglehold on the nation. She was, of course, proved correct. When Permion was murdered, the Woodwych chapters were among the loudest voices calling for war, while again their cousins in the north called for a more cautious response. In the end, the Greatwood chapters joined the war alongside the rest of the Virtuous, but their reticence was neither forgotten nor forgiven.

In the centuries since, the Woodwych chapters have continued to embrace change. They welcomed trade with the League, and quickly embraced the idea of helping to found the Empire. The northern chapters continue to espouse caution - they were a solid core of opposition in the Highborn Assembly to the idea that Highguard would prosper in a union with "lesser" nations. While they grudgingly accept that the world has moved on, members of the insular chapters are often quick to point out the dangers of abandoning reliable tradition in favour of untested novelty.

One story that is guaranteed to inflame the disagreement between the chapters of western Casinea is that of the supposed "secret weirwood grove" that exists somewhere in Greatwood. The source of the rumour has never been pinned down, but several times there have been accusations of a conspiracy among several of the Greatwood chapters to conceal the existence of such a grove - that it is the real source of their reticence to allow their rich woodlands to be cut. No proof of this hidden Bourse resource has ever been presented.

OOO Notes

- All the regions of Casinea are controlled by the Highborn (and by extension the Empire), making this a staunchly Imperial territory.
- The Silent Sentinel is a second rank fortification.
- * The Blood Red Roads are a great work that provides additional income to farms and businesses owned by Highborn characters in Casinea.

Cast Off The Chain of Memory

Rules

Night Magnitude 4

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets a character, who must be present throughout. The target must be willing. If they are unwilling or unaware of the purpose of the ritual, it fails.

Effects

During the ritual the target must describe an event, location, or person they wish to forget; alternatively they may select a specific day and forget everything that happened during it between sunrise and sunrise the next day.

At the conclusion of the ritual, the unwanted memory is wiped away. The character no longer remembers it. This is not an enchantment - the memory has simply ceased to exist. The character will remember that this ritual was used, but will quickly cease to remember what it was they wished to forget unless reminded by another character.

Description

This ritual frees the target from the weight of unwanted memories and the emotions that accompany them. The ritual might remove the memory of an event - a battle, a murder, a conversation with a person or a betrayal, for example. It might remove all memories to do with a specific person, or connected to a place, or it might remove the memory of a terrible, painful day. Sometimes the excised memory leaves residue behind - for example someone who chooses to forget the day of their wedding will still remember their spouse, although they may become confused as they will be unable to remember a marriage. Likewise, a character who forgets their spouse may still have a dim recollection of a wedding day, especially the parts of it that involved other people, and may become confused if reminded that it was their own wedding day.

This ritual is used as a way to treat traumatic experiences and some emotional wounds. Knowingly aiding a criminal by wiping away memories of illegal actions that are still under investigation by the Imperial authorities sometimes leads to the ritualists being brought before a magistrate as accomplices or accessories.

Common Elements

Masks or items that represent the memory to be removed are often used, and may be shattered during the ritual. Sometimes a mirror is used to capture the reflection of the target as they describe the memory they no longer wish to remember. Often a Kallavesi ritual will involve a posset or nostrum that causes the target to fall asleep after they have described the memory they wish to lose, and when they awaken the memory has gone like chalk-marks in the rain.

Among the Highborn, and those few Imperial Orcs who have mastered this ritual, the memory will often be written down rather than spoken aloud, and the piece of writing destroyed or buried. A Highborn target will often bring pages from their journal describing a period or event they wish to forget and ceremonially burn them or destroy them in water. A Freeborn or Navarr ritual is likely to involve fire and sometimes ash, which may be used to mark the body of the target with swirling, designs. Hypnotic dancing and music may also be used, to relax the mind and allow the unwanted memory to slip peacefully away.

The Diras and Xun rules are often used, but sometimes the runes Aesh, Hirmok or Cavul may be employed to help with the mastery of the mind, or the purity of memories.

Castellan of Spiral Castle

Overview

The title of Castellan of Spiral Castle is an Imperial title appointed by the people of Dawn.

Built in pre-Imperial times, Spiral Castle stands in Weirwater at the heart of a small weirwood forest. Built around a strong Summer regio, the Castle is owned by the De Casillon family. Many of the nobles who live there are descendants of Empress Richilde. During the height of the Sun Queen's reign, the Imperial Senate agreed to a request that the resources of Spiral Castle be dedicated to the support and upkeep of the armies of the Empire, and of Dawn in particular. The Earl of Spiral Castle has always been an Enchanter, and usually possessed of a strong changeling lineage.

The title of Castellan was created to allow the somewhat insular inhabitants of the castle to fulfil their duties without having to spend too much time away from their castle. When Imperial armies are not in need of emergency supplies, the nobles and yeomen of Spiral Castle tend to their weirwood groves, practice their magic, hawking and hunting, and commune with the Eternals of the Summer Realm. Over the centuries, they have drifted further and further away from Imperial concerns, and some members of the Imperial Synod have expressed concerns over whether they are entirely human any more.

After the death of Emperor Hugh in 368YE, the inhabitants of Spiral Castle abruptly withdrew from contact with the Empire, shrouding their woodland behind a wall of swirling mist. Attempts to make contact have so far been ignored, and attempts to penetrate the mist have left explorers disoriented, emerging from the mists very close to where they entered them after hours of stumbling through hostile woodlands.

In Summer 379YE, following a challenge by the eternal Barien, the heroes of Dawn recovered the Equine rod and convinced the nobles of Spiral Castle to bring down the walls of mist and rejoin the Empire.

In Spring 380YE, following suggestions from the House de Cassilon, the Senate agreed to expand the reach of Spiral Castle to allow for armies in nearby territories to be resupplied, without having to come to the Castle itself.

Responsibilities

The Castellan is responsible for directing the efforts of Spiral Castle to provide emergency resupply of armies based in Weirwater. They have the final say on which army will benefit from the Castle's bounty. They are also expected to represent the nobles of Spiral Castle in their dealings with the outside world - which primarily means keeping them at arm's length and discouraging visitors.

Powers

Resupply

Each season the inhabitants of Spiral Castle could perform emergency resupply on a single named Imperial army that spends the entire season in either Weirwater, Karsk, Karov, Astolat or Semmerholm. The army recovers 500 strength (in addition to the natural resupply the army receives). They could not benefit from any other emergency resupply while benefiting from the attentions of Spiral Castle.

The army receives this emergency resupply as long as the region of Weirmoor is in Imperial hands.

OOO Note: To use this ability the Castellan should e-mail Profound Decisions after the event detailing the army they intend to resupply.

Spiral Castle represents a source of weirwood that was entirely dedicated to a single purpose - resupplying armies. As a consequence, the weirwood provided by the woodlands around the castle has an enhanced effect. If Spiral Castle were decommissioned, the woodlands would produce no more than around sixteen wains a season at best. It is likely the De Casillon family would oppose efforts to decommission Spiral Castle.

Seat on the Bourse

The Castellan of Spiral Castle has a seat on the Imperial Bourse. It is an Imperial title that grants the right to participate on the rare occasion when the Imperial Bourse as a body is required to make a decision.

Bounty of Golden Apples

In Winter 379YE, the inhabitants of Spiral Castle declared their intention to provide the Castellan with three golden apples from their private orchards. Going forward, this valuable vis will be received by the Castellan each season.

Appointment

Before the inhabitants of Spiral Castle withdrew behind their wall of enchanted mists, this title was appointed during the Summer Solstice; since its recovery, it is now appointed during the Autumn Equinox.

The Castellan of Spiral Castle is appointed by citizens of Dawn who control military units. The larger the military unit an individual has, the more votes they can allocate in support to a candidate. The voting is handled by the civil servants in the Bourse.

Only a Dawnish character is able to hold the title. It is traditional for a yeoman to hold the title, but there is no legal requirement that this be the case. As a title in the Bourse, the Castellan of Spiral Castle cannot be revoked by the Imperial Synod.

The Title in Play

The role does not provide additional information about events in the Empire, nor allow the player holding it to request special reports or downtime actions. These details are assumed to be below the abstraction layer. The title holder is encouraged to create their own stories about their activities within reasonable limits and to get involved in events appropriate to their title during the game, but they do not have any powers beyond those explicitly listed in the section on powers.

These details exist partly to provide context and character to the role - and partly to allow our writers to use the title as a plot hook. Plot that involves the position will be rare - but all the campaign positions in Empire have these details to create the potential for it to happen.

Castle of wind and sky

Strangers are dangerous.

Little Bat stared at the tall dark-skinned man. He was dressed in fine silk, the bleached white robes pulled tight to his body. He was crouched down sheltering behind the low wall struggling for air, the wind screaming at him as it tried to steal the breath from his lips.

Strangers can harm you.

There were a lot of new people visiting the vale now. They had started arriving as summer faded, as soon as the castle was complete. Little Bat liked the castle. It reminded her of the picture in Little Rhino's book, the one with the giants and the castle in the clouds. The strangers had brought the clouds with them.

Never approach a stranger.

The strangers mostly stayed in the castle. It was calm when they were indoors - the wind would rest waiting for its prey to emerge - it only blew when they dared to set foot outside the castle. It didn't bother anyone from the vale - it was only the strangers that it hated. As soon as the clouds could see them they would call to the wind and it would run to attack them.

Never talk to a stranger.

The stranger was struggling to make head way, fighting against the wind with every step, desperate to reach the safety of the castle. He leaned hard in to the wind, fighting to keep his balance, but as he moved to take a step the capricious gale switched directions and sent him sprawling in the wet snow. The scrolls he had been clutching were torn from his grasp, but fortunately they dropped to the ground only a pace away despite the raging wind.

Never trust a stranger.

The man clutched his robes around his cold body, moaning as he reached for the nearest scroll. Just as his fingers made contact, the wind screamed again, tearing the paper from his grasp, hurling it into the air. It landed barely a pace further away, but the torment was too much for the stranger and his arm dropped to touch the cold snow cursing. The wind paused, watching, waiting, ready for the mouse to move again.

Never help a stranger.

Little Bat skipped forward enjoying the pattern her shoes made in the snow. She scooped up both the scrolls and standing near enough to help and far enough to be safe she handed them to the stranger. He looked at her, astonishment plain on his face - perhaps it was because she was helping him, perhaps it was because his tormentor had ceased to bellow. Little Bat dropped the scrolls into his hand. "Safe journey" she said, the same way her mother had said it to that odd stranger who had come visiting the vale last Winter.

Never mistreat a stranger.

She kept a fixed smile on her face just as she had been taught and carefully backed away from the stranger. Once she was a safe distance from him, she turned and ran for home. The wind picked up behind her as she ran.

Overview

The Icy Crag of the Eternal Sun, the grand imposing fortress of learning constructed on the edge of the vale of Volchitrava is labouring under a powerful curse. It seems the occupants have invoked the wrath a powerful enemy - and the Mistress of Blizzards has taken a care to remind the magicians of the Empire from whence comes her name. Ever since the solstice, the peaks of the castle have laboured under the weight of heavy white clouds thick with snow and ice that falls on anyone foolish enough to step forth.

Such a thing might be bourne, but the true terror is the wind. The Immovable One has sent her most vindictive child to berate her enemies. Gales strong enough to knock a citizen from their feet appear from nowhere and then vanish just as quickly. Inside the castle, the magicians are safe, some power in the stone protects them, but the wind whips around the fortress walls, screaming abuse at those within and daring them to come forth. It attacks any foolish enough to meet the challenge.

As if to stress that this is no ordinary wind, it picks its targets with care. The inhabitants of the vale are almost completely unaffected. Young and old walk through the storms without a care - untouched and untroubled by the raging gale. Even the simplest things are rendered strange by this chaotic weather. Washing hung out on a line is dry within an hour - even when the snow is falling. Nothing is as it seems.

One thing is abundantly clear - Cathan Canae is furious.

Significance

Despite the best efforts of Cathan Canae, the fortress still stands and remains open for magicians to come and study. Great magics are attempted within the walls and the business of creating new rituals continues apace.

The problem is getting magicians to travel to and from the Icy Crag. Every time anyone steps forth they are attacked by the elements. The naked hostility of the Lady of Frost is causing a great many magicians to question the sanity of defying her. Even the strongest fret about the risks, they may be able to endure the curse, but what if her temper should grow worse. Who knows what she might do next? Once the situation becomes clear, the Empire begins to experience great difficulty motivating anyone to make the journey north and take the risk.

Sadly in the end the question of motivation is resolved the same way it is always it - with money. The Crag is able to operate fully - but only by offering wages far in excess of what was planned. As a result of the curse, the day-to-day upkeep of the college ends up costing the Empire twice what it had expected. This dire situation looks set to continue for as long as the curse lasts.

Dealing with the Curse

It seems certain that Cathan Canae has placed a curse upon the Icy Crag. It is possible the curse could be broken - it is possible it may simply end - the temper of the eternal of the Summer Realm is notoriously fickle. It is at least unlikely to grow worse if past behaviour is anything to judge by - unless someone does something to anger the eternal further of course.

According to rumour what has infuriated Cathan Canae is the fact that the banner of Meraud hangs in the Crag's halls. In theory the college could reject Meraud and invite Cathan Canae to resume the patronage she was promised. But wise heads point out that if that Meraud is also a Summer eternal. He doesn't have much affinity for storms - but he does like to drop comets on things. Any attempt to solve this problem diplomatically is going to need be handled exceptional carefully to avoid making the situation worse.

The simple alternative might be brute force. If the Imperial Conclave were to declare enmity to Cathan Canae - it would prevent her wielding her power openly in the Empire - and that would definitely break the curse. Of course it is almost certain to anger Cathan Canae even further - but at least her anger could not then be directed against the Empire - well not directly at least.

Casualties

Overview

Both sides involved in a campaign take casualties. This is represented by a reduction in their effective fighting strength.

Casualties represent fatalities, permanent damage to equipment and lost resources. Thanks to easy availability of magical, herbal and surgical healing, injured soldiers are generally restored to full fighting fitness within a short period of time, and are not counted as casualties.

Calculating casualties

Each side in a campaign normally inflicts casualties on the other side equal to one tenth of its fighting strength. The casualties are split among all the forces present in the territory based on the orders submitted by the commanders on both sides, the outcome of the campaign, and the actions of player characters during time-in as a guide. However the armies and navies of a side are assumed to stand and fight together, it is not possible to single out an enemy army.

A force that falls below 1,000 strength is disbanded. An army is routed, or annihilated, a navy is sunk. It is effectively destroyed and ceases to exist as a significant force although individual soldiers or vessels may survive. A large army disbands if its fighting strength falls below 1,500.

E.g. There are three full strength Dawnish armies fighting in the Barrens. They have a total fighting strength of 15,000 so they will inflict 1500 casualties on the opposing forces. The precise number of casualties may be adjusted due to the orders submitted and any appropriate rituals in place as well as any battles that have taken place.

The casualties are split equally between the enemy forces present and then the casualties each force incurs is adjusted based on the order submitted for that army or navy.

Natural Resupply

- Must be in an Imperial territory, on defensive orders, with no opposing forces present during the season

Resupply represents new equipment and materials, and new recruits to replace the dead. If an Imperial force spends the entire season in a territory controlled by its allies with no opposing forces there during the season then it automatically recovers 500 strength (750 for a large army or navy).

In order to benefit from natural resupply, the general must issue a defending order to their army. it is not possible to gain the benefits of natural resupply while taking an attacking order to capture territory even if there are no opposing forces present.

No natural resupply takes place if there is an enemy force defending or attacking any part of the territory. Forces leaving the territory at the start of the campaigning season do not count, but forces that enter the territory that season do.

Armies cannot resupply in a territory in which there is an ongoing damage effect such as Thunderous Tread of the Trees or Mountain Remembers Its Youth. This does not stop an army that has taken damage while moving through a territory from resupplying as long as they end their movement in a territory where no such effects are in place.

A force cannot be resupplied above its maximum fighting strength normally 5,000 (7,500 for a large force).

Emergency Resupply

- Can be used anywhere provided the force is not engaged in a campaign that season
- Requires mithril or weirwood and 2 crowns per wain

The Imperial Senate may pass a motion to authorize the use of mithril or weirwood - to speed up the resupply of an Imperial army or navy. In the case of an army, these materials represent weapons and armour as well as tents, wagons, siege equipment and other supplies. For a navy they include repairs to existing warships as well as new vessels, shipboard weapons, food and materials for the ships and their crews, and other supplies. This represents a concerted effort by the Empire to bring the target force back up to full strength. Emergency resupply, like natural resupply, takes a season to complete.

Emergency resupply can be used with any force that is not engaged in a campaign that season. If the force takes part in a campaign - either attacking, being attacked or being part of a larger force that attacks, then any attempt to use emergency resupply fails.

In a single season, the first 50 wains of mithril or weirwood restore 20 army strength for each wain allocated. The next 50 wains provide an additional 15 army strength each. The next 50 wains provide an additional 10 army strength - and so on. The rate of emergency resupply resets each season so mithril and weirwood spent in a subsequent season is not affected by earlier actions. In addition to materials, emergency resupply costs 2 crowns per wain.

Following a decision of the Imperial Senate, it is the responsibility of the Senator (or other agent of the Senate, such as the Quartermaster General of the Imperial Armies) to call for a moment of silence honouring the dead after any motion for emergency resupply is passed. Unless the Senate imposes additional restrictions, a senator authorized to oversee the resupply of a specific Imperial army can do so freely for a year following the passage of the motion.

Category-Mass Effect

Overview

- Mass call is a character targeted enchant that lets you call a single MASS, and has our Battle duration (The effect lasts until the end of the next battle, skirmish or quest the character participates in; or until the end of the current event, whichever is sooner.)
- Each target must also be a contributor
- We swap extra uses for additional targets
- We mark "MASS SHATTER" for a proper review as we have issues with it

Changes

- Removed sympathetic effect from Fetid Breath of Teeming Plague, and added a roleplaying effect
- Removed sympathetic effect from Howling Despite of the Yawning Maw, added a roleplaying effect, and added a beggars lye option
- Added roleplaying effect to Inescapable Chains of Bitter Glass
- Added roleplaying effect to Revelatory Light of the Emyrean Spheres, and specified the effects of the blindness caused by the ritual - get confirmation on material reduction rather than substitution
- Added roleplaying effect to The Grave's Treacherous Edge, and beggar's lye option
- Added roleplayng effect to Thundering Roar of the Lion-bound Horn
- Magnitude reduction on these rituals has been removed following discussion with Graeme, and replaced with mana substitution
- There is no formulated Mass strikedown effect at this time due to safety concerns surrounding it's use on the battlefield. These H&S concerns have been largely overruled, and consequently the design space is now open.
- Template for Ref Rules/OOC Notes section is here Template%3AMass Ref-effect

Cathan Canae

Eternal of Summer

Sobriquets

Cathan Canae is called the Queen of Ice and Darkness or the Lady of the Frost.

She is sometimes called called The Breath of Winter (perhaps confusingly, given she is an Eternal of Summer), Mistress of Blizzards and The Immovable One.

Appearance

This Summer Eternal appears either as a tall, muscular woman dressed in heavy chain in the style of a Wintermark warrior-heroine, bearing a vicious hooked polearm called Ironwind. On her brow is a tall crown of ice set with three blue jewels. She usually wears a mantle of white bear fur, which stories say was made for her by the Suaq icewalker-hero Fainomaiken from the hide of the titanic Devilbear that haunted the wastes of Sermersuaq centuries before the Steinr came and the people of Wintermark became one.

On the rare occasions that she is presenting a more peaceful mien, she dresses in the manner of a rich Steinr thane, or wealthy Varushkan boyar, usually with her white mantle over the top and her regal crown. She is by turns imperious; mighty; cold as the glacier; furious as the blizzard.

Cathan Canae is rarely encountered alone; she is usually accompanied by warriors or occasionally ogre-like giants or savage supernatural beasts. She rules a great swathe of territory in the Summer realm from her immense frozen citadel. Her realm is composed of awe-inspiring mountains, frozen waterfalls, glaciers and trackless snow-covered plains, haunted by legendary monsters and bands of savage warriors. Her armies regularly engage in skirmishes and battles with those of Eleonaris on the Fields of Glory and Hayaak for mastery of the Forest of Arden.

Concerns

Cathan Canae exemplifies and glories in physical strength; she is the awesome strength of the glacier, the might of the howling blizzard, the irresistible majesty of the mountain, the implacable force of the avalanche. She reaches for the strength that none can stand against, and that cannot be overcome - both the irresistible force and the immovable object. She is extremely stubborn, and respects only two things; might and resilience. She is extremely proud, and those who disrespect her earn her unending ire.

In many stories it is Cathan Canae who sends blizzards and avalanches down from the mountains, or south from the frigid wastes, to batter Wintermark and Varushka. She does not do this from wickedness, but because it is in her nature to test others. Those who endure the onslaught of winter, or who fight with courage against the armies of their enemies, become ever stronger, ever more capable of resisting whatever the world throws at them.

In Wintermark she is strongly associated with the rune Verys.

Boons

Cathan Canae can give boons of strength, martial prowess and supernatural endurance or fortitude. She almost always demands that those who would receive her boons prove their strength by defeating one of her champions or enduring a challenge of their resilience, constitution or will. According to stories the hero Fainomaiken endured twelve impossible tasks during his fabled courtship of this proud queen, including holding back the glacier Immanoviel for a year-and-a-day and enduring seven days and seven nights naked beneath the frozen waterfall called Unending Frost. Modern heroes are likely to receive slightly less dramatic challenges, but those who fail are often left broken or maimed. Cathan Canae has neither mercy nor respect for those who fail to live up to her high standards of excellence.

On rare occasions, she will lend a weapon, shield or piece of armour from her extensive collection to a mortal to wield for a time. Her artisans are some of the most skilled in the Summer realm and work with all manner of exotic materials including living ice, water, wind and starlight. Even other Eternals of Summer seek the aid of her crafters.

Sometimes she will offer the services of her giant warriors, massive Eternal humanoids often reaching seven or eight feet in height and possessed of unspeakable strength. She may likewise send some of the legendary beasts and savage hunters of her realm to bedevil mortals. or be prevailed upon to raise a blizzard or avalanche, or aid mortal ritualists in doing the same.

Some mortal ritualists are able to prevail on ancient pacts to call forth a frozen fortification from her realm, and she can make this process easier or harder.

A very few men and women have wooed Cathan Canae; those who impress her with their strength, courage, and fortitude may spend one night as her consort. Should they survive this honour it is said that ever after they are inured to the cold of winter - they can walk naked through the mightiest blizzard without difficulty, or swim the frozen floes of Tsirku without fear.

Caution for the Dawnish Youth

Song by Jamie Wakefield (<https://soundcloud.com/jamie-wakefield/caution-for-the-dawnish-youth>)

Chords: Dm Asus Dm Dsus Dm Asus

Verse 1 How can you pretend to know of violence, Sitting, reading fairy tales of war? Tell me what's the worst that you can fear! A papercut? My Dawnish friend, our wounds are deeper still.

Chorus Ai! Ai-ee-eh! Ai-ee-eh! Ai! Ai-ee-eh! Ai-ee-eh!

Verse 2 The borders of The Empire are too fragile, To let an enemy get half-a-chance. Kill them where you can, Use everything you have to hand. Noble grace will send you to your grave.

Chorus

Verse 3 with bridge. The Striding walks the trod to save our homeland. The Steading guards the wood 'till they return. You would blindly wander in alone? You cannot see. You cannot hear. There in the deep... The Vallorn lie.... They never sleep... They're waiting...

Chorus

Verse 4 On the road, the paths we tread are endless. The weariness will wear you to the bone. The enemy will wait for you to stumble. With vigilance, your only coat of steel.

Cavul

The Swan, Rune of Purity

Affiliated with the Realm of Day

Cavul is the Swan, which represents purity, clarity and calm. It removes corruption and restores things to their original condition. It is also called the Rune of Clarity, and is used during meditation to center the mind and shut out external influences.

Purity protects from outside influences by reinforcing what is present (protection and warding) or restoring things to their original condition (removing corruption and taint). It has strong connections with water, and magic that evokes Cavul often includes elements of washing, cleansing or drinking with pure liquid.

The Rune of Purity has unfortunate political connections. It has been used by movements that consider lineage to be a taint on humanity, as well as by groups who oppose the involvement of magicians or the Eternals in Imperial affairs. Prior to their arrest in 342YE, the Fraternity of the Swan inscribed Cavul on the bodies of their Imperial Orc victims as a call to arms against the so-called corruption of the Empire by orcs.

Using Cavul in magic

Cavul is evoked with magic that reinforces, protects against outside influence, removes taint or impurity, or cleanses. Many magicians evoke this rune by name, or trace it on the body of their target when performing the Purify incantation.

Crafting with Cavul

Scholars, monks and politicians may bear the Swan Rune on a ring that they can study to calm their emotions without drawing attention. While it is sometimes placed on or inside a drinking vessel (especially by those who fear poisoning) it is not popular with those who enjoy carousing, for it is said that the presence of Cavul removes the flavour of any alcohol it comes into contact with. It is used on flasks and water skins by travellers, to keep the liquid inside fresh.

Celebrant's Fiddle

Description

A Celebrant's Fiddle allows a priest to use a musical performance to draw on the power of the consecration of Prosperity to encourage their audience. Listeners are filled with a profound sense of satisfaction for what they have achieved with their hard work. The power of the magical musical instrument itself is only part of the process that brings about this spiritual experience - the performance itself helps connect the spirit of the audience with the power of the potent consecrated aura.

These items may be any type of musical instrument, but they are often crafted as fiddles or other stringed instruments. While it might be expected that a musical instrument connected with Prosperity would appear expensive, this is actually relatively uncommon. Priests who favour this instrument, especially in the Marches or among Sutanirr, prefer a durable instrument that can be used to play quick, lively music. The Celebrant's Fiddle is often quite effective at connecting to the celebratory impulse in the audience, dragging them onto the dance floor or helping them relax and enjoy the rewards their hard work have brought them.

Whereas priests who use many of the other musical instruments often intersperse their performances with readings or homilies, priests who favour the Celebrant's Fiddle generally allow their music to speak for itself. They favour uplifting, upbeat music that moves the body as well as the spirit - ceremonial use of this musical instrument is often indistinguishable from a festive celebration.

As with many religious magic items, it is common for a Celebrant's Fiddle to be hallowed. An extremely popular choice is the Hallowing of the Overflowing Cup, although the Hallowing of the Grateful Debtor is also reasonably common.

In Wintermark, Prosperity is represented by Pallas, and the Rune of Wealth is often worked into the decoration of the instrument.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of any kind of musical instrument. You must be performing music with this item to use its magical properties.
- Requirement: You must have the dedication skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: You must be dedicated to Prosperity to use this item. Once per day, while you are in an area consecrated to Prosperity, you may spend ten minutes of appropriate roleplaying that includes playing this musical instrument. Any listener who was in the area for the entire period recovers all hero points. You cannot use this ability if you are on a battlefield or in a similar stressful environment. A listener who has lost the ability to recover hero points overnight is not effected by this power.
- Materials: Crafting a Celebrant's Fiddle requires 7 measures of tempest jade, 9 measures of dragonbone, and 5 measures of iridescent gloaming; It takes 1 month to make one of these items.

Celesti Lighthouse Keeper

Overview

The Celesti Lighthouse Keeper is an Imperial title created by the Freeborn Civilian Commissioner in Winter 380YE. The Celesti lighthouse itself is built near the town of Oran, in Feroz; a stone tower topped with a massive beacon of polished mithril mirrors.

Responsibilities

The Lighthouse Keeper is expected to ensure the Celesti lighthouse remains functional, providing a beacon to sailors along the coast of Feroz. They would also be the responsible for dealing with any threats to the Lighthouse - or in theory to Oran itself - but would also to deal with any opportunity related to the Celesti lighthouse.

Powers

Mariners' Mana

The Celesti Lighthouse Keeper is a ministry. The Keeper can purchase quantities of crystal mana from mariners and ship-captains that visit Oran, buying at a set price. The Keeper makes their decision how much money to spend during downtime from their character page. Money is removed from, and resources are placed into, the character's inventory when the downtime is processed.

Total Money Spent	Production
7 Crowns	8 mana crystals
17 Crowns	16 mana crystals
35 Crowns	25 mana crystals
48 Crowns	33 mana crystals

Appointment

The Celesti Lighthouse Keeper is appointed during the Spring Equinox each year. It is chosen by unanimous decision of the senators of the Brass Coast. If a unanimous decision cannot be reached, the title may be appointed by the Imperial Senate instead.

The title can be held by any Freeborn citizen. They can be revoked by the General Assembly, the National Assembly of the Brass Coast, and by the Assembly of the Nine.

The Celesti Lighthouse

The Celesti lighthouse was originally constructed as part of the massive investment in coastal ports and defences during the reign of Emperor Barabbas. The lighthouse was intended to serve not only as a navigation aid but also to keep a watch for signs of Grendel ships. As befitting Barabbas' grand ambition, the structure was significantly larger than was strictly appropriate to the traffic through a moderate sized coastal town - making it an object of fun for satirists and humourists around the Bay of Catazar.

The original architectural plans were put together in collaboration with the hakima known as the Celesti, ensuring that it was built with a distinctly Freeborn aesthetic. While the original lighthouse was portrayed outside the Coast as something of a white elephant, the Freeborn appreciated the beautiful structure as much for its aesthetic as for its value as a beacon. The most significant contribution of the Celesti however - and perhaps the real reason for their inclusion in the project - was the beacon. The Celesti's home since the founding of the Brass Coast is a reclusive monastery near the summit of the Gilded Peak in Kahraman. Here they conducted extensive research on the natural phenomenon that gave the summit its name, and the peaks are rich with orichalcum and mithril with which they crafted fine mirrors to recreate the golden light of the peaks.

Barabbas had originally planned to have the lighthouse lit in a dramatic display as his great flotilla sailed past on its way to conquer the Grendel. It was perhaps an ill omen that due to overspending and delays, construction hadn't yet started on the complex beacon and only the tower itself was finished. With Barabbas' death just a few days after, funding for coastal projects abruptly stopped, and there was little interest from Senate in finishing what was largely seen as one of the late Throne's great follies. With no further money forthcoming, it proved impossible to complete the lighthouse.

- 5 The Celesti Lighthouse

For the past century, a small group of Guerra hakima have kept a large bonfire lit at night in the otherwise empty beacon room to maintain its function as an aid to sailors through the treacherous isles and sandbanks of the southern coast. Though using only a simple bonfire the beacon is nowhere near as clear or bright as was intended. Tourists and pilgrims to the site have provided enough funds to keep the structure itself in fair condition, though never enough to build its complex beacon.

In 380 YE, Ahraz i Guerra, one of the remaining hakima of the Celesti, raised the funds necessary to complete the beacon and recovered the plans from the Celesti archives. The work was then authorised by the Civilian Commissioner for the Brass Coast, thus ensuring that golden light of the Gilded Peaks will, after nearly two long centuries of absence, finally be brought to shine out across the bay; welcoming those from near and far to the Brass Coast.

The lighthouse is situated near the farthest tip of the Oran peninsula at one of its highest points, and was engineered so that its beacon sat a square 500 ft above the sea. Making it visible from the mast of a moderately sized ship for some 30 miles, and enabling navigators to quickly calculate their distance from shore taking into account its known elevation. This makes it a useful navigation aid for those attempting to traverse the many isles and sandbanks of Cazar. By no coincidence, this also makes it visible to the taller structures in Siroc, Oran, and Joharra.

To ensure the monument would not fall into disrepair again, the title "Celesti Lighthouse Keeper" was created, to be appointed by the Freeborn senators. Keen to promote trade with the newly opened foreign ports in Rigia and Kantor, the Keeper was given powers of a ministry and empowered to purchase mana directly from ships captains, ensuring guaranteed prices on the docks of Oran for those willing to sell to Civil Service factors.

I was always happy to discuss matters with the families, it was after all what hakima did. In fact I made a point when I first moved to the keeper's lodgings in the base of the tower to oversee construction that I introduce myself to the locals. That my door was always open. I was not however expecting to be visited by a troupe of townsfolk at such an unsocial hour of night. I pulled my robe closer against the icy sea breeze rolling over the cliffs."

"It's a metaphor you see"

I was attempting to answer their question of "what was all this about". As the town had been using the lighthouse, even its diminished capacity, for the past two centuries I assumed they were well aware of its literal function and was attempting to explain the wider implications and intricacies.

"Two centuries ago Emperor Barabbas invited the Celesti as hakima to design this lighthouse not just because of their expertise in the matter, but for its symbolic importance. We as hakima serve to advise and guide the nation so that it may make the best decisions. The Celesti oath makes reference to bringing the light of Wisdom to all the Families. Thus this lighthouse doesn't just serve a literal purpose in providing a light by which sailors may navigate; but it is a metaphor for the light that the hakima shine to guide the Families."

The man in the lead of the small group sucked his teeth and thought on this for a moment.

"That may be the case good sir

But we would much appreciate it if the hakima didn't shine their light of Wisdom through our bedroom windows when we are trying to sleep"

Celestial Arch

Motto

Knowledge and power in union.

Symbol

A symbol that has been associated with this Order in the past has been a dark blue archway surmounting a six-pointed star

The Manifesto

The Order of the Celestial Arch holds the following to be true:

- Both politics and magic are the art of the judicious application of power
- Magicians, by nature of their knowledge, discipline, perception and power are prepared for leadership
- Negotiation with Eternals and diplomacy with Foreign Powers are comparable skills, and of comparable importance to the Empire

The Order of the Celestial Arch therefore exists to:

- Ensure that major political decisions receive the benefit and insight of Conclave mages
- Encourage those in positions of leadership and authority to hone their skill through study of magic
- Ensure unity of purpose between the Conclave and the Senate

Membership of the Order

The Celestial Arch often works closely with Senators seeking a voice in the Conclave, and prepared to return the favour in the Imperial Senate. They lobby constantly for more magicians to take up political life, and make no secret of the fact that many of them support magical training as a prerequisite of candidacy for the Senate. The order often tries to recruit magicians who are also Senators, or at the very least to maintain good relations with them.

They tend to make an effort to maintain good relations between the Empire and friendly Eternals, while being quick to identify Eternals who are enemies of the Empire and proscribe interaction with them. As with the Sevenfold Path they have a no-nonsense approach to magicians who fall back on curses and other actions likely to damage the standing of magicians as a whole in the Empire - a surprising number of threshers who are also magicians belong to this order.

The grandmasters of the Celestial Arch try to wield magic and politics with equal aplomb. This order tends to attract a number of Urizen magi, which can often give them easy access to crystal mana.

As magicians interested in political, as well as magical, power the Celestial Arch often see the advantage of strategies that will garner political favours, either within the Conclave or with other Imperial bodies. While their main interest usually lies with the Senate, they see the value of encouraging the military council, synod or bourse to feel indebted to the Conclave - which means they may find themselves ready allies in the Rod and Shield, Sevenfold Path or Golden Pyramid as a consequence.

Conclave vault

Each summit, the Conclave vault of the Celestial Arch garners the following resources;

- A pro-rata share of the Font based on the precedence of the orders at the previous summit.
- A portion of ilium based on their position among the orders as determined by precedence.
- 2 ingots of tempest jade, 3 measures of iridescent gloaming, and 2 measures of dragonbone from existing bequests.

Celestial Sigil

Description

A Celestial Sigil is a magical standard that is infused with the power of mana. Woven from soft wool, bleached with beggar's lye, reinforced with sungold and moonsilver, and carefully embroidered with fine silk threads imbued with iridescent gloaming, they often depict astronomantic constellations. The banner pole is invariably of weirwood, often shod and bound with mithril, and embellished with dragonbone. It is most popular with the Urizen (unsurprisingly), but warbands of Dawnish witches are also known to favour the power of this magical standard. Some Varushkans call it a Firebird Banner, referencing both the constellation of the Phoenix (with which it is often adorned), and the way that the standard empowers magical healers to restore man additional warriors - or sear their enemies with devastating incantations.

The bearer of the standard can tap into a deep reserve of extra mana allowing them to perform many more incantations than they might otherwise - something not usually possible with a magical talisman. Some banner bearers draw on the standard's magic to allow them to heal or empower their allies. More martially inclined banner bearers - especially Dawnish war-witches and Imperial orc warcasters prefer to fight with a Celestial Sigil in one hand and a rod in other (especially magical rods that further increase their magical prowess). By combining the power of a Celestial Sigil with items such as a Neophyte's Rod, a Battlesmith's Panoply, or an Ashen Mantle, a martial magician can increase their reserves of personal power even further.

The most famous Celestial Sigil was carried into battle in pre-Imperial days by the sentinels of Urizen. A valuable artefact, it served as a rallying point for the Citadel Guard - perhaps most famously in the campaign against Alderei the Fair. Historians record that it was one of the first banners to bear the beautiful image of the Phoenix that adorns many Urizeni banners and standards to this day. Sadly, the artefact was lost in 54YE during the sourcing of Redoubt. The standard was consumed in black flame by the will of the Ashenblood Knight, a powerful servant of the eternal Surut. The exact circumstances of its destruction are unclear. Some historians claim the Ashenblood Knight was fighting for the orcs and destroyed the sigil after defeating its bearer, Salome of Highwatch, in a duel. Others disagree and claim that Salome offered the standard as tribute to the Thrice-cursed Court to bind the Ashenblood Knight to her service for a time. Regardless, this powerful symbol of Urizen martial might was lost forever in the early years of the Empire. In the centuries since, however, many generals of the Citadel Guard have made a point of fighting under a celestial sigil, perceiving it as a powerful reminder of the victories of the past - and the cost of failure.

The Celestial Sigil is a symbol of magical power, and as such it often encourages its bearers to seek out and overcome other magicians. On the battlefield, this means the standard is favoured by regiments who have good reason to fight powerful sorcerous foes - although it does occasionally cause problems when the banner is carried in other places especially the Imperial Conclave.

Rules

- Form: Magical standard. The phys-rep requirements for a magical standard are more stringent than those of similar items. You must be bearing this banner aloft to use its magical properties.
- Effect: While wielding this standard you gain five additional personal mana
- Roleplaying Effect: This banner seems to vibrate under your fingers. While wielding it, you feel an urge to identify and defeat enemy magicians.
- Materials: Crafting a Celestial Sigil requires seven ingots of orichalcum, seven ingots of weltsilver, thirteen measures of dragonbone, eleven measures of beggar's lye, and twenty measures of iridescent gloaming. It takes one month to make one of these items.

"You must focus your minds on the connection" Calacius spoke as a drift of snow fell upon the spire courtyard around them. He motioned to the flag that lay unfurled before them all. A design that, while simple, was striking at the same time; the fountain Calacius had stitched it himself deciding that the aesthetics of the banner were wholly appropriate for the group of Urizen around him. Dressed in a simple, unadorned robe the Urizen magician seemed untroubled by the temperatures and appeared as comfortable as if it were a cool summer's day. Seven others stood forming a circle beside him, similarly dressed and showing equal stoicism in the face of the cold. Each stood before a different carved symbol at their feet; the runes of The Way beautifully engraved and lined with shining weltsilver and glowing ambergelt. Each bore a simple, unadorned staff of pale wood, held at ease beside them.

"Ambition, our drive to perfect all that we are" spoke the first, a female Cambion whose horns were hung with arcane fetishes.

“Courage, to use all that we know where it is needed.” Atticus, an elderly man bent almost double with age, supported himself on his staff but his grip was strong and sure.

“Loyalty, to the spires, the Empire and the pursuit of perfection.” The third, a Merrow, the rest of those around him reflected in his glassy eyes.

“Pride, in the knowledge that we stand above all in our art.” The fourth speaker was a young man whose warrior’s stature seemed a little at odds with his quiet demeanour.

“Prosperity; the richness of knowing and the rewards of our labours.” The woman who spoke next turned her head left to right as if listening to something only she could hear, the strands of silver woven into her hair shimmering in the light of the glowing globes around them.

“Vigilance, to watch for the darkness that threatens us all, to use our talents for the good of the Empire,” rasped the sixth, her skin toughened with pale-brown patches. A Briar, uncommon among the Spires of the Urizen she stood beside her brethren as equal, her worth in battle proven by the bark that marred her beauty.

“Wisdom, for it guides us always” Calacius finally spoke again, completing the circle.

They each raised their staffs before them and banged them once, hard on the stone courtyard. As they did, each fancied they could see dancing lights coalesce around them, vague shapes that formed in the air. Wrapped in their own thoughts for a moment, they shared an endless second of unspoken communion before the lights faded in their minds and floated towards the flag and were absorbed by the fabric.

“As one we learn, as one we fight” Calacius pronounced, bowing his head slightly to those around him who repeated the motion. “Now steel yourselves for we march on the morrow. Go with wisdom.”

Brazier of Benediction (Redirected from Censer of Benediction)

Description

These talismans may consist of anything from a simple earthenware bowl or fire pots to an intricately carved silver or gold vessel. Also known as a Censer of Benediction, this is a religious talisman used to offer additional potency to ceremonies of consecration. At its most basic it takes the form of a vessel used for burning incense or aromatic herbs as part of a ceremony. Generally the liao used as part of the consecration is added to the material burnt in the item and the resultant fumes inhaled - some mystics will also pour any potion they are using into the flames.

A priest who uses one of these handy talismans is able to create - or remove - significantly more durable auras than normal by using additional liao. In Highguard and Urizen particularly, one of these items may be called a Brazier of Purification, partially in reference to the idea of filling an area with "pure" virtuous power but also in reference to its usefulness in dismantling corrupt or malign auras that may have infused an area. Some specialist Stewards of the Dead combine this regalia with a suitable vestment, such as a Wayfarer's Robe, allowing them to cleanse haunted areas of extremely potent malignancies.

As with almost all priestly regalia, a censer of benediction is often hallowed with an aura that helps the priest to fulfill their chosen role. Popular choices include all those hallows which encourage a priest to rouse, recruit, exalt, or empower other people in the name of Virtue.

Rules

- Form: Talisman. Takes the form of ceremonial regalia.
- Requirement: You must have the dedication skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: When you perform or cooperate with the performance of the consecration skill, you may spend up to three additional doses of liao to increase the strength of the ceremony by the same amount.
- Materials: Crafting a Brazier of Benediction requires seven measures of ambergelt, seven ingots of green iron, five ingots of orichalcum, and eight measures of dragonbone. It takes one month to make one of these items.

Performing a Ceremony

- Every ceremony requires ten seconds of appropriate roleplaying and a dose of liao to perform
- Most ceremonies involve the creation or removal of roleplaying effects
- Priests can cooperate to make roleplaying effects more difficult to remove
- All ceremonies require the presence of a referee

Each of the eight religious skills can be used to perform a ceremony. All ceremonies require ten seconds of appropriate roleplaying and one dose of liao for each participant. Most ceremonial skills involve the creation or removal of roleplaying effects, that can affect an area, character or item.

Priests can work together to perform most ceremonies, to strengthen the effect and make it harder to remove. Each priest who participates in a ceremony must have the relevant skill and must consume one dose of liao. A priest may only support another priest if they are dedicated to the same virtue as that priest or if they are not dedicated to any virtue.

Religious skills do not require touch, but do require you to be close enough to touch the target. If there are multiple participants, they must be close enough to touch the target or another participant.

Selecting Roleplaying Effects

- The roleplaying effects of a ceremonial skill are determined by the virtue of the lead priest

Anointing, hallow and consecrate allow a character to create roleplaying effects on a person, item and area respectively. The roleplaying effect created is determined by the virtue of the priest who is performing the ceremony, or by the priest leading the ceremony if more than one priest is participating.

Some ceremonial skills provide a number of different roleplaying effects that can be created. In this case the lead priest must choose one of the roleplaying effects from those available for their virtue.

The roleplaying effects that can be created by the seven virtues are:

- Ambition
- Courage
- Loyalty
- Pride
- Prosperity
- Vigilance
- Wisdom

Dedication, anointing, consecration and hallow create effects that depend on the virtue dedication of the priest leading the ceremony. Characters who are not dedicated to one of the seven virtues cannot lead such a ceremony but they may always contribute to make the effect harder to remove. They may perform other ceremonies normally.

Duration

- Consecration and hallowing effects created with ceremonial liao will last until the next PD event
- Anointing effects created with ceremonial liao will last until the next morning
- Roleplaying effects created with true liao last indefinitely
- Any ceremonial roleplaying effect can be removed by an exorcism of equal strength
- Any ceremonial roleplaying effect can be replaced by another effect of the same type of higher strength

Anointing

If an anointing ceremony is performed by members of a sect who both share a virtue, and possess the anointing skill, then they may cooperate to achieve a more powerful outcome. The strength of the ceremony produced is equal to the number of participants who have the skill being used - but only one participant needs to consume a dose of liao to achieve the result. To participate in a ceremony using the power of the sect bond, all participants must be part of the same sect, share a virtue and possess the skill.

The insight ceremony will reveal the presence of an active anointing.

The recipients of an anointing, will receive a card with the roleplaying effects printed on it and the strength of the anointing. You can keep this card until the next morning to remind you of the effects that your character is under.

Consecration

- Consecration creates an aura, a roleplaying effect that covers a small area

Consecration can be used to consecrate an area to a virtue. It creates an aura, a roleplaying effect that affects everyone who enters the area.

Consecration is most effective when used on a tent, building or clearly demarcated area. The aura affects everyone who comes within 15 feet of the point where the consecration was performed. Multiple consecrations can be used to affect the entirety of a larger tent or structure if required.

Hallowing

- Hallow creates a roleplaying effect on a magical item
- Hallow can only be performed on items that have a special item ribbon

Hallowing allows a priest to bless an item to turn it into a simple relic dedicated to their virtue. The hallow creates a roleplaying effect on the item which affects any character that is bonded to the item and using it in the appropriate way for that type of magical item.

Characters who are bonded to a hallowed item will receive a hallowed item card that describes the roleplaying effects that they are experiencing.

Cerulean Mazzarine

Description

The deep blue flowers of this delicate plant resemble butterflies. So perfect are the blooms that they trick other butterflies into alighting on them and thus help to pollinate the plant. It favours warm, dry environments and is most common in the wild around the Bay of Catazar, growing equally well in the orchards of the Brass Coast, on the lower slopes of Urizen, and in the gardens of Sarvos. It has thick, fleshy leaves that produce a numbing sap with analgesic properties.

Rules

- Can only be applied by a character with the physick skill.
- Using 30 seconds of appropriate roleplaying the physick can restore a limb that has been cleaved or impaled.
- The herb use fails if you or your target are hit or attack another character during application, but the herb is not consumed

Chain around my leg

Kellek nodded, but he was not really listening. The Freeborn woman opposite him poured some of the Imperial Roseweald out onto the wooden table between them, prattling about the fine quality of herbs straight from the Spice Gardens of Feroz. Her eyes roved over his face as she tried to judge his mood. He was breathing slowly and rhythmically, in through his nose and out through his mouth, and she was trying to work out what that meant.

What it meant was that he was desperately fighting the urge to kill her, to take her herbs, and to run for the woods. It was taking almost his entire will to stop himself acting on this instinct, to ignore the frenzied, terrified voice just over his left shoulder that only he could hear. Run, it said. Take the herbs and run, run, run.

"I think, Faria, that this is not the best time for this discussion." he said forcing his voice to stay even, doing his best not to betray the rage and terror surging through his blood.

She opened her mouth to say something, and something shifted inside him. The shadows in the tent rolled in like stormclouds and for a moment he was in two places at once. One Kellek sat at the bargaining table negotiating the purchase of herbs. The other stood in freezing water up to his chest, the green canvas of the tent replaced by a rough rock surface just above his head. The waters were rising, and there was no way out. There were other orcs here as well, orcs he could barely make out, trapped in the water with the air running out and the absolute certainty that there was no way out and nobody to remember how they died. For a moment he knew their names, with a cold and detached clarity, and then it was all gone and he was only one Kellek again.

He jerked, suddenly, knocking his goblet flying, and the vision was gone. Faria i Padema i Riqueza looked concerned. Her worry gave him a flash of irritation...

... and just like that it roared through him. Blood burning rage, bone-deep hate, stomach-churning loss and fear and despair, and a desperate, impotent thirst for vengeance that he could never slake. He knew these were not his emotions, but he could do nothing to control them. He launched to his feet, tossing the trestle table to one side as he stood, scattering crimson herbs and money in all directions.

"Where were you?" he bellowed. "Where were your people when they were selling our children like sheep? Where were you when they left us to drown in the mines because it was easier to buy more slaves than rescue them?"

It felt good to say it. The detached part of him, the part full of clarity, recognised that this was not just the power of the ancestors in him. This was his own rage, his own hate, his own despair, his own need for answers. He'd been blind to the truth, before the magic and the drumming had opened them and made him look directly at things he had tried all his life not to see, to hear clearly the voices he had tried all his life not to hear.

Faria fell back, terrified. Kellek felt rather than saw Mord and Sakkia closing in, grabbing him, pulling him back. If they had not been there, he would have killed this woman - this woman he had known for twenty years.

"Where were you when we were born in darkness, and worked until we dropped, and died in darkness, and we were throw away like so much forgotten rubbish?" he howled. "Where were you?"

His rage collapsed in on itself, turning into a ball of all-consuming sorrow that pulled everything into it and let nothing else escape. He collapsed, and his friends caught him.

He heard Mord calmly and politely telling the Riqueza merchant that it was really not a good time, and perhaps she should come back in the morning. She nodded, pale faced, clearly scared, and backed away. As she lifted the tent flap, the rhythmic thunder from the fighting pit became louder for a moment, each beat of the drums like a nail driven into Kellek's temples.

When the human woman was gone, the madness went out of him. He slumped back down on the bench with his head in his hands. Sakkia sat on one side of him and Mord on the other, body to body, and none of them said anything for quite some time.

- 1 Overview
- 2 Revelation

This season both Imperial Orcs armies are resting in Casinea. While the Summer Storm resupply and recover from their recent engagements against the barbarian orcs, the Winter Sun are engaged in much more esoteric pursuits.

During the Autumn Equinox a powerful enchantment was laid over venerable general Mor'gur. A spontaneous Day magic ritual created by the Skywise, and woven by the magicians of Urizen, using the inscribed skull known as Defiance as a focus, it is intended to make it easier for the orcs to hear their ancestors.

During the day the soldiers of the Winter Sun drill and practice and maintain their weapons, their armour, and their tents. At night they gather together to tell stories and meditate on the nature of worth and those who have gone before. Many seek communion in impromptu fighting pits, or make the pilgrimage to Anvil to use the pit built there long ago by the first Imperial Orcs. The nature of the magic used, drawing as it does on the realm of Day, is often at odds with the ceremonies of the orcs and the shaman. Loud drumming, dancing, and fighting are ideal for getting the blood pumping and drawing the attention of the ancestors but they are anathema to the rationality and calm of the realm.

Still, the magic of the Day realm has a resonance for focus, and most importantly for revelation and clarity. Although, it must always be born in mind that receiving a revelation, seeing with absolute clarity, is not necessarily a comfortable or comforting experience.

Revelation

At first it is not clear whether it is the magic of the enchantment on the general, or simply the fact that the orcs have come together in large numbers to focus on the voices of their ancestors. Regardless, during the three months they spend in Casinea, the Winter Sun find it easier to the voices that are the birthright of all orcs. This is, to put it mildly, a mixed blessing. The focus of the ritual - Defiance - is a relic made by slaves to keep their memories alive, and it is these memories that flood through a Winter Sun who have opened their spirits wide.

Gather around the fires, bring your items of worth and take up song. Honour the memory of the fallen, may they find their way. Know that they are with the ancestors now and may it trouble you no longer. May we heal our wounds and cleanse the hardship of battle. Not just from the Body but of the Spirit. May the bond of our ancestors be renewed as we stare across the abyss. Do not fear the darkness, listen to those that have come before you and closely for our brothers and sister, and perhaps the father of our freedom. As we gather our strength resupplying may the next time battle comes the ancestor march at our side.

General of the Winter Sun

The Anger of Chains

It is the voices of the slaves who lived and died as the property of Imperial citizens that the Winter Sun orcs hear when they listen to the void. The majority of soldiers in the Winter Sun are descended from those slaves who lived and died in Varushka, in Temeschwar, and in Wintermark - which at that time included Skarsind as well of course. Many of the orc soldiers weep openly when they consider that the homeland they now claim was built, at least in part, on the suffering of their ancestors. It is a sobering reminder that the mines of Skarsind were dug and worked by orc slaves just as much as the mines of Varushka.

In some cases, orcs experience visions - waking dreams in which they experience for a moment a flash of someone else's life. These visions are most common among orcs who handle Defiance, or who have been in close proximity with it at any point since its recovery. Even more than the voices, the visions are deeply unpleasant. They are an intimate reminder of what it is to be a slave.

Oh, surely some humans treated their slaves better than this - some did not starve them for minor infractions of draconian rules, some did not flog them, some did not leave them to suffocate or die of thirst behind rock falls, some did not tear their children and their mates and their brothers and sisters away from them on a whim to sell them to other humans. But there are no memories here of such humans, only memories of hate, and fear, and sobs of vengeance in the dark. It is, unsurprisingly, a harrowing experience

Some orcs disengage immediately, unprepared to deal with the tumult of anguish, hate, and sadness that these voices bring with them. Others embrace the revelation, seeking to find a greater understanding of where they came from. Those orcs with the spirits of shaman have no choice - they are incapable of shutting out the angry, shouting voices and some have to be restrained for their own safety - and the safety of others.

Some of the slave-voices are more powerful than others, more coherent. These ancestors want two things from their descendants. First, freedom. They hate and in some cases fear humans and urge their descendants to forge their own lives away from them; they do not understand that the orcs are free now. Secondly, they want vengeance. Revenge on the humans who hurt and killed them and their people, who used them as tools and left them to die in the dark.

This handful of voices are clear and coherent, it is true, and they may even be strong enough to carry the Imperial orcs across the Howling Abyss. Yet they will never do so while they live in the Empire.

Quieter Voices

While the majority of voices heard strongly during the harrowing three months are those of the orcs who spent four hundred years and more as slaves of the Empire, they are not the only ones. The enchantment woven with the aid of Defiance has at least partially made it easier to hear some of the oldest ancestors, those from before the time their descendants were enslaved.

These voices, too, are angry. Among the orcs of the Winter Sun most of the voices who can be recognised seem to be from the Thule or Jotun tribes. They alternately rage and are disappointed with their descendants; they have no identity of their own and they are servants of humans who are not "worthy" of that service.

A few focus on these ancestors and try to forge a connection with them but for the most part they are scattered, and angry, and confusing. Unlike the connection with Sjofn, forged from her axe of worth, there is no link to be drawn on. Those who already had a connection to one of their barbarian ancestors are able to focus on it, and strengthen it a little, but they must still deal with the chorus of dead slaves that threaten to drown them out.

Defiance has no strong connection to the orcs who came after the time of Thrace. There are a handful of exceptions - some orcs report hearing the voices of dead companions who had participated in the various pilgrimages lead by the skull since its discovery.

Consequences

Any Imperial Orc whose military unit supported the Winter Sun this downtime has a profound spiritual experience. Any other Imperial Orc who has a connection with the Winter Sun, or has spent time in Casinea this downtime, may have shared some of this experience, depending on their roleplaying. All such orcs experience a powerful roleplaying effect: You are haunted by the voices of angry slaves. At inopportune moments (when it is most dramatic) they will loudly urge you to either strike down or flee from any nearby humans. This effect is particularly pronounced if you spend a hero point.

It is not possible to overcome this roleplaying effect by spending a hero point. Attempting to do so, unfortunately, just makes the voices of the ancestors louder and more insistent.

If you are a character with the shaman archetype, this effect is even more pronounced. You are constantly being urged to escape from or take vengeance on humans. This is particularly strong near characters who are clearly Varushkans, Winterfolk, or Temeschwari (if you can identify such). Whenever you are in their presence you feel a very strong urge to flee, or to attack.

The roleplaying effect will have faded by the end of the Winter Solstice, although shaman in particular may wish to bear it in mind in future when interacting with the people who enslaved hundreds of generations of their ancestors.

Players who participated in this experience are encouraged to create ancestors of their own - slaves with strong personalities - and may continue to hear their urgings long after the roleplaying effect has faded. It is also acceptable for a participant to feel a stronger connection to a named barbarian ancestor, or to an Imperial Orc player character who has died since the beginning of the campaign.

Defiance

At the end of the season, the voices become a little quieter but the effects do linger a little. There is one final unexpected consequence of the ritual and the enchantment. Over the course of the season, the skull Defiance slowly loses its power. By the start of the Winter Solstice, it is nothing more than a mundane skull - albeit one with considerable worth. OOC Note: The player with Defiance should bring it down to GOD before going in-character to replace the ribbon.

Hammers and Chains

Despite the turmoil and wrath, some of the soldiers of the Winter Sun gain strength from the experience, and from the voices of their enslaved ancestors. Some swear oaths to ensure that the evil of slavery - evil they have experienced first hand - is wiped from the earth. They quote Bloodcrow Ergot, whose judgement in the Imperial Orcs assembly said that

"prosperity must not come at freedom's price." Many of these orcs carve medallions of bone or wood in the shape of hammers which they wear as totems, in remembrance both of the tools their ancestors used to break rocks and of the hammers used ultimately to break their chains.

During the Winter Solstice, the general of the Winter Sun will be called upon to submit their orders. If, during these orders, they encourage their soldiers to embrace the revelation they have received then their soldiers will continue to pursue the voices of their enslaved ancestors - and permanently change the Winter Sun quality.

The general will need to provide a total of 25 wains of weirwood and/or mithril.

The direct consequence will be that the quality of the Winter Sun will permanently change to Freedom Fighters, and the general will gain an additional option. As well as being able to submit the Hit and Run order, they will be able to submit the Break the chains attacking order.

In the long run, soldiers of the army will be less comfortable around human armies from Varushka, Wintermark, and the League - but they are disciplined enough to ensure that there are no significant incidents if they are required to fight alongside the descendants of the people who once kept them as chattel.

Break the chains

- Your side must control a region with the forested, hilly or marsh keyword.
- Casualties suffered by this army are decreased by three tenths.
- Casualties inflicted by this army are decreased by a fifth.

The army uses their mastery of wilderness survival to outmaneuver enemy advances, and make contact with local forces that share their enemies. They free slaves and prisoners, seek the support of rebels and bandits, and sabotage labour camps and prisons alike. Allies are helped to reach camps in defensible locations, shown hidden paths, and the like. The army avoids pitched battles, and focuses on gaining allies among subject populations, some of whom join the army as fresh recruits.

Limited Opportunity

The ability to change the quality of the Winter Sun is only available during the Winter Solstice event.

Challenge the Iron Duke

Rules

Summer Magnitude 30

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 10 minutes of roleplaying. During the ritual the casters must be in a strong Summer regio. The target character must be present throughout.

As part of the performance, the ritualists must create a written challenge detailing exactly who the target is. The proclamation is destroyed as part of the ritual (OOO Note: The proclamation, or a copy, should be given to the referee.)

Effects

This ritual challenges the eternal Barien, binding him to provide a challenge to the target. If the challenge is overcome, Barien offers a reward to the target commensurate with the difficulty and nature of the challenge.

The ritual binds Barien to provide a challenge to a given character only once. Characters who cheat during a challenge arranged by the Iron Duke are likely to make the Eternal angry, and he is capable of cursing those who transgress the rules of a challenge he has set down.

Whatever the outcome, the result of the challenge becomes known among all the eternals of Summer.

Additional Targets

Additional characters can be targetted be effected by the ritual, as long as they are members of the same band. Each additional target increases the magnitude of the ritual by 5. The challenge Barien delivers, and the reward he provides, will assume that all characters targetted by one casting of the ritual will face it together. All targets must be present throughout the performance of the ritual.

OOO Elements

The proclamation created and used during the ritual is given to a referee, and used to target the ritual.

It may take some time for Barien to arrange a challenge, but a herald is likely to be dispatched on his behalf to accept the challenge within a day or so. The Iron Duke selects challenges that are difficult, but never impossible - it is his nature to test targets, not to trick or destroy them. Challenges often involve fighting, but this is not a requirement. Barien's heralds will often seek out other player characters to serve as the adversaries for characters involved in this ritual challenge.

Description

Barien is known as the Iron Duke, and the arbiter of worth. It is his nature to identify and recognise those who have overcome challenges. He possesses many treasures that he can loan or give to challengers who answer his challenge, and other boons that may be even more valuable. Further, once someone undergoes the challenge to Barien, other Summer eternals are soon made aware of the outcome and this may permanently influence how they react to the characters involved,

The ritual binds Barien to provide a challenge to a given challenger only once. After someone has challenged him through this ritual, he may decline to offer a challenge if it is performed a second time, although in such a case the eternal usually sends a herald to tell the challenger or the ritualists his decision. Indeed, Barien does much of his work in preparing the challenge through his heralds, and prefers to get other mortals to provide obstacles for the challengers rather than to rely on purely supernatural sources of opposition. It is not unknown for two mortals or bands of mortals who have both been targeted by the ritual to find themselves pitched against each other, or against a slightly stronger force of mortals with whom they have a connection - Barien often uses his heralds and discussions with magicians to determine ironic or obviously suitable challenges based on what he can learn about the challengers.

On several occasions a Dawnish enchanter who has been approached to provide a Test of Mettle or Test of Ardour has instead made meeting and defeating the challenge of the Iron Duke the heart of the Test. This is often seen as a sign of respect for the petitioner, and Barien takes such challenges extremely seriously. It is one of the few circumstances where the Duke might become involved personally with the challenger.

An Urizen stagazer by the name of Caellia of Clearwater made a close study of this ritual and several others like it. She argued convincingly that it is actually no different to Missive for Sadogua - it simply creates a conduit between the ritualists and the eternal, and allows for a transfer of information. It could theoretically be cast for a single crystal of mana. However, the ritual has been intentionally designed to be much higher magnitude, and she theorised that this was partly to bind the Eternal to an agreed-on pact, and partly to provide power that Barien could then use to create a challenge.

While the ritual is popular in Dawn, it also has obvious appeal to many Winterfolk, adventurous Freeborn and legions of Imperial Orcs looking for an opportunity to 'prove' themselves. Some Highborn who understand the ritual are torn between a general suspicion of the eternal and the Highborn love of competition; after all, this ritual is tailor-made to allow a clever mortal to pit their wits against an eternal and show what humans are truly made of.

Common Elements

The proclamation of challenge is a vital element in this ritual. It is often prepared on a scroll and read by the challenger at the end of the ritual. Other common elements involve stories and songs of glorious or heroic deeds, girding the challenger with arms and armour, or anointing the target with oil, blood or wine. Banners and flags are often used, as are heraldic themes, the sounding of horns, and on some occasions, the ritual is used at the beginning of a tourney in the hope that Barien will deliver some sign of the challenge by the end of the tourney.

Any or all of the Summer runes might be evoked, depending entirely on the nature of the targets.

"The first time was for love - if you can believe that! Faced some Marcher lad with arms like tree-trunks, swinging a great mattock thing around like it didn't weigh anything. Funny you only think to be scared once you're actually in there with some big bastard looming over you, eh? He should've won it, too, but he got careless and slipped, and I wasn't about to let him have the chance to knock any more of my teeth out! In at him with my axe - bet that left a mark that still stings come Winter! After all that, the girl I was mooning over ended up running off with my best friend, ain't love grand?"

The second time was a matter of pride. I'd taken a bad wound campaigning up around Skoura (no, you won't find it in the history books, "never happened" so they say), and I'd been laid up for weeks afterwards, and limping a bit beyond that. Anyway, word was out that I wasn't fit for duty no more, so I spent all my savings challenging old Barien again. I guess he remembered me from last time, because he sent out some ... thing ... Not rightly sure what it was, but it was damn tough. Luckily I'd got a good few years of free company work under my belt by this point, and though my sword snapped off in it, I got me this better one in return, aye, and all the work I could ask for as well.

The third time, that was just plain foolishness. "Top of my game", I thought, "I can handle anything old Iron Britches throws at me, no problem". Think of it, beating old Barien three times in a row! Course, this time the challenge was to steal a hat from every Imperial general. As you can plainly see, Magistrate, that one didn't go so well..."
- Testimony of Ilsa Van Der Holberg, two time victor of the Iron Duke's challenge

Chamber of Delights

Rules

Night Magnitude 8

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual is most effective when used on a tent or room, where the location aura automatically expands to fill the interior space. If the ritual is performed in an open area, then the space must be clearly defined and no more than 40' across at most. It must be absolutely clear to anyone whether they are inside an enchanted area or not. If for any reason the boundaries shift or move significantly, then the enchantment collapses prematurely.

This spell is an enchantment. A target may only be under one enchantment effect at a time. This is also a location aura. A target may only be under the effect of one aura at a time.

Effects

This ritual enchants an area with a potent aura. Anyone who enters the area becomes aware of (and subject to) the aura, and experiences a powerful roleplaying effect: they feel relaxed, happy and perhaps even a little drugged; pressing concerns are easy to set aside for later. They feel an urge to indulge themselves, and luxuriate in pleasurable sensations. It is easy to fall asleep in this area, and anyone who does is likely to experience vivid, pleasant dreams and awaken refreshed.

The Chamber of Delights can provide a source of supernatural strength to anyone in the area, allowing them to overcome an unwanted roleplaying effect. This ability requires the character to roleplay being relaxed and happy, and to remain in the area. If they leave, the unwanted roleplaying effect returns assuming it has any duration left.

A character who engages in at least fifteen minutes of relaxed roleplaying in this location aura recovers all lost personal mana. There is no effect if the character is on a battlefield or in a similar stressful environment. If the character makes or suffers an attack during this time, or spends any personal mana, then the fifteen minutes is interrupted and must be begun again from scratch. This magic is not sufficient to allow recovery of personal mana to any character who is under an effect that prevents recovery of mana overnight - most obviously, it will not help someone who is under the effect of Dreamscape of the Endless Hunt or similar curses.

This enchantment is a location aura, similar to that created using the consecration ceremony. A location can only be under one aura at a time. This ritual will replace any standard location aura (including those created by similar rituals), but is not powerful enough to remove a durable location aura. Likewise, any consecration can replace (or remove) this enchantment. A detect magic spell performed in the area determines the realm and magnitude of the effect. The insight skill will not detect any spiritual element to the enchantment.

The effect lasts until the start of the next Profound Decisions Empire event.

Description

This ritual creates an enchanted aura that evokes feelings of relaxation and restful indulgence, similar to those that surround some eternals of the Night realm. It is commonly used to prepare areas that encourage relaxation and recreation. Some Freeborn parador, for example, have a location specifically set aside for invoking this ritual, where visitors relax, eat, drink and chat languidly. Many naga find these enchanted areas especially soothing, and enjoy holding long indulgent feasts in them, or simply engaging in lazy gossip while sipping cool drinks.

The Chamber of Delights can be made permanent with ilium but this is almost always done inside a building rather than in a tent or other fragile structure - simply because it is too easy to cause the enchantment to collapse by shifting the boundaries of the aura. Magicians theorize that an ilium-infused enchantment such as this would be especially durable. They speculate that in addition to the usual resistance to replacing such an enchantment with an enchantment not also infused with ilium, removing or replacing the aura with the consecration ceremony would only work if the priests involved used true liao. The reticence of the Synod to "waste" true liao on magical experimentation has meant that there is no definitive proof either way.

Like The Solace of Chimes and The Chamber of Pallas, The Chamber of Delights creates an aura similar to, but distinct from, the kind of aura a priest can create with the ceremony of consecration. Most obviously, it is not created using liao (and has no spiritual component that might be examined with the insight ceremony). Rather than being drawn from the Labyrinth or the spiritual strength of humanity, it is a construct made using magic. The strength of the aura does not vary; it is not possible to create a durable aura through the use of this ritual. Some magicians speculate that it might be possible to make a similar ritual of a higher magnitude that would be more resistant to removal - in the same way that priests can cooperate and invest additional liao to create a stronger consecration.

There are some priests who are quite skeptical of this ritual. They claim that it somehow invokes a false virtue, or even a malign spiritual presence. It encourages inaction rather than action, self-indulgence rather than Virtue. Some magicians have even used auras such as these to support spurious claims that the ceremonies used by priests of the Way are just magic. Worse, they have even been used to found small cults based around the idolatrous worship of eternal. Scholars of magic, especially those associated with the Sevenfold Path have demonstrated repeatedly that while consecrations and enchantments such as these share some similarities, they are different on a profound level. In practice, most priests tend to treat The Chamber of Delight much as they would any other enchantment - it influences the minds of mortals, through magic. It may be a useful tool, or a test for the faithful, but the context in which it is encountered is the most important thing. Indeed, some priests dedicated to Prosperity encourage the use of the Chamber of Delights - after all, it is virtuous to celebrate and enjoy the deserved rewards of hard work and this enchantment encourages everyone to enjoy themselves (provided, of course, there has been some hard work to celebrate ...)

The ritual is known and used by people across the world by many different names. Only in the Sumaah Republic and Iron Confederacy is its use monitored or proscribed. Imperial magicians speculate that it should be possible to create similar enchantments in the Summer, Spring, and even Winter realms although no such rituals are currently part of Imperial lore.

Common Elements

This ritual is designed to create feelings of relaxation and pleasure. It is often performed with relaxing music, especially the sound of stringed instruments. Soothing incense is often burnt, and where possible the area is dressed in deep, luxurious colours and decorated with patterns designed to help relax the mind (mandalas, depictions of the runes of Night and so on). Decorations and beautiful ornaments are often scattered around the area, and both cushions and thick carpets are common. Invocations are almost invariably performed in quiet voices, and may involve participants sitting or lounging rather than standing.

The rune Zorech is often evoked with this ritual.

Champion's Bastion

Description

A warrior who can withstand mighty blows can fight for longer. A champion's bastion is often of alloyed green iron and steel, inlaid with weltsilver designs. The more active a warrior wielding this shield is on a battlefield, the more the field repays that action by granting them vigour and helping them shrug off minor wounds.

The history of this item is fiercely disputed, with the Highborn and the Dawnish both claiming it as their development. It certainly predates the Empire; carvings in the Necropolis tomb of Miriam the Strong, a Highborn hero of the Patrician War, appear to show her gaining strength from her glowing shield after striking down her enemies. Her shield, War's Reward, was stolen from her tomb in the early years of the Empire, and has long-since disappeared from Imperial history, but its depiction of a unicorn and a pegasus rampant is widely known among Highborn historians. If the shield still exists, it would be an artefact of remarkable worth, not least as the oldest known example of a Champion's Bastion.

Ironically, the grounds for this claim are the source of the dispute with the Dawnish, who claim that Miriam was a Dawnish Noble who travelled to Highguard to aid Permion's rebellion. The evidence for this is largely a folk tradition in Dawn, but as with many troubadours' tales, the Dawnish regard it is as just as true as the glory in it.

This shield is generally found in the possession of those with a passion for battle beyond even other warriors. Warlords of the Imperial Orc legions value these shields, usually boldly decorated with their legion's symbol, as a means of staying upright for longer to inspire their followers in battle. Some hear particularly loud bursts of ancestral whispering while using the shield, believing it invigorates their souls along with their bodies. The Dawnish similarly bear these shields with heraldic decoration. Some very wealthy Knightly Orders strive to bestow one of these shields upon every new member, bearing the order's heraldry. It is sometimes called Glory's Reward as it rewards glorious actions with renewed strength and harks back to the name of Miriam the Strong's shield. It can lead to over-confidence. One knight is famously recorded as saying, just prior to the battle where she was hacked apart by a dozen orcs, "Give me Glory's Reward and a bucket of Errant's Wine, and I'll slay the lot myself."

In Dawn, the Gryphon runes are commonly used as a set upon these shields, along with depictions of griffons about to strike. Elsewhere, particularly in Wintermark, firebird imagery is used, invoking its strength of spirit and fabulous healing powers.

Rules

- Form: Talisman. Takes the form of a full-sized shield. You cannot make a magic buckler. You must be wielding this shield to use its magical properties.
- Requirement: You must have the shield skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: Whenever you spend a hero point you regain one lost hit immediately afterward.
- Materials: Crafting a champion's bastion requires seven ingots of green iron, five ingots of tempest jade and five ingots of weltsilver. It takes one month to make one of these items.

The scop was holding court in a raucous corner of the tavern. He had an audience of drinkers all over the Empire, but his attention was on three: a Marcher, a Dawnish knight and most particularly on the hero of his Hall. She'd recently returned from Skarsind. The Imperial army had lost, and his job was to drag crumbs of glory out of defeat, to fire the citizens of Empire to the challenge of battles to come.

"Shield-guarded glory-tall, legend, tho' stature-small, Great Kiri! Axe-maid! The best of our hall!"

Two foes she faced alone, turn-swings she cut one down, left his skull axe-cleaved, and turned to the next

*Down swung his mighty axe, leaving the lime-wood cracked.
She's hurt. She rises! she back-handed hacks!"*

Not bad, he thought as he smashed a tankard towards the next table to punctuate the end of the line. He raised his arm to Kiri:

"Blood-slick that deadly glade, death for orc foe-man made, Giant she stood there, bestriding the field!"

They're laughing now. He's got them, he knows, but always leave them wanting more and that knight's Troubadour is tuning up on the next table.

*He'd something in his mind about the shield that Arte had made her. "Sturdy-light lime-wood board, bastioned with tempest jade, Green-iron girded and welt-silver-wired!" or something like that. A bit literal for a tavern-song, really.
Best keep it for the Hall. He can feel he'll be asked for a verse about this next time his Hall gathers to remind themselves they are all heroes, and their legends will live forever.*

"Axe-ready glory-torn, Wintermark newly-born, bonded like sword-edge, a nation for war.

Ice-crafty Suaq-scouts, Steinr-line weapons high, storm-crows amongst us, wise Kallavesi.

*First Empress came to us, Wisdom she spoke to us
Empire like thanes-hall, nine nations as one.*

Soul-singing, gathered here, heroes of Kolti's hall!

These are our stories, they say who we are."

Champions Shining Resolve

Rules

Summer Magnitude 16

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets a character, who must be present throughout.

This spell is an enchantment. A target may only be under one enchantment effect at a time.

Effects

The target gains two additional hero points.

The target also experiences a roleplaying effect: You feel an urge to demonstrate your prowess to everyone, and have a sense that you can achieve anything you set your mind to.

An Imperial Orc target experiences an additional roleplaying effect: you are more likely to hear your ancestors while under this enchantment.

The effect lasts until the start of the next Profound Decisions Empire event.

Additional Targets

This ritual can affect additional characters from the same banner. Each additional character increases the magnitude by 12. Additional characters must be present throughout.

Option

Any caster who has mastered the ritual may choose to substitute Green Iron for crystal mana when contributing to it. Every 2 ingots of Green Iron spent counts as 1 crystal mana when contributing to the ritual.

Description

Great deeds - if not necessarily heroic deeds - are at the heart of the Summer Realm. This ritual functions a little like the empower incantation, but is even more versatile. As with crafted items such as the Triumphant Blade or a suit of Runeplate it is most effective when it is used to enchant someone who either already possesses a reserve of passion and heroic drive, or who is armed with a Butcher's Cleaver or similar item that can be 'powered' by the ritual.

Even without other uses, the ability to steel the will and resist outside influences is sometimes useful in its own right; anyone can benefit from the ability to overcome malign spiritual forces, even if it is only for a short time.

The name of the ritual is the subject of some controversy. Some magicians claim it is Champion's Shining Resolve, intending it to be used on one or two glorious and heroic warriors. Other magicians claim it is Champions' Shining Resolve, meaning it is most appropriate to use it on multiple warriors so that all can benefit. The Highborn and Urizen magicians who make a study of such things suggest that one can learn something about one's peers by asking them what they think the ritual is called.

Common Elements

This ritual often involves anointing the target in some way, often with wine or blood. It may also include a symbolic crowning with green leaves or (especially in The Marches) a circlet of woven corn or grass. The names of heroic individuals (especially powerful ancestors, even for targets who are not themselves Imperial Orcs) or particularly inspirational paragons and exemplars are another common element, as are symbols of Pride.

When green iron is used during the ritual, especially by a Dawnish coven, the ingots are often pressed against and into the weapons and armour of the target, often as part of a formal act of girding the target.

Any of the Summer runes might be evoked, but Feresh, the rune of majesty, is the most common. An evocation of The Stallion or The Oak may be appropriate with this ritual, as may evocations of horses; animals that represent pride or majesty such as eagles or lions; and legendary or heraldic beasts such as gryphons, chimerae and unicorns.

Change Urizen voting

Proposal for changes to the Urizen voting method for senators in the event of a draw.

Should more than two candidates be standing then the candidate with the lowest voting strength will conceded with their votes being recast.

Should it be a draw with no lowest candidate then those previously unable to vote would be granted a voting strength of one.

Overview

- This motion is in two parts; the first part addresses concerns over resolving ties during Senatorial elections.
- The second part gives a vote to those who cannot vote in Urizen senatorial elections.
- Passed unanimously.
- Advised by the Civil Service that the motion may have constitutional implications, or require the agreement of the egregore of Urizen.

Legal Ramifications

- The civil service has clarified the procedure for resolving ties during senatorial elections.
- Attempting to give a vote in the Urizen elections to non-ritualists is unconstitutional. This was struck down by magistrates.

OOC Notes

Given the nature of voting in Empire and the fact that the Empire has been around for hundreds of years, it is difficult to imagine that draws have not occurred frequently over that time. Therefore, it was a design flaw not to notice that the system needed one or more mechanisms for trying to resolve draws, that should have formed part of the campaign setting from the outset - so that detail has been corrected.

In theory, it is perfectly possible to allow the players to try and introduce rules to decide voting ties for each nation as they occur - but in practice that stretches credibility and interest. There isn't, in practice, that much game to be had from determining the mechanisms involved - and it seemed better, on balance to adopt the majority of what the players wanted - a mechanism to move forward when draws happen - and make that part of the setting.

Generally speaking we are keen to discourage players from discussing and attempting to implement significant changes to the voting mechanisms. These mechanisms are part of the game design - and they are designed to be inequitable and unfair - partly to try and enhance the character and flavour of each nation and partly to encourage politics and play. We want players to deal with the problems that the political systems cause - not dismantle and 'fix' the political system itself. It would be trivially easy for us to have written a simple fair one-citizen-one-vote democratic system for the Empire - we spent a lot of time designing the systems that exist instead because we think that ultimately they will produce a more exciting game for people.

For this reason, any attempt to extend voting in Urizen to non-magi was always going to be struck down as unconstitutional. Such a change makes perfect sense - but it removes the strong motivation to play a magician if you are playing an Urizen character, it weakens the setting by removing the emphasis on Urizen magicians as politicians and it reduces the complexity and politics of the game by giving everyone an equal voice, rather than forcing some groups to rely on others for representation.

Election Clarification

In the case of a tie, all save the top two candidates are eliminated and the election is re-run. If the deadlock continues, the election is tied and nobody is elected to the position.

Change of doctrine

Overview

The Doctrines of the Faith are the foundational pillars of the Imperial faith and the Way. They represent the distilled wisdom and knowledge Synod priests across the ages in statements. In essence, the doctrines define the Imperial Religion and the beliefs that it imparts as part of teaching a virtuous life to the citizens of the Empire.

The wilful rejection, or perversion of, the Doctrines of the Faith, or actively teaching and promoting False Doctrines is defined as heresy, which is a religious crime. Consequently, what is, and is not, doctrine and the wording of those doctrines, is an ongoing debate within the Imperial Synod. It is also the means by which definitive answers are provided to settle religious debates and controversies.

Given the significance of doctrine, only the majority support of the General Assembly can add, remove or amend doctrines of the faith. This requires a greater majority of the General Assembly.

"...that I maintain that there is a pressing need for a Doctrine of Inclusionism that will settle the question of the Eternals and their right and proper role in the creation we all share.

Illuminate Cicero, addressing the General Assembly

Judgement

Any member of the Synod may submit a judgement to change doctrine. There is no legal requirement for clarity but the Tribune will encourage a priest to use simple, lucid language that makes the new doctrine clear and to avoid confusion. It is common for a change of doctrine to need a great deal of scrutiny so most priests will choose the final voting deadline of a summit to ensure that there is time for the Synod to discuss the change in detail.

A judgement of veto requires a greater majority to pass.

Outcome

Beware of a door that has too many keys.

If the judgement is successful, then the change of doctrine becomes a formal Marcher Proverb part of the Imperial faith and gains the backing of Imperial law.

If a judgement is rejected, then in theory there is no change of doctrine. Although it does not have any legal standing, such a rejection is often commonly interpreted as a rejection of the virtue and validity of the proposed idea. For example, a failure to change doctrine to recognize that orcs have souls does not legally imply that orcs do not have souls - but will be commonly interpreted as such by many Imperial citizens if the change of doctrine was decisively rejected by the Synod.

Even more so than a statement of principle, a change of doctrine can have significant implications for the Empire, and for followers of the Way across the known world. Due to their shared faith, the priests of the Sumaah Republic pay particular attention to changes of doctrine by the Synod. There are priests who support congregations that follow the Way in many foreign nations, and they tend to look to either the Empire or Sumaah for guidance on religious matters. A significant change of doctrine may be accepted or refuted by priests in other nations, but whatever else happens it will not be ignored.

Changing of the guards

Overview

The Spring Equinox saw many dramatic events unfold in Dawn. There was a tourney to elect the monarch of Dawn, but for the first time in centuries it was contested by two candidates, with nobles rallying round Imperatrix Lisabetta or Yael, the First Empress Reborn. In the end the only significant opposition to Lisabetta was from House Ossienne and their supporters who opposed both candidates. The contest was decisively won by Empress Lisabetta, the Imperial Throne is once more the Monarch of Dawn.

But the tourney has only begun to reveal the depths of the Dawnish affection for their new Queen. At the same summit an extraordinary Statement of Principle was put to the Dawnish National Assembly by Tamain Sepulchre where it passed with a greater majority. News of the statement has rippled across Dawn, carried by wandering troubadours to every noble house. The extraordinary words have inspired many arguments and much fervour - did Tamain really mean what she appeared to say. Now there is a chance to take stock of what that might entail.

Significance

Tamain's words - just as the new Queen is crowned have reminded many of Dawn of their glorious history, of what they once had. Inevitably, it caused a few to ask if they might not have such a thing again?

The Dawnish National Assembly recognises the Empress Lisabetta as Queen of Dawn. She is the ultimate authority in this life and her words should be followed above all others.

Tamain Sepulchre, Dawn National Assembly, Spring Equinox 381YE, Upheld 158 - 20

Crowns

Centuries ago, before Dawn joined the Empire, the Monarch of Dawn was elected much as they are today - by glorious tourney of nobles. But in those times the Monarch was far from a ceremonial position - they commanded the loyalty of their earls and through them they ruled over the land. They were the ultimate authority... their words were followed above all others... That changed when Dawn joined the Empire - but could it be changed back?

On the face of it, it seems absurd. The Imperial legal system does not leave any room for a monarch to actually rule in Dawn. But this is Dawn! - pointing out that the entire thing was completely impossible simply created a challenge. On this occasion the challenge was eagerly taken up by an ambitious young advocate, Melusine of Tanner's Bar in Causse. She has spent weeks criss-crossing Dawn, since the last summit, talking to nobles about her plan... her extraordinary, incredible, glorious idea to make Lisabetta Queen in more than just name...

Melusine's plan rests on one simple idea. While Imperial law does not allow for a monarchy, it does allow for each nation to choose their senators according to their own culture. In Dawn, this "election" has been conducted by a tourney between the noble houses for hundreds of years - but that tradition only built on the existing tradition to elect the Monarch.

Her proposal requires only a subtle change to the existing arrangements. The tourney should be held just as it always has done - but now it will be conducted beneath the eyes of the Queen. The nobles will do battle for her approval - and when the fight is won the Queen will pick the contestant that fought most gloriously. That noble's house will then put forward one of their own to be senator.

A number of people have pointed out that the Empress is likely to be too busy to attend every tourney, but Melusine argues passionately that she shouldn't be expected to. She points out that the same contestants often win the tourney for a territory each year. If nobody is expecting an upset, then the Empress can simply send a representative who can judge the contest in her name. Maybe she will only take an interest if the outcome is in doubt... or if she wishes the outcome to be in doubt...

Melusine has discussed her plan at length with magistrates and civil service. They have confirmed that while this election method would be unorthodox, it is compatible with Imperial Law - provided that it reflected the will of the Dawnish people. The definitive test of the will of a nation is to ask their egregore.

- 4 Old Ways
- 5 Limited Opportunity

Speaking as the egregore, Lady Griffinsbain has confirmed that many in the nation would welcome a step towards a full restoration of Dawn's monarchy, but such views are far from universal. It is one thing to cheer for the new Queen in a tourney, it is quite another to hand her control of Dawn's political authority. Melusine is passionate, but she can hardly convince all of Dawn by herself. Nor would coming to Anvil and convincing everyone there work either - she needs to influence the entire nation and that is only possible with a mandate. Thus she is travelling to Anvil to seek out Tamain to ask her to submit the following mandate.

To achieve glory that rivals the Monarchs of old, our Queen must rule as they once did. We send X with 100 doses of liao to persuade all that she must become the ultimate authority in Dawn, so that we may all grow more glorious together.

Synod Mandate

If this mandate were enacted it would do more than just change Dawn's elections. The Empress already possesses the power to speak to every citizen in the Empire once a season. With the backing of this mandate, those words would become as significant in Dawn as a Statement of Principle passed by the greater majority of their national assembly. They would be as likely as a Statement to create the opportunity in Dawn for a mandate in the following season.

Melusine's proposal already has some powerful backing. The Staff of the Archmage is a powerful magical item that forms part of the regalia of office of the Archmage. A new staff is crafted every year by a secretive weaver's cabal in Weirwater. This cabal, the Five Rings, holds the six schema required to make the staves as part of their most prized possessions. They have always refused all requests to share the schema with the Empire - according to their history the schema were given into their care by King Rodric the last independent King of Dawn. They have held them in trust ever since - but they have told Melusine that if Empress Lisabetta becomes Queen of Dawn in truth as well as just in title - then they will hand them over to the Queen for her to use in service of the nation and the Empire. What she chose to do with the schema could potentially mean the Archmages losing access to one of the symbols of their office - albeit so that any magician could wield one of these powerful ritual staves.

The residents of Castle Spiral have also indicated that if the Queen's words really were the ultimate authority in Dawn, then they would kneel and acknowledge her as their true liege. If the Queen so commanded, then control of the castle's resources would then be passed to the Castellan of Spiral Castle, who could either continue to use the facilities of the Castle to help Imperial armies resupply - or dispose of the supplies of weirwood directly if they preferred.

It is not normally possible for characters to enact a conscious change to a nation's electoral system, even using a mandate. The change is possible in this case, because it is significant but small, is consistent with the themes of the nation, enriches the character of the election process, and reflects a Statement of Principle passed with a greater majority. A Statement of Principle that directly tried to change a nation's electoral system would not result in a mandate unless it was judged to also meet the other criteria mentioned here.

Old Ways

Melusine is not the only Dawnish citizen to respond to these dramatic events by considering some of the older traditions of Dawn. Glory lies at the heart of Dawn, it infects the lives of both noble and yeoman. It has been in the spirit of the nation since before the Empire was founded. But although glory still retains its central importance across Dawn, spiritually it has been somewhat supplanted by the Way of Virtue. Now there is a small but growing group who seek to restore glory to its central role. Like Melusine, they have indicated that they are seeking to gain support so that they can raise a mandate to pursue their goals.

The National Assembly believes that the pursuit of Glory should come before the pursuit of Virtue. We send X with 25 doses of liao to encourage the citizens of Dawn to pursue glory above all other concerns.

Synod Mandate

Every good Dawnish man or woman is already driven to pursue glory, but this exhortation to place it above the pursuit of virtue is new. It is potentially heretical - any who pursue this path risk condemnation at the hands of the Imperial Synod - and the person who raised the judgement might then face prosecution for abetting the act.

But this level of risk is what makes the exhortation challenging and inspiring. If the mandate were enacted, Dawnish folk would be inclined to take any time they have previously spent considering the virtues and devote it instead to the pursuit of glory. This would have two immediate effects - all Dawnish military units would receive a small boost, equal to an extra rank, as people rush to support them. But all Dawnish congregations would suffer an equivalent penalty, as people abandon the Way of Virtue to pursue glory.

Earl du Chailly, one of the people at the heart of this movement, is expected to arrive in Anvil on Friday evening of the Spring Equinox, to discuss the matter with the National Assembly of Dawn.

Limited Opportunity

This opportunities in their current form are available only during the Summer Solstice 381YE.

Icon of the Insightful (Redirected from Chant of Long Years)

Description

An Icon of the Insightful is also known as an icon of the Measured, Icon of the Shrewd, Icon of the Astute, and of course an Icon of the Wise. It allows a priest to perform ceremonies as if they were dedicated to the virtue of Wisdom. It generally takes the form of a piece of religious art, usually depicting a paragon or exemplar of Wisdom such as Zoria or Avigliana. The Icon is not always a portrait, however - in Varushka it often takes the form of a statuette of a squirrel, and is known as a Wise Gatherer. In Wintermark it is sometimes crafted in the form of a medallion or short rod decorated with the bones and feathers of ravens, generally decorated with the Rune of Wisdom, which is known as an Icon of the Raven or an Icon of the Staff. Other less common variants are certainly possible - from the finely written scrolls of the Brass Coast to the clear crystal trapezohedron the Urizen call a White Star.

The icon is equally valuable to a priest who is dedicated to one of the other six virtues as it is to a priest who is dedicated to none of them. It allows them to perform ceremonies such as anointing, consecration, and hallow, and create auras of wisdom in place of the auras they would otherwise have access to. It also allows a priest to cooperate with priests dedicated to Wisdom who are not part of their sect.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of an icon.
- Requirement: You must have the dedication skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: You may perform ceremonial skills other than dedication as if you were dedicated to the virtue of Wisdom.
- Materials: Crafting an Icon of the Insightful requires 5 measures of iridescent gloaming, 7 measures of beggar's lye, and 9 measures of dragonbone; It takes 1 month to make one of these items.

Chants for naughty children

Hey Daddy, if I'm not allowed to sing this because it's rude then why did you start laughing as soon as the lady left the tent?

There are a few children's rhymes in Dawn and The Marches that are very rude and only sung by very naughty children. Expect to get yourself and your parents in trouble if anyone catches you singing this!

To the tune of Freres Jacques.

Dawnish version

Mucky Marcher, mucky Marcher You're no good, you're no good Failed your Test of Mettle, failed your Test of Mettle
Go eat mud, go eat mud!

Marcher version

Dawnish dandy, Dawnish dandy Run away, run away We will do the fighting, we will do the fighting, While you play, while you play!

Exceptionally Naughty Chant about the Dawnish Sung Only By Extremely Bad Children

In dawn we all get up at noon I eat my soup with a silver spoon When I want a cup of tea I clap my hands and it's made for me My seneschal's here to wash my hair I can't go out if he's not there He'll change my bib when there's food in it And he wipes my arse when I take a shit

Chapter

Overview

Most Highborn live in or near one of the chapters, the great walled settlements, that are spread across the plains that surround the river Couros. Each is a fully functional community incorporating families and individuals from all walks of life, who share a common set of beliefs in the form of a creed.

The oldest chapters are among the most heavily fortified, with concentric rings of stone built over the centuries as the settlement has grown. Inside the walls are beautiful stone buildings dressed with marble frescoes depicting scenes of the lives of the paragons or Imperial triumphs. Every chapter has a degree of autonomy, but they are unified by their heritage, their faith and their belief in the Empire.

Chapterhouse

At the centre of each chapter is the chapterhouse, a beautiful edifice constructed of hard granite dressed with white marble. The chapterhouse is a place of devotion, but also the heart of the community. It serves as a meeting hall and storehouse, and as the final line of defence if the chapter is attacked.

The Highborn pride themselves on the strong sense of community within a chapter. They work together and often eat together, meeting daily in the chapterhouse for prayers and to break fast. The people of a chapterhouse are brought about by a shared purpose and belief. There tend to be few social barriers within a chapter as crafters, soldiers, scholars, labourers and priests come together regularly to affirm their bonds of loyalty, or eat together, or celebrate. The tensions within Highguard, where they exist, tend to be between differing chapters whose beliefs and attitudes may conflict.

History

The first chapters were built inside existing fortifications constructed on the borders of Highguard. These chapters carry the burden of protecting the nation against barbarian raids and incursions and include hundreds or even thousands of experienced soldiers. Later chapters were constructed in the interior where there is less need of constant vigil so these tend to include more scholars, philosophers and crafters.

The chapters were born during the Revelation, when the people rejected corruption and hungered for virtue, yet this was a time before the Synod and there were many conflicting views about the nature of virtue and of visions granted by true liao. Each chapterhouse offered the promise of salvation, enlightenment and protection from corruption and wickedness encapsulated in their creed. The nature of a chapter's creed varies but the broad theme was to state the shared beliefs and purpose of the chapter – and how they held to virtue over corruption.

Some chapters held to a single virtue, and some even to a single paragon, such as the Scions of Atun. Others, such as The Illuminated Soul, took a broader approach, welcoming all forms of virtue but requiring those that dwelt there to be transparent in all aspects of their lives so that deception and wickedness had no place to hide. A smaller set focussed their creed on a purpose or calling, for example, the creed of The Arrows of Truth speaks of their calling to hunt and slay dangerous creatures that have escaped the eternal realms. Even in the age of the Imperial Synod, there are chapters who hold that their way of living, their creed, is the equal or superior of the Way, which is for lesser souls.

Charge of the Rushing Wind

Rules

Spring Magnitude 10

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying.

Effects

At the completion of this ritual, all contributors gain the ability to cast the repel spell once as if they knew it and without spending any mana.

When cast with more than one contributor, this ritual always counts as a use of the coven bond and counts towards the number of rituals the coven can perform that day.

The power granted by this ritual lasts until it is used or for ten minutes, whichever comes first.

Description

The Charge of Rushing Winds is a battlefield spell that allows a coven of Spring magicians to drive their opponents before them. Used with care, it allows each of them to exert their ritual mastery to immediate tactical effect. The most common battlefield use is to allow a coven to help break a line of shields, or a charge, or to push enemies out of defensible positions. It is at its most useful when the ritualists are supported by (or are themselves) battlemages and warriors.

The ritual is more powerful the more members of the coven are present, and reaches its highest potential the more ritualists who have not personally mastered the ability to repel their foes through spellcasting.

As the name implies it captures some of the power of the gale-force wind, but it could just as easily be said to harness the power of the river in tumult. Either way, the ritualists are often profoundly aware of the dangerous natural forces they are wielding; their implements often feel as if they might be snatched from their hands at any moment. In some cases, especially if the ritual is performed during turbulent weather, ritualists may find themselves caught in gusts of wind that do not seem to touch others, occasionally stumbling or staggering for no apparent reason.

This ritual has existed in one form or another since the earliest records, and it is likely that the repel incantation itself began as a refinement of the power it grants.

Common Elements

When performing this ritual, the coven often invokes natural forces of wind and water. Clashing, discordant music or thundering rhythms are common. The effect of the ritual itself is violent, so violent movement and loud invocations are normal. A Freeborn coven often combines loud drumming with energetic, whirling dances during which the ritualists violently crash their implements together; a circle of Highborn magisters by contrast may combine slow, irresistible movement with chants or rhythms that begin to speed up as the ritual gathers momentum.

Other elements might include the runes Mawrig or Verys, the evocation of The Claw or The Stallion, a violent stage-fight between two angry characters, or images of horses, bulls or chimerae.

Chasuble of Majesty

Rules

Summer Magnitude 10

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets a character, who must be present throughout. The target character must possess the dedication skill.

This spell is an enchantment. A target may only be under one enchantment effect at a time.

Effects

When the target performs or cooperates in the performance of a religious skill, they may spend up to two additional doses of liao to increase the strength of the ceremony by the same amount.

In addition, they may choose to respond to any roleplaying effect that would cause them to doubt or abandon their cause, philosophy, or beliefs with a declaration of certainty and bolstered commitment.

The effect lasts until the start of the next Profound Decisions Empire event.

Additional Targets

This ritual can affect additional characters from the same sect. Each additional character increases the magnitude by 8. Additional characters must be present throughout.

Description

It is easy to focus solely on the physical and war-like potency of the magic of Summer, but as this enchantment demonstrates there is much more to the Realm than that. This ritual enhances and strengthens the spiritual powers of a priest, allowing them to perform more potent ceremonies through the use of additional liao.

While some priests are concerned about allowing magic to influence them, there are many more who see the strength this ritual can grant in a very positive light. Whether they are creating a potent consecration or exorcising a force of corruption, the usefulness of Chasuble of Majesty cannot be denied. Indeed, the ritual was first used extensively by Highborn magisters, and some religious magicians point to it as proof that magic is another tool for humanity to use in pursuit of its glorious destiny.

The ritual is named for the travelling garment popular among pre-Imperial pilgrims, although it is also commonly called Mantle of Majesty. A roughly oval piece of tough woollen cloth, with a hole in the centre through which to pass the head, falling below the knees on all sides and gathered up on the arms to allow them to be used freely. It became associated with several early Chapters and as the Way spread, so too did the chasuble. While it was eventually replaced by the beautiful robes favoured by high ranking priests today, the chasuble remains popular with some sects, especially among the priests of the Assembly of the Way.

Common Elements

This ritual often incorporates religious imagery of the Imperial Virtues. Some magicians, especially in Wintermark use the seven accepted runes of the faith when they perform the ritual, but others prefer to focus more on symbols of the Way, especially the seven-spoked wheel.

Child protection information

Child protection policy

- Profound Decisions runs Empire LRP events ('the event') on four weekends each year at the Wychavon Live Roleplaying Centre near Honeybourne in Worcestershire.
- The aim of the event is to provide an interactive environment for live roleplayers of all ages to enjoy as individuals, groups or families.
- The event is organised by Profound Decisions Ltd ('the event organiser'), a family run company based in Preston, Lancashire.
- All policies and guidelines relate to children under the age of 18 and vulnerable adults of any age. Prior to the event the event organisers will draw the attention of parents or guardians ('carers') to the latest version of the policy available online for their information. This acknowledges the part they play in partnership with the event organiser in the implementation of a child protection policy.
- Carers of vulnerable adults should inform Profound Decisions of all relevant circumstances surrounding their dependent before arriving at the event.
- The event aims to provide a safe environment for children to enjoy live roleplaying alongside participants of all ages, as far as is reasonable and practicable, but it is not a child care organisation in the full meaning of the Protection of Children Act 1999.
- Carers are reminded that the physical and emotional safety of children together with their belongings remains their responsibility during the event. All carers should ensure that they are familiar with any activities their dependents are engaging in before allowing them to participate.
- All those who assist in running the event are volunteers. They are recruited upon recommendation by those who manage the event as professional people in their own right and/or supporters of the event with good character. The event holds contact details for all personnel, but standard crew are not processed or cleared by the Disclosure and Barring Service (previously called the Criminal Records Bureau).
- After discussion with the DBS, they have informed us that we are not eligible to request DBS checks on crew, as it is not required for the activities we provide. In essence, the new guidelines state that because there is no intention to provide activities to children or vulnerable persons without the presence of a parent or guardian then it is not possible to request a DBS check as this would violate the privacy of our crew.
- When attending the event, carers must ensure that children are adequately supervised by themselves or by another responsible adult acting on their behalf. Our cleared crew will offer to act in this capacity upon occasion as part of their event activities. Our standard crew are not able to provide supervision. Camping areas and toilets are not supervised.
- The event follows a strict non-discrimination policy and all participants are treated equally irrespective of race, gender, religion, physical/mental disability, sexual orientation, age or ethnic origin.
- In the event of a problem, any member of crew may be approached and, if not able to deal with the problem themselves, they will contact somebody who is able to help. All problems will be dealt with sympathetically and discreetly, and will be properly documented where that is appropriate.
- All event crew are familiar with this policy and the guidelines and definitions that follow.
- There are no formal restrictions on photographing the event or participants. Photographers are asked to be discreet to preserve the immersive feel of the event, through application of common sense and following the directions of the event organiser where given.
- This policy is kept under review by the event organiser and will be improved or enhanced from time to time as may be deemed necessary.
- All volunteers working for the event are given access to a copy of this Child Protection Policy with the following Code of Good Practice and Definitions of Abuse. They will pass any concerns to one of the nominated officers (listed at the end of this document), and are expected to observe all the agreed procedures.
- The event organisers will store in an electronic format only the necessary information relating to the administration and operation of the event. This is broadly limited to contact information, game information about the characters an attendee is playing and any declared medical conditions that will be passed to the first aid team.

Code of Good Practice

- Good practice includes valuing and respecting children as individuals and the adult modelling of appropriate conduct. Appropriate conduct excludes bullying, racism, sectarianism, sexism or other forms of discrimination.

- It is important to minimize any physical contact with children who attend the event, beyond what is an essential part of roleplaying activities. Avoid any inappropriate or sexual contact, regardless of the in-character situation.
- You must take all reasonable steps to avoid spending time with a child who is by themselves. If you are supervising children without their carer present, try to ensure that you are working with groups of two or more children at any give time. You should also try to ensure that you are working alongside at least one other cleared crew member. There should be two or more adults in the company of two or more children at all times, as far as is reasonably possible.
- Do not make suggestive or inappropriate remarks to or about a child, even in fun, as these could be misinterpreted.
- Those who abuse children can be of any age (even other children), gender, ethnic background or class. It is important not to allow any preconceptions preventing the appropriate action being taken.
- It is the responsibility of every adult to prevent the physical, sexual or emotional abuse of children and young people wherever they can and to report any actual or suspected abuse that comes to light.

Note - scope for abuse will be minimized if the event is run with the safety of all its members in mind and sensible steps are taken in dealings with children. If an allegation is made, or concerns are raised, they should – with minimum delay – be brought to the attention of one of the persons named at the end of this document.

Definitions of Abuse

The following definitions of child abuse are taken from the HM Government publication “Working Together to Safeguard Children” 2006.

- Physical Abuse. Physical abuse may involve hitting, throwing, poisoning, burning or scalding, drowning, suffocating or otherwise causing physical harm to a child. It may be the result of a deliberate act, but also could be caused through the omission or failure to act to protect.
- Emotional Abuse. Emotional abuse is the persistent emotional ill treatment of a child such as to cause severe and persistent adverse effects on the child’s emotional development. It may involve conveying to children that they are worthless or unloved, inadequate, or valued only insofar as they meet the needs of another person. It may feature age or developmentally inappropriate expectations being imposed on children. These may include interactions that are beyond the child’s developmental capability, as well as overprotection and limitation of exploration and learning, or preventing the child participating in normal social interaction. It may involve causing children frequently to feel frightened or in danger, or the exploitation or corruption of children. Some level of emotional abuse is involved in all types of maltreatment of a child, though it may occur alone.
- Sexual Abuse. Sexual abuse involves forcing or enticing a child or young person to take part in sexual activities, whether or not the child is aware of what is happening. The activities may involve physical contact, including penetrative (e.g. rape, buggery or oral sex) or non-penetrative acts. They may include non-contact activities, such as involving children looking at, or taking part in the production of pornographic material or watching sexual activities, or encouraging children to behave in sexually inappropriate ways.
- Neglect. Neglect is the persistent failure to meet a child’s basic physical and/or psychological needs. It may involve a parent or carer failing to provide adequate food, shelter and clothing, failing to protect a child from physical harm or danger, or the failure to ensure access to appropriate medical care or treatment. It may also include neglect of, or unresponsiveness to a child’s basic emotional needs.

It is important to note that the event involves the context of a live roleplaying game and children may be directly or indirectly exposed to simulated behaviour or themes that could otherwise be of concern. The event organiser places clear responsibility on the carer to ensure that children and vulnerable adults are immediately removed from any situations that concern them. If at any point the event organiser believes that this responsibility is not being followed then they reserve the right to sanction, remove or ban the Carer or child involved from this or future events.

Advice on Responding to an Allegation

The following information is intended to assist you should you become involved in a potential child protection situation:

- Always stop and listen straight away to someone who wants to tell you about incidents or suspicions of abuse, and stay calm. Take what is said seriously: it is rare for children to make false allegations.

- If you can, write brief notes of what they are telling you while they are speaking – these may help later if you have to remember exactly what was said. Keep your original notes however rough: it is what you wrote at the time that may be important later, not a tidier and improved version you wrote up afterwards. If you don't have the means to write at the time, make notes of what was said as soon as possible afterwards.
- Never make a promise that you will keep what is said confidential or secret. If you are told about abuse you have a responsibility to report it so that action can be taken. Give reassurance that only those who need to know will be told.
- Do not ask leading questions that might give your own ideas of what could have happened (e.g. "Did he do XX to you?"), just ask: "What do you want to tell me?" or "Is there anything else you want to say?"
- Allow the child to continue at his/her own pace and reassure the child he/she has done the right thing in telling you.
- Inform the child what you will do next and with whom the information will be shared.
- Never attempt to carry out an investigation of suspected or alleged abuse by interviewing people etc. yourself; you could cause more damage and spoil possible criminal proceedings. That is a task for a professional person working with a Child Protection agency, and would follow a referral from the event's nominated child protection officer.

Nominated child protection officers

The event officers who need to know about any allegation of child abuse and who are responsible for taking any necessary action are:

- Matthew Pennington.
- Alison Pennington.

Children of Thunder

Description

The Children of Thunder are most often a mace and a rod. Bound with green iron and inlaid with tempest jade decoration, these arcane weapons are used to strike powerful blows that drive an opponent away.

According to some artisans, every time the weapon or the implement hits an opponent it stores a tiny portion of the energy used to strike that blow. When needed, the cumulative force is unleashed in a single stroke, hurling the enemy away. Some wielders as a consequence make a habit of striking the children of thunder against solid surfaces before a battle, in the hope that they can "build up a charge", as it were.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. A pair consisting of a one-handed weapon and either a rod or a wand. You must be wielding both the weapon and the implement to use the set's magical properties.
- Requirement: You must have both the ambidexterity and magician skills to bond to these items.
- Effect: You may spend a hero point to call REPEL when you strike with this weapon or rod. You cannot use this ability if you are wearing armour.
- Materials: Crafting the Children of Thunder requires seven measures of dragonbone, seven ingots of tempest jade, and three ingots of green iron. It takes one month to make a pair of these items.

Chimes of Annulment

Rules

Day Magnitude 10

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 5 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets a Druj miasma pillar which must be present throughout.

Effects

This ritual will cause a Druj miasma pillar to be deactivated for one minute.

In the event that all nearby pillars are de-activated at the end of that minute, then the pillar will not re-activate.

OOO Note

This is an extremely specialist ritual, which has limited application during the normal scope of an Empire event. It is designed to specifically counter a single obstacle - the Druj miasma pillars encountered in Reikos - and as such there is no guarantee anyone who masters the ritual will ever actually perform it. However, its inclusion in Imperial lore does mean that the effect can easily be created by any Imperial ritual magician using the spontaneous magic rules, without the need for an arcane projection. It is important to be aware of the very limited scope for using this ritual before choosing to master it - especially in light of the end of the Druj Miasma in Reikos.

Option

Any caster who has mastered the ritual may choose to substitute weltsilver for crystal mana when contributing to it. Every 2 ingots of weltsilver spent counts as 1 crystal mana when contributing to the ritual.

Description

The development of this ritual was overseen by Octavius of the Spire of the Auric Horizon, the Provost of the Halls of Knowledge during the Spring of 379YE; its creation was most likely prompted by a failed attempt to destroy the central miasma focus in Grey Charge during the Spring Equinox. It was added to the body of Imperial lore by declaration of the Imperial Conclave in 379YE.

The ritual focuses purifying the corrupt energies of one of the Druj fear miasma pillars or foci. The "Druj miasma" (as it is colloquially called), was encountered by the Imperial armies engaged in the liberation of Reikos towards the end of 378YE. The armies that entered the barbarian-conquered territory encountered the miasma as a nearly tangible spiritual presence that appeared to hang over the whole of Reikos.

The question of the precise construction of these miasma pillars is one that still remains to be answered – much of the work on creating this ritual was done through extrapolation from the experiences of the Imperial heroes when they attempted to weave spontaneous magic to destroy the pillars in Grey Charge. As near as can be established, the Druj use a combination of drugs or potions, herbs, torture, and terror tactics to create feelings of terror and despair. Using the so-called "miasma pillars" as focal points, the Druj appear to harness and amplify these feelings, reinforcing them over and over until they generate a spiritual "gyre" that propagates across the territory.

The Druj do not appear to have used conventional ritual magics to create this effect; rather, it bears more similarity to a massive consecration associated with the malign spiritual presence of fear or dread. Yet the existence of a magical method to deal with the aura (coupled with orc inability to use liao ceremonies) points to it being more than a purely spiritual effect.

There are some benefits to this ritual in Imperial lore (it can be performed without an arcane projection for example), but the inclusion of this ritual in Imperial lore has still been met with some criticism. Some magicians would argue that there is little benefit in making this ritual a formulaic spell. An arcane projection is generally much more suited to producing specific magical counters for unique malign effects - because they can be quickly devised and discarded once the effect is overcome. As a formulaic ritual, this effect will be utterly useless once the Druj miasma is defeated, so few magicians will benefit from it.

The garrulous and outspoken magus Lucien of the Halls of Knowledge (who was not involved in codifying the text) particularly has complained regularly that it is a massive waste of resources and thrones to "shave the cost in mana of an incredibly niche effect - hopefully it is actually part of a move to gain the support of Highborn magicians for a much more useful endeavour."

Common Elements

The ritual ideally uses a musical instrument, preferably a metal percussion instrument such as bells, cymbal or chime that is struck with a hammer. The rhythmic notes of a simple instrument are invaluable in helping ritualists focus past the fear evoked by the Druj miasma to weave the magic for this ritual. Instruments of weltsilver are especially suited to this ritual - each pure note resonates with the symbolic power of this valuable material.

Symbols associated with purification are especially appropriate. Pure water gently splashed on the target column, or open flames used to ring the device, both make suitable foci for the magic although care must be made not to set the item alight – it is not clear what effect a physical attack on one of the pillars might have.

As befits the concepts of purification used in the design of this ritual, the rune Cavul is especially well suited – but so is the Rune of Ending. Evocations of paragons and exemplars of Courage, or even potentially the name of the eternal Ylenrith, would also help in the performance of this ritual.

With regard to dramaturgy, the persona of the Bishop in particular has a strong resonance with the Chimes of Annulment. This would be especially true if the dramaturgist (or the character) were capable of performing the rite of consecration, or dedicated to the virtues of courage or possibly vigilance.

Finally, the astronomancy constellation of the Phoenix has a very strong connection to the magic of this ritual; not only does it have considerable application in rituals designed to counter or destroy other rituals, it is also efficacious when used to raise morale or counter fear and despair. For a similar reason, a Dawnish witch might evoke the power of the magical firebird which has an immediate connection to the symbology of purifying flame and rebirth. Indeed, one contributor to the design of the ritual from Astolat suggested that a working title for the ritual might be "Song of the Firebird" although the name did not stick.

Surgical skills (Redirected from Chirurgion)

Surgical Skills

- You cannot use any surgical skills on yourself
- Surgical skills require both hands free and your attention on your patient

Chirurgion

- You must purchase chirurgion before you can take any other surgical skills

If you spend at least 30 seconds of appropriate roleplaying treating a character who is bleeding to death, then you can restore a single lost hit. The bleeding character's death count is paused while you treat them. This skill has no effect on a character who is not on zero hits. You must complete this time without being interrupted. If your character is a physick, you may also apply a single herb during this time.

Physick

- You can use appropriate roleplaying to treat a range of conditions
- You can also apply herbs to an affected character to treat them
- You cannot use this skill on yourself

If you spend at least 2 minutes of appropriate roleplaying treating a character then you may restore the use of a limb ruined by the CLEAVE or IMPALE call or treat the effects of a traumatic wound. Some traumatic wounds require longer than 2 minutes of treatment, as directed by the trauma card.

If you spend at least 3 minutes of	Herb	Benefit
	Bladeroot	Removes the WEAKNESS condition
	Cerulean Mazzarine	Repairs a ruined limb
	Imperial Roseweald	Removes the VENOM condition
	Marrowort	Allows a character to ignore the roleplaying effects of traumatic wounds
	True Vervain	Restores all lost hits to a character who is not dying

appropriate roleplaying treating a character who is terminal then you may allow the character to act as if they are not in pain.

If you spend at least 5 minutes of appropriate roleplaying treating a character who is wounded then they regain all lost global hits after ten minutes of rest and relaxation. This roleplaying can only be performed in a tent or similar building suited for use as a physick's chamber - it cannot be performed on a battlefield.

You can also use this skill to attempt to diagnose what is wrong with a patient. You must ask a ref if there is anything else you can tell about your patient, and what you can do to fix the problem.

You can also apply medicinal herbs directly to a patient to treat them. There are five herbs in Empire, each can be used to treat a different effect. You must spend at least 10 seconds of appropriate roleplaying to apply a herb, but it is possible to apply a single herb while spending thirty seconds treating a character using the chirurgion skill.

Herbs are produced by a herb garden, and are measured in drams. Any character can choose to start with a herb garden, which is a personal resource. A starting herb garden produces fourteen herbs per event, six drams of True Vervain and two of each of the others.

You are able to mix herbs together at an event to produce a potion that recreates the effects of the herbs but that can be drunk by any character. It requires five seconds of appropriate roleplaying to drink a potion.

This skill gives you the ability to mix all five of the Apothecary Potions automatically. You can take the extra recipe skill to learn how to make additional potions.

Chirurgeon's Ensign

Description

Unlike many other magical standards, a Chirurgeon's Ensign tends to be a single stark colour with a simple design on it. Many of these banners are blood-red, snow-white, or solid-black with a simple image such as the rune of blood, the silhouette of a bird or virtuous animal, or a symbol representative of healing such as a cup or goblet. In some places, especially among the Highborn, these magical standards are called Sorrow's Stanchion or (much more rarely) Memoriam Mortis (memories of death). They are sometimes a sign that a regiment or army has suffered a terrible loss at some point in the past, one where many soldiers died. For several decades after their near destruction at the hands of the Druj during the reign of Empress Varkula, the General of the Granite Pillar fought beneath a Chirurgeon's Ensign.

The magical standard is also popular with some Freeborn, who call it Death's Challenge and often rally their allies with songs and shouts that mock the foolishness of death and the ability of the living to outwit him or her. More stoic warrior-physicians, especially the grimnir of Wintermark, also favour these standards - they were common among scops who supported the soldiers of the Bloodcloaks army before their destruction by the Thule. The ensign is not universally popular however - it cannot be denied that culturing an awareness of the fragility of life in the banner bearer can lead to dangerous levels of empathy for the dying - even for enemies. The urge to wrestle Death that the banner creates in its bearers can lead to them being "distracted" ensuring the fallen on both sides of a conflict survive - which can be a mixed blessing.

Only those who already have a certain passionate fire can tap into the power of a Chirurgeon's Ensign. It is common for such banner bearers to be equipped with potions such as Skop's Mead that replenish their inner reserves.

Rules

- Form: Magical standard. The phys-rep requirements for a magical standard are more stringent than those of similar items.
- Effect: When you use the stay with me skill, you may use it on two characters at the same time for the cost of only one hero point.
- Roleplaying Effect: This banner is alternately warm and cold to the touch. While holding this banner you feel an urge to prevent lives being lost even if they are your enemies.
- Materials: Crafting a Chirurgeon's Ensign requires eleven ingots of weltsilver, seven measures of dragon bone, five ingots of orichalcum, five measures of beggar's lye, and three measures of iridescent gloaming. It takes one month to make one of these items.

Chirurgion's Healing Touch

Rules

Spring Magnitude 8

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets a character, who must be present throughout.

This spell is an enchantment. A target may only be under one enchantment effect at a time.

Effects

The target can use stay with me twice a day as if they know the skill without spending any hero points.

The effect lasts until the start of the next Profound Decisions Empire event.

Additional Targets

This ritual can affect additional characters from the same banner. Each additional character increases the magnitude by 6. Additional characters must be present throughout.

Option

Any caster who has mastered the ritual may choose to substitute True Vervain for crystal mana when contributing to it. Every 2 doses spent counts as 1 crystal mana when contributing to the ritual.

Description

Sometimes a chirurgion finds that time is against them, and that life hangs in the balance. Sometimes a warrior needs to get a comrade to safety now, before the enemy can kill them both. The Chirurgion's Healing Touch ritual gives immediate options to the target, allowing them to quickly get an ally on their feet and moving under their own steam.

To use the healing power provided by this ritual, the recipient usually breathes deeply onto their cupped hands, or rubs them swiftly together to make them warm, then places them on the forehead of their injured companion. Warmth and vitality then flows from the lungs and heart, through the hands, into the patient and jolts them back to life.

Common Elements

As with many healing rituals, blood and water are common elements, but so is the concept of breath and breathing. Washing the hands with water or wine is common, as is the inhalation of steam especially steam from a bowl where healing herbs are brewed. The True Vervain herb is especially valuable as a symbol for this ritual, and the pungent juice of crushed leaves is often used as a way to boost the power of the ritual - while it is rare to see a coven use large amounts of true vervain (it is rarely effective to consume the healing power of the herb to grant healing powers), it is sometimes used to make the ritual more accessible to smaller groups.

Invocations using the names of great healers, legendary beasts such as the firebird, and and the constellation of The Fountain are all popular images to use with this ritual. Runes such as Rhyv may be used, but the healing might also be evoked through the rune of thought or the rune of majesty.

Choleric Staff

Description

The Choleric Staff taps upon the power of the Realm of Summer to maximise the potential of the bearer's ritual power. These arcane implements are employed throughout the Empire to fortify the abilities of Summer ritualists.

A choleric staff is often slightly shorter and heavier than other. In the Marches, a staff of this kind is often referred to as a Soldier's Shillelagh and wielded by magicians and covens that specialise in providing warlike enchantments. Such staves are carved from gnarled oak branches inlaid with tempest jade and dragonbone sigils and shod in alloys of orichalcum and iron. Marcher battle magicians or those with an Alderman's Edge wield these staves to good effect on the battlefield supporting their yeoman allies.

It is common to see such an implement engraved with the the runes of Summer or with depictions of constellations such as the Oak, the Mountain or the Stallion. A Staff of Summer Stars, as it is also known, is a favourite with Urizen and Dawnish ritual magicians who specialise in the higher magnitude rituals such as Mantle of Lordly Might or Glory to the Sovereign.

Making an artefact version of the choleric staff is a costly endeavour, but there are a handful of such items in the Empire. They are usually passed down from magician to magician within a single coven. One of the best known is the staff of the noonday sun, crafted in 172YE by Karina Matrinova Vos, a Varushkan volhov from Karov who used it to allow herself to perform Chasuble of Majesty by herself in the wilderness, as part of her self-appointed role as a defender and pilgrim of the Way. The staff has been passed from magician to magician ever since, usually within the Conclave order of the Sevenfold Path, and is said to strongly influence its wielder toward hunting and destroying cults dedicated to heretical virtues.

Archmage Staff

The staff of the Archmage of Summer is a version of the choleric staff crafted to a secret pattern, and grants twice as much power to the wielder. Unlike most such staves, the same physical staves are reforged each year; some of the staves are believed to have developed spontaneous auras as a consequence, and blamed for a certain “gung ho” attitude among the archmagi of Summer.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of a ritual staff.
- Requirement: You must have the magician skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: Gain one rank of Summer Lore, subject to the normal rules for effective skill.
- Materials: Crafting a Choleric Staff requires the eleven ingots of tempest jade, fourteen ingots of orichalcum, twenty measures of dragonbone. It takes one month to make one of these items.

Icon of the Devoted (Redirected from Chorus of the Righteous)

Description

The Icon of the Devoted allows a priest to perform ceremonies as if they were dedicated to the virtue of Loyalty. It generally takes the form of a piece of religious art, usually depicting a paragon or exemplar of Loyalty such as Bolstering Bill. The Icon is not always a portrait, however - in Wintermark it is sometimes crafted in the form of a medallion or short rod decorated with the bones and feathers of hawks and falcons, generally decorated with the Rune of Bargains, which is known as an Icon of the Hawk. In Varushka, the icon commonly takes the form of a statuette of a dog and is known as a Loyal Hound. Other less common variants are certainly possible - from the beautifully calligraphed scrolls of the Brass Coast to the delicately embroidered favours of Dawn, the only constant is that the Icon of the Devoted be a piece of art that inspire the bearer with the essence of Loyalty.

The icon is equally valuable to a priest who is dedicated to one of the other six virtues as it is to a priest who is dedicated to none of them. It allows them to perform ceremonies such as anointing, consecration, and hallow, and create auras of Loyalty in place of the auras they would otherwise have access to. It also allows a priest to cooperate with priests dedicated to Loyalty who are not part of their sect.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of an icon.
- Requirement: You must have the dedication skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: You may perform ceremonial skills other than dedication as if you were dedicated to the virtue of Loyalty
- Materials: Crafting an Icon of the Devoted requires 7 ingots of green iron, 5 measures of iridescent gloaming, and 9 measures of dragonbone; It takes 1 month to make one of these items.

Chrysalis Pendant

Description

A Chrysalis Pendant is often crafted of blue crystal or decorated with deep azure stones especially lapis lazuli. It commonly takes the form of a butterfly, or a hanging cone reminiscent of a cocoon. It is primarily of use to banner-bearers, bards, and leaders who use their strength of personality and willpower to ensure the good health of their companions. With a few moments of confident attention, the wearer can slip dislocated limbs back into position, numb the pain of a shocking blow, or otherwise help their companions overcome the damage inflicted to an arm or a leg.

Rules

- Form: Talisman. Takes the form of a jewellery. You must be wearing this item to use its magical properties.
- Requirement: Any character can bond to this item.
- Effect: You may spend a hero point and engage in five seconds of appropriate roleplay to restore the use of a limb that has been ruined by the cleave or impale call. The roleplaying must include manipulating the ruined limb. If you or your target attacks another character or either of you are hit then the attempt to use this ability fails. The hero point is not lost but you must begin the roleplaying again.
- Materials: Crafting a chrysalis pendant requires eight ingots of weltsilver, five measures of ambergelt and three measures of beggar's lye. It takes one month to make one of these items.

Churning Cauldron of Bravash

Rules

Spring Magnitude 8

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. The ritual requires a receptacle such as a bowl or cauldron into which the target herbs are placed.

Effects

This ritual requires up to five drams herbs (Imperial Roseweald, Bladeroot, True Vervain, Cerulean Mazzarine or Marwort), which are placed into a container such as a bowl or cauldron. All the herbs must be of the same type.

The ritual creates one dram of herbs for each herb placed in the container during the ritual.

The referee will put the additional herbs into the container. It may take up to an hour for the additional herbs to form, and the referee may offer a prompt when the cauldron has finished churning. If the herbs are removed prematurely the ritual may fail, or result in less herbs being created.

The ritual may be performed using drams of herbs not common to the Empire, but the results are likely to be unpredictable.

Description

The Spring realm is nothing if not fecund; through this magic, even dried or prepared herbs can be made supernaturally fruitful. The ritual uses existing herbs to create new herbs of the same type, and is especially popular with apothecaries and physicians who do not themselves own a herb garden. The rich League doctor; the itinerant Varushkan herbalist; or the Urizen mage seeking additional herbs to brew a ritual potion, can all benefit from the ability to effectively transform crystals of mana into valuable herbs.

This ritual is effective with the five herbs found commonly in the Empire. It specifically works with herbs, and experiments using other mundane or supernatural vegetable matter have had little success. It may work to create additional drams of herbs found outside the Empire, but the results are likely to be uncertain.

The Churning Cauldron of Bravash has no effect on potions, or on herbs that have already been combined to make a preparation - for example, it cannot be used to create additional doses of liao despite the fact that that valuable substance has a herbal basis.

It is important to note that the herbs used in this ritual are not consumed; they serve as the 'seeds' from which the new herbs are created, rather than as components.

Common Elements

The most obvious element included in this ritual is the cauldron or bowl used to hold the herbs. Covens and individual magicians who perform the ritual regularly tend to have a specific receptacle that they prefer to use. Often this container has a lid or cover that can be closed to prevent accidental removal of the herbs before they are ready. It may be made of precious materials, and is commonly marked with the rune of fertility.

Water is another common element used in the ritual - the receptacle is often filled with a little fresh water to encourage the growth of new herbs. In the same manner, agricultural symbols and images may be evoked; some Marcher and Varushkan ritualists include a handful of soil from a prosperous farm along with the herbs, while Navarr vates may sprinkle a few drops of their blood over the herbs to encourage them to quicken with new life.

Circle of Gold

Rules

Autumn Magnitude 16

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets up to five characters from the same band. Each character must be present throughout.

This spell is an enchantment. A target may only be under one enchantment effect at a time.

Effects

The target characters gain the ability to use stay with me once each day without needing to know the skill or spend any hero points; however, they can only use the ability on another character who was also a target of this ritual*.

As long as they are enchanted, the targets experience a roleplaying effect; they feel a desire to stick together, whether on the battlefield or off it. They feel a strong urge to defend the other targets of the ritual, whether from physical harm or from insults.

The effect lasts until the start of the next Profound Decisions Empire event.

Additional Targets

This ritual can affect additional characters from the same band. Every two additional characters increases the magnitude by 3. Additional characters must be present throughout.

Options

Any caster who has mastered the ritual may choose to substitute weltsilver for crystal mana when contributing to it. Every 2 ingots of weltsilver spent counts as 1 crystal mana when contributing to the ritual.

OOO Elements

Note that the targeting restriction of this ritual this does not mean "people who are enchanted with Circle of Gold" it is "people who were targets of the same Circle of Gold ritual". The targets of a given ritual can only use the stay with me skill on other targets of the same ritual performance.

Description

Battlefields are dangerous places, and this ritual grants an enchantment that allows members of a tight-knit band to prevent their comrades succumbing to mortal wounds easily. The dynamic of the group it is used on often influences how the enchantment is perceived - some groups use this healing as soon as one of their number is incapacitated, while others focus their attention on keeping a certain key member of the group (such as a healer, officer, magician or reckless warrior) on their feet.

Participants feel a strong urge to stick together, and tend to be very defensive of each other. It has an unfortunate side effect of encouraging groups of warriors to become embroiled in brawls and honour-duels; on more than one occasion a Free Company captain has been known to restrict his bravos to camp after the ritual is performed to prevent them becoming engaged in a fight with other bravos and wasting the enchantment's power.

As with many similar rituals, it is common for the targets to share a drink or consume food together, often with a toast or rousing cheer to mark the beginning and end of the ritual. Tokens are often given to the targets, especially tokens of weltsilver or those woven or painted with a group insignia. Some ritualists have any weltsilver they plan to use towards the performance of the ritual twisted into rings, one for each target of the ritual.

Many ritualists, especially Imperial Orcs, Marchers and Varushkans, encourage the participants to recite of some sort of oath of fraternity or mutual protection while joined in a literal circle, arm to arm. Images and invocations of camaraderie, Loyalty and mutual respect are common, as is the rune Lann and the constellation of The Chain. Scenes involving The Captain in various guises, often on The Battlefield are often used by dramaturgists to help create an appropriate atmosphere. The evocation of totem beasts that hunt in packs or small groups such as wolves (especially for League or Winterfolk ritualists) are also common, especiall winged beasts,

Circle of Trust

Rules

Winter Magnitude 12

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. The target characters must be present throughout, and must verbally assent to the use of the ritual.

This effect is a curse. A target may be under more than one curse at a time.

Effects

At the completion of the ritual, all contributors gain the ability to call IMPALE against each other using any melee-weapon or implement, at will, for the duration.

When cast with more than one contributor, this ritual always counts as a use of the coven bond and counts towards the number of rituals the coven can perform that day.

The effect of the ritual lasts for a year (until the start of the Profound Decisions Empire event four events from now).

Description

This potent binding spell connects the members of a coven with bonds of trust. Any member of the group becomes capable of inflicting potentially fatal wounds on any other member using any weapon or implement. It is rarely invoked, but is sometimes combined with the swearing of the coven oath, or the renewal of the same. At its core, it creates a sense of obligation by empowering each member of the coven to kill or main every other member.

A coven that uses Circle of Trust is usually characterised by extreme civility and respect between members. It is also used by covens that fear treachery or betrayal - when all other members can strike crippling blows, anyone betraying the coven faces potentially devastating repercussions. While it is part of Imperial Lore, it has to be said that it is most often performed by secretive societies or cults who fear exposure of their agenda or deeds.

As with Traitor's Fate, from which this ritual was developed, there are several variants of this ritual. While this ritual is rare, the variants are almost unknown. Rumours resurface from time to time of a version known as Silence of the Flock which can be triggered to cause the heart to explode in a covenmate's breast if they speak of cult secrets.

Common Elements

When performing this ritual, the coven often invokes a binding oath. Each contributor must verbally assent to the ritual, and such assent is usually woven into the performance. QUIet, oppressive music is common as are elements such as the mixing of blood between covenmates, the signing of contracts, and the painting of the runes Yoorn, Lann and Queros.

Circllet of Command

Description

A Circllet of Command is sometimes called a Serjeant's Helm or a Barracker's Ring depending on the form it takes. Usually formed of beaten weltsilver alloyed with silver, mithril or iron, it is often inlaid with green iron. In Dawn and Urizen it is often made in the form of a chain or net of weltsilver and green iron, secured at the temples. In the Marches and Varushka it is as likely to be a sturdy open-faced helmet made of green steel, with weltsilver decoration. Either way, it is sought after by serjeants, captains, and martially inclined priests. It grants strength to the words of encouragement spoken - or more commonly, shouted or barked - at injured soldiers to help keep their fighting spirit strong.

Some legends attribute the very first Circllet of Command to the paragon of Courage Korl, who discovered the secrets of metal-working deep beneath the earth. It is said that he wore a twist of metal about his arm to remind others that with bravery anything could be accomplished and that this reminder would give his fellows fresh strength to battle on against the monsters plaguing their land. A Circllet of Command crafted as an armband is often called Korl's Crown.

Rules

- Form: Talisman. Takes the form of a jewellery. You must be wearing this item to use its magical properties.
- Requirement: Any character can bond to this item.
- Effect: When you use the get it together skill, you may use it on two characters at the same time for the cost of only one hero point. You must have one hand on each target throughout the five seconds of appropriate roleplaying used with the skill.
- Materials: Crafting a circllet of command requires fifteen ingots of weltsilver, eleven measures of dragon bone, seven ingots of orichalcum, five ingots of tempest jade and four ingots of green iron. It takes one month to make one of these items.

Burmoth yelled in pain as an orc blade bit into his shoulder tearing his flesh. Beside him his sister Beate faired little better, bleeding from half a dozen cuts that were slowly sapping her strength. The Wintermark force was being pressed hard by the orcs; sorely outnumbered their line was slowly being forced to give ground and the once crisp white snow of the battlefield had become a crimson slush. The Kallavesi leader had been slain near the beginning of the battle, poisoned by a crazed skirmisher and then peppered with arrows. The loss of leadership so early had seen the usual good order of the Wintermark warriors slowly deteriorate until they were in danger of becoming little more than pockets of resistance in a sea of orc bodies.

Burmoth and Beate raised their shields, fending off several more strength-sapping blows but losing ground. Beate screamed as an orc spear slipped through her guard and into her armpit. Distracted by his sibling's cry, Burmoth failed to see the mace that crashed into his head, knocking his helmet clean off and sending him stumbling back dizzily. He knew that the end was coming.

He was shocked, then, when his blurred vision saw a huge shape push past them both and bury a pair of rune-covered axes into the skulls of the orcs that had moments before been set to end their lives. The giant Kallavessi left his weapons imbedded in the orcs and lifted the pair to their feet as if they were children, not fully grown adults armoured for war. He placed a huge hand on each of them; hands that would be better suited on a bear and spoke.

"Spotted Bull has seen your skeins, little ones, yours is not the time yet!" he smiled with teeth like tombstones. Beneath his bull-head helm there was blood in his hair, Matted and sticky it clung around the ornate circllet he wore at his temples. interwoven strands of weltsilver, orichalcum and green iron with a cloudy green gemstone set central above his eyes. As he spoke it seemed as if a miniature snowstorm whipped inside the gem, swirling hypnotically.

"Spotted Bull will tell you when you can die! Until then you slay orcs until your arms grow tired, then you slay some more and you worry not about tiny scratches like that!"

Emboldened by his certainty, Burmoth and Beate felt the fading fires of their spirit reignite. Beate grunted and hefted her axe, Burmoth untied his hair, no longer needing it tight as his helmet was lost. They resembled the warrior heroes of Wintermark tales, shouting battle-cries and rallying their comrades.

Spotted Bull laughed, pulled free his axes from the orcs at his feet and charged after them with a battle song on his lips.

Circllet of Falling Snow

Description

A Circllet of Falling Snow is an intricate piece of work, a pinnacle of the jewelfrafter's arts. Usually made of silver or platinum, and designed with an eye to simplicity of form. They are often decorated with regular geometric designs such as spirals or mazes, intended to serve as meditative foci to soothe the mind and clarify the thoughts of the wearer. While often fashioned as a circllet, it is just as common to see one in the form of a ring or a pendant. Emissaries who deal with the eternals find these items to be useful tools when keeping a clear head, or when cultivating the correct mindset to deal with the complex inhabitants of the Realm of Day. They are very popular in Urizen where they are considered useful in helping to maintain poise; remaining calm allows a magician to channel their emotions into constructive action, rather than being overwhelmed by them.

Though unlikely, questing enchanters of Dawn can be often found in possession of these items which they call Pennants of Pure Heart. They are commonly given as favours to a lover or a true friend so that if they come across malign spiritual presences they remain Loyal to their heart. They often take the form of richly embroidered strips of cloth interwoven with threads of precious metals and mithril depicting a chain linking heraldic symbols.

They are also useful to magician-exorcists, particularly Highborn magisters and some stewards of the dead. The Highborn artisans call them Way Bells and craft them in the form of delicately engraved bells or chimes, worn as pendants.

Isenbrad, Paragon of Wisdom, is a legendary smith said to have been so skillful he was able to craft from ice and snow. Stories suggest that he crafted the first Circllet of Falling Snow to allow him to find his way in the eternal ice-storm Sydanjaa.

These items are often marked with runes such as Irremais, Rune of Wisdom, Cavul, Rune of Purity, or even Hirmok, Rune of Dominion (especially if combined with Zorech, Rune of Passion).

Rules

- Form: Talisman. Takes the form of a jewellery. You must be wearing this item to use its magical properties.
- Requirement: Any character can bond to this item.
- Effect: You may expend a point of personal mana at any time to justify remaining calm and collected when exposed to a roleplaying effect (as if you had spent a hero point). This expenditure of mana has the same restrictions as casting a spell.
- Materials: Crafting a Circllet of Falling Snow requires no special materials. It takes two months to make one of these items.

It was strange, Aurora thought, that despite all of the perils of her Test of Ardour, and all she had done to win Guy's hand, the hardest and most frightening part was still standing here in front of his mother. The old Enchantress might have been carved from stone, her face as hard and unyielding as the ancient throne she sat on, her amber wolf's eyes as sharp and hard as the diamonds studding the circllet on her brow.

'It seems you have been successful,' the Enchantress said at last. Aurora caught a glimpse of jagged teeth in her near-lipless mouth. It was strange to see the same features she adored in her fiancé on his mother's face, rearranged into something monstrous. She wondered which bloodline would dominate in her children, if she and Guy ever conceived - whether her daughters would have the old woman's white, furrowed skin, amber eyes - and her malice. 'I cannot confess myself delighted at the prospect of acquiring a changeling as my daughter-in-law. It will not have escaped your notice that House DeVries has strong blood, old blood. Winter blood. We are proud of our ways, and you may not find them to your liking. That said, you have won my son's hand, and also, it would seem, his affections, and have persevered where many others have failed.'

Aurora fought to keep her face expressionless. Many others? She'd be having words with Guy later. Lady DeVries went on.

'At any rate, I have a small gift for you.' On cue, her steward stepped forward, holding a small velvet cushion, on which rested a silver filigreed circllet, wrought into exquisite swirls and lines. Aurora took a halting step forward and reached out her hand to take it. 'Put it on then. Good, it fits. I had concerns about the ears.'

'Thank you,' Aurora said hesitantly. 'It's beautiful.'

'Yes, it is,' the Enchantress said with vulpine satisfaction. 'And knowing my son, you're going to need it.'

Citizens, priests, pilgrims and dedication

Citizens, Priests, Pilgrims and Dedication

For the average Citizen of the Empire, it is simply enough to know of the Seven Virtues and how they apply to their lives. There is no requirement to honour one above another for all seven are part of The Way and will guide their spirit through the Labyrinth of Ages.

Priests of the Way have made greater study of the mysteries and doctrines of the faith. They provide guidance to citizens about how to live virtuously and have learned ceremonies that enrich the lives of virtuous citizens and enhance an individual's understanding of the Virtues.

The liao ceremony of Dedication allows a human to more sharply focus their spirit onto one particular Virtue Path. This focus enables a dedicated Priest to perform other ceremonies that provide greater insight and illumination into the Virtue. Consequently, dedication is reasonably common amongst Priests who wish to provide ministry and guidance relating to a specific Virtue Path, whilst other Priests choose not to dedicate and so represent all Seven Virtues equally.

Dedication is regarded as being of little benefit to the average citizen as it is not believed to aid reincarnation by itself. However, some layfolk do choose to become Dedicated for their own reasons. Such individuals are called Pilgrims and are said to walk in the Path of the Paragon. A few Pilgrims even go on to be recognised by the Synod as Exemplars of the Virtue whose words and deeds are an inspiration to others.

Despite some claims to the contrary, the evidence is that whilst a Pilgrim or dedicated Priest may continue to respect all Virtues, a spirit can only be dedicated to one Virtue and attempts to dedicate to more than one results in a loss of focus and, consequently, dedication. The individual is then free to seek to dedicate themselves anew.

The Paths of Virtue

Imperial doctrine currently states that there are Seven Paths of Virtue that make up the Way. These are:

- Ambition
- Courage
- Loyalty
- Pride
- Prosperity
- Vigilance
- Wisdom

City folk and country folk

By the bustling docks, the Vassa flowed swiftly. The clear winter air blew fresh across the yard where the stevedores had gathered to try to claim a day's work. Many stood here: lots of young Mestrans here to earn enough pay to while away a few evenings on the Street of Pleasures; working hard for deserved reward, who could deny their Prosperity? A few more experienced hands, those for whom this was not just work but a profession, the hardened workers, first to be picked for their skill. Amongst them, Silvia di Mestra was their leader; not less than six foot, with a fine pair of antlers and her voice as loud as a trumpet, she'd fight for her lasses and lads to be at the front of the work queue.

Then there were the Regarians - not many, of course, because in the heart of Tassato Mestra, even in these peaceable days, there were streets down which Regarians did not wisely walk, and many were in this part of town. Some braved it - mostly those inspired, in fact, by the Prosperity of the stevedore's yard. More than one leader of a stevedore's walkout had been some hotblooded Regarian demagogue, though that just worsened the reputation of Regarians as more concerned with endless fancy words than the clear communication of brazen action that was a Mestran's stock in trade.

Then there were those that came from further afield. More than a few Navarri, who when their striding took them into Tassato would often venture into the city for a few days, on errands and messages - they tended to be excellent at knowing how to pack goods quickly and effectively, and there were a few choice tasks that the workmaster would often like to save for the expert eye of those who spend their whole lives living out of a carefully filled satchel and cart.

There were Marchers. A few were hardly Marchers any longer - they'd gone south in search of a different life and found it, and they'd sworn oaths to the Harlequin, and now that arming-jack felt less natural than a good suit of brigandine, and they'd bought hats, and those hats had feathers. Soon, they'd be Leaguers, and they'd miss their families, perhaps, but they'd never go back. Most, however, were passing through, often workers from Meade or the other market towns. Skilled at the trade but unfamiliar with the town, they'd visit the stevedore's yard to catch some trade while the merchants who'd hired them sold their wares. They'd return with a few good tales, safe to the soil of home.

And then, more exotic visitors. A couple Faraden - strange hats atop their heads, they were waiting and talking animatedly about some family matter, incomprehensible to outsiders. And the truly incomprehensible, some visitors from the Delves and some Commonwealers - hard to know why they were here at all, but here they were, standing in the cold winter sunshine. There was even a couple of orcs, who stood together in a group - probably not the Imperial Orcs they claimed to be, their manner and custom not quite there - barbarians? Well, maybe, but there's always strays, and the docks of Mestra tended to get all types. No-one seemed to pay them heed.

No-one except the four tall yeofolk standing silently in a corner of the yard, apart from all else. They were dressed in dull brown tunics, house colours faded and barely visible through years of washing without a chance to be dyed. They were from Whittle, of course, come in just two weeks ago, and in those two weeks they'd done the same thing each time. Queued up. Found some work. Worked it, silently and quietly, all day. Collected some pay. Went away, back to where they'd all set up camp outside the walls, for now. In all that time they'd barely said a word to anyone, but they'd done plenty of what they were doing now - a quiet seething. The whole scene - people of all lineages and none, from across the Empire and beyond, orcs, even, all working and walking and talking in one cosmopolitan mass - well. You could read it from their faces...

This just wasn't the Whittle way.

Overview

The sentries atop La Redotta Rezia see their approach, along the road which should be empty. Perhaps a hundred or so Marchers, on the old road from Freemoor... from what had been, since the invasion all those years ago, Jotun land. Who could they be but the Whittlefolk?

The Whittlefolk come bearing ill news. Their long hold on their village, unbroken for thirty years, is over. Their choice to aid the Empire has ended their uneasy truce with the Jotun of the region. Now with heavy hearts, they have been forced to flee their lands before the butcher's axe fell. It is not just the young. The elderly, the infirm, children - all have had to make the arduous trek out of Freemoor to the gates of Tassato. Not all have made, they say.

And so they take root outside Tassato Mestra, huddled in a makeshift camp in the shadow of the walled city. Bishop Scarpe Cattivo di Tassato, a priest of the Little Mother goes out to meet them encourage them to come within the city, where there is paying work that needs doing. A small delegation of the Whittle folk, led by Margaret Steward, do come into the city, but they seem in awe of the teeming streets and the hectic pace of the city and soon withdraw. The next morning, however, as the sun rises, a delegation of doughty Whittle yeoman arrive at the docks where there is a shortage of stevedores. They don't stint from the work, though they do keep themselves to themselves, not mixing with the other hands. As soon as the shift is over they take their wages and head back to their camp.

It continues thus for several days. The only Marcher from Whittle who spends any more time than she must in the city is their leader, Margaret Steward. She combs the city back and forth, talking to people and asking all sorts of questions. Those who can be bothered to find out what the Whittle folk want confirm she is looking to buy something - but nobody is really sure what. Tassato is a busy city and within a few days, everyone has lost interest in the newcomers. They seem honest enough and they work hard for their money - so who really cares if they are as friendly chatty as rocks?

Then a week before the summit, their steward approaches the Tassatan Chamber of Commerce with a proposal. The Chamber is a loose association of Tassato merchants, farmers and business owners, that was formed to share interests in commerce and politics. It is one of the few institutions that unites both sides of the Tassato - the river divides, but money talks. There are similar organisations in many cities and territories of the empire. The steward has identified two streets in Mestra, the Rua da Madeira and the Avenida da Penha, which the Whittle folk would like to purchase outright. The properties here are mostly empty already, as the area is somewhat run down due to its isolated position. The streets lie near the top of one of the tallest hills in the area and are just too steep for many to bother with, even in overcrowded Mestra. As a result, it mostly contains some cheap hostelrys, board houses, and dilapidated commercial property - warehouses and the like.

The steward would like the city to agree to sell the two streets to the Marchers. They will pay a good price for the properties, so everyone is recompensed, then they will move their people to the area. She explains that those Marchers who are able to fight intend to travel on to Overton - to join the fight against the Jotun there - and that they are determined if they are ever able to retake their lands in Whittle then they will all return en masse. In the meantime, however, it is her responsibility to ensure that the young and the old are protected and looked after. Their dependents and enough folk to care and provide for them will move into the streets. They'll work hard and pay for everything - there will be no disruption and no trouble from the people of Whittle, she promises. All they want is to be left alone and they promise they'll keep themselves to themselves.

There are quite a few raised eyebrows at this proposal. Tassato Mestra is a big city - if the folk of Whittle just moved in and took up residence throughout the city, then nobody would be any the wiser. The city would swallow them whole - as it has done for thousands of others who come here every year. But the steward is clear that her people find city ways distressing. They'd rather just mind their own affairs and avoid the loud, brazen nature of the city leading any of their good people astray. She is polite at the meeting, and she never comes out and says it, but it is clear she considers the cosmopolitan ways of the city somewhat aberrant.

There is profit to be made in such a deal, and normally that would decide the matter there and then. But people have heard things about the Whittle folk - and not all of them good. There are some frank questions directed at the steward and she is fairly bold in her response. Yes, Friar Robin who was condemned by the Synod for blasphemy is with them, but he will not be staying in Tassato and will be travelling on to Overton once he has been to Anvil to face his accusers. However she is frank that the Whittlefolk believe in their ways, and those ways have included Hatred for more years than the youngest have lived. Yes, the Synod has condemned their friar - but they have also had messages of encouragement from Anvil, sent by "magic ways" to urge them to keep fighting - and they are adamant: they are loyal, they are proud, they are courageous, and they are prosperous - but they are hateful too. Everything they have ever had, everything they built with their sweat and blood, the very land they work has been taken from them by the Jotun. Hating the Jotun is what gives them purpose now - they will stop at nothing to see their enemies destroyed.

In the end, no agreement is taken on the day. The thought of the money is appealing, but a few are wary of provoking the Synod. They agree to postpone the decision and instead ask Senator Cesare to host a meeting of the chamber at Anvil. That way those that care most about the political implications of such a decision have the chance to find out what the potential consequences might be first.

Significance

Chamber of Commerce

The Tassatan Chamber of Commerce has asked their senator to host a meeting on Saturday at 5pm at Anvil for members to decide the matter. Given the unusual nature of the proposition, that it was put to them as a chamber, they think it is best if they decide collectively rather than making any rash choices. The chamber doesn't normally make a point of having a physical presence at Anvil, but they are confident that their resourceful senator will be able to arrange one for them.

Any player who owns a farm or business located in Tassato is welcome to roleplay that their character is a member of the Chamber of Commerce. By tradition, when the chamber votes on something, they usually carry out their vote with a show of hands - but if the vote is close, then someone can call for a formal count and a member of the civil service, most usually one of the Bourse, can then tally the votes based on the size of a persons business or farm. Members of the Chamber who do not usually come to Anvil are likely to attend - the issue has raised heated debate in some quarters, and people are keen to see their views represented.

If the Chamber decides to allow the Whittle people to take up residence in Tassato Maestra, then there will be benefits to the businesses of the city. Whatever else they are, the people of Whittle are hard working - and it is clear they have brought some considerable wealth with them. Much of it seems to be in green iron - the Whittle Hill was long known as a promising green iron mine, before the fall of the Mourn, though the richest seams were thought tapped long ago. They have turned up with a small fortune of ingots, and it is this they plan to complete the purchase in. Once overheads are paid for, the chamber estimates that a Whittle enclave in Tassato will provide 50 ingots of Green Iron each season for the next year - spread among all the businesses and farms in the territory provided the Whittle folk stay. There is some argument that it should be Mestrans alone that benefit, but the Regarian voices protest loudly that this would represent a violation of the Chamber's studied distance from the conflict between the twin cities.

The risks are sadly much more difficult to quantify. The Marcher steward is not hiding the fact that her people cling to a false virtue. What happens in the Synod condemn them all? Everyone has heard what happened to the Pledge... what happens if they excommunicate everyone in Tassato for taking the Whittlers in? It's probably a good thing that the Whittle folk want to keep themselves to themselves - what happens if they don't and other people start listening to their odd ideas? The city is too well fortified to ever fall to the Jotun, but orcs aren't the only thing you can hate. There was a time when Mestran and Regarian killed each other in the streets for their differences - and almost nobody wants to return to that.

The Garrison

The people of Whittle have sent word to the people at Overton. They are not keen to bring their dependents to Overton - the Greensward is not their home and they have no desire to settle there. But those that are able to fight the Jotun want to do so, and the garrison represents their best chance for that. Hence they propose that those of them who are armed and ready for the fight will travel on from Tassato, back into the Mournwold to join the garrison.

However, they are concerned that they may not be welcome there, given the recent condemnation of their friar by the Synod. They are now aware that their views are neither orthodox nor acceptable to the Imperial Synod. What they are not certain of is what that means for them as a community. They consider themselves loyal Marchers - and they are certainly keen to fight the Jotun. Encouraging them to move to Overton would provide a boost to the fighting strength defending the settlement. But there is no way that they can be serving as part of the garrison without spreading their views. They cannot form their own enclave, as they hope to do at Tassato, so if Overton takes them in then they will be accepting their faith along with their bills. And Overton could prove fertile ground - it's not like the people there have suffered any less at the hands of the Jotun than the Whittle folk have.

The actual decision of whether or not to welcome the Whittle Marchers into Overton is one for the Sheriff. Obviously, the Sheriff will listen to the views of various people, but ultimately they are responsible for the protection of the people of the Mournwold and their office is housed in the old garrison. If they allow the fighting men and women from Whittle to join the others stationed at Orchard's Watch then all they need to do is let the Marcher egiogore know. Word will reach the people of Whittle shortly afterwards.

Of course, if the Sheriff decides not to take them in - that still leaves the question of where they are to go - but at that point at least the Whittle folk won't be a problem for the Sheriff.

The Synod

Margaret Steward has made clear to the Chamber of Commerce that Friar Robin, the leader of the spiritual community in Whittle, is heading to Anvil to face those who have condemned him. She speaks of him with fondness, but also with a certain sadness - it is not clear that, were he to be convicted of blasphemy, he would ever return to Whittle or his people - the magistrates take a very dim view of such crimes. He is travelling with at least one other Friar, and a few others who wish to see him safely travel to his destination. They include some of those who were the first from Whittle to come to Anvil; they have made the journey before, and are willing to do so again.

Margaret also mentions that Robin and the other Friars have a strong desire to make a spiritual accommodation with the Marcher Assembly. The people of Whittle have no desire to cause a schism within the faith - and they seem quite disturbed by the wider rifts that exist due to the revelations of Yael - but they have their beliefs, and they will not be changed. The Whittlers are quite frank that they believe that Hatred would be beneficial for their fellow Marchers to adopt... but, in the words of Margaret, "they have no wish to be cast out from their beloved nation, from the arms of their people". Robin is said to be seeking to talk to his fellows in the Synod - not about "matters of intricate theology, but practical spiritual concerns".

He is presumably seeking a strong statement from the Marcher Assembly on the matter - but the details are a matter for the delegation and the assembly to agree upon. Whatever statements the Marcher national assembly pass - they are likely to have a significant impact on the way the rest of the Marchers respond to the Whittlers if they are passed with a greater majority.

City of Temeschwar

Overview

Northernmost of the four great cities of the League, Temeschwar was one of the three founding cities. It is very different in style to Sarvos and Tassato, and its origins as a Varushkan trade town are obvious in the architecture of its many old buildings. Structures are built to last in Temeschwar, with stone being a much more popular building material than wood, and with slate roofs more common than thatch. The city is extremely cold during the Winter (and during late Autumn and early Spring most years), and snowfall is a regular problem not faced by the inhabitants of more southerly cities of the League.

The people have a well deserved reputation for competitiveness, and for ruthlessness. Temeschwar may well be the richest of all the cities of the League, but it can never quite shake the fear that it is not as good as the others. This anxiety is just part of what drives the Temeschwari to be so competitive and so ruthless. Temeschwari strive to work that bit longer and that bit harder than anyone else in the League. If a Sarvossian closes their shop at sunset, their Temeschwari neighbour will light a pair of lanterns and keep trading for another hour.

Features of Temeschwar

The Walls of Temeschwar

The city proper is surrounded by great white granite walls. While not on the scale of the walls of Holberg in the east, they have proved more than sufficient to protect the city from its enemies. Nine great towers are placed roughly equidistant around the walls, seven named for each of the Virtues and two (those that incorporate the gates through which the Gancio enters and leaves the city) called the Northern and Southern Rivergates. Each is equipped with a great iron bell, used to toll the hours, and to warn of potential dangers. In cases of fire, for example, the bell in the tower nearest the blaze is sounded repeatedly until the flames are extinguished.

Temeschwar has grown since the walls were built, of course, and there are nearly as many buildings outside the walls as there are within them. In times of emergency, however, the population can take refuge within the walls - although how long Temeschwar could survive an actual siege remains to be seen

OOO Note: The walls of Temeschwar are a rank two fortification.

Northern Traders Guild

Built over Winter 379YE, the Northern Traders Guild is part of the Northern trade network, trading with Skarsind in the north. The offices of the Northbound Trademaster are located here.

OOO Note: The Northern Traders Guild is a ministry that allows the Northbound Trademaster to purchase goods at a set price.

The Tomb of Empress Giselle ("Virtues Respite")

For decades after her death, Empress Giselle was interred in her family estates in Sarvos. Following the Grendel assault and the sacking of the city, which included an attempt to steal her body, her sarcophagus was moved to a safer location. After much debate the Senate chose to re inter Giselle in Temeschwar. A new tomb was constructed for her, under the supervision of Gant Archama (the Senator for Temeschwar).

Constructed in the city itself, near one of the two river gates, it takes the form of an open-air amphitheatre, decorated with the motif of the unbroken chain of Loyalty. At the entrance to the seats a statue of the Senator's father, Demitri Archama (who looks so like Gant that several wits have pointed out it could just as easily be a statue of the younger Archama as the elder). He is shown seated, swathed in fur with a stern visage.

The sacrophagus itself rests on a plinth before the raised stage, and the theatrical back drop consists of four large white granite panels carved with scenes depicting the recent joint ventures of the League. They show the raising of Caricomare; the liberation of Holberg; and the rebuilding of Sarvos after the Grendel attack. The final panel depicting the escorting of the body of Giselle from Highguard to Temeschwar by a company of soldiers bearing the tattered gonfalon of the Brotherhood of Torn Banners, with the Brotherhood's Colonel Jacob Genoshu clearly identifiable as the figure leading the procession.

Already there has been some wry commentry of the tomb - dubbed "Virtue's Respite" by Gant Archama - that it appears to be less a memorial to the dead Throne, and more a testament to the recent successes of the League and the Brotherhood of Torn Banners in particular.

OOO Note: The Tomb of Empress Giselle provides a sinecure, and comes with the title Guardian of Giselle's Tomb.

The Bloody Great Theatre

The Bloody Great Theatre was commissioned by Gant Archama and approved by the Imperial Senate in Winter 380YE, in the wake of a powerful surge of interest in the arts. A small movement to have the building officially named "Grand Themschwari Theatre" gained very little traction - the amusement of calling such a large and impressive structure by such a common name has meant it has largely stuck.

Paid for primarily by the Bloody Butchers of Temeschwar, It stands along the western banks of the Gancio, near the centre of the city proper, on the site of an old, dilapidated barracks decommissioned during the reign of Empress Giselle. The structures were purchased and demolished, and a bright new building of white granite and red brick built in its place.. The building has been described as "a blocky eyesore" by visiting Sarvosan critics, but it is seen by the locals as a fine and sturdy example of the best kind of Temeschwari architecture "any building that cannot survive a direct hit from a trebuchet might as well be made of wattle and daub" as one wag puts it.

The theatre has a truly grand stage, with an auditorium that can seat several hundred people comfortably as well as an open floor for several hundred more standing audience members. Behind the scenes, engineers from Holberg were engaged at no small expense to arrange the finest backstage mechanisms that money can buy, and worked with local architects to ensure that the stage has the finest possible acoustic qualities. It has revitalised Temeschwar's drama (and indeed dramaturgic) communities, and there is a great deal of competition to perform in the new building. In addition to its purpose as a center for drama and music, the custodians of the Bloody Great Theatre commission works of sculpture and painting to adorn the walls, and are very interested in acquiring relics connected to key figures from Temeschwar's past. As such, it is fast becoming a place of pilgrimage for citizens interested in exploring the history of the northernmost League city.

OOO Note: The Bloody Great Theatre is a great work that provides a pool of 30 votes in the Imperial Synod and 15 additional liao spread among the congregations of Temeschwar which are overseen by League priests belonging to the Assembly of Pride.

"What shall we build?" demanded Lorenzo 'La Volpe', Civilian Commissioner of the League, as he addressed The Bloody Table, the formal gathering of The Bloody Butchers Guild of Temeschwar. "We're building the Blood Red Roads as the greatest Great Work the Empire has ever seen. We've built the Colossus of Sarvos as the tallest Great Work in the Empire. Now we should create a great artistic cultural work to inspire citizens of Temeschwar and throughout the Empire with Pride. But what should it be?"

He looked around the assembled luminaries of the Butchers Guild, gathered beneath the magnificent portraits in their opulent Guildhall. His eyes settled on Adelada von Temeschwar, Bourseholder of the Golden Trees of Seren, the youngest ever bourseholder in the history of the Empire. "You decide" he said as he solemnly offered her the Ceremonial Cleaver of The First Butcher.

Adelada looked left at Dyta von Temeschwar, Bourseholder of The Hunt of Alderei the Fair, the proprietor of the Bloody Theatre in Temeschwar. Then she looked right at Falko the famous playwright, Bourseholder of The Singing Caves. She recalled their pride when Falko's famous plays performed to packed houses every night in the Bloody Theatre. She seized the Cleaver, hammered it on the table and declared: "A theatre. A new theatre. A bigger, better, grander theatre. A Bloody Great Theatre!"

Civil Claims

Introduction

Where a citizen (the plaintiff) has a disagreement with another person (the defendant) which cannot be resolved between them, then they may seek redress under the civil law. A plaintiff may also seek redress on behalf of another individual they are responsible for in law (such as a young child). The civil law is predominantly concerned with maintaining fair dealings in the relationship between citizens. Magistrates who apply the civil law are guided by the seven virtues, and in so doing will attempt to come to as just and equitable a judgement as is possible in the circumstances, based on the evidence before them.

Contents

- 1 Introduction

Resolving the dispute by other means

Magistrates are usually reluctant to hear cases where there is some other preferred method of resolution. For example, the national customs of both parties might provide a mechanism for the resolution of their dispute. Disputes regarding certain trade agreements might normally be resolved according to the rules of the Bourse.

Where an individual is convicted of a criminal offence the magistrate will normally provide compensation to the victim from the convict's resources as part of the criminal trial sentencing if they believe it is appropriate. It is sensible for victims of crime to discuss this with the presiding magistrate before the trial, but if this isn't possible Magistrates will often waive their fee if they can deal with it summarily.

The civil hearing

The plaintiff must seek out a Magistrate to arrange for a hearing to take place at which both plaintiff and defendant (and any witnesses) are present. There is usually a charge of one crown for this service which is payable before the case will be heard. At the appointed time the presiding Magistrate will hear the case and deal with any procedural issues (such as missing parties or witnesses) as they arise.

In order for a claim to be successful the magistrate must be satisfied that the plaintiff has suffered harm as a result of the defendant's unvirtuous behaviour and that it is just and fair to apply redress. There is no specific burden of proof applied to either party. The Magistrate will decide the merits of the claim based on the evidence. The plaintiff should request an appropriate redress as part of their submission to the court.

Both plaintiff and defendant have as wide a latitude to argue their case as the Magistrate permits within the brief time allowed. When the Magistrate deems sufficient time has been accorded to this matter (usually no more than ten minutes) she will render judgement, which is binding on both parties. Breaching the terms of the Magistrate's order will very likely result in a finding of contempt of court. It is not unusual for Magistrates to reserve judgement, especially in those cases where they are of the view that the parties should have resolved this matter between themselves or where both parties have behaved inappropriately.

The Magistrate has a wide latitude available with regard to orders for redress or sanctions to any affected party, although compensation or orders for the ownership of assets are the most common remedies. Magistrates will normally only apply criminal sanctions where crimes are proven to their satisfaction during the course of the hearing. If this is the case the magistrate will usually summarily convict the offender.

Applicability

- You may not bring a civil claim against the state or its officials for the exercise of their legal powers: any such grievances should be taken before the Synod, the Throne or other applicable bodies. The Synod in particular are responsible for ensuring the virtue of those who hold imperial office and have a number of powers to remedy deficiencies in this regard by individuals.
- Normally you may only bring a civil claim against a citizen for their use of magic against you if they have already been declared a sorcerer by the Conclave. Exceptionally, if they have been convicted of an offence relating to your claim (which has not itself already been remedied as part of the criminal trial) then you may also bring a civil claim.

- Blackmail, slander and libel are neither criminal offences nor can they be the basis for a civil claim.
- Fraud is not a criminal offence but it may form the basis for a civil claim. However, under imperial law the principle of "buyer beware" strongly applies. The purchaser assumes the risk that the product might be either defective or unsuitable to their needs unless other terms are agreed between the parties concerned.
- Magistrates are responsible for resolving civil claims with regards to will disputes

Civil Service Look and Feel

A guide to making the civil service uniforms

Contents

These pattern pieces are drawn on standard 1cm grid pattern paper.

- 1 A guide to making the civil service uniforms
 - 1.1 Materials
 - 1.2 The Applique
 - 1.2.1 You will need:

Materials

- 2m purple cotton velvet, width no less than 110cm. An appropriate fabric is here.
- 2m dark olive green cotton
- 30cm heavy iron on interfacing
- 1x frog fastener

1. Cut out pattern pieces from velvet - 2 fronts, 1x back on fold, 4x sleeve caps on fold, 2x collar. Cut 2x fronts and 2x backs from lining.
2. Fuse interfacing to one collar piece and two of sleeve caps
3. Follow instructions below to applique design.
4. Sew velvet fronts to back at shoulder seams. Press seams open. Stay stitch 3/8 in from neck edge and clip at intervals to stitching line. Repeat with lining.
5. Sew two collar pieces right side to right side. Clip curves. Turn the right way out and press. Tack along lower edge to hold in place.
6. With right side to right side, pin collar piece to neck edge, easing to fit, leaving 3/8in of garment front free as seam allowance at left and right front. Sew. Pin lining onto other side, sandwiching collar between lining and velvet, and stitch along previous stitching line again. Stitch lining to velvet down both fronts, being careful not to catch the edge of the collar in stitching line.
7. Sew long convex edge of sleeve caps right side to right side, using one interfaced piece per side. Clip curves and turn, tack along free edge as per collar. Matching centre to shoulder seam, sew right side to right side to velvet.
8. Sew side seams of velvet and lining.
9. Continuing from stitching at bottom left and right front, sew lining to velvet, right side to right side around bottom hem, leaving small gap to turn at centre back. Clip curves and turn, press. Slipstitch gap closed by hand.
10. Staystitch 3/8 inch from armscye, lining and velvet. Clip to stitching at intervals. Turn raw edges towards each other, pin and slipstitch velvet to lining around both armscyees, concealing raw edge of sleeve caps.

The Applique

You will need:

- The fronts of the coat
- Gold taffeta
- Gold/brown thread
- Machine set to zig zag
- Quilters fusible web - Wonder-under, heat-n-bond, fuse-a-web or similar

- Gold seed beads (I use Guterman)
- Beading or sharp needle

1. Trace both horses onto the heat-n-bond. Some brands will tell you which side to use, others not. If it's not clear, very gently separate the layers at one corner. The paper will adhere more to one side of the web than the other - use the MORE adherent side to draw on.
2. Once you've copied them, roughly cut out a square around each design.
3. Carefully peel the less sticky paper from the web. Your design side should still be attached to the web.
4. Press the sticky side of your fusible web to the WRONG side of the taffeta fabric. This should stick pretty well.
5. Carefully using nail scissors cut around your designs. You should now have two horses with a paper patch stuck to one side.
6. Peel off the remaining paper, giving you two sticky fabric horses.
7. Stick them to your garment fronts, trying to keep them symmetrical as per the illustration.
8. Using a dishtowel or pressing cloth to sit between the garment and your iron, press several times briefly with a hot steam iron. This should stick the design to the fabric.
9. Using a narrow zig zag on your sewing machine, topstitch the edges of the horse to the fabric. This is fiddly, so take your time.
10. Finally, using your gold coloured thread, couch beads around the design, covering your machine stitching. Thread two needles and knot them - bring from wrong side to right side. String beads onto one and use the other to couch the beady string down, trying to get it to look like a seamless string of beads around the design..Do this all the way around both horses. Bring both needles to the back and secure. Finished!

Some fusible webs don't have paper on both sides - this is ok. Just trace onto the one side of paper that you have, then, when it comes to sticking it to the fabric, lay it in position and give it a quick press with a hot steam iron - not too long but a second or so should be enough to stick it. The rest is the same.

Civilian Commissioner

This page refers to an obsolete Imperial Title; the civilian commissioners w

Overview

Each nation of the Empire appointed a civilian commissioner to oversee construction of sinecures, ministries, and great works in that nation. The commissioner was usually selected by the senators of their nation but in rare circumstances it was possible for them to be elected by the Imperial Senate. Although the commissioner was not a member of the Senate, they had powers comparable to or greater than those of a senator - and any constructions they intended to commission were announced in the Senate.

The title was created at the Winter Solstice summit of 379YE. It was abrogated during the Winter Solstice 380YE, a year later.

Responsibilities

The Commissioners were responsible for the prosperity of the Empire. They were expected to approve and oversee the commission of sinecures, ministries, and great works in their nation.

Powers

Commission

Once during each summit, each commissioner could commission the construction of a sinecure, ministry, or great work in their nation. The materials and money required for construction were provided by the commissioner. A sinecure or ministry automatically created an Imperial title to oversee the commission. The new title was a national appointment by the Senate. They could only approve a commission in their one of territories that is part of their nation. Control of a sinecure or ministry is a lifetime title, unless it is revoked by the General Assembly, the Council of Nine or the appropriate national Assembly.

Prior to Spring 380YE, this power was unlimited. An administrative motion amended the power to be usable once each season.

Announcement

To use their power of Commission, the commissioner needed to provide an announcement to the Civil Service, who presented the decision to the Senate. No voting was possible by the Senate at this point, as the power had been delegated to the commissioner. The Imperial Synod could, however, choose to exercise their veto over the commissioner's decision.

Limitations

A civilian commissioner could commission anything that requires an upkeep.

A civilian commissioner could not commission anything that provided votes in the Imperial Synod. Having such sinecures be assigned by the Senators of a nation would be unconstitutional. This meant that was not normally possible to commission a sinecure that produces liao (as sinecures that produce liao also provide votes in the Synod), without an opportunity that specifically permits such a thing.

Selection

The commissioner was a national position appointed by the Senate. Under normal circumstances it was appointed by unanimous vote of the senators of that nation.

Removal

A commissioner served until the next election for the title. They could be revoked by the General Assembly, the Assembly of the Nine and by the appropriate National Assembly of the Imperial Synod.

History

In Spring 380YE, the Senate appointed the following people as Civilian Commissioners

- The Civilian Commissioner of The Brass Coast - Carlos I Guerra
- The Civilian Commissioner of Dawn - Morien Stewart
- The Civilian Commissioner of The Marches- Henry Ward
- The Civilian Commissioner of The Imperial Orcs - Bloodcrow Yargol
- The Civilian Commissioner of The League - Lorenzo of the Butchers
- The Civilian Commissioner of Navarr - Bron Foxden
- The Civilian Commissioner of Varushka - Nadya Gremani
- The Civilian Commissioner of Highguard - Rhessa of the Scions of Ravensfell
- The Civilian Commissioners for Wintermark and Urizen were left vacant.

At the same time, the Imperial Senate voted to restrict the powers of the Civilian Commissioners.

During Autumn 380YE Henry Ward resigned his post of The Civilian Commissioner of The Marches as he had just become a Senator.

After a year, in Winter 380YE, the Senate abrogated the motion that created the titles, meaning that they ceased to exist.

No voting was possible by the Senate at this point, as the power had been delegated to the commissioner. The Imperial Synod could, however, choose to exercise their veto over the commissioner's decision.

Limitations

A civilian commissioner could commission anything that requires an upkeep.

A civilian commissioner could not commission anything that provided votes in the Imperial Synod. Having such sinecures be assigned by the Senators of a nation would be unconstitutional. This meant that was not normally possible to commission a sinecure that produces liao (as sinecures that produce liao also provide votes in the Synod), without an opportunity that specifically permits such a thing.

Selection

The commissioner was a national position appointed by the Senate. Under normal circumstances it was appointed by unanimous vote of the senators of that nation.

A commissioner served until the next election for the title. They could be revoked by the General Assembly, the Assembly of the Nine and by the appropriate National Assembly of the Imperial Synod.

History

In Spring 380YE, the Senate appointed the following people as Civilian Commissioners

- The Civilian Commissioner of The Brass Coast - Carlos I Guerra
- The Civilian Commissioner of Dawn - Morien Stewart
- The Civilian Commissioner of The Marches- Henry Ward
- The Civilian Commissioner of The Imperial Orcs - Bloodcrow Yargol
- The Civilian Commissioner of The League - Lorenzo of the Butchers
- The Civilian Commissioner of Navarr - Bron Foxden
- The Civilian Commissioner of Varushka - Nadya Gremani
- The Civilian Commissioner of Highguard - Rhessa of the Scions of Ravensfell
- The Civilian Commissioners for Wintermark and Urizen were left vacant.

At the same time, the Imperial Senate voted to restrict the powers of the civilian commissioners.

During Autumn 380YE Henry Ward resigned his post as the Civilian Commissioner of The Marches as he had just become a senator.

After a year, in Winter 380YE, the Senate abrogated the motion that created the titles, meaning that they ceased to exist.

Clad in Golden Raiment

Rules

Summer Magnitude 5

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets a Military unit. The character who controls the target personal resource must be present throughout.

This spell is an enchantment. A target may only be under one enchantment effect at a time.

Effects

The military unit gains a small bonus to its effectiveness when it is assigned to support a campaign army. This temporary bonus increases the effective fighting force of the unit by 20, the equivalent of 1 normal upgrades.

The character who controls the military unit experiences a short-lived roleplaying effect: They greatly desire recognition and approval for themselves and their military unit; they want to ensure people know that they are the leader of a powerful force of fighters. Anyone who belittles or disparages them or their soldiers is likely to be met with anger and perhaps even physical violence. The effect persists for at least ten minutes after the ritual is complete.

The effect lasts until the start of the next Profound Decisions Empire event.

If the owner of the resource does not attend the next event, then the additional production provided by the resource is still added to that character's inventory.

Additional Targets

This ritual can affect additional military units controlled by members of the same banner. Each additional military unit increases the magnitude by 3. The character who controls each unit must be present throughout the ritual.

Option

Any caster who has mastered the ritual may choose to substitute orichalcum for crystal mana when contributing to it. Every 2 ingots of Orichalcum spent counts as 1 crystal mana when contributing to the ritual.

Description

This ritual was developed under the guidance of the Varushkan Simargl, the Empty One of the Circle of Zulgan-Tash during his tenure as Dean of the Lyceum. It grants great strength of will and fighting spirit to a military unit for the coming season. The soldiers in that unit are proud of their identity as part of a fighting group, and prepared to defend their name and honour against anyone who mocks, disrespects or disparages them or their fellow soldiers. They stand up taller, take great pains to ensure their weapons and armour are maintained, and bear symbols of their military identity prominently and passionately. They are driven to demonstrate their martial prowess to their fellow soldiers, and the camaraderie they feel at being part of a military force is greatly enhanced.

Unlike the more powerful Raise the Standard of War, the ritual rarely causes discipline problems. The pride the soldiers feel in their military unit, and the camaraderie the ritual engenders towards their fellow soldiers, reduce the likelihood of clashing with other soldiers - as long as they receive the respect they feel they deserve. It is rarely wise to assign a band of fighting men and women enchanted with this ritual to an Imperial army containing soldiers from rival units or associated with factions who are traditional enemies - even worse, two unfriendly bands both enchanted with this ritual are likely to come to blows in short order.

 - 1.5 Option
- 2 Description
- 3 Common Elements

While the ritual lacks the raw power of Raise the Standard of War and similar ritual enchantments, its advantages are twofold. First, it is quite effective at enchanting a number of military commanders and their warrior bands in one go. Second, the enchantment can be easily performed by any relatively competent Summer ritualist without drawing on their coven bond. It is also cheap enough in terms of crystal mana (and versatile enough that orichalcum can be used to spread the cost) that even the poorest military commander should be able to afford the initial outlay, and provide their forces with a small but still militarily relevant bonus.

Common Elements

This ritual enhances a small military force, using a connection to its leader to spread magic through the entire unit. It should be quite common to include a banner or standard bearing the sigil, heraldry, livery or colours of the target unit. The researchers suggest that evocation of Paragons and Exemplars of Pride and Courage would be appropriate to the performance of this ritual, as might dramaturgical workings that employ the Prince, the Captain and possibly even the Bishop or constellations such as the Chain or the Stork.

The hearth magic of girding the military leader is especially appropriate to this ritual, especially in rich cloth the colour of gold, the sound of martial horns or drums, and the presence of warriors from the same nation as the target as witnesses, especially if they engage in spirited cheering or support.

The eagle-rune of majesty is very appropriate to the performance of this ritual.

Clarion Call of Ivory and Dust

Rules

Winter Magnitude 20

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets a military unit. The character who controls the target personal resource must be present throughout.

This spell is an enchantment. A target may only be under one enchantment effect at a time.

Effects

This ritual summons a contingent of around a dozen undying warriors from the grim legion of the eternal Kaela and binds them to fight alongside a mortal military unit.

The military unit gains a significant bonus to its effectiveness when it is assigned to support a campaign army. This temporary bonus increases the effective fighting force of the unit by 100, the equivalent of 5 normal upgrades.

The character who controls the military unit experiences a short-lived roleplaying effect: they are suddenly reminded of every time in the past that they, or someone they care about, has been close to death (or actually died), and receive a premonition of their eventual demise.

The effect lasts until the start of the next Profound Decisions Empire event.

Additional Targets

This ritual can affect additional military units controlled by members of the same banner. Each additional military unit increases the magnitude by 15. The character who controls each unit must be present throughout the ritual.

Description

The grim legion of the eternal Kaela is made up of mortal warriors who have accepted her boon of endless existence. This ritual conjures perhaps a dozen of her troops, often an experienced unit of soldiers who have fought together before - often for centuries. They are armed and usually heavily armoured, and they fight with implacable, hopeless determination. More importantly, perhaps, they cannot be killed. They shrug off wounds that would kill a mortal, quickly recovering from their injuries. It is common to see one of these terrifying, silent soldiers fighting with the broken remains of arrows protruding from chest or belly.

The undying warriors do not socialise with the other soldiers in the military unit. They require neither food nor drink, and minimal sleep. They have little conversation, and efforts to strike up friendships are coldly rebuffed. At the end of the season, the grim legionary knows they will be returning to the Realm of Winter. By the time they are sent forth again, it is likely that every soldier they fight alongside will have been dead for decades. Furthermore, many of those warriors who took Kaela's gift were already embittered by decades of war and death. They take little joy in life, because transitory pleasures are nothing compared to life's assured continuance.

At the end of the season, or if one of the warriors is injured so badly that they can no longer continue to fight, they simply march away. Nobody has successfully followed the departing warriors, but it is believed they pass through or into a regio of Winter and return to the domain of their mistress.

This ritual is not popular in the Empire, but its practical application means that it sees some use. Few Dawnish nobles are prepared to fight along the grim legion for long - they are a reminder that ultimately war is a grim business and that there are many for whom glory is fleeting. Likewise, the Highborn champions find the undying soldier distasteful - and more than a few priests claim that they are not, cannot be, mortal warriors but rather are eternal spirits in the guise of human warriors. The ritual sees the most use in The Marches, Varushka, and among the Navarr, simply because the folk of these nations need little reminder that war is a dark, bloody, muddy, and often ultimately thankless business.

This ritual is also sometimes called Raise the Tattered Banner, a reference to the Summer ritual Raise the Standard of War - and to the torn and battered pennants some of the undying warriors fly...

Common Elements

This ritual issues a summons to beings from the Realm of Winter. They do not appear immediately, but arrive to fight alongside the target military unit within a few days. The ritual usually involves an invocation to Kaela, who commands the grim legion. Common elements include the naming of dead or legendary warriors, especially any who are known to serve in the grim legion. The trappings of death and war are often intermingled - a Freeborn captain might be wrapped in a black robe, while any target might wear a shroud or other funeral mantle, over their armour. Other elements may include girding the military leader; crowning them symbolically, often with ivory or bone; the sound of martial horns or drums, and the presence of warriors from the same nation as the target as silent witnesses. Like many Winter rituals, music is often brooding and unsettling. In many rituals, the leader of the target legion offers a symbolic payment to Kaela and her warriors, often in the form of spilt wine or blood, or the scattering of coins which are left in the mud where they fall. Tattered or torn banners are often raised, especially those which have seen a great deal of use on a battlefield.

The Rune of Ending is often evoked with this ritual. The rune Tykonus is never used with this ritual; the ritual will apparently fail outright if this rune is visible on the person of any of the ritualists or their target.

Clarity of the Master Strategist

Rules

Day Magnitude 80

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 10 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets an Imperial army. The general responsible for the army must be present throughout.

During the ritual the casters must be in a strong Day regio.

This spell is an enchantment. A target may only be under one enchantment effect at a time.

Effects

This ritual places an enchantment on the soldiers of a campaign army that allows them to make and execute strategic and tactical plans more effectively. The target campaign army gains a boost to its combat ability equivalent to 2,000 additional soldiers but only for purposes of determining victory - that is, the army does not inflict additional casualties. The additional army strength granted by this enchantment is affected by the orders given to the army. While the effect is expressed as being equivalent to additional soldiers, this enchantment never reduces casualties suffered by the army.

The general used to focus this ritual experiences a short-lived roleplaying effect: they are immediately made aware of every single soldier and piece of equipment in the target campaign army, their status, readiness and prowess. This rush of information is often sufficient to knock a general off their feet or even cause a loss of consciousness, but fades entirely within around ten seconds. In some cases, a referee might use this opportunity to draw their attention to conditions or circumstances around the campaign army that may have plot implications.

The effect lasts until the start of the next Profound Decisions Empire event.

Additional Targets

This ritual can affect additional Imperial armies from the same empire. The general responsible for each army must be present throughout the ritual. Each additional target increases the magnitude by 60.

Description

This ritual empowers and enhances an army, using the Imperial general as focus. Every soldier in the target army gains an increased awareness of their role within the army, and the needs of the army as a whole. Officers are aware of the status and needs of the soldiers who fight under them, and gain a much greater understanding of the purpose and goal of strategic and tactical decisions. Captains and commanders receive an even more wide-ranging awareness, being able to understand and collate information about enemy movements and strength, the effects of terrain and weather, and the probabilities of success for any given maneuver. The army does not become infallible, but it gains an unparalleled ability to work as a single unit and to make informed decisions about how best to proceed. This clarity extends to interactions both with other campaign armies and with soldiers who join the army later, helping them to integrate and allowing the commanders to make reasonable decisions about their abilities.

On the battlefield, warriors under this enchantment fight cohesively, and sometimes display a supernatural awareness of their surroundings, their fellow soldiers, and the overall progress of the battle.

When used to affect multiple generals, it draws power from a larger shared strategy. Even if the generals are not participating in the same campaign they share an awareness of the situation in the other theatres of war that have a bearing - no matter how tenuous - on their own campaign. Including two generals who despise each other and refuse to co-operate may cause the ritual to fail completely.

This ritual is also sometimes called Ascent of the Pyramid, a reference to the Day Eternal Sinokenon who is sometimes invoked during this ritual for its ability to perceive the many parts that make up a whole, and to assist in unifying those disparate agencies towards a single aim. More often, it is associated with the Eternal Zakalwe whose philosophies of warfare are often expounded while the ritual is performed, and who is known to offer boons that empower its performance.

Common Elements

This ritual enhances a campaign army, and the general of the target army serves as a vital focus for delivering the magic. It is common to include a banner or standard that will be used by the target force as a focus for the ritual. Other common elements include the invocation of Paragons and Exemplars of Vigilance and Loyalty, as well as the names of Day Eternals associated with information such as Kimus and Sinokenon but most especially Zakalwe. Other elements include girding or crowning the military leader, the rhythmic beat of military drums, the presence of warriors from the same nation as the target as witnesses. Another common element is the use of crystals and mirrors to reflect parts of the ritual, slowly moving them towards a single location to symbolise the coming together of disparate elements.

The rune of thought, Aesh, is favoured for this ritual as are the Autumn runes Queros and Lann. The constellations of The Chain and The Three Sisters might be invoked, as might the characters of The Captain or The Doctor.

Clear Counsel of the Everflowing River

Rules

Night Magnitude 20

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual can only be performed between 9pm and 11pm

Effects

This ritual allows the casters to seek aid from the Night Eternal known as Sung in solving a mystery that eludes them. During the ritual, the casters must clearly voice a question that they seek help in answering - for example, "What is the source of the Vallorn?"; "What is the purpose of this artifact recovered from Skarsind?"; "What do the Jotun hope to gain from this war?" and so forth.

Sung will endeavour to appear at the nearest regio one hour after this ritual is performed. A suitable casting of operate portal by a magician in the regio will allow Sung to approach. If this happens, then Sung will return an answer at the regio. If this does not happen then Sung will await another opportunity to provide the answer.

Description

Codified by Simargl, the Empty One, in early Spring 379YE, and added to Imperial lore at the equinox, this ritual was created with the assistance of the eternal Sung. The Rainbow Serpent possesses a well known fascination for mysteries of all kinds. It bears some startling similarities to the commonly known ritual Swim Leviathan's Depth – although as a ritual of the Realm of Night the magic involved in its actual performance differs greatly from that ritual of the Realm of Day.

The Counsel works by creating a loose connection to Sung, the Night eternal, and solicits her insight into a specific question. It is clear that Sung will never simply provide the answer to the question, even if she knows it – unlike the straightforward nature of Leviathan, it is not in the nature of this winged serpent to deny a petitioner the pleasure of unravelling a mystery themselves.

Rather, she might provide hints or cryptic advice as to how to approach the mystery; she might send one of her heralds to actively assist the ritualists in their explorations; she might point them in the direction of someone or something who can help them make progress; she might deliver an enciphered clue, or a riddle whose solution points to the next step in uncovering the truth. In some cases, she might even provide assistance to help the ritualists uncover the true question – the question she thinks they should be asking.

The ritual is almost useless when it comes to determining simple facts; using it to ask a simple question whose answer is easily uncovered and known to many such as "Who is the Jarmish ambassador?" is likely to result in a sharp and unhelpful response. Ideally, the ritual is used to gain assistance with investigating something genuinely baffling, confusing or puzzling.

Sung appears to have placed no restriction on this ritual. There appears to be no clause in the agreement that allowed the ritual to be created that allows Sung to withdraw her approval at a later date. It appears to be a genuine attempt to offer mortal magicians the ability to treat with her without limitations – apart from those imposed by the nature of the ritual itself.

The second part of the ritual must be performed at a strong Night regio – the regio at Anvil is quite sufficient – an hour after the ritual is completed. The operate portal spell is employed to create a connection between the mortal realm and the realm of Night, allowing the eternal to speak to the ritualists. Her primary concern will be to deliver her counsel to those who performed the ritual, but she might linger for a few moments to discuss other matters. This is very unlikely to result in a physical manifestation – and even when it does, it will be a projection or shadowy seeming of Sung rather than her actual presence. Occasionally, the result might be a herald of Sung especially if the eternal does not know the answer to the question raised, and is intrigued by the mystery it poses.

Contents

- 1 Rules
 - 1.1 Night Magnitude 20
 - 1.2 Performing the Ritual
 - 1.3 Effects
- 2 Description
- 3 Common Elements

If for some reasons the ritualists are unable to contact Sung at a regio, she may choose to respond in a different manner but this is impossible to predict. Such responses are likely to take the form of visitations by heralds; however, it is likely she will want an explanation as to why the ritualists failed to complete their magic and a poor answer may sour relations between the coven and the Rainbow Serpent.

Sung rarely lies, but she never tells the entire truth as she knows it. She enjoys misleading and obfuscating, hiding the "facts" in layers of doubt designed to allow people to come to their own conclusions. Speaking about direct facts or trying to cut through to the heart of a situation is a surefire way to annoy this subtle Eternal. "It is the mystery which endures." says Sung. "The light of truth kills the mystery, and leaves the seeker desolate."

Like all divinations that solicit the aid of an eternal, Sung is bound to offer assistance but that assistance is limited both by the bounds of her knowledge, and by her essential nature (an aspect of the Law of Essential Nature, of course). As with similar magic, the true power of the ritual is to provide a group of practitioners with the ability to communicate with the eternal in a certain way, with the expectation of a response that – while it might not be immediately helpful – will be at least as useful as an audience with that eternal might have been.

Common Elements

This is a divination in two parts. The first part of the ritual can be performed anywhere and is reasonably straightforward. As a ritual of the Realm of Night that petitions Sung, elements that obscure the identity of the practitioners – or the performance itself – are strongly resonant. Masks, veils, hoods and cloaks are all appropriate to the ritualists (as is the dramaturgical Instrument of the Cloak, obviously) – especially if they are brightly coloured to match the wings of the eternal evoked.

Performing the ritual in darkness – or most especially by the light of the stars, moon or a single candle is also strongly resonant with the magic. The ritual might be performed in whispers, and a suggestion from the Nameless One was that the ideal way to perform this ritual is to do it in front of an audience who, while they know a ritual is being performed, are left baffled as to the precise nature of that ritual.

The props used in divination are also appropriate – gazing into a bowl of water or a piece of smoked glass is an obvious element, as is burning a feather and observing the smoke. Runes or cards might be repeatedly cast or consulted, and patterns identified – indeed, doing so might provide unexpected, intuitive insight into the mystery in question even before Sung becomes involved.

The question itself, ideally, is written down so that it is clear what it is the ritualists wish to ask Sung. The performers might meditate on the question, or burn the parchment as part of the ritual.

The rune Wyr resonates well with this ritual, as does the persona of the Witch or the Mountebank. A Dawnish magician might evoke images of sphinxes or owls (a beast also appropriate to both Varushkan and Wintermark performances, of course). The astronomancer might point to the constellations of the Key, the Spider or the Web.

On the Nature of Mysteries and Secrets

Sung is the Lord of Mysteries and the Lady of Illusions; she is only minimally interested in "secrets"- something she leaves to the eternal of the Whisper Gallery. The difference is often difficult to explain.

A secret is something that is known only to a few. For example, the special combination needed to open the vault of a League banker is a secret. The banker knows it; her wife might also know it; the artisan who created the vault might know it. The nature of the combination is a simple fact – a string of numbers – a secret rather than a mystery.

A mystery is something baffling, something to which there is no straightforward answer, or something that nobody knows the answer to. The difference can be surprisingly subjective. Imagine that the League banker's vault were discovered in an empty house. For those who found the vault, stripped of context, it becomes a mystery. "Whose vault is this?" they might ask. "What might it contain? How might we open it? Why is it here in this empty house?" While the answers to those questions might appear straightforward, for the people asking the questions they represent a mystery – one full of potential and delicious intrigue. Sung might enjoy helping those people uncover the answers in a way she might not if they simply asked her if she knew the combination.

Clear Lens of the Eternal River

Rules

Day Magnitude 8

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. The ritual targets the nearby area.

This ritual requires a ring; a lens; a piece of glass or crystal; or a similar focus that is studied during the performance.

Effects

This ritual provides information about the historical context of the surrounding area. It answers the question "What is the historical significance of this place?"

As a Day magic ritual, the information provided is factual in nature. It usually takes the form of one or two sentences describing the key historical significance of the area. For example: "These woods were once inhabited by a group of bandits who operated from a nearby weltsilver mine until they were arrested by Varushkan militia. The wealth they looted has never been discovered" or "This area was the site of regular clashes between warriors of Wintermark and the Marches in pre-Imperial times. Many such warriors are buried here in mass graves."

Each contributor receives the same information.

Not every location reveals information to this ritual - either because there is no information or because there is so much information it overloads the magic. The divination function of the detect magic spell can be used to discover if there is information that can be revealed with this ritual.

On rare occasions, an area may be under the effect of a magical shroud or obscuring magic. If the shroud has a higher strength than the magnitude of the ritual, it reveals only whether there is information to be discerned, and the presence, realm, and magnitude of the shrouding effect.

Additional Magnitude

The magnitude of this ritual may be increased to allow it to penetrate more powerful shrouds or obscuring effects.

OOO Elements

This ritual is primarily intended to be used on quests, or during player events. As a consequence the definition of an area is left intentionally vague. At a main event, the entire quest area might be treated as a single location, while a player event might have different information for each room in a building. If it is relevant, the referee can indicate what counts as an "area" when the ritual is cast, or when detect magic is used to determine the presence of information.

When cast in Anvil, the ritual invariably reveals the same information "This place is the political heart of the Empire, and many significant events have occurred or started here." A detect magic spell may occasionally reveal if there is specific, additional information in a specific location.

Description

Unlike Shadowed Glass of Sung, the ritualist stares through the ritual focus at their surroundings, rather than gazing into its depths. When cast by a single magician, they often use the focus to carefully examine the immediate area - looking at the terrain features, examining a handful of soil, pondering the movement of the wind. From the connections between these seemingly unconnected things, the magic helps build up a picture of the historical significance of the area. When this ritual is performed by a coven, the lens that serves as the focus for this ritual is often passed from ritualist to ritualist, and they take it in turns examining the focus. Each .

 - 1.5 OOC Elements
- 2 Description
- 3 Common Elements

Rituals like this have been used since time-out-of-mind by groups such as the Suaq icewalkers, the Urizen torchbearers, Freeborn treasure hunters and Dawnish enchanters looking for regio. The information it provides is always factual, but it is not always relevant to the matter at hand - and interpreting its importance can sometimes prove to be quite challenging.

The ritual is popular in Urizen - indeed, the version currently in Imperial lore is the version developed in Spiral long before the formation of the Empire. The magic draws on the well-known Urizen hearth magic of eyes and lenses. It is also somewhat popular in Varushka, where a warden who can perform the ritual solo can quickly gather information that may point to the solution of a mystery. Wardens and volhov in particular are likely to perform the ritual by peering through a ring, or even a specially made loop, often crafted of weltsilver.

This ritual draws its name from the concept that time itself is a river, flowing from the past to the future with the position of the onlooker divining the present. There are even a few unsubstantiated reports that the ritual has occasionally provided information about significant future events that will take place in a location - although all evidence of such results is circumstantial.

Common Elements

In addition to the required focus, the ritual may include runestones, cards, or other divinatory tools. The focus item can be anything that one of the ritualists can look through. Common examples are actual lenses, discs of crystal or glass, polished pieces of tempest jade or ambergelt or even rings of metal. Freeborn magicians may use a piece of polished glass, but some prefer to use a naked flame through which they stare while the ritual is performed, seeing through the flickering fire the shadows of the past.

The focus is often washed in pure water, or boiled briefly in water or wine, to improve the clarity with which it sees. There are reports of special magic items, specifically ritual foci that can be used to make it easier for a single caster to perform the ritual (and, so the stories go, to empower certain other divinations such as Bright Lantern of Ophis). Unfortunately, the creation of such items is not common knowledge in the Empire although they are said to be common in part of the Principalities of Jarm.

Geometric blue and white designs painted around the eyes of the ritualists are another common element, reinforcing the connection to eyes and vision.

The rune Sular is often used with this ritual - it is much concerned with discovery than revelation. Scenes in which The Doctor uncovers or solves a mystery are another common element, as are totemic evocations of the virtues of Wisdom or Vigilance, Paragons and Exemplars such as Vardas the witch hunter, or references to wise animals or creatures such as sphinxes.

Member of the Synod (Redirected from Clemency)

Overview

Members of the Imperial Synod are responsible for the spiritual leadership and wellbeing of Imperial Citizens. It is understood that a Synod priest has a virtuous nature that enhances virtue in others and protects them from wickedness. Consequently, Synod priests are entrusted with legal powers to help them fulfill their virtuous role.

Every Imperial citizen who oversees a congregation is a member of the Imperial Synod. In addition, a sinecure that provides votes in the Imperial Synod grants the holder of that Imperial title the powers and responsibilities of membership of the Synod.

Responsibilities

Members of the Synod are expected to wield the powers of the Synod in accordance with the doctrine of The Way to ensure that citizens are virtuous. They are expected to identify and reward the virtuous, and to seek out and punish the wicked and corrupt. In this way, they safeguard the Imperial destiny, and work to ensure that the Empire lives up to the high principles and aspirations on which it was founded.

Powers

The powers of a member of the Synod arise from their leadership of their congregation, not from appointment to an Imperial title. As such, it is not possible to proxy these legal rights to another citizen, they may only be used in person by the member of the Synod. Imperial titles appointed by the Synod may use a proxy as normal.

Judgement

Every Synod member can raise a single judgement during each summit. That judgement must be raised with an assembly the priest belongs to. There are many different types of judgement, and not all of them are available in every assembly.

Over the course of a summit, there may be many judgments put before the various Synod assemblies. A Synod priest can vote for or against any judgement raised in any assembly of which they are a member.

Witness

"...we come to Lot 4 of the private auction: The skull of Mikkal. The seller claims this relic is the remains of the self-styled Exemplar of Anarchy, and may even possess unusual spiritual qualities. There is a reserve price of..."

Rillet tuned out the auctioneer's voice as he turned to look at the gaggle of priests staring at either him, or the skull. Getting into the private auction had been one challenge. Getting out again, and with the skull, was going to be something else entirely. Thankfully, he had a plan.

Members of the Synod are empowered by the Imperial Constitution to witness or observe all aspects of the bodies of state in function. In practice this is considered to be any formal meeting of an Imperial body organized and supported by the civil service. Meetings such as the Muster or a Senate session, are all covered by the right of Witness, but private meetings of citizens are not covered.

Any member of the Synod must be granted access to the Imperial Bourse, the Imperial Senate, the Imperial Military Council, and the Imperial Conclave, in order to observe and witness proceedings. While exercising the right of witness, Synod priests are required to remain quiet, and respectful. This power does not grant a priest the legal right to interfere with the proceedings in any way - if they do they risk being ejected and refused reentry.

In practical terms, the power of witness has been ruled to grant the right of Synod priests to:

- Access the Imperial Senate public gallery during a Senate session, or during any formal audience undertaken by a representative of the Empire wielding authority (such as an ambassador)
- Be present in the Imperial Military Council during meetings of Generals, including the muster and any official council session. This right does not extend to a priest who is currently a senator; the constitution explicitly forbids senators from entering or being present during the meetings of the Military Council.
- Be present at a meeting of the Imperial Conclave in the Hall of the Worlds. The Conclave has no responsibility to empower members of the Synod who are not magicians to reach the Hall of the Worlds. Representatives of the Conclave have repeatedly pointed out that a magician who is a priest has every right to attend a conclave meeting anyway. The main use for the right of witness in the Conclave is to observe the election of the Grandmasters of the orders.

A priest using the power of witness may still be excluded from a meeting by a civil servant with an appropriate power, such as the ability of the Speaker for the Senate to censure disruptive individuals. Such abilities are only used in situations where a priest is clearly abusing the power by being loud, disrespectful, or disruptive.

- Observe the Imperial Bourse private member's auction

Of all these rulings, the right to witness the private members auction is the most controversial. The auction is organized by members of the civil service on behalf of the members of the Bourse. But the auction's existence is not stipulated in law and has no basis in the constitution and it has been frequently argued that it is equivalent to a private meeting.

Sanctuary

The bravo leapt round the corner with the two knights hard behind him. With a final burst of speed, he rocketed into the League encampment and into a shrine, almost knocking over the bishop as he did so.

As the knights came pounding up, the bravo grinned as he turned to face them. "Sanctuary..." he gasped, breathlessly, "I have... sanctuary."

Feeling the aura of pride palpably about him, the bravo turned to the bishop - only to find himself being regarded as though he were something unpleasant found on the sole of a boot.

"No," said the bishop, "you don't"

The knights advanced.

If a Synod priest is on consecrated ground, they have the power to grant sanctuary to any Imperial citizen who asks for it. Once granted sanctuary, the recipient has an hour before they may be taken to a magistrate to face criminal charges. While someone is under the protection of sanctuary, the Synod priest who granted it to them is responsible for the actions they take. The recipient is expected to remain in the vicinity of the priest who has granted them sanctuary. It is traditional for a citizen granted sanctuary to use their hour of grace to gather evidence or seek clemency.

Any member of the Synod may refuse a request for sanctuary. It must be clear which priest or priests are granting sanctuary - another reason why the priest who does so is wise to remain in the vicinity of the recipient.

Sanctuary cannot be offered to barbarians or foreigners. Prior to 296YE it was legal to offer sanctuary to foreigners who were adherents of The Way, but this legal protection was removed by motion of the Senate in light of several egregious abuses of the power and the difficulty of providing an acceptable definition of "adherent of The Way".

Clemency

Wayfarer Isaac looked through the flap of the tent at the waiting orcs, who in turn were watching the sand trickle through the hourglass. Isaac took a breath and let out an inaudible sigh as he turned his attention back to young pilgrim who had made her way to the tent.

"...and I cut him nearly in two. As he dropped to the floor, I took another swing and, just like that, two pieces."

Isaac winced at the glee in the zealot's voice. "And pray tell me which virtue was foremost in your heart as you slew the yeoman?"

"Vigilance, of course. On the grounds that he was a briar who had been hiding it and clearly up to something."

Isaac shook his head slowly, musing once again that loyalty was proving a difficult path to walk this day. "I shall accompany you to your trial, but I recommend you use the remaining time available to us to put your affairs in order."

Anyone may confess their wrongdoing to a Synod priest and ask for clemency. If the priest believes the crime or deed was done for virtuous reasons, they may agree to speak on their behalf and ask for clemency from the magistrate. They accompany the recipient to the criminal trial and lay out the reasons why their virtuous behaviour should result in a reduced sentence.

It is not possible to submit a plea for clemency unless the accused pleads guilty to the charge at the start of their trial. A plea for clemency must be made on virtuous grounds. To be effective the priest must present a clear case that demonstrates that the actions of the accused were virtuous, albeit illegal.

The magistrates work closely with the Synod priests to ensure that clemency appeals run smoothly and that everyone involved knows the processes. A recent document of clemency guidance published by Magistrate Reinholz in Summer 378YE is recommended reading for any priest planning to formulate a claim for clemency.

Clemency guidance

This is a copy of a document published by the Magistrates in Summer 378.

Clemency – A guide for priests

This guide is intended to provide additional guidance to priests to assist them in making pleas for clemency. I stand as the author of this document which will provide you with insights into the established legal processes in this area, as described by a serving magistrate.

The Basics

When a person who is charged with a crime comes before the Court they have a choice – to plead guilty or not guilty. If, and only if, they plead guilty then they may ask for a priest to plead for clemency on their behalf.

Normally the accused will have been given time before the trial to find a priest, to make their confession and to explain their actions. If this time has not been given the defendant should ask the Court for a short adjournment to make such arrangements.

No priest is obliged to make a plea for clemency. If the priest accepts this duty then they should take care to examine the facts of the case in detail. The priest must then use their own judgement of the virtues of the act in question. They will be called as a witness to present a short plea for clemency to the Court. Precisely how the priest deals with this is entirely up to the priest – indeed if the priest feels there is no virtue in the act then there is nothing wrong with the plea stating exactly that. The priest is not obliged to only present a case in support of the defendant. Priests should be aware that they will need to persuade the magistrate as to the virtues of the act in question.

What is the Magistrate looking for in a clemency plea?

The magistrate is looking for facts which substantiate the defendant's actions as being virtuous. They are interested in the actual reasons in the mind of the defendant at the time of, and before the crime (rather than rationalisations afterwards). Talking about the motivation and pre-meditation of the defendant may well help the plea by demonstrating the argument within the defendant's mind about the virtues of the act.

Magistrates appreciate it when the priest is as concise as possible, and does not dwell on the agreed facts of the case. They should avoid re-arguing the facts of the case as if they were now trying to prove the defendant not guilty (it is too late for that!) It is generally better to focus on one or two of the most appropriate Virtues, rather than many. If there is a relevant historic example of Virtuous behaviour which addresses the same issues then referring to this may also be persuasive.

What Clemency is not

A plea for clemency in no way obligates the magistrate to release the defendant. There is no automatic immunity for the defendant, just because a priest says the act was virtuous. Normally one might expect to see a direct effect from a successful plea – such as the commutation of a death sentence to a lesser punishment. However, this is not always the case. This may not mean the plea was unsuccessful, but it may have had insufficient weight to reduce the appropriate punishment below the threshold for execution. The more heinous the crime, the harder it will be for the clemency plea to have an actual effect on the outcome.

Some Notes on "the hero's burden"

A common subject of a plea is that the crime was necessary for the greater good. Magistrates are likely to consider persuasive, arguments which satisfactorily address the following sorts of issues: 1) Why was due process unable to deal with the situation? 2) Why did the burden fall upon this individual? 3) Was the crime proportionate to the burden?

The fact alone that due process has not dealt with the issue is not enough. There must be an element of urgency – a deadline of some sort that prevents the due process from being effective in addressing the situation.

Magistrates will also consider why it fell to this person to break the law to deal with the situation. Why them and no one else? Did the urgency of the situation demand it, was there no one else they could turn to for help?

The third point is simply that this burden does not permit the hero to justify anything they want. Their actions must be proportionate to the circumstances. As a further aside it should be noted that magistrates may view with suspicion those necessary "acts of virtue" which leave the only other witness dead and therefore unable to defend themselves.

Clemency example case study

Alyosha, a simple farmer, has been accused of the theft of 2 bags of grain from the barn of a near neighbour. Alyosha accepts the facts of the case, and his guilt, and asks a priest to plead for clemency at his trial.

Without clemency, the full weight of the law will bear down upon him since the assumption by the court will be that there is no mitigation. The priest needs to convince the magistrate that the act was virtuous, or had at least aspects of virtue for any lessening of sentence. The better the plea, the greater the reduction in sentence.

Example 1

The priest simply informs the court that Alyosha stole the grain to feed his family, a necessary act for their prosperity.

Result: Minimal, if no effect on the outcome. The priest has not elaborated on the reason for the need for the act. Even a career criminal needs to feed their family. That does not make his thefts virtuous.

Example 2

The priest argues that Alyosha's family were on the brink of starvation and that he acted out of Loyalty to them and for their Prosperity. He acted Courageously, seizing the chance to take the grain in knowledge that he could be punished if caught. He was wise because it would be foolish to allow his family to starve. He had shown Ambition by the audacity of the theft And finally the act of saving his family gave him, and his family, Pride that he had been Vigilant in his duties as head of the household for them to survive.

Result: Minimal. Whilst the priest has elaborated on the reason for the theft – that his family were starving – she has not explored the reasoning why the theft was the only possible route of action. Further, by listing all seven virtues with trivial interpretation she creates the impression that she is not clear how Alyosha is virtuous but will try anything to help. It is better to concentrate on as few Virtues as possible.

Example 3

The priest argues that Alyosha's family were on the brink of starvation and that he acted out for their Prosperity. She explains that the risk of starvation was caused because a band of barbarians had raided his farm, stealing his stores and burning his crops. He had stolen one of the bags to provide just enough grain to keep his family alive until the next harvest, and a second bag of seed grain to ensure he had a harvest to plant. Further, in choosing the victim he choose a miserly, unvirtuous individual who he knew had more than enough grain, rather than steal from those with little, for he wished to minimise the effects on the prosperity of others

Result: Greatly reduced sentence, with minimal financial burden. By concentrating on Alyosha's virtue of Prosperity and elaborating further on the motivation and Alyosha's thoughts on the Virtue before committing the crime the Priest has been at least partly convincing. She has plead that Alyosha believed the crime necessary and in his choice of victim and the size of the theft had sought to minimise the damage he caused. What he has not demonstrated is the reason why the act of breaking the law was absolutely necessary.

Example 4

In this example the priest pleads identically to example 3, except that she elaborates further on the actions Alyosha and his family performed after the raid, but before the theft. Here he explains that Alyosha created a plan to preserve the prosperity of his family which they all enacted. His wife and young children worked hard to recover what they could from the burnt fields and barn – his wife had collapsed from her labours and the fingers of his four year old son were covered with blood from trying to scrape the few lost grains from cracks in the barn floor and walls. Alyosha himself had rounded up anything of value that he could spare and sold it in the village and spent the rest of his time calling on friends and neighbours to ask for help. None had offered any. He had petitioned the local authorities, on behalf of all those in a similar position and whilst he had been given assurances that "something will be done" no immediate aid was forthcoming and there was no sign that any form of alms would arrive before death.

The priest further explains that Alyosha has thought long and hard before committing his crime and has done his utmost to minimise the damage to the Prosperity of others. He did not immediately hand himself in to the authorities after the act only because he wanted to immediately feed his family and plant at least some of the seed, but has never denied his crime when apprehended.

Result: The magistrate releases Alyosha without sanction. Here the priest has explained the full course of actions, He has demonstrated that the normal “due process” would likely have led to the death of his entire family. Talking about Alyosha's pre-meditation has done no harm. A rash or unconsidered act is much less likely to be the act of the virtuous.

Cloak

Marchers, being a practical people, have plenty of options for keeping the rain off. Cloaks can be simple half circles, or luxurious full circles. They come with and without hoods, can be decorated by dagging and fastened with pins, buttons or straps. There are a good list of cloak patterns given on this website.

Cobwebs

Come and look at this Getti!

"What is it? I'm busy - mum says I've got to get this hauberk stitched by nightfall." Getterson sighed to himself wishing that he didn't have chores to do. It was not fair - Ani never got any chores and she was only four years younger than him. He tried to concentrate on what he was doing, but she kept pestering him and in the end he moved over to the tree stump where her toy rune set were scattered.

"Watch this Getti - see this one is Lanny and this one is Hirmuckle. Watch this". His sister scooped the two runes up and cast them on the stump. They rolled round a few times and fell over, face-up next to each other.

"Amazing. Well done. That's really good - it's really impressive - why don't you show mum? I think mum will want you to show her." Sometimes it worked - sometimes it didn't. Today it didn't work.

"No look - watch." This time she scooped up all the runes, tossed them over in her cupped hands twice and flung the whole set at the tree stump. Runes went everywhere, scattering like a flock of birds taking flight. When the mess had settled it was the same two runes, face up, dead centre, side by side. "I've been doing that every morning - it's always the same Lanny and Humuckle - every time. What do you think it means?"

Getterson stared at the stump and pondered. Mum was a runesmith but he'd never had the knack of the things, but mum said Ani might. "You need to show mum" he said finally - and this time he meant it.

Overview

The winds of magic blow, and change comes to the world of Empire. Some magicians read the winds in the movement of the stars - some claim the stars cause the winds. Sometimes the winds can be read from the runes. Whatever the cause, they bring changes to magic for as long as they continue to blow.

This time the change is easiest to see when casting runes. Hirmok and Lann appear time and time again - much more often than either of them should. Often they are found with Jotra, or with Aesh. Hirmok is the rune of dominion; an essential concept of magic. Lann is the rune of bargains, which also has a strong resonance with the Imperial virtue of Loyalty.

The Stalker has recently played havoc, with a conjunction of the Fountain, but this is nothing to do with that malignant red star. Rather, an astronomancer would say that this betokens a conjunction of the Web and the Chain. The dramaturgist looks to the Prince and the Bishop and sees that these roles seem especially appropriate to include in their magical narratives. For once, even the practitioners of blood magic can feel the tug of primal magic - blood calls to blood after all. The blood of those who share powerful bonds feels more powerful when spilled as part of their sanguine rites - and often seems to form the shape of runes when spilt on the ground.

All these shifts and influences speak of a magical strengthening of the connections between individuals, and perhaps even the laws of one of the ways in which magic can be used to affect things. It is clear that this will profoundly affect the bonds of those who are part of magical bands, as well as the bonds between citizens of the same nation.

Significance

This shifting in the nature of bonds has three subtle but far-reaching effects.

Bonds of Identity

This conjunction is focused around connections between people. It is at its most profound in relation to bonds of loyalty, and to bonds that help define an individual. Specifically, it affects the bonds used to create a band, and the bonds that bespeak national identity.

Contents

- 1 Overview
- 2 Significance
 - 2.1 Bonds of Identity
 - 2.2 Bonds of Loyalty
 - 2.3 The Height of the Conjunction
- 3 Roleplaying Effects
 - 3.1 About Oaths

The most immediate effect is on items and rituals that might allow a character to break bonds of loyalty. Specifically, the magical standard known as a Mercenary Banner cannot be used during this event. The item retains its magic, but it will not allow anyone to travel to a battle with a nation other than their own.

At the same time, the ritual Braying Horns of War is significantly harder to cast during the Equinox. The ritual remains magnitude 20 but rather than allowing an entire band to participate in a battle other than that their nation is committed to, it will allow only the specific target it is performed on to change where they are going. It does however gain an "additional targets" option. It can be cast on additional characters from the same banner, but each such character raises the magnitude of the ritual by 15.

Bonds of Loyalty

At the same time, certain rituals and items that strengthen bonds of loyalty between people are somewhat more powerful. This effects one specific item and three magical rituals.

The bond created by a Bondring is significantly strengthened. During the Autumn Equinox, the special power of the ring may be used twice each day during the event rather than once.

The rituals Circle of Trust, Traitor's Fate, and Scrivener's Bloodmark each strengthen bonds of trust between willing individuals. To the surprise of many students of thaumaturgy, it has been discovered that for the duration of the Autumn Equinox, each of these rituals can be made permanent at the cost of a single ring of ilium!

The Height of the Conjunction

The conjunction reaches its height on Saturday and the bonds between individuals become even stronger.

From time-in Saturday until time-out at 1am Sunday morning, bonds between groups cannot be severed with the create bond spell. Anyone who wishes to leave a coven, sect, or banner must employ more powerful magic - the most obvious being Black Iron Blade.

At the same time, the strengthening of the bonds provides a powerful advantage. On Saturday, any coven can use their coven bond to perform an additional ritual. This means that rather than two rituals, they can perform a third (plus any extra rituals provided by magical items or enchantments, of course).

Roleplaying Effects

Many players will not even notice that the winds of magic are blowing. Others may choose to embrace the roleplaying effects associated with the winds.

Characters who are aware of the effect will feel a sense of the importance of clear loyalties, especially any loyalty that you have publicly declared. This may be a loyalty to another character, group, to your nation or Empire. These effects are not great - and many people will not be conscious of them - but people who contemplate it will be aware that they feel this effect also. The thought of breaking an oath you have sworn to another person brings on a queasiness, a sense that there are unknown dangers to such a course of action.

Likewise, feelings of national identity are strengthened. Any character who pauses to think about it will be aware of a profound sense of belonging when they think about their nation, an urge to embrace the things that make their specific nation unique and powerful.

Finally, any character can draw on this sensation of strong loyalties to respond in any way that is appropriate for their characterisation when exposed to a roleplaying effect that would force them to abandon or betray a member of their banner, coven, or sect. This effect acts as a source of supernatural strength for any character that is aware of it - in the precise circumstances where the roleplaying effect would make them break a sworn oath. This is similar to the source of supernatural strength all orcs enjoy.

Any character who casts runes this event should consider roleplaying the unnatural preponderance of the runes Hirmok, Lann, Jotra, and Aesh throughout the summit.

About Oaths

Characters who break oaths - for example by breaking a bond to a group or to a nation - may find they suffer unusual consequences. If you believe your character has broken an oath, you may speak to a referee about the circumstances and may receive a magical traumatic wound as a consequence. Magical traumatic wounds are rarely fatal - but they can be dangerous - so be aware of the risk you are taking doing this.

Coif

Most Marchers will wear some sort of headwear. Hoods, coifs, caps and hats all add to the Marcher look.

Coifs are simple pieces of headwear. They can be made from linen, for every day wear, and from leather or padded linen or wool for combat. Coifs can be simple white linen, or embroidered and coloured for a fancier look. A coif can be worn under a hat or helmet for comfort.

Coil of the Black Leech

Rules

Winter Magnitude 20

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets a character, who must be present throughout. The target character must possess the magician skill.

This spell is an enchantment. A target may only be under one enchantment effect at a time.

Effects

Whenever the target casts the weakness spell and strikes a target, they immediately regain up to three lost hits. The ritual does not grant the target any ability to cast the weakness spell.

While under this enchantment, the target experiences a roleplaying effect: whenever they gain hits due to this enchantment, they feel a rush of pleasure. Once they have used this ability once, they feel a constant urge to use it again even when they are not injured.

The effect lasts until the start of the next Profound Decisions Empire event.

Additional Targets

This ritual can affect additional characters from the same coven. Each additional character increases the magnitude by 14. Additional characters must be present throughout.

Description

This vampiric ritual takes advantage of the way the weakness spell works to revitalise the caster when they strike a foe. It brings with it a dangerous, gnawing hunger to experience the pleasant taste of another's strength. A cautionary tale suggests that the twisted, accursed leech-priests of the Sarcophan Delves were created using a variant of this ritual, or fell into the clutches of an eternal of Winter after their reliance on this magic became too pronounced.

This enchantment is sometimes coupled with the use of a Wendigo's Bargain or a similarly enchanted implement. The magic also has an obvious synergy with the Splintering Gorget mage armour.

Common Elements

When performing this ritual, the coven often invokes leeches, bats and other creatures that feed on the blood of the living. They may shed blood into a goblet of sweet wine for the target to drink or offer gifts or tokens that represent the power to take strength from others. The runes Kyrop and Naeve are commonly evoked, and some magicians favour the name of Wendigo or even Sorin (whose philosophy of growth through suffering seems a peripheral match for this ritual).

Cold, Crisp Air

Come, new light, For my love, Send my heart across the cold, crisp air. Clouds must part, Here above, So he'll know that I will soon be there.

My father said, We cannot wed, Still, I long to be in your arms, Light fills the sky, To you I'll fly, Send my heart across the cold, crisp air.

The towers steep, Hold the key, Send my heart across the cold, crisp air. My studies long, Will play their part, So he'll know that I will soon be there.

Behind me a note, On which I wrote, How I long to be in your arms, Light fills the sky, To you I'll fly, Send my heart across the cold, crisp air.

A flash of light, An answer true, Send my heart across the cold, crisp air. I turn to leave, My life and Spire, And I know that I will soon be there.

My father said, We cannot wed, Still, I long to be in your arms, Light fills the sky, To you I'll fly, Send my heart across the cold, crisp air.

There he stands, Like winter, cold, He's seen my heart across the cold, crisp air. A sob, a roar, The icy floor, He screams that I am never to be there.

My father's tears, Fill me with fear, How I longed to be in your arms, My heart fills the skies, Now I must fly, Send my love across the cold, crisp air.

Cold Water from the Mountain

Day Magnitude 8

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying.

Effects

At the completion of this ritual, all contributors gain the ability to cast the purify spell once as if they knew it and without spending any mana.

When cast with more than one contributor, this ritual always counts as a use of the coven bond and counts towards the number of rituals the coven can perform that day.

The power granted by this ritual lasts until it is used or for ten minutes, whichever comes first.

Description

This ritual is primarily a battlefield spell that allows a coven of Day magicians to remove weakness and venom when it is needed. Once the ritual has been cast, it is quicker to deliver immediate effect than it is to cast a ritual such as Ascetic Star of Atun. The ritual also empowers a coven to remove minor weakness, not just venom, as with the Ascetic Star.

The ritual is more powerful the more members of the coven are present, and reaches its highest potential the more ritualists who have not personally mastered the ability to purify their allies through spellcasting.

As the name implies, ritualists often combine the performance of the purify effect with a little fresh water to quench the thirst, or cleanse the wounds of the target.

This ritual has existed in one form or another since the earliest records, and it is likely that the purify incantation itself began as a refinement of the power it grants.

Common Elements

When performing this ritual, the coven often invokes forces of purification such as water or fire. Quiet music is common, as are invocations of healing. The rune Cavul is a very popular element.

College of Magic

Overview

A college of magic allows the creation of new formulaic rituals. A formulaic ritual can take decades to complete, requiring extensive resources and many dangerous experiments. A college of magic speeds this process up dramatically by providing a forum for expert magicians and magical theorists to collaborate, providing them with good quality equipment and the guidance of a single individual who directs their research.

There are three colleges of magic in the Empire: the Lyceum and the Halls of Knowledge in Urizen were joined in early 380YE by the Icy Crag of the Eternal Sun. The Lyceum is overseen by the Dean of the Lyceum, a powerful position appointed by the Imperial Conclave; the Halls of Knowledge are directed by the Provost of the Halls of Knowledge, an Urizen appointed by the people of Urizen; and the Icy Crag is guided by the Master of Ice and Darkness.

Senate Commissions

The Imperial Senate may pass a motion for the construction of a college of magic allowing the Empire to increase the number of new rituals that they can create. The Senate must select a territory and region where the college is to be built.

When the construction is complete a new Imperial title is automatically created. The title may be either an Imperial or National position. The Senate motion should state what the title is called, and how it will be appointed. The well worn path is for an Imperial position to be appointed by Declaration of Candidacy before the Imperial Conclave while a national position would be appointed by the people of that nation through the Imperial Bourse.

Benefits

Ritual Texts

The magicians of a college can be directed to research the formula of a new ritual so that it can be mastered. The ritual must already exist in the form of an arcane projection, but there is no requirement to select one they have personally commissioned. A college can work on formalising one ritual at a time, and the research may take anywhere from a season to several years depending on the complexity and the resources available. The amount of time it takes to complete research into a ritual depends on the magnitude of that ritual.

It requires three months (one season) for every 10 ranks of magnitude the final ritual will have.

If research is not completed, the college keeps notes on their work so far, and may resume it at a later date from where it was left off.

At the completion, the master of the college receives a ritual text suitable for use in mastering the ritual. They may keep the knowledge of the ritual restricted to themselves and their allies, or through a Declaration of Imperial Lore the Conclave can have that ritual added to the wider body of Imperial Lore, making it available to any ritual magician in the Empire.

Specialisation

A college may be created with a speciality in one of the six realms of magic. This specialisation is free, and is almost always declared when the college is commissioned. When the college is directing research towards a project that is part of the speciality lore, the work proceeds at the rate of 15 ranks of magnitude each season.

Furthermore, when working in the speciality realm, the master of the college can increase the rate at which the ritual is researched by spending money to purchase rare materials, esoteric tomes and exceptional equipment, and to secure the temporary assistance of reclusive or avaricious experts.

The first five ranks of additional research in a season cost 2 Thrones. The next five ranks cost a further 5 Thrones. The next five ranks cost a further 10 Thrones, and so on doubling the price for each additional five ranks of research within the same season.

A college can have only one specialisation; changing a specialisation once it has been declared would be extremely expensive.

- Labour: 45 Thrones

There are a limited number of magicians in the Empire who are prepared to help with research of new rituals. This means that each new college of magic that is constructed will have an increasing upkeep cost - to reflect the fact that it must pay more to entice those independent magicians that remain to work there.

College of the Liberated

Overview

This sturdy college stands in Trivento, in the League territory of Sarvos. It was initially constructed to help deal with an influx of freed orc slaves brought to the Empire from the Principalities of Jarm. Today, most of the students are young League citizens seeking to better their lot in life.

The college guides people toward Prosperity by providing education and apprenticeships to the poor and disadvantaged - and by doing so thereby increase the productivity of all businesses in Sarvos. There was some controversy around this project with regard to the legal status of the orc slaves, but that was quickly resolved by the magistrates. Both the college - and the originator of the scheme Duke Ferrero Sanguineo Rezia di Tassato of the Gilded Horn Carta - have received much praise from the Church of the Little Mother who have called for similar schemes in other parts of the Empire.

A significant majority of the orcs for whom the college was built - the slaves from Jarm - now live among the Imperial Orcs as part of their nation. They are referred to as the liberated.

History

The College was commissioned by the Imperial Senate in Winter 379YE to deal with an influx of orcs from the Principalities of Jarm. In the years since, most of the orc students who have passed through its doors have moved on, one way or another. Today, the college provides education and apprenticeships to the poor and disadvantaged of Sarvos.

Of the three hundred or so freed slaves who came to the Empire from Jarm, only around a third still remain in Sarvos. Some still live in Trivento, but most have been lured to the Jewelled City itself. Despite their time at the college, many struggle to compete with professional League citizens who have enjoyed more education and greater opportunities. While some are able to hold jobs as assistants to shopkeepers, most have ended up as labourers of one type or another - farmhands, dockworkers, miners, drovers. There are even a very few nasty rumours that at least one old-style "fighting pit" has been reopened somewhere in Caricomare, with orc gladiators providing the main attraction as they did in the bad old days before the Orc revolt.

Part of the problem has been caused by the sack of Sarvos, a mere three months after work on the College was completed. The Jarmish orcs are often treated with suspicion by citizens of Sarvos, concerned that they may be more inclined to support the Grendel than their human benefactors. There seems to be little basis for this prejudice - after all, there were no College orcs in Sarvos during the time of the invasion - they were all still in Trivento. There have been a handful of violent incidents of violence aimed at the newcomers, but for the most part the prejudice is less obvious.

It is no surprise, then, that two-thirds of the orcs educated at the College have chosen to move elsewhere. Most take the long overland trip to Skarsind, looking to find new lives for themselves. Ironically, they have little difficulty finding employment there. Many are more than happy to work in the mines the Imperial Orcs eschew, alongside the human miners who make up the majority of mineworkers in Skarsind. Others find the skills learned in their apprenticeship in the League to be rare among the Imperial Orcs, and settle into comfortable positions running or helping to run businesses - such as those associated with Torfast Trading Post. College orcs settling in Skarsind invariably bond to the Imperial Orc egregore, and set about industriously building new lives for themselves and their families.

When Casimir Marcelino di Sarvos spoke in the Imperial Synod encouraging the people of Sarvos to show hospitality to the freed Jarmish slaves, but to be vigilant to the possibility of Grendel infiltrators, his words have polarised opinion somewhat. Those already predisposed to view the College orcs as citizens make more of an effort to help them improve their status in the League. Those already suspicious of the orcs point to the possibility of Grendel orcs among them, and grumble. Most people don't care one way or another of course - this is Sarvos and there are more important things to worry about - but discussion between the two opposed sides is becoming more heated. Taken from "The Parents of Security" wind of fortune

Great Work

The College of the Liberated is a great work. Each season, it produces additional wealth which is distributed equally between every business resource in Sarvos owned by a League citizen who attended the previous event.

Combat skills

Thrown

You may throw weapons of 8" or larger provided that it has been passed as safe for throwing. Throwing weapons may include axes and javelins, but you cannot throw shuriken, rocks or tiny throwing knives shorter than 8" long.

Ambidexterity

This skill allows you to simultaneously wield two weapons (or implements) up to 42" long each. Your opponent still only takes one hit per second at most if hit swiftly and repeatedly - even when using two weapons at once. It is not possible to wield two weapons at once without this skill. You cannot wield two weapons if either is longer than 42".

Marksman

You may use a bow or crossbow. All missile weapons require both hands to shoot, and do IMPALE automatically, with no need to call the effect.

Weapon Master

This skill allows you to wield one-handed spears, two-handed weapons, pole-arms and pikes.

Shield

Any character can use a buckler up to 15" in diameter. A character with this skill can use a larger shield; the maximum size for the shield is based on the shield shape.

A shield must be gripped by a handle held in the hand to protect the wearer. A shield that is simply strapped to the body does not protect the wearer. All blows that strike a slung shield are considered to hit the character wearing it.

Some special calls still affect a character even if the blow is blocked by a shield and it is important for a shield user to know which ones these are so they can react appropriately. A character is still repelled, entangled, or knocked off their feet if the blow strikes their shield, although they do not lose any hits.

Endurance

You gain 1 additional global hit each time you purchase this skill. The cost to purchase this skill increases by 1 pt each time you purchase this skill.

Fortitude

Normal characters bleed to death in three minutes if they are reduced to zero hits. Each time you purchase this skill the time taken for your character to bleed to death increases. The increase is one minute for the first level of fortitude purchased, two minutes for the second level and so on. The cost to purchase this skill increases by 1 pt each time you purchase this skill.

Normal characters bleed to death in thirty seconds when affected by venom. Each level of this skill that you purchase gives you ten additional seconds before you become terminal when affected by venom. The increase is ten seconds for the first level of fortitude purchased, ten seconds for the second level and so on.

Combing the Beach

Rules

Day Magnitude 20

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. The ritual targets a written document of no more than two hundred and fifty words on a single subject.

Effects

This ritual sends a document of no more than two hundred and fifty words to the eternal Roshanwe. The document should detail facts, conclusions and beliefs related to a single topic. It is important to be clear about what single topic the ritualists wish to know more about, and what they already know.

The eternal will respond with a document of their own which details a question about that topic that may help the petitioners with their investigations. To receive Roshanwe's answer, one of the ritual contributors should perform the operate portal spell at a regio aligned with the Day realm one hour after the ritual was performed.

Description

This ritual was developed at the Halls of Knowledge in Zenith under the direction of Octavius of the Spire of the Auric Horizon, Provost of the Halls of Knowledge. The initial work was undertaken by the eternal Roshanwe, or one of her agents – she presented the arcane projection from which the ritual was developed as a gift to the Empire.

The ritual was initially subject of a declaration of Imperial lore, under the name “Unknown Unknown”. The Imperial Conclave agreed that the ritual would be entered into Imperial lore before it had been formulated at the Halls of Knowledge – a risky proposition as the ritual may have changed in any number of ways during the process of codification. The Civil Service have since updated and strengthened the rules on how a declaration of Imperial lore is made to prevent such a situation occurring again.

Rather than providing direct answers to questions, the eternal Roshanwe favours guiding seekers to find their own solutions. Unlike rituals such as Swim Leviathan's Depth and Clear Counsel of the Everflowing River, this ritual does not deliver answers to questions posed by the ritualists. Rather, it is a tool to help find a question that may have been overlooked, or to suggest an avenue of investigation that might not have occurred to the petitioners. In this way, Roshanwe can aid the magicians of the Empire to find their own answers to the mysteries that vex them.

Performing the ritual requires the creation of a clearly-written document that lays out the things that the questioners already know. This will be challenging within the limited number of words – it encourages the questioners to be precise, as well as concise. There is generally little need to include information that is common knowledge across the Empire (OOC Note: that is included on the public wiki). Roshanwe knows as much about the Empire as any Imperial citizen and assumes that the wise among them know that much at least.

The response from Roshanwe will likewise be concise. The eternal will suggest a question that the petitioners should ask themselves about the information they have provided, one that may help them to find a path to the answer they seek. There is no direct communication – the answer is received in written form.

It is important to understand that while this ritual sends a message to Roshanwe, it is not a method of communication with the eternal per se. Roshanwe agrees to review the findings of the document they are sent, but nothing more. Attempts to use it for purposes other than this – to send a missive to the eternal for example, or to ask for their aid in a different manner – will prove disappointing. During codification, experiments along these lines resulted in Roshanwe responding with the question “Do you understand how this ritual works?”

Contents

- 1 Rules
 - 1.1 Day Magnitude 20
 - 1.2 Performing the Ritual
 - 1.3 Effects
- 2 Description
- 3 Common Elements

This is a divination ritual, that involves a form of limited communication with an eternal. The target of the ritual is a document, no more than two hundred and fifty words, that lays out as much as possible (within the limits) about a situation or problem. At the completion of the ritual, the document vanishes.

As the focus of the ritual, it makes sense to adorn the document itself the rune Sular, whose nature is Discovery. It may be sprinkled with droplets of fresh or salt water, evoking the imagery of the eternal ocean of the realm of Day. Unsurprisingly, Roshanwe is evoked, but so might be the names of Paragons or Exemplars of Wisdom. Indeed, the ritual has several elements that seem to have been informed by the Imperial understanding of that Virtue – that brevity is a tool of the wise, that locating the correct questions are more important than the wrong answers. Invocations related to Wisdom are very appropriate elements even for magicians who do not normally employ the theurgic tradition.

A recitation of the document is a logical inclusion in the ritual so that every member of the coven performing it knows the nature of their communication with Roshanwe. After the document vanishes, and the ritual is thus complete, one of the participants should return to the regio where the ritual was cast roughly an hour later. They then perform the operate portal spell, calling out to Roshanwe by one or more of her many names.

Come my pretty one

Come, My Pretty One - Traditional Dawnish courting song
Lyrics and music by Claire Bowden

<https://soundcloud.com/herecosyouare-1/come-my-pretty-way>

A pdf of the tune and lyrics can be found here.

Come, my pretty one, and dance with me, All in your red dress, trimmed with ribbons, There's a whole wide world out there for you to see, But the days are short, and few in number, So dance, dance, dance, dance, dance, dance, dance, dance, dance, dance, dance, My pretty one.

Come, my merry one, and sing with me, All by the firelight, gaily glowing, There's a whole wide world out there for you to see, But the night is dark, and filled with terrors,* So sing, sing, sing, sing, sing, sing, sing, sing, sing, sing, sing, My merry one

Come my bravest one and fight with me, All in your armour, brightly gleaming, There's a whole wide world out there for you to see, Your enemy's near and great in number, So fight, fight, etc... My bravest one.

Come, my jolly one and drink with me, Where wine and beer are freely flowing, There's a whole wide world out there for you to see, And bring back tales of your valour, So drink, drink etc My jolly one.

Come, my hungry one and feast with me, All in your best coat, or your leathers, There's a whole wide world out there for you to see, But it wouldn't serve to leave here starving, So feast, feast, etc My hungry one.

Come, my darling one and lie with me, With naught between but breath and longing, There's a whole wide world out there for you to see, But the night is dark, and all too lonely, So lie, lie, etc My darling one.

Come, my fearless one and die with me, All for the glory and songs hereafter, There's a whole wide world out there for you to see, But our lives are short and ever changing, So die, die, etc My fearless one.

Commission

Overview

Overview

The Imperial Senate has the power to commission important projects or great works of construction that will benefit the Empire. Any Imperial citizen can make use of mithril, weirwood or white granite they have purchased to improve a resource they own. But regardless of how much wealth they possess, no citizen can recruit their own army or simply order the construction of a great work unless they have been granted the authority to do so by a Senate motion or by a title such as Bearer of an Imperial Wayleave or Arcane Architect.

Most commissions automatically result in the creation of a new Imperial title, for example raising a new army causes the creation of a new Imperial general. Creating this title is an integral part of the commission and does not require a second motion to be considered by the Senate.

Creating a New Commission

The following pages describe the current library of known commissions distilled from the ledgers maintained by the Imperial civil service. We will maintain this list with any new forms of commissions that develop in play.

Military Commissions

- Imperial army
- Imperial navy
- Fortification

Civilian Commissions

- Sinecure
- Ministry

- Embassy
- College of Magic
- Runeforge
- Folly

Costing

Any commission that is proposed by a senator will be costed by the civil service, so that the Senate can make an informed decision on whether to pass the motion. The civil service use extensive ledgers of known costs based on the desired outcome - so they can cost any request for something that has been built before - or a variation thereof - provided the citizen makes clear what they want the commission to do. Where the desired outcome is not stated or not clear then the costing takes longer as the civil service are forced to guess what the proposer wanted.

Most costs are defined in terms of the number of wains of mithril, weirwood and white granite which are required to complete the construction. Costings will also state any ongoing upkeep costs as well as the time and money required to complete the construction. Civil servants are present during the construction of the commission, so it is not possible to construct anything other than the commission approved by the Senate.

It is possible to request something that has never been constructed before, but such a construction may not be physically possible and the costing is likely to take much longer, as much as a year. The civil service have to do extensive research to look into the practicality of the request and use day magic to make predictions of the materials required.

The civil service try to provide costings to any citizen who requests them, but if they are unusually busy then they will prioritize requests for costs which are linked to a motion that has actually been proposed.

Necessary Details

Whenever a new commission is being created several important details need to be communicated to the Civil Service. We will provide help or advice on creating these details on request. In particular, players are welcome to email Profound Decisions to discuss new commissions they are seeking to have created. If any details are omitted then we will either try to contact the player whose character proposed the motion to create the commission to get details from them, or else we will make up the missing facts.

The commission itself will need a name, so that it can be clearly identified in Imperial Records.

The necessary details include the rough location where the commission is to be raised or built - usually the territory and region are sufficient.

Most commissions have a standard cost for mithril, weirwood and white granite, for example a new Imperial army requires 200 wains of mithril and 50 crowns, so this detail is fixed. If the commission can be of variable size, then the necessary details include what materials will be used to complete the commission to the size desired by the citizen overseeing the project.

Commissions that result in the creation of a new Imperial title also require the necessary details for the new title. The position will need a name. If the Imperial title bears any particular duties or responsibilities then this is particularly important information.

The civil service need to have a clear idea of the nature of any commission that is being built, where that is not clear. A sinecure, for example, is a very general term, only marginally more specific than a word like "building" or "construction". It is used by the Empire to describe any construction designed to produce a fixed income. A concise overview on the nature and purpose of a commission may be relevant to the Senate's decision to pass a motion; a more detailed description can be provided to the civil service later. Sinecures, ministries, great works etc. are all effectively classifications for different types of structure that the Senate can commission. It is very helpful to provide as much flavour and detail on how an individual commission works as possible. While these in-character details do not affect the rules, they are important for the campaign and can influence plot developments involving the commission.

Limitations

New Commissions

The Empire has limited capabilities to oversee new commissions. In a given season, the civil service is able to deal with only twelve new commissions. Attempts to commission more than twelve projects in a single summit beyond this will fail - they will not be actioned. This includes commissions from the senate, and from Imperial titles given the ability to commission via an announcement.

Imperial Titles

The approval of the Imperial Senate is required to approve the commission of any significant construction. Because of the great costs involved in creating a structure using mithril, weirwood, or white granite, most commissions are built to provide important practical benefits. If these benefits require administration or oversight by a citizen then the constitution mandates that a suitable Imperial title be created and a citizen with no other Imperial title be appointed to the position.

As a result of these rules laid down at the dawn of the Empire the Constitutional Court does not allow the Senate to authorize a commission that would provide tangible benefits to an individual citizen without creating an Imperial title to be responsible for the commission and any benefits or powers it provides.

Citizens shall not hold more than one high office at a time and must exercise their powers in person; those whose virtue causes them to be offered numerous Imperial titles must choose between them. In this way no citizen shall accumulate so much responsibility that they consider themselves better than their fellows.

Some Imperial commissions - most notably fortifications, follies, and great works do not provide practical benefits that an individual could gain from. The Imperial Senate may still create an Imperial title with responsibility for the commission if they wish, by including explicit instructions to this effect in the wording of the motion.

There can only ever be a single Imperial title with responsibility for a commission. Whoever is appointed to the title becomes the legal custodian of the commission; if it were to be threatened in any way, it would be their responsibility to deal with those threats. Likewise, if any opportunity relating to the commission presented itself, they would make any decisions needed to take advantage of it.

Maximum numbers of Imperial Forces

The Empire cannot sustain an unlimited number of armies and navies. In addition to the significant drain on the treasury of the Imperial Senate, each individual nation can only provide so many soldiers. The supply number for each nation represents the maximum number of Imperial forces (armies and navies) that nation can sustain at any given time. The Senate cannot raise a new Imperial army or navy of that nation if it would take the nation over its supply number.

At this time, the maximum number of forces a nation can support are as follows:

- Dawn, the Marches, and Highguard: 4 armies each
- The Brass Coast, Navarr, Varushka and Wintermark: 3 armies each
- The Imperial Orcs, and the League: 2 armies each (but the Imperial Orcs experience further limitations to this number)
- Urizen 1 army

A nation cannot contribute its support to maintain a force from another nation. The only way for players to increase the number of armies and navies a nation can support is to conquer additional territory. Likewise, the loss of territory to the barbarians may reduce the supply number for that nation.

Insufficient Supply

If a nation ever has more armies and navies than it can support, all that nation's forces suffer significant penalties until this imbalance is rectified.

Each army and navy controlled by that nation suffers automatic losses of 500 force (or 750 force for a Large army) each season. In addition, no army or navy controlled by that nation gets natural resupply (nor can it take advantage of any benefits that rely on natural supply such as the ritual Brotherhood of Tian).

The senate may pass a motion to disband an army.

Domestic affairs

Most commissions can only be constructed in a region controlled by the Empire. Spy networks are an example of a current exception.

Opportunities

Opportunities are seeded into the game from plot. Opportunities are usually commissions; often they will circumvent or exceed the regular play balanced rules for determining the outcome of a commission.

A commission opportunity must be proposed by a senator to be voted on as any normal commission, but it may provide the ability to do something at reduced cost, or in a way that could not normally be achieved. The nature of the plot will normally dictate what benefits the opportunity provides, as well as what information is available on those benefits.

Improvements and Repairs

In addition to new commissions, the Senate may also pass motions to upgrade or improve existing commissions. In the case of armies and fortifications they can also pass motions to expend the resources needed to return the army to full strength or repair the fortification. These motions follow the same processes used for new commissions.

Implementing a Commission

Any player whose character is providing wains of money for a commission, should put the coins and the documents representing the wains of mithril, weirwood and white granite that they are committing to their project in the bag that they hand in at the end of the event. They should then email Profound Decisions to make us aware that they want to pay for a commission. We will remove the money or resources from their inventory as soon as we are aware that you wish to make a payment. If anything is removed from your inventory by us that you did not wish to use in this way then please let us know as quickly as possible.

The responsibility for implementing a motion lies with the senator who passed the motion. They are considered to be in charge of the work and the civil service will liaise with them to obtain any necessary details which have not been included in the wording of the motion. However, once the Senate has passed a motion, then the legal authority has been granted to create the commission has been granted, so any character can provide the resources needed to build the commission. The only exception is where the wording of the motion explicitly states that the civil service should only accept materials from a specific individual.

Please do not include a note when you hand in your wains as it is impossible to process these notes at the point where your bag is processed.

Lapsed Commissions

A Senate commission has a year to begin construction from the date it passes.

In the event that no payments have been made against a construction for a period of one year, a motion will lapse and will no longer be considered under construction. A payment is considered to be at least one season's worth of the required materials. It requires fresh authorisation by the Imperial Senate to restart a lapsed commission, and may require a fresh costing from the civil service.

At this time, there are no lapsed motions of commission.

Oversight

If the Senate passes a commission, then the member of the Senate that proposed the motion is then responsible for overseeing the project. Any funds allocated from the treasury are given directly to the proposer to use for the completion of the commission. The citizen remains responsible for the commission and legally empowered to authorize it, even if they lose their position in the Senate during that time. The only way a commission overseer can be changed is if the citizen dies or is excommunicated; only then is Senate legally permitted to pass a motion to assign one of their number to complete the project.

A character can go about spending their funds as they see fit, and can delegate some or all of the responsibility to others, but they are ultimately considered to be responsible for ensuring the project is completed.

Commission Egregore histories

We propose the creation of a written history of the lives of the Egregores and their hosts. This work will be collated and maintained by Gwylwr of the Carrion and other interested historians selected by him and will be submitted to the Imperial Archives.

Proposed by Miaren, seconded by Hercynia.

Overview

- Supporting the creation of a document.
- Passed with 3 votes against.

Date

- Spring 377YE.

Progress

- Unknown.

Constitution

- The Senate has not created a position with the authority, responsibility or stipend to achieve this task

The civil service opinion is that the Senate could have chosen to create an Imperial position with the responsibility to compile Egregore biographies and histories. The position could have been granted a stipend. Without the creation of an Imperial position, this motion has no legal implications.

It is important to note that no Egregore, current or past, is obligated to co-operate with this project - any more than any citizen of the Empire is required to share their history with strangers.

Campaign Outcome

While there are no Imperial archives as such, reasonable efforts will be made to ensure that copies of completed histories will be made available to the people of the Empire.

- Passed 25 votes to 3.

Date

- Passed Autumn 377YE.

Cost

- 10 Thrones.

Campaign Outcome

Constitution

The Imperial treasury that is made available to the Senate is what remains from taxation and auctions in the Imperial Bourse after appropriate deductions to meet the running costs of the Empire are removed. The Master of the Imperial Mint receives a breakdown of income and expenditure for the Empire which includes outgoings for Imperial armies, fortifications, stipends, running costs for any great work that require them and the costs to administer the territories of the Empire. The Senate has the ability to curtail most of these outgoings by abrogating past motions, demobilizing armies and dismantling existing fortifications and great works but they cannot change the Empire's territorial administration costs, these are fixed.

Notes

The level of detail provided in information available to the Master of the Mint and the Senate is set by the limits for Abstraction in the game.

Commonwealth

This is a placeholder page for content that PD are actively working on.

The information presented here is designed to give a feel for the foreign nation, and is by no means exhaustive. The focus of the Empire campaign is on the Empire and its citizens, and while this information can be used to create backgrounds or inform role-playing on the field; it is not intended that players portray characters from this foreign nation without discussion with Profound Decisions.

Overview

The Commonwealth is a young nation, taking its first major steps on the world stage. Guided by a philosophy of the greatest good for the greatest number of people, the nation is convinced that it can make the world a better place - a conviction that makes its neighbours very nervous. Three times in the last fifty years, the Commonwealth has been at war with nearby countries and in each case they have been victorious. Yet, rather than turning their conquered enemies into vassals, they have done everything possible to incorporate them into the greater Commonwealth. Membership brings a level of freedom and comfort seen in few other places - provided one is prepared to accept the philosophy of the greater good.

Like the Empire, the Commonwealth is dominated by humans (both lineaged and unlineaged). Unlike the Empire, the Commonwealth population includes significant numbers of both orcs and daeva as well. Indeed, the Commonwealth recognises all sapient beings as having equal standing before their law, and equal opportunities within their society - a stance that contributes to their poor relations with the Principalities of Jarm.

Of particular interest to Imperial citizens are the Commonwealth ports which are open to trade with the Empire.

Terrain

The Commonwealth lies to the south-east of the Empire, and takes many weeks of sailing by boat to reach. It shares the same land-mass as the Principalities of Jarm and, while they do not share a border, their uncomfortable proximity leads great deal of friction between the two nations.

History

The Commonwealth is a comparatively young nation. It has its roots in an old kingdom that once occupied the area that is now the core of the Commonwealth. Some time around 20YE, the old monarchy collapsed into a civil war that raged for over a century as the various heirs and pretenders to the royal throne (and their descendants) fought to be recognised as the One True Ruler. By 120YE, the area had stabilized slightly into five smaller states, each locked in a vicious struggle for dominance with their neighbours and suffering regular internal coups and schisms.

Into this chaos came a philosopher named Leonitz Altmann whose extensive writings came to form the core of the Commonwealth philosophy of the greatest good for the largest number of people. His teachings were embraced especially by the daeva soldiers who served in the armies of the Successor Monarchies - and they quickly spread the teachings to their human and orc peers. An organised coup by the militaries of all five monarchies swept away the idea of rule by hereditary nobles and re-united the Successor Monarchies into a single nation - the Commonwealth.

The coup was by no means bloodless, but it succeeded in part due to a great deal of grassroots support both from a civilian population sick of unjust taxes and the tyranny of the landed nobility, and by free thinkers and egalitarianists in all walks of life. Since then, the Commonwealth has steadily expanded - and not only through conquest. Several smaller nations adjacent to the Commonwealth peacefully petitioned for admittance when it became clear that the social, cultural, and economic benefits of doing so far outweighed the requirement to adopt the Commonwealth's political systems.

People

The modern Commonwealth is a highly meritocratic stratocracy. All political power in the Commonwealth lies in the hands of the military. Only those who serve are seen as worthy to make decisions about the future of their nation. Final executive power lies in the hands of the general council. Retired military officers often return to civilian life, but a sizeable number of ex-soldiers choose to continue to serve their nation in support roles; while they no longer make decisions themselves, they offer advice and logistical support to the men and women who do.

The general council does not exist in a vacuum, however: a second "house" of power exists, composed of the wisest and best-educated philosophers, thinkers, and planners. The Commonwealth is known throughout the world for its universities - centres of academic excellence that study everything from comparative religion to engineering, from medicine to ethics - and it is the universities that advise the military on courses of action that they can take to pursue the nation's goals. Some of the most influential people in the Commonwealth are the philosophers who dedicate themselves to establishing the most ethical course of action for their nation.

The civilian population possesses a great deal of freedom, but they cannot hold political rank nor participate directly in government. They are expected to co-operate with and support the military. They can accumulate personal wealth, and ultimately serve to drive the economy of the Commonwealth, but only those who take up military service can gain a voice in the running of their nation.

The practice of slavery is seen as one of the greatest evils to beset the world; the Commonwealth is absolutely dedicated to the emancipation of all slaves everywhere and their incorporation into the Commonwealth. A slave cannot engage in enlightened choice; the idea that a sapient being might be reduced to the status of an object is absolutely abhorrent to the Commonwealth. This vile institution is one of the things guaranteed to stoke the passions of any good citizen of the Commonwealth - more than any other form of tyranny, they are dedicated to its absolute destruction.

In addition to the ideas promoted by the common good, the people of the Commonwealth are known for a dynamic approach to life and its problems. The truism "was du heute kannst besorgen, verschiebe nicht auf morgen" (roughly "Don't put off until tomorrow what you can do today") is a touchstone among the people of the Commonwealth. This is almost certainly down to the influence of the daeva. While humans and orcs tend to see the short lifespan of the daeva as a tragedy, the daeva themselves see it as a spur towards action. Act now, they say, because you may not see another sunrise. Much of the Commonwealth's culture is drawn from the tension between the idea of taking action today, and the desire to ensure that action is ethically sound.

Everyone in the Commonwealth speaks the Gemeinsamesprache (the "common tongue"). All official documents are written in this language, and while the Commonwealth carefully preserves many of the traditions of the nations that join it, it requires every child to learn the Gemeinsamesprache as their first language. Other tongues exist, and while the Commonwealth makes no effort to stamp them out, they are not promoted. Language, as the Commonwealth philosophers say, shapes thought. Language differences make misunderstandings easier, and prevent true understanding between sapients. The soldiers have a more practical approach - they do not need to translate a half-heard order on the battlefield before they can obey it.

Politics

All political power lies in the hands of the military and all government positions are held by actively serving soldiers. Only those engaged in active service are able to participate in political decision making. Ultimate authority lies in the hands of the generals, each of whom leads a significant armed force. These generals make decisions on behalf of the entire nation as part of a unified general council.

The soldiers of the Commonwealth - from the lowest footsoldier all the way up to the most powerful generals - swear an oath, not to the Commonwealth itself, but to the idea of the common good. This oath is fairly straightforward and can be summed up as "Handle so, dass das größtmögliche Maß an Gutem entsteht!" (Act according to the principle of the greatest good for the greatest number of people).

In all cases, the Commonwealth select their own leaders: ultimate political power lies in the hands of the soldiers. For example, a unit of soldiers select their own captain from among their own ranks - not even the generals can appoint someone to a leadership position. This has led to a more dynamic military that is largely free from the dangers of nepotism or corruption. Rather than spending their time attempting to impress their superiors, ambitious Commonwealth citizens spend their time gaining the confidence of their peers and proving their competence to those who will be most impacted by it. At the end of the day, the soldiers tend almost overwhelmingly to select leaders that they trust to make life-or-death decisions on a daily basis.

The military council does not exist in a vacuum. If the Commonwealth's "military council" has ultimate executive and legislative power, the ultimate administrative power lies with the philosophers and academics. The universities work together to create a "second house" of government reminiscent of modern think tanks. The universities present proposals for laws and building projects to the general council based on careful study and heated debate. Such projects often require extensive commitment of people and resources; the generals determine which projects will be implemented and which will be refused via complex funding agreements.

The Commonwealth considers this two-tier approach to be very effective. The important ideas come from the people who are good at ideas but poor at execution/practicality, but the decisions about which policies to put into operation lie with the people who excel at practicality. The same people who are responsible for protecting the nation from outside threats and maintaining order are charged with selecting and implementing the policies proposed by the intelligentsia.

There is no doubt that the Commonwealth is an aggressive, expansionist nation, but they are not interested in subjugating or culturally dominating their conquered neighbours. They are also not driven by a desire for wealth, or for land, but by an absolute commitment to the idea of spreading the philosophy of the greater good. A common claim from the philosophers of the Commonwealth is that they will only consider going to war if they can prove that the suffering caused by doing so will be less in the long term than the suffering caused by doing nothing.

Magic

While the Commonwealth is militarily extremely powerful, and is well-respected for its commitment to learning and education, it has comparatively few magicians. Their Zauberer are expected to put their magic towards the service of the military, and there is a great emphasis on practical application over theory. Those who master ritual magic are very much in the minority - the majority of Commonwealth magicians focus on spellcasting, or master a handful of low-magnitude rituals that can be performed without the need for a coven.

More powerful groups of magicians do exist, but they are almost exclusively connected to one of the Commonwealth armies; they are soldiers, not scholars. Unsurprisingly, the Commonwealth focuses on magic of use on the battlefield - their most powerful ritual magicians master the lores of Autumn and Summer, and the healing powers of Spring. The rituals of Day and Night are seen as the province of philosophers, while the realm of Winter is seen as particularly suspect, and its use discouraged.

Religion

The common good contains many ideas that the priests of the Way might recognise. It encourages loyalty and personal pride; it respects courage, enshrines wisdom as a lofty ideal, and encourages prosperity and ambition. Yet it does not recognise these virtues as distinct - rather, it promotes the idea of living a good life, a life founded on ethical principles, that recognises both individual freedom and communal responsibility. Commonwealth priests have a not-entirely unearned reputation for being condescending to the "backwards" priests of the Imperial Synod.

Commonwealth priests are almost always philosophers and scholars. They promote ethical behaviour with an emphasis on both personal liberty and personal responsibility, whilst also encouraging community spirit and respect for other sapient. Many of these philosophers become chaplains, serving on the front lines as soldiers. Others engage in more pastoral care, tending to the spiritual needs of their communities, being particularly active in the role of educators and counsellors. While religious scholars all embrace the core philosophy of the greater good (as laid out by Altmann), there are several competing schools of thought as to how to put these ideas into practice. Most students of Altmann's philosophy agree, however, that the first step toward achieving the greatest good for the greatest number of people lies in choosing to live an ethical life; to avoid causing suffering to others; and to actively reduce the suffering of other sapient peoples.

When foreigners think of the Commonwealth religion, however, they usually imagine the paladins. The paladin orders go beyond the role of advisors and educators, and actively seek to promote the philosophy of the greater good. Many serve as armoured knights who inspire and support their fellow soldiers directly, often in the vanguard. Others have a reputation for more underhand behaviour - they actively infiltrate other nations and encourage the people to revolt against tyrants or oppressive laws.

In particular, chaplains and paladins alike engage in ceremonial practices that would be familiar to followers of the Way. Unlike Imperial or Sumaah priests, however, they eschew using ceremonies which create auras (specifically they employ anointing, consecration, and hallowing only to remove existing auras). In the Commonwealth, the creation of auras is considered a wicked act, practiced by witches and sorcerers. These auras, they argue, are a form of oppression. Sapient beings are born with free will, and spiritual auras attempt to subvert that free will. As a consequence, many paladins of the Commonwealth who master these religious ceremonies (as well as insight and exorcism) commit themselves to tracking down and eradicating spiritual auras and menaces (such as ghosts). Paladins who specialise in this role are sometimes called witch hunters.

This philosophy is often seen by Imperial priests as being an expression of Lucidianism, but the movements are unrelated. Lucidianism grows out of the desire to explore the seven virtues without the distractions caused by auras; the Commonwealth opposition to auras runs much deeper and is based around complex concepts of self-determination and the power of enlightened choice.

Economics

At the lowest level, the economy of the Commonwealth is somewhat familiar. The civilian population maintain resources, and buy and sell goods to each other, and to the armies. All the mithril, white granite, weirwood, and ilium in the Commonwealth is ultimately controlled by the armies, however. The armies also have an entire class of structures that the Empire might call "intermediate Bourse resources" - large scale sinecures that secure additional resources for the armies. The armies use these resources to supply themselves, and to invest in projects suggested by the universities. The surplus is sold to the civilian population, and the money used to buy bread, shoes, and swords. This represents a form of "trickle down economics" but it is not that straightforward - the civilian buys Bourse resources from the army to improve their resource, and then they have more materials to sell to the military.

The Commonwealth invests heavily in infrastructure. The universities propose projects that they believe will improve life for the citizens in an area, and the generals determine how much their army is prepared to contribute to making that project a reality. The more impact the project has, and the more people it effects, the more likely it is that enough generals will be invested enough in the outcome to invest in the project. This leads to a slightly paradoxical situation in which it is easier for the Commonwealth to build a great work than it is (for example) for you to get the potholes outside your house fixed.

The ideals of the common good are held up in the economic arena as elsewhere; this is particularly apparent in foreign trade. The Commonwealth imposes punitive tariffs and import taxes on any nation that practices slavery, for example - when they are prepared to deal with them at all. The universities regularly debate the ethics of having anything to do with foreign nations that keep slaves, but the general consensus is that absolute sanctions would ultimately do more harm than good. Any merchant from Asavea or Jarm had best get used to regular lectures about the evils of slavery if they wish to do any business in the Commonwealth - and few bother as there are better profits to be made elsewhere.

The irony of the Commonwealth is that it can only truly exist while it is expanding. Their philosophers are well aware that they will eventually have to find a new form of government, once there is no longer any need for an active military. They are a nation that lives in the moment, but they are wise enough to know that eventually someone will have to come up with a new idea about how to live - once they have conquered the entire world, of course."

Emperor Frederick

Look and Feel

The Commonwealth look and feel are very much a work in progress, but some elements of their costume are detailed here.

Clothing in the Commonwealth is practical and utilitarian. Leather, wool, and fur are the most common materials used throughout the Commonwealth. The most common style for civilian clothing is a buckled leather or wool jerkin over a quilted tunic or lightweight gambeson, with trousers. this image or this image might represent an off-duty soldier or merchant. The people of the Commonwealth do not usually reflect their rank in their clothing - rather, rank is presented with badges, medals, or insignia. A wealthy merchant may have a beautiful gold ring or necklace, but the idea of spending money on mere appearance is often seen as wasteful.

The Commonwealth tends to be cold, however, and whether armoured or off-duty, the people favour heavy fur-trimmed cloaks and fur-trimmed leather hats.

Chaplains, academics, magicians, and many paladins favour an even more austere look; black robes are standard. The gentleman on the left in this picture from the Seventh Sea roleplaying game, represents the style embraced by the academics and those who favour the religious life (albeit they will recreate it in black). In character, it is modelled after the clothing worn by the philosopher Altmann who inspired the creation of the Commonwealth.

When it comes to armour, a full harness of plate is common at all ranks. The armour often belongs to the army itself, and is loaned to the lower ranks. The Commonwealth prides itself on providing the best possible arms and armour to its soldiers - indeed, the common infantry in the Commonwealth are much more likely to have magic items than their counterparts in the Empire. In this image the man on the left and the woman in the middle represent Commonwealth soldiers.

An OOC Note on the Daeva

The daeva are a species, like humans and orcs. They are not found in the Empire, and are not known anywhere along the Bay of Catazar. We are still working on the precise details of this species, and wrangling over their appearance has been one of the factors that has delayed the Commonwealth for so long.

But there are two "facts" we know about them. One is that they are short lived - they mature quickly, and they seldom live more than thirty or forty years. This has given them a biological drive to take action - they are dynamic and energetic because they know that they will not be around for long.

The other thing we know about them is that they have an inbuilt drive to "make the world a better place". Both these drives have had a profound effect on the development of the Commonwealth.

The daeva are extremely unlikely to be made available as player characters.

Please do not e-mail Profound Decisions asking for more details of the daeva - we will share them with you once we know for certain what they are.

Commonwealth ports

This is a placeholder page for content that PD are actively working on.

Overview

There are two Commonwealth ports available to Imperial characters with the fleet resource; Leerdam in the east and Volkavaar in the west.

Leerdam (Eastern Commonwealth)

In Leerdam the Eastern Commonwealth finds its purest expression; traders from across the sprawling nation come to trade with foreign merchants, while mendicant preachers advocate their strange philosophy of "the greatest good" to visitors and residents alike.

Some of the oldest, and arguably richest, cities of the Commonwealth are found in the east. Leerdam serves as a provincial capital, a center for trade with the rest of the world. Some of the wealthiest men and women in the Commonwealth are found here, maintaining elaborate townhouses and a lifestyle that might impress an Asavean noble. Following the completion of an embassy in Siroc, a spacious estate on the southern outskirts of the city has been made available to the Imperial civil service, to function as an Imperial embassy to the Commonwealth.

Trade with Leerdam

A starting fleet resource that engages in trade with Leerdam during downtime will produce 3 doses of bladeroot, 3 ingots of tempest jade, 3 ingots of green iron and 2 measures of beggar's Lye. A fleet that has been upgraded will produce more valuable resources according to this chart of foreign ports.

Volkavaar (Western Commonwealth)

The mithril spires of Volkavaar are snow-bound all year round. Here the Commonwealth operates its great university of magic and engineering, and the grand Temple of the Common Good serves as a point of pilgrimage for their strange faith.

Over the last century a program of public works has transformed the western provinces from isolated rural communities to integrated towns and cities with all the advantages that Commonwealth artisans can provide. Roads snake through dark pinewoods, sturdy stone bridges span previously unfordable rivers, and walls of white granite encircle most settlements. Flimsy wooden structures increasingly give way to granite and weirwood structures; entire new towns have been constructed to house labourers, carefully planned by the professors of the university of Volkavaar.

The progress of this urbanisation has led to a massive demand for building materials and labour. Quarries for white granite have unearthed rich veins of weltsilver in the hills, and the drive to harvest more and more lumber has opened up hitherto unexploited forests dripping with ambergelt. While many of these resources are turned to the great machine that is the Commonwealth's expansion, the surplus is traded across the world. Prior to Spring 380YE, the port of Volkavaar also sold surplus crystal mana produced in great abundance by the magicians of the western provinces. At that time, however, the emphasis in the port shifted away from mana and toward artisan's oil.

Trade with Volkavaar

A starting fleet resource that engages in trade with Volkavaar during downtime will produce 3 measures of ambergelt, 3 measures of weltsilver and 3 vials of artisan's oil. A fleet that has been upgraded will produce more valuable resources according to this chart of foreign ports.

Complaints

Overview

Many live roleplayers do not like to complain - experienced players understand that running an event is challenging and it can seem as if complaining will only add to this burden. It is true that complaints can be challenging for organizers to deal with - but often the only way we can identify that a problem is happening is if a player reports the matter.

Bringing an issue to our attention allows us to assess the problem and take whatever steps are appropriate to deal with it. If we are able to deal with the problem effectively then we can improve the event for everyone.

Contact Us

- Please report a problem as soon as possible
- Serious breaches of our code of conduct should be reported to a member of our management team

The more time that elapses, the harder it becomes to confirm the details of what has happened, so the best time to report an event is as soon as possible. If a problem is happening at an event, it is much easier to deal with the issue there and then.

If you are concerned that another player is breaking the game rules for their character then you should bring the matter to the attention of a referee. Minor breaches of the guidelines on good conduct at events can be reported to your nation's egregore, a referee, or a member of the GOD team. Anything serious should be brought to the attention of a member of our management team; the best way to get hold of one of us is to ask in GOD.

If the problem occurs between events then please contact our head office as quickly as possible to discuss the issue. The best way to report a problem is to email us but you can use any of the methods listed on our contact us page.

Civility

- You must be civil towards our volunteer crew at all times

Profound Decisions is a professional live roleplaying company dedicated to producing high quality events. However the majority of crew that you encounter at an event are volunteers who have freely given up their time to make the event more enjoyable for everyone. Please respect their generosity and remember that this is their hobby too. We require our players to be civil towards all members of the volunteer crew at all times.

If you have a problem then the appropriate members of crew will try to resolve that for you, but if a problem is substantial and you wish to complain about the matter then it is better to take that to a member of the the Profound Decisions management team.

Process

- We never disclose details of complaints or sanctions to other game systems

We will strive to deal with any complaint in a timely fashion. If a problem is reported at the event, we will address the issue there if that is practically possible. If you are contacting us by email then we will acknowledge receipt of your email as soon as we have read it.

We strive, where possible, to deal with any complaint by getting as many eye-witness accounts as possible. We will ask the participant raising the complaint to give us as full a description of events as they are able. If the participant does not want to make an anonymous complaint we will then approach the other party and ask them to provide us with their version of events. We will also try to get a statement from anyone else who was an eye-witness present at the time.

Once we have the best possible picture of what happened, we will make a decision and inform the complainant and the recipient of the complaint of the outcome. We will never disclose any details of complaints or sanctions taken against our players to third parties under any circumstances.

Confidence

- All complaints are treated in confidence by Profound Decisions management team
- We do not share details of complaints with other systems

All our crew are asked to treat issues raised with them with appropriate discretion and we endeavour to ensure that any issue that you raise with a member of the Profound Decisions management team will be treated in complete confidence.

We do not share details of complaints with other members of the LRP community or other game systems. We always refuse to confirm or deny if individuals have been issued with a warning or banned from our events. This is because the standard of proof that we would require to ensure compliance with our rules would be significantly higher if that outcome could be shared with other systems. Evidence of illegal behaviour at our events will be shared with the police as appropriate.

Complaints about other Participants

Process

We will strive to deal with any complaint in a timely fashion. If a problem is reported at the event, we will address the issue there if that is practically possible. If you are contacting us by email then we will acknowledge receipt of your email as soon as we have read it.

Where possible, we will try to get as many eye-witness accounts as possible. We will ask the participant raising the complaint to give us as full a description of events as they are able. If the participant does not want to make an anonymous complaint we will then approach the other party and ask them to provide us with their version of events. We will also try to get a statement from anyone else who was an eye-witness present at the time.

Once we have the best possible picture of what happened, we will make a decision and inform the complainant and the recipient of the complaint of the outcome.

Anonymity

If a participant wishes to report an incident but wishes to remain anonymous or does not otherwise want to make a formal complaint, then we adjust our complaints process to reflect their wishes. The issue is discussed in detail with the complainant and we investigate it as thoroughly as we are able to without compromising their anonymity. The incident is logged on the accused's participants database records; if there are independent complaints in the future against the same party then we would use the history of previous incidents in determining the outcome of subsequent complaints.

Formal Warning

In general we operate on a "single warning" policy; a player whose behaviour does not meet the standards outlined on this page receives a single warning. Further complaints about any aspect of their behaviour risks permanent exclusion, but if there is a complaint from a different source that the player has repeated the behaviour they have already been warned for then it is standard practice to permanently exclude them from our event.

The nature of complaints in LRP is that there is usually only hearsay evidence. We are not a court of law and that means we do not require proof beyond reasonable doubt, but we do try to take an approach that is fair to all parties. Giving the accused a single warning gives a reasonable balance; giving them a chance to avoid making a similar mistake in future and avoiding the more onerous requirement to make a judgement beyond reasonable doubt. In cases where an incident is egregious and where the facts are beyond reasonable doubt, we reserve the right to issue an immediate ban for a first offence.

Must avoid Policy

If it is appropriate given the nature of the complaint then we may suggest a must avoid order. This must avoid policy is designed to help a player who is having problems with the behaviour or presence of another player. The ruling is an option for the player bringing the problem behaviour to our attention; it is only applied where the player making the complaint believes it will benefit them.

Complaints about the Event

If your complaint is about some aspect of the event that Profound Decisions are responsible for then the best approach is to take the matter to the duty manager in GOD. If they can resolve the problem for you, they will attempt to do so, but if they cannot then they will find a member of the Profound Decisions management team to speak to you about the issue. They will discuss the issue with you directly and see if there is a solution that we can agree on that we would address your concerns.

Feedback (Redirected from Complaints procedure)

Overview

Live roleplayers rarely like to complain, we're all very aware that running an event is difficult and everyone involved is trying their best. Because of the social nature of the hobby, we're often friends with the some or all of the people running the game, so we don't want to upset our friends by appearing critical. And because event running is always stressful and always frantic and most organizers have to run events around their real jobs then a lot of players tend to assume that we're too busy to deal with feedback.

But getting good feedback from players is essential to improving a game. As organizers, we don't have the luxury of playing the game, we know a lot about the game and what happens but our perspective and experience is very different from the player one. We want feedback because we want to make our games as awesome as we can - good feedback is essential to achieving that. And the advantage of running Profound Decisions as a full time job is that we don't have to work it round our day jobs - so we're never too busy with real life to talk to you about the game.

So please don't feel hesitant about talking to us about anything you think will improve the game for you or for other participants!

Correct Procedure

If you do have a complaint, a concern or want to give feedback then please go to GOD and ask to speak to a member of the Profound Decisions management team. The management team are employees of Profound Decisions whose job it is to deal with any serious problems that you have. If an issue is serious or distressing then we would urge you to bring it to attention of the management team as early as possible. We will try to promptly resolve any problems that arise.

If there is any part of our game that you wish to discuss with Profound Decisions between events, then you can contact Profound Decisions at any time.

Incorrect Procedure

Profound Decisions is a professional live roleplaying company dedicated to producing high quality events. However the majority of crew that you encounter at an event are volunteers who have freely given up their time to make the event more enjoyable for everyone. Please respect their generosity and do not ask them to handle complaints. Please remember that this is their hobby too. We require our players to be civil towards all members of the volunteer crew at all times.

Critically we find that a lot of players tend to assume that if a friend is a member of crew then it is better to talk to them about a problem than bother PD. Unfortunately this is the worst possible way to pass on feedback or complaints. Second-hand feedback is rarely very useful, if only because the issues get more confused and less verifiable the more they get passed on. If you have an issue you want to raise with us, I would much rather talk to you about the issue than hear it from another party, regardless of how important a member of our crew you might perceive that person to be.

Please bring any issues directly to us yourself if you possibly can, rather than passing them on to a third party.

Imperial Conclave (Redirected from Conclave)

Magic is but a tool like any other, what matters is the mind that wields it.

Overview

The Conclave is an organisation effectively open to all magicians in the Empire. Members of the Conclave explore, discuss and use magic for the benefit both of the Empire and the magicians themselves. Much of the business of the Conclave is hidden from the eyes of non-Magicians, taking place in the Hall of Worlds. At the same time its influence can be far-reaching - it has access to the magical resources of the entire Empire, and has the ability to make decisions about magical matters that are legally binding on Imperial citizens.

Role Within The Empire

The Conclave is charged with oversight of magic across the Empire. Its remit includes encouraging the use of magic in the best interests of the people of the Empire; preventing the misuse of magic to damage the interests of the Empire; and advising the Imperial Senate, Military Council and Imperial Synod on arcane matters.

It possesses specific powers to promote and protect safe and prosperous use of magic by its citizens, through the use of declarations. The Conclave also controls a pool of magical resources that are allocated via gambits for use in specific projects supported by one or more Conclave order.

The Conclave also acts to direct magical research in the Empire. The Conclave appoints the Dean of the Lyceum, a prominent post that has access to the resources needed to research new rituals in the span of years rather than the decades that would be required for a magician working alone.

History

Mages from Urizen were heavily involved in the creation of the Conclave and the power and nature of the body reflects much of their approach to life. The Urizen passion for magic caused many Urizen magi to attend and speak at the first Conclave meetings, even though the nation did not formerly join the Empire until after the death of the first Empress. In many ways the structure and arrangement of the Conclave reflects how the early Urizen would have chosen to rule the entire Empire, had they been given a free hand in such matters. Instead the design and creation of the Conclave was as imagined, but its remit was heavily constrained; the powers of the Conclave deal only with magic and the use of magic in the Empire.

The first Conclave deliberately chose to hold all their sessions in the Hall of Worlds at Anvil to limit the ability of non-magicians to interfere in their business. The Conclave has always met here although records show that this arcane location changed significantly in the decades that followed the formation of the Empire, growing in size and shape and taking on the form that it assumes today. Unpredictable, seemingly random, changes still occur but most are now cosmetic in nature. Many Conclave magicians subscribe to the idea that the Hall of Worlds adapts to suit the needs of those who meet there, as other chambers in the realms are known to do, reflecting the uses to which it is put.

Sessions

The official business of the Conclave takes place at the Conclave sessions - which are always held in the Hall of Worlds. The Conclave normally has a single session each evening during any Imperial summit. The agenda for these sessions is managed by the civil service but items can be added to the agenda by any individual in exchange for a mana crystal. Agenda items are divided into three types; addresses - an opportunity for individuals to provide Conclave members with information; declarations - which allow Conclave members to vote on issues of policy; and gambits - formal requests by the appointed officers of the Conclave to utilize the resources of the Conclave.

Because of the potential size of the Conclave - which exceeds even that of the Synod - sessions are subject to strict rules that determine who can speak and for how long. These rules are referred to as the three principles; the Principle of Proportions, Principle of Precedence and Principle of Presence. The principles are designed to balance the desire of members to speak with the need to prevent Conclave sessions from becoming unnecessarily long. Civil servants administer the operational procedures of the Conclave, but in practice the chamber is dependent on members to police the rules to keep sessions moving. In return the Conclave provides every member with a vote that allows them to directly influence the decisions that the chamber takes.

Most members of the Conclave choose to join a Conclave order. These are political bodies with clear philosophies about how magic should be used. Joining an order allows an Imperial magician to unify their voice with other like-minded magicians as well as giving them influence over how the Conclave expends the magical resources it accrues.

Participation

Any Imperial magician who attends a session in the Hall of Worlds at Anvil is considered to be a member of the Conclave. They are eligible to vote in declarations and to join a Conclave order if they wish to do so. Members of an order elect a grandmaster who provides leadership and direction to the order. Most Imperial magicians who attend Conclave sessions regularly choose to join an order, but it is not mandatory and some individuals prefer to remain independent of any political affiliation, the better to influence all of them.

There are strict rules to determine who can speak and when, but anyone who is present at a session has the right to speak, provided they pay for their time with a mana crystal for every minute spent talking. Membership of the Conclave is a requirement to vote but not to speak. It is possible, albeit difficult, for non-magicians to reach the Hall of Worlds so anyone who makes the effort to reach the Hall of Worlds can address the Conclave, if they can afford it. It is rare for citizens who are not magicians to do this, however it is not uncommon for beings of the realms, eternals and their heralds who are present at meetings to speak before the Conclave.

Being a magician is a legal requirement to vote in declarations or to join an order, so any individual who attempted to pass themselves off as a magician without the requisite skill would be guilty of subverting the agencies of the state. It is common practice to assume every citizen present is a magician but magistrates do pass judgement when imposters are uncovered.

Anyone can add an address or a declaration to the agenda for a Conclave session, if they provide a mana crystal, they need only find a suitable civil servant to do so. However there is rarely any value in doing so unless you can be physically present to speak on the matter.

Imperial Magus (Redirected from Conclave Liaison to the Senate)

Overview

The title was created at the Winter Solstice summit of 377YE, and Concordia Sforza of Sarvos appointed to the position by declaration of the Conclave.

Responsibilities

The Liaison is expected to take responsibility for providing the Senate with advice on magical matters. Following further discussion, these responsibilities were expanded to give the Imperial Magus the responsibility to advise the Imperial Conclave of the Senate's position on magical matters.

Powers

The Imperial Magus is an Imperial Title appointed by the conclave.

Right of Address

The Imperial Magus has the right to make an address to the Senate once per summit. This is intended to allow them to present important information for the Senators consideration. To use this power, the Magus informs the Civil Service that they wish to address the Senate. Their address will be added to the agenda for the next Senate session.

Advising the Senate

The Imperial Magus is entitled to enter the Senate chamber at the start of a Senate session and participate in the debates. They do not have the power to raise motions or to vote on a motion. This power is intended to be used to participate in Conclave related discussions.

Addressing the Conclave

Once per summit, the Imperial Magus can raise an address to the agenda of a conclave session for free.

Selection

The Imperial Magus is appointed by declaration of the Conclave. They remain in post until replaced or they step down. Any Imperial citizen may hold the post.

Removal

The Imperial Magus is replaced by declaration of the Conclave. The Imperial Magus cannot be revoked by the Synod.

History

The first Imperial Magus was Concordia Sforza of the Carta Bellamarina of Sarvos. When it was initially created, the title was Conclave Liaison to the Senate and had only the right to address the Senate.

At the Autumn Equinox summit 378YE the powers of the title were amended, and re-titled Imperial Magus. During the Spring Equinox 379YE, the responsibilities of the title were further expanded to include a responsibility to keep the Imperial Conclave apprised of the Senate's position on magical matters.

Conclave address

Overview

A Conclave address is an opportunity for an individual to make a presentation to the Imperial Conclave.

Procedure

Raising an address

Any Imperial citizen can place an address on the agenda for the next Conclave session. Placing an address costs a mana crystal, paid when the address is raised. The civil servant records the name of the person raising the address who may also choose to add a short sentence summarizing the topic of their address.

Presentation

Presenting an address allows an individual to speak before the Conclave, for up to one minute in duration, on whatever topic they desire. If they wish to speak for longer than a minute then they may spend additional crystal mana to do so as normal.

Legally, an address is considered to be any agenda item that does not require a vote of the Conclave. Traditionally, addresses are used to provide the assembled magicians with important information, or to inform the Conclave of significant magical or political developments.

The Warmage, Bursar, Imperial Magus and any archmage have the power to raise a single address for free each summit.

Debate

After the presentation is complete, the grandmaster of each order may nominate someone present to speak, in order determined by the Principle of Precedence. Every speaker must pay crystal mana for the right to present their views. It is considered rude to move the debate away from the topic of the address - magicians who attempt to pursue unrelated agendas are often barracked by the assembled magicians until they stop talking.

Resolution

After the discussion, the address is complete and the civil servant moves on to the next address, or the process of resolving the declarations begins.

"You think I speak off the cuff? The key to a good Address is preparation. Rehearse it to yourself in your head, keep it down to a minute. Use your outdoor voice. Stick to the point, and for Virtue's sake don't bore them. Make one joke, and time it right. Have them laughing when time is called, and they will stand a chance of recalling what you said!"

Conclave appointments

Overview

Appointments by the Imperial Conclave are made by Declaration of Candidacy. If a character is successful then they remain in position until they die, resign the title or are replaced by a new declaration.

Conclave Appointments

- The six archmagi, one for each magical realm.
- The six grandmasters, one for each Conclave order
- The Dean of the Lyceum, responsible for developing new rituals
- The Warmage who liases closely with the Military council
- The Bursar of the Conclave who buys and sells on behalf of the Conclave.
- The Imperial Magus is a Conclave representative in the Senate who advises them on arcane matters

Selection

Any Imperial citizen may hold an Imperial position, appointed by the Conclave, provided it is the only Imperial title they control. It is possible for the Senate to create a national position appointed by the Conclave, in which case any Imperial citizen of that nation would be eligible to hold that title.

It is not constitutionally possible for the Conclave to restrict an Imperial title to only magicians (or only members of the Conclave). In practice, by holding their meetings in the Hall of Worlds, the Conclave have found a practical solution that ensures that it is rare that anyone who is not a magician is able to make a declaration of candidacy.

Removal

When Urizen joined the Empire they were instrumental in the formation of the Conclave. As a result of their actions, the constitution was amended to lay out the duties of the Conclave and stated that "it shall be guided by fraternities of magicians under the general aegis of the Senate, and without interference from the Synod."

As a result it is not possible for the Synod to revoke an Imperial title appointed by the Conclave.

Conclave design

Overview

We have overhauled the design and function of the Conclave to try and improve the game experience of interacting with it. This page presents the thinking that underpins the new design.

Goals

The core goal for the Conclave is to capture the feel of the classic fantasy trope of a body of political magicians - a recurrent theme in literature like Feists' Magician or Trudi Canavan's Black Magician novels. The concept of powerful wizards arguing over the dispensation and control of the forces of magic ought to present countless opportunities for interactions and plot.

The inherent flaw in this conceptual picture is that meetings - of magicians or indeed anyone else - are usually more enjoyable in literature than they are when roleplayed out. At their best they can be tense dramatic political scenes, at their worst they drag on interminably with little if anything actually decided. The challenge is to make every member of the Conclave feel involved and enabled while preventing sessions degenerating into a talking-shop. This trade-off is particularly acute in the Conclave because there are literally hundreds of magicians in the game - the design for the Conclave needs to try to involve all of those players - by ensuring it is fun for so many players to be involved.

When reviewing the Conclave our starting point was that there were two possible models for a political house. It could be an elective body where the player-base exercise power by choosing who would be part of the body - and by their interactions with those who are part of the body. The Senate, the Military Council and the Bourse all work this way - albeit in very different ways. The alternative is a representative body - one where everyone who wishes to be part of the body can partake personally. The Synod works like this - but it was brilliantly designed by Daniel Williams to function with so many members.

We feel that the fundamental goal for the Conclave - indeed the implication of the very name - is that it should be a representative body - one in which all magicians can take part and wield power directly - not one that elects individuals to do that. To do that and remain enjoyable and dramatic the design for the Conclave needed to rival that of the Synod - whilst remaining as distinctive as possible.

The Price of Words

The previous design concentrated its focus on voting - allowing only a few characters to wield power directly in the Conclave. To counter this lack of individual participation, players had extended the rules to allow everyone to talk. The patch and the flawed design produced a Conclave that left players feeling disenfranchised - because they couldn't influence the outcome directly - but meant that meetings ran on for hours as the political issues were debated.

In a social situation - where characters are meeting to discuss something - talking is expensive. The more talk that takes place, the more frustrated most players become as the meeting inevitably begins to drag. The blunt truth is that we like to talk more than we like to listen. We had identified this problem very early on in the design of Empire - which is why locations like the Senate use an NPC chair to keep meetings on message and on time. But that approach could not work in the Conclave - not with the potential for hundreds of characters all wanting to speak on every subject.

Re-examining the situation it was clear the original design was poor. The Conclave rules in play restricted the thing that was relatively easy to scale to hundreds of players (voting) but didn't restrict the thing which does not scale well (talking). The polar-opposite design - one where the power to talk was as expensive IC as it is OOC (in terms of the impact on other player's enjoyment), but voting was open to everyone present - is a significant change but one we believe will make the Conclave a more dramatic and exciting place to lock horns with your fellow magi.

The Price of Peace

To an extent we have already seen that begin to happen with the dramatic conflict between the Synod and the Senate in the final event of the first year. But the game is designed so that players can gravitate towards the elements of the game that best fit what they enjoy. Political strife will always be rare in the Military Council - it is at the coal face of the war with the barbarians. Players who like a very directed, unified engagement with a clear external enemy to fight against are much more likely to find that in the Military Council than anywhere else in the game.

But the Conclave - a body of magicians many of whom will never take the battlefield should be the opposite end of the spectrum. This is the place to go if face-to-face battles with a horde of barbarians is really not your thing. Of course we would still expect players to make all the usual arguments about the good of the Empire - but our hope was that the countervailing instinct - the selfish instinct to advance your own position would provide a platform for some great political infighting.

Going over the design again we realized that this hadn't happened in the Conclave as much as we had hoped in the first year because we had fundamentally blocked the avenues to advancement and inadvertently placed massive emphasis on the good of the Empire. The members of the Conclave orders had to cooperate to elect a grandmaster - then the grandmasters had to cooperate to elect the archmages. Then the archmages had to cooperate to spend the Conclave's money. It's difficult to imagine a set-up that could have a stronger emphasis on cooperation and the good of all.

Like the change to voting, the new design is a significant change to the existing set-up - but it provides vastly more support for individual and collective advancement. The orders are set-up to have a political agenda - by giving them control of the Conclave's resources - we make it easier to direct those resources towards those goals. Previously the Conclave resources were split equally between the archmages - now they are allocated to the orders based on their size - the better to make clear that each order appreciates that this is their mana to use for their goals.

There are other more minor changes that lie alongside this one, but they all build on this common goal - to make the orders feel like their Conclave vault belongs to them - that it is theirs to use as they see fit. The hoped for outcome is that gambits become a hell of a lot less consensual - that cooperation becomes something that is difficult for the orders to achieve - not something that is expected. There will be plenty of players calling for the orders to put aside their differences for the good of the Empire of course, but with the new design for the Conclave that should suddenly become an awful lot harder to achieve - and thereby produce a more enjoyable game for those involved.

Of Mice and Magi

Our ideal Conclave should have two identities - one is political a Conclave in which the orders circle each other looking for political advantage and power. In this world positions like archmage are playing pieces on the board. The more archmagi an order controls, the easier it is for them to dominate the political landscape of the Conclave. The changes to voting, to the gambits and the grandmasters are all designed to help support this.

But the Conclave has another identity - this is a meeting of magicians. There are six great realms of magic, with mysteries to be unravelled, challenges to be overcome and powers to be mastered. We want the magicians of the Conclave to take an interest in the magic of the setting - and the natural figures for that to happen are the archmagi. The previous design had them as deeply political figures - the redesign exchanges that political power for increased mastery of magic - in particular of abilities that allow them to cooperate with ritualists throughout the realms. The ability to raise gambits is primarily limited to archmagi precisely so that they can emphasize the magical identity of the Conclave - to balance the political identity of the orders.

Lightning Bolt! Lightning Bolt!

The design of combat magic in Empire deliberately prioritized one core design principle. We wanted magic to be important - but we wanted the best possible fighter in a fight... to be a fighter... There are many different ways to build a LRP game, but the Ad&d historical approach in which magic utterly eclipses fighting - but the fighter has better endurance - was definitely not what we wanted in Empire.

It is also, observably difficult to build a magic system that makes casting magic at your enemies look cool and immersive to other participants. It is rare to find an author that can make a magical duel enjoyable to read in literature - where they can do anything - it is far more difficult to make flinging spells awesome in a live roleplaying game. Empire's primary approach to this problem is to deliver combat magic spells with rods and staffs - to allow the participants to feel the blow and respond naturally. But whatever the approach used, it is almost inevitably that watching a dozen warriors duel will always be more immersive and engrossing than watching a dozen magi shouting at each other - a contest that is often decided by how fast you can gable you can spit out your spell vocals.

If we had designed a magic system that meant that wizards could tear warriors apart on a battlefield - the contest might still have been somewhat underwhelming for participants and onlookers - because of the limitations on magic in a fest LRP system. In fact, given the dominance of the armoured warrior on the battlefield it was inevitable that the contest would be dominated by warriors.... not wizards. Absent any political powers in the Conclave - or in fact any discernible relationship with the Conclave - it was inevitable that the role would effectively become a martial contest to put a champion on the Military Council. There is nothing wrong with that conceptually - but it falls short of the influence and authority that we wanted for the warmage.

The new role is a political appointment by the Conclave - and thus is much more clearly a part of the Conclave. Uniquely, the title grants power in the Military Council and in the Conclave. We hope that future warmages will find many ways to utilize that advantage to benefit both houses... and themselves.

A Wizard Civil Servant Did It

We've updated this as a few players have asked us to provide some kind of IC explanation for the change, so we've done as requested.

The official explanation for this change (and a few other minor changes to things like Bourse auction methods) is that it is always done the old way in the first year following a "Time of Emergency" and then automatically reverts to the standard method after one year.

The time of emergency was what happened in the first year following the death of Empress Britta and most of the Empire's finest who died with her. This was why every senator at the first event was having to be elected and so on - it was the rules following a time of emergency when basically everyone who was running the Empire is dead. The explanation is that the Civil Servants have one set of rules to use when running the Empire in the year that follows the declaration of emergency - and then they revert to the standard rules (the ones now on the wiki).

Obviously this is a figleaf justification, we are not attempting to claim that this is a seamless elegant solution, but hopefully it will help to minimize the impact of the changes for individual players - allowing them to roleplay that what happened has happened. It isn't particularly helpful to postulate that individual civil servants are somehow engaged in some kind of conspiracy to control the Empire; this isn't some kind of actual plot you can interact with - it's a justification by PD for the changes we are making to the game to make it better for everyone playing it.

The Perils of Fair Play

There are a few risks with the new design for the Conclave. One is that players will continue to put aside all differences and self-interest and denude the game of ooc enjoyable political intrigue and conflict in favour of united action against the barbarians. We believe we've done everything possible to mitigate that threat. There are simple but very powerful elements in the design - like the ability of the orders to purchase crystal mana to add to their vaults - which should massively reinforce the ideal presented in the setting. It's not the Empire's mana... it's your mana...

But there is another more fundamental risk - the dark shadow of fair play that looms over the new Conclave design. The idea that it costs mana to talk in the Conclave is central to the whole design. It means that the orders have to expend resources to try and sway each other in session, so it gives costs to manoeuvres on the political battleground. But critically it is essential to have this in place if the meetings are not to run for hours and hours - far beyond the endurance of even the most political live roleplayer. For the Conclave to be fun - the rules on talking at a Session will have to be strictly enforced. Our civil servants can do that... but only to a point... without buy-in from the players it just won't work.

The risk is that players feel that the rules simply aren't fair. There is a natural egalitarian spirit in most live-roleplayers - we all want each other to enjoy the event. We all want each other to be involved and have a good time. So naturally - if a fellow live roleplayer wants to say something, the natural instinct is to let him speak. That's "fair". What does not seem fair - is to make him pay for the privilege and then shout him off stage the moment his minute is up.

Economists call this the tragedy of the commons. The forbearance of the players is our "commons" - the longer any individual talks, the more individuals who stand up and talk - the more the patience of the collective will of the assembled players is consumed. But that is hard for anyone in the room to see - what is clear to see is the benefit being enjoyed by the player who gets up to speak. The net result is that allowing players to speak without paying mana - allowing players to speak after their time is up - makes the game more enjoyable for that player - but makes the game a tiny bit less enjoyable for every other player in the tent. By prioritizing the individual over the collective good of everyone present - by being "fair" - the players are actually being unfair to themselves and to everyone else present.

We hope that the players will grab the Principle of Proportions and embrace it with both hands. When a magician tries to remain talking after his sands are run out, please - shout him down - heckle her off stage. When a character has paid to talk, we hope that players will take that moment to be "fair" to them and let them speak (a few shouts of "shame" at appropriate moments are to be expected!). But when a player tries to break the Conclave rules (and trying will be fun too!), then that is the moment to be "fair" to everyone. A loud chant of "Mana! Mana!" until they pay up or cede the floor may seem harsh - but it will actually make the game more fair - and more enjoyable - for everyone who wants to take part in the Conclave.

Conclave of Trees and Shadow

This is a placeholder page for content that PD are actively working on.

Rules

Night Magnitude 20

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets a forest. The character who controls the target personal resource must be present throughout.

This spell is an enchantment. A target may only be under one enchantment effect at a time.

Effects

This ritual calls forth a band of shadowy warriors drawn from the darkness beneath the boughs of the target forest, and imbued with a vital essence that comes from the trees there. The warriors form a powerful military unit under the control of the character who controls the target forest, and fight under that character's command during the coming season.

The target forest produces no special materials during the coming season. At the end of the season, or if they are destroyed, the warriors return to the forest and melt back into its shadows, restoring its production to normal.

The military unit created consists of supernatural troops that can be assigned any of the tasks that a normal military unit can undertake. The warriors are especially well suited to raiding actions, but are still effective when they fight as part of a campaign army.

Additional Targets

This ritual can affect additional forests in the same territory. Each additional forest increases the magnitude by 15. The character who controls each forest must be present throughout the ritual, and each receives control of their own military unit.

Description

The shadow warriors called forth by this ritual ooze forth from between the trees into clearings and across boundaries. They begin as shapeless forms of living darkness, but quickly take on more physical forms. Scholars who have studied the magic believe that they are made partially from darkness, partially from the vital essence of the forest, and partly from lesser spirits of the Realm of Night. They are usually armed-and-armoured in a fashion that reflects the kind of raw materials commonly gathered from the forest that spawns them. For example, a forest that produces iridescent gloaming tends to form warriors with pole-arms and robes, while a forest that produces ambergelt spawns warriors with great two-handed axes and dark furs. A forest that normally provides dragonbone tends to produce warriors in hides armed with one-handed spear and shield, while a forest that produces beggar's lye spawns warriors in blackened chain with great shields and maces. These effects are by no means universal.

The shadow warriors invariably appear to be in medium armour. They can speak, and appear to be intelligent although there is something ... hollow about them, as if they are not entirely present. They follow orders well, but tend to shy away from fire and bright lights. They maintain a slightly incorporeal quality, as if they are not entirely physical, but they can be hurt and even disrupted by blows as easily as any other warrior. They tend to move quietly, even in a group, and excel at taking small groups of enemies unaware - they are quite proficient when raiding into barbarian territories.

Magicians who have spent time as guests of the Eternals of Night have reported encountering very similar beings as guards, servants and even courtiers in those realms. The enchanter Chretien l'Incroyable wrote a well-researched treatise on them and claimed that these creatures were actually formless - that like the Eternals themselves they are shapeshifters who take on forms based on the expectations of observers. This ritual, he theorised, used the energy of mana to summon these spirits and clothed them in a form of animus or eidolon drawn from the target forest. He further theorised that the warriors did not actually die when 'killed'; the essence drawn from the forest returned to it, and the warriors' spirits returned to the Realm of Night. Regardless, it is reasonably well-known that several Night Eternals are prepared to offer materials or items that assist with the performance of this ritual, although they rarely do so lightly.

In Highguard this ritual is called Call Forth the Hollow Men and is frowned upon; there is some suspicion that some of the shadow warriors are capable of remaining in the world for their own reasons, especially when they have been summoned with the assistance of an Eternal. In Varushka the ritual is used carefully; some wise ones are concerned that it would be better if the darkness-under-the-trees remained there, in a land where that darkness may already be haunted by malign spirits. The ritual remains popular, however, because it offers a way to call up a band of warriors in a time of need - there are several stories of volhov, cabalists and Marcher landskeepers who have used this ritual to great effect when vales or villages have been threatened by monsters, Feni or bandits.

In the past, this ritual has been used to call up warriors to take part in a tourney or to test the mettle of soldiers or knights. The expense of performing the ritual means that this is a rare, magical activity that attracts warriors from all over when it is attempted, especially in Dawn. Like several other summoned creatures, the shadow warriors cannot pass through the Sentinel Gate at Anvil. As with creatures such as the husks conjured by Quickening Cold Meat, magicians theorise that this is because the gate cannot latch-on to the spirits of Night that empower the shadow warriors, and when they try to travel through the gate their spirit-less 'bodies' are simply shredded back into darkness and the vital essence of the trees.

(OOO Note: This might make an interesting event for a player-event, but under most circumstances the shadow warriors summoned during Profound Decisions events will unfortunately have to remain primarily as a downtime or plot resource rather than something that can be used on the field.)

Common Elements

The ritual often involves a map of the forest to be enchanted; in the case of the Navarr a map of the trods near the forest may be studied, and the shapes worked into new designs suggesting swirling tendrils extending from the trods to embrace and surround the target forest. Other common features include samples of the raw material most suited to the forests; wood, leaves or flowers taken from the forest; symbols of Loyalty; weapons and armour, especially those appropriate to the shadow warriors likely form are also a strong element.

As with many Night rituals, music and dance are common elements. The character who will control the summoned shadow warriors may be symbolically girded as a warrior or general, or even crowned with a circlet of leaves from the target forest.

Conclave order

The surest way to corrupt a youth is to instruct her to hold in higher esteem those who think alike than those who think differently.

Lebannon of Haros Water

Overview

The orders are political bodies with clear philosophies about how magic should be used. They are made up of like-minded individuals and exist to bring together mages who share a common vision for how magic should be used in the Empire. There is no requirement for a magician to join an order, and many magicians involve themselves in the discussions of multiple orders.

Any individual present who is not a member of an order can still take part in Conclave business. They can still raise items to the agenda, participate in votes, and may speak during debates if they have the support of a grandmaster.

Each order also controls their own Conclave vault. The vault contains mana crystals and materials that are distributed by the Conclave to the order for their use. As the property of the order, responsibility for their distribution lies with the grandmaster of the order.

Joining an Order

Any Imperial magician may join any order. To become a member requires the use of a simple magic ritual. Several civil servants associated with the Conclave have mastered this ritual and can perform it on an Imperial citizen at no additional cost beyond the crystal mana required. The ritual places an invisible mark on the target which can be revealed with detect magic and several other rituals.

During character creation, a character with the magician skill can join an order without needing to expend any crystal mana. A character who chooses not to take this option will need to join an order in play at the usual cost.

Changing Order

A magician can change order by replacing their Arcane Mark with the Arcane Mark of their new order.

However, a magician who changes order cannot vote in the election for a new grandmaster, if they were a member of another order when that order voted for a grandmaster in the last year. In effect you cannot participate in the election for a new grandmaster if you were previously eligible to vote when a grandmaster was elected at any of the previous three summits. Attempting to influence the election of a grandmaster without due authority is electoral fraud and can carry harsh penalties.

Powers of membership in an order

Electing a Grandmaster

A member of an order can vote to determine who the grandmaster of the order will be. The grandmaster must be a member of the order to be eligible to stand.

Establishing Precedence

The number of members of an order attending Anvil determines precedence. The precedence of an order determines when they speak during a Conclave session, and what share of the Conclave resources they receive. Only members of the order who bear the order's Arcane Mark count for precedence. Precedence is determined by the civil service by performing a census of the arcane mark possessed by each magician attending the summit shortly before it begins.

Right of Challenge

Claiming to be in an order one is not a member of is considered electoral fraud. Any member of an order may request that another member prove their membership in the presence of a magistrate; in this case the onus is always on the challenger to provide the magic needed to examine the target's Arcane Mark.

Challenging the Grandmaster

Any member of an order may declare that they have no confidence in their grandmaster. The grandmaster will be automatically removed from office if a simple majority of members of the order go in person to the Hub and register their challenge with a civil servant. The civil servant will ensure that each magician bears the appropriate Arcane Mark of the order using an Arcane Touchstone (an item that will determine if a magician is a member of a specific order as if using detect magic). The number required to launch a successful challenge to the grandmaster is set by the precedence determined before the summit. A grandmaster can only be successfully challenged once during each summit.

If the challenge is successful, it is announced at the start of the next Conclave session. An election for a new grandmaster is triggered after that conclave session ends. Such an election follows all the normal rules for the appointment of a grandmaster.

As with other significant elections, it is not legal to vote against a grandmaster if you were eligible to vote in a different order's grandmaster election within the last year.

Existing orders

In the modern era, the following Orders are legally recognised as part of the Conclave:

- The Celestial Arch: The Celestial Arch maintain that the skill and knowledge required to master magic mean that magicians are naturally better leaders and statesmen. They champion the cause of magicians and magic in choosing the Empire's course.
- The Golden Pyramid: The manifesto of the Golden Pyramid centres on the role of magic in generating wealth across the Empire. This Order also champions the causes of artisans, and the right of all magicians not to be treated as servants or slaves.
- The Rod and Shield: The most martial of the orders, the manifesto of the Rod and Shield centres on the role of magic in defending the Empire and expanding its borders. The Rod and Shield is a popular order with battlemages and healers.
- The Sevenfold Path: The Sevenfold Path manifesto centres on the belief that magic serves the Empire best when it is used virtuously, and that the virtuous should not fear magic. It often serves as a bridge between the Conclave and the Imperial Synod.
- The Shuttered Lantern: The Shuttered Lantern focuses on the protection of the Empire and the accumulation of knowledge about allies and enemies alike. They are known to favour spying, espionage and other subtle uses of magic.
- The Unfettered Mind: The Unfettered Mind believe that the study and use of magic are ends in their own right. They work to expand the Empire's arcane knowledge and power, and oppose measures to curtail or constrain Imperial magic.
- The Silver Chalice: The Silver Chalice focuses on the health and wellbeing of the Empire and its citizens, wielding magic that nurtures life, mends what is broken, and brings what is torn apart back together. They are the newest Conclave order, formed officially during the Autumn Equinox 381YE.

Creation and Dissolution of an Order

New orders can be created, and existing orders dissolved, by a constitutional vote of the Senate. A newly created order requires a clear statement as to its purpose and attitudes to magic, and a symbol, similar to those possessed by existing orders, that is used with the Arcane Mark ritual. When an order is dissolved, the contents of its vault are redistributed among the remaining orders.

Conclave session

We do not need to like each other to meet as a Conclave, but we must respect each other if we hope to be effective. My principle of proportions ensures respect for other magicians is accorded in the most sublime way. Each of us will weigh the balance of our business against the Conclave's precious time using the scales of magic itself. If the price seems too high, then perhaps what you have to say is not as important to us as it is to you...

Overview

Like the Senate and the Military Council, the Conclave conducts its official business at formal sessions, where matters are discussed and votes are cast. Although Conclave members meet to discuss business throughout the day (the rules of the Conclave positively encourage magicians to pursue their goals outside the sessions), the sessions are the best chance to address the entire Conclave and the only time that declarations can be passed.

Traditionally, the Conclave has one formal session each evening during the Imperial summit.

Conclave Principles

Rather than have a civil servant chair a session, as effectively happens in the Senate, the Conclave employs three ancient principles to ensure the smooth running of their meetings. The Principle of Precedence, uses a count of members of the Conclave orders to determine in what order individuals are eligible to speak, as well as how much of the Conclave's resources each order receives.

The Principle of Proportions demands payment from any individual who wishes to speak, one mana crystal per minute that the speaker wishes to employ. All mana collected is added to the Conclave vault. Official appointments by the Conclave receive limited opportunities to speak as part of an address or declaration without paying this cost, but no other exemptions are allowed. Eternals, foreign dignitaries, even the Empress herself have to pay. Formally the mana is considered a bequest, but no-one is under any illusion that what is demanded is payment - payment to all the assembled magicians to recompense them for the time.

The Principle of Presence prevents a magician from authorizing a proxy to speak on their behalf to the Conclave. The individual who lodges an agenda item with the civil service is the individual who must present that item to the Conclave, they cannot pass the opportunity to do so to another individual. In practice this principle is rarely restrictive to anyone but archmagi and individuals who are unable to reach the Hall of Worlds.

Speaking before the Conclave

Following the Principle of Proportions, speaking before the Conclave costs the speaker one crystal mana for every minute they wish to talk. Every agenda item costs a mana crystal to raise - but automatically entitles the party who lodges the item to a minute to present their case. If they wish to speak for longer than this, they must pay for additional time.

After the presentation is complete, the grandmasters of the orders may nominate volunteers to speak on the topic being discussed, in order determined by the Principle of Precedence.

The nominated speaker, need not be a member of the grandmaster's order but must be an Imperial citizen. Independent magicians and other beings present in the hall can speak, if they receive the nomination of a grandmaster to do so. It is also possible for a grandmaster to nominate a magician from another order, if they wish to do so. Once nominated, the speaker may continue for as long as they can provide mana.

Minutes are timed using a set of minute glasses provided by the civil service, who are also responsible for ensuring that individuals obey the time limits. The civil servants have the legal power to remove a magician once their allotted time has expired, but this is rarely needed, Conclave magicians are positively encouraged to police themselves - by barracking any magician who attempts to carry on speaking until they pay the mana or relinquish the floor.

Since the speaker has paid for their time, those assembled are required to let the speaker use their minute freely - on the understanding that they have paid to speak themselves. The speaker may not invite others to speak on their behalf. Shouts of support or rejection from the floor are acceptable, as is an expression of assent or dissent in response to a question from the speaker - but shouting a speaker down, trying to talk over them, or inviting someone else to make substantial statements during this time will result in censure by the civil service. This is not to say that the individuals present during Conclave must be silent - when important matters are being discussed there are often scores of whispered conversations taking place between members of the Conclave. If these conversations become intrusive however, the civil service may intervene to curtail them.

Mana must be provided before the nominated individual begins talking; when someone plans to talk for more than a minute it is common to provide the civil service with a pile of mana to use as they speak.

Setting the Agenda

Any Imperial citizen can add an item to the agenda by approaching a civil servant associated with the Conclave and raising the agenda item. To do so they must bequeath a single mana crystal to the Conclave. At the next Conclave session, each item on the agenda is raised and resolved by the meeting in the order in which they were raised.

Any member of the Conclave can ask to review the agenda for the next session. The agenda is closed an hour before the session is scheduled to begin, so that copies can be made. Copies are generally placed at the Civil service hub and in the Hall of Worlds, and one copy typically furnished for each grandmaster and archmage.

An item raised to the agenda can be either an address, or a declaration (including Declaration of Candidacy). Except in the case of a grandmaster invoking the veil of their order, the specifics of the address or declaration must be recorded on the agenda. A character who places an item on the agenda is automatically guaranteed a single minute to speak on the subject without further cost, but it must be that character that speaks. The rules of the Conclave forbid any individual from using a proxy to speak in their place.

The person who raised the agenda item may withdraw it at any time, but they do not get their crystal mana back.

Session Order

Each Conclave session follows a strict order; significant announcements are made, addresses are made, and declarations resolved.

The first business of any Conclave session is announcements by the civil service. Commonly the civil service restrict these to announcements relating to organisational matters - challenges to grandmasters, titles that have become unexpectedly vacant, and so on. Once these are complete the items on the agenda are debated in strict order, starting with the addresses, then any declarations.

Addresses are dealt with in the order they were raised to the agenda. The same is true for declarations with the exception that declarations with similar outcomes are resolved at the same time as the last agenda item was raised. For example, if more than one individual has challenged for a title, they will all be resolved in together, at the point determined by the last challenge registered.

Each agenda item is announced by the civil service and then the person that raised the item with the civil servant is allowed to make a presentation on it, up to a minute in length. If they wish to speak for longer than a minute, then they must pay to do so.

Once an address or declaration is complete, magicians from the orders may speak.

Concluding the Agenda

Once all agenda items are dealt with, the conclave session ends. If a session ends prematurely for any reason, remaining agenda items are added to the start of the next Conclave agenda.

The result of any Declaration comes into effect at the end of the Conclave session in which it is passed.

Conclave vault

No, Grandmaster. It is not 'yours'.

It is ours.

Lebannon of Haros Water

Overview

The Conclave has a store of resources, usually referred to collectively as the Conclave vaults. The resources exist predominantly in the form of crystal mana and ilium, but some other materials also end up in vaults. These reserves are built up from a range of sources including donations, Conclave politics and seizures from sorcerers and barbarians.

Each Conclave order has its own vault. At the start of each summit, all crystal mana collected by the Conclave since the last summit are divided up between the vaults, in proportion to the size of the order as determined by the Principle of Precedence at the previous summit. At the start of the summit, the contents of the order vault are given to the Grandmaster who has responsibility for distributing them in the service of their order.

Allocation

Resources are divided among the orders based on the Principle of Precedence. Civil servants divide the Conclave resources between the orders based on all the magi counted in total as belonging to that order. This calculation is based on the number of characters with the correct Arcane Mark who were alive and present at the end of the previous summit.

For example, if the total number of Imperial magicians belonging to an order was 100, and 100 mana crystals were available, and the total precedence for the Sevenfold Path was 30, then 30 mana crystals would go to their Grandmaster.

Divisions are rounded down and any resources that are not allocated as a result are held over until the next summit.

Bequests

Any Imperial citizen, and anyone with whom the Conclave has declared amity, can approach the civil service and donate materials or objects to the order of their choice. When this happens, the materials or object are distributed to the Grandmaster at the start of the next summit. It is often easier to simply give something to the Grandmaster directly - but in some cases this has been used to set up regular ongoing bequests to a specific order.

On rare occasions individuals may donate materials to the Conclave as a whole. When this happens, the civil service announces the bequest to the Conclave and any magician can present a declaration of entitlement to suggest that the bequest be either added to the vault of an order, or assigned to a specific individual. Until a bequest is assigned, it is kept in trust by the civil service. Once assigned, the assignment is permanent; while a bequest can be assigned by the Conclave, they have no ability to take the bequest back again or reassign it once their decision has been made.

Bequests are a common way for Eternals to support either the Conclave or the specific orders for which they have an affinity.

Resources

Crystal Mana

There is a large pool of crystal mana available to the Conclave at the start of each solstice or equinox, referred to as the font. The font is divided up between the Orders before the first Conclave session of each summit.

The basic font, as of the Winter Solstice 377YE is 122 crystal mana. This pool is supplemented by any mana collected under the Principle of Proportions as well as mana seized from sorcerors and enemies of the Empire. The amount of mana in the font may vary from season to season, and any remainder that cannot be allocated to an order carries over to the next season.

Crystal mana can also be added to an order's share by the grandmaster's power to fund their order; from mana expended during the election of a grandmaster, and from bequests.

Ilium

The Conclave has small reserves of ilium, which are distributed to the orders. The ilium is not distributed pro rata. Rather, it is divided into seven "pots" which are distributed to the orders based on their order of precedence (the first pot goes to the largest order at the previous summit, and so on down to the smallest order). Ties are resolved in favour of the oldest order.

Raw materials

Each order receives a trickle of ingots and measures of special materials. These are primarily delivered as gifts or bequests from Imperial citizens. Unlike crystal mana, the raw materials are bequeathed to a specific order and distributed directly to the Grandmaster.

Rare Items

On occasions, enchanted items, scrolls or ritual texts may end up in the possession of a specific order's vault or the Conclave as a whole. Items controlled by the Conclave as a whole are distributed using a endowment.

Concord

Overview

A declaration of concord allows the Imperial Conclave to agree a statement of belief, intent or support. It can also be used to extend an invitation, accept an offer or reject an approach by an eternal. The declaration has no binding legal consequences but it does clearly express the intent of the Conclave, so it is often used when the Conclave wish to demonstrate their collective will to another political house such as the Senate.

Declaration

The only effect of a declaration of concord is to demonstrate the agreed will of the Conclave. To do that effectively the declaration must clearly state what it is that the Conclave agrees on. It is common to have wording such as "the Conclave believes..." or "The magicians of the Empire support...". The declaration should be a clear simple expression of what it is the Conclave wishes or are doing (or that they reject).

In general, more is less - the longer and the more complex the wording, the less clear the resulting declaration will be. The wording of a declaration of concord cannot be amended after it is submitted, and will be recorded verbatim if the declaration passes.

The conclave can only vote either to agree with the declaration, or to disagree with it.

Resolution

It is not possible for the Empire to pass any declaration secretly. If the declaration is passed, the civil service take reasonable steps to ensure that magicians throughout the Empire are aware of it. Some of those informed will be inclined to follow the lead of the Conclave and will act accordingly. This often means that non-Imperial parties will become aware of the declaration - usually that is to the advantage of the Empire.

For example, if a declaration calls for increased magical trade with Jarm - then many Imperial magicians will make contact with their Jarmish counterparts looking to trade with them. Naturally therefore the Jarmish will soon become aware of the declaration the Conclave has passed - they may (or may not) then choose to send a representative to Anvil to discuss the matter.

However, if a declaration calls for Imperial ritual teams to take every advantage of an offer provided by Basileus Flint of the City of Locks to allow them to curse the Thule territories, then Imperial magicians will be aware that that declaration has passed... but the Thule will not. No Imperial magician is going to get in touch with the Thule to discuss the matter with them unless a player-character chooses to do that.

Occasionally the declaration of concord is used in advance to declare that a specific magical act will not be considered sorcery. Such a declaration is not legally binding on the Conclave but it can be very influential.

For example, in 326YE a number of curses were placed on individuals who had been identified by the Shuttered Lantern as supporters of the briars involved in the Freedom heresy. Given the personal power of several of these individuals, the covens involved sought this declaration immediately before placing the curses and used it (successfully) as a defence when magicians associated with the Imperial Senate and Imperial Synod tried to have them declared sorcerers in the aftermath.

The declaration of concord has also been used to initiate the creation of a Conclave order or a new Imperial title. The Imperial Senate will often take a relevant declaration into account when voting on a motion that impact magicians, or magical matters. The Constitutional Court also look at these declarations as evidence that the constitutional role of the Conclave is not being undermined.

Concord can also be used by the Conclave to accept an offer or a deal, often from an eternal or foreign nation.

For example in Autumn 381YE the Conclave used a declaration of concord to accept the offer of the eternal Adamant to send his koboldi to support the miners of the Empire.

If a concord does not pass, it is not considered to be the same as the Conclave saying they do not believe something - it is generally accepted by Imperial citizens, eternal, and foreigners alike that there are a number of reasons why the precise wording of a concord may not be upheld.

Sanction (Redirected from Condemnation)

"...an Atun herself shall turn her gaze from you, as your soul lingers, unmourned, in the darkest recesses of the Labyrinth. You are excommunicated."

"You... you can't do that! Your writ of excommunication never passed the General Assembly!"

"You are condemned as a heretic. I will be sure the magistrate's know it. Besides, if the Assembly lacked the spine to issue a writ of excommunication against the likes of you, what makes you think they have the will to condemn me?"

Overview

The Imperial Synod is responsible for investigating and publicizing behaviour the Synod considers to unvirtuous. Sanction allows the the Synod to publicize such deeds and to bring religious crimes to the attention of the magistrates for possible prosecution.

For many years the only option available to the Synod was to condemn an individual for their invidious actions - criminal or unvirtuous. However following the work of stormcrow Jorma Steelhail from 379 to 380, the Senate finally agreed to expand the scope of the Synod's powers to allow a range of different edicts to be issued - in accordance with the judgement of the Synod.

As a result the judgement was changed to allow the Synod to choose one of four different options - whether to vindicate, castigate, condemn or demand penance.

Vindication

A judgement of vindication is used by the Synod to demonstrate that they view the target as innocent of any accusations of unvirtuous acts that have been levelled against them. It may also be used to formally laud the subject's virtuous disposition.

Penance

Penance is used where the assembly believes the subject to have engaged in both virtuous and unvirtuous behaviour. The judgement recommends how the target can correct their unvirtuous behaviour.

Castigation

A judgement of castigation indicates that the target is believed by the assembly to be guilty of unvirtuous deeds and nature and is formally rebuked for them.

Condemnation

Condemnation is used where the assembly is satisfied that an individual is guilty of committing a religious crime. The priest who brought the motion of condemnation is expected to be responsible for ensuring that the magistrates are informed of the matter, and that the basis for the condemnation is presented to them.

Judgement

The judgement of sanction must name one specific type of sanction; vindication, penance, castigation, or condemnation, that is being weighed against all those named in the judgement. A sanction may be raised by any assembly of the Imperial Synod. When the judgement is raised in a national assembly, it may only be used to sanction members of that nation. The virtue assemblies may raise a judgement against anyone - but they are expected to restrict the remit of their sanction to matters concerning their virtue.

Synod Judgement

- Any Assembly
- Lesser Majority

The judgement must name each specific individual who will be covered. A judgement may only name more than one individual if they are members of the same oathsworn band - either a banner, sect, or coven at the time the judgement is raised.

When a judgement of sanction is submitted, the Tribune is responsible for informing the subject of the judgement. Usually they will send a messenger to find the citizen to ask them to attend the Hub so that they can be briefed on the development. Any sanction requires a lesser majority to pass.

Outcome

It is easy to defend the innocent.

A successful judgement of vindication, castigation, or penance will be noted and recorded in the official Synod records, but it is the responsibility of the priest who brought the judgement to ensure that all are aware of the outcome.

Marcher Proverb

A successful condemnation however will lead to a criminal trial, if the magistrates are satisfied that there is sufficient evidence that Imperial Law has been broken, especially if a religious crime has been committed. The magistrates will consider:

- Whether the presenting priests have sufficiently established a religious crime has taken place
- The severity of the crime in terms of harm, or potential harm, to the Empire
- Any pleas for clemency

The priest who raised the successful judgement of condemnation must address the magistrates, either alone or with others, and present the basis for their condemnation.

Inquisition

A priest who conducts an inquisition may choose to escalate the inquisition to a sanction if they believe it is appropriate. To do this they submit a new judgement of sanction for consideration by the Synod. This judgement does not count against the limit of one judgement per priest per summit, provided it is submitted by the same priest who submitted the judgement of inquisition and that it does not name a new target not named in the inquisition. The new judgement may use less names than the original inquisition, but it may not add a new name to the list.

Refusal to attend an inquisition is usually sufficient grounds for condemnation and prosecution for subverting the agencies of state, provided that the target or targets could reasonably have attended.

Conduct design

Overview

One of the fundamental truths of LRP is that the quality of the game is dependent on the people at the game. Live roleplayers often prefer to attend games our friends are going to - because we know that we will get the kind of roleplaying experience we want when playing in their company. The people we roleplay with are often more important than the event itself in determining how much we enjoy the game. The setting, the characters, the plot - these things are crucial - but so is the way we interact and roleplay with each other.

Laying out a code of conduct for players attending our events gives us a chance to define the acceptable parameters of behaviour. That lets players know if the style of roleplay that is encouraged at our events is something they will enjoy or not. Most games are explicit about the setting and the game rules - by being explicit about the rules for conduct we want to empower players to make an informed decision if this is a game that they will enjoy.

Politics

- It's fine to disagree with our rules, provided you follow them at our events
- We run live roleplaying events - not political debates

Some of the elements of our code of conduct are contentious. The overwhelming majority of people who attend our LRP games accept that players should be treated equally regardless of their identity - but there is no clear agreement on the best way to try and create an environment that supports that. Part of the reason we need a code of conduct is precisely because players do not all agree on the best way to tackle the problem; if everyone felt the same way about the issues there would be no need to lay down any guidelines for what we required at our events.

Disagreement is healthy, LRP benefits from a marketplace of ideas. We don't expect or even want all live roleplayers to agree with the policies we have adopted - but we do require the players who choose to come to our events to comply with them while interacting with the Empire community. This code of conduct is part of the rules that we have laid down for Empire, and in that sense it is just like any of the other rules of the game. We don't expect all experienced live roleplayers to agree with our design choices for how combat or magic works best in a live roleplaying game - but we do expect everyone to follow our rules and take their hits. It's fine to disagree with our policies and our politics - provided you still follow the rules of the event you have chosen to attend.

Disagreement between live roleplayers on the best way to tackle these issues can often lead to heated debate. That debate is healthy - it is the essential element that allows members of the hobby to develop a better understanding of the issues and identify better ways to improve games. But crucially, we run live roleplaying events - not a debating society - our goal is to create the best events we can - not act as a forum for the wider hobby. As such we encourage players to use other forums, online spaces, and events to discuss the issues addressed by our code of conduct. The reason that Profound Decisions players come together is to enjoy Empire - not to discuss politics - so please respect our game and try to take political debates elsewhere where reasonably possible.

Where Angels Fear to Tread

Defining a code of conduct is difficult. There is no need to make rules for the things everyone already agrees on - the only issues that need addressing are the ones that are contentious. By necessity our code of conduct lays down rules and requirements that some of our players will not agree with. In fact, given the wide-ranging nature of the material covered and the wide range of views on the subjects dealt with it's likely that almost everyone can find something to disagree with. Defining a code of conduct for our games is an intimidating prospect, it is an unpleasant nettle to grasp.

The easy alternative is not to bother. In a small live roleplaying game, there is rarely a need for an explicit code of conduct because players will tend to find mutual agreement on the kind of conduct acceptable for the game simply by socializing together. The code of conduct still exists - but it comes into being through evolution rather than design and it is not written down anywhere. But every LRP game can identify behaviour that is not acceptable to them - the code of conduct is still real even if it hasn't been written down. Not having an explicit code of conduct has many advantages -

Contents

- 1 Overview
- 2 Politics
- 3 Where Angels Fear to Tread
- 4 Compliance Not Convergence
- 5 Human Rights and Human Wrongs
- 6 Further Reading

since the majority of human beings tend to assume that their own personal views are the right ones and represent the majority. By not writing a code of conduct down groups of players with different views on what is acceptable behaviour for a LRP game can participate in the same game by assuming that everyone else is doing it wrong.

That works less well in a large game - especially in a game like Empire that appeals to thousands of live roleplayers from across the country. The more players participate in a game, the greater the spread of views there is. In the absence of a clear code of conduct the only way to establish the agreed parameters for the game is to argue it out at the events and online. Given how emotive these issues are, that tends to produce volatile, hostile arguments that are incendiary, divisive, and exhausting for everyone.

We've taken the decision to draw together existing material that was spread over our website and wiki and update it and give it more prominence because we think the advantage in terms of clear communication of what players can expect and what is expected of them is worth the price of offending players who don't find our code acceptable. It's not a pleasant thing to have to do - but we wouldn't do it if we didn't think Empire would benefit by doing it.

Compliance Not Convergence

The kind of issues that we address in our code of conduct, costume, language, equality and diversity, are emotive and politically contentious. There is absolute agreement in the minds of individuals on what the right answers are, but there is no agreement at all across our hobby or in the wider gaming community about the way to handle these issues. At events we tend to focus on playing the game, so we reserve discussion of these contentious issues for the internet - an environment perfectly designed to polarize debates and breed resentment.

We don't imagine for a second that our code of conduct will settle these arguments - that is not what it is intended for. We have no basis for telling other players the answers to these questions nor are we remotely interested in doing so. Profound Decisions is not a political party- it exists purely to try to create enjoying live roleplaying games. Our remit extends to our own games - and no further.

So we can't stop people arguing on the internet about what the answers should be, but we can define what the answers are for Empire. We don't remotely expect everyone to agree with the decisions we take - but disagreeing with us about how many hits your character should have, doesn't give an individual player license to ignore the rules that have been laid down for everyone. It's absolutely fine to disagree with us - provided you comply with the rules we have laid down for Empire when you are involved with the game.

Human Rights and Human Wrongs

In laying down a code of conduct, we absolutely are trampling on the inalienable human right for you to turn up at our events and do whatever you like. Of course this supposed "right" never existed in the first place. You can't play stormtroopers, ewoks or jedi at our Empire events. In fact, no LRP organization has ever created a game where you can turn up and do whatever you like. All we have done is take that further than many systems by explicitly defining the code of conduct that we expect of participants.

In doing that we have categorically increased the restrictions on people's right to do as they please at our events. That is not a step that we take lightly - as a libertarian I'm overly attached to people's rights to choose for themselves. We've done that to ensure that people have the right to attend our events without experiencing the kind of behaviour we've asked players to avoid.

But there is another right here - my right to run the game I want to run. The right of my crew to create the game they want to create. Everyone involved in Empire has some right to define what they want for the game - our view is that the more work you put into the game, the more right you have to make those decisions. Ultimately Profound Decisions is the only body that can make a conscious choice about what the rules for conduct should be at our events - we've chosen to take that step because if we're going to spend our lives working on a game than we're damn well going to choose to do that on a game that we want to run.

In short we've set these rules for our code of conduct because these are the rules we want for our game. Anyone who genuinely respects us for running Empire will be willing to abide by the rules of the game because they will respect our right to choose what we create.

Of course some participants will be unhappy at the decisions we have made - that is inevitable. We can't make everyone happy - and we have never claimed that we would try to do that. But regardless of any restrictions that we create, everyone who is part of the live roleplaying community retains one fundamental human right - the freedom to choose what games they wish to attend.

The Courageous Priest (Redirected from Confusion)

Golan the Wanderer is false in his preaching that purifying the Empire to Courage will cause the First Empress to Return. We know this for I, Yael, am the First Empress returned from beyond the Labyrinth and reborn among the people of my Empire. I shall come among the Citizens of Reikos to tell them of my vision of the Labyrinth and of the Land Without Tears.

The General Assembly of the Imperial Synod 379YE Winter Solstice

The Assembly of Courage calls for a campaign of preaching in the territory of Reikos, teaching how the Virtue of Courage stands alongside the other Virtues as an inspiration against fear and ruin. The campaign will be led by Nina of Cantiarch's Hold and be supported by at least 25 vials of liao to inspire virtue through virtuous auras.

The Assembly of Courage of the Imperial Synod 379YE Winter Solstice

Overview

The confusing and conflicting judgements passed by the Imperial Synod, have done little to slow the progress of Golan as he travels Reikos preaching to any who will listen. His words continue to inspire many Highborn citizens who hear him - with his dream of a Empire reforged - and of the First Empress come again. Priests who administer congregations of Courage soon find their numbers swell far beyond expectations - with every new devotee drawn from the congregation of another virtue. The First Empress united humanity beneath her banner - to forge an Empire. Now Golan seems intent on unifying the faithful behind one virtue - by invoking her name.

With the backing of the Synod, Nina of Cantiarch's Hold travels to Reikos to preach how the Virtue of Courage stands alongside the other Virtues as an inspiration against fear and ruin. For those not swept up by the fervour of the Courage of the First Empress, her words seem wise - balanced and fair, but Nina lacks the resources needed to counter Golan. Not that more liao would have helped since the Synod failed to address the judgement that the Empress was a follower of Courage. Without a clear response on that fundamental issue it is not possible for any priest to stop the spread of Golan's ideas.

It is much less clear if Yael of Felix's Watch intends to counter Golan or assist him. Logically, his claims that the First Empress will not be reborn until the Empire embraces Courage completely must be wrong. If she truly is the First Empress reborn. But whatever the arguments, the presence of a living embodiment of the First Empress - with the support and backing of the Synod - is having the opposite effect. There are starting to be as many pilgrims flocking to the congregations of Courage inspired by Yael as by Golan.

Thus far neither of the Synod priests; Nina or Yael, have met Golan - perhaps they will have an opportunity to do so at the forthcoming summit for the Synod have called Golan to inquisition.

The influence of the Courage of the First Empress has already spread to every corner of Highguard - decisions at the next summit will determine if it continues to spread further.

"You seem troubled sister, why so? The liberation of Reikos is nearly complete, the Druj are scattered and defeated... Share your burdens with me, Mariamme?"

The Unconquered sighed heavily and shifted the weight of her armour across her shoulders. She glanced back and smiled wanly at Boethus before returning her gaze to the horizon. "It's probably nothing" she demurred, but her grim face told a different story.

"Good - it would not do to share a weighty matter while we eat - it might spoil our repast!". The wayfarer carefully spread a blanket over the crude table and begin to unpack a simple meal of bread, cheese, cold meats and wine. He decanted a little water into a hand bowl and generously offered it to the soldier first. He waited until she had washed before continuing to press his old friend.

"Now, what has your daughter done to trouble you this time?" he smiled to lighten the tone, but his tone was as sincere as his guess.

"It might not be about Sal!" Mariamne laughed despite herself. Boethus' ability to read her mood always made her smile.

"Mariamne, if you were a hundred miles over the border with no food and no way back... you'd be worrying about your daughter."

"I'm no different from any other mother" she protested. Despite her refusal to be drawn, Mariamne could feel she was losing the battle. Boethus always knew what to say to get her to relax and once her guard was down he would wrestle her concerns from her. Her priest said nothing... just smiled that infuriating smile that indicated that he was not going to give up until she opened up. She sighed again, and then accepted the inevitable.

"She's... she's... got herself caught up in the First Empress heresy. I always hoped you'd help her find Wisdom, but all she's ever wanted to do was become an unconquered and now she's got this crazy idea in her head that Courage is the only virtue worth having. We.... we argued... but she's passed her tests now and I can't stop her."

"What caused the argument?"

"She's been going to listen to Yael - that priestess who claims she is the First Empress reborn? I tried to point out that it's just possible that she might not have told the truth about what happened in her vision... and that's when Sal exploded. She said if we'd all been more Courageous, Reikos would never have fallen and Noah might still be alive. And... that's when I lost my temper."

"Have you tried to reason with her since?"

"Several times - I even took her to see that young priest - Nina of Cantiarth's Hold - you know... the priest in Reikos who isn't preaching anything crazy or heretical at the moment."

"And?"

"Pointless. She's articulate and knows her virtues, she's clearly got the backing of the Synod - but she isn't convincing anyone who isn't already convinced. The problem is the Synod - fundamentally if the Assembly of Courage are right, if the First Empress was an exemplar of Courage... then why should anyone follow a different virtue? Sure the other virtues are important - but this Golan isn't preaching that there is only one virtue - just that there is only one important virtue. It's not even clear it is heresy. Unless the Synod are prepared to gainsay the claim that the First Empress was devoted to Courage, then good priests like Nina are going to be helpless to stop this craze from spreading."

"And now your daughter is caught up in it?"

"Yes! Sal is talking of founding a new chapter - to follow the Empress reborn! She's 15! She passed her citizenship test a few years ago... and now she wants to found a chapter. It's ridiculous."

"She never lacked for Courage."

"It's a bit of bloody Wisdom she needs right now, frankly she can save her Courage for fighting the Druj."

"I hear Golan has been summoned to Anvil - for Inquisition. If they resolve the heresy - would that help to heal the rift?"

Mariamne snorted and shook her head. "I doubt it - it's been one mad idea after another ever since her father died. She just needs to grow up a little."

"Would you like me to talk to her?"

Mariamne finally relaxed "Would you? With Noah gone, she won't listen to me anymore. I wouldn't ask but..."

"You didn't ask." Boethus cut her off - "I offered. Consider it done."

Significance

Golan and Yael's preaching is taking root, and has now had a significant effect. The Courage of the First Empress, as it is becoming known, includes Highborn citizens who follow Golan, or Yael - or in some cases both. These people believe that the First Empress is an exemplar of Courage - that the entire Empire is an edifice built on Courage and that it can only triumph when it is dedicated entirely to that Virtue. As a result citizens are abandoning the other virtues and flocking to the congregations of Courage.

Congregations lead by priests dedicated to Courage are seeing numbers swell in response to the teaching of Golan and Yael - while other Virtues are beginning to suffer by comparison. Every congregation in Highguard operated by a priest dedicated to Courage has seen a significant gain in the amount of liao and the number of votes they receive. Conversely all other congregations have seen a loss of liao and votes.

Countering the Courage of the First Empress

If Golan attends Anvil to answer to the Inquisition then it may give the Synod the opportunity to have him tried on grounds of religious crimes. Golan has prepared the ground well for this eventuality - making clear to everyone who will listen that the Synod will attempt to punish him for revealing the truth about the Courage of the First Empress. Executing Golan will prevent him from further preaching but will likely only harden the hearts of his followers - and it seems incredibly unlikely that anything short of such an outcome is going to influence the hearts and minds of those citizens who have been caught up in the fervour of Golan's cause.

The civil service are unable to offer any advice at this time on what steps might be taken to specifically counter the influence of Yael, but given a day's notice they would be able to advise a member of the Synod of the possible implications of any judgement proposed by them.

However such a judgement would need to be clear and direct. Only if the General Assembly passes a judgement explicitly refuting the claim that the First Empress was an exemplar of Courage and names a priest to travel to Reikos with 50 liao, can they stop the Courage of the First Empress gaining any more recruits. To reverse the gains the Courage of the First Empress and restore the former status quo in the affected territories would require the above judgement refuting the claim of the First Empress' Courage and 150 liao.

Helping Golan or Yael

If the Courage Assembly passes a judgement supporting Golan's claims then the backing of the Synod will provide a boost to his efforts. If the Synod names a priest to travel to Highguard with 75 liao, then they can spread the effects of Golan's teaching to Sarvos, Tassato, Miaren, Morrow, Redoubt, Therunin, and Astolat.

If the General Assembly recognises the First Empress as an Exemplar of Courage, then the effects of Golan's teaching will automatically spread to Sarvos, Tassato, Miaren, Morrow, Redoubt, Therunin, and Astolat. The Courage assembly could then name a priest to use 75 liao to spread the effects even further to Semmerholm, Weirwater, Upwold, Temeschwar, Karov, Madrugá, and Feroz.

Additionally if the General Assembly or the Council of Nine passes a judgement supporting Yael's claims to be the First Empress reborn then the impact of the Courage of the First Empress can be spread using only 50 liao.

It may be possible to spread the effects wider still later, once this is accomplished.

Other Judgements

In the event that multiple incompatible judgements are passed, the judgement that has had the largest amount of liao spent on it takes precedence.

It is not possible to counter the effects of Yael or Golan without passing a judgement that clearly states either the First Empress was not an exemplar of Courage or at the very least that there is no evidence that she was.

Judgements already raised by the Synod

The following judgements of the Synod raised during the Winter Solstice 379YE relate to this event.

Congregation

Definition

A congregation can represent almost any structure or location where people could receive spiritual instruction, such as a monastery, a church, a sacred grove, a burial site, or similar structure.

Production

A congregation entitles the owner to ten votes in the Imperial Synod. In addition the Imperial civil service will provide the owner with five doses of liao.

Downtime Options

It is possible to sell the liao produced by a congregation. You receive 12 rings for each dose of liao that you sell in this way.

Upgrades

A congregation can be upgraded using white granite obtained from the Bourse. Each time a congregation is upgraded, the owner receives two additional votes in the Synod and one additional dose of liao from then on.

To upgrade a congregation requires Imperial Wains of white granite equal to the level the congregation is being upgraded to. So the first upgrade of a starting level 1 congregation costs 2 Imperial Wains of white granite, from 2 to 3 costs 3 Imperial Wains, etc.

Diversification

A congregation cannot be diversified.

National Implications

Senators in Highguard are chosen by the Highborn National Assembly on the basis of who gets the least votes against them. This vote is a normal Synod vote - but only Highborn characters with a congregation personal resource can vote.

Sentinel Gate (Redirected from Conjunction)

Overview

The Sentinel Gate is the massive archway that stands at one side of Anvil. It is used by Imperial citizens to teleport to battle-grounds to fight the barbarians - as well as to go on quests throughout the Empire.

History

The Gate is an ancient magical device, it was constructed long before the time of the Empire. The Gate was discovered by the Urizen mages and presented by them as a gift to the Empire when their nation joined. The Gate was then moved to Anvil and erected there, where it has remained since.

The Gate's allows the Empire to teleport people to critical locations in the Empire but only at a solstice or equinox. It is now a pivotal part of the Empire's military planning - the ability to strike against their enemies at critical locations has been so decisive that it influences the entire way the Imperial Military Council plan and conducts their wars.

Conjunctions

The power of the stars creates connections between times and places - referred to by Imperial magicians as conjunctions. By using the Gate to access a conjunction a character can travel from Anvil to the site linked through the conjunction. The device is powerful and expensive, but not so powerful that it could not be replicated. However the Gate does not create conjunctions - it only provides the means to access them, so creating an additional Gate would not generate any additional conjunctions.

The Sentinel Gate at Anvil was bonded to the Empire centuries ago by Urizen magicians using a powerful Autumn ritual. Because of this, only Imperial citizens can use the Gate. Autumn magic can be used to create a link between the Empire and a barbarian or a foreigner to allow them to use the Gate - and Night magic can transform or disguise a target in such a way that they can pass through. In both cases though it requires that those using the Gate are accompanied by a greater number of Imperial citizens. In the opinion of Imperial magicians, the Gate is secure from intrusion - a belief supported by the last four centuries of use.

Partly as a result of this bond, the Gate can only be used to travel to places the Empire is connected to - either inside the Empire, on the borders or to locations where significant numbers of Imperial troops are present. In the theory the bond could be broken but it would then need bonding to a new nation or power to be usable at all.

Predestination

Conjunctions only occur at a solstice or equinox but beyond this restriction they appear superficially to be random, defying attempts to explain or predict them using logic. Urizen magi use the Net of the Heavens to explain the clear serendipity in the conjunctions that arise that allows the Empire to intervene at critical moments - but this may simply be the natural hearth magic of the underlying constellations that links them to fate.

Any magician can detect the imminent presence of a conjunction by casting detect magic on the Gate. They can only detect the imminent presence of a specific conjunction in this matter - the caster must specify exactly what destination they are seeking to detect each time they cast the spell. If a conjunction for that location exists - then the spell will identify the approximate time and how powerful the conjunction is - expressed in terms of how many people can travel through the gate when the conjunction occurs.

Detect magic can only detect the imminent presence of a conjunction to a precisely specified location. It is not possible to use detect magic or rituals to detect all possible conjunctions for a wide area. Attempts to do this always fail. The spell is only as effective as the description of the location provided - ambiguous or unclear descriptions usually result in failure but may sometimes give erroneous answers.

Detecting conjunctions in this way is a form of prognostication, and is affected by the same limits that apply to all attempts to make forecasts or predictions using Day Magic. The information is always correct - but only at the specific time that the spell is cast - and only for the magician casting the spell. The information may change at any time and very occasionally different casters get different results. It is exceptionally rare for a conjunction to disappear once detected, it is slightly more common for new conjunctions to appear. Some Wintermark mystics claim this is because the conjunctions are linked to an individual's skein or perhaps the fate of a nation or even the whole Empire.

Operating the Gate

To access a conjunction to travel elsewhere in the Empire, the Gate must first be activated. The easiest way to do this is to perform the operate portal spell on the Gate - but any equivalent magic will work. Once opened the Gate remains open for a brief period, just long enough for those gathered to travel through it. After that, the outward gate closes and nothing further may pass through. It is impossible to access a single conjunction twice - the Gate can only be opened again if a second conjunction followed immediately after - an exceptionally rare event. Magic cannot restore access to a conjunction once the Gate has closed, no more than it create new conjunctions.

Those who have made use of the conjunction to travel elsewhere in the Empire have a short period of time during which they return safely - usually around half an hour. The noted astrologer Aquila of the Glittered Towers compared it to the passage of the stars through the heavens. The conjunction begins when a specific heavenly body is directly over Anvil - only at the moment is outward travel to the destination possible. The travellers may return to Anvil at any time the conjunction endures, but as time passes, return becomes increasingly dangerous as the stars move out of alignment and the conjunction weakens. Citizens who have waiting too long to return have suffered magical backlash resulting in traumatic wounds and even death in exceptionally rare cases.

As a result all Imperial magicians are taught a minor cantrip that usually allows them to calculate how long a conjunction they have used will last. Any magician that has used a conjunction to travel from Anvil can perform this cantrip without cost. It takes a few seconds to perform and if successful, lets them know approximately how long remains before they must return. The cantrip is not reliable, sometimes the influence of the stars is hard to detect and the spell fails.

Major Conjunctions

Most conjunctions are small, they allow anywhere between ten to thirty people to travel, but there are usually at least two conjunctions at any time which are potentially much more powerful. A major conjunction occurs when several normal conjunctions occur at the same time - as a result they often present the option to choose a single destination from one of several possibilities. Imperial magicians soon discovered that these conjunctions could be accessed by the egregores to allow vastly more people to travel through - hundreds or even more - sufficient to achieve major military outcomes. Because of their potent military benefits these major conjunctions are controlled by the Imperial Military Council which decides which nations will travel and how best to make use of the conjunction.

Even a major conjunction would normally only allow a few dozen travellers, but by drawing on the power of the egregore bond, the conjunction can be accessed by everyone bonded to that egregore. Stargazers who have studied the operation of the Gate and the formation of conjunctions claim that the bond produces a powerful hearth magic effect through the law of sympathy - a character using the conjunction is a single entity - but the egregore can use a major conjunction to allow their entire nation to travel through the Gate as a single entity.

To operate the Gate in this way, the egregore does not need to physically travel via the conjunction (although some choose to do so), but they do need to engage the egregore bond with those who are travelling. This is usually done using a small ceremony or simple arcane rite designed to epitomize the nation's spirit. Invoking the essential nature of their nation, produces the required hearth magic that allows the nation to travel through the Gate - at a major conjunction - as if they were a single entity.

There are limits to the major conjunctions - which are only poorly understood by Imperial magicians - which restrict the nations that may travel together. These restrictions appear to be bound by the movement of the stars in some way - which nations may use the conjunction to fight together is rarely the same from one summit to another. While the restrictions cannot currently be predicted, they can be divined - using night magic. The civil service present the Military Council with a definitive breakdown of the available options for using the Gate's major conjunctions each summit.

Major conjunctions have other limitations as well. They vary in size, the smallest allows a single nation to travel while the largest allows four or five nations to travel. Using a major conjunction is enormously taxing for the egregore - an individual egregore is rarely able to make use of more than one or two major conjunctions in this way during an equinox or solstice.

Does the conjunction happen by happy chance because Robert of Mitwold turns up to Anvil to complain about the Feni stealing his cows?

Of course not... what a foolish notion! You have preordination all the wrong way round my friend.

Robert of Mitwold comes to Anvil because the power of the constellations compels him to; it arranges all matters so that our Marcher friend cannot help but come to Anvil and find someone who can assist him.

The conjunction draws what it needs to it.

Rules

- The Gate can only be opened at predestined times. It is not possible for anyone or anything in the game to open the Gate at any other time.
- At the predestined moment, the Gate can be opened by any Imperial citizen. A magician can use the operate portal spell to activate the Gate, or an Égregore can do it using hearth magic.
- Any Imperial citizen can travel through the Gate when it is open. Foreigners and barbarians can only travel through the Gate using magic specifically designed to facilitate this - a ritual, item or eternal power, and only in the presence of an equal number of Imperial citizens.
- Magical creatures - beings that are created or summoned using magic cannot use the Gate.
- The Gate remains open for outward travel only for a short amount of time. No character or object may travel out through the Gate once the assembled citizens have passed through in good order.
- The Gate closes for return travel slowly. There is a set period of time for which return travel is safe, any citizen who delays too long may experience a magical traumatic wound when they eventually pass back through the portal.
- Any Imperial magician who passes through the gate can sense how long they can remain away from Anvil before the Gate closes if a referee is present. This ability requires a few seconds of appropriate arcane roleplaying.
- Characters can move anything through the gate that they can personally carry, including shared loads. Beasts of burden - and their loads cannot use the Gate.
- Sights and sounds perceivable through the portal can be perceived in-character.

Conscience of the Senate

No. Call it the Conscience of the Senate. If I ever have need of a conscience... I'll find my own priest.

Varkula, The Throne

Overview

The Conscience of the Senate is an Imperial title appointed by the Cardinal of the Assembly of the Way in the Imperial Synod. It is considered a virtue title of the Assembly of the Way.

During the reign of Empress Teleri, all the cardinals of the Synod were granted the abilities now wielded by the Conscience. They used them in a variety of ways, and to the increasing chagrin of the Imperial Senate. When Empress Varkula came to the Throne, she orchestrated matters so that the Senate was able to successfully remove those powers from the cardinals. As a compromise, however, the post of the Conscience was created and its appointment left in the hands of the Cardinal of the Way. The intention is that rather than representing the interests of any one Virtue assembly it will instead represent all the virtuous citizens of the Empire.

Responsibilities

The Conscience is intended to observe Senate affairs; to speak on behalf of the virtuous; to keep the senators focused on their duty to the citizens of the Empire rather than their own aggrandizement; and to represent the Synod in the Senate when needed. When the Synod passes a judgement of veto, it is the responsibility of the Conscience to ensure that someone presents that decision in the next Senate meeting. Often the Conscience will do so themselves, but they may appoint someone else to do so.

Limitations

One Year Only

The Conscience serves for up to one year, unless removed from office early. In addition, no person may hold the seat of the Conscience more than once in their lifetime. This restriction is historical in nature, put in place when the post was first created to limit the power of the Conscience.

Lay Person

The Conscience must be a lay-person; this means that if the appointee has a congregation, they must give up their membership of their assembly and lose the ability to participate in the business of the Imperial Synod for as long as they serve.

Powers

The Conscience enjoys many of the same powers as a senator with the advantage that they do not need to worry about re-election. Some Consciences decline to use these powers, seeing their role as more ceremonial; others take full part in the business of the Senate, engaging in spirited debates with their fellow senators.

Member of the Senate

The Conscience is a member of the Senate. They are entitled to enter the Senate chamber at the start of a Senate session and participate in the debates.

Proposal

The Conscience may propose a single motion for consideration by the Senate each summit.

Voice of Virtue

The Conscience may abstain from any vote in the Senate. The conscience will often be called on to speak on matters relating to the Synod.

Appointment

The cardinal of the Way may appoint any citizen to be the Conscience, provided that that citizen has never held the position previously. It is frowned upon to name a conscience from the same nation as the cardinal. If the Conscience controls a congregation, they face additional restrictions.

The conscience may hold the seat for no longer than a year, or until a new cardinal of the Way is appointed and chooses to name a replacement. They can be revoked by the General Assembly, the Assembly of the Way, and the Assembly of the Nine.

Consecration

Overview

The ceremony of consecration teaches a priest how to use their liao to evoke an aura to create a place of spiritual contemplation. It is perhaps most commonly used in shrines to aid pilgrims in their meditations upon one of the Seven Paths. By consecrating an area, the priest creates a potent location aura drawn from their virtue. The standard location aura provided by a consecration provide two significant benefits. They produce a roleplaying effect which will influence the way characters in the location will act, and they also provide a source of spiritual strength to overcome a malign roleplaying effect.

A location may only have one location aura in place at once, so creating a new aura automatically replaces any existing standard aura. A durable aura is more difficult to remove. Characters with the same virtue can cooperate to perform a consecration to create a durable aura or to remove or replace an existing one.

Consecration is not the only way that a person may experience a powerful aura. A location aura can occur spontaneously as a result of actions taken there and some curses and dangerous spirits have the ability to create a location aura. Some magic rituals such as The Chamber of Delights or The Solace of Chimes also create location auras, but without any true spiritual underpinnings.

A Synod priest who is in a consecrated area can choose to grant sanctuary to any Imperial citizen who asks for it.

Performance

- Requires a dose of liao and at least ten seconds appropriate roleplaying
- Requires the presence and assistance of a referee

Performing a consecration requires a dose of liao and at least ten seconds of appropriate roleplaying. You must be physically inside the area you wish to consecrate throughout the ceremony.

You must have a referee to perform a consecration. The referee will take your liao, and bring an A5 laminated card to mark the entrances to the consecrated space. If you let a referee know ahead of time that you are planning to perform a consecration, then they will have the aura cards ready if possible.

Consecration is most effective when used on a tent or room, where the location aura automatically expands to fill the interior space. If a consecration is performed in an open area, then the space must be clearly defined and no more than 40' across at most. It must be absolutely clear to anyone whether they are inside a consecrated area or not. If for any reason the boundaries of a consecrated area shift or move significantly, then the consecration collapses.

Effects

- Consecration creates a location aura on the area
- Provides a source of spiritual strength to overcome other roleplaying effects while in the location
- Anyone in the area can determine the presence and strength of a consecration
- The effect lasts until the start of the next Profound Decisions Empire event

Unlike anointing and hallow, there is one specific consecration location aura for each virtue. You create the consecration aura that matches the virtue you are dedicated to. A character who is not dedicated to a virtue (a priest of the Way) can use the consecration ceremony and a dose of liao to attempt to remove an aura created with the consecration skill.

The strength of the consecration ceremony determines how hard it is to remove or replace the consecration. A new consecration must be of at least equal strength to replace an existing consecration.

As with any aura, a location can only be under the effect of one aura at once. Consecrating a location that is already under the effects of a standard aura will automatically replace that aura. Consecrations cannot be overlapped; if an area contains a location aura then the new aura either replaces the existing aura or the ceremony fails.

Removal

- Consecration lasts for a season or until removed or supplanted.

Any character with the consecration skill may opt to remove an existing location aura rather than replacing it. In the case of a durable consecration, the ceremony must still have a strength at least equal to that of the existing aura.

The consecration skill can also be used to remove location auras arising from other sources, including those created by some magical enchancements such as The Solace of Chimes.

True Liao

- True liao can be used in place of liao to perform the consecration ceremony.

You can use true liao in place of normal liao to perform an consecration ceremony. This will create a true aura, the aura is permanent - it will last at least as long as the enclosure is intact, and perhaps even longer than that.

Astronomancy (Redirected from Constellation)

Overview

The constellations have been known since time immemorial – they figure, largely unchanged from their present forms, on some of the oldest buildings and artifacts in the world. Many magicians – especially those of Urizen – believe them to be a map or chart of the powers of the world reflected above – as if the sky were a great dark lake and reflected on its surface was the means to understand, control and manipulate the forces of nature.

At its core, astronomancy is a magical tradition that involves identifying patterns in the stars associated with fundamental magical and natural laws, and drawing power from them to fuel ritual magic. These patterns - the constellations - are held by many astronomancers to be the same tools the Creator used to forge Creation. Like the runes and the narrative principles of dramaturgy, Astronomancy is a means of placing magic in context and understanding it.

Invocation and Command

The stars are handles – physical ways to grab the force of magic. Nobody in the Empire imagines The Stork is an actual stork. That arrangement of stars you can see in the sky is the way it is to represent one of the primal powers of creation; by using that imagery and incorporating it into your rituals, you are tapping into that primal power and associating your ritual with it.

Astronomancers believe that the sky is limitless, and so are the powers it represents; the constellations known and codified by the Empire are merely the tip of the iceberg. Every star is part of a constellation and every constellation is a representation of a cosmic principle, a natural force or a universal power. The codified ones are simply those whose meaning and purpose is clearly understood; there exist many more to discover, comprehend and codify. Every Astronomancer dreams of naming a new constellation and adding them to the great catalogue.

Using the constellations the easy way, an Astronomancer can draw the design on an implement or artifact, arrange things or people to recreate the design below (such as standing your ritualists in the shape of The Fountain or The Chain) or simply invoke them during a ritual to shine favourably or unfavourably upon the outcome or a specified target. By naming propitious stars to someone you could bless or curse them.

As Above, So Below

Astronomancers firmly believe that echoing the structure of the constellations strongly influences the environment – it is not uncommon to find an Urizen spire's encampments laid out in the form of The Net, or Astronomancer's chambers arranged specifically to evoke a particular constellation.

Tulpas

The constellations are not sentient or sapient in any meaningful way – they are symbols of potentiality, emblems of cosmic forces ill-understood by the Empire's magicians. But sometimes during a ritual, a combination of the existence of the constellation, coupled with the efforts of the magician, will cause the manifestation of a Tulpa. These are thought-forms; concepts and ideas given form by magical will and the motive power of the Constellation.

Tulpas are curious creatures – constructs of will and magic that make it easier to form a connection between the constellation and mortal men. The process by which a Tulpa forms and manifests is structurally and magically very similar indeed to the process by which a national Egregore is formed; some Astronomancers view them perhaps as the understandable face of principles too vast and alien for our minds to clearly understand. As the Varushkan Egregore sometimes represents a way for magicians to understand what it means to be Varushka, to interact with the soul of a nation in a meaningful way, so Tulpas of the Claw allow a magician to interact with the principle of conflict between living things.

They are bridges, formed by magicians to connect them to these potent principles. Essentially the magician gives the magic a physical form or a spiritual form that is easier for mortal minds to interact with. In a real sense, if the magician were not doing the ritual the Tulpa would not exist - it is like a combination of the cosmic principle and the ritual itself. It exists from moment to moment at the point where magicians work magic using it. Through the principles of Astronomancy, the tulpa allows magicians to connect to the power of the constellations; they are not entities in the way the Eternals are entities; the Urizen in particular describe them as being much more like cosmic ushabti.

Whilst Tulpas traditionally form their own bodies, Astronomancers who are deeply aligned with a constellation during a working sometimes experience what they describe as “brushing by” or “alignment” with a Tulpa. The ritualist’s mind brushes the consciousness of a Tulpa during a ritual and the ritualist finds themselves behaving in a way which personifies or exemplifies the principle of the Constellation. The ritualist does not lose control or consciousness, they remains in control of their own actions; but all factors to do with the constellation are amplified.

Constellations

There are eighteen constellations recognised by Imperial astronomancers, from which they can draw power.

Astronomancy (Redirected from Constellations)

Overview

The constellations have been known since time immemorial – they figure, largely unchanged from their present forms, on some of the oldest buildings and artifacts in the world. Many magicians – especially those of Urizen – believe them to be a map or chart of the powers of the world reflected above – as if the sky were a great dark lake and reflected on its surface was the means to understand, control and manipulate the forces of nature.

At its core, astronomancy is a magical tradition that involves identifying patterns in the stars associated with fundamental magical and natural laws, and drawing power from them to fuel ritual magic. These patterns - the constellations - are held by many astronomancers to be the same tools the Creator used to forge Creation. Like the runes and the narrative principles of dramaturgy, Astronomancy is a means of placing magic in context and understanding it.

Invocation and Command

The stars are handles – physical ways to grab the force of magic. Nobody in the Empire imagines The Stork is an actual stork. That arrangement of stars you can see in the sky is the way it is to represent one of the primal powers of creation; by using that imagery and incorporating it into your rituals, you are tapping into that primal power and associating your ritual with it.

Astronomancers believe that the sky is limitless, and so are the powers it represents; the constellations known and codified by the Empire are merely the tip of the iceberg. Every star is part of a constellation and every constellation is a representation of a cosmic principle, a natural force or a universal power. The codified ones are simply those whose meaning and purpose is clearly understood; there exist many more to discover, comprehend and codify. Every Astronomancer dreams of naming a new constellation and adding them to the great catalogue.

Using the constellations the easy way, an Astronomancer can draw the design on an implement or artifact, arrange things or people to recreate the design below (such as standing your ritualists in the shape of The Fountain or The Chain) or simply invoke them during a ritual to shine favourably or unfavourably upon the outcome or a specified target. Construct Dunfrith

Ham, son of Brigantia, son of Frecki and of Bruin, lead apothecary of Dunhearth and descendant of the Great Dun, apprentice of Wise Rangara and Saviour of Holburg, with the authority of the Great Thane, Tobrytan Dunning, called Spooner, has instructed the foresters of Woodhall in the southernmost reaches of Hahnmark, close by their home of Dunhearth Hall, to fell trees in such a way as to create glades. These glades are positioned most carefully and plantings and experimentations have shown that conditions are such that, in the most exposed and Northern facing areas, Bladeroot grows vigorously, as it does in many areas of Wintermark, in the Southern facing and most sheltered glades, Cerulean Mazzarine grows strongly and well, in the glades carefully placed upon sites of skirmishes with the Feni, Marrowort does flourish, and True Vervain and Imperial Roseweald will both grow well in this area, even without careful tending.

As such, and as a legacy to future generations, a balanced herb sinecure is proposed, funded by the family of Ham, and to be overseen by him, for as long as he does live, that he may provide potions for the benefit of the Empire.

It shall be called Dunfrith, meaning in the old tongue "forest of Dun" and the custodian shall always be known as the Guardian of Dunfrith.

The Imperial Constitution

Constitution

- Sinecures are usually life-time appointments, but virtue appointments are normally available to be reappointed if a new cardinal is elected. The Senator for Tassato will need to provide these necessary details.
- It is unconstitutional for an Imperial citizen to vote in a virtue assembly unless they are a member of that assembly. A sinecure that provides votes in the Synod or in senatorial or bourse elections must provide those votes for all situations where they are relevant.

In its original form, this motion was unconstitutional because it provided the potential for an Imperial citizen to vote in a virtue assembly when they were not dedicated to that virtue. In addition a sinecure that provides votes in the Synod should provide votes in all relevant assemblies. After discussion with the senator for Tassato, the Constitutional court recommended that the motion be modified as follows.

Amendment

- The sinecure is a lifetime appointed by the current Cardinal of Prosperity
- The sinecure will provide votes in the appropriate assemblies based on the nationality and virtue of the recipient

- Any trade with the Asavean Archipelago, especially trade in valuable materials such as white granite, requires the co-operation of Asavean merchants. Without their cooperation, these docks will not provide any special benefit.
- A synod member indicated an intention to raise a veto; however, the Imperial Synod had successfully used this power earlier during the summit so no veto is possible and construction can begin post-haste.

Constitution

- For the purposes of clarity; this will not create an additional seat on the Imperial Bourse.

Conviction

"Reikos is no more. Our home - the cradle of our virtue - has been steeped in the noxious bile of our enemies. What grows here now is only misery and despair. The land has turned against us - those who have survived the Druj will find only death here now."

The wild-eyed preacher stood atop the mound, his clothes ragged and torn, his hair and fingers stained with dirt. His pronouncements of doom had angered some and they have moved on quickly - but a large crowd remained - gripped by the fervent preacher's words. Many bore physical marks of their captivity, vivid weals and scars at wrists and ankles. The Black Thorns had moved through here only days earlier driving the orcs before them and freeing the slaves from the Druj camps.

"The Druj are but one part of our destruction. Our Senate barter away the Empire to the northern orcs to buy peace from them - but the horns of war blow on every border of the Empire. We are beset on all sides. Besieged - we cannot hold. Death is come upon us. She is inexorable, the hound that pulls down the hind. Not the little death - not release into the Labyrinth. I speak of true death! Our souls themselves lost as our Empire is torn down!"

A drop of spittle ran from the preacher's lips. His hands continued gesturing even when he stopped speaking, moving back and forth abruptly as if animated by a will of their own and seeking to underpin the threats the priest warned of.

"It is time now! Just as our souls enter the labyrinth and are reborn - so must our Empire be reborn. Reforged, the nations of humanity will come together as they did only once before. Only once have we been truly united - when SHE walked the land. When SHE led us into war. When SHE brought the Way to all humanity."

"On the day SHE entered the Labyrinth we lost the Way. What virtue did SHE follow? Lost - lost to us - lost to the darkness of the Labyrinth. That is why we have squandered HER legacy. That is how we have fallen so low. We have forgotten the faith SHE used to carry all before her!"

"No - not lost... hidden. Hidden by cardinals and gatekeepers who could not stand the light of truth that shone from HER! Buried by the priests who could not bear to submit to HER path. They destroyed the truth! These cowards stole the Way from us. By their actions they doomed us all!"

The crowd groaned, there was no-one left now who was not swept up by the preacher's words. Starved and beaten by the Druj, they had grown used to the hunger in their bellies - now they were reminded of the hunger in their soul.

"But the truth is reborn just like our souls! There are still priests in the Synod brave enough to speak the truth. Not all our silenced. Listen to the wind - there you will hear the truth. SHE was an exemplar of Courage!"

"Courage is what we need now. Courage to withstand our slavery beneath the Druj. Courage to turn their fear back on them. Courage to send the orcs crawling on their bellies back to their mountain holes. Courage to unite our great Empire beneath HER will."

"I am sent to bid you to Courage for I have seen and SHE will be reborn! Long has she laboured in the Labyrinth, but now SHE prepares for her final journey into life. Now SHE prepares to lead us in war against our enemies - to unite us once more. But only if we have the Courage to follow HER."

"We must make the Empire ready for HER! This is why SHE has not returned to us - because we are not worthy! Traitors and silver-tongued schemers have taken HER dream and twisted it into something SHE never intended. We must set it back on the right path, must have the Courage to return to HER way - and then SHE will return to lead us!"

"Our Empire must be reborn! The Way must be healed! Not seven virtues equal and the same. How can that be? A feeble lie we tell our children - a lie that suits the flatterers of every virtue in the Synod well. But if SHE was an exemplar of Courage as they finally admit - then the truth is revealed. Courage - beyond any other virtue - is what we need to follow HER through the Labyrinth. Courage above all other virtues to defeat our enemies. Only Courage will remove the fear from our hearts - only Courage can save us."

"Courage was HER virtue. This is the truth the Synod has kept from you for centuries. That is why we have fallen. That is why you laboured under the whips of the Druj."

"Courage was HER virtue. Set aside the others - and turn at the last to the truth. And you will be reborn, our Empress will be reborn, our Empire will be reborn."

"Courage was HER virtue. Who now will follow another virtue when you know that the greatest human who ever walked the earth chose this for HER path?"

"Courage was HER virtue. Who among you will step forth and be reborn. Step forth and I will anoint you in HER Name - in HER virtue."

The speaker stood, silent at the last, his hands wide, imploring the crowd to accept his words. For a moment there was silence and then a young woman stepped forward, her eyes full of fervour to receive the priest's blessing. And then the tide burst.

Overview

The devastation wrought by the Druj in Reikos has scared the Highborn inhabitants both physically and spiritually. The people of Highguard pride themselves on their indomitable spirits, but even they are not immune to the bone-cutting terror they have suffered. Now that the people have been freed and the invaders have been driven from the land, some of them are beginning to raise up their heads once more and look for answers.

Into this febrile environment has come an enigmatic Highborn preacher, Golan the Wanderer. Unkempt and dishevelled, he appears to be the very antithesis of the Highborn sensibilities - and yet his words have had a powerful effect on those who have heard them.

What Golan is preaching appears to be a simple case of heresy - he claims that only Courage can save the Empire, he does not actively deny the other Virtues - but he very clearly claims that it is profoundly more important. Of course scholars have argued for centuries about the relative merits of each of the virtues, but Golan's claims are more down-to-earth - more fundamental. He claims that the First Empress was a follower of Courage.

Every Virtue has made claim to the First Empress at some point, but Golan goes much further. The First Empress founded the Empire - in effect the Empire is her legacy - and she is its paragon. She embodies it - and it embodies her. By Golan's logic this simply removes Courage from any comparison with the other virtues. The question he asks over and over is "if the greatest woman who ever lived followed Courage - why would we follow a lesser Virtue? Are you wiser than the First Empress?".

Normally this would seem to be a cut and dried case of blasphemy - yet another variant of a purification heresy. Golan's other claims may be simply more fantastic than blasphemous - that the Empire stands on the brink of destruction - only the rebirth of the First Empress can save it - and that that can only happen when the Empire pursues Courage above all other Virtues.

However the legal situation is somewhat confused by a recent Judgement by the Synod, in which the Assembly of Courage unanimously declared the First Empress to be an exemplar of their faith. This is a point repeatedly referenced by Golan in his speeches - and he is clearly using it to build his audience - even as he claims that the proof will be when the Synod acts to suppress this essential truth.

Golan's speeches seem to be confined to Reikos at present, but it seems likely that he has his sights set on transforming the entire Empire.

Significance

Golan's preaching is taking root, but has not yet had a significant effect. However, if Golan's following continues to grow then the effects will be very noticeable by the time of the Spring Equinox. Congregations lead by priests dedicated to Courage are already seeing numbers swell in response to Golan's teachings - while other Virtues are beginning to suffer by comparison.

If nothing happens - then every congregation in Reikos operated by a priest dedicated to Courage will see a significant gain in the amount of liao and the number of votes they receive. Conversely all other congregations will see a loss of liao and votes.

Worse, if Golan continues his campaign unchecked, then he may be able to spread his message to other territories.

Contents

- 1 Overview
- 2 Significance
 - 2.1 Countering Golan
 - 2.2 Helping Golan
- 3 Resolution

Countering Golan

If the General Assembly or the Virtue Assemblies passes a judgement refuting the claim that the First Empress was an exemplar of Courage and names a priest to travel to Reikos with 50 liao, then they can stop the heretical priest from influencing any further Highborn citizens and undo the work he has done thus far.

Alternatively the Synod might wish to put Golan to Inquisition and attempt to summon him to Anvil to answer his critics. It cannot compel a citizen to attend, but Golan seems to have no fear of the Synod or any punishment they may hand down. Rather he seems keen to invite such punishment, perhaps believing that a martyr will give credence to his claims that the truth is being suppressed by the Synod.

Helping Golan

If the Courage Assembly or the Highborn Assembly passes a judgement supporting Golan's claims then the backing of the Synod will provide a massive boost to his efforts. If the Synod names a priest to travel to Highguard with 25 liao, then they can spread the effects of Golan's teaching to every territory in Highguard.

Ultimately Golan is claiming that the First Empress is a paragon of Courage - that in effect the entire Empire is an edifice built on Courage and that it can only triumph when it is dedicated entirely to that Virtue. If the General Assembly passes a judgement in support of this claim, recognizes the statement of the Assembly of Courage that she is an Exemplar, or raises the First Empress to the status of Paragon of Courage, then a named priest chosen by either the General Assembly or the Assembly of Courage could spread this word across the Empire. This would require 100 liao - but every congregation in the Empire would then experience the same effects as will soon be felt in Reikos. The priest would need to named as part of a separate statement of principle raised by either the General Assembly, the Assembly of Courage, or the Assembly of Nine.

In the event that multiple incompatible judgements are passed, the judgement that has had the largest amount of liao spent on it takes precedence.

Resolution

The Imperial Synod made three judgements in this regard.

The Courage assembly passed the judgement "The Assembly of Courage calls for a campaign of preaching in the territory of Reikos, teaching how the Virtue of Courage stands alongside the other Virtues as an inspiration against fear and ruin. The campaign will be led by Nina of Cantiararch's Hold and be supported by at least 25 vials of liao to inspire virtue through virtuous auras."

The General assembly also passed the judgement "Golan the Wanderer is false in his preaching that purifying the Empire to Courage will cause the First Empress to Return. We know this for I, Yael, am the First Empress returned from beyond the Labyrinth and reborn among the people of my Empire. I shall come among the Citizens of Reikos to tell them of my vision of the Labyrinth and of the Land Without Tears."

Finally, the Courage assembly declared an Inquisition on Golan "Inquisition to call Golan of Reikos to stand before the justice of the Synod on charges of Blasphemy, Heresy and Idolatry. As author of the Recognition of the First Empress I request the opportunity. Inquisition to occur at the Spring Equinox 380YE." There has been no immediate response from Golan.

Unfortunately, Nina of Cantiararch's Hold did not gather sufficient liao to significantly influence the people of Reikos - the minimum threshold was 50 liao to refute Golan's claims. It becomes clear very quickly (before any liao is spent) that she has insufficient liao to influence the people of Reikos.

In contrast Yael's judgement (backed up virtuous auras) that Golan is incorrect because the Empress has already been reborn has inflamed the situation.

Her claims have cast doubt on some of Golan's claims - that the Empress will not be reborn until the Empire adopts Courage wholeheartedly - but they have done nothing to undermine his central tenet that if the First Empress is an Exemplar of Courage then Courage must be the key virtue of the Way. If anything many of his followers seem more than ready to accept Yael's claims because they see them as adding weight to Golan's wider preachings that Courage is the preeminent virtue...

This means that all congregations in Highguard lead by priests dedicated to Courage are receiving additional votes and liao due to massively increased attendance, while those lead by priests who are not dedicated to Courage are seeing reduced attendance and consequently their influence in the Synod is somewhat reduced, and they have somewhat less liao that they might expect.

There is likely to be further information about the situation regarding Golan and his preaching in the Winds of Fortune before Event 2.

Corsair

The only difference between a privateer and a merchant is that the privateers get their goods cheaper.

Freeborn Proverb

Overview

Corsairs epitomise Freeborn daring and adventure. Since the earliest days of the Brass Coast, their ships have ranged across the known world seeking opportunities for trade and excitement and defending both Freeborn and Imperial interests at sea. The corsairs embrace these traditions, but they excel as sea-borne raiders who prey on barbarian shipping passing through the Bay of Catazar. The Freeborn detest piracy, but they regard privateering as a perfectly legitimate form of warfare - and a highly profitable one at that. By focusing their attacks against the ships (and occasionally coastal settlements) of nations the Imperial Senate has declared barbarians, they not only avoid censure but gain the approval of the Empire.

Few corsairs are just privateers - most engage in foreign trade when it suits them, especially when the Bay is undergoing a period of relative stability. Their most common enemy is the Grendel but it has been decades since a serious Grendel attack has threatened the Empire, and most of that force were sunk long before they reached shore. There are still sporadic engagements between the orc ships and the ships of corsairs, of course, but increasingly corsair families are looking further afield - to trade with foreign nations.

There is a significant difference between a pirate and a privateer. If the Freeborn applaud the triumphs of their corsairs, and enjoy the wealth and plunder they bring back, the Empire tolerate it because the actions of the corsairs damage the barbarians who dwell across the bay from attempting a naval invasion. Problems arise if a corsair chooses to engage in piracy against the shipping of a foreign nation that is not at war with the Empire. Though more profitable, this can lead to a breakdown in diplomatic relations or even a shift towards open hostility. This can, in turn, prompt sweeping action by the Senate - as seen in the Summer 378YE motion to place civil service observers on all ships leaving Imperial ports.

There is some grey area where ships belonging to slavers are concerned - more than one corsair has justified attacks against vessels from the Asavean Archipelago and the Principalities of Jarm as missions to free slaves.

As professional sailors, corsairs often have their own odd traditions which are unique to their ship or family. While they make light of it, corsairs often appear superstitious to outsiders. They often express the idea that luck, fortune, or chance are things that can be attracted or driven away and engage in odd behaviours intended to encourage good luck or discourage bad luck. Partly, this stems from the sailor's awareness of how much their life and livelihood depends on the vagaries of forces beyond their control - especially the weather. Many corsair songs and stories personify luck as a whimsical man or woman, a force of nature akin to a storm. When luck is with a corsair, this figure is friendly. When luck turns sour, this mythical figure turns cruel and hateful. Fortune is often depicted as the paramour of Death, alternately seeking and fleeing the grim reaper's embrace.

Corsairs who are followers of the Way tend to hold the exemplar Zemress in special regard. Occasionally, a corsair priest will attempt to have Emperor Barabbas recognised as an exemplar of Prosperity - many corsair families got their start thanks to the Highborn Emperor's shipbuilding programs - but the idea has never gained much traction due to the prevailing opinion that Barabbas was a profligate fool.

Military heritage

Whereas many families maintain a small, well-equipped force of warriors, it is much more common for everyone in a corsair family to be able to fight except for a small, well-financed force who take a more supportive role. This tendency to encourage everyone on a crew to learn to fight helps make the corsairs the scourge of the open sea - and is sometimes the only difference between them a traditional Freeborn family.

Unlike other Freeborn warriors, who are used to fighting in large open spaces, corsairs developed their fighting style on ships, on the narrow alleys of ramshackle pirate ports, and on treacherous beaches all over the world. Each corsair fights in the style they are comfortable with - one may favour a hooked axe, another a pair of short blades. Battles at sea often begin with an exchange of missiles - as a consequence, many corsairs are proficient with javelins or bows, and while it is not common the Catazarri crossbow is also a popular weapon. The bhuj - the trademark Freeborn heavy spear - is also popular, especially among shipboard marines who value the ease with which they can skewer boarders or send them tumbling into the sea.

Because they value mobility (and the ability to swim), many corsairs are lightly armoured. The bold show off their success with ornately gilded plate, especially if they are anticipating a fight on land. More pragmatic corsairs favour a hauberk of mithril scale with an easily-doffed helmet and toughened leather greaves and bracers.

In battle, many corsair captains like to lay out a goal or goals for an engagement then trust the crew to get on with it, rather than spend time on complicated tactical plans or worrying about contingencies. On the occasions where a corsair has served as a Freeborn general, they have been notable for their commitment to making sure the soldiers under their command understand as much about a battle as possible - the better to empower them to react to the tumultuous, changing circumstances on the field of war. Obviously, this "seat of the pants" approach to warfare can cause a great deal of friction with those used to imposing a top-down strategy.

There's a tide in everything; ride it right, and you make your fortune.

Corsair Saying

Creating a Corsair

The corsairs are designed to encourage a more general mix of fighting and trading than a traditional family. More so than other Freeborn, corsairs are adventurous and crave excitement. They're much more likely to take personal risks in the pursuit of profit or a new experience. They embody a swashbuckling approach to life, and to a degree are inspired by the antics of Sinbad in stories and film.

A corsair group is created like a Freeborn family but emphasises ships and fighting. The fleet resource is an obvious choice, but a band of corsairs is also likely to include one or more military units that may represent marines. That's not to say that everyone in a corsair family will be a sailor - there is plenty of room for other Freeborn archetypes. One member of a corsair family might be a priest or sutannir who oversees an island congregation, while another might be concerned with trading the goods the family brings back from barbarian ships and foreign parts to other Imperials (represented by a small business).

Most corsair families have a "base" which is almost invariably somewhere on the shores of the Brass Coast, and will represent both the harbour from which the family fleets operate and probably the location of any other personal resources. You might hail from a large settlement on the mainland such as Siroc or Cazar. Alternatively, your family may lay claim to one of the innumerable islands off the coast of Madruga and Feroz. Some small islands may be home to a single corsair family, which the larger ones are more likely to be shared by two or three groups. It is a rare corsair who is not based in Madruga or Feroz since neither Kahraman nor Segura have a coastline.

It is uncommon for a corsair family to contain a powerful ritual coven, although not unknown. When a corsair group needs magical support, they traditionally seek the aid of the hakima. Indeed, there are groups of hakima who make the corsairs the focus of their attention, concentrating on supporting and subtly guiding corsair families to the benefit of the nation. Rituals that enhance a corsair ship such as Blood and Salt and Sular's Promise are the most popular enchantments.

A lone corsair is a perfectly acceptable character concept - you might represent a larger "off screen" corsair family, or be an independent captain who embraces the free-wheeling philosophy of the corsair.

Playing a Corsair

Corsairs tend to dress more simply than other Freeborn, preferring practical trousers and a light tunic when they are working. Their flair for wealth tends to show through with jewellery worn at wrist and neck. Metal chains are especially popular with corsairs, as are pieces that appear exotic to Imperial eyes - especially those that have an exciting story attached to them.

Corsairs are not the only people who own ships in the Brass Coast by any stretch. However, the corsair character concept revolves around boats, sea-travel, and fighting. They cultivate "larger than life", flamboyant attitudes, often portraying themselves as swashbuckling adventurers. They share the traditional Freeborn distaste for personal boasting, but they take great pleasure in telling embellished stories of their escapades. The goal is to stress how exciting and dramatic their lives are, rather than how brilliant their personal accomplishments are. You may want to play your character as a little "wilder" than your fellows on the Brass Coast - enjoying the opportunities presented by "shore leave" to enjoy good food and drink and good company before returning to sea for extended periods of time cooped up on a ship in the middle of the ocean.

As a corsair, you should be aware of your luck and may want to adopt a few harmless superstitions about it. You may laugh off any suggestion that you take ideas of luck and fortune seriously, but as a sailor you are aware that random chance plays a large role in your survival and prosperity. You may engage in specific actions that you only half-believe will attract good luck or keep bad luck away.

If you own a fleet, you should consider making regular raids against the Grendel. You will earn a good living from such raids but it will also gain you valuable influence in the election for the Broken Shore Bounty, which is a seat on the Imperial Bourse that provides the rare material ilium. Many corsairs consider control of this resource to be especially prestigious, because of the triumphs needed to achieve it.

It may be worth noting that the corsair is not a criminal archetype. By default, they raid the ships of the enemies of the Empire. They do not prey on the ships of their fellow Imperial nations, nor do they regularly attack the ships of neutral foreigners.

Corsair's Bloody Mask

Description

The Corsair's Bloody Mask empowers the wearer to perform rituals which empower a fleet or military unit.

Otherwise known as the Crimson Reaver Mask, this talisman is often crafted to resemble a ferocious green beast of the sea, spattered with the blood of its last victim; or a maniacally grinning face with blood dripping from the sides of the mouth.

Their construction sometimes incorporates Rhyv, the Rune of Blood.

Rules

- Form: Talisman. Takes the form of a ritual focus. You must be wearing this item or holding it in hand to use its magical properties.
- Requirement: You must have the magician skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: Gain 1 rank for the Blood and Salt and Merciless Wrath of the Reaver rituals, subject to the normal rules for effective skill.
- Materials: Crafting the Corsair's Bloody Mask requires five ingots of tempest jade, three measures of dragonbone, and three measures of iridescent gloaming. It takes one month to make one of these items.

"May the wind be at your backs, your sails remain full, and your prow hold fast."

"May your blades remain keen, your armour stalwart and your minds clear. Be not afraid, for you have magic at your back."

Corset (Redirected from Corsets in Empire)

Overview

Although corsets are common in live-roleplaying, they are discouraged in general in Empire, as they do not fit with the setting. This is because they were little used until the Tudor period, and only in the last 40 years have they been seen as outwear - placing them firmly outside the historical influences for Empire. This page explains more about how we approach corsets in Empire.

Less Appropriate

The minimum costume standards for Empire state no jeans, t-shirts, or trainers - but as part of the social contract for the game everyone agrees to try and get the best kit possible. To make this possible we need to make clear what look and feel is ideal - and also indicate if items of costume are less appropriate.

In defining this ideal look and feel for Empire we have specifically chosen not to include some images. Some items were omitted so that the overall range of images avoids becoming too broad - we want each nation to look distinctive. Sometimes items were left out because the real world significance of them is so strong that it would impact the game, we want to avoid players confusing these nations with real world cultures. And some items are not part of the ideal because they come from a historical period that isn't part of the inspiration for the game or are too modern in feel.

Corsets are one of the pieces of clothing that is defined as "less appropriate" for Empire - because they don't fit the setting. It is permissible to use these items as part of your character's kit; creating a costume is always a compromise as time and money are limited. What we want to do is be clear on the suggestions we are making, so that players who are looking to create or improve their existing kit can be confident about what would look best for their nation.

Some players may wish to wear a corset underneath their costume, for various reasons. That's acceptable especially if the corset is not visible. In Dawn or the League part of the front could be seen filling the deep 'v' of a gown front (like a plastron). In Navarr a leather corset could be teamed up with a split skirt and rough jacket over the top. In Urizen it might be glimpsed under your robes with a sash around the middle.

Armour

Finding good armour that fits the female body is hard. Plate or brigandines made for men are usually too big, are rarely comfortable and almost never flattering. While a leather corset does not meet the rules requirement for armour in Empire - but they can make a good basis for female fitted leather armour. Layer soft leather waistcoats or short cuirass over the top and add tassets or a leather skirt. If worn with mail, the leather corset gives it shape and is very effective at lifting a lot of weight off your shoulders. Underbust designs are best as they allow more movement in the torso.

Costume alternatives

There are a range of alternatives for costume for players who want something that is figure forming or flattering without using a corset. The list below is not exhaustive, but presents some starting ideas:

Wide Belts

A wide leather belt will look great in Wintermark, in other nations you might be able to use a tightly tied sash or a stiffened fabric belt.

Bodice

Using a stiff lining fabric such as heavy linen or canvas will allow dresses to be laced or buttoned tighter without wrinkling of the fabric or bulging of the bits underneath. The bodice of a dress could also be reinforced by using a flexible plastic boning along the seam lines.

Corsage

- 4 Costume alternatives

 - 4.2 Bodice
 - 4.3 Corsage
 - 4.4 Fitted dresses

For some nations it may be possible to use corsage within the brief. It is essentially a shaped vest that laces at the back. Historically it was worn over a bliaut (very full dress with long hanging sleeves) and featured frequently in pre-Raphaelite art. It is a simple thing to make and can be reinforced as above in order to lace it tightly over your costume. There is no reason why this couldn't also be used over trousers and shirt in a similar way to a sleeveless doublet, and would therefore work for women who aren't keen on long skirts.

Fitted dresses

A well fitted dress works wonders for the figure but is difficult to buy off the peg. If you make your own costume, one approach is to leave the side seams open from armpit (potentially up into the upper arm) to hips and lace these closed.

Costume

Overview

We would like Empire to be an aspirational game, one where every participant strives to have the best possible kit. Kit is more than just costume, it includes the props, set dressing and everything else that players bring into the in-character area at an event. The more effort every individual puts in to their kit, the better the game becomes for everybody. But kit is expensive to make and transport to events so it can become demoralizing to make this effort if people feel other players are not trying equally hard. To get the best possible game we need everyone who participates to agree to try their best.

But all aspirational games are at risk of appearing elitist, the assumption is that participants' costume will be judged against some unknown standard, which can be intensely intimidating to new players. We want Empire to be an accessible game that anyone interested in live roleplaying can feel confident about attending. We want the game to be inclusive, to be inviting and welcoming towards everyone interested in taking part.

An aspirational hobby is one where every participant aims for the best standards they can achieve - an inclusive hobby is one where those involved accept the different standards that others can achieve. What we want for Empire is for every player to agree to try their best - but for no player to ever feel embarrassed that their best effort is not good enough.

Costume

- Basic in-character costume that does not include trainers, jeans or t-shirts

All participants must wear appropriate costume while in the in-character area during time-in. Any basic costume is acceptable provided it is very broadly medieval in style and does not include trainers, jeans or t-shirts. T-shirts are acceptable if worn under costume and are not visible.

These costume requirements are not intended to be aspirational; they are designed to allow players to attend the event with absolute confidence that their costume is good enough to play the game. Most of our players want to create fantastic kit, but the purpose of these simple rules is to make clear that these are the minimum standards that players can demand of each other. It is important to encourage everybody to make the best effort they can, but it is not appropriate to make other players feel unwelcome because their kit only meets these basic requirements.

Nudity and Sexual Performance

- Nudity and sexual performances are prohibited at events

Public nudity, of the kind that would not be permissible on a beach on which children are playing, is not acceptable at Empire. Clothing and costume should ensure that genitalia and nipples (if female) are completely covered. The only exception to this is for those who are breast-feeding, which is perfectly acceptable at Empire.

Performance roleplaying that is focussed on sexual displays are not acceptable at events. This means that anything involving nudity, striptease, erotic dance, burlesque or similar is not permitted.

Tents

- Dome tents and party tents may not be pitched in the in-character area
- Tents made mostly from nylon, polyester or similar reflective materials may not be pitched in the in-character area

Our events feature separate in-character and out-of-character camping areas, so players with modern tents are welcome to bring them to the event and use them in the out-of-character field. But modern dome tents and party tents may not be pitched in the in-character area. Some fabrics that are part plastic or impregnated with plastic are fine; materials like polyhemp are positively ideal for guy ropes at Empire. But tents that are obviously synthetic, such as those made of nylon or any material that is sufficiently plastic that it becomes glossy and highly reflective cannot be used in the in-character area.

The standards are much more demanding for tents in the in-character area because modern tents are very disruptive to the immersion of the event. No player who is interested in attending Empire should feel they have to have a in-character tent to play the game. Period tents are expensive and we recommend that players focus on improving their kit in preference to getting a suitable in-character tent if resources are limited. The field will be filled with scores of in-character tents as well as the sets and structures that Profound Decisions build on the site.

Continual Improvement

- Players commit to get the best kit they can given their skills and resources
- Participants commit to continual improvement of their kit between events

Every individual has different amounts of time, experience and resources available to them. Some players have enough disposable income to buy the costume they want to wear, some have the skills and experience to make their own, while others have been LRPing long enough to own many excellent pieces of kit already. Many of us are not that fortunate, our budget and skills are limited, and we may not have exactly the right costume for the game.

The best way to build a game that looks amazing but is welcoming to all is to focus on improvement over time. No costume is perfect - every costume from the simplest home-made tunic to the most expensive tailored outfit can be improved. You can add accessories to improve the overall look or replace parts of the kit with better items. Our kit includes everything we have with us in the in-character area - every element matters so the more we can eliminate even the smallest out-of-character items from our costume and our camps then the more immersive the field becomes.

By committing to continually re-examining your kit between events then you can ensure that the kit you start with improves over time. Just as with creating your kit in the first place, the time and money you can spare to improve your kit has to be your own choice, not something that anyone else can dictate.

The wiki lists scores of links for traders who sell good quality kit and pages of costume advice to help players improve their kit, including a page of suggestions on how to develop your kit on different levels of budget.

Criticism

- Few players want to have other participants judging their appearance
- Participants should not criticize other player's kit

Many of us are self-conscious about our appearance; few people want to feel they are being judged on their appearance by others. One of the hardest challenges in live roleplaying is communicating the idea that kit and costume are important - that every element is important and that the organizers expect every participant to try their best - without putting players off by appearing elitist. The level of effort made by players is important because it sets the costume standards for the event which affects everyone's enjoyment. But if you are being asked to make an effort with your kit then it can be difficult to imagine that you won't be judged on the basis of how good your kit is.

Because of this our code of conduct asks all Empire participants to avoid criticizing other player's kit. Although we encourage everyone to get the best costume they can, we don't judge how successful they are. We respect the efforts made by our players and require everyone who plays the game to do likewise. It is fine to give advice to our friends on how to improve costume if they ask for it; but criticism from strangers - in person or even worse on-line - is never welcome. It does not matter if a piece of kit is not the right period, or the right style, because you should assume that the player in question has followed our guidelines and made the best effort they can.

If you have a legitimate concern that another participant's costume does not meet our minimum costume standards or is strongly inappropriate for the setting then you should inform Profound Decisions or a member of our crew if you are at an event. We will judge if our guidelines have been contravened and what action is required. If someone is violating the rules regarding nudity or sexual performance, then please ask them to stop immediately or report the matter to a member of our crew.

Summary

We are striving to make Empire an amazing game. We want to see incredible in-character camps and buildings populated with characters with beautiful costume. We want players to be able to wander through the site without seeing modern items that jar with the setting. The only way that can happen is if everyone involved with the game, the organizers, the crew, the traders and the players make it happen. The only way to play in an awesome game is for everyone who participates to make an awesome effort to make the game special. But the best way to achieve that is through encouragement to nurture enthusiasm, it won't happen through elitism or criticism. To ensure that Empire remains inclusive and open to everyone who wants to play we've made these rules to help players who have made their best effort with the kit feel confident that they are welcome to play the game.

Cotehardie

The cotehardie developed from the kirtle or tunic, a basic pull on, t-shaped gown. The cotehardie emerged when its precursors became more fitted, adding either button or lace up the front. Cotehardies can also lace up the side, or in the back (showing status as help is required!) and can be as tight or loose as desired.

The cotehardie comes in many lengths - from high on the thigh to floor length. It hangs best when made in heavier fabrics. Generally these dresses are made from wool, but heavier weights of linen or cotton are also suitable. The cotehardie tends to denote higher status than a simple tunic.

In particular long cotehardies are usually worn over a lightweight underdress called a shift which can be made by simply adding some panels to a t-tunic to allow for movement. All of these dresses are straightforward to make either from patterns or from pattern diagrams and are easy to buy from both reenactment and LARP suppliers.

These dresses can be worn with the skirt tucked into the belt at the front to display the shift underneath, or show off a fancy lining.

Council address

I've heard what General Igund suggests and I have a counter proposal; I warn you now, it involves less heroism and fewer dead soldiers. Nobody wins a war by dying. You win a war by making the other bastards die in such numbers that they run back across the mountains with their scaly tails between their legs.

General Nadia, Boyar of the Black Hills

Overview

A Council address is an opportunity for an individual to speak to the Imperial Military Council during a Council session. Only a handful of Imperial titles confer the right to address the Military Council, .

The Senate may create new Imperial titles with this power if they wish; this is most appropriate where the holder of the title does not attend Military Council meetings, but has responsibilities that require them to report to the Military Council.

Procedure

Raising an address

An Imperial citizen who has the right to address the Military Council may do so by informing the Herald of the Council of their intention. The Herald will add the item to the agenda for the next session. The Herald will record the general nature of the address, and a citizen who deviates dramatically from their declared topic risks censure.

The citizen should ensure that they are present at the chamber at the start of the session. They are likely to be called early as addresses are usually dealt with before other agenda items, but after reports from the Field Marshal and the Herald.

Presentation

The citizen making an address will be allowed five minutes to speak during which those present are expected to remain reasonably quiet. The purpose of an address is to present the Council with information that is of interest to them, or to request their assistance. Individuals who try the Council's patience by talking too long on a subject that it is clearly of diminishing interest to everyone present may be directed to conclude their address early by the Herald.

Discussion

After the presentation is complete, the Herald may allow some time for members of the Council to ask questions and for the speaker to reply. The amount of time allocated to such discussions depends entirely on how much additional business the Military Council has. It is possible that discussion will have to be perfunctory.

Decision

It is possible that the address will require the Military Council to make a decision - either to use on of its powers or to otherwise present a collective opinion. If necessary, the Herald will call for a vote.

Council session

Overview

Council sessions are formal meetings of the Military Council. They are distinct from the muster, being shorter and having a broader focus. A Council session is intended to last for no longer than one hour; the Herald of the Council is responsible for ensuring business is presented, discussed and resolved in a timely fashion. The sessions let the military council receive battle reports and other military briefings, as well as allowing them opportunities to propose and discuss strategies for the coming months.

A council session is also an opportunity for representatives of other political bodies to make addresses to, or requests for aid from, of the Military Council. Individuals such as the Quartermaster General of the Imperial Armies may put forward their plans for resupply, or the High Exorcist might offer the generals the chance to receive additional priestly support during an up coming battle.

Member of the Military Council

Only members of the Military Council and key civil servants may speak freely during Council sessions. Any title that grants membership of the Council automatically grants the right to speak on any issue being discussed and to participate in any vote brought before the chamber. The current Imperial titles that are classed as a Member of the Military Council are:

- The Throne
- General
- Warmage

Members of the Imperial Synod have the right of witness which grants them the right to attend council sessions, but not to speak. In practice, it is common for any Imperial citizen who is interested in the affairs of the Military Council to attend sessions, provided they do not disturb the meetings. Citizens who are not members of the Military Council may only speak in session if they are requested to do so by a Council member with the right to speak and the request receives the assent of the Herald.

Speaking in a Council session

The Herald of the Council acts as an impartial chair to keep the discussions civil and organised. They have the power to silence anyone present in the chamber, or to expel them from the chamber, but such powers are rarely used. The preferred approach in the Council is to allow members to discuss matters freely. The Herald will usually only intervene where a speaker is repeating themselves, attempting to browbeat other council members, or is straying far off the topic being discussed. They are disciplined about keeping the meetings running to time however and will bring a discussion to an end once the allotted time has been used.

The Herald will introduce each agenda item, by stating the nature of the issue that the assembled council members are being asked to discuss. If any member of the Council wishes they may demur, requesting that the Herald strike the item from the agenda. If this happens, the Herald may take a quick show of hands to determine if the majority present wish to continue with the item. If they do not, then the Herald may move to the next item on the agenda. It is not possible to object to the presentation of an address to the Council, only to an item of business on the agenda.

Setting the Agenda

The Herald of the Council prepares the agenda on behalf of the Council. Any member of the Council may view the agenda and may add something to it by informing the Herald in good time before the Session begins. The Herald will normally try to arrange the agenda so that the least contentious items to discuss are raised first. That way, if less time is required to discuss these items, then time is freed up for discussing other items later. Likewise, they may collate similar agenda items together for the sake of simplicity and smooth running order.

In addition to the agenda items, there will often be one or more addresses which are usually handled first. The initial address at the Council session following a battle is automatically given over to the Field Marshal. The session after each battle also includes an address by the Herald, where they update the assembled members of the Council with all available information on the progress and outcome of the battle. This address usually involves confirmation of what objectives were achieved. The Herald may also present reports from Imperial scouts, or details about spoils of war.

A discussion may lead to a call from members of the Council to exercise one of the powers of the Imperial Military Council. When this is the case, the Herald may call for a vote.

Powers of the Council

The Military Council has three legal powers that it wields collectively. They are not used in the muster, but they can be employed at any time during a Council session; there is no requirement to raise a specific agenda item. Most often, an opportunity to use one of these powers is raised during a discussion during a session and then voted on.

All these powers require a majority of eligible Council members to vote in favour, otherwise the vote is rejected. When invoking these powers, members of the Council who are not present are counted as a vote against, likewise Council positions which are currently vacant.

Appointment

The Military Council may be able to directly appoint someone to an Imperial title. An Imperial appointment is voted on by all the members of the Military Council, while a national position is decided by majority decision of the generals of that nation.

An Imperial appointment by the Military Council can normally be revoked by the General Assembly and the Assembly of Nine, while a national appointment can also be revoked by the appropriate National Assembly.

Pardon

A general or adjutant can use their right of address to make a formal request for the Military Council to pardon an Imperial citizen who has been sentenced to death by penal military service. They must add their address to the agenda for the next meeting in the normal manner, but make clear who they will be seeking a pardon for. It is possible, though rare, to use a single address to request a pardon for a group of individuals provided they can be clearly identified.

Spoils of War

When spoils of war are captured by Imperial armies on campaign, then the legal responsibility to assign them falls to the Military Council. The Herald will add an address to the agenda for the first Military Council session after the muster so that they can present details of the spoils of war. The Council will then discuss them and how they might best be allocated. When this discussion has concluded, the Herald will call a vote as to what method will be used to allocate the spoils.

If the Council are unable to agree a method then the Herald will automatically raise the issue again at the next Council session. If the Council cannot reach an agreement by the end of the summit, then control of the spoils passes to the Imperial Senate who can attempt to dispose of them at the next summit.

Speaking outside a Council session

Members of the Military Council are strongly encouraged to meet and discuss their business outside the regular hours of the muster and the Council sessions. The sessions are intended to be an opportunity for members of the Council to address everyone in a formal setting, they are not meant to be the first opportunity for a general to discuss matters with their colleagues. On occasion the Herald will advise a Council member looking to add a point to the agenda that a matter might be better discussed privately outside of a session rather than raised in Council.

On occasion some Council members will arrange to arrive at a session early, or remain behind after the session is concluded in an attempt to discuss matters with other members of the Council. This practice is encouraged provided it remains a private agreement between colleagues and no attempt is made to create a de facto extension of a muster or Council session. The Herald encourages private discussions between Council members so that discussions in session can be expedited and efficient, not so that they can be dragged out indefinitely.

Courage roleplaying effects

This is a placeholder page for content that PD are actively working on.

Overview

These roleplaying effects are created by priests dedicated to the virtue of Courage who use the relevant ceremonial skill. A character performing an anointing or hallow must pick one of the appropriate roleplaying effects when they perform the ceremony.

Consecration of Courage

- In this place, your doubts and uncertainties feel weaker and unimportant; you feel an impulse to speak and act without concern for consequence.

Anointings of Courage

The following are a range of auras that can be summoned onto a living soul, with their consent, by priests whose own souls are dedicated to Courage:

The Trial of Courage

- You feel an urge to seek out something of which you are afraid and to confront it; your feelings about the thing you fear are unchanged.

Description: This aura is common, and reasonably popular, for a range of different reasons. Priests of courage have been known to use it to illustrate the path of courage to pilgrims or other citizens, and show them that courage is more than words. Other priests have used this to help test the virtue of those who would, or claim to, walk the path and help them overcome their own weaknesses. In more than one tale, this aura - or something like - is used to teach humility to the boastful, such as the mighty warrior who claims no fear in battle, but who balks at reading their poetry to strangers.

The Proof of Courage

- You are filled with a desire to prove your courage, and are far less inclined to back down from a confrontation. You also feel more inclined to take opportunities that present themselves.

Description: Priests of courage have been able to use this aura to shore up the hearts of those who are about to enter into conflict and have doubts, whether this is a battlefield full of orcs or a Senator about to clash with others on the senate floor. Pilgrims who are plagued with indecision have also found this aura beneficial in making a courageous choice. This aura is popular in overcoming the presents of malign spiritual presences, and especially those that cause fear and doubt.

The Purity of Courage

- You feel a sense of surety. Any fears you have about the consequences of your actions are muted. Attempts to make you doubt what you know to be true cause you to feel irritation and annoyance.

Description: Fear and doubt are the natural enemies of the pilgrim on the path of courage. Priests of courage have used this aura to help pilgrims strengthen themselves against these forces, and live their lives by the teaching that states "do not fear to act; only be shamed by inaction".

- Any fear and uncertainty you feel about the unknown diminishes, and you feel more able to face it. If you are bleeding, or terminal, any fear of death you have is lessened, and a strong sense of curiosity about what lies beyond life rises in its place.

Description: Many priests of the path of courage know that much of fear's power is rooted in the unknown, such as what may lie in the shadows and darkness even if they be empty. Priests have been able to use this aura to help pilgrims confront and explore these unknowns and thus diminish their power. This has not been a popular use of this aura in Varushka, where it has resulted in the unfortunate disappearance of pilgrims. A widespread unknown that causes fear is of what lies beyond death. Even the virtuous pilgrim may falter at being confronted with the mysteries of the Labyrinth of Ages and doubts about their own reincarnation, and so this aura has found a place for some in receipt of last rites as they are dead or dying.

The Revelation of Courage

- The next time you sleep you experience vivid dreams concerning the things you are afraid of, forcing you to confront unwelcome truths and self-deception. Your dreams show you facing and conquering these fear, and reveal how your fear merely gives power to your doubts. You awaken renewed, ready to overcome the things you fear and with a new sense of purpose.

Description: It is easy to assume that the things one fears cannot be overcome. Worry leads to self-doubt, inner turmoil, inaction and cowardice. Priests on the path of courage know the power of helping a pilgrim face the things they fear, and learn the truth that no matter how insurmountable something may seem, the first step to overcoming it is to cast aside fear and doubt. Some priests also favour the use of this aura in assisting those who are plagued by nightmares to strengthen themselves against these, and overcome them.

Hallows of Courage

Hallowing of Irontooth

- You feel an urge to seek out, expose and penalise cowardice and weakness. This impulse includes the desire to use this item in doing so, if it would be appropriate.

Hallowing of Permion

- You feel an urge to seize any opportunity that presents itself. Conscious failure to seize any such opportunity causes the feeling to change to one of revulsion and rejection, which flows from the item to you, for as long as you are bonded to it.

Hallowing of the Scrivener

- You feel an urge to ensure that the words you write be the raw truth from your heart. The idea of using mealy-mouthed 'weasel words' is repellent to you. If you knowingly deceive whilst under this effect, the feeling changes to one of revulsion and rejection that flows from the item to you for as long as you are bonded to it.

Hallowing of the Bull

- You feel a desire to keep up the spirits and resolve of those around you to avoid them succumbing to weakness and doubt. This includes a desire to use this item in achieving this outcome, if it would be appropriate to do so.

The Hallowing of Isaella's Resolve

- You feel a strong urge to disregard any possible consequences that may arise from taking any action you feel in your heart to be right. This includes an impulse to use this item in taking that action, if it is appropriate to do so.

The Hallowing of Ashwine's Rose

- You find it almost impossible to doubt what you believe in your heart to be true. Attempts to dissuade you without compelling evidence are far less likely to succeed.

Bands (Redirected from Coven)

Overview

In Empire it is possible for characters to formalize their loyalty to each other by creating a band. Bands draw on the hearth magic of oaths combined with magical bonds created by magicians to allow members to use certain skills, rituals and items more effectively on each other. For instance ritualists who are part of the same coven (a type of band) can combine their skills to perform more powerful rituals.

Bands are intended to build on the characterisation of the group concept that you have created for your characters. They are there to recognize and support the choice to act as part of a Dawnish noble house, a League guild or a Freeborn family. Players creating characters together are encouraged to use the potential abilities of bands to add depth and character to their group concept.

The Role of Bands

We encourage players coming to Empire to attend as part of a band with their friends. Bands can help to add depth and enjoyment to characterization, making all the characters feel more real and be more fun to play. The band can have its own identity and history and gives characters a way to belong to something that is bigger than they are, yet is still something they can create a history and background for. Bands give OOC friends good IC reasons to roleplay together and good groups are great for helping new players get involved in a game.

The brief for every nation in Empire includes several archetypes to help you develop the idea for a band. For instance a noble house in Dawn, or a chapter in Highguard. There are pages for some of these archetypes explaining the part they play in the setting and offering advice on how to create and play one. These concepts have been designed to be fun to play, but the list is not meant to be restrictive. You can create a travelling band of Dawnish troubadours, or a secretive guild of Highborn artisans if you wish to. Working with your friends, you have the same freedom to create a group concept as you do to create your own character.

Joining a Band

- There are three types of band, banners, covens, and sects
- You may join one of each type of band when you create your character
- You can only ever join a band with members of the same nation
- Joining a band in play requires a magician using the create bond spell

There are three types of band: banners, covens, and sects. You may belong to a single banner, a single coven, and a single sect at the same time, but a character can never be a member of two banners at the same time, nor two covens, or two sects. If you are creating a new character then you may choose one band of each type to begin play as part of - but you can leave any of the options blank if you prefer. Please ensure that you have the permission of the players who are part of a band before joining.

E.g. The Highborn chapter of Exile's Hold is a banner. The members gain all the benefits of being a banner but any character that joins this group cannot join any other banner. They must break the bond with this banner before joining any other banner.

To join a band in play you must find a magician to perform the create bond spell. You can only be a member of one of each type of band at once. For example, if you are a member of an existing banner, then you cannot join another band that is a banner without first breaking the bonds that join you to your existing banner. You can only join a band with members of the same nation.

Creating a Band

- You must use the website to create a band
- Bands must have a name, an oath and a nationality
- Oaths must be appropriate for the setting
- An oath can never be changed

- 3 Joining a Band
- 4 Creating a Band
- 5 Banners
- 6 Covens
- 7 Sects
- 8 Linking Bands Together

One player will need to use the website to create a new band, but it must only be done once - other characters then join that band. A band can be secret or public. If the band is public, then the name of the band and the nation it is associated with is public to all players in the game. Players making a character can choose to begin play as part of a public band. If the band is secret, then the name of the band is not visible to any player. New characters must join the band in play, they cannot begin play as part of a secret band.

Bands use the hearth magic of an oath to give them power. For this reason, a band must choose an oath when it is created. The oath is usually reasonably short - because it must be recited by any character who joins the band in play. The player creating the band online should enter the text for the oath when they create the band. The only requirement for the oath is that it is in-character and suitable for the setting, any oath that meets these requirements is fine.

Although an oath is required to create a band, it is not magically enforced - there is no automatic magical consequence for any individual that breaks their oath. It is a matter for the roleplaying of the characters who are members of the band to deal with any character who breaks their oath. Once created, the oath cannot be changed, a new band must be formed if characters wish to change their oath.

You can still create a band on the system, even if the benefits are not relevant for your group concept. By picking one of the three options (banner is usually the easiest, if your group plans to fight together at all) and ignoring the additional rules you can still submit details and background about it, even if it doesn't benefit from being a banner, coven or sect.

Banners

- A banner may benefit from using a magical standard

If your band incorporates the idea of a group of warriors that fight together then you may wish to create a banner to represent this. A banner is named for their ability to use a magical standard, which is a magical item created by an artisan. Magical standards provide a potential benefit to every member of the banner.

Covens

- A coven may combine their skills to perform rituals together
- A coven can perform up to two rituals a day
- A coven may benefit from paraphernalia

Groups that intend to perform rituals together need to create a coven. A coven is a band of oath-sworn magicians who choose to work together to perform powerful rituals that they could not do alone.

Members of a coven can work together to perform a ritual with each participant contributing crystallized mana to a ritual up to the limit of their ability. This allows a coven to perform much more powerful rituals than an individual could achieve alone. A coven may also benefit by being bound to ritual paraphernalia, a powerful magical item created by an artisan.

A coven can only perform up to two rituals each day. A character may perform any number of rituals by themselves and they may include others in the ritual performance. But the power of the coven can only be used to combine magical strengths twice per day. Some magical paraphernalia increase the number of rituals a coven can perform in a single day.

If a character is part of a coven that has already performed a ritual together that day, then they may join another coven but they cannot participate in another ritual conducted by that coven until the next day.

Sects

- When members of a sect co-operate to perform some liao ceremonies the cost is reduced to one liao
- A sect may benefit from using a magical reliquary

If your group concept incorporates the idea of a shared set of beliefs and worship then you may wish to create a sect to represent this. A sect is a band of oath-sworn devotees of the Way who choose to work together to further their common goals.

If members of a sect co-operate to perform a ceremony of anointing, consecration, dedication, excommunication, exorcism, hallowing, or testimony, only one dose of liao needs to be consumed to achieve the result, no matter how many members co-operate. All the other rules for co-operation in ceremonial skills still apply.

For example, if two members of a sect who are both dedicated to Vigilance and both have the anointing skill perform a ceremony together to anoint a target, then they may produce the same effect as two priests cooperating - but need only consume a single dose of liao.

A magical reliquary provides a benefit to every member of the sect that is bonded to it.

Linking Bands Together

Although a band must be either a banner, coven, or sect, it is common for players to have a background concept that includes characters who are linked in multiple ways. In these situations it is perfectly appropriate to create more than one band whose concepts and backgrounds are linked.

For example, a group of players intend to play a Marcher household but some of them want to play monks while the others play yeomen. They create a banner called the Cawford Household and a sect called Cawford Monastery - to represent the large monastery on the Cawford lands. Cawford players can choose to start as members of either or both groups or join either group in play.

Cowl of Ashes

Description

The Cowl of Ashes empowers one of the most potent, and poorly understood, rituals in Imperial lore.

Whispers through the Black Gate allows a coven to raise the ghost of a deceased person, and communicate with that spirit for a short time. Through the power of this ritual, a murder victim may be interviewed to discover the circumstances of their death; a departed politician might be induced to part with the secrets they took to their graves; or the bereaved might be offered one final chance to speak with the loved one they have lost.

The ritual is also dangerous, of course. Sometimes, it fails to raise the expected spirit and something else comes in its place. Most often, this is a ghost of someone other than the expected person - and the accepted wisdom is that the unexpected spirit represents one of the target's past lives. On occasion, however, the ritual causes hungry wraiths or crazed phantoms to appear which seek to overwhelm the coven who have pried open the door to whatever waits beyond life. The longer the target has been dead, the more likely it is that something of this nature will occur, and the more potentially deadly the resulting excursion of spiritual forces will be.

There is one safeguard on the ritual, a safeguard that the Cowl of Ashes exploits to provide additional protection to a ritualist. The spirits called forth with Whispers through the Black Gate can only perceive and interact with the magicians who summoned them. Sometimes this quality can be heartbreaking - a beloved son must have his words to his departed mother relayed via a medium rather than speak to her directly - but when something goes wrong this protection prevents the unleashed spirits from running amok and harming those near the regio where the ritual was performed. The Cowl extends this protection to a ritualist who contributes to the performance - a protection that they can choose to eschew once they know for sure what their Winter magic has raised up.

Some stewards of the dead have also reported that they have encountered unquiet spirits that seemed unable to perceive them when they were wearing these cowls, even when such spirits had not been raised by Whispers through the Black Gate. The protection is unreliable at best, and should not be relied on.

These talismans are most often crafted in the form of veils and cowls, drawing on hearth magic to conceal the identity of the wearer from malign spirits. Wintermark crafters, especially Kallavesi, craft them from bone or ivory in the shape of bird-faces, and often incorporate Gralm, the Rune of Destiny or Yoorn, the Rune of Ending. In the League, a Cowl of Ashes is likely to be a mask depicting the cool detachments of the Doctor, or the unassailable authority of the Prince. The mask is expensive to create, requiring extensive amounts of beggar's lye and dragonbone, with weltsilver chasing and iridescent gloaming used to subtly tint the cloth - but it is especially favoured by those who summon the spirits of the long dead, or who explore the limitations of Whispers through the Black Gate.

Rules

- Form: Talisman. Takes the form of a ritual focus. You must be wearing this item or holding it in hand to use its magical properties.
- Requirement: You must have the magician skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: Gain 3 ranks for the Whispers through the Black Gate ritual, subject to the normal rules for effective skill. If you contribute to a performance of this ritual while wearing this mask, you are invisible to any spirit or spiritual effect, as if you were not part of the coven. This effect lasts until you remove the mask, interact with, or speak to a summoned spirit. You must inform a referee that you are using this item in advance of performing the ritual.
- Materials: Crafting a Cowl of Ashes requires three ingots of weltsilver, twelve measures of beggar's lye, seven measures of iridescent gloaming, and nine measures of dragonbone. It takes one month to make one of these items.

Cowl of Judgement

Description

A Cowl of Judgement may take the form of an actual cowl, but it is actually more common for it to take the form of a shawl, veil, or stole (a thick strip of cloth worn over the shoulders), or occasionally a mask. When in use, the cowl is lifted to cover the head or face, but for day-to-day wear it is left loose over the shoulders or carried seperately. Only when the priest is ready to perform the ceremony of excommunication is the cowl lifted, the shawl, veil, or stole raised, or the mask used to cover the face. Traditionally, the cowl is only raised at the point at which there is no possibility of reprieve - some even suggest that it is dangerous or "unlucky" to raise the cowl and then fail to go through with the excommunication - it can demonstrate a frivolous lack of commitment or conviction or a weakness of judgement.

Regardless of the form it takes, a Cowl of Judgement is almost always a bleached white colour., decorated with dragonbone sigils or talismans representing the virtues and the symbols of the Way. A Mask of Judgement is often constructed of porcelain or ivory, carefully shaped and inlaid with dragonbone symbols.

The Cowl of Judgement appeals most to priests who are concerned about the spirituality and dedication of their fellows. It allows them to perform powerful excommunications that are very difficult to remove, and so it is rarely invoked casually. Wearers may encounter suspicion from their fellows; after all, by donning this robe the priest implies that they believe themselves to have both the judgement to evaluate their peers and the will to cast them out if they find them wanting.

As with many such regalia, it is common for a Cowl of Judgement to be hallowed, generally with hallows of Vigilance or Wisdom, or hallows which encourage the wearer to trust their judgement or act with conviction.

Rules

- Form: Talisman. Takes the form of ceremonial regalia. You must be wearing this item to use its magical properties.
- Requirement: You must have the dedication skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: When you perform or cooperate with the performance of the excommunication skill, you may spend up to five additional doses of liao to increase the strength or the ceremony by the same amount.
- Materials: Crafting a Cowl of Judgement requires seven ingots of weltsilver, twenty one measures of beggar's lye, eleven measures of dragonbone, and five measures of iridescent gloaming. It takes one month to make one of these items.

Crafting skills

Artisan

- You must purchase artisan before you can take any other crafting skills

During the downtime between events, you may craft up to three magical items using rare materials that you have in your possession. The materials are used up to create the item. You may only craft items that you know how to make. Every artificer can also make, and apply, Artisan's Oil, a special preparation that can mend broken items

Rare materials are produced by mines and forests, which are personal resources.

You may also bond any item that you can make to a willing person. A character can only use a magical item if it is bonded to the wielder.

When you choose this skill you can pick four magical items that your character is able to create. The choices you can make are limited as follows:

- The first item must require no special materials to make
- The second item must require a maximum of 10 total special materials to make
- The third must require a maximum of 20 total special materials to make
- The fourth item can be chosen with no restrictions.

The character creation system is set up to enforce these restrictions automatically.

At the first event you attend you will receive 3 items that you have already created. These will be:

- The first item that you selected with 9 months still to go before it expires
- The second item that you selected with 6 months still to go before it expires
- The third item that you selected with 3 months still to go before it expires

Extra Item

You may choose one additional item that your character knows how to make each time you purchase this skill. There are no restrictions on what this item can cost.

Create Egregore histories

We propose the creation of a written history of the lives of the Egregores and their hosts. This work will be collated and maintained by Gwylwyr of the Carrion and other interested historians selected by him and will be submitted to the Imperial Archives.

Proposed by Miaren, seconded by Hercynia.

Overview

- Supporting the creation of a document.
- Passed with 3 votes against.

Date

- Passed Spring 377YE (Event Two 2013)

Cost

- None.

Progress

- This project is ongoing,

Legal Ramifications

- The Senate has not created a position with the authority, responsibility or stipend to achieve this task

The civil service opinion is that the Senate could have chosen to create an Imperial position with the responsibility to compile Egregore biographies and histories. The position could have been granted a stipend. Without the creation of an Imperial position, this motion has no legal implications.

It is important to note that no Egregore, current or past, is obligated to co-operate with this project - any more than any citizen of the Empire is required to share their history with strangers.

Campaign Outcome

While there are no Imperial archives as such, reasonable efforts will be made to ensure that copies of completed histories will be made available to the people of the Empire.

- Summer 379YE

Cost

- None

Campaign Outcome

- One virtue inquisitor Imperial title was created in each virtue assembly and the assembly of the Way.

Constitutional Court

- The constitutional court notes that it would also have been appropriate to give the virtue inquisitors the inquisitor power of the Imperial Inquisitor - to perform an inquisition each season without the need for a vote in the Synod, and in addition to any existing judgements they have raised normally.
- The constitutional court further notes that it would be appropriate to extend the power of inquisitor's judgement to the Imperial Inquisitor as well.

Create bond

Description

This simple spell is one of the first that a magician learns to cast. Every magician is able to cast it; along with operate portal and detect magic, it represents a shared suite of powers common to everyone who works magic. Being able to forge magical bonds is a key part of learning to cast spells and especially to perform rituals. Where detect magic teaches an apprentice magician to perceive magical energies, this spell teaches them the fine control needed to cast other, more complex, spells.

The ability to create bonds is a vital tool both for joining a coven and unlocking the abilities of magical items. Other than potions and herbs, most magical items can only be used if the user is bonded to them. By creating a bond, the magician attunes an individual to the magical properties of the item. A human or orc can have only a limited number of items bonded to them at one time. Many magicians speak of these limitations in terms of chakra, visualising them as magical nodes from which bonds can be created that link with any of a broad class of magical items. While the three object chakra are the most commonly understood, magical scholars also recognise several additional chakra including those that allow a person to be bound to other people as part of a magical group such as a coven, sect or banner.

Magicians often talk about bonds as if they are literal threads of magical energy connecting things together. While many visualise them in these terms, it is a little misleading - the bond does not literally extend as a line of magic between a person and their sword, for example. It is not possible to track an item one is bonded to. Rather, the bond could be thought of as an attunement between two things - a unique mark that both share that signifies a profound connection.

Bonds do not break naturally, but mastery of this spell allows a magician to actively sever an existing bond. A magician will quickly become aware if they are attempting to create a bond where one already exists, before they expend any personal mana. If a magician wishes to "over write" an existing bond, they first need to destroy the existing connection which requires a separate casting of the spell.

It is worth noting that an artificer also has the ability to bond characters and magical items, but their abilities are quite limited in that they can only bond items they know how to make, and they can neither break a bond, nor bond people to each other to form groups.

There are a number of things that can interfere with or assist a magician in creating a bond. For example, an effect might conceal a bond or make it difficult to break without ritual magic. There are also several ways to divine information about or using bonds - for example, the ritual Ties that Bind is a valuable investigative tool that can uncover all sorts of information about the bonds and bonded items of a particular person. A magician who wants to enhance their ability to create and break bonds might invest in a Scrivener's Seal, a magical wand that allows the create bond spell to be performed twice a day without depleting personal mana.

Casting

- Type: Regular spell
- Cost: 1 Personal mana

Effects

This flexible spell can be used to perform a number of separate tasks, but only one may be used each time the spell is cast. Each of these uses requires the assistance of a referee.

- Create a bond. You may bond a willing character to a suitable item or group. You must be close enough to touch both character and item.
 - You can also use this spell to bond a character to a band (a coven, banner or sect).
 - Bands and items such as magical standards, ritual paraphernalia and reliquaries can be bonded to a band. A single use of this spell can bond a band to an item, provided that a willing member of the band is present throughout.
- Break a bond. You can break an existing bond between a character and an item as long as one or the other is present. If the owner of a bond is present they must be willing - even if the item is the target, the bond will not break if the character on the other end is present and does not consent.

- You can break a bond between a character and a group as long as the character is present.

Sample Vocals

The following are sample vocals you can use to cast this spell if you don't want to make up your own.

- (touching a character and a sword) "I am the bridge between this and this, I am the path and when I am done you will remember this moment of connection, no matter how great the distance between you. This sword belongs to you, and you to it. You are bound together by memory of this moment."
- (cutting a character's thumb) "Blood is blood, it is your life, your name echoes in every drop, it marks what it touches, it marks it as yours." (presses thumb against item to be bonded) "With this mark, you are bonded."
- (evoking the chain) "Things hold together. Five stars and five fingers, weaving five threads together to make a binding, this to this. Take hold of this and choose to be bound, not to slavery but to a greater cause."
- (tracing runes on the targets) "The seed grows to a sapling, winding roots in the earth and branches in the air, catching at the wind. The wave ripples in the water, binding and spinning the skein to link these two together until the end comes."
- (receiving a coin from the target) "There is power in payment, here in the counting house. This coin is small but in time could move an Empire. So I weave a tiny thread, that in time can bind destiny and shape fate. You spend your coin to buy my skill, and I tie your fortunes together."

Common Elements

- Rune Magic: Evrom and Yoorn are good choices for initiating or destroying a bond, respectively. Some traditions suggest that it is good luck to mark a young person with the rune of beginning the very first time they are bonded to a band. Any of the Autumn runes can be evoked when creating a bond, but especially Hirmok to signify ownership or Queros when creating a connection to a band. When using runes to create a bond, it is common to mark both targets with that rune as part of the casting; when breaking a bond, the rune is symbolically washed away or rubbed out.
- Astronomancy: The Chain is suitable to any use of this spell whether forming or breaking a bond. Likewise the Web represents connection, and is especially appropriate when renewing a bond that has existed previously. The Three Sisters are effective when bonding people together, but some magicians prefer to avoid using this constellation due to the omens of sorrow and loss that surround it; these magicians suggest that the Chalice, with its imagery of things coming together or separating, is much more apposite. In each case, the astronomancer often uses the constellation to represent the bond itself rather than the magical process of creating the bond.
- Dramaturgy: The Prince has a strong resonance with bonding magic, representing ideas such as unlocking or claiming power, swearing oaths to a group, or demonstrating authority. Other personae might come in to play depending on the nature of the bond being created - using the Bishop to bond someone to a sect, for example, or the Captain to bond a yeoman to a weapon. The Coin is a strong instrument to use when either creating or breaking a bond - some magicians incorporate the payment of a ring into the casting of the spell. Likewise, any League dramaturgist can see the value of using imagery associated with the Ring when creating a bond to a group. Evoking the images of the Counting House is also very appropriate when casting this spell - some dramatists prefer to perform it while seated at a table across which payment and the item to be bonded or unbonded are passed.
- Other traditions: A little water from the same container sprinkled on both targets, or a little blood from a character, both help reinforce the idea of bonding two things together. Paragons or totem animals associated with Loyalty or Prosperity might also be appropriate.
- Realms: Creating a bond is unequivocally tied to the Autumn realm, with its themes of connection and ownership. Breaking a bond has obvious correspondence to the realm of Winter.

Create law of Annihilation

To make the act of Annihilation – defined as destroying or, endangering with destruction, a human soul – a crime under Imperial Law.

Proposed by Semmerholm, seconded by Holberg.

Overview

- Creating a law making it illegal to destroy a human soul.
- Passed

Date

- Spring 380YE

Campaign Outcome

- This law requires additional definition before it can be enforced.

- There is some concern that this crime is not defined in such a way that a conviction can ever be secured; it is being reviewed by the Constitutional court and the Magistrates.

Create law of protection for humans in Mournwold

Humans of the Mourn (excluding the Feni) are hereby afforded full protection under law.

Proposed by Mitwold, Seconded by Morrow.

Overview

- Passed

Date

- Summer 381YE

Campaign Outcome

- Humans of the Mourn who are not Feni will receive legal protection as if they were a foreigner.

Constitution

- It is noted by the court that there are a number of humans fighting for the Jotun in the Mourn. This causes a legal contradiction in that those with whom the Empire is at war ordinarily have no legal protection. In practice if humans line up in battle against the Empire imperial soldiers will normally be protected by the law of self-defence. However it should be noted that this defence involves a "reasonableness" test which now potentially places the conduct of soldiers under the scrutiny of the magistrates. Furthermore there may be other, far less clear cut, situations that may arise during the Mourn campaign.
- The use of the phrase "Humans of the Mourn" means that barbarian humans whose homes are outside the Mourn wouldn't be given legal protection but humans living in the Mourn would (even if they were outside of the Mourn).

Create roll of honour

We should give official recognition to the loyalty of those military unit commanders who commit their troops to support our armies in the field. We suggest a roll of honour be posted each season listing those who have aided each campaign.

Proposed by Kallavesa, seconded by Astolat.

Overview

- A public record of military units aiding Imperial armies to be produced and made public.
- Passed unanimously.

Date

- Passed Spring 2013

Cost

- The Civil Service compiles this information for the benefit of the Military Council; as such additional costs involved in creating an additional copy for purposes of the roll of honour are negligible.

Progress

- Complete

Campaign Outcome

When the civil servants compile lists of recent military campaigns for the Military Council, an additional copy of the information will be made and disseminated via the Hub.

It is worth noting that if this information were not already being compiled, or if many additional copies were required, the costs would likely be significantly higher.

Campaign Outcome

- Juha, the Cave Spider of Varushka was appointed as the first Ambassador in Spring 381YE
- This motion attempted to take advantage of an opportunity. While there no legal issues with this tile, one of the requirements of that opportunity was that this be a national Varushkan position. Create title of High Bard of the Empire

This motion is currently undergoing scrutiny.

I propose the creation of a new imperial position titled "High Bard of the Empire" In this first year of the reign of the Empress of Flowers the citizens of every nation have been inspired to create works of artistry and beauty, of poetry and passion, creations in word and song to celebrate our Imperium and confound the the ignoble deprivations of our barbarian foes.

Yet challenge and competition spurs Pride and Ambition both and I propose we create the position of Imperial High Bard, that will be awarded annually to the imperial citizen best proving their artistic credentials before the selection of the council of nine who will cast votes to decide the recipient of this great title for the year ahead. So let each Nation contend and demonstrate the artistry of their poets and war singers in bright competition and great contention, and each year the brightest talent of the Empire will write their immortality in legacy made real in word and deed.

The High Bard will embody the artistic spirit of the Empire and should carry songs in passion and courage to embolden and encourage our soldiers and should deliver spirit-crushing feats of satire and rebuke against the Barbarian Generals and our hated foes! By these means we will demonstrate the power of artistic inspiration from all our nations to weave glorious legacy through the deeds and example of our bright imperial fellowship.

Overview

- Passed
- Created an Imperial Title within the Senate

Date

- Winter 380YE

Campaign Outcome

- The Imperial title of High Bard of the Empire
- The title is appointed by judgement in the Assembly of Nine

Constitution

Following an administrative motion during the Spring 381YE session, the following points were made.

- This position will be formally appointed by Judgement of the Assembly of Nine. The motion lays out the expectation that they will award the title to the winner of the competition, but it is not constitutional to specify a limitation of this kind. The Assembly may choose to appoint any eligible Imperial citizen.

- As has been noted previously the right to deliver a Senate address is considered to be a significant constitutional power.
- The Constitutional Court have previously rejected an attempt to create a "High Consul" on the grounds that the title implied a position of authority or power over other citizens. In general senators are advised to avoid such language in favour of appellations such as "Imperial Consul". In this instance, the court judges that citizens are most likely to consider the High Bard to imply expertise rather than authority and on that basis they have not requested a change.

Create title of High Consul

To create the title of High Consul. This title is expected to coordinate the activities of Ambassadors and similar positions and report back to the Senate. Additionally, the High Consul has responsibility for interactions with foreign nations where no other Imperial position exists with that responsibility.

Proposed by Therunin, seconded by Miaren

Overview

- The title of High Consul would be an Imperial title appointed by the Imperial Senate.
- The title has the right to address the Senate.
- The title has the power to represent the Empire in all dealings with foreign nations where no other title with that power exists.

Date

- Summer 379YE

Campaign Outcome

- The Constitutional Court has recommend this motion be amended

Constitution

- Clarify that Right of Address is once per summit
- Clarify that the Consul has no legal right to issue instructions to ambassadors
- Amend the responsibility and change the name of the title to Imperial Consul
- OOC Note: Parts of this section were superseded by the 2018 rules update.

After scrutiny the Constitutional Court have issued clarifications on the right of address and the power of authority and requested minor amendments to the name of the title and the responsibilities.

Right of Address

The Right to Address the Senate is considered a constitutionally significant power, one which the Court are keen to ensure is not abused to monopolize the time of the Senate. It should be noted that the Imperial Throne only has the right to address the Senate once per summit. As such the only constitutional interpretation of the right to address the Senate in this context would be one in which the power may be used once per summit.

Authority

Authority can only be vested in a single Imperial title. While an ambassador may employ aides, assistants or a proxy, it is not legal for two Imperial titles to be granted authority to represent the Empire to the same foreign power at the same time. This motion avoids any conflict of identity by making clear which title will hold authority, but it is vital to stress that where an ambassador exists then it the power of authority is vested in that title. The title-holder is expected to discharge their duties without undue interference from any other Imperial citizen. If the Senate have granted a citizen authority to represent the Senate then the constitutional position is explicitly that the decision making responsibility lies with that citizen and no other.

It is constitutionally forbidden for a citizen to hold an Imperial title that conveys direct legal power or even responsibility over the discharge of powers of other Imperial titles, lest a citizen "accumulate so much responsibility that they consider themselves better than their fellows". The holder of an Imperial title must exercise their powers in person, not through the agency of other citizens who hold other titles.

Citizens shall not hold more than one high office at a time and must exercise their powers in person.

Title and Responsibilities

The title of "High Consul" carries a legal implication that the title-holder occupies a position of authority over the existing ambassadors. This implication is further strengthened by the explicitly stated responsibility that the Consul will coordinate the existing ambassadors. Such a position of authority is categorically forbidden by the constitution.

To make the situation clearer, the Court have recommended that the title be amended to "Imperial Consul" and that the responsibilities be clarified such that the title is expected to liaise with existing ambassadors to keep the Senate informed of ongoing negotiations and developments.

Create title of High Exorcist

Create a new imperial title; the High Exorcist. .

- Has right of Address to the Military Council
- Is appointed by the Assembly of the Nine
- Serves for one Year
- Can be revoked by a Simple Majority of the General Assembly
Proposed by Kallavesa, Seconded by Temeschwar

Overview

- Create an Imperial Title title within the Imperial Synod

Date

- Winter 377YE

Cost

- Stipend: 3 Thrones

Campaign Outcome

- The Imperial title of High Exorcist was created.

Constitution

It is possible for the Senate to grant the High Exorcist the right to vote on the Military Council - doing so would automatically allow the holder of the title to be present throughout the a Military Council session and to speak freely. The Warnage operates in such a way at present. However this would be a substantive change to the working of the Empire, so would require the approval of The Throne.

The Constitutional Scholars wish to point out that if the Synod elect a High Exorcist who has control of a congregation, then the High Exorcist will automatically benefit from the Right of Witness, and cannot then be excluded from a Military Council session. Moreover the holder of the title is welcome to request permission to speak and can do so at the sufferance of the Council. The Adjutants appointed by each General operate in such a way at present.

It was initially ruled that it was not possible to give the High Exorcist the Power of Address in the Imperial Military Council. This Power of Address gives the holder the right to address the Senate (Conclave members have a similar power for the Conclave), but there is no equivalent power in the Military Council and the structure of the Military Council sessions does not allow for citizens to make addresses. Further examination of this decision lead to its reversal in 378YE.

Create an additional Bourse auction each season. Proceeds go to Imperial budget.

Holder must use a wayleave in the senate by announcement.

Three wayleaves will be sold in each season.

Civil Service scrutiny required.

Proposed by Kahraman, Seconded by Sarvos

Overview

- Passed
- Create three Imperial titles Bearer of an Imperial Wayleave by the Imperial Senate that are appointed through Bourse auction

Date

- Winter 380YE

Constitution

- Each Wayleave must be an Imperial title subject to all the normal rules for an Imperial title
- It is possible for this proposed Imperial title to have a term of a single summit
- The commission would have to be announced at the same summit that the title was auctioned
- The number of commissions available to the Senate would be reduced in advance by the number of Wayleaves auctioned

It is not possible to vest the powers of the state in a document that is auctioned - they must be an Imperial title that is held. The constitution demands that no Imperial citizen hold two titles at once - allowing documents to carry powers of state would create the potential for an individual to effectively circumvent this limitation. The closest comparable situation is the favour of The Throne - a highly complex and constitutionally challenging arrangement.

The constitutionally valid way to achieve the closest outcome that the court can identify is to auction one or more Imperial titles through the Bourse each summit. These titles would last for the duration of the summit - and would allow the appointed citizen to announce a single commission in the Senate at that summit. They would be subject to all the normal rules for Imperial titles.

The number of Imperial Commissions would be reduced by the number of titles being auctioned through the Bourse, to prevent the Empire defaulting on its contract. The civil service are not confident of being able to administrate a title bought at one event and used at another when it is no longer valid - and it is not consistent with the way all other Imperial titles operate.

Create title of Quartermaster General of the Imperial Armies

- Passed at 25 Thrones with 16 votes for, 8 votes against.

Date

- Autumn 377YE.

Cost

- Stipend: 25 Thrones per season from the Senate budget

Campaign Outcome

- Quartermaster General of the Imperial Armies created.

Constitution

The Senate were advised that it is not possible to create a great works that could automatically provide emergency resupply to armies based in Miarren without a source of appropriate materials, mithril or weirwood, that could meet the costs. The senators elected to create an Imperial title with the authority to carry out the work instead.

When the title was created it was unclear which other powers, if any, this title had been granted. The civil service raised procedural motions at the Winter Solstice Summit 377YE to clarify whether this title had the power to:

- resupply an Imperial army.
- raise a new Imperial army.
- repair a fortification.
- create a new fortification.

If the title did possess one or more of these powers, they would still be procedurally announced to the Senate by the civil service (although no voting would be involved), and subject to the veto of the Imperial Synod.

The outcome of the procedural motions was to clarify that the Quartermaster General had the power only to resupply an Imperial army.

Create title of Trade Envoy to the Sarcophan Delves

To create the position of Trade Envoy to the Sarcophan Delves Proposed by Kahraman, Seconded by Miaren

Overview

- This followed on from a previous motion to create other trade envoys.
- Passed

Date

- Winter 379YE

Campaign Outcome

- The ceremonial title of Trade Envoy to the Sarcophan Delves was created.

Constitution

- This title does not have the power to handle formal diplomatic relations with the Sarcophan Delves
- OOC Note: Parts of this section were superseded by the rules update 2018.

The civil service will direct representatives and citizens of the foreign power to whichever title or body has been granted the power to represent the Empire. The power cannot be vested in multiple titles or bodies; it must be absolutely unambiguous who holds it and in almost all cases this means an ambassador.

In Spring 377YE, the Senate passed a motion to create envoys with several foreign nations but indicated that the scope of their responsibilities was purely to initiate trade in resources. Because of this limitation, it was judged that these positions did not carry any authority and were ceremonial titles only. It is not possible to create a diplomatic post that has authority only in specific areas.

As a result, this is a ceremonial title, with the responsibility for helping with trade with the Sarcophan Delves - it does not have legal powers or authority. Authority to negotiate with the Sarcophan Delves continues to remain with the Imperial Consul.

The well worn constitutional path to create an Imperial title that has authority is to create an ambassador. It is possible to create an ambassador without building an embassy - although experience has shown that all attempts to initiate diplomacy with foreign nations without first building an embassy are ineffective.

Create title of trade envoy

To appoint ambassadors to foreign nations to pursue trade in bulk raw materials. Ambassadors to be appointed to the Principalities of Jarm, the Asavean Archipelago, Faraden, the Commonwealth and the Sumaah Republic. Results to be presented for Senate approval at the next meeting.

Proposed by Tassato, seconded by Temeschwar.

Overview

- Ambassadors to be appointed to the Principalities of Jarm, the Asavean Archipelago, Faraden, the Commonwealth and the Sumaah Republic.

Date

- Passed unanimously Spring 377 (Event Two 2013).

Cost

- None

Constitution

- This motion should have been presented as five separate motions so that senators could vote individually
- These positions have a responsibility to initiate trade with the foreign nation
- The Senate has not chosen to assign any powers or functions to these positions
- The Senate has not chosen to assign any money to support these positions

Progress

The purpose of these positions appears to be closer to trade envoys, than to actual ambassadors - the Senate appears to wish these positions to find a way to allow the Empire to trade for bulk raw materials with neighbouring powers.

The civil service have provided those appointed with the names of known contacts in the foreign powers so that they may initiate communication with them via Winged Messenger.

It is possible that a trade embassy might be built to allow regular trade to be automated. This would require significant investment of bulk resources - the civil service strongly recommend that this construction does not begin without firm agreements with a foreign power on trade terms first.

Election

At the event the following people were appointed to these positions by the Senate.

- Constanza Barassadi di Tassato of the league for the Principalities of Jarm
- Adnanna Dionati of the League for the Asavean Archipelago
- Braganza i Arco of the Brass Coast for the Faraden
- Destain of Derondell of Dawn for the Commonwealth
- Elisir of Urizen for the Suma Republic

Campaign Outcome

- The Imperial title of Civilian Commissioner is created, one for each nation of the Empire.
- The title was amended in Spring 380YE to limit the use of the power to once each season per commissioner

Constitution

- Clarify the limits of Imperial capacity to Commission
- Raise an administrative motion to allow the Senate to consider a recommendation from the Civil Service to limit these titles to one commission per season

Creating a commission requires a considerable amount of work for the Imperial civil service, who must identify potential sites for the construction, clear land, check supply routes, as well as ensuring that sufficient skilled architects, engineers, and workers are available for such a large scale construction. There is a practical limit on the number of commissions that the Senate can authorize each season before the practical limits of the Civil Service and the Empire to arrange them is exhausted. This limit applies on the number of commissions approved, even if the commission is never funded, since much of the administrative work needed to assess the commission and prepare for it is done before the building begins.

This practical limit has not been an issue previously - since the number of commissions the Senate has approved has been well within the capacity of the Civil Service to support them (albeit only just at times). With the passage of this motion, any practical limit on the number of commissions that the Senate might approve has been removed - they might theoretically approve dozens or even scores of commissions - vastly more than the Empire has the ability to support.

The constitutional court are concerned that the likely outcome of this practical limit, once it becomes apparent, is that civilian commissioners will compete with each other to announce their commissions first, with permission going to the quickest commission, not the most appropriate. In light of this possibility, and the the fact that the senators were unaware of this practical limitations at the time that this motion was passed, the court have asked the civil service to raise an administrative motion recommending that the Senate amend all titles with the power of commission be allowed to announce a single commission per season.

There is no requirement for the Senate to accept this recommendation, this isn't a constitutional issue, it is a practical issue of the Empire's logistical capabilities. This functional limit of the Empire's capacity to support commissions will apply no matter what decision the Senate takes, it is a case for the Senate to decide how it wishes to allocate those resources.

Creation of an Imperial lottery

That the senate create a position of sinecure, to be allocated by the Navarr senators to organise and administrate a lottery. We suggest 40% of the takings to be used as prizes, 10% to be given to the title, 50% to be given to the senate.

Proposed by Therunin, seconded by Mitwold.

Overview

- Defeated 6 votes to 20

Date

- Autumn 377YE

Cost

- A sinecure produces an income for the Imperial citizen appointed to be responsible for it. Any sinecure would require at least 10 wains of White Granite, Weirwood or Mithril to build, dependent on income produced.

Constitution

This position does not appear to be a sinecure, it does not appear to involve the expenditure of materials to create a structure that would produce an income. At present any Imperial citizen could choose to operate a lottery and can choose to grant a portion of the profits earned to the Imperial Senate.

If the Senate wish to pass a law criminalizing gambling - except via the operations conducted by a character with an appropriate Imperial title then they could do so - but the title would need to be appointed by the Bourse, since this activity would fall within their purview.

It is perfectly legal to include expectations of behaviour with a motion and the Synod are encouraged to take such suggestions into account when determining whether to revoke an individual. However it is beyond the constitutional limits of the Senate's powers to create legally binding requirements for how an Imperial title holder should discharge their responsibilities.

Crewing (Redirected from Crew guidelines)

Overview

Volunteer crew are an essential part of Profound Decisions; the events simply couldn't happen without them. We need a large crew to put on the Empire events, so we are dependent on people to volunteer to take part as crew. Crewing is hard work and may mean that you miss out on the fun of playing but crewing is great fun for those that enjoy it and you'll be part of an elite team of people helping to create a fantastic LRP event for over fifteen hundred players. It's a huge responsibility and very rewarding when you see what you've helped to create.

This information is for anyone who is considering volunteering to crew an Empire event. This set of pages explain how crewing works, what options are available and what is expected of our crew. If you are interested in crewing after reading these guidelines then email us and let us know what interests you, or just join Empire Crew Introduction on Facebook to chat to us about getting involved.

Crew Wiki

If you are a member of our crew or you have read the pages here and are looking for more information on crewing, then we have a separate dedicated Empire crew wiki. Although this information is intended for our crew, this wiki is deliberately open to the public so that anyone who is interested in finding out more about how crewing works can read about it. We hope to build on this wiki over time so that it is a definitive resource for crew but also provides useful information for other groups, particularly people interested in running Empire sanctioned events.

Logistics

Crewing the event is free and includes vouchers for meals up to £5.50 from the caterers and access to hot drinks and snacks in the crew area. You will need to bring your own tent, a sleeping bag and something to sleep on. The crew have their own camp, which is designated for use by crew members only. If you plan to share a tent with a player then you will need to camp in the player area.

Organization

Our crew are assigned to a single team from one of three broad areas, the site crew, the event crew and the plot crew. Each team has a head who confirms crew spaces for members of their team. If you want to volunteer for crewing then it's useful to tell us what team or teams you'd like to help out in. You aren't restricted to working with just one team, but you need to be join a team before you can be part of the crew.

Site Crew

The site crew help us get the event ready by putting up tents, setting up the electrics, maintaining the site etc. Those who are helping with set-up need to be on site roughly two days before time-in. Those who are helping with take-down need to be on site until roughly one day after time-out. We aim to complete take-down by nightfall the day after the event.

If you are part of the site crew then you are encouraged to get involved and take part in crewing the rest of the event, but if you prefer to play then you are welcome to do that instead. Bear in mind though that you might be called on during the event to help with any issues that are relevant to your team.

The site crew are made up of six teams, site set-up, gate, security, set dressing, sparkies, and hygiene. Read the site crew page to find out more about what is involved in joining one of these teams.

The event crew help us to run the event, handling all the necessary logistics to keep the game going. The GOD team and the referees are there to answer player queries. They include the GOD team, the referees and the weapon checkers, and crew welfare who see to the well-being of the three hundred plus other members of crew on site!

Event crew is a great role for anyone who wants to help players enjoy the event and doesn't mind not being in-character for most of the event. Most event crew need to be on site well before time-in to help get the game ready. It is fantastic if you can lend a hand for a few hours taking down the god tent after the event, but it isn't a requirement.

Other than the weapon-checkers who are needed at set-times, most event crew are too busy throughout the event to get more than a few hours off to play.

The event crew are made up of several teams, god, refs crew welfare, tavern, and weapon check. Read the event crew page to find out more about what is involved in joining one of these teams.

Plot Crew

The plot crew are there to bring the Empire setting to life and try to make each event as dramatic and engaging as possible. We need good writers as part of our plot team, but good NPCs are also essential, whether playing the same role each event as part of the Anvil field team or playing a multitude of different parts in the skirmish or plot NPC team. And the NPCs need several teams to support them so that the make-up, costume and props are available. Everyone involved with plot works together to create the plot, get the NPCs briefed and into character, and to respond to the actions of the players as the plot unfolds.

Plot crew only need to be on site shortly before time-in ready for the game. It is great if you can lend a hand for a few hours taking down the monster tent after the event, but plot crew is a great role for anyone who wants to be right in the heart of the game but cannot get to the event early or stay late.

Plot crew are very busy throughout every event. This means that it is impossible to play an event and be a member of the plot crew; although you will get a chance to take a few hours off each event to get out and socialize in-character if you want to.

The plot crew are made up of several teams, costume, make-up, skirmish, plot NPCs, field NPCs, and writers. Read the plot crew page to find out more about what is involved in joining one of these teams.

Commitment

There is no expectation that crew commit to attending all four events each year. Some roles are only suitable for crew who can make the majority of the events, but there are many crew roles that are useful even if you only make one event a year.

We operate a permanent crew system and encourage people to become a full time member of the crew team rather than play some events and crew others. However, you are welcome to resume playing in the future if you choose to do so. You can let us know at any time if you're not enjoying what you are doing as crew and equally we'll be honest with you if we feel it's not working out.

Enjoyment

It is important to us that the crewing experience is enjoyable and rewarding not least because we depend on our crew for so much. We believe that our first responsibility is to our crew and that the best way to deliver a great event for players is if the crew are really enjoying what they are doing. So if you are crewing the event then please remember that you come to events to enjoy yourself and that, as the people who do the work to put the event on, you have more right than anyone to enjoy it!

Criminal trial (Redirected from Criminal Trials)

The role of the Magistrate

All trials are presided over by an NPC magistrate. It is the role of the NPC magistrate to run trials in a manner which is expeditious, just, and wherever possible, provides an environment in which entertaining role-playing can occur. Magistrates will aim to conclude trials within ten minutes in most circumstances and so time given to both witnesses and the accused will be strictly controlled.

Imperial courts follow an inquisitorial (rather than adversarial) model. This means that the magistrate is responsible for investigating the facts of the case, rather than acting as an impartial referee between a prosecutor and a lawyer for the accused.

There is no prosecution or defence and the accused normally speak for themselves. If the magistrate is satisfied that the accused is unable to represent themselves adequately for some extraordinary reason then they may allow another person to speak in their stead. This does not exempt the accused from the requirement to answer any questions put to them by the magistrate.

There are no juries. Judgement is made by the presiding magistrate. Occasionally a magistrate may ask one or more of her peers to sit with her in judgement over a particularly difficult case.

The law allows magistrates to accept any evidence, including hearsay.

The minimum persons required to be present for a trial to be valid are the presiding magistrate, and at least one other person. The accused should also be present if possible, but may be tried in their absence if they abscond. Magistrates may choose to try all of those accused in connection with a particular crime or crimes at the same time. This is particularly likely where a criminal conspiracy by a group of individuals is suspected.

Where there are multiple offences which might apply to the accused the Magistrate is only required to set out the most serious charge(s). This does not prevent the accused from being found guilty of a lesser related offence. If found guilty, the punishment will also take into account any relevant lesser offences where appropriate.

Example one: The accused is charged with murder. It is possible that they might be found guilty of murder, manslaughter, assault or any other relevant lesser offence that the circumstances dictate.

Example two: The accused attacks members of the militia when they come to arrest him. They might be charged only with assault, even though this assault occurred while resisting arrest. If found guilty their punishment will take account of the fact that the assault took place against members of the militia while the criminal resisting arrest.

The role of witnesses

Most trials consist of the magistrate questioning witnesses relevant to the case. This will usually involve the investigating officer and the accused, among others. Where relevant this may include expert witnesses who are believed to possess relevant specialist knowledge. Trials are often decided purely on the basis of witness testimony.

As such, witnesses who provide false testimony are subject to harsh penalties. It is not unknown for a magistrate to impose a summary punishment upon a false witness without recourse to an additional trial. There is no requirement for witnesses to be sworn in because every citizen is always bound by their constitutional obligations. Witnesses who fail to attend a trial to which they are called run the risk of being found in contempt of court.

The accused may request the magistrate to call specific witnesses to give evidence, and may ask to question any witness themselves, but the magistrate is not required to allow it.

Structure of the pre-trial process

The accused will be presented before the court. The accused may be accompanied by a priest (if they intend to plead guilty and ask for clemency) or possibly by a friend or legal advisor.

The magistrate may choose to dismiss all the charges if they find no case to answer. Otherwise, the charges against the accused will be detailed and they will then be asked how they plead in relation to each charge: guilty or not guilty.

If the accused pleads guilty then before pronouncing punishment the magistrate will allow any priest present (or the Empress) to plead clemency on their behalf. Alternatively, if a weregild arrangement has been made with the victim then this must be approved by the magistrate. The magistrate may also investigate and consider any other pertinent evidence or testimony prior to sentencing.

When determining the accused's punishment the magistrate will take into account the seriousness of the crime and any mitigating factors presented by the priest in their plea for clemency. Further guidance on making effective clemency pleas is available here.

If the accused pleads not guilty then the magistrate will make arrangements for a trial to be held to investigate the facts of the case to determine guilt. If the accused refuses to plead then the magistrate may treat this as a guilty plea. In either case a plea for clemency will not be permitted.

If all the relevant witnesses and evidence are available then the trial may proceed summarily. Alternatively, if further investigations are required or witnesses are not currently available, the magistrate will release the accused on their oath that they will present themselves when it is time for their trial. Occasionally a magistrate will set other limitations on the accused's behaviour while awaiting trial.

Where a magistrate has reason to believe that the accused is an absconder risk or will not comply with their conditions they may require the payment of monies or assets to the Court in surety. These assets will be returned after the trial, provided that the accused does not abscond, breach any conditions or commit any further crimes.

If an accused absconds then the magistrate may try them in their absence. It is likely the magistrate will draw an adverse inference from the accused's failure to attend and also find them guilty of contempt of court. Any citizen can use reasonable force to apprehend them for the reward, although in practice it is often thief-takers and militia who are in the best position to do so.

Exceptionally, the magistrate may order the accused to be held in supervised custody until their trial can begin. This is only permitted where the magistrate believes the accused would be likely to commit further crimes if they were released. If so, the trial must be carried out as soon as reasonably practicable.

Structure of the trial process

The magistrate summarises the charges and then questions the accused about their version of events. The accused may be given an opportunity to make a statement.

The magistrate questions any witnesses and examines any other evidence. The accused may also be given an opportunity to question witnesses or examine the evidence.

The magistrate may give the accused a final opportunity to speak before either retiring to consider or passing judgement. The magistrate will then pronounce the sentence. Punishment is usually carried out swiftly but those sentenced to death might be allowed time to make final arrangements.

Sanctions for contempt of court

If a magistrate believes that any person is impeding the course of justice they may charge them with contempt of court and hand down a summary punishment. For example, this might be because that person is disruptive during a trial, disrespectful of the magistrate's authority, fails to attend court or fails to obey their lawful order.

If this occurs during a trial the offender will likely be fined and possibly also removed from the court. If the accused is found guilty of contempt and removed from the court the magistrate may allow someone else to represent them.

There is also a more serious charge of perverting the course of justice, most often applied when an individual fabricates evidence or bears false witness.

Punishments and sentencing

Magistrates will use their discretion to match the punishment to the crime. All punishments are potentially available to magistrates in respect of any crime.

Punishments available

- Fine: The most common punishment by far. The amount of the fine may vary due to multiple factors: the seriousness of the crime, previous convictions and the wealth of the accused. The magistrate may also levy additional fines to be given in compensation to the victim(s). The magistrate's power to issue fines also includes the power to confiscate the convict's assets, without limitation. Where the magistrate believes that the convict's assets have been transferred to other persons in order to avoid confiscation they may take action against them for attempting to pervert the course of justice.
- Execution: The ultimate penalty. This is reserved for the most serious crimes. While there is no set method of execution laid down by the law, the interests of justice are usually served by swift and sober methods.
- Military penal service: When sentencing a convict to death the magistrate may offer the alternative of dying in the service of the empire.
- Branding: this is considered a somewhat primitive and archaic punishment by some magistrates but it is still occasionally practised.
- Magical punishments: Although rare, occasionally a magistrate may choose to legally sanction the use of magic upon a convict if that is the most appropriate course of action.

Other possible consequences of conviction

- Public denouncing of convict and potentially their group: Magistrates may use their position to denounce a convict, along with their associates. Such denouncements have no legal force of themselves but are usually used to bring matters to the attention of applicable bodies who can take action. Sometimes denouncements serve as a public warning about an individual or group. For example, a magistrate convicts a certain senator of a crime and then reports this to priests of the Synod. They formally request the Synod revoke the senator.
- Religious consequences: It is not unheard of for religious powers such as testimony or excommunication to be applied to a convict after the trial. Although a magistrate cannot directly order the use of religious powers during sentencing she can make a formal request to the Synod to do so and may be able to provide liao for this purpose.

Factors when determining sentence

What follows is a list of possible factors that a magistrate may take into account when sentencing, but it is not an exhaustive list. The factors most likely to carry the most weight are listed first but any one of the factors could, in the right circumstances, override all others.

- the harm (or potential harm) caused by the crime
- relevant previous convictions
- clemency: the persuasiveness of the plea
- the imperial interest (such as making an example of a convict to deter others, or showing mercy where it is just)
- for fines only, the wealth of the accused may be taken into account in order to avoid fines being either trivial or unjust
- the wishes of the victim or their family

Weregilds

Weregilds are an old Wintermark custom whereby compensation payments are made to the victim of a crime by the perpetrator. When Wintermark joined the Empire these customs were adjusted to fit into the Imperial Law. In order to benefit from a weregild arrangement the accused must ensure that agreement is reached with the victim before their trial and for this purpose mediators are often employed to negotiate with both parties to find the right weregild.

The weregild not only replaces any compensation to the victim that would otherwise have been set by the magistrate, but agreeing this settlement with the victim is also taken into account positively during sentencing in a similar way to clemency. Magistrates will refuse to take into account weregilds which are unfair to the victim. Even where the weregild is accepted, the Magistrate may still apply severe punishments if the needs of justice demand it.

Weregild arrangements are a secular alternative to pleading clemency and they are treated as an admission of guilt by the accused.

Serious Crimes

In general, the following crimes are notable in that they will often result in the death penalty for those convicted:

- murder
- malsanguino.
- treason
- perverting the course of justice
- contravening a Declaration of Sorcery
- contravening a Declaration of Interdiction
- religious crimes involving dedication to a false virtue

Bear in mind that any crime may carry any punishment, up to and including death, if the circumstances warrant it.

Examples of sentencing policy

Most assaults are punished with a modest fine, since given the wide availability of healing there are usually no lasting consequences. On the other hand, if attempted murder is proven this is much more serious and may warrant execution.

Murder is usually punishable by death, unless there are extenuating circumstances. Consequently, those who admit their guilt and arrange for a priest to plead clemency on their behalf are much less likely to be executed. However clemency does not in any way guarantee this - please see here for further guidance on making clemency pleas in court.

Theft is usually punishable by fine. Thieves who are unable to meet fines are sometimes branded. Only where there seems to be no appropriate alternative punishment would execution be contemplated for a thief. This might be the case for a serious repeat offender who professes to have no means to pay his fine, but this is not common.

Perverting the course of justice is an extremely serious offense. Magistrates are often inclined to make examples of those convicted by sentencing them to death.

Penal military service

For the most serious crimes, a magistrate may sentence a convict to penal military service as an alternative to execution. A convict has the right to refuse, instead choosing execution. Penal military service offers a method by which the convict can attempt to redress their crimes by dying in military service for the Empire. If there is a suicide mission then it is likely that they will be sent on it, in other battles they will be placed in the most perilous positions by the commanding general. The commanding general has the power to summarily execute any of these convicts on the battlefield if they fail to follow orders, try to flee the field or attempt to carry out further crimes.

While those sentenced to penal military service are away from the battlefield they are free to go where they want and to spend their time how they wish. However, they are usually branded in a prominent place to warn others of their crimes. Should they be caught committing further crimes it is likely that they will be summarily tried and executed by the presiding magistrate.

Occasionally, those sentenced to penal military service repay their debt to the Empire by repeated and conspicuous acts of heroism on the battlefield. The Imperial Military Council has the power to free convicts from their penal service in such circumstances.

Differences in the criminal process for religious crimes

The process for dealing with religious crimes is somewhat different than for other crimes.

Differences in the structure of the pre-trial process

In order for someone to be prosecuted for a religious crime they must first be condemned by one of the Virtue Assemblies.

Magistrates are often disinclined to hold suspects for long periods while waiting for the condemnation of an appropriate Assembly. If this is an issue, this process can often be expedited by going to the Assembly of Nine, the Imperial Inquisitor, or any other titled position that wields the legal power of inquisition and condemnation.

The magistrate will require an expert witness from the relevant assembly to present the basis for the condemnation and to assist them as required at trial. This is usually (but not necessarily) the priest who brought the motion of condemnation.

The accused may choose how to plead but, as the Synod have already condemned them for their crime, there are very limited grounds for them being found not guilty.

Differences in the structure of the trial process

The remit of the magistrate who tries the case is limited to the following issues.

The accused can only be found not guilty if the magistrate determines that either:

- the accused has been condemned for something that does not meet the legal definition of a religious crime. For example, simply making an unvirtuous suggestion does not necessarily meet the definition of blasphemy; or
- that the condemnation is not a bona fide exercise of the Assembly's powers, but is in fact a vexatious or malicious attack on the accused. It will be presumed that the condemnation is bona fide in the absence of any evidence to the contrary.

The magistrate will throw out the case if the expert witness does not satisfy them as to the first point.

The second point will only be considered if the accused pleads not guilty.

If the accused is convicted the magistrate is also responsible for determining an appropriate punishment in accordance with their sentencing guidelines.

As in all cases, the harm (or potential harm) caused by the crime is often the main factor in determining sentence. So for example, if the convict has promoted heretical teachings to other citizens but there is no evidence that citizens were swayed or influenced in any way, the amount of harm caused is likely to be modest.

In practice the death sentence tends to be reserved for the worst offenders only, in particular those who dedicate themselves to a false virtue, commit idolatry to a similar degree, or who continue to repeat their crimes.

Crimson Ward of Summer Stars

Rules

Summer Magnitude 8

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets a character, who must be present throughout. The target character must possess the battle mage skill.

This spell is an enchantment. A target may only be under one enchantment effect at a time.

Effects

The target character gains two additional ranks of endurance, but only while wearing mage armour.

They are also under a roleplaying effect; you feel confident in their personal prowess, and certain that your magic is a match for any challenge they may encounter.

The effect lasts until the start of the next Profound Decisions Empire event.

Additional Targets

This ritual can affect additional characters from the same coven. Each additional character increases the magnitude by 6. Additional characters must be present throughout.

Description

This ritual, also known as the Thunder of the Stag's Heart and the Prism of the Glorious Soul empowers a magician to make greater use of their mage armour. The protective ability of the armour is enhanced, but the ritual achieves that by enhancing the aura of the wearer rather than the armour itself. Battle-magicians, especially Dawnish war-witches and Imperial orc warcasters make extensive use of this enchantment, preparing themselves for the dangers of the battlefield. Some mages feel that the ritual can lead to dangerous over-confidence in battle, or speculate it may magnify personality flaws with repeated use.

Common Elements

This ritual usually involves the magician and their mage amour. The armour is often donned as part of the performance, each piece accompanied by an invocation or marked with a rune or symbol. It is common for a coven of battle-magicians who have gained some knowledge of Summer rituals to perform this ritual together on their own coven, the morning before they take the field.

Another common element is marking key points on the body that correspond roughly to the locations where mage armour is worn (the brow, the shoulders, the forearms, the shins, the belly, the chest and the neck), or (especially for a vate) spilling a few drops of blood from those locations before donning the mage armour.

The rune Feresh is often used with this ritual, and evocations of The Stallion, of horses or bears, and especially of gryphons.

Crossroads

The old woman whispered and muttered to herself, gently shaking an old rattle filled with baby teeth. Beneath the raven-feather-and-dragonbone mask, her amber eyes were fixed on those of the young Grinnir opposite. He felt light headed, from the sweet smelling smoke and the three bowls of mead she had bid him drink, and was glad he was sitting down.

Without looking, the mystic reached out one stick-thin arm and grabbed the kettle from the fire. In a smooth motion she poured the boiling water into his lap. He winced in spite of himself. She chuckled. Despite the carelessness of her movement, not a drop splashed - although he was intensely aware of the heat from the wooden bowl so dangerously close to his groin.

The mystic did not speak, but mimed raising the bowl. He remembered her instructions then, with a start. He leant forward, and inhaled a deep breath of the scented steam. The sweet, sharp scent caused his nostrils to tingle and chilled his lungs. His head swam. Rainbows gathered in his peripheral vision, vanishing when he turned to look at them. He caught himself giggling.

He looked down at his hands - the old mystic must have taken the bowl without him realising. The fire was lower than he remembered. He felt ... displaced, as if his skin were too tight for his body. Then he was distracted by one of the new tattoos on his forearm, the swooping hawk and the soaring falcon. He fancied he could see them beating their wings.

His hostess poked him with a long dry stick, and offered him a tall boiled-leather pot. He reached inside, feeling the coolness of the mammoth ivory tokens within engulf his fingers. He grabbed a handful and without looking at them threw them onto the mat in front of him. His vision blurred - then narrowed - then danced with colours. The old woman snapped her fingers, then pointed to one of the runes.

"Gralm," she rasped. She held one jagged fingernail just above its surface, almost close enough to touch. "It is the crossroads. It is the skein. It is the choice you must make - to go to south, or to stay in Skarsind. It's the hero's road."

She grinned, showing her jagged yellow teeth. She snapped them suddenly together and grinned.

"It is also death. All roads end in death, and lover's meeting."

She pointed to the second rune, again stopping just short of touching it.

"Ull!" she announced fiercely. "It is the tossed coin, the rolled dice. The lightning strike, the unforeseen chance. The life that happens while you are making other plans. It is a powerful rune. It is ... great deeds, for good or ill. A hero's rune."

Then she pointed to the third rune - leaning forward and peering at it. She held her entire face just above it, sniffing.

"This ... is the other rune. The twenty-seventh. See, it is blank? It is the unknown and the unknowable, the rune without a name, the mystery, the secret that you knew before you were born and will know after you are dead. It is the road, the road of a thousand choices, Walk the road turning left and right, choosing your path and then look back to see that there is only a straight road behind you with no turnings. Look ahead and see no more choices."

She rolled back on her haunches and studied her guest carefully.

"Many mystics do not include the blank rune among their stones." She sucked her teeth thoughtfully. "I am one of those. Here."

She upended the pot then, spilling all the remaining runestones. They bounced and scattered across the cloth, clacking and clattering together. They were all blank, all empty, just tablets of mammoth ivory scattered around the first two runes he had cast down. The mystic stirred them all together with one sharp taloned fingernail, and laughed - a sharp barking laugh like a dog. Or a wolf. Then she pushed her mask up, and the young warrior could see she was smiling - a particularly mirthless smile.

"Well my boy, I don't know what to tell you. The runes say your choice is important, and will shape your life ... but they also say you have to make it alone ..."

Overview

Across the Empire, wherever diviners cast the runes or look to them for guidance, the same two keep cropping up over and over. Gralm, the Crossroads. Ull, the Coin. The runes of destiny and chance. The twenty-seventh rune also - even where that rune is not included in the casting, it turns up unlooked for.

In the League, everyone seems to have decided to perform the same plays, with the same themes. This season, when the sun has set and the temperature has lessened, the troupes and the guisers and the mummers tell old stories that set the Prince and the Witch against each other. Where the prince seeks the advice of the witch, however - a common enough trope in these sorts of plays - as often as not the actors falter and forget their lines. Where the Prince lays out her choice - to marry, to seek the Throne, to have her enemy slain - her voice sometimes takes on a bewitching timbre that stirs the audience as never before, and sends at least one dramaturgist into retirement with the knowledge she will never again match the performance she has just given.

The Urizen search the night skies diligently for signs; the Hakima find their own excuses to take blankets and bottles of wine out under the Summer stars. There they look for the signs of the world above reflecting what is already afoot in the world below. It is a sky full of birds. They find the Phoenix easily enough, and muse on the transformation of the self through learning, wisdom and understanding. Some of them mark the path of a falling star, a single tear shed by the phoenix that traces a crimson arc across the shadowed world to all to earth somewhere in the mountains of Urizen. Is this the sign they seek?

Perhaps not, the Wanderer forms no conjunction with the phoenix despite the portent. Rather, it seems to stand in alignment with absent stars - with the Stork which eschews the heavens in Summer months. Only when the astronomancers realise that the conjunction is with hidden stars, do they mark how the sky reflects what the runecasters and the dramaturgists already know.

Choices.

Fateful, significant choices that might shape a life, a skein ... an Empire. A chance to weave a new fate, or confound an old one. A crossroads, from which a traveller must choose one road or another. There will be no turning back, as the Solstice approaches, and no guarantee of a second chance.

The Urizen say the Stork means making the right choice for the right reasons; in Highguard they call it the Decision to be Virtuous. It is about accepting responsibility for your own destiny, being the master of your own fate. Accepting that things matter, and that the decisions and actions we take in life influence them. It is about accepting that you must choose, or you must stay where you are until hunger, or thirst, or old age catch up with you - like one that travels a lonely road and, looking back once, walks on and knows the darkness that follows at their heel.

Significance

There are tides in the world. Usually they are most obvious when the stars align, but it must be remembered that the stars as often as not reflect the world; they do not shape it. The runes heralded the shifting of those arcane currents first, and the stars followed suit.

In this case, a conjunction of chance and fate; a conjunction that suggests that the right choices can shape the world. The Stork, the crossroads, the dice, the Prince and the Witch. Call it a conjunction; it's as good a name as any.

Under this conjunction, rituals that seek guidance are harder to perform. The magnitude of Signs and Portents, Whispering Shadow Courtiers and Dreams in the Witch House are each increased by two for all casters. The conjunction may have similar effects on similar magical effects, especially those that draw on the intuitive, divinatory powers of Night.

In contrast, the rituals that support choices that have already been made - specifically Call Winged Messenger, The Ambassadorial Gatekeeper and The Ethereal Courier each have their magnitude reduced by 2 for all performances. Indeed, any ritualists who have mastered these rituals may choose to substitute green iron for crystal mana when performing these rituals; the smooth metal is taken in token payment by ... well, who knows? Every two measures of green iron spent count as one crystal mana.

Many players will not even notice there is a conjunction taking place. Others may choose to view this as an opportunity to focus some of their role-playing around embracing or avoiding difficult or significant choices.

Sensitive characters will experience dreams of crossroads, and games of chance. They may also have frustrating dreams in which they seek guidance from absent friends, family members, or authority figures that ultimately proves impossible to understand or appears irrelevant. These dreams will also feature images of birds, especially ravens, and spiders spinning glistening or metallic webs.

Resolution

The effects of the conjunction fade within a month of the end of the Summer Solstice; the consequences of the decisions taken under it's influence may prove a good deal more durable.

Two roads diverged in a yellow wood,

And sorry I could not travel both

And be one traveller, long I stood

And looked down one as far as I could

To where it bent in the undergrowth;

Then took the other ...

Crow Keeper of the Rest

Overview

A motion to construct the Pilgrim's Rest in Kallavesa Marsh, Kallavesa was entered into Senate during Autumn 380YE and passed. The sinecure was self funded by Kitsana – a Wintermark Stormcrow of the Way. This would then create the Imperial Title of 'Crow Keeper of the Rest'.

Crow Keeper of the Rest was an Imperial title created by the Imperial Senate in Spring 381YE. The position is a sinecure, requiring minimal responsibility but awarded a regular income of liao and votes in the Imperial Synod to reflect the many pilgrims taking rest on their journeys.

The sinecure itself is a modest construction of white granite and other materials resembling a way station or inn by the side of the Pilgrim's Trail. The establishment offers pilgrims a place to rest before they take the last part of their journey into the marsh to lay their loved one to rest.

Responsibilities

The Crow Keeper of the Rest is responsible for the safety and wellbeing of those who travel through the Kallavesa Marsh whilst on pilgrimage.

Powers

A Portion of Liao

The sinecure provides six measures of liao to the Crow Keeper each season, to be used as they see fit.

Voice in the Synod

Crow Keeper of the Rest may sit in the Imperial Synod, and possesses 12 votes in Synod affairs (or an additional 12 votes if they already have a congregation). They may use these votes in any assembly for which they are eligible.

Appointment

Crow Keeper of the Rest is a national position appointed by the Synod. It is elected by judgement of the Wintermark Assembly.

The title can be held by a Wintermark citizen. The Crow Keeper has tenure and serves until they die or step down. They can be revoked by the General Assembly, the Wintermark National Assembly, and by the Assembly of the Nine.

Pilgrim's Rest

Shortly after the winter gathering at Anvil of 380YE construction began on the new way station. The building itself is something akin to a roadside inn, with rooms for travelers to sleep; tables and benches for eating and drinking; a large hearth keeps the main room warm along with an ever burning brazier which is surrounded by plinths with books and maps. The books tell the stories of fallen heroes and the maps mark where they are laid to rest in the marshes. Annexed off from the alcove containing the brazier is a cold store room where fallen heroes may lay before their final journey.

There is a kitchen that serves pilgrims all day and night with traditional Wintermark stews and meats. A bar serves drinks including Kitsana's own personally brewed wine 'Kallavesa Wreck'. To the rear of the building are rooms that may be used by Pilgrims to rest their weary feet and aching legs. In honour of a fallen hero of Wintermark and a dear old friend to Kitsana there is a constant vigil and unobtrusive presence of a now retired military unit ensuring the safety of Pilgrims. Some of these 'guards' have taken to hearing and retelling the stories of other fallen heroes in the great Wintermark scop tradition with soft song, lively stories and sombre praise; extolling the Virtues of those who have passed and cheering the spirits of those who mourn. Along with the newfound scops is the presence of a few local Wintermark Stormcrows who guide Pilgrims and preach all Virtues of The Way. Some of the resident Scops and Priests like to imagine that, even from beyond the gulf of death, in some way Kitsana herself still uses her lamp to protect travelers in the area.

Kistana

Before the construction of the Pilgrim's Trail and Britta's Pool a Wintermark Stormcrow priest by the name of Kitsana would walk the trails of the Kallavesa marshes lighting torches and lamps along the way so that pilgrims would be able to find their way through the marshes whilst taking their loved ones for burial in the Wintermark tradition. Kitsana also maintained a small hut with some basic shelters in order to offer pilgrims warmth and hospitality. While pilgrims ate their hot soup, bread and drank steeped tea or something a bit stronger Kitsana would ask to hear of the virtues of their fallen and the stories of their Names.

Once the Pilgrim's Trail and Britta's Pool were constructed Kitsana saw a great increase of pilgrims traveling through the swamps and marshes. She came to the decision that her simple hut and shelters would no longer be adequate and began to collect the materials needed to build something more substantial. In the autumn of 380YE the Senator for Kallavesa heard of her efforts and advised her that he would personally propose the motion to the Senate for this to be built and with a Second from the Senator for Semmerholm and the promise of self funding the motion passed.

Sadly, the day before the sinecure could be appointed for the first time, Kitsana died. The first citizen to hold the title was the stormcrow Nils Bardstrom, of Hendaal Hearth.

Crow on the Cradle

Original Song by Sydney Carter (<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=r8xouMVIesY>)

Varushkan version

Lyrics and arrangement by Jude Reid and Daisy Abbott

Crow on the cradle, the wind and the storm
Now is the time for a child to be born
He'll laugh at the moon and he'll cry for the sun
And play in the sunlight when winter is done

Sang the crow on the cradle

But winter is hard and the snow it is deep
The frost and the hunger will keep him from sleep
You'll strive and you'll suffer
but day after day
The winter will take your sweet baby away

Sang the crow on the cradle

The crow on the cradle the snow in the sky
Somebody's baby is born just to die
Crow on the cradle, the cruel wind's sting
Somebody's baby will not see the spring

Sang the crow on the cradle Sang the crow on the cradle
Your mother and father they'll sweat and they'll save
To build you a coffin and dig you a grave
Hush little baby now never you weep
I've got a song that will put you to sleep

Sang the crow on the cradle

Oh crow on the cradle I'll weave him a charm
I'll guard him and watch him and keep him from harm
My cloak I will give him to cover his bed
And I will go hungry to see my child fed

Oh the crow on the cradle

Crow on the cradle, the wind and the storm
I'll rock him and hold him and keep my child warm
The lamps we will light and the hearth fires we'll burn
Oh crow on the cradle you'll never return

Oh you crow on the cradle Oh you crow on the cradle (rpt)

Navarr version

New lyrics by David Proctor

The summer is ending, the brokers weigh corn
Now is the time for a child to be born
She'll laugh at the trees and cry without fear
And if she's a Thorn she'll carry a spear
Sang the crow on the cradle

And if it should be that this baby's a Vate
Never you mind if she shares Navarr's fate
With blood on her fingers and and a knife in her hands
And the Vallorn behind her wherever she stands
Sang the crow on the cradle

And when it should be that the child takes the Brand
They'll dance along with her and with her they'll stand
With a scar on her cheekbone
And a suit of dark maille
And before her the ruins of Terunael
Sang the crow on the cradle

The crow on the cradle, the husks in the night
Somebody's baby is born to our fight
The crow on the cradle, the green and the black
Somebody's baby is not coming back
Sang the crow on the cradle

Your striding or steading will sweat and they'll fight
To hold back the vines that creep in the night
Hush-a-bye little one, never you weep
The corpse glade is ready for when you should sleep
Sang the crow on the cradle

Bring me my bow, and I'll shoot that bird dead
That's what Navarr and Thorn long ago said
The crow on the cradle, what can we do?
Ah, this is a thing that I'll leave up to you
Sang the crow on the cradle

The crow on the cradle the husks in the night
Somebody's baby is born for our fight
The crow in the cradle, the cities of dust
One day we'll take back all that we have lost
Sang the crow on the cradle

Crow on the cradle

Vaclav descended the spiral stairs in silence. Now and again he would reach out and touch two fingers to his lips, and then touch one of the skulls cemented into the wall. He paused at the bottom, and settled the long cloak of black feathers round his shoulders, adjusted his dragonbone mask, and stepped through the crude archway into the barrow proper.

Candles guttered here and there, providing little illumination. He waited in silence.

After a few long minutes, he heard the scraping of bone on stone. A quiet, empty voice spoke from somewhere in the gloom.

"Ssssserav ..." it hissed, and then fell still. Vaclav took a deep breath.

"No my lord. It is Vaclav. Serav was my grandfather. He's been dead for twenty years, lord. Remember."

There was a noise that might have been a chuckle.

"Twenty ... years? I should apologise ... Vaclav. Sometimes it is hard to ... tell you apart. You are such excellent ... stewards."

Vaclav bowed his head for a moment, and then drew a slim scroll from beneath his feathered cloak.

"You told me to come as soon as there was word from the Malinov, my lord. A scroll arrived less than an hour ago."

He unfurled the pale parchment, squinting in the gloom. He could barely make out the scroll, never mind the writing. In truth, he had memorized the words but he made a show of reading the scroll out for his lord. The dead king could be quite touchy about little details, as Vaclav had learned the hard way.

"They say they remember, and they keep to the old compact. They are Varushkan and do not forget. They will raise the black standard again, if their cousins in the west will do their part. There is talk of roads, of course. Of mithril. They will march, but never again lead. Oaths were sworn, after all."

The voice from the shadows was stronger now. Vaclav's eyes had adjusted to the gloom a little, and he could make out the hunched shape seated on the stone throne in the centre of the barrow, and a few of the dark alcoves set at regular intervals into the walls. He could not quite make out the shapes that occupied them, and as always he was grateful for that.

"I remember the oaths. I am not ... so far gone. I remember Pieter Malinov near ... pissed himself ... when he laid his blood on the black stone. So angry. So passionate. So ... foolish. That was ... long ago."

Vaclav knew better to interrupt his lord when he was reminiscing, lost in the past.

"I remember ... when you told me ... what they had done to the Senator. Thrown ... out of a window."

A dry, empty chuckle.

"Again, lord, that was my grandfather. And I think you told me once that that was Varla Malinov. I am sorry."

"Don't ... apologise. It is nearly ... time ... for me to rest. The iron boots no longer ... march. The sound of the drums becomes ... distant. The crows ... have fed ... but now ... peace."

The dark lord hissed the final word, drawing it out, his voice dwindling away into silence. Then, suddenly, it was strong again. Vaclav felt a flicker of his lord's will, his full attention focused on him.

"Send the birds, Vaclav. Make the ... offer. Baruk and his people will ... remain here and guard my ... slumber. Tell him ... that those of his people who wish may go to the Imperial orcs ... if they will take them. But our bargain ... must be paid in blood ... and he and his blood-kin will ... stand watch ... over the barrow. He knows ... the price should he fail."

Vaclav nodded, and bowed, and started to withdraw. Then he paused and turned back.

"My lord ... may I ask a question?"

The silence became expectant.

"Will it last, this peace with the northern orcs?"

Laughter, then. Dry, but strong, filling the barrow. Echoed by the unseen figures occupying the alcove.

"No, Vaclav. Peace never lasts. Never. In a month, a year, a decade, a century ... peace dies. The boots march again, the drums beat again. the blood ... flows again. As it was in my youth, as it was in the centuries since. Peace ... there is no peace, outside of the grave."

The laughter died away; there were no echoes. One moment laughter, the next silence.

"Send the birds, Vaclav. When the peace ends ... I will be here. For you, for your children, for your children's children. It does not ... matter ... how long. It does not matter if you call yourself Ushka, or Varushkan. I will ... always be here ... for you."

Vaclav bowed low, a catch at his throat and his eyes blurred with tears at the terrible hunger in his lord's voice - and the terrible, terrible love that lay there too.

He pulled his cloak around him again as he stepped through the archway and began the long climb up the spiral stairs. At each turn, he touched his fingers to his lips, and touched the skulls of those who had gone before him, nestled in their earthen alcoves. His father. His grandfather. His great-grandmother. Back and back through the generations.

One day soon that he would join them, and in time watch his daughter, his grandson, the blood of his blood, descend the dark stairs to commune with the Lord of the Broken Hill, in the darkness, in the silence of centuries, until long after his bones were dust and his name forgotten.

Overview

Since the Thule invasion of Karsk in 368YE, an independent military force has operated out of the Broken Hill, in Branoc. Composed primarily of Varushkan warriors apparently supported by a powerful sovereign known as the Charnel Lord, the force was supplemented by some Wolves, and even a number of orc bandits. The army changed sides at least once during the war on the command of its aberrant overlord, but despite this treachery eventually came to fully support the Varushkan defenders.

Now, it appears that there is peace with the Thule - at least in the short term. The barbarian orcs have withdrawn from Branoc, and from Crowlook, to cold Krevsaty. The Charnel Lord obviously considers the invasion over ... and has instructed his agents to approach the Varushkan people with an offer.

The Charnel Lord knows that it is time to sleep once again - to fall into the restless slumber in which he sleeps away the years between wars in Karsk. While still a presence within the Broken Hill, he will not be in a position to completely protect his chosen people ... and he wishes the Varushkans to take over this role. "His" people are still Varushkan - albeit estranged cousins to the rest of the population of Karsk. He has also sent his messengers to the Malinov, the Sloev and the Pravin of Moresvah and called in certain old favours, to gain the assistance of the notoriously insular old families in protecting the soil of Varushka.

One thing he has reminded them of is that, until the reign of Empress Mariika, the scions of these families lead the army of the Iron Helm into battle, serving as general as often as not. When the cunning Empress disbanded their army, they swore a mighty oath that one day they would see the black banner of the cruel army raised again. Perhaps the time has come to make good on that oath ... working with the surviving followers of the Charnel Lord they could certainly realise that dream ... provided the rest of Varushka were prepared to help them.

Significance

The Varushkan followers of the Charnel Lord represent several vales in Branoc, Crowlook and eastern Nitrost. These could either form the core of a new Varushkan army or they could be used to expand an existing Varushkan army to make it large.

- 3 Resolution

This opportunity to incorporate the warriors of the Charnel Lord into an Imperial army will be available until Summer Solstice 380YE, otherwise the warriors are likely to disperse back to their homes. This opportunity might well be removed if open war with the Thule erupts again before a decision is made.

Armies

Enlarging an existing Varushkan army with the assistance of the two insular natives of Karsk would require a motion of the Imperial Senate, and would cost 125 wains of mithril. It would take six months, during which time the target army would still be able to move and submit orders normally. At the end of that time, the army would become a large army with all the standard benefits, and with the increased upkeep.

Alternatively, by working the the miners of Moresvah, the Varushkans could use this core of vicious killers to reinstate the Iron Helm army. The legacy of this cruel army is particularly strong in Karsk . It would require 160 wains of mithril and 40 Thrones, and take a year, but at the end of that time the cruel banner of the Iron Helms would be raised again in Karsk. However at present, the Varushkans cannot support an additional army.

Supply

Sadly, the long years of war have wrought untold damage to the infrastructure of Karsk. Near constant casting of Rivers of Life means that the road network that connects the vales of Karsk is ruined. As a result of the devastation, the Varushkans are not currently able to support a third army. After two years, the industrious Varushkans will likely repair enough of the roads to be able to support a third army if nothing else changes, but there is an opportunity to improve the situation immediately.

A Senate motion to rebuild all the damaged roads would be a great work that requires 80 wains of White Granite and 20 Thrones, but would be complete within two seasons. Once complete it would allow the Varushkans to support a third army, but it would also provide a valuable additional benefit. The improved travel would cause a permanent increase in the productivity of mines and forests. In total they would produce 100 additional ingots each season spread through the mine and forest resources of the territory.

Construction of the great work. and raising a new army, can happen at the same time - but work raising the new army cannot begin until the construction of the great work begins. If anything goes wrong with the road network, then the new army would not be supported and could not be completed.

Resolution

The Imperial Senate agreed not only to rebuild the roads of Karsk, but also to restore the Iron Helm. The work on rebuilding the roads was completed shortly before the Spring Equinox 380YE.

(OOC: The cost to recreate the Iron Helms has been reduced to bring it into line with recent updates.)

Crown of Three Tears

Overview

The Crown of Three Tears was worn by the pre-Imperial kings and queens of Wintermark. It is a vital part of their heritage. It was lost to the Empire during the fall of Skarsind.

In Summer 378YE, Ioseph of Phoenix Reach (the Minister of Historical Research) commissioned an investigation into its provenance and whereabouts at the request of Thane Aedred of Renwaerd. In Autumn 381YE, the results of the research (a document prepared by the civil servant Warren of Dale) were made publicly available to Imperial scholars interested in the history of this prestigious item.

The Crown of Three Tears

The history of the Crown is innately tied to the history of Wintermark. Every child knows the story of its creation, and it can be argued that it has existed as long as the concept of Wintermark itself. The two are practically inseparable.

It is beyond the scope of this document to list every significant event involving the crown; a conservative estimate would suggest it is anywhere between five and seven hundred years old, and has been in constant use throughout this time.

Rather I will attempt to give an overview of the crown's history, and highlight events that seem particularly relevant today. I am indebted to the assistance offered by the scholars of Rundhal and Kalapheim, and to the Navarr of the Swift Quill Striding who helped gather information from historians across the Empire.

Provenance of the Crown

After the war a victory celebration was held in Hahnmark. A traditional Steinr grand moot – a Witan – was called, where three representatives of each people spoke on the nature of their achievement and of what must be done next to survive. It is said that amidst the speeches the leaders of the Suaq, the Kallavesi and the Steinr each shed a single tear for the trolls, and that these three tears froze in an instant, becoming clear gems. These gems were collected by the most cunning of the Suaq hunters and set in a crown forged from the torcs and rings of the fallen heroes of the three people. The wisest of the Kallavesi mystics crowned wily Ulmo of the Suaq King of the Three Tears, ruler of a new nation, Wintermark.

A tale of Years, "Scop Arna the Golden"

Without wishing to give offence to the Winterfolk, the story of the three tears is almost certainly a metaphor not intended to be taken literally. As with the stories of feathers, seals and falling stars, it is a fanciful tale that appeals to the romantic nature of the folk of the north-west. The Steinr, Suaq and Kallavesi had just waged and won a bloody war of extermination against the "trolls" (most likely a metaphor themselves for a powerful tribe of orcs – several books have been written about this theory so we will not belabour it here).

The story of the forging of the crown itself, however, is certainly based in fact – examination has confirmed the story of its construction. The clear gemstones are unique, as near as can be ascertained – no jeweller has ever successfully identified them as anything other than "clear gems", nor have any other gemstones with the precise hue, tone or translucence been encountered. This alone would be sufficient to make the crown a treasure beyond price. One quirk associated with the crown is that the ritual Hand of the Maker does not reveal the identity of the jeweller who crafted the crown. Magicians who have performed that ritual on the Crown of Three Tears report that it simply presents a sensation of cold, darkness and great sadness. While some magical scholars theorise that this simply means a powerful Night ritual has been used to conceal the crafter, the magicians involved regularly point out that they can tell the difference between receiving a result they do not understand and information that is hidden by magic.

As the Crown of Wintermark

The crown was passed from monarch to monarch through the history of Wintermark; when a king or queen died the Witan would select another to take their place. The ceremonial coronation always took place at the end of the Witan, marking the chosen King or Queen as the leader – but not the ruler – of the three peoples. It is no coincidence that the method of choosing the King or Queen of Wintermark is similar to the method whereby the modern Empire chooses an Empress or Emperor – indeed, those Winterfolk who have held the Throne (Guntherm and Mariika) both delayed their coronation until the end of the summit in honour of this old Winterfolk tradition.

The list of Wintermark kings and queens is incomplete – but all existing stories confirm that they were crowned with the Crown of Three Tears. All Kallavesi, Steinr and Suaq recognise the crown – at the very least it adorns the Face of Ulmo, the massive carving of the Suaq First King that overlooks the Winterfolk “capital” of Kalpaheim.

Three monarchs in particular are worth mentioning in a document about the Crown of Three Tears.

Queen Ilsin and the Vallorn

The first is Queen Ilsin, during whose reign the crown was very nearly lost forever. Against the advice of her counsellors, she led an ill-fated crusade against the Vallorn of Hercynia. Trusting to the power of her runesmiths and icewalkers, the queen and a large number of her warriors attempted to root out the infestation with fire and steel.

Perhaps predictably, the attempt was a disaster and the queen and all her warriors were reportedly slain by an onslaught of ravenous vallornspawn. Hours before her death, Queen Ilsin entrusted the Crown of Three Tears to Carun White-Walker, widely considered one of the swiftest messengers of the Navarr people at the time, and he managed to break through the tide of monstrous assailants closing in around the Wintermark army. The crown was returned to Hahnmark, and Carun's impassioned tale of the Queen's courage in the face of certain death is remembered in Kalpaheim to this day.

King Yorick and the Thrones of Summer

A little over fifty years later, the changeling King Yorick Bloodgold led the folk of Wintermark (the image here is purportedly a drawing of King Yorick found in the cellar of a house in Kalpaheim in 342YE). He wore the Crown of Three Tears to a “summit” attended by the nobles of the Summer Realm, representing the people of Wintermark. The details of the meeting are quite fanciful, and difficult to confirm. It is said that Queen Eleonaris of the Fields of Glory, Queen Cathan Canae of the Cold Wastes, Prince Jaheris the Just, King Hayaak of the Forest of Arden and King Rhianos of the Eternal Sea all greeted Yorick as an equal. They judged him to be a great ruler of mortal men because in their eyes he rules over not one but three kingdoms. According to the tale, the crown allowed Yorick to endure the majestic presence of these five potent Eternals and gave his word great weight in their councils. During the meeting, peace was brokered between the warring Eternals – and a treaty agreed to limit the involvement of the Summer Eternals in the conflict between the Wintermark and the Jotun.

A footnote to this tale suggests that when Yorick returned from the Summer realm (presumably in reality this was a chamber somewhere between the mortal realm and the Eternal realm) he brought with him five gifts from the Eternal Kings and Queens.

A similar tale is apparently told among the Jotun, although in their case the Jarl of Jarls is credited with securing the peace treaty and receiving the five gifts.

The Last King, Aloh Bearnig

The last bearer of the crown was the Kallavesi Aloh Bearnig (a copy of the only surviving image of the king can be found to the right). He was chosen for his swift wits, clever tongue and cautious demeanour. Before his coronation, the mystics explored a powerful vision that suggested the next ruler would be called on to make a decision vital to the future of Wintermark; indeed, only six months after his coronation the First Empress held her historic meeting at Anvil. Aloh attended, and while he found the Empress' vision appealing he declined the offer to forge an Empire. According to history, he saw little benefit in an alliance with the distant Highborn – another story suggests that a bitter argument between Marchers and Dawnish attendees (or between Urizen and Navarr – sources give different versions) caused him to believe that the Empire would fail because it would be unable to achieve unity.

The King was no fool however – he knew that if the Empress did unite the Bay of Catazar, even for a short time, she would be irresistible. He returned to Kalpaheim full of uncertainty and sought the advice of his counsellors.

In the end, however, the King was persuaded that the grand alliance might in fact work, in part due to the skilled diplomacy of a Highborn Wayfarer, Malachi of the Winds of Virtue. Aloh personally helped lay the groundwork for the Imperial Senate, and was instrumental in ensuring that the leaders of the Empire represented the people, rather than governed them.

Finally, when the nation joined the Empire, King Aloh Bearing returned the crown to the Kallavesi mystics. It became not only a symbol for the unity of the three peoples of Wintermark, but for their union with the newborn Empire.

As the Crown of Heroes

After the end of the line of Kings and Queens, the Kallavesi mystics chose to bestow the crown on the Winterfolk hero they considered to best exemplify the virtues of Wintermark. While the final decision lay with the Kallavesi – as was the will of King Arnulf – in each case the mystics took counsel from the cleverest Suag and the most courageous Steinr. The decision was never made lightly, and it was understood that only death would sever the tie between the hero and the crown.

In the last 378 years, an estimated eighty-four men and women of Wintermark have worn the crown and stood as exemplars of Winterfolk unity. Of these, all save two held the crown until their deaths.

Lordi the Far Walker abdicated his responsibility when it became clear that the wasting sickness he suffered for most of his life would soon claim it – he returned the crown to the Kallavesi before his final Walk northwards.

Ritha Henriksdottir was the only hero of Wintermark to be stripped of the crown. During the reign of Empress Brannan she drew arms against the Cardinal of Loyalty following the shameful revocation of the Throne. Motivated by anger over what she saw as a betrayal, her hot Changeling blood caused her to murder the Cardinal in front of several dozen witnesses. She never denied the charge, and returned the crown to the Senator for Kallavesa shortly before her execution. Her final words were sometimes mentioned as a caution to the heroes that followed her: “let my shame pass with me, and leave the crown and the heart of Wintermark untouched.”

Covetousness, murder and Agramant the Wendigo

As a priceless artefact of great power and importance to the people of Wintermark, it should come as no surprise that there have been numerous attempts to remove the crown from the hero of Wintermark to which it has been entrusted.

In 138YE, the Crown was actually stolen in 138YE by, of all things, a coven of Urizen magicians who were convinced that it held the key to unravelling a magical mystery related to the control of winter storms. They drugged the hero Marko the Ice Lion during his marriage celebration, but their attempt to replace the crown with a replica was uncovered almost immediately. The ire of the entire nation of Wintermark was raised against the Urizen – and it must be said that the aghast magicians of the south-eastern lands cooperated entirely with the resulting investigation and willingly handed the thieves over to Imperial justice. The crown was recovered, undamaged, and those involved in its theft faced stiff penalties.

In 246YE a minor diplomatic incident occurred when a representative of a powerful Asavean “noble” named Bertillon of Nemoria attempted to buy the crown, intending for it to form the centrepiece of his collection of royal regalia from around the world. After three increasingly heated attempts, the bearer of the Crown, supported by all four Wintermark senators and the egregore and with the assistance of several burly warriors ejected Bertillon's agent from Anvil. The Winterfolk were later charged with assault, and required to pay reparations to the agent – but no further attempts were made to purchase the Crown of Three Tears.

In Winter 328YE, agents of Agramant the Wendigo attempted to steal the Crown of Three Tears during a particularly eventful summit at Anvil. Haukr Valdísarson, the Suag hunter who was at that time bearer of the crown was lured into an ambush and set upon by corrupt Marchers and several Heralds of the Winter Eternal. Despite the odds, he and his party fought free although in the process Haukr was fatally wounded when a bone spear-tip broke off near his heart. He died two days later.

Following his death, his son Valdir employed potent Icewalker rituals to seek the deeper purpose behind his father's murder. Pursuing several leads, he discovered the existence of a bargain between Agramant and a Thule Dragon called “Fraynir” who coveted the crown for an unknown purpose.

Two more attempts were made to acquire the crown that were later traced to the Thule magician – a blatant attempt to buy it by an agent of the Thrice Cursed Court in 334YE, and a Thule orc attack against the home of Karmark Ogmásdottir (Steinr hero of Wintermark) in 352YE. Kormakr was able to foil the attack against her home but lost her life in the process.

What use a Thule Dragon might have for the Crown of Three Tears is difficult to guess, but conjecture suggests that it Fraynir was likely motivated by more than simple covetousness. While the last attempt to gain the crown that can be convincingly tied to the Dragon took place nearly forty years ago, it is impossible to be certain that Fraynir is no longer alive – even if the stories of Thule Dragons having achieved a state of near immortality are not true, it is accepted fact that their lifespan is supernaturally long.

Inga Suvvisdottir and the Fall of Skarsind

The final Wintermark hero to wear the crown was Inga Suvvisdottir. This courageous warrior was killed in 373YE during the fall of Skarsind. She was killed by Thule forces while defending Gildenheim, along with the majority of the warriors fighting alongside her.

An eye-witness, the grimmir Hovat the Bloody, says that her unit were attempting to fight through to relieve an impromptu field hospital that had been threatened by an unexpectedly successful push by the Thule. Her soldiers were ambushed by Thule archers, pinned down against the walls of Gildenheim, and surrounded by a significant force of warriors supported by a grim “empty eyed” warlock. With her companions falling left and right to remorseless attacks, Inga engaged the leader of the ambushing group - a massive pale-skinned warrior wearing midnight scale armour with a helmet in the shape of a roaring drake. She fell beneath his massive green-iron blade but not before she had inflicted a grievous wound on him.

Hovat's account lacks details – the chaos of warfare makes it difficult to confirm his story – but the when the defenders fell back before the Thule army, Inga and her warriors were not among them.

The following two sections are out-of-date; the Crown was actually recovered by Imperial heroes during the Spring Solstice, 379YE.

Current whereabouts of the Crown of Three Tears

After the barbarians were driven out of Skarsind in 377YE a thorough search was made of the ruins of Gildenheim in the vain hope the crown could be found – there was however no sign of it. Interrogation of captured Thule revealed very little.

At this point, we can only speculate as to the whereabouts of the crown.

It seems likely that such a potent artefact, even were it not recognised as the Throne of Three Tears, would have been claimed as part of the spoils of war. The most hopeful scenario is that it is part of the regalia of some Thule Warlock or Warlord, but unfortunately the most likely situation is that it is in the cold, withered claws of a Thule Dragon in distant Otkodov (see references to Fraynir above).

Locating and recovering the Crown of Three Tears

Had the Crown been captured by the Jotun, or even the Druj, then it might be feasible that a “ransom” could be paid to recover it. If, as is most likely, it is in the hands of the Thule it may be possible to secure its return but at this time there are no diplomatic channels with which to contact them and doing so runs the risk of alerting them to the true value of the artefact – a value they could in theory be ignorant of.

A suggestion from the Icewalker Rudhra Dancing Fox when contacted to add her expertise to the search for information about the Crown of Three Tears is that communication with an Eternal might help to confirm the location of the Crown.

The Eternal Kimus might be an obvious choice, given its interest in significant events and “pivotal” or “important” objects and people.

Alternatively, if efforts have been made to keep the whereabouts of the crown secret, then agents of the Whisper Gallery might possess some insight into where it might be found.

The final suggestion is the most worrisome of course – the crown is an immensely valuable item and, if it has fallen into the hands of a Thule Dragon, then it might have been traded to Ephesis in return for something of immense value or power ... or offered as Tribute to Skathe, Tharim and Surut in return for an incalculable amount of magical power.

Properties of the Crown

The crown is very old, and has been passed down through generation after generation of Winterfolk. While it is a magical artefact, its true value lies in its symbolic nature.

It is an exceptionally powerful symbol of the unity of the three peoples. There are few items in the Empire that have such a potent symbolic meaning – the handful of items of comparative importance would include the Imperial Crown and perhaps the Throne. Its role in the history of Wintermark makes it an artefact beyond price. During the reign of Empress Mariika, the Kallavesi seer and mystic Tekupala claimed that the greatest power of the Crown was the way it warped the skein of whoever wore it. They would be drawn into situations where the choices they made would shape their destiny and that of people throughout Wintermark and beyond – but that the price paid for this shaping of the skein was that the bearer would often find themselves overwhelmed by the forces arrayed against them. Or, as the Suaq bard Garn said when he was chosen to bear the crown, that it ensured he would die a brutal, savage death at the hands of his enemies, which removed a lot of the uncertainty from his life.

Theories of Suleman of Cantiararch's Hold

The Highborn archivist Suleman of Cantiararch's Hold, made an extensive study of the bearers of the Crown of Three Tears. He petitioned to be allowed to examine the crown itself, but was politely rebuffed. Instead, he examined the lives of each of the monarchs of Wintermark and the heroes who followed them. His cautious analysis was that wearers of the crown tended to die violent deaths, usually in or shortly after battles. He suggested that the most likely explanation was that the traditions and customs of Wintermark itself meant that the kind of people wearing the crown – leaders and champions – tended to mean that they regularly found themselves in harm's way. He did note that while more bearers died violently than died peacefully (of old age or sickness), there was only one story where the bearer died of misadventure – and the death of King Ulfarn the Unready is regularly pointed to as being the result of an assassination rather than a dining accident. In the interests of balance, however, Suleman presents a second, alternative hypothesis but is quick to point out that it is just conjecture. He theorizes that the Crown of Three Tears is actually an extremely dangerous cursed item; that serendipity and synchronicity conspired to put anyone bound to it in dangerous, life-threatening situations and to make it more likely they would die as a result of these encounters.

The Winterfolk cultural tendencies mean that they perceive the effect of this curse as a boon – it ensures that their leaders and heroes encounter important events during which they can make significant choices and shape their skein – and it cannot be denied that the wearers of the crown tend to live exceptional – if short and bloody – lives.

Recent History

In Winter 378YE, a curse fell over the three peoples of Wintermark that encouraged them to seek the company of their own tradition and eschew that of the other two. Initially, the Strength of Tradition was somewhat beneficial - but that soon changed as the curse grew in power and its true malignancy was revealed.

By Spring 379YE, the curse had escalated to become the Bane of Tradition, causing conflict between the three traditions and threatening to tear the nation apart. Investigation by brave heroes uncovered evidence of a conspiracy; the Thule barbarians were using the Crown of Three Tears as a powerful focus to destroy Wintermark. The crown's role as a symbol of unity made it the perfect tool to try and tear that unity apart.

The Crown was eventually recovered by Imperial heroes during a vicious engagement with Thule forces in Hahnmark, here the orcs were attempting to complete the final stage of their magic. As part of the ceremony needed to break this curse, General Erkenbrand of Tyrsholm was crowned the first champion of Wintermark since the fall of Ingvar Suvvisdottir, and the unity of Kallavesi, Steinr. and Suaq was re-affirmed.

Crumbling Flesh and Withering Limbs

Rules

Winter Magnitude 8

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets a character, who must be present throughout. The target character must possess the magician skill.

This spell is an enchantment. A target may only be under one enchantment effect at a time.

Effects

Twice each day during the duration of the enchantment the target can call CLEAVE with a rod when they hit a target, following the rules for a heroic call.

The effect lasts until the start of the next Profound Decisions Empire event.

Additional Targets

This ritual can affect additional characters from the same coven. Each additional character increases the magnitude by 6. Additional characters must be present throughout.

Description

This ritual allows a magician to channel destructive, painful magic through their rod. The spell blasts flesh and twists bone, leaving a limb useless and crippled or immediately incapacitating a target with an agonizing burst of pain if it strikes the chest or belly. The rod needs to strike reasonably exposed flesh, but the magic penetrates heavy clothing and light armour with ease. The effects of the withering cleave can be treated in the same way as a blow from a sword or axe.

As with Kimus' Glaring Eye, the magic of this ritual can be used by a magician in armour because they are not actually casting a spell when they invoke its power. For a ritualist with no other useful incantations, this can prove moderately useful on a battlefield as long as they select the right moment to strike with their withering strike. Even magicians with useful battlefield magic can still find this enchantment useful however; it gives a powerful strike when used at the right point in a battle, and is certainly enough to deal a crippling blow to an enemy magician.

Sometimes this ritual is named Sorin's Chastising Touch, evoking that Eternal's philosophy of learning and strength through suffering. Some scholars believe the name refers to a more potent version of the ritual that allows additional uses, and is used by certain tyrannical magicians to inflict crippling injuries on recalcitrant minions.

Common Elements

This ritual almost always involves the target's implement in some fashion. Sometimes the rod is anointed with noxious preparations, sometimes magician and rod alike are marked with the rune Kyrop which symbolises weakness. Invocations involving old age, disease and sickness are included.

Crusade

Jessica stood on the orcs chest and took a firm grip on her great two-handed sword. She had hit the little bastard far too hard. She wiggled the weapon back and forth slowly working it loose from where it had lodged in his chest.

Sir Jory stomped up to her, and smacked her on the back with the loud "clang" of bloodsteel on mithril. He was covered in blood, and she could tell from the way he was favouring one leg that at least some of it was his own.

"That's the last of them," he said grimly.

"What about the ones that made a break for the tree-line?" asked Jessica, finally getting her sword free. She checked the blade carefully, then kicked the orc corpse in the head. "Notched the blade, dammit."

"They didn't get far." Sir Jory inclined his head to a Navarri archer picking among the dead for unbroken arrows.

Jessica looked sceptical, but held her peace. Like many Dawnish she considered the bow-and-arrow a poor choice for a warrior's weapon.

"None of them made it into the trees, then?"

Sir Jory shook his head. "It was strange, mind. Three of them made it to the edge... and then... they came back."

Jessica began to wipe her sword clean. Sir Jory put his hands on his hips, breathing heavily, and leant forward slightly. He looked pale under the blood.

"Are you alright?"

Sir Jory waved her concern away. "Right as rain once I've had a sit down. One of the brutes dented my helmet for me. That'll teach me to turn my back on a desperate Druj, even if it's cause two of his friends are trying to disembowel me."

The two Dawnish looked towards the forest. A wall of green, stretching as far as the eye could see. Not just a metaphorical wall, not really.

"How far does it go do you think?" asked Sir Jory.

"All the way to the Barrens, obviously." Replied Jessica. She sheathed her blade, now clean, and looked speculatively at the dead orcs around her. Sir Jory made a sound halfway between a grunt and a snort.

"They've attacked Drycastle, I hear." he said to nobody in particular. "And set one of the Towers aflame to boot. Bloody vermin."

Jessica, a questing knight, had more experience fighting the orcs of the Barrens. She chose her words carefully.

"You know they brought Lord Agravaine back? I remember telling you - the questing knight?"

Sir Jory nodded. "I remember you saying that all the talk was that the Barrens was ripe for the conquering."

"I know that with a fourth army, with the Druj out, with Spiral Castle admitting they're part of Dawn again, there won't be a better time to strike in the next decade, if ever. Once we get bogged down in Urizen, or on the west side, we'll not get loose again easily."

Sir Jory shrugged. "I don't know if I agree with you ... but I do know that right now there are orcs shooting arrows into Dawnish yeomen and the only thing between us and them are some trees."

They looked at the Forest of Peytaht again. Jessica forced a grin - and the Paragons knew there had been few enough of them in the last few months.

"Spooooky trees," she joked. Sir Jory met her gaze.

"Well, you know what a Dawnishman such as myself says when told that a forest is full of things even the Druj are frightened of?"

They stared at each other in silence for a moment. Jessica's grin become stronger, more natural.

"I assume it's the same as this Dawnishwoman says - let's go and see what the Druj are so afraid of"

She slapped Sir Jory on the back with a clang of mithril on bloodsteel, and the pair of them went off to report the destruction of another orc encampment.

Overview

In Semmerholm, the mustering of the fourth Dawnish army is almost complete. Almost every noble house in Dawn has provided stout yeomen, noble knights, and war witches to take up arms under the banners of Dawn. Valentin of House Orzel is the Senator for Weirwater who proposed the motion - assuming that he is able to provide the final wains of mithril required to complete equipment and deployment, the army will enter service during the Spring Equinox.

This season the senator for Weirwater is expected to confirm both the name of the army and the composition of its forces. Senator Valentin is under pressure from some noble houses to have the new army take up the banner of the Gryphon's Pride - the army lost in the Barrens in 276YE. Troubadours encouraged by House Lionsguard (among others) have spread the tale of the Gryphon's Pride's glory, and made much of the idea that the Barrens are Dawn's destiny. With the current situation in the Barrens it is clear that many Dawnish nobles will be watching to see what the Senator announces with interest.

The final mustering of the new army could not come at a more propitious time.

A well-publicised agreement with the Jotun orcs says that Dawn will keep its armies away from the conflict on the western border and instead fight the orcs hero-to-hero in glorious battle beyond the Sentinel Gate. At the same time, the indigenous orcs of the Barrens have launched a sneak attack against the Towers of the Dawn and the houses of Dawnguard. Dawnish blood has been spilled by these so-called "foreigners" and it will not stand!

This attack, along with the memories stirred by the talk of the Gryphon's Pride, has reignited ambitions to finally conquer the Barrens. The Druj have been driven back, and all that stands between Dawn and control of this large, exceptionally rich territory are a trio of aggressive barbarian armies. Within a year, they could be scattered and the Barrens conquered - and who could then deny the glory of Dawn?

Significance

Crusade

There is a strong undercurrent in the nation at the moment that it is time to take the Barrens. The Hounds of Glory, the Eastern Sky, and the Golden Sun will be more than a match for three armies of savage orcs, and when the new army joins the fray as well the orcs will finally be driven out of the Barrens once and for all. The mithril at the Fangs and the weirwood of the Eaves of Peytaht are valuable prizes, quite apart from the fact that the Barrens as a whole is rich - almost certainly rich enough that control of it would allow Dawn to raise and support a fifth army.

When promises were lost, a Gryphon's Pride would bear the cost

A lion leads, whilst cowards stayed behind

Into the jaws they ran, her golden armour in the van

And before the Golden Sun the Druj were blind

Though glorious was her art, merely mortal was her heart

And in the heat of day it gave its last

Whilst bravely they had fought, the Gryphon's Pride was all for nought

And the blood that spilled was Dawnish blood at last

If the Dawn national assembly calls for the conquest of the Barrens, the people will listen. A suitably worded statement of principle could name a Dawnish priest to support the armies. The priest would need to collect 50 doses of liao, to enable creation of auras of Courage, Pride, and Ambition, and this would mean that every military unit controlled by a Dawnish captain would gain a significant bonus to their fighting strength when engaged in fighting in the Barrens for the next season while supporting a Dawnish army or fortification. By contrast, any Dawnish military unit that chose to fight elsewhere would suffer a significant penalty to their effective fighting strength.

 - 3.1 Epilogue

It is likely that if the assembly makes this statement, the opportunity would exist to keep supporting the Dawnish conquest of the Barrens.

The Barrens orcs are still foreigners - so this statement would do nothing to make an attack against the orcs legal. However, the troubadours argue, it is not a crime for the knights and war-witches of Dawn to defend the Towers of Dawn ... and kill any and all orcs who attempt to take the fortification, and the manors of Dawnguard, away from them. In self-defence, of course.

The Shadow of Peytaht

At the moment the Hounds of Glory and the Eastern Sky are in Reikos. While they could easily reach Dawnguard this season, this would entail passing through either the vallorn infested depths of Brocéliande ... or through the Great Forest of Peytaht.

Stories claim that some dark force lives at the heart of Peytaht, where even the Druj feared to tread. Yet it is clearly possible to pass through - as the eastern barbarians proved when they brought their armies down into Reikos in the first place. Indeed, in the last months of the war in Holberg the Druj moved their armies through the forest again.

There is no doubt that passage through the forest is dangerous ... but it is the quickest way to reach the Barrens in the event that the Dawnish wish to launch their crusade ... or simply wish to defend their people in Dawnguard. While it is glorious and courageous to face the unknown, running in unprepared is unwise. There are certainly precautions that can be taken.

If the Dawn national assembly, or the virtue assembly of Courage or Wisdom, upholds a statement of principle that glorious warriors guided by courage and wisdom should not fear to face the dangers of the Forest of Peytaht, this would surely help mitigate the risks involved in moving through the forest. The statement would need to name a priest, and the priest would be responsible for collecting liao to support Imperial troops passing through the forest this season.

If 50 liao are collected, one army would receive significant protection from any dark forces in the forest of Peytaht, or two armies could be partially protected. Alternatively, if 100 liao are collected it would provide significant protection to both armies if they went north from Reikos into the Barrens.

Regardless, it is the obfuscated nature of the threat that makes Imperial forces so reticent to pass through the forest. A courageous army risking the wrath of Peytaht is one sure-fire way to find out whether there is actually any substance to that threat, or whether it is simply orcish superstition.

Thorny Questions of Legality

Currently, the Imperial Senate has declared the Barrens orcs to be foreigners. Yet that same senate refused to accept a peace treaty negotiated with the orcs. Now they are aggressively attacking the Dawnish people of Dawnguard.

It is entirely legal for the Dawnish people to defend themselves against the attack by the Barrens orcs; any number of captains can support the Towers of the Dawn without facing criminal charges. There is some grey area as regards the legality of moving Imperial troops into the Barrens to protect the people of Dawnguard - but again a case could surely be made for self-defence and duty to Imperial citizens.

However, if the Barrens orcs remain legally foreigners, attacking or conquering the Barrens would be a serious crime, not only for those generals who ordered their armies into battle, but for the captain of any military unit that assisted them. The constitution, however, supports the rights of the generals to give such orders to the troops under their control, however, in the expectation that those orders be carried out, regardless of the motions passed by the Senate.

In the words of the notoriously uncompromising General Artur deCoyne, "It's usually a lot easier to get permission for something once you've proved it can be done."

Resolution

The national assembly of Dawn raised and passed the following judgement: "The Dawnish National Assembly supports actions taken by Nobles and Military Units in Glorious Battle and Crusade in The Barrens. The National Assembly appoints Frederik Novarion to lead this and support the military units using liao." Frederick Novarion has provided 50 doses of liao to support the Crusade.

Military units supporting the Barrens crusade receive a bonus, while those not involved in fighting in the Barrens receive a penalty.

- Any Dawnish unit that supports the Golden Sun or defends Towers of the Dawn will receive the "Glorious Crusade" effect, which adds a bonus to their fighting strength.
- Any Dawnish unit that does not support the Golden Sun or defend Towers of the Dawn will receive the "Scorn of the Troubadours" effect, a penalty reflecting the scorn for those who disavow the conquest of the Barrens.

Epilogue

There is a heavily muted response to the siege of the Towers of the Dawn from the people of Dawn. At first, there is significant pride in the fact that so many Dawnish nobles marched into the Barrens with their retinues. With the Towers so close to defeat and the Barrens Orcs determined to take them at any cost it is clear that only the commitment of so many Dawnish to the Barrens has been sufficient to carry the day.

But the pride turns to dismay when folk realize that only one Dawnish army has been inspired to join the crusade. With the Hounds of Glory and the Eastern Sky boldly attacking in Spiral it seems clear that the Dawnish generals have accepted that this is the real priority. The presence of the Towerjacks in their stead - an army that should by right have been Dawnish in the minds of a few - does little to quell their concerns. By the time the fighting is underway, Dawnish men and women are already beginning to question the purpose of the crusade.

The hope that a glorious battle in the campaign might reaffirm the Dawnish support for the conquest of the Barrens vanishes once it becomes clear that the strategy has been to avoid direct engagement with the Barrens Orcs at all costs. The decisions to give ground while attempting to waylay them in ambush is strategically brilliant - that much is undeniable - but it does nothing to fire the blood.

By the time the campaigning season has drawn to an end, the troubadours who inspired the crusade have slowly abandoned it, in favour of seeking glory elsewhere.

Crystal Architect of the Spires

Overview

The Crystal Architect of the Spires is an Imperial Title appointed by the senators of Urizen, empowered to commission structures that produce valuable crystal mana. The title was created at the Spring Equinox summit of 379YE, and was one of the titles amended in Spring 380YE following the need to restrict the number of projects commissioned each season.

As of the end of the Autumn Equinox 381YE, the Crystal Architect has commissioned three sinecures: the Caves of the Claw in Morrow, and the Tower of the Fall and the Storm Vault in Zenith.

Responsibilities

The Crystal Architect is responsible for overseeing the creation of mana sinecures in Urizen. They can only authorise construction in Urizen territories, and they can only authorise the construction of structures that provide mana - not votes of any sort.

Powers

Commission construction of mana structures

Once per summit, the Crystal Architect can commission the construction of structures in Urizen that will produce crystal mana. The materials required for construction are provided by the Crystal Architect. Each such commission automatically creates a sinecure, one that is appointed by unanimous decision of the Urizen senators. Control of the sinecure is a lifetime title, unless it is revoked by the General Assembly, the Council of Nine or the Urizen Assembly.

To use this power, the Crystal Architect provides an announcement to the Civil Service, who present the decision to the Senate. No voting is possible by the Senate at this point, as the power has been delegated to the Crystal Architect. The Imperial Synod may, however, choose to exercise their veto over the Crystal Architect's decision.

When it was created, this power was unlimited. The Senate chose to amend the powers during the Spring Equinox 380YE as part of an administrative motion.

Because this is a national position, the title can only be held by a Urizen.

Appointment

The Crystal Architect of the Spires is appointed during the Spring Equinox each year. It is chosen by unanimous decision of the Urizen senators. If a unanimous decision cannot be reached, the title may be appointed by the Imperial Senate instead.

The title can be held by any Urizen citizen. They can be revoked by the General Assembly, the Urizen National Assembly, and by the Assembly of the Nine.

Crystal Clarity of the Rational Soul

Rules

Day Magnitude 8

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets a character, who must be present throughout.

This spell is an enchantment. A target may only be under one enchantment effect at a time.

Effects

At the conclusion of the ritual, the target is enchanted with an aura of calm and serenity. They experience a powerful roleplaying effect; they feel calm, collected and clear-headed. Although pressing matters have not lost their importance, they feel contemplative and focused on intellectual activity rather than physical action.

This aura replaces, but does not remove, any other roleplaying effect the target is experiencing. When the enchantment ends, any roleplaying effects that the character is experiencing resume, assuming they have not expired. Other effects of rituals or curses still apply; a character under the effect of Anathemic Call of Bug and Briar for example is still attacked by stinging insects - the Crystal Clarity of the Rational Soul simply removes the urge to scratch or react to the bugs. Likewise, a character haunted by a malign spirit does not stop being haunted - they simply have the focus and clarity to ignore the feelings of dread or fear the spirit causes.

The effect lasts until it is removed or until the next sunrise, whichever comes first.

Description

This ritual creates a powerful aura that dampens emotions and clears the mind. It suppresses other auras, even those created by priest ceremonies. The target becomes clear and collected for the duration, and is neither supported nor hindered by other similar enchantments or auras.

This ritual is viewed with suspicion by some priests. It can dampen the natural ambitions and exuberance of the human soul, and prevent targets from benefiting from auras created by hallow, anointing or consecration. In the eyes of these priests, this ritual is a curse and those who rely on it are weakening themselves and their fellows. Worse, some more extreme critics claim that the feelings of tranquility the enchantment creates are nothing less than a magical attempt to channel the corrosive spiritual power of Peace.

Individuals who are exposed to this effect for long periods of time find it increasingly difficult to bring themselves to take heroic action; they are detached from some essential element of their soul that allows them to perform incredible feats. They also feel it increasingly difficult to express strong emotion even when not under the effect of the aura; love, hate, anger, joy, happiness and sadness all become muted. These lingering effects fade over time, but some scholars of Day are concerned that over-reliance on this ritual can permanently damage the personality of the target.

The most common use for this effect is to allow someone who has come under dark influences to be able to endure until a more permanent solution may be found.

Common Elements

this ritual usually involves a period of meditation or symbolic cleansing, bells, chimes and soft music as well as reflective surfaces and crystals are often involved. The rune Cavul is usually painted or traced over the target.

Crystalline Focus of Aesh

Rules

Day Magnitude 20

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets a character, who must be present throughout. The target character must possess the Day Lore skill.

This spell is an enchantment. A target may only be under one enchantment effect at a time.

Effects

The target gains one effective rank of the Day lore skill for purposes of performing rituals, subject to the normal rules for effective skill.

They gain two effective ranks (total) to the appropriate ritual lore if they are contributing to the performance of any ritual that divines information. The ritual does not need to be part of Day lore, but the normal rules for effective skill still apply.

While the enchantment lasts the target experiences a roleplaying effect: You feel incredibly focused, able to bring all your faculties to bear on a single topic. Distractions become irritating, however, and it can often prove difficult for you to shift your focus to another subject or think about more than one thing at a time.

If the target is a merrow, the roleplaying effect is especially pronounced. A merrow may also choose to temporarily add to or increase physical trappings of their lineage. These changes are temporary and do not last more than a few hours after the enchantment ends.

The effect lasts until the start of the next Profound Decisions Empire event.

Additional Targets

This ritual can affect additional characters from the same coven. Each additional character increases the magnitude by 15. Additional characters must be present throughout, and must each place their hands into the same opaque container.

Divination Rituals

For purposes of the additional bonus, rituals currently in Imperial lore that are considered divination effects include: An Echo of Life Remains, Bright Lantern of Ophis, Clear Lens of the Eternal River, Dreams in the Witch House, Eye of the High Places, Eyes of the Sun and Moon, Hakima's Glass, Hand of the Maker, Shadowed Glass of Sung, Signs and Portents, Skein of Years, Ties that Bind, and Wisdom of the Balanced Blade.

Only rituals that directly provide information as their primary function are considered divination rituals. Rituals that gather information by communicating with an eternal (such as Swim Leviathan's Depth) are not considered divination effects. Likewise, a ritual whose effect is something other than providing information to the ritualists is not considered a divination ritual for purposes of Crystalline Focus of Aesh, even if its description talks about divination as the method employed. Spontaneous magic effects may gain the additional bonus; if in doubt consult a referee before performing them.

Description

This ritual creates a pact between the target and the eternal Kimus.

This potent enchantment strengthens the recipient's ability to wield Day magic.

While enchanted, the magician finds themselves strengthened - they are able to employ Day magic more effectively than normal. It may share a little power with a novice, or allow a master of Day lore to wield significant personal power. Those experiencing the enchantment find it easy to concentrate on a single task, applying their entire focus to the act of weaving magical energies. Some magicians using this enchantment speak of a greatly increased awareness of the flows of mana. Others report a form of synaesthesia, the act of performing Day magic being experienced as eerie colours, sounds, smells, and tastes.

The magician gains further prowess when working magic designed to divine information, and the enchantment provides its benefits regardless of the realm involved. While this allows a magician to perform more complex rituals than they might otherwise manage, it also provides them with additional strength to draw on should they need to penetrate a shroud of concealment or deception to gain the information they seek.

This ritual draws on the power of the eternal Kimus, and her well-known fascination with observing as many events as possible. According to some theoretical scholars, Kimus is automatically aware of any ritual performance that includes an individual bearing this enchantment - indeed some speculate that the eternal might be able to locate or perceive enchanted magicians more easily. A few paranoid scholars have suggested that the enchantment transforms every magician empowered into a metaphorical "eye" for Kimus - that the eternal can see experience whatever the bearer sees during the entire duration. There is absolutely no evidence to support this supposition, but that does not prevent (sometimes hysterical) conspiracy theories.

Kimus seems to have offered their power to several rituals currently lost to Imperial magicians. Scrolls at the Lyceum mention a more potent version of Crystalline Focus of Aesh called Mastery of the Unblinking Eye. The ritual allows a magician to further increase their ability to wield the lore of Day. According to some fragmentary notes, the ritual either requires or gains additional power from the inclusion of a specially formed sphere of tempest jade which becomes the focus for the magic. Such spheres are also mentioned as being a common form of boon offered by Kimus to empower ritual magicians. The crumbling parchment scrolls apparently formed part of the collection of magical papers donated by the Freeborn hakima of the line of Guerra and strongly imply that the founder of that tribe possessed a complete ritual text detailing this ritual.

Two other rituals are referenced in a partial tome held at the Halls of Magic, the journal of a second century stargazer named Mattia of Ankarien. In return for certain significant services performed for Kimus, she received access to something called The Book of Silver Leaves - a collection of ritual texts apparently collected in pre-Imperial times by a cabal of diviners and seers in a distant land dedicated to Kimus. The tome references two rituals that Mattia and her cabal apparently mastered, and used to great effect during the reign of Empress Brannan. The first is called Eternity in an Hour, which seems to combine elements of the Crystalline Focus with the effect of All the World in a Grain of Sand in that it grants a magician with the ability to focus completely on rote action and familiar magics. The enchantment allows the magician to greatly increasing their ability to perform rituals they have mastered at the expense of seriously curtailing their ability to contribute to any other ritual - even to one that is in Imperial lore. The other is referred to as Mirror of the Heavens, and apparently represents an even more profound connection to She Who Watches. While it does not provide much additional focus with magic beyond that granted by Crystalline Focus, it apparently greatly increases the ability of the one who bears the enchantment to perform divinations. There are few specifics in the text - which is believed to be a copy of an original tome kept at the Library of Ankarien. If the journal still exists, and should it contain any further information about these two rituals, it is most likely in the possession of the Grendel.

Common Elements

The ritual usually involves an invocation of the eternal Kimus, although different covens will phrase this invocation in different ways. As a ritual of the Day realm, and one that draws power from the Unblinking Eye, magicians may paint the symbol of an eye on the target, often on the forehead, as the ritual is performed. A blood magician will often use a little merrow blood to create this symbol. Spheres of crystal, glass, or tempest jade provide useful foci for the ritual, as do mirrors of polished silver or weltsilver - magicians of the League in particular favour using mirrors for this ritual, drawing on their well known hearth magic property for revealing the truth. Mystics, specially in Wintermark and Varushka tend prefer to eschew such showy props, and use a bowl of pure water as the focus, into which they will drop blood, ink, or candle wax and observe the shapes the substance forms on contact with the water.

The runes of discovery, revelation, Wisdom, and thought are all resonant with this ritual and often painted or traced as part of its performance. A theurge might evoke paragons and exemplars of Wisdom, but some such magicians prefer to call on inspirational figures associated with Vigilance or Ambition depending on the ends the additional power will be turned.

Crystaltender's Vestment

Description

These simple robes are sometimes reinforced with mithril, silver or golden threads, and are usually made from rainbow silk. They are relatively easy to create, but require painstaking attention to detail in preparing the embroidery that runs through them. While they were originally favoured by magicians who tend mana sites, they are increasingly popular with magicians who focus their magic on spellcasting rather than ritual magic. Although a piece of crystallised mana can be used to cast any spell, many magicians find this robe's power gives them more versatility.

By invoking the simple charms woven into the fabric of the vestment, a magician can unwind the magical essence inside a piece of crystallised mana. The resulting energy is channeled through the precious metal embroidered into the robe, and infuses the wearer, restoring their personal ability to perform incantations. Many users report a feeling of giddiness and some tingling during the process, but there has been no firm evidence that it is harmful in any way.

These robes are among the signature creations of the Witch Weavers of Dawn, particularly those who take up war magics later in their careers and need to make use of their ritual-focused resources. Since no obscure materials are needed, this pattern is often the first a witch weaver will learn, testing both their skill at embroidery and enchantment. Xun, the rune of transformation, is most commonly used along with its associated imagery of butterflies or winged serpents. Navarr Vates also make use of these robes, more often in the form of decorated leather garments, preferring to draw their magic from within than from a crystal that might be dropped or lost when needed.

Rules

- Form: Armour. Takes the form of a robe.
- Requirement: You must have the magician skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: Once per day you can consume a piece of crystal mana to restore three points of spent personal mana.
- Materials: Crafting a crystaltender's vestment requires no special resources. It takes two months to make one of these items.

"Addictive? My dear sir, such rumours are plainly base slander, put about by those less accomplished in the arcane arts. It simply is not possible to become addicted to mana, no matter how much magical power one absorbs. Really, I assure you, the late Arbiter Vortis did not explode because he absorbed too much mana! Clearly, he exploded because he forgot to carry forward a seven in his ritual calculations... I have said all I intend to say on the matter and I bid you a good morning."

The Leaping Hare (Redirected from Cunning Puissance of the Leaping Hare)

Rules

Summer Magnitude 4

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets a character, who must be present throughout.

This spell is an enchantment. A target may only be under one enchantment effect at a time.

Effects

The target may call STRIKEDOWN once per day with a pole-arm.

The effect lasts until the start of the next Profound Decisions Empire event.

Additional Targets

This ritual can affect additional characters from the same banner. Each additional character increases the magnitude by 3. Additional characters must be present throughout.

Description

This enchantment is among one of the best-known Summer rituals. Along with The Swan's Cruel Wing, The Hammer of Thunder and Strength of the Bull it provides a coven with the ability to select the right enchantment to enhance any band of warriors.

The ritual is usually referred to by its popular Marcher name. The swift movement of the hare, and the way it weaves back and forth underfoot, are an image associated for the quick and deft use of a bill to hook a target's legs out from under her. Some magicians use the name of their own favoured totem animal in the ritual - for example it is called The Dancing Fox by some Navarr, while several cabals of Dawnish war-witches call it Glittering Salmon Leap, and a few Urizen refer to it as the Charge of the Mountain Goat.

Common Elements

This ritual usually involves both the target and their pole-arm. A ritualist might trace matching runes on weapons and warrior, or might anoint them with a mixture of blood and oil. The target is often persuaded to perform a series of quick, deft maneuvers; sweeping, jabbing and hooking as the ritualist weaves magic over the warrior and the pole-arm. Legendary warriors, especially those who displayed cleverness or guile, are often invoked as are Paragons and Exemplars of warlike mien.

Any of the Summer runes might be evoked, but Jotra, the rune of battle, is the most common. An evocation of The Stallion or The Oak may be appropriate with this ritual, as are evocations of horses and unicorns.

Curator of the Printer's Guild Museum (Redirected from Curator of the Printer's Guild)

This is a placeholder page for content that PD are actively working on.

Overview

The position was established by a motion of the Imperial Senate during the Spring Equinox 379YE.

There were some concerns from the constitutional scholars about the way the sinecure involved was presented. Until those concerns are resolved, the title cannot be appointed.

History

The museum was constructed to provide a suitable venue to display the extensive collection of unique and historical artifacts gathered by the Printe'r Guild- a League guild that provides printing serves throughout the Empire and publishes the Pledge newspaper.

While construction on the museum was soon completed, there were some concerns from the constitutional scholars about the details of the associated sinecure, which would be resolved during the Autumn Equinox 379YE summit.

The Printer's Guild Museum of Wonders

Situated just off the western bank of the river Vassa, in the League city of Tassato Mestra, the home of the Printers Guild Museum of Wonders is an impressive building.

Hoardings covers the walls of surrounding streets, advertising the wondrous items of mystery to be found within the confines of this fabulous establishment. Street hawkers connive and convince to drive the crowds forwards. Resplendent dramaturgists in fanciful costumes of the foreign realms beckon the credulous public towards the entrance. Knifing through the crowds are bravos and sell-swords, keeping the peace with a light touch and stern gaze, allowing the adventurous souls from calm Regario to make their way to the Museum with a thrill of wonder, but none of Mestra's usual menace.

Fine white granite columns dominate the fascia of the Museum, with a grand staircase leading to the main entrance. In the hallway are inscriptions proclaiming the generosity of the Printers Guild, with busts of Silvio de Tassato, the main benefactor, and Jonah Yakovitch, the Prince of the Guild, staring down on the heaving masses.

There are five main collections, catalogued by Gancius of the Carta Notturmo. Objects of Historical Significance, Relics of the Precursor Nations, Treasures of the Eternal Realms, Curios from Foreign Lands and the Catalogue of Natural Wonders. Each is housed within its own area of the Museum, with its own experts and archivists tirelessly working to Gancius' scheme. The collections rotate on a frequent basis, to drive attendance, constantly staying fresh and new. One month a display of the secrets of the Night Eternals, the next a history of trade with the Commonwealth, then a display of the pilgrims of the Way. Each exhibition comes replete with new and exciting artefacts, unique events and fresh dramaturgical performances on the streets outside.

As the days draw to an end, the public exhibits close and private tours commence for the wealthy patrons of the Museum. This is a chance to get close to the wondrous items, to hold some of the less fragile and to connect with the history of the Empire.

A constant stream of scholars from other nations travel to the musuem. Away from the hustle and bustle of the main galleries, these learned souls reverentially research and cross reference, sharing their own knowledge with the curators, such that the truth of history can be discovered.

Coin flows through this endeavour at a prodigious rate. Tickets are brought, keepsakes and souvenirs sold to one and all. Food and drink for the weary traveller, all bring Throne after Throne through the door. Generous donations from patrons, rings thrown to street performers, all go into the upkeep of this fine institution. Just as quickly, the money is spent. As a prosperous endeavour it is not in the business of being a business, there is no long term profit sought, nor investors to placate. Acquisition of artefacts and relics, the employ of performers, guards and researchers, and the maintenance of the buildings and surrounding streets.

Powers

Point of Pilgrimage

The Printer's Guild Museum of Wonders is a sinecure overseen by the Curator who receives 6 liao and 12 votes in the Imperial Synod. These votes can be used in any and all appropriate assemblies for which the Curator is eligible.

Appointment

The Cardinal of Prosperity appoints the Curator of the Printer's Guild Museum. As an Imperial title, it may be held by any Imperial citizen.

While the assumption with most sinecures is that the Curator hold the position until they die or step down, the Curator is appointed by a Cardinal. As such, when a new Cardinal of Prosperity is appointed they may choose to name a replacement. The Curator can be revoked by a lesser majority of either the General Assembly, or the Prosperity virtue assembly.

Curator of the White City Museum

Overview

This title was established by the Imperial Senate during the Summer Solstice 378YE. The White City Museum was completed shortly before the Spring Equinox 379YE.

Responsibilities

The Curator of the White City Museum is responsible for maintaining the museum itself, and for acquiring new exhibits. Indeed, the intention was that the Curator acquire antiquities from across the Empire, establishing the White City Museum as a site of Imperial, rather than only Highborn, pride.

In addition, if anything were to threaten the good operation of the museum, it would be the responsibility of the Curator to address those problems.

Powers

The Curator is an Imperial title in Highguard. It grants custodianship of a sinecure.

Point of Pilgrimage

The Curator receives 7 liao and 14 votes in the Imperial Synod. These votes can be used in any and all appropriate assemblies.

Selection

The Curator is appointed by judgement of the Highborn national assembly.

This is a national title and can only be held by a Highborn citizen.

Removal

As with most sinecures, the assumption is that they hold the position until they die, step down or are revoked.

The Curator can be revoked by a lesser majority of either the General Assembly, or the Highguard national assembly.

History

The museum was established following the destruction of the Tabernacle Museum of Antiquities by the Druj, and many of the original parts of the collection were items recovered from the ruins by heroic Imperial action.

Currency

Imperial Coins

Imperial coins are minted at the Imperial Mint in Tassato. Coins are made of steel, rather than precious metal. Since the reign of Emperor Giovanni the Empire has operated a fiat currency with the value of all Imperial coins derived solely from their backing by Imperial law.

The coins are denominated as 1 Ring, 5 Rings, 1 Crown, 4 Crowns, 1 Throne, 5 Thrones, 20 Thrones and 100 Thrones.

There are 20 Rings to a Crown and 8 Crowns to a Throne.

A ring generally represents a suitable payment for a minor task, or the cost of an item such as a simple meal or a bottle of wine or beer. Citizens who deal mostly in rings tend to be towards the bottom of the economic pile.

A crown is a more significant expenditure; a fine meal or a bottle of wine from a prestigious vinyard might cost a crown. Citizens who deal mostly in crowns tend to be wealthy - they are often business owners, or run a prosperous farm.

A throne is a serious expenditure; the movers and shakers of the Empire deal in Thrones for preference. The Imperial Senate particularly deals in Thrones. Anyone making transactions in Thrones is considered to be among the richest people in the Empire.

Historical Coins

Prior to the foundation of the Empire, each nation used their own coinage, generally stamped from precious metals. Each nation had their own exchange rates based on the perceived value of the individual coins - although some coinage was stronger than others. The Freeborn silver moon for example was recognized by most of the nations that eventually became the Empire; likewise the Navarr copper thorn tended to be accepted wherever the early trods extended.

All these various currencies created a problem when the Empire was founded. The exemplar Avigliana di Sarvos convinced both the Throne and the Imperial Senate to pursue the idea of a unified currency. As a result, during the time of Emperor Giovanni the Empire spent six months negotiating with various representatives of the nations to introduce a representative currency based on stores of gold and silver. After Giovanni's death even this was abandoned in favour of the current fiat currency approach.

The design of the new coins was heavily influenced by the Imperial Synod. Many historical coins, especially the gold and silver runemarks used in much of Wintermark, were marked with runes such as Fesh and Pallas. The Synod successfully argued that such symbols were inappropriate, and the final design for the rings, crowns and thrones reflects this. Some priests, especially those of the assemblies of Pride and Prosperity see this as a great success by the early synod - every citizen of the Empire is reminded of the virtues every time they engage in even the simplest transaction.

Historical coins have no value within the Empire as currency, although they still occasionally turn up in treasure troves, ruins, and archaeological explorations. When they are recovered, they can sometimes be sold to collectors or museums (both Imperial and otherwise). If their silver or gold content is high, they might be sold to the Civil Service for imperial currency in the same way as hacksilver.

Elsbet Giella di Sarvos.

My dearest Elsbet, I must write with haste, for G. is even now preparing to present A's plan to the Freeborn and Marcher negotiators. We have the agreement of the mountains and the Northerners already, but these two are critical, otherwise the agonizing delays of the last six months will all have been for nothing. Everything hangs in the balance, but I am certain he will do it. I implore you to buy all the silver you can afford with all possible speed as soon as this winged messenger reaches you.

Foreign and Barbarian Currencies

All Imperial services and functions are handled in imperial coins - foreign and barbarian coins are not legal tender within the Empire. Foreign visitors know this, and rarely bother to bring their own currencies with them - preferring instead wherever possible to draw on caches of Imperial money built up through trade.

Hacksilver

In some cases, however, the Imperial civil service will exchange foreign or barbarian coins for Imperial coinage of similar value. However, they tend to do so based on the precious metal content of the alien currency. The most obvious example of this is hacksilver - the coinage of the barbarian orcs that surround the Empire. Their misshapen coins are worthless in the Empire, but tend to have a high silver content. The civil service purchases hacksilver and pays an amount based on the total weight and silver purity of the hacksilver.

OOO Note on Foreign Coinage

While nations such as Faraden and the Iron Confederacy use their own unique coins, Profound Decisions does not produce these coins and they have no value in the Empire. Foreign nations know the Empire's dislike for using non-Imperial coins and will generally use rings, crowns and thrones for all transactions within the Empire.

Bourse Certificates

The civil servants of the Imperial Bourse maintain stocks of the three valuable materials mithril, weirwood and white granite. Measured in wains, it is impractical to move these materials around too much or bring them to Anvil. Instead, the Bourse issues certificates that represent ownership of a wain of material. These are similar to bearer bonds - whoever has the bond can use it to collect a wain of the appropriate material from the Bourse.

Bourse certificates exist both to facilitate trade and construction within the Empire, and with foreign nations. These documents are carefully made to defy forgery; as such, they are accepted at face value not only throughout the Empire but by civilised foreign nations. An Asavean merchant or Jarmish magician-prince knows that their representatives can visit the Empire and claim mithril, weirwood or white granite in return for a Bourse certificate. Likewise, an Axou trader could arrange a deal with an Imperial citizen where they deposit some weirwood at Crown's Quay, receive a Bourse certificate, and transfer ownership to their contact simply and effectively.

Two attempts by the Senate to instruct the civil service to refuse to honour a cache of Bourse Certificates, (one presented by the Sumaah, another by the Grendel) have both been struck down as unconstitutional citing the Bourse "shall be free of all interference of the Senate".

Barter

Barter is often considered a little gauche, but is also extremely common between Imperial citizens. Ingots and measures of the various valuable materials, as well as the extremely valuable ilium, are weighed and valued by neutral Imperial assayers and have a standardized weight and purity - and thus value. The same is true of liao and herbs such as True Vervain - doses are prepared to a standardised purity and volume. This makes it much easier for Imperial citizens to exchange, sell, or buy these materials than for people in other nations; an Imperial trader knows that a certain amount of orichalcum will certainly be pure enough for the purpose they intend it for.
