Great Mine of Briante

Overview

The Great Mine of Briante is located in Briante in the Freeborn territory of Kahraman. Custodianship of the Great Mine grants an Imperial title; a seat on the Imperial Bourse; and a seasonal bounty of valuable mithril.

The Resource

In the Freeborn territory of Kahraman, in the Serra Briante, lies the great mine that shares its name with the region and the town that surrounds it. Perhaps the deepest mine in the Empire, it has been dug deeper and deeper over the centuries to excavate the precious mithril that is found far beneath the surface.

The bulk of the mithril mined in Briante lies deep underground, but advances in Imperial mining techniques mean that the miners can reach it no matter how far from the surface it lies. The Mine takes the form of a great shaft, cut almost vertically into the ground, on the walls of which can be seen dozens of workers. The Freeborn stonemasons pride themselves on their courage and skill, scoffing at the use of safety-ropes or nets and preferring to free-climb, seemingly completely oblivious to the fatal nature of any slip or fall. In recent decades their numbers have been swelled by a surprising influx of League workers from fallen Holberg, and a great deal of friendly rivalry exists between their bands. Tunnels riddle the rock beneath the Briante valley, pursuing the rich seams of metal ore as they extend from the central shaft. Some of these passages make use of cunning pumps that ensure the workers have breathable air no matter how far the tunnels might stretch beneath the surface.

The town of Briante itself is notable for its peculiar structure. Initially a mining village built on the edge of the workings that would later become the Great Mine, the settlement has spread around the outside of the deep shaft that forms the heart of the industry. With traditional Freeborn disregard for danger, the inhabitants have strung rope bridges across the shaft to connect parts of the town, arguing that "nobody in their right mind would walk all the way round the edge when they can just go across the middle". More than a few buildings actually lean precariously over the edge of the shaft itself! The majority of these structures are those that house the great cranes and lifts used to get miners and ore alike between the surface and the depths of the shaft; however, some civilian structures also poke out over the abyssal depths, built on wooden balconies and walkways by a populace with a great deal of experience of supporting heavy loads. The bridges and teetering structures are a regular source of conflict with the mine overseers, who complain that they endanger the operation of the great ore cranes used to pull mithril ore (and other valuables) from the lower tunnels - or present a potentially fatal hazard to anyone working below them.

There is some archaeological evidence that the Imperial (and pre-Imperial Freeborn) excavations here are nothing new. The remains of mine workings stretching back at least to the Terunael period, and in some cases much further than that, have been found along the walls of the valley. Indeed, some scholars who have explored the area around the mine claim to have evidence that the entire Briante valley was originally formed by a great open-cast mine intended to get at the most accessible mithril, abandoned centuries before the Terunael first settled the mountains south of Liathaven. They are largely dismissed as crackpots, however, and seem unable to muster up anything conclusive beyond wild speculation.

The Bourse Seat

Responsibilities

The Seat has no particular responsibilities; they simply receive a bounty of mithril which is theirs to do with as they will. If the Great Mine of Briante were to be threatened in any way, it would be the responsibility of the Seat to deal with those threats. Likewise, if any particular opportunity were to arise related to the Great Mine of Briante, the Seat would expect to be consulted as to how that opportunity might be resolved.

Custodianship of the Great Mine of Briante comes with a seat on the Imperial Bourse. For the most part, this Seat comes with no additional responsibilities. It is an Imperial title that grants the right to participate on the rare occasion when the Imperial Bourse as a body is required to make a decision.

Bounty of mithril

The Seat has control of a source of mithril and receives Bourse certificates to represent that control. They can dispense this resource as they choose. Production is 22 Imperial wains of mithril every season.

Appointment

As with all mithril Bourse seats, the holder of the title is determined during the Autumn Equinox. As an Imperial seat, any Imperial citizen may participate in the auction and hold the title. Votes are recorded in private in conjunction with the civil servants who support the Bourse.

Custodianship of the Great Mine of Briante is retained for a year, or until the citizen holding the seat dies, or steps down. An Imperial Bourse seat cannot be revoked by the Imperial Synod.

Great Pits of Ennerlund

Overview

The Great Pits of Ennerlund are located in Ennerlund in the League territory of Holberg. Custodianship of the Great Pits grants an Imperial title; a seat on the Imperial Bourse; and a seasonal bounty of valuable mithril.

The Resource

The Great Pits of Ennerlund were rightly famous for the impressive application of ingenious League engineering. Dug dangerously close to the bounds of the Morass the mithril mine was kept dry by mechanised pumps. The pits were lost when Holberg was overrun and the mine - and its bounty of mithril - served the Druj instead. When the Empire began its triumphant liberation of Holberg, the barbarian orcs destroyed the pumps and collapsed the pits during the Winter Solstice 378YE. This act of vandalism was slightly overshadowed by the atrocity that accompanied it - when the pits were finally liberated, it became clear that the Druj had herded hundreds of enslaved miners into the tunnels and collapsed the tunnels on top of them.

Extensive work was required to restore the pits to working order - not only clearing the collapsed tunnels (and extracting the bodies of the dead) but also replacing the pumps without which the lower levels have already been submerged. The Imperial Senate passed a motion to repair the Pits but did not fund it; instead Bridget Eastville of the Marches, the Senator for Mitwold provided the 250 Thrones required to complete the project. Rumours at the time suggested this money came as part of a loan from the Marches, one that the Senate was later called upon to repay.

Work restoring the Great Pits began in late Spring 379YE ... and almost immediately halted. The Druj destruction of the Great Pits had been a calculated act, and one with a tragic and horrific consequence. Following dozens of reports of the unquiet dead haunting the pits, the Dawnish priest Ozren de Orzel of Dawn was dispatched by the Imperial Synod to exorcise the cleansing of the haunting spirits from the mines as work could not continue until the ghosts were laid to rest.

With the ghosts dealt with, it still took several seasons to restore the pits to working order. Even after the pits had been reopened, problems continue. The slow spread of The Morass has left the lower levels prone to serious flooding - significantly increasing the upkeep cost of the mine.

Great work

Overview

A great work is any major economic investment which is sufficiently large in scope that it provides a benefit to the inhabitants of an entire territory. The return can take the form of money, herbs, materials for crafting items or mana crystals.

Great works do not normally result in the creation of an Imperial title, as most great works do not require an Imperial citizen be appointed to oversee them. The Senate may choose to create a custodian for a great work - an Imperial title with responsibility to look after the great work.

Senate Commissions

The Imperial Senate may pass a motion for the construction of infrastructure capable of improving the wealth generated by resources in a territory.

It is also possible for the Senate to pass a motion to upgrade a great work, increasing the benefits that it provides.

Benefits

Each great work is linked to a specific type of personal resource in a specific territory. Every member of that nation who attended the last event and who owns the appropriate personal resource in the territory gains the benefit.

The size and effectiveness of the great work sets the total size of the benefit that accrues to everyone in the territory - this benefit is divided equally between the affected players of that nation each season (in the setting there are wide reaching benefits to other NPCs but these are ignored when calculating returns for play balance reasons).

The type of benefits gained are determined by the nature of the great work, not the resource it applies to. For example, the Madruga Shipyard provides a benefit of money to all Freeborn fleets in Madruga.

Costs

- Materials: Variable (minimum 40 wains)
- Time: 3 months to construct per 50 wains of materials used
- Labour: 2 crowns per wain
- Upkeep: None

The more resources are devoted to constructing a great work, the greater the return. Under normal circumstances, the material required will be the one associated with upgrading an equivalent personal resource. For example, at least 40 wains of mithril is required to create a great work that produces mana crystals.

Wains Money Ingots Herbs Mana Crystals

56	1080 rings	60	90	45
80	1300 rings	72	108	54
100	1440 rings	80	120	60
160	1800 rings	100	150	75
280	2340 rings	130	195	97

In addition to the wains required, it costs 2 crowns per wain to pay for labour and skills to complete the construction.

 - 2.2 Costs
- 3 Limitations
- 4 Responsibility
- 5 Multiple Great Works
- 6 Recent Great Works
 - 6.1 Previous Great Works

The table shows some standard costs and benefits for a range of great works. For example a great work created by the Senate using 56 wains of mithril could produce 40 mana crystals each season. There is no upper limit on how many wains can be used to construct a great work; provided at least 40 wains are used, then any amount can be spent to build it.

Limitations

It is not possible to create a great work which boosts the production of military units. If the Senate wishes to spend significant sums to increase the military effectiveness of the Empire then they must do it by raising armies or constructing fortifications.

It is not possible to create a great work which creates ilium, liao, mithril, weirwood, or white granite.

Great works are not affected by rituals that target personal resources. A ritual that increases the production of a green iron mine will not affect a great work that provides green iron nor one that benefits green iron mines.

Only members of a nation may benefit from a great work - a vast series of forges throughout Hahnmark might provide a bonus to all Wintermark mines based in the territory - but Wintermark characters dwelling in other territories - and characters from other nations would not benefit from the great work.

Responsibility

The Senator for a territory is expected to be responsible for any problems that might beset the structures represented by a great work. For example, if Grendel corsairs are raiding the Madruga shipyards, then the Empire will expect the Madruga senator to deal with the problem.

Multiple Great Works

The Senate may commission a great work be upgraded - or create a second great work in a territory that is intended to benefit the same personal resource. For instance the Senate could authorize the creation of a vast rope works in Siroc in Madruga that would provide an income in crowns to all fleets based in the territory.

Because the new great work would benefit fleets in the Madruga, the same as the existing great work, the Madruga shipyard does, the effectiveness would be reduced. In effect the total benefit would then correspond to the total amount of wains spent constructing great works that benefit fleets in Madruga. The civil service can provide estimates on the total benefit that will accrue from the completion of a great work in a territory. These estimates are only valid for the current state of the territory.

A second great work in a territory that benefited owners with different personal resources would provide the full effect listed.

Previous Great Works

- The Atalya Shipyards in Madrugá was a specific type of great work, a shipyard. Before its destruction by the Grendel in 381YE it granted additional wealth to Freeborn fleets as well as having additional powers related to the construction and maintenance of Imperial navies.

Green and pleasant lands

The orc group observed with interest as Fallanvel tried again.

"Yes, they are orcs. Yes, they are out the Barrens. But your Senate has just declared them to be foreigners rather than barbarians, which means that they are protected by the law and able to come and go as they please. Even if they weren't, then they would still be protected under the protection of delegation laws ..."

The herald waved the piece of paper in his left hand again. It was covered in miniscule scrawl, too small for a human eye to make out.

"And even if that were not true, they would still have this invitation from the Wintermark fellow, Jorma Steelhail, who is-or-was an actual senator."

He waved the piece of paper in his right hand - a slightly tattered piece of parchment that had clearly been folded and unfolded many times and handled more than was good for it.

"And on top of all that, my Lord Guardian of the Southern Skies, Keeper of the Gates of Wisdom, Eater-of-Silence, Speaker in Dreams and Conscience-of-Kings was specifically asked to arrange a delegation from the independent orcs of the lands you call the Barrens to come to Anvil and negotiate with the Imperial Senate. It's all very straightforward!"

Fallanvel cocked his head. The Navarr women continued to stare at him impassively. The little feathers on the herald's neck and shoulder continued to stand on end - he knew there were more Navarr in the woods but had no idea how many. He fervently hoped this was not all about to turn into arrows and spears.

Both women were unreadable - the armoured brand had barely acknowledged his presence and had said not one word to him. He found silent people deeply, deeply unnerving.

As her companion - a vate if the herald was any judge - finally opened her mouth to say something, one of the orcs behind Fallanvel suddenly raised their voice.

"What is the delay, herald? Are we to pass through this forest or are we not?"

The orc delegation was - perhaps unconsciously - split into two groups, for all that they were stood quite close together. The armoured orc that spoke was the younger of the two leaders - brash and prone to outbursts. The other leader, an older orc with the marks of a shaman, spoke softly.

"Patience, child of the Black Wind. We are travelling in their territory, it is right that they are suspicious. I would be suspicious too if they came to the Great Forest and demanded to speak with the elders of my clan. The human senate will still be there even if we are delayed an hour or so, and we achieve nothing if we cannot prove good intent."

There was muttering from both factions. Their human companion spoke in an undertone, and the two leaders turned to converse privately with the briar.

The Navarr vate shut her mouth. The brand raised an eyebrow. Fallanvel began patiently explaining the situation again.

"These orcs are from the barrens ... they wish your assistance to travel to Anvil. They are invited ..."

Overview

In distant Brocéliande, in the Boar's Dell, a band of orcs has emerged without warning from the Barrens. They have come under a flag of truce, and claim to represent the two great clans of the independent orc nation to the east of the Empire. A combination of factors have encouraged them to send envoys to Anvil - the main one apparently being the decision taken by the Imperial Senate at the Spring Equinox to recognise their tribes as having the status of foreigners, rather than barbarians.

They are not a united force - the delegation is lead by a shaman of the Great Forest clan, and a warrior of the Black Wind clan and there appear to be some internal tensions. They are accompanied also by a human with strong briar lineage who appears to be either a Navarr or one of the mysterious denizens of Dourfell Keep.

This is believed to be the first time the people of the Empire have had any peaceful contact with the orcs of the Barrens. Reports claim that they threw off the oppressive chains of the Druj over Winter 377YE. Information about what they want - if anything - is in short supply.

Significance

Initially led into Greenstead by a herald of Lashonar, they have been entrusted to the guidance of the Navarr. After much discussion, several members of the Splitroot Striding have agreed to escort them to Anvil. Using the trods, it is expected that they will arrive some time on Saturday afternoon. As they are escorted by Navarr, it is likely the Navarr will be the first people to hear when the delegation gets close.

It is worth noticing that they are not here under the auspices of the law of delegation protection - the Imperial senate has formally recognised them as foreigners rather than barbarians. They are protected by the law and expected to abide by it in the same way as any Asavean, Faraden, or indeed any Imperial citizens.

Resolution

The delegation from the Barrens came to Anvil and negotiated a treaty which was discussed in the Senate. The independent orcs returned safely to the Barrens.

Greensteel Bracelets

Description

Occasionally known as a Squire's Reward in Dawn, these items normally take the form of either a sturdy bracer crafted from an alloy of green iron, or occasionally a pectoral of the same material. They are usually decorated with simple orichalcum inlays. Powerful noble houses in Dawn keep a set of these bracelets on hand at tournaments, calling them Tourney Trinkets, and lend them to those who wish to participate in martial contests but lack training. On several occasions, such participants have won the day and been rewarded with the bracelets as their prize.

In Highguard, there is a quiet trade in these bracelets as gifts for more timid youngsters when they are sent off to do their military service. Those who struggled with martial skills during their childhood occasionally find worried relatives slipping them this talisman. It is sometimes considered a little shameful to be found relying on such items, but sensible soldiers know that an actual, physical shield is a better protection on the battlefield than the Virtue of Courage alone.

Rules

- Form: Talisman. Takes the form of a jewellery. You must be wearing this item to use its magical properties.
- Requirement: Any character can bond to this item.
- Effect: You gain the shield skill.
- Materials: Crafting a set of Greensteel Bracelets requires nine ingots of green iron and three ingots of orichalcum. It takes one month to make one of these items.

"Our striding has walked the Trods since the Third Leaving. We do not all have time to become brands, nor is that all our calling. Yet we must travel the dark places in the Forests-Once-Ours, and watch them lest the Vallorn spread to threaten the civilisation we have mapped in barbarian blood. I have ambergelt, taken from the living trees that are our treasury. I need green iron, and orichalcum, so that I can shield my people, so that we can shield the Empire."

The broker stood square on to the merchant's desk, more at home here than others of his nation, yet still a reminder that not all of Empire were city-folk. The merchant considered her answer carefully; she had underestimated a broker once before and would not do so again.

"Ambergelt?" she said. "Obviously I'm interested, but I'm also interested to see what the Varushkans have to offer. As to green iron and orichalcum ... the Freeborn, and the Marchers alike have paid me good steel in the past for both - my guild could mine so much the deeper with the thrones these metals would earn at Anvil!"

The Navarr inclined his head in agreement.

"Still, I have ambergelt and I need green iron and orichalcum. I am here now. Are you interested?"

The merchant tried a different tack.

"As a matter of interest, what is it that your striding needs with these metals? I ask only because there have been a few incidents recently."

Two weeks ago his neighbour had been dragged before the magistrates. Some opportunist had been making Scorpion's Sting daggers, and there had been numerous fatalities. The source of the materials used had been traced, and the merchant involved fined quite steeply. She did not think the Navarr were likely to be making anything illegal, but it was worth checking.

"The artisans in my striding will use them to make Greensteel Bracelets. We are due to travel from here through dangerous territory, and every shield will help my people in their journey. Why do you ask?"

The merchant kept her face straight, but she scented opportunity. She negotiated carefully, and half an hour later they shook hands and the broker departed. The merchant scattered a little more sand on her contract, blew on it, and finally allowed herself a satisfied smile. Enough metal for three Greensteel Bracelets, two for the Navarr striding and one for her. She knew that the Earl of Royston intended to make a play for the senator's seat in Weirwater next time the nations gathered at Anvil. The gift of a Greensteel Bracelet would put her in the earl's good graces. From there it should be an easy step to encourage him to vote in support of the League's trade proposals, and they would all profit.

"Do you think he knew?" Asked her clerk, suddenly, from his desk near the door. The merchant considered for a moment.

"Possibly. But what does it matter? The broker will remember me next time he passes through and come to me first, the earl gets a useful trinket to help pad out his line for their tourney, and I get the ear of the next senator for Weirwater, at least for a time. Nobody loses, least of all the Navarr."

Smiling, she locked the contract in her desk drawer, and returned to work.

Greensteel Orb

Description

Greensteel orbs are usually created in the form of a metal orb inlaid with tempest jade and bound with greensteel bands. They are often engraved across their surface with interlocking lines reminiscent of mazes, nets or even spider's webs; or inscribed with runes. They are rarely composed of stone, wood or bone although ceramic or glass versions are not unknown - natural materials rarely make good greensteel orbs. The orb is infused with potent enchantments and attuned to the realm of Autumn. A coven can use it to draw on the power contained in ingots of green iron and align it with their own magic, allowing them to reduce or in some cases replace the need for crystal mana when performing Autumn rituals.

While this item is usually made in the form of a 'covenstone' wielded by one of the magicians in a ritual, this is not the only shape appropriate to this item. Some covens possess metal bowls or chalices, while others prefer massive chains of iron and greensteel links, sometimes worn by one of the ritualists, sometimes passed from hand to hand during the ritual. These items are usually regular, but they invariably look like made, rather than natural, things. Regardless of the precise form it takes, a coven that uses it is careful to ensure that it plays a central role in their ceremonies - in addition to its ceremonial use it is a symbol of the oath that binds them together.

Rules

- Form: Paraphernalia. Takes the form of a piece of ritual paraphernalia. The item must be present in the ritual to use its magical properties.
- Effect: Members of the coven who are performing a Autumn ritual they have mastered may use green iron in place of crystal mana. Every two measures of green iron spent count as one crystal mana.
- Materials: Crafting a greensteel orb requires seven ingots of tempest jade, four ingots of green iron and three measures of dragonbone. It takes one month to make one of these items.

Grendel

Overview

The Grendel are orcs who hail from Attar and the Broken Shore - lands to the south and east of the Bay of Catazar. A nation of sea-faring orcs with a love for wealth and power, they were once nothing but pirates and reavers. Over time their society has advanced to the point where they are as likely to trade as to steal what they want. Despite their riches and the luxurious lifestyle of their leaders - the Salt Lords - the Grendel are brutal, uncompromising bullies who use violence and threats of violence to get what they want. Their comparative distance from the Empire means that its citizens know relatively little about their society.

Much of the current information about Grendel society comes from Angelo i Ceniza, a Freeborn civil servant who spent several months in late 378YE as a captive guest of the Salt Lord Suriad of Dubhtraig.

The Tribe

The Grendel dominate the lands to the south and south-east of the Empire. Historically, they have threatened territories across the Bay of Catazar: Sarvos, Highguard, Urizen, and the Brass Coast. Before the birth of the Empire, the ancestors of the Grendel controlled much of the land that is now part of these nations, but were driven out by human settlers.

At the top of Grendel society are the Salt Lords - their great wealth seems to derive from their position of power, although they claim it is the other way around. The Salt Lords control the trade into and out of the Broken Shore and their ships have been seen in most foreign ports across the world - at least those that will deign to accept orcs. Beneath the Salt Lords are the Sea Lords - the commanders of the Salt Lords warships - together they form a council which rules the Broken Shore with an iron fist.

Grendel culture is inextricably linked with the sea, and all their most important settlements are large bustling ports. Their position of power and wealth in the Broken Shore comes in part from the trade that their fleets carry out across the world. The Grendel raise no armies of their own, preferring to hire mercenaries from the interior of the Broken Shore. Although they have long since outgrown their piratical roots, ownership of their own vessel is still a powerful dream for most young Grendel.

The Grendel are undoubtedly the richest of the barbarian orc nations that face the Empire; the Salt Lords have wealth that would rival that of any League Merchant Prince or Freeborn family. More so perhaps than any other Barbarian nation the Grendel have an abundance of finely crafted items and artisans are always in great demand. However the wealth of the nation does not run deep, most Grendel are born into desperate poverty and destined to remain that way all their life. In Grendel society the victor is the one who takes the spoils.

Slavery is endemic in Grendel lands, and is the natural endpoint for those who do not make the right choices in life. There are hundreds of thousands of slaves in Grendel lands; the lucky ones work as servants in the villas of wealthy Grendel captains or Salt Lords, while the threat of a short, brutal existence in the salt mines is ever present for those that attempt to rebel or escape. Those that show promise can find themselves fighting for their lives in the gladiatorial arena. Regardless of their position, the slaves of the Grendel are never allowed to forget that they are possessions - objects, rather than people.

5 things to know about the Grendel

- Masters of the sea - the Empire has fleets - the Grendel have navies and it has already sunk one Imperial flotilla
- Smarter than you - the Grendel spend time, money and effort on being as well informed as possible
- Masters of the deal - Grendel are fiercely competitive, driven to get the best from every negotiation no matter how small
- Richer than you - they pride themselves on their wealth and affluence
- Masters of the game - the Grendel are cunning and savvy, they seek to understand their rivals so that they can outwit them

What the Grendel are not

- Pirates The Grendel will resort to reaving if it benefits them - but their nation has long since decided that trade and conquest offer a better route to riches than piracy.
- Civilized The Grendel are rich, smart and enjoy the trappings of civilization. But in reality their culture is like a society run by a bunch of drug cartels.

Warriors of the Grendel

The bulk of most Grendel armies are bands of mercenaries hired from the many orc tribes that dwell inland on the Broken Shore. From the Imperial perspective there is little to distinguish these forces from the countless minor tribes that are incorporated into the armies of the Thule, Druj or the Jotun. Most own little more than a sword and a breastplate usually worn over a plain tunic or similar. In battle they form up and fight in mobs along tribal divisions. What does make them distinct is the command and leadership of the Grendel commanders - there is none of the brutal savagery of the Druj, nor the caution of the Thule. Grendel commanders are bold risk-takers but they pride themselves on their discipline - soldiers that cannot obey orders face summary punishment.

The elite troops in the Grendel's arsenal are the professional soldiers, hired from the moridun. Each moridun appears to be some kind of independent mercenary fellowship - operating from a fortress somewhere in the Broken Shore where they recruit, equip, and train Grendel soldiers. Each moridun has its own symbols and imagery and each jealously guards its own traditions and unique fighting style. Commanders will almost always deploy Grendel soldiers from a moridun where they have them available - but such troops are at most effective when engaged in pursuit of the military objectives that that moridun specializes in.

Magic

The Grendel seem to view the use of ritual magic as a profoundly economic activity. The most powerful magician among the Grendel holds the rank of Wind Lord and sits in the Grendel High Council with the Salt Lords. While the Grendel might use the power of ritual magic to realise their goals, they would only do so if they couldn't achieve the same end more cheaply using mundane means. The Grendel hoard wealth and they expend their magical reserves carefully, seeking the maximum return on their investment.

The Grendel do not use the same magical terminology as the Empire. Angelo reports that their most important realm is the Sky - from which information and enlightenment flows - and that they also prize the uncontrollable Sea - the source of wild storms and violent winds, the fountain of life. The Realm of Sand is valued for its many economic benefits - sand is mutable and workable, ordered and measured though it can shift suddenly beneath you. The other realms are largely disdained by the Grendel.

Spellcasting on the battlefield is seen as an important auxiliary role, a way to round out the fighting strength of a unit. Magicians embed themselves within the best units to provide magical healing or offensive abilities depending on their capabilities. Unlike the Thule, the Grendel do not field battle magicians by themselves, as such individuals are seen as too expensive to risk in such a way. Battlefield magicians, especially members of the Grendel tribe, will often carry magical items designed to protect them and boost their strength.

History

Centuries ago, the ancestors of the modern Grendel laboured under the rule of a powerful orc tribe that dominated the Bay of Catazar, but that tribe was cast down by the rise of the Empire. After gaining their freedom, they survived, then prospered, by preying on fleets that passed through the Bay.

Raiding came to a head in the reign of Emperor Barabbas who created three large navies intent on destroying the Grendel and claiming the island of Attar, the largest landmass in the Broken Shore. Facing a significant Imperial threat, the rival Salt Lords came together to oppose a common enemy. The Grendel never cease their rivalry, but they know that in most times there is more to be gained from working together than apart.

Over time, the Grendel nation has expanded to the point that they now lay claim to swathes of land to the south of Urizen and Highguard. Historically, their activities have been kept in check by the activities of the Freeborn corsairs, but the balance of power appears to be slowly shifting in favour of the Grendel, especially in the southern bay...

Grendel look and feel

Overview

The Grendel prize discipline and order in battle. Most Grendel who take the field are professional soldiers, career professionals who are well trained and well paid, they expect to be given orders and to follow them closely. The ideal of fidelity is drummed into Grendel soldiers - that martial strength is accomplished by working together, by showing loyalty to those you serve, those you fight alongside and those who fight for you.

Most Grendel prefer to remain onboard their ships, but elite units of soldiers will fight on land, alongside the much more numerous barbarian forces of the Broken Shore who make up the bulk of the Grendel armies. Where possible we will try to field Grendel warriors together, especially if they have similar costume, and then inter-space the line with bands of regular barbarians.

As with any barbarian role, PD will provide simple costume that you can use when monsterring the Grendel. The following page provide an overview of how you can improve upon the basic barbarian breastplate and soft kit available.

Breakdown

Colour

The Grendel enjoy bright colours, especially purple. Purple dyes were once rare in the Broken Shore and only the wealthiest Grendel could afford them. In modern times they have become common-place as a result of trade, but they remain prized for their historical association with wealth and power. Red is also popular, though the preferred shade is a bright rich colour, rather than the dark blood red of the Jotun. Bright splashes of white, yellow, or orange are common as highlights and in accessories.

Base Layer

The basic Grendel costume is a white shirt worn over a pair of cotton or calico trousers (baggy or straight). These are worn by both male and female Grendel, with wealthier Grendel having decorated or bejewelled garments fitting to their status. In the colder climes of the Empire, the Grendel will usually wear robes or a long coat that covers the shirt and falls down over the trousers. Cloaks are common in all weather though they are usually shorter garments hung from shoulder clips, rather than full cloaks that hang from the shoulders themselves.

In practice any bright coloured base garments are better than nothing as a starting point if you are volunteering to play a Grendel.

Armour

Grendel warriors who are used to fighting on ships avoid mail or heavy metal armour, considering the risks to great. Instead they use lighter materials than steel, such as mithril, leather, or even cotton. Their armour shows considerable Asavean influence. Some units will wear a thick cotton linothorax, while soldiers in other units opt for ornate cuirass made of mithril or cured leather.

Warskirts are ideal, but where most barbarian orcs will fashion a war skirt from rough scraps of leather, the Grendel favour a carefully cut war-skirt of thick leather straps, with ornamentation and decoration where possible.

Weapons

There is no single favoured Grendel weapon; units armed with spear and shield are common, but swords of all kind are popular, with exotic curved blades, especially prized by the wealthiest Grendel commanders. Grendel rarely go into battle with a single weapon, most carry a backup weapon and those units that avoid the weight of a shield will usually carry a second blade instead and fight with both.

When it comes to ranged combat the Grendel heavily favour crossbows, especially when they can field them behind fortifications such as a fort or the forecastle of a ship. Where this is not possible, bow users will normally deploy in mixed units, protected by soldiers with shields at the front. Javelins and other thrown weapons are widely employed, but are regarded as distinctly inferior to crossbows.

Shields

All Grendel prefer to enter battle with a shield where possible, to provide protection from enemy archers. The perfect shield is a large round domed shield, like the classical Greek Hoplite shield. Units capable of forming interlocking shield walls as part of an effective deployment are amongst the best paid of any Grendel soldiers.

Accessories

Purple is often seen on Grendel war banners war or incorporated into their costume as an under-tunic. Even a small amount of purple can make a big impact: a tabard or sash, scarf (to hide your human neck!), material belt or strips of cloth used as arm wraps or decoration on armour.

Grendel accessories include all manner of jewelry, especially necklaces and bracelets. Anything that expresses the wealth of the Grendel soldier is great. In particular their armour often includes ornamental tassels that hang down over the shoulders or sometimes the waist.

Broken Shores Tribes

In addition to the Grendel, there are six major tribes that inhabit the Broken Shores - the Salt Dogs, the Stone Gyre, the Iron Gulls, the Black Eels, the Brine Turtles, and the Sand Turtles. These large tribes live in the interior of the Broken Shores alongside numerous minor clans. The Grendel raise their armies from the tribes of the Broken Shores, the subject tribes are effectively mercenary armies in the pay of the Grendel.

Grendel forces will usually have Grendel soldiers commanding them but the warriors of the subject tribes form the backbone of every Grendel army. As such half or more of the forces encountered on battles and skirmishes will usually be orcs from one of the six Broken Shore tribes. These orcs ideally wear a plain breastplate over a simple cut dark tunic and/or a waskirt. As the tribes include a large number of smaller clans, any costume that is suitable for a barbarian orc is useful when playing one of the foot-soldiers of the Broken Shores.

Volunteering

Everyone who is volunteering to monster should turn-up wearing base costume and carrying at least one weapon, preferably a one-handed sword, if remotely possible. However if you are able to bring costume, weapons, and armour that are suitable for Grendel roles when monstering for a Grendel fight, then this is an enormous help in making the battle look as good as possible. In particular, we will try to assign volunteers to groups based on the kit they bring with them; players who have good Grendel kit will be assigned the more interesting Grendel roles, those without will be assigned to play barbarian orcs from one of the Grendel subject tribes.

Any of the following kit is ideal when volunteering for a skirmish or battle involving the Grendel.

- Crossbow
- Sword, or one-handed spear
- Rod, staff or wand
- Round shield
- Cuirass or linethorax
- Any greaves and vambraces
- Bright coloured tunic, purple or red if available
- Leather waskirt

If you are playing Empire or Odyssey, then some of your personal kit may be extremely useful whenever you are volunteering to monster. Imperial kit that is especially useful when volunteering for Grendel battles is covered below.

Urizen

The Grendel field significant numbers of magicians on the battlefield, usually including them into other units. We are always short of wands, rods and staves, so if you own a suitable mage implement, then it is helpful if you can bring it with you when volunteering so we can cast you as a Grendel magician. Participants who play Urizen sentinels will hopefully find that elements of their costume are well worth bringing with them when volunteering.

Varushka and Wintermark

Although most Varushkan and Wintermark armour is not suitable for the Grendel, some costume is still very useful. Tunics especially brightly coloured ones that can be worn under a PD breastplate on the battlefield are ideal as is a white shirt or short robe even if heavily embroidered.

Highguard & Dawn

Most Grendel generally avoid heavy armour - with the exception of elite Stone Born units, but some of their soldiers who are trained to fight on land will use a metal breastplate, greaves and vambraces. If you have plate and are able to use pieces of it to produce a Grendel look - especially by combining it with an appropriate tunic underneath or even a warskirt, then you could play one of the Grendel heavy infantry.

Navarr

Navarr players who are used to fighting with spear and shield are encouraged to bring both when volunteering for Grendel roles. The disciplined Grendel tactics are a far cry from the individualistic approach of the Navarr, and playing a Grendel unit may give you a chance to use both spear and shield in a very different way. The leather armour of the the Navarr is ideal for Grendel, provided it does not look too rugged and wild.

The Brass Coast

Freeborn round or domed shields are ideal for Grendel, especially if they lack any obviously Imperial symbol. Brightly coloured clothes, especially trousers are ideal, if they can be worn with a PD breastplate.

The League

The Grendel adopted the crossbow from the League and any player who has one is encouraged to bring it with them when volunteering for the Grendel. The Grendel do not wear the kind of elaborate garments common in the League, such as slashed doublets or use materials like velvet or jacquard, but a brightly coloured pair of hose or trousers, or similar under-garment is still useful.

Rome, Greece, or Persia

The Grendel costume is partly inspired by the classical nations of the Mediterranean. In particular if you have played Odyssey, then Roman, Greek or Persian costume and armour is absolutely ideal. If you have any kit like this, then please bring it with you if you can. Metal Lorica is best avoided, as are the iconic helmets of the period. A simple round helmet or something ornamental like the one below are perfect for the Grendel.

Grim Gardener

Overview

The Grim Gardener is an Imperial title commissioned by the Imperial Senate in Spring 381YE. The position of Grim Gardener is a sinecure, requiring minimal responsibility but offering a regular income of valuable herbs.

The garden is in the region of Perumaki, Miekarova, in the shadow of the imposing Vor'azi fortification of Grimhold.

Responsibilities

The Grim Gardener has no particular responsibilities; they simply receive a bounty of herbs. If their garden were to be threatened in any way, however, it would be their responsibility to deal with those threats. Likewise, if any opportunity relating to the gardens presented itself, they would make any decisions needed to take advantage of it.

Powers

Grand Bounty of Herbs

The Grim Gardener has custodianship of a sinecure. They receive a significant amount of herbs each season: 7 doses of True Vervain, and 5 doses each of Imperial Roseweald, Cerulean Mazzarine, Marrowort, and Bladeroot.

Appointment

The Grim Gardener is appointed by unanimous decision of the Varushkan senators. If a unanimous decision cannot be reached, the title may be appointed by the Imperial Senate instead.

The title can be held by a Varushkan citizen. The Gardener has tenure, and serves until they die or step down. They can be revoked by the General Assembly, the Varushkan National Assembly, and by the Assembly of the Nine.

The Gardens of the Grim

The Grim Garden is neat and orderly. Surrounded by a high fence, with low internal walls separating the herbs into different beds. The walls are covered with depictions of the Varushkan virtuous animals, and well maintained paths weave between the herb beds allowing easy access to the gardeners who protect them.

The Garden of the Grim also contains a large statue of a strongly lineaged armoured Draughir with a wolfhead helm and chains. A small plaque set into the indicates that this is the Varushkan hero Chernobog, an exemplar of Loyalty who died defending the Imperial Conclave from an assault by servants of the eternal Arhallogen Spring 379YE.

Grimnir's Hearthfire

Description

This short ashen wand is polished and coloured, then wound around with weltsilver strands. It is a powerful aid to a battlefield magician, allowing them to more quickly restore those who have taken serious wounds. As the name implies, this wand is closely associated with the Grimnir, the dedicated healers of Wintermark. It is rare for a Grimnir to commission such an item themselves. More often, grateful Thanos or warriors will present them as gifts to a Grimnir who has saved their lives. Traditionally the weltsilver for the wand will be smelted in a fire begun from the embers of the hearth in the intended Grimnir's hall, to strengthen the eventual bond between magician and wand.

In the Marches, the wand is known as Fletcher's Bane as it is often used to treat individuals who have been repeatedly hit by arrows. Indeed, the wands themselves are sometimes made of old arrow-shafts with Rhyv, the rune of blood, repeated over the entire surface.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of a wand.
- Requirement: You must have the magician skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: When you cast (but not swift cast) the heal spell, you also restore any and all of the target's limbs which have been crippled with cleave or impale.
- Materials: Crafting a grimnir's hearthfire requires sixteen ingots of weltsilver, nine measures of ambergelt and seven measures of iridescent gloaming. It takes one month to make one of these items.

In retrospect, Luukas thought to himself through the blur of pain, throwing a harpoon at an ice bear hadn't been the greatest act of Wisdom he had ever committed. True, it had gotten the bear's attention and he had successfully baited it into the back of the orcish battleline. And true too that the bear had made quite a mess of those orcs when it had arrived. The suaq warriors would kill it eventually, the Icewalker was sure, now that they didn't have orcs to worry about. It would all have worked out so well if the bear hadn't knocked him down a cervase on its way to the orcs. Now he lay slowly freezing, his body battered and a broken leg twisted beneath him.

As he watched his red blood seep across the white ice, he pondered what his next life would be like. Hopefully he would be a naga again - he did so enjoy being a naga. Perhaps he would be Freeborn. It would make a nice change in climate.

"Should have known it was you behind such a ridiculous trick," growled a voice above him.

Luukas forced open his eyes in time to see a cloak-wrapped figure ease himself into the crack in the ice. Luukas smiled as he recognised the thick beard and broad-brimmed hat.

"Just in time, Gondlir," he rasped at the Grimnir. "I was about to wipe my feet on the doormat of the Labyrinth."

"Well, you've got a choice. You can have your flesh fixed or your bones unbroken. I have power enough for one spell."

Luukas sighed. He didn't make the best decisions when bleeding heavily.

Gondlir cracked into a smile and pulled a silvery wand from the folds of his cloak.

"I'm just winding you up. You're lucky. It's got one more left for the day."

Gondlir traced the wand across Luukas' wounds and muttered an ancient rhyme. Claw-marks melted shut, bruises faded and somewhere in his leg fragments wriggled to rejoin themselves into the proper shape. Luukas sat up, still a little giddy.

"Don't suppose you have any of that medicinal alcohol as well?"

Bands (Redirected from Groups)

Overview

In Empire it is possible for characters to formalize their loyalty to each other by creating a band. Bands draw on the hearth magic of oaths combined with magical bonds created by magicians to allow members to use certain skills, rituals and items more effectively on each other. For instance ritualists who are part of the same coven (a type of band) can combine their skills to perform more powerful rituals.

Bands are intended to build on the characterisation of the group concept that you have created for your characters. They are there to recognize and support the choice to act as part of a Dawnish noble house, a League guild or a Freeborn family. Players creating characters together are encouraged to use the potential abilities of bands to add depth and character to their group concept.

The Role of Bands

We encourage players coming to Empire to attend as part of a band with their friends. Bands can help to add depth and enjoyment to characterization, making all the characters feel more real and be more fun to play. The band can have its own identity and history and gives characters a way to belong to something that is bigger than they are, yet is still something they can create a history and background for. Bands give OOC friends good IC reasons to roleplay together and good groups are great for helping new players get involved in a game.

The brief for every nation in Empire includes several archetypes to help you develop the idea for a band. For instance a noble house in Dawn, or a chapter in Highguard. There are pages for some of these archetypes explaining the part they play in the setting and offering advice on how to create and play one. These concepts have been designed to be fun to play, but the list is not meant to be restrictive. You can create a travelling band of Dawnish troubadours, or a secretive guild of Highborn artisans if you wish to. Working with your friends, you have the same freedom to create a group concept as you do to create your own character.

Joining a Band

- There are three types of band, banners, covens, and sects
- You may join one of each type of band when you create your character
- You can only ever join a band with members of the same nation
- Joining a band in play requires a magician using the create bond spell

There are three types of band: banners, covens, and sects. You may belong to a single banner, a single coven, and a single sect at the same time, but a character can never be a member of two banners at the same time, nor two covens, or two sects. If you are creating a new character then you may choose one band of each type to begin play as part of - but you can leave any of the options blank if you prefer. Please ensure that you have the permission of the players who are part of a band before joining.

E.g. The Highborn chapter of Exile's Hold is a banner. The members gain all the benefits of being a banner but any character that joins this group cannot join any other banner. They must break the bond with this banner before joining any other banner.

To join a band in play you must find a magician to perform the create bond spell. You can only be a member of one of each type of band at once. For example, if you are a member of an existing banner, then you cannot join another band that is a banner without first breaking the bonds that join you to your existing banner. You can only join a band with members of the same nation.

Creating a Band

- You must use the website to create a band
- Bands must have a name, an oath and a nationality
- Oaths must be appropriate for the setting
- An oath can never be changed

Contents

- 1 Overview
- 2 The Role of Bands
- 3 Joining a Band
- 4 Creating a Band
- 5 Banners
- 6 Covens
- 7 Sects
- 8 Linking Bands Together

One player will need to use the website to create a new band, but it must only be done once - other characters then join that band. A band can be secret or public. If the band is public, then the name of the band and the nation it is associated with is public to all players in the game. Players making a character can choose to begin play as part of a public band. If the band is secret, then the name of the band is not visible to any player. New characters must join the band in play, they cannot begin play as part of a secret band.

Bands use the hearth magic of an oath to give them power. For this reason, a band must choose an oath when it is created. The oath is usually reasonably short - because it must be recited by any character who joins the band in play. The player creating the band online should enter the text for the oath when they create the band. The only requirement for the oath is that it is in-character and suitable for the setting, any oath that meets these requirements is fine.

Although an oath is required to create a band, it is not magically enforced - there is no automatic magical consequence for any individual that breaks their oath. It is a matter for the roleplaying of the characters who are members of the band to deal with any character who breaks their oath. Once created, the oath cannot be changed, a new band must be formed if characters wish to change their oath.

You can still create a band on the system, even if the benefits are not relevant for your group concept. By picking one of the three options (banner is usually the easiest, if your group plans to fight together at all) and ignoring the additional rules you can still submit details and background about it, even if it doesn't benefit from being a banner, coven or sect.

Banners

- A banner may benefit from using a magical standard

If your band incorporates the idea of a group of warriors that fight together then you may wish to create a banner to represent this. A banner is named for their ability to use a magical standard, which is a magical item created by an artisan. Magical standards provide a potential benefit to every member of the banner.

Covens

- A coven may combine their skills to perform rituals together
- A coven can perform up to two rituals a day
- A coven may benefit from paraphernalia

Groups that intend to perform rituals together need to create a coven. A coven is a band of oath-sworn magicians who choose to work together to perform powerful rituals that they could not do alone.

Members of a coven can work together to perform a ritual with each participant contributing crystallized mana to a ritual up to the limit of their ability. This allows a coven to perform much more powerful rituals than an individual could achieve alone. A coven may also benefit by being bound to ritual paraphernalia, a powerful magical item created by an artisan.

A coven can only perform up to two rituals each day. A character may perform any number of rituals by themselves and they may include others in the ritual performance. But the power of the coven can only be used to combine magical strengths twice per day. Some magical paraphernalia increase the number of rituals a coven can perform in a single day.

If a character is part of a coven that has already performed a ritual together that day, then they may join another coven but they cannot participate in another ritual conducted by that coven until the next day.

Sects

- When members of a sect co-operate to perform some liao ceremonies the cost is reduced to one liao
- A sect may benefit from using a magical reliquary

If your group concept incorporates the idea of a shared set of beliefs and worship then you may wish to create a sect to represent this. A sect is a band of oath-sworn devotees of the Way who choose to work together to further their common goals.

If members of a sect co-operate to perform a ceremony of anointing, consecration, dedication, excommunication, exorcism, hallowing, or testimony, only one dose of liao needs to be consumed to achieve the result, no matter how many members co-operate. All the other rules for co-operation in ceremonial skills still apply.

For example, if two members of a sect who are both dedicated to Vigilance and both have the anointing skill perform a ceremony together to anoint a target, then they may produce the same effect as two priests cooperating - but need only consume a single dose of liao.

A magical reliquary provides a benefit to every member of the sect that is bonded to it.

Linking Bands Together

Although a band must be either a banner, coven, or sect, it is common for players to have a background concept that includes characters who are linked in multiple ways. In these situations it is perfectly appropriate to create more than one band whose concepts and backgrounds are linked.

For example, a group of players intend to play a Marcher household but some of them want to play monks while the others play yeomen. They create a banner called the Cawford Household and a sect called Cawford Monastery - to represent the large monastery on the Cawford lands. Cawford players can choose to start as members of either or both groups or join either group in play.

Gryphonsoul Aegis

Description

Crafting a suit of this armour is a serious undertaking for even a skilled armoursmith, and it is certainly one of the most expensive magic items known to Imperial artisans. It requires a large amount of orichalcum, carefully alloyed with steel and green iron. The metal repeatedly quenched in great baths of beggar's lye. All this effort focuses and reinforces the irresistible force of the human (or orc) spirit.

The armour is fairly popular in Dawn, and many suits are of Dawnish manufacture. They are often build with the four Gryphon Runes (Tykonus, Verys, Feresh and Jotra), or etched with an image of a gryphon. Some rare suits are constructed with an eagle-head helm and clawed gauntlets and boots, visually capturing the image of the heraldic beast.

In other parts of the Empire, the armour has a variety of other names. In Varushka for example, Schlacta wear heavy Hearthfire Chain and rely the power to see them through the dark winter nights. Both the Freeborn and the Highborn follow a tradition of delicately engraving each scale of the Lionsong Paean with a word, phrase or poetic line invoking strength, Courage or the name of a Paragon or Exemplar.

Crafting a Gryphonsoul Aegis requires eleven ingots of green iron, twenty-one ingots of orichalcum, and nine measures of beggar's lye. It takes one month to make one of these items.

Rules

- Form: Armour. Takes the form of a suit of heavy armour. You must be wearing this armour to use its magical properties.
- Requirement: Any character can bond to this item.
- Effect: While wearing this armour, you gain 2 additional ranks of endurance and an additional hero point.
- Roleplaying Effect: You feel inspired to attempt great deeds and to pit yourself against the hardest challenges.
- Materials: Crafting a Gryphonsoul Aegis requires eleven ingots of green iron, twenty-one ingots of orichalcum, and nine measures of beggar's lye. It takes one month to make one of these items.

“Damn bandits,” the schlacta said. He didn't sound particularly upset or fearful, which Radomir found strange given that the warrior was slumped on the ground with a sword thrust into his guts. The schlacta's blood was already staining the damp dirt around him; all that heavy armour hadn't done the man much good when Jasna had crept up behind him and slammed her blade through a chink at his waist.

Radomir ignored the fallen warrior's growled irritation and stepped over him; the man would be dead soon enough; he had little blood left in him. Instead the bandit cast his gaze round the little campfire the schlacta had been warming himself at, wary for any other guards here.

But there were none.

The bandit chief gave an incredulous laugh. “Just one man watching the approach? Really?”

Goran shrugged, standing straight from where he was rifling through the schlacta's discarded pack. Over at the edge of the cliff Radomir could see Mila crouched in vigil, frowning down at the village below. When she too shrugged, he relaxed. “Well, I guess they really are that stupid, then. We'll cull them like the sheep they are. Jasna, I want you to-”

He turned to his second in command, but the sharp-featured and light-footed woman wasn't standing any more. The schlacta was somehow back on his feet, and the very sword that Jasna had run him through with was now in his blood-slick grip. The soldier grunted as he pulled its tip out of the fallen woman's side, seemingly hampered little by his own injury.

Suddenly, that heavy armour looked daunting indeed.

“So,” said the schlacta affably, “shall we try this again? Three against one is hardly fair odds for you, so I'll let you get a head start if you want to run now.”

Guardian of Britta's Shrine

Overview

The Guardian of Britta's Shrine was an Imperial title created by the Imperial Senate in Winter 376YE. The position of guardian was a sinecure, requiring minimal responsibility but offering a regular income.

Following the death of Empress Britta in 376YE, heroic efforts recovered her body and many of her effects from the Thule barbarians. The body was interred in the swamps of Kallavesa while her personal accouterments were placed in a shrine of white granite in Necropolis. The eternal flame that burns in the courtyard before the memorial serves as a place of pilgrimage for those wishing to meditate on and show their respects to the departed Empress, whose inspirational example is already seen by many as re-igniting the flame of Imperial Pride following the disastrous reigns of Empress Giselle, Emperor Hugh and Emperor Walter.

Some controversy surrounded the sinecure; it was regarded as unconstitutional since it created votes in the Synod but was appointed by the Senate, allowing the Senate undue influence the Synod. The motion was not struck down by magistrates at the time, however, and so the title stood.

The first Guardian of Britta's Tomb was Ruth of Highguard, a Steward of the Dead belonging to the Cenotaph chapter of Necropolis. In Autumn 379YE, a delegation of Highborn and Winterfolk visited the shrine and removed the personal effects of the Young Empress. They were reunited with her body in Kallavesa. As news spread, the stream of pilgrims traveling to the shrine dropped to a trickle and then largely petered out. By the beginning of the Spring Equinox 380YE, the title of Guardian had become a purely ceremonial title, providing neither votes nor liao.

Responsibilities

The Guardian oversees the shrine dedicated to the memory of the dead Empress, and ensures the eternal flame is not extinguished.

Powers

The Guardian has no legal powers.

Appointment

The Guardian of Britta's Tomb is appointed during the Winter Solstice each year. The title is selected by unanimous decision of the Highborn senators. If a unanimous decision cannot be reached, the title may be appointed by the Imperial Senate instead.

The title can be held by any Highborn citizen. The Guardian is appointed annually. They can be revoked by the General Assembly, the Highborn National Assembly, and by the Assembly of the Nine.

Guardian of Dunfrith

Overview

Dunfrith was commissioned by the Civilian Commissioner of Wintermark in Autumn 380YE. Construction of Dunfrith (a name meaning "forest of Dun" in an obscure Wintermark dialect) was completed shortly after the 380YE Autumn Equinox.

Responsibilities

The Guardian of Dunfrith has no particular responsibilities; they simply receive a bounty of herbs from Dunfrith in Wood Heath. If Dunfrith were to be threatened in any way, it would be the responsibility of the Guardian to deal with those threats - it is also their responsibility to deal with any opportunity related to the sinecure.

Powers

Bounty of the Guardian

The Guardian receives custodianship of a sinecure. They receive an income of herbs each season: five doses each of Bladeroot, True Vervain, and Marrowort; four doses of Imperial Roseweald; and two doses of Cerulean Mazzarine. Bladeroot and True Vervain prosper in the northern hills, and the glade set aside for the production of Marrowort supports a fine crop, but the gardeners struggle to maintain more than a few patches of Cerulean Mazzarine in the chilly climate.

Appointment

The Guardian of Dunfrith is appointed by unanimous decision of the Wintermark senators. If a unanimous decision cannot be reached, the title may be appointed by the Imperial Senate instead.

The title can be held by a Wintermark citizen. The Guardian has tenure, and serves until they die or step down. They can be revoked by the General Assembly, the Wintermark National Assembly, and by the Assembly of the Nine.

Dunfirth

The foresters of Woodhall in the southernmost reaches of Hahnmark created several glades in the woodlands near Dunhearth Hall. The glades were positioned to allow the cultivation of all five of the magical herbs. Much of the work creating the sinecure was overseen by Ham, son of Brigantia, son of Frecki and of Bruin, lead apothecary of Dunhearth and descendant of the Great Dun, apprentice of Wise Rangara and Saviour of Holberg, "with the authority of the Great Thane, Tobrytan Dunning".

One of the glades, the southernmost of the five, was cleared over an old battleground where the people of Dunhearth fought the Feni in past centuries - the harvest of marrowort is particularly strong here although there have been a few (unconfirmed) reports of unsettled spirits in the vicinity since the herb garden was established.

In Summer 381YE, a natural disaster claimed parts of south-eastern Hahnmark. The opening of Lorenzo's Deep Pockets (as the sinkhole is known) stopped just short of consuming the entire forest of Dunfirth. Today the herb glades stand on the north-western lip of the great crater, not far from New Dunhall.

Guardian of Giselle's Tomb

Overview

The Guardian of Giselle's Tomb is an Imperial title created by the Imperial Senate in Autumn 380YE. Work on the tomb was completed shortly before the Spring Equinox 381YE. The position of guardian is a sinecure, requiring minimal responsibility but offering a regular income of liao, and additional votes in the Imperial Synod.

Responsibilities

The Guardian oversees the shrine in Temeschwar that houses the sarcophagus of Empress Giselle. If the tomb were to be threatened, it would be the responsibility of the Guardian to face those threats; likewise should any opportunity related to the shrine arise the Guardian would decide how to respond.

Powers

Bounty of Liao

The sinecure provides five measures of liao to the Guardian each season, to be used as they see fit.

Voice in the Synod

The Guardian receives ten votes in the Imperial Synod. They may use these votes in any appropriate assembly, following the normal rules for votes provided by a Sinecure.

Appointment

The Guardian is a League national title appointed by judgement of the League national assembly.

The Guardian has tenure and serves until they die or step down. They can be revoked by the General Assembly, the League National Assembly, and the Assembly of the Nine.

Virtue's Respite

The tomb of Empress Giselle stands in the city of Temeschwar.

For decades after her death, Empress Giselle was interred in her family estates in Sarvos. Following the Grendel assault and the sacking of the city, which included an attempt to steal her body, her sarcophagus was moved to a safer location. After much debate the Senate chose to re inter Giselle in Temeschwar. A new tomb was constructed for her, under the supervision of Gant Archama (the Senator for Temeschwar).

Constructed in the city itself, near one of the two river gates, it takes the form of an open-air amphitheatre, decorated with the motif of the unbroken chain of Loyalty. At the entrance to the seats a statue of the Senator's father, Demitri Archama (who looks so like Gant that several wits have pointed out it could just as easily be a statue of the younger Archama as the elder). He is shown seated, swathed in fur with a stern visage.

The sacrophagus itself rests on a plinth before the raised stage, and the theatrical back drop consists of four large white granite panels carved with scenes depicting the recent joint ventures of the League. They show the raising of Caricomare; the liberation of Holberg; and the rebuilding of Sarvos after the Grendel attack. The final panel depicting the escorting of the body of Giselle from Highguard to Temeschwar by a company of soldiers bearing the tattered gonfalon of the Brotherhood of Torn Banners, with the Brotherhood's Colonel Iacob Genoshu clearly identifiable as the figure leading the procession.

Already there has been some wry commentry of the tomb - dubbed "Virtue's Respite" by Gant Archama - that it appears to be less a memorial to the dead Throne, and more a testament to the recent successes of the League and the Brotherhood of Torn Banners in particular.

Guardian of the Cairn

Overview

The Guardian of the Cairn is an Imperial title established by the Imperial Senate during Autumn 378YE. The stones and cairns that make up the crystal henge are quite old, but their use as a source of crystal mana is very recent. Construction and expansion began in late-autumn 378YE and was finished just in time for the Winter Solstice. The stones themselves were augmented with polished mithril, and several cairns were adjusted to help direct flows of subterranean mana toward them.

The position of Guardian is a sinecure, requiring minimal responsibility but offering a regular income of crystal mana.

Responsibilities

The Guardian has no particular responsibilities; they simply receive a bounty of crystal mana from the Sylvihrafn in Skarsind. If the Henge were to be threatened in any way, it would be the responsibility of the Guardian to deal with those threats.

Powers

Bounty of Mana

The Guardian of the Cairn gains custodianship of a sinecure. The Guardian receives an income of 9 crystal mana each season.

Appointment

The Guardian of the Cairn is appointed by unanimous decision of the Wintermark senators. If a unanimous decision cannot be reached, the title may be appointed by the Imperial Senate instead.

The title can be held by a Wintermark citizen. The Guardian has tenure, and serves until they die or step down. They can be revoked by the General Assembly, the Wintermark National Assembly, and by the Assembly of the Nine.

Sylvihrafn

The crystal henge of Sylvihrafn stands in Skarsind near the Hold of Hrafnar in the north-eastern Skogei Glens. The hall and the henge alike overlook the dark forests of Varushkan Miekarova. It is named for the late Sylvi Hrafn who fell during the Battle of Ikka's Tears; her body joins that of her ancestors among the cairns. The newly expanded circle was originally named the Sylvi Hrafn Crystal Henge, but as is the way in Wintermark the name was quickly shortened to Sylvihrafn.

The henge itself is reasonably old; the founders of the Hold of Hrafnar often performed magical rituals here. When the Thule barbarians conquered the Skogei Glens, they continued this practice themselves - there is some evidence that several enchancements designed to assist the invading armies originated among the stones and cairns.

The ring consists of thirteen standing stones, around and between which are scattered low cairns of carved rocks. The stones are intricately threaded with mithril designs that denote the history of the battles with the Thule in Skarsind - both the recent invasion and liberation, and older conflicts stretching back to the dawn of Wintermark. The stones "draw up" mana flows from deep underground, and the crystals produced form on and around the rocky cairns. The crystals gathered here have a distinctive silvery tinge, that the a few scops have claimed makes them resemble tears.

The Founders (Redirected from Guerra)

This is a placeholder page for content that PD are actively working on.

History, Myth, and Legend

Contents

According to the hakima, the Brass Coast was founded by three sisters named Erigo, Riqueza and Guerra. They departed Highguard with their extended families, and sought a new homeland far from the internecine squabbling of the Highborn. With the aid of powerful magic, they located a homeland where they could be free of interference from the Highborn, one where they could pursue their own destinies.

All Freeborn today see themselves as descendants of one of the three founders - whether literally (via matrilineal lineage), or spiritually (for those who choose to join the nation but cannot claim a direct link to the founders).

- 1 History, Myth, and Legend
- 2 Riqueza
- 3 Erigo
- 4 Guerra

The three women were known to be powerful magicians, and depending on who one asks either formed of a single coven or, more likely, lead three individual covens that worked together most likely through the use of items such as the Web of Celestial Attunement or the Hakima's Mantle. Yet it would be wrong to think of them solely as magicians; they were also proud and ambitious leaders, and are considered to be the first dhomiro as well as being the model on which the hakima base themselves.

Outside of the Brass Coast, historians are divided as to whether the three women were actually related by blood or not; Highborn archivists claim that the records suggest that the three were actually unrelated, being instead scions of minor patrician families. Unhappy with the growing turmoil within the nation, and predicting the impending civil war, the three formed an alliance, sold their holdings, and simply left Highguard. Even though the archivists contest some elements of the story, they agree that the three women almost certainly existed, and there is little doubt that they held the rank of Patrician within the crumbling society of the Highborn before they chose to give it all up.

According to some tales, they each took a new name when they left the Highborn nation, symbolically burning any connection to their past in a great bonfire somewhere in Casinea. Romantics imagine that they set off from what would later become Anvil, but there is little factual support for this notion.

Riqueza

Legends recorded by the Hakima claim that Riqueza was the eldest of the three sisters. She is said to have been a mystically-inclined seer, as well as a practitioner of the apothecary's arts. The Incarnadine Satchel is one of several miraculous relics of Riqueza, although the powerful artefact was lost to the Empire nearly a hundred years ago.

As recounted in the song Riqueza's Dream, it is said that she was the motive force behind the decision to quit Highguard. She is often described as having been a mistress of night magic, and a common tale of the founding claims that she used a crystal with a flaw in the shape of the rune of transformation to lead the Freeborn to their new homeland. A number of her children were said to have inherited her fascination with transformation.

The Riqueza perform ritual magic using loud, rhythmic, energetic drumming.

Erigo

According to the tales of the hakima, Erigo was neither the eldest nor the youngest of the three sisters. According to the old stories, she was the most martially minded of the three sisters. A significant proportion of her family were warriors and battle magicians, and when the Freeborn decided to settle on the Brass Coast she and her tribe took the lead in driving out the orcs who inhabited their new homeland. She is said to have been adept at weaving enchantment over armies and fleets alike. Several of the families descended from her line see it as their duty to protect the rest of the Freeborn, and a number of the oldest corsair families trace their lineage back to Erigo.

The exemplar Zemress was born into the Erigo tribe.

The Erigo tribe use a less energetic style, often accompanying their rituals with soothing, harmonious music.

Guerra

The hakima teach that Guerra was the youngest of the three sisters. She was known both for her quick temper and for the courage with which she spoke her mind. She was the most politically minded of the three founders, and is said to have negotiated treaties of recognition with the scattered Navarr stridings, giving them the freedom to walk the trods on the Brass Coast in return for helping the early Freeborn nation maintain lines of communication between scattered settlements. According to Highborn accounts, her family were heavily involved in mercantile endeavors before she lead them out of Highguard.

Guerra was an acknowledged master of day magic. Some hakima claim that it was Guerra, not Riqueza, who lead the Freeborn to the Brass Coast, using a dowsing pendulum marked with the rune of discovery.

She is said to have founded the city of Siroc, reasoning that while the Freeborn may wish to wander, outsiders would want a single place they could come to when they wished to deal with them. There are a number of humorous stories about Guerra and the powerful merchant-Prince of Sarvos, in which he and his family repeatedly tried to woo her into political (and romantic) entanglements that she cleverly turns to her own advantage - all without speaking a single word of falsehood.

The Guerra prefer physical movement combined with fire and light when they perform their magic.

Guided Path

Description

There is a strongly-held belief in some sects that certain ceremonies have effects that will follow a dying person into the Labyrinth. They believe that an anointing can help the passage of a soul, or a powerful testimony follow someone into the next life in some fashion. Less merciful sects believe that if a person dies while excommunicate it will impede their passage to reincarnation, or even cause the soul of a criminal marked in this fashion to be destroyed. Even sects that do not adhere to such beliefs see the value of performing ceremonies to offer comfort to the dying. These sects are the ones likely to make use of a Guided Path.

Normally taking the form of an amulet or talisman of dragonbone usually marked with a Labyrinth, a Guided Path takes its popular name from the Navarr. Some guides have made use of the item since long before the founding of the Empire in a quest to help the dying to find their way back to a partner in the Great Dance. A similar item known as an Amulet of the Threshold was used by Highborn sects who offered comfort to the dying. Both items predate the use of liao, and some theological historians suggest that the use of items such as the Guided Path may provide some evidence that the very first uses of ceremonial skills were to prepare the dying for their next lives.

Rules

- Form: Talisman. Takes the form of ceremonial regalia.
- Requirement: You must have the dedication skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: When you perform or cooperate with the performance of a religious skill that targets a terminal character, you may do so without spending a dose of liao. If you have an ability to add additional strength to a ceremony you may use that ability in the normal way at the normal cost.
- Materials: Crafting a Guided Path requires four measures of dragonbone. It takes one month to make one of these items.

Guidelines for all young live roleplayers

Live-roleplayers of all ages are welcome to take part in Empire, but it is important to appreciate that you are playing a game alongside adults so we expect you to be mature and to play the game the same way they do. This means that you should try to stay in-character as much as possible. If you need to drop out-of-character then try to leave any areas that are filled with other players who are roleplaying before you stop roleplaying, so that you don't disturb their game.

In this game, you will be roleplaying a character who is the same age as you are in real life. There is a range of briefing material that you can read, including some elements that are written specifically for younger players. The more familiar you are with these, the better the you will be able to roleplay; you will get more respect from other players and be included in the game more.

Empire will not make your character a grand hero, but it will offer you the chance to roleplay becoming one if you engage with the game and roleplay accordingly. Your character will not begin as anyone special, but you will be no more or less important than the characters of other players of any age who are attending the game. By roleplaying and reacting as your character you will have opportunities to become an important part of the game world as your character grows up.

Please make sure that you have read the specific guidelines and policies appropriate to your age. The restrictions that are in place are designed to protect everyone attending the event. If you break the rules then you will not be able to attend further events until you are significantly older.

In particular, please note that you are not permitted to purchase alcohol from the tavern before you are eighteen and you are not permitted to take the battlefield until you have passed the warrior test and have the approval of your parent(s). If you break these rules you put the entire event in jeopardy for everyone who is playing and you will not be allowed to resume playing the game before you turn eighteen.

We are confident that you can demonstrate that you are every bit as capable at roleplaying as the adults. But ultimately it's down to you to show how good a roleplayer you can be.

Guidelines for parents or carers

If you are bringing your child to a Profound Decisions event, then you are taking responsibility for their behaviour and their actions. Profound Decisions will operate parts of the game aimed at younger players, but you remain responsible for your child at all times. If we gave Empire a film classification it would be "Parental Supervision Required" - as the parent or carer you are expected to provide that supervision. It is not the responsibility of other players to change their behaviour to take account of your children.

Empire allows young roleplayers to attend and participate - it is not a creche or an alternative to baby-sitting. You must not bring children over five who are not interested in roleplaying to the event.

All players are asked not to make IC complaints about children that are dropping out-of-character or crying. You must respect this request by minimizing any disruption caused by your child dropping out-of-character. If your child is upset or crying, then please consider the context - in a public IC area is like being in a cinema; in your own tent is like being in your own house; in someone else's tent it's like being in their house. Act accordingly and where appropriate take your child out of the area to comfort them or until they are ready to resume roleplaying.

If you are the parent or carer of a child then you must roleplay a character who is the parent or carer of the child. You should expect other characters to hold your character to be IC responsible for the IC actions of your IC children. For instance your character can be prosecuted by a magistrate if your child is a thief or a mugger.

As a parent, I am fully aware how normal it is to feel protective of your children, but you must not use this as justification to OOC confront another player. If you are unhappy out-of-character with the behaviour of another player (of any age), then the correct response is to bring this to the attention of a member of the PD crew. We will deal with the situation.

You must appreciate that very young children are not old enough to effectively participate in an LRP game. We have chosen not to exclude the under 5s, to allow children to play the game to the best of their individual abilities, rather than using age as a marker to nominate who can or can't play the game. However there is a very considerable burden on anyone caring for young children and you must expect this to impact on your own ability to enjoy the event.

In addition to these general guidelines, please make sure that you read the age related rules and guidelines that apply to your child. It is your responsibility to ensure that you and your child meet all of these rules. This remains true, even if another adult agrees to look after your child for a period of time during the event.

We will be inflexible and unsympathetic in dealing with any parent that does not follow the rules. We believe that doing so is the best way to protect all children and parents, to ensure that their ability to enjoy the event is not harmed by the actions of individuals. When speaking to LRPers it is clear that the majority are happy to welcome young live-roleplayers to participate at our events, provided that the parents and children are meticulous in meeting clear standards of behaviour. We intend to build on that support by demonstrating that the majority can meet these standards and by refusing further entry to the minority that cannot.

Guides: Synod

An Introduction to the Synod

Contents

Membership of the Imperial Synod is an important calling and carries with it a number of Duties and Rights. This guide is intended to aid new members of the Synod in fulfilling their duties, and remind them of the purpose of the Rights.

Duties

As a member of the Synod you have the following duties:

I – Appoint a Cardinal for your Virtue Assembly

- Your Virtue Assembly is determined by your Virtue Dedication or, if you are Undedicated, you are considered a member of the Assembly of the Way
- If the Assembly has no Cardinal, you should ensure that your voice is heard in the appointment of the Cardinal
- If the Assembly has a Cardinal, you share in the responsibility for the judgements and decisions they make as part of the Assembly of the Nine
- If you feel that the Cardinal is not representing the Virtue or The Way in the manner they should, it is your duty to take action

Consult with the Functionaries of the Synod on how to take necessary actions in relation to this duty. This can include identifying a Cardinal if they are unknown to you.

II – Exercising of Judgement

- As a religious leader, it is accepted that you are possessed of good and virtuous judgement
- Your duties including passing judgement on matters presented to the Synod Assemblies
- There are no formal meetings at the Synod, as you are expected to spend time attending to the needs and wellbeing of the lay citizens
- You should check in at the Synod across the day to check with the Functionaries if any matters have been presented for your judgement
- In time, you will get a sense for when to visit. If in doubt, we recommend once every three hours for a few minutes as a guideline.

Consult with the Functionaries of the Synod on seeing the judgements and how to register your own.

III – The Spiritual Wellbeing of your Nation, and the Empire

- As a religious leader, you already minister to the spiritual wellbeing of several Citizens from your home nation.
- Within the Synod, you are a member of three Assemblies: Virtue, National and General
- Your duties within these Assemblies are to ensure that the Empire remains virtuous and that any corruption, idolatry, heresy or blasphemy is identified and dealt with
- You have access to a number of powers to take action against threats you have identified.

If you wish to use any of the powers of the Assemblies to oppose wickedness, consult with the Functionaries of the Synod as to what options are available to you, and what may be the easiest way to access them.

Rights

- 1 An Introduction to the Synod
 - 1.1 Duties
 - 1.1.1 I – Appoint a Cardinal for your Virtue Assembly
 - 1.1.2 II – Exercising of Judgement
 - 1.1.3 III – The Spiritual Wellbeing of your Nation, and the Empire
 - 1.2 Rights
 - 1.2.1 I – Witness
 - 1.2.2 II – Sanctuary
 - 1.2.3 III – Confession and Clemency
 - 1.2.4 IV – Judgement

As a member of the Synod, you are afforded various Rights to ensure that you are able to carry out your crucial role in the Empire:

I – Witness

- As a member of the Synod, you have the right to enter any common space within the Empire, including the Military Command Tent, to observe that all citizens are behaving virtuously
- If you are prohibited from exercising this right, you may notify the Synod Functionaries or the Judiciary
- This right exists only whilst you are maintaining a discreet presence. Causing a disruption, or disturbance, forfeits this privilege in that time and place.

II – Sanctuary

- If you are in the Synod tent, or on consecrated ground, and an individual asks you for Sanctuary from the Imperial Law, you may grant it for the turn of an hourglass
- This right is intended to ensure that the Imperial Law is being enforced with reference to the Seven Virtues.
- The turn of the hourglass is so that the individual may either gather the proof of their innocence, or confess their crime and the virtues that informed it
- You, or a fellow Synod member, may appeal to the Judiciary for an extension of the hourglass

III – Confession and Clemency

- Where an individual has been granted sanctuary in the Synod, or on consecrated ground, you may take their confession.
- The confession will be in relation to the crime for which they have sought sanctuary
- Having taken confession, you may accompany the individual to the Judiciary and appeal for clemency on the grounds of the virtues that informed the crime
- Be warned, this right is not to be taken trivially or abused. If the individual offends again in the future, it will reflect poorly on you and charges may be brought.

IV – Judgement

- As your duties include giving your judgement on matters before the Synod, you too may call on your fellow Synod members to pass judgement
- Judgements can cover a range of matters including inquisition, revocation of Imperial positions, reward of virtuous acts, changing doctrines of the faith and more
- The Functionaries of the Synod can advise you of the options available to you, and effective ways of accessing them.
- When a judgement is put before the Synod Assemblies, a deadline will be set by which Synod members will be expected to have expressed their judgement.
- After the deadline, the Functionaries of the Synod will tally the judgements of the Synod members and document the Judgement of the Synod.
- Although the Synod is not required to meet, some Synod members have found it advantageous to explain the judgement they seek to make to their peers to ensure their support during the judgement process.

If you have any questions or require further clarifications regarding these Rights, it is advised that you consult with the Functionaries of the Synod regarding their interpretation.

Guild

In ancient Catazarria the merchant prince would licence wealthy interests to participate in the politics of their city. To do so the group in question had to present a document outlining their goals, heraldry and founding principles. If the prince smiled upon their efforts (or at least, on the accompanying gift), they would grace it with their seal and it would become an official legal document. Thus, an ancient Catazarri could point to their "carta" (paper), proving that they had the right to lead. Their ability to monopolise trade faded though after they joined the Empire, due to the competition from crafters in other cities and nations. Most responded by expanding their remit.

Nowadays the process of authorising a guild is administered by the Imperial Civil Service, and the document itself has come to be known as a charter. The terms are interchangeable. Some older Catazarri guilds insist on the archaic term, while more modern charters, especially those from Holberg, use charter instead. Some guilds operate without a charter, but for those that have one it is an object of immense pride. Typically decorated in gold leaf, illuminated in fine coloured inks and adorned with the seals of bishops and Empresses, it is frequently displayed as a public statement of wealth and power. An ancient charter is well regarded and will garner a guild respect even if their financial fortunes are not so illustrious. It is not unknown for an ailing guild to even sell their charter, and a thriving trade exists in counterfeits and stolen charters.

By tradition, the leader of these ancient organisations carried a signet ring with the seal of the guild upon it, and thus only they could sign documents on behalf of the entire guild. This practice earned them the title of "signeur" or "signeura" (when their power wasn't great enough to justifiably claim the title of prince), and this has persisted to the present day.

Discussions within the guild are often heated, citizens of The League appreciate a passionate argument, but if consensus cannot be reached on an important issue then the signeura may simply raise their hand, palm inwards to display the ring with the seal of the guild. This is done to remind the other guild members that the guild follows their lead, and should abide by their decision while doing so. It is not done lightly, as it can be seen as a reprimand for excessive bickering or childlike behaviour, and can lead to extreme bad feeling. In any event, the other guild members must accept the signeura's decision or a challenge their leadership immediately.

A small number of guilds demand that every member be either a blood relative or married to a blood relative. Often referred to as "camorra" in a slightly derogatory way, these guilds have a largely undeserved reputation for dubious morals and underhand dealings. They are marginally more common in Temeschwar and Tassato than elsewhere.

The guild is intended as the major social grouping for the League; a network of skilled and ambitious people who have bound their fortunes together for mutual gain. Smaller guilds typically specialise in order to take advantage of a niche while larger ones tend to be extremely diverse, but these patterns are far from set in stone. A free company, for instance, is a type of guild who specialises in mercenary work and tends to have few fixed assets as a result.

It may be a good idea to consider whether you want to have a group charter when creating a guild, and how vigorously you expect the members to adhere to it. Having a charter will serve as a good advertisement to new potential players who might wish to join. You should consider carefully what your group will enjoy playing and try not to put in place rules that will be hard to enforce or lead to constant internal friction. Nebulously virtuous principles and grandiose goals that will encourage the guild to strive will probably serve you best unless you have a group dedicated to a real hardcore concept.

Each guild's specific goals and methods vary, but almost universally involves accumulating political and financial power. Success is about more than cash though, it is about renown and sophistication. Whatever your guild does, it should at least claim to be the best at it. Membership in your guild should be something that others aspire to. Everybody should know its name and recognise its heraldry. Remember; the guild endures after you are gone, leave its legend greater than you found it.

Even if a character isn't a member of your guild (or even your nation), they can still associate with it - The League encourages hiring specialists. Such freelancers may never have the security or prestige of guild membership, but they can hire themselves out to the highest bidder. A servant that betrays a guild after accepting its coin will seldom last long, though.

Within a guild, the player characters represent the leaders and owner, and while the guild may have thousands of staff across its holdings, players are the only ones who get to make major decisions. A leader who doesn't attend events is no leader in the eyes of a League citizen, and will most likely find themselves replaced in short order - those who make the effort to attend get to make the decisions.

You may wish to base your guild in a single city; Holberg, Sarvos, Tassato or Temeschwar. A guild that spreads itself too thin stands little chance of influencing local politics, so if you want a bigger share of the political power you are better concentrating on the least-populated territories. Your character certainly will come from a single city, so make sure you know its foibles and fashions lest you appear a buffoon in front of your peers!

Gwerin Morfa

Overview

In Autumn 379YE Corey Brackensong, as Dredgemaster of Feverwater, commissioned historical research about "The Gwerin Marfae, the marshfolk around at the time of Terunael." Very little is known about these people, who apparently lived in what is now the north-western Mallum, and potentially in parts of eastern Dawn long before the foundation of the Empire.

What little is known about these enigmatic people is summarized here in a document compiled for the Dredgemaster by Lim Sinij of the Halls of Knowledge. It contains a great deal of speculation and should, perhaps, be taken with a pinch of salt.

What Little is Known

Among the existing archives of Imperial Lore, there is precious little information on the Gwerin Morfa. For once, Emperor Nicovar bears only part of the blame – even before the burning of the libraries there was precious little known about this people who, at one point, were considered entirely fictional. I will share with you what is known, and what has been discovered via other means, in particularly the small amounts of archaeological evidence we have managed to gather.

I must confess that there is little of this to share. Even the location of the Terunael city of “Beantol”, wherein we might expect to find more information, is lost. Again, until recently, Therunin was believed to be the easternmost city of Terunael. References to “Beantol” or “Beandol” - the city in the lands of the Druj - were considered purely fanciful in many academic circles.

One thing that can be said with confidence – the Gwerin Morfa spoke Iaith, rather than (or possibly in conjunction with) Imperial. Whether they are the people with whom the language originated, or speakers of a language that to their contemporaries served the same purpose as modern Imperial serves in the Empire, is impossible to say.

The name – Gwerin Morfa – is certainly Iaith in origin. It translates roughly as “folk of the coastal marshes”. However, as with almost everything else, the assertion that this was the name these people gave themselves is speculative. It is possible that this is not what these people called themselves, but something applied to them by the Terunael. Or, it might be the name of a subculture within a larger culture whose name is now completely lost to us.

Recent research into the origins of the Vard and Ushka draws attention to the idea that there were already human civilizations in this area when the Terunael raised their cities – it is entirely possible the Gwerin Morfa are one of those human cultures contemporary with the Suag, Kallavesi, and Ushka who did not survive the last great orc incursion.

Historically, we believe that the Gwerin Morfa were a pre- or perhaps even proto-Terunael culture that lived principally in marshes across parts of the eastern Empire and beyond. There are scattered references to them in fragments of text from pre-vallorn Terunael, and a handful of comments in documents preserved from the disapora-era Navarr.

We can only conjecture as to why they would choose to live in such marginal land. Were the marshes of the Empire once drier, more fertile, or home to less dangerous parasites and diseases? Was the continent warmer and wetter in ancient times, covered in marshland from Kallavesa to Therunin? Were the principal non-marsh areas of the continent which might have offered firmer footing and a base for infrastructure occupied by other beings who had marginalised them to outlying bogs? Perhaps the orcs? This might again suggest that the Gwerin Morfa were siblings of the early Kallavesi, Suag, and Ushkans – all peoples believed to have been driven into inhospitable terrain by the domination of the orcs.

Almost all of our physical evidence – an inscription on a stela, a few pieces of pottery, occasional preserved scroll fragments – comes from the east where Druj incursions were particularly savage. The best documented discoveries of what purport to be Gwerin Morfa artifacts are in Therunin and southern Holberg. Speculation also suggests that the marshlands inhabited by the Gwerin Morfa would have been particularly subject to poisonous Spring magic unleashed by the Druj – and are of particular interest to them given their fascination with herbs and poisonous creatures.

Speculation again. The problem remains that there is little evidence for the existence of the Gwerin Morfa at all. If they were widespread, even so long ago, surely the bones and artefacts of such a culture would have surfaced before now. Still - absence of evidence is not evidence of absence. There is some evidence that the height of their culture pre-dates the Terunael. Fragments of Iaith poetry and song suggest that at one point literature in that language had some influence on the culture of the forerunners of the Navarr – and in the role of an equal - or even superior - culture rather than a subject. Yet today the language is almost unknown.

Some of this Navarr documentation suggests that the Gwerin Morfa culture continued (though to what extent is unknown) into Terunael times but not beyond. Primary theories of their destruction suggests that either they were wiped out by the vallorn or fell in the last days before that disaster during the barbarian orcish incursions which precipitated it.

If they did avoid consumption by the angry green tide of the vallorn, we can only speculate as to whether the presumed centre of Gwerin Morfa civilisation east of Feverwater fell in battle with the Druj, or were taken as subjects and forced into slavery, perhaps in the orc lands even further to the east. It is in this area that we believe the Gwerin Morfa were principally located. There has been no evidence of their culture unearthed in any excavations in the bogs of Kallavesa or Bregasland - though it must be said that the terrain there makes undertaking expeditions into the area highly speculative. Yet even in this scholars are divided – the chalk designs of the Marches bear some similarity to the beast totems of the Gwerin Morfa (I touch on this below).

It is commonly conjectured that the Feni tribespeople of the Marches (and the northern Brass Coast, and southern Wintermark) could be continuing survivors of the ancient civilisation to which the Gwerin Morfa belonged. This is held up by a comparison of the cultural trappings of the Feni to the known customs of the Gwerin Morfa, which I will discuss now.

Whilst conditions often make it difficult and highly speculative to undertake archaeological expeditions in marshland, discovery archaeology (that is, creating or expanding a dig on in an area where artefacts or human remains have already been discovered) can yield excellent results due to the high degree of preservation of remains in compacted peat bogs and similar areas where moisture (the principal agent identified in the decay of remains) has been kept out of an area by natural means, usually to do with the porosity and elevation of the local soil. Peat bogs are often elevated above groundwater level in comparison to the remaining land.

We know from artefacts ascertained this way that many of them wore long-sleeved tunics of dyed wool. There are precious few remaining artefacts of soft matter, since the moisture in the air begins to affect and decay the matter when it is exposed and removed from the dig. What ornament and jewellery survives in the form of grave goods consists of marked dragonbone necklaces, bracelets, and nose, ear and lip piercings. Sometimes the dragonbone has been fashioned into crude shapes which, together with analysis of remaining art from parchments suggests that Gwerin Morfa held animal totems in particular high regard, perhaps even worshipping them.

In addition to dragonbone, several moonsilver brooches, and a sungold buckle, all inlaid with pieces of tempest jade have been unearthed. In each case the quality of the pieces is notable – although some scholars speculate that it is possible they might be pieces purchased from – or taken in battle from – a different culture.

We can extrapolate from these cultural trappings and existing further documentation that they were arranged in tribal groups (or clans) centred around a particular animal totem, amongst them boars, bears, wolves, toads, and snakes. No non-predatory animal has been discovered operating in the manner of a totem though that does not mean these never existed.

There is evidence of early inter-tribal raiding amongst them whereby the victorious clan would burn all instances of the totem of the loser – perhaps assimilating survivors of the losing clan into their own. Some burnt remains of dragonbone wolf totems have been unearthed in northern Therunin, but not recently. Certainly the evidence of particular animal totems suggests one thing of import, because those that we know – with the exception of the toad and snake - are not animals which commonly make habitat in bogs or marshland.

Of particular interest is a distinct lack of steel items among the relics of the Gwerin Morfa – although perhaps given accounts that both the Ushka and the Kallavesi/Suaq had very little (or no) steel prior to the arrival of the Vard/Steinr this should not be surprising. They appear to have particularly favoured alloys of orichalcum – with gold for jewelry, and with tin and copper to produce a metal similar to bronze. Precisely where this orichalcum came from is a riddle – it is not a metal found in any abundance in marshes, after all. There is some speculation that orichalcum alloys were restricted to important or unique items – and that common Gwerin Morfa made do with bronze or iron weapons – but there have been a handful of finds of steel items. In the northern Therunin site, four steel arrowheads were recovered as part of the grave goods, for example.

Comparisons between the few historical trappings of the Gwerin Morfa that persist, and the existing culture of the Feni, are inconclusive. It is possible that the Feni are an offshoot of the ancient civilisation reduced over time to savagery or ancient contemporaries (as it were) of an ancient culture whose customs and habits have been unchanged by centuries of progress. It is even conjectured by some scholars that the Feni represent a migration west of the remains of the Gwerin Morfa culture from its origins upstream of Feverwater.

Further conjecture, extrapolated from those few examples of still-existing documentation from those formative times and limited archaeological evidence, suggest that each clan employed larger representations of their totem animals in defence of their villages. Several sketches in charcoal exist showing great stone carvings erected on outcrops of higher ground around a village, fashioned in the likeness of a particular animal or animal head. Comparisons have naturally been drawn both with the giant stone head recently recovered by heroes at Anvil during the siege of Holberg, and with chalk carvings on hillsides such as the Old Pig in Mournwold. In particular, Old Pig bears certain stylistic similarities to paintings on pot shards found in Therunin.

We know nothing about what magic – if any – the Gwerin Morfa employed; which realms (if any) they favoured and what eternals they might have treated with. They certainly had knowledge of artifice – several of the animal-totem necklaces have shown signs of being long-depleted magical items. Examination of a boar pendant found in Therunin discovered that at one time it would have functioned in a manner similar to a Bloodfire Periapt.

It is very likely though, from the discovery of two skeletons in the Morass in southern Holberg, that they counted at least one cambion and one antlered changeling amongst their numbers indicating the presence of lineage.

This is the sum of information that is currently available to us and I press on you once again that the total of our resources in this particular area is embarrassingly small. Should you discover anything further on your own merits we would be pleased to add that to our body of knowledge.

There are three possible paths of further investigation. The first is the Iaith language – the Navarri scholar Osian ap Feurig is one of the Empire's leading experts on the language and has made a study of poetry and literature that may contain further insights into the Gwerin Morfa. While they are peripatetic scholar, they are known to have some connections with a Navarri instructor at the Academy called Iestyn Tair Leidr.

Secondly, there is known to be a significant area of marshy terrain in the Barrens called “Saltmarsh” that lies along the banks of a great river – possibly even the same river that runs down into the Feverwater. It is possible that some Gwerin Morfa settlements might have existed here. Whether anything survived the domination of the Druj would be hard to say – but an avenue of investigation might be opened with the indigenous orc population.

The final avenue is mentioned only for the sake of scholastic completeness – the Druj may have records of their own about the Gwerin Morfa of “Beantol” - although obviously anything they might know or be prepared to share will come at a high price and be suspect as any communication from those verminous barbarians.

Hahnmark

Overview

The territory of Hahnmark is spread along a series of treacherous mountain passes, the rolling foothills beneath and the wide plains that stretch toward Sermersuaq and Kallavesa. In ancient times it was the centre of the troll kingdom, but today is considered the ancestral homeland of the Steinr in Wintermark. The other passes through the mountains are likewise protected by fortified halls, preventing access to the rolling hills that drop down towards fertile plains.

In the oldest days, before the coming of the Steinr, Hahnmark was the heart of the troll kingdoms and it was here that the three peoples first came together to oppose their enemies, and to create the union that has made their people the strongest in the world. The peaks of eastern Hahnmark are scattered with relics from the troll kingdom, mostly ruined and empty, or haunted by malignant spirits who hate the people of the lowlands with an endless, frigid spite. The higher peaks are avoided by sensible folk as a consequence.

Hahnmark is a rugged land, like the people who call it home. A slight majority of the population are Steinr, but as always there is a nearly equal presence of Suaq and Kallavesi people in its prosperous halls. The people of the rolling hills enjoy a high level of prosperity, their wealth coming from trade with other Imperial nations; from the mines and farms of the mountains and the flatlands; and from the strong sword-arms of its warriors.

The Senator for Hahnmark is appointed by the Steinr during the Autumn equinox, and is almost invariably from Steinr stock.

Recent History

During the invasion of Skarsind, many refugees came down through Pakaanan's Pass to find temporary homes in Northspires and Bruckland. Since the territory has been reclaimed, many are returning to their homes - although a number have chosen to stay permanently in Hahnmark. Concerns that the Thule might come further west and invade Hahnmark proved groundless, but there were repeated calls for the Hall at Kalpaheim and the vigilant Stormspires to be reinforced and further fortified. Successive Senates failed to agree to the amount of white granite needed, and the projects were largely abandoned.

Major Features

Kalpaheim

The largest settlement in Wintermark. Once capital of the entire nation, this is the site of the original joining of the three cultures. The settlement circles a stone fortress built in the first days after the defeat of the trolls - the Hall at Kalpaheim - parts of which extend into tunnels dug deep beneath the mountains. A prosperous hub for trade with other nations, Kalpaheim guards a large pass through the mountains that serves as a major trade-route down into the Marches, and the rest of the Empire. Other valuable trade routes include those to Hercynia in the north-west, and through the Navarr territory to the forests and mines of Skarsind and ultimately Varushka.

As well as safeguarding the prosperity of Hahnmark, Kalpaheim is a central feature in the heritage of the Winterfolk. The Face of King Ulmo, an immense carving of the first monarch of Wintermark, looks down upon Kalpaheim from the side of one of the western mountains. It serves as a reminder that the eyes of history are upon the town and the people of Wintermark. This impressive feat is one of the wonders of the Empire, constructed long before the nation joined the Empire by a trio of Artok under the control of the icewalker Gilda Heimssdottir. She also dug out most of the tunnels that parts of the hall now occupy.

When the Steinn travelled through mountain passes to find the Suag and Kallavesi, they sought guidance in visions. It is said that this high-mountain with its four jagged peaks rose above the mist in the early daylight, pointing out the way. It is now home to a religious settlement called The Fingers, where the virtues that founded Wintermark are celebrated; the Courage to carry such a bold plan through, the Pride gained through the trials of the journey, and the Loyalty that now joins the three peoples.

Gulnar's Deeps

An old series of copper mines in northern Kalpamark that unexpectedly broke into a much larger cave network beneath. The full extent of the caves has never been mapped, since ice and meltwater make much of it treacherous, but a wealth of minerals and metals now comes from the deeps.

Runegrott

In southern Northspires is found a vast labyrinthine chamber in the ice, in which many runes are carved. They are thought to be very old, and some scholars argue that the origin of runes in Wintermark lies here, rather than in the caves beneath Gildenheim. The chamber is carefully guarded. It is a matter of debate as to whether the runes bear any message -- some claim the original laws of Wintermark, and thus the Empire -- were taken from the inscriptions in this chamber.

New Dunhall

In 381YE Arnburh, the Dunhearth Hall and neighbouring Woodhall fell into a massive sinkhole. Forewarned by the Navarr, the Thane and Redfeldr were able to evacuate the town. During the Summer Solstice 381YE, plans were laid for a grand Wintermark trading town. The purpose of New Dunhall is four-fold: to re-establish and protect trade between Wintermark and the Marches; to serve as a base of operations for mining Lorenzo's Deep Pockets; and to provide a defence against any fell creatures that might come out of the deep earth. Work was begun almost immediately, and the majority of the construction completed shortly before the Autumn Equinox.

At the heart of the new town is a large market overseen by the Caretaker of New Dunhall, intended for commodity trading and the sale of the Dunning's fine artisan goods. A new Dunhearth Hall was built, larger and richer than the old hall, destroyed in the collapse. Along with the various barracks, supporting buildings, and defensible walls, New Dunhall represents a fine example of a Wintermark town, dedicated to the continuing security of the area.

Not far from New Dunhall is found Fallsheart Cave, a cavern exposed shortly after the sinkhole collapse which is a rich source of crystal mana. A Guardian is appointed to protect the cave, which is at some risk from hungry trogoni.

Regions

Bruckland

Of all the regions of Hahnmark, Bruckland has the highest concentration of halls that have a majority of Suag members. The cold, flat plains are scattered with low, artificial hills atop which lie stone beacons and desolate watchtowers. Between the hills wander large domesticated herds of deer, elk and the occasional mammoth. Fruitless attempts to domesticate the mammoths have largely been abandoned, but there are a few stubborn mammoth herders in Bruckland who follow the herds and occasionally harvest an old or injured member for ivory, hide and meat.

The most famous settlement in Bruckland, the fishing hamlet of Turelva lies across the waters of Kronevann from Kronehal. The two settlements enjoy a friendly rivalry in all matters; an annual fishing contest between the two has become a four day festival which boasts attendees from as far afield as Dawn.

Kalpamark

The heartland of Hahnmark, site of Kalpaheim and the face of King Ulmo. The halls of Kalpamark are some of the most prosperous and influential in Hahnmark - possibly in the whole of Wintermark.

Kronemark

The flattest part of Hahnmark, the downs of Kronemark are a patchwork of fishing villages and farms. The largest settlements sprawl around the shore of the icy lake Kronevann, or along the many streams that connect it to its sister lakes in Bruckland. The best known of the settlements on the Kronevann is Kronehal. Claimed as the home of Sigrid

Alvsdottir, legendary champion of the Steinn who slew Vatr, the one-eyed warleader of the trolls and as her reward claimed the crown of the Steinn.

Northspires

The hills and mountains of Northspires are a rich source of Orichalcum and Tempest Jade. Some of the highest peaks in Wintermark are found here, and there are scattered ruins on the upper slopes that date back to the height of the troll kingdoms. Several halls look down across the rest of Hahnmark from here, the most famous of which is probably the Stormspires. A remote fortress and watchtower whose commander is often titled 'the Eyes of the North', Stormspire keeps a careful watch on any traffic from the North. One of the key major beacons, the folk of Stormspire also maintain and staff a smaller network of beacons on nearby peaks.

Southridge

In the years before the foundation of the Empire, the rolling downs and woodlands of Southridge were the site of regular skirmishes between the Winterfolk and the Marchers. These came to an end with a final peace treaty, signed at the settlement of Moot. Grim-faced folk drew lines on maps and agreed to fight orcs, not each other. The place of meeting grew into a small trading settlement where Marcher grain goes north, and Wintermark sends its worked metal and leather south. Despite nearly five centuries of relative peace, however, there are occasional tales of haunted battlefields and unfortunate incidents with rowdy Marchers who ought to know better.

The woodlands and rugged gulleys of Southridge are also home to at least one hidden tribe of Feni who mostly keep to themselves but occasionally engage in banditry against travellers or poorly defended halls.

Valasmark

Rugged Valasmark slopes down towards the cold fens of Kallavesa to the south-west. In a populous valley near the centre of the region stands Valashal, a Hall almost entirely peopled by groups of Steinn, accepting warriors from all over the nation. Its stated intent is to be the greatest focus of martial heroism in the country and therefore the world. Without Suaq, their casualties in time of war tend to be horrific; but they also attract scops from far and wide to sing of their bravery and their dead are remembered for their glorious deeds.

Wood Heath

On the edge of the forests on the southern side of Hahnmark stood the bustling logging town of Woodhall which supplied a great deal of the wood, charcoal and Beggar's Lye for Wintermark's building, crafting and smithing. Woodhall also saw regular caravans from Temeschwar to the east, and enjoyed cordial relations with the Marchers of Upwold to the south. Without warning, however, Woodhall was destroyed - in Summer 381YE a massive sinkhole opened up that swallowed Woodhall, along with nearby Dunhearth, and the settlement of Arnburh. Only the advance warning from Navarr seers studying the Pool of Silver Clouds in Miaren prevented great loss of life.

Today, the newly built town of New Dunhall houses many of those displaced by the collapse. With the aid of the Caretaker of New Dunhall, the inhabitants work to ensure not only trade with the Marches and Temeschwar, but that those brave souls responsible for exploring the great pit are supported.

As with Southridge to the west, there is believed to be at least one tribe of secluded Feni in Wood Heath, although their attentions are mostly directed toward Upwold and Miaren.

OOC Notes

- The regions of Hahnmark are under the control of the people of Wintermark (and by extension the Empire) making the territory staunchly Imperial.
- Some of the prominent halls of Hahnmark are detailed here.

Theodric Mooting, Hero of Hahnmark

One of the great heroes of the Steinn people, Theodric Mooting was born in Valasmark some time before the foundation of the Empire. A talented scop from an early age, he was famous not only for his beautiful singing voice but also for his good heart and willingness to see the best in people. He quickly learned all the lessons his master had to teach him, and went on a great pilgrimage around Wintermark visiting halls across the nation to study with the scholars, musicians, and poets among his people.

A proud Steinr, he was never afraid to get his hands dirty - while he would often repay the hospitality of his hosts with music and poetry during the evenings, he spent his days sparring with their warriors, teaching their children, and working in their fields. A competent warrior, he bore banners into battle against Jotun, Feni, and Marchers with equal enthusiasm.

The most famous tale about Theodric involves the bloody enmity between two rival generals in Kronemark - the thane of Geranshal and her distant cousin the thane of Eilashal. Queen Linna called the two together to settle their differences but matters quickly escalated out of control - neither of the well-loved heroes could abide that the other drew breath. Blades were drawn by the thanes and the warriors from their halls. For a moment it seemed like the Queen's hospitality would be cast aside and the blood of one hero or another spilled in her hall, with potentially disastrous consequences for Hahnmark.

Before the first blow could be struck, Theodric stepped into the space between the feasting tables and began to sing. The Queen was quick to act - no fighting should take place while the scop sang. The two generals were forced to agree, and took the opportunity to prepare for the fight to come. To their surprise, however, Theodric sang for three days and three nights straight without faltering or repeating himself once. He moved the warriors to weeping for their own foolishness, and still he did not stop until exhaustion had claimed every other person in the Queen's hall - by which time cooler heads had prevailed. Over the next several days the thane of Gernashal and the thane of Eilsashal were able to settle their differences and, according to the stories, became close friends who fought beside each other on many battles.

Theodric is also known to have traveled for a time with the Dawnish exemplar Elayne Silverlark and her companion Lord Endric. The priests of Wintermark say that he taught her much about heroism, and just as much again about the proud arts of the scop. When she returned at last to Dawn, she took many of his songs and tales with her and paved the way for a better understanding between her people and the people of the Mark. For his part, Theodric is said to have learned to play several instruments previously unknown in Wintermark, and introduced several of them to his fellow scops as he continued his travels around Wintermark.

The scop himself lived to a ripe old age, and decided shortly after his seventieth birthday to head north and "explore Sydanjaa - to finally find out what rests at the heart of the eternal storm."

Hakima

Overview

The hakima are the guardians of magical lore in the Freeborn tribes. They trace their role back to the three founders who were each powerful ritualists with their own style and emphasis. A group of hakima recruits the most promising individuals from Freeborn families and give their loyalty to the nation as a whole, rather than any individual family. By drawing together ritualists from different backgrounds, the hakima ensure they have sufficient ability to cast powerful rituals, something that would be difficult for a single family to achieve by itself.

The hakima play an important political role in Freeborn life, acting as neutral arbiters and serving as the glue that holds Freeborn society together. The traditional role of the hakima is to provide advice and direction to individuals and families, and to help the nation as a whole prosper. While there are fools in any position, the position of hakima is well respected by most Freeborn who appreciate that they represent something of a higher calling. The best hakima use this respect to direct the Freeborn families in the best interests of all; the worst try to browbeat families into doing as they say.

The hakima have no formal power, but their neutrality gives them an important social role in helping to settle disputes and their magical skills mean that their support for individual families is invaluable, something they can translate into additional political influence. Members of hakima groups should try to make sure they are present when all important business is being decided by the Freeborn, to ensure that the right decisions are made.

While they see their first loyalty as being to the nation, they also recognise that tribal and familial identity are vital parts of that national identity. They vehemently oppose anything that might threaten the tribes, or compromise what it means to be Freeborn. While a group of hakima may represent all the tribes, the individual preserves their link to the founder. They keep the tribal element of their name, and never stop thinking of themselves as a Riqueza, Guerra or Erigo - not least to remind everyone else of the importance of tribal identity to the Freeborn.

If life was just about manipulating magic it would be easier by far.

Politics

The political power and influence of the hakima inevitably ebbs and flows depending on their numbers. The hakima were numerous in the run up to Britta's death, but many lost their life in the battle that claimed the last Empress. With their numbers significantly reduced since then, the hakima have struggled to muster the strength needed to cast the most powerful rituals and have seen their influence wane as a result.

Opinions on how to fix this problem remain divided. Traditional hakima groups favour covens formed along strict tribal lines, but in recent years many hakima have advocated that hakima of different tribes should try to work together to help the Freeborn of the Brass Coast prosper. Increasingly progressive groups of Riqueza, Guerra, and Erigo are seen working together on political and magical matters. These groups claim it is impossible for them to effectively help the families if they insist on sticking to narrow tribal lines. The conservatives warn that this new approach risks diluting the tribal legacy of the Brass Coast.

More than being just magicians, the hakima exemplify a connection to the founders of the tribes and the history of the Freeborn. They are traditionally held to be wise, able to perceive the larger picture more effectively than most Freeborn who are anchored in more mundane activities. They may be consulted when important decisions need to be made within a family, or when magical assistance is sought. They rarely wait to be consulted, however – a hakima is likely to be poking around any important business ready to offer a suggestion as to what to do next.

They are especially cautious about preserving the links to the founders that form the underpinning of tribal identity. They have little time for dabblers and charlatans who debase the legacy of the Founders and offer advice that claims to be based on divination but is as often as not made up on the spot.

Traditional hakima groups draw specifically on the original approach to magic used by their tribe's founder. Progressive covens prefer to combine the key elements of all three tribal traditions to include drumming, fire and poetry. As with all Freeborn ritualists, it is common for a ritual to be accompanied by a number of non-ritualists whose role is to create the proper atmosphere by joining in the singing and dancing. Whereas a "dabbler" will perform a ritual with and for the benefit of a single family, a hakima group is likely to invite any and all Freeborn to participate in their magical workings.

Creating a hakima

The hakima are intended to allow players to play a group of Freeborn ritualists who also have a significant role in the politics of the Freeborn nation, if they choose to do so. Players can choose to create a hakima group rather than play a traditional Freeborn family.

Individual hakima characters are recruited from Freeborn families, so you can still define your Freeborn family as part of your background. If you want to be from an existing Freeborn family, one played by current players, then it's worth contacting the group just to check they are happy with you doing that. Balancing the loyalties to your tribe with old ties to a family can be part of the fun of playing a hakima. Otherwise, you can define a small NPC family that your character is from.

It's perfectly acceptable to have characters in the group who aren't playing hakima. Members who want to play warriors should take a look at the kohan character role, who are often found with the hakima. There is no reason why a group of hakima wouldn't associate with a sutannir or a merchant, but if your group doesn't include these sorts of characters you are likely to be dependent on the other Freeborn family groups for help, a situation which will make the events much more enjoyable for everyone in your group. You will have to roleplay with the Freeborn families to obtain what you need, which is a lot more fun than just being able to sort it out without any roleplaying required.

Focusing your group on magic will make it more enjoyable for everyone in the group but it will also bolster your group's reputation and ability to perform powerful rituals. The hakima's position is derived from the magical support they render to the other families, the more focused on magic your group is, the more important you will be to all the other family groups.

It is possible to play a hakima character who is part of a Freeborn family group. Most hakima try to separate their duties to the nation from their ties to their family, but this is not always possible. Your character might be associating with a family to help give them direct guidance; working with them to achieve some long term goals, or simply belong to a group of hakima who maintain closer ties with their blood relatives than normal. Ultimately though, the respect the families are supposed to have for the hakima is based on their neutrality, on the fact that the hakima are loyal to the Freeborn people rather than any individual family. You can't expect other players to treat you as a hakima if you are very obviously just a ritualist who is part of a Freeborn family group. If you want to play a ritualist who is part of a family group, it may be better to play that idea to the hilt, perhaps even a character who has rejected the role of the hakima in favour of remaining loyal to their family.

You can create and play a lone hakima; it's hard to be powerful as an individual ritualist but your character may be able to make themselves essential by performing weak but important rituals. If you playing a hakima who is part of a group or coven of traditionalists, then you will need to ensure you are a member of the same tribe as the others. If you are joining a progressive coven then you are free to pick your own tribe.

Playing a hakima

The political role of the hakima is meant to be a subtle one. Part of their influence comes from the way they place the good of the nation above that of the family, so the more unbiased you can be, the more power you are likely to wield. The magic rituals you can offer are valuable to other groups, so don't be afraid to use that to get what you want from them, but the more subtle you can be about it, the better. If you try to throw your weight around and expect other players to do what you say because "the brief says the Freeborn respect the hakima" you are going to get nowhere. The hakima are supposed to be shrewd and wise in their dealings with the families; you have to play that part of the Freeborn brief to get other players to play theirs! Still, some hakima such as the Red Hills Coven of Kahraman make careful use of curses when dealing with those who transgress the traditions of Freeborn society - such magic represents the "stick" that accompanies the "carrot" offered by the enchantments of an organised hakima coven.

Most hakima consider the welfare of the Freeborn more important than that of the other nations that make up the Empire. In a dispute between a Freeborn family and a League guild, for example, they will almost certainly be staunch supporters of their fellow Freeborn. This can be a great excuse to be stubborn, and help other Freeborn players resist the temptation to compromise with outsiders.

Please don't be intimidated by the magical traditions set out for the three tribes. It's great if you are able to make effective use of your tribe's magical tradition, but it's not required. You're better off picking an approach that you're confident you can do well and enjoy than trying something you are hesitant about.

Other Magicians

The hakima are written with a degree of hostility towards those ritualists and spell casters who are not hakima but have remained part of a Freeborn family group. These characters directly undermine the power and influence of the hakima by offering the families a way to perform rituals without being dependent on the hakima. Traditionally the hakima have derided them as charlatans, which for a group who view themselves as wise and learned guides is meant to convey a degree of scorn and contempt for these dabblers, but how you react to their presence will depend on their numbers and power.

Whatever approach you take it is critical to appreciate that the family magicians represent an existential threat to Brass Coast society. The more family magicians there are - the less the families need the hakima. But the hakima are the glue that binds the three tribes together - without them the nation risks splintering and ultimately that would seem them destroyed. So the existence of family magicians ultimately threatens the entire existence of the Brass Coast.

A degree of hostility and contempt towards family magicians can help to remind everyone that these partisan dabblers are a break from the traditions of Freeborn society. If the hakima are numerous and able to perform powerful rituals than they can use that influence to encourage a degree of disdain for family magicians. But whatever the political situation on the ground, by far the most effective way to neutralise the threat of the family magicians is to recruit them into the hakima ranks. Most hakima are drawn from the families, if you can make this happen in play then it will be a significant boost to the power of the hakima and help to preserve the Brass Coast way of life for future generations.

If your hakima coven is small in number then disdainful superiority over the families will be difficult to pull off. You might need to take a more proactive approach, using items like Hakima's Mantles to work with family magicians to help them perform more powerful rituals. The key point to remember if you do that is that the role of the hakima is a higher calling than that of a family magician who is at the beck and call of their dhomiro. One uses magic as a political tool to gain influence to better serve the entire Freeborn nation - the other is a lackey who uses his magic at the behest of his group to earn them a few extra coins. But anyone can become a hakima, you just have to show them the way.

Hakima's Glass

Rules

Day Magnitude 2

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. The ritual targets a single object or character who must be present throughout, or the immediate area around the contributors.

Effects

At the completion the ritual reveals information about magic present on the target, equivalent to that which would be uncovered with the detect magic spell.

Additional Magnitude

You may increase the magnitude of the ritual to penetrate more powerful shrouds or masks.

Description

This simple ritual is old - it may even be one of the first magical rituals ever created. As with several similar rituals, academics theorise that the detect magic spell is an adaptation or refinement of this ancient ritual. It is known by many different names all over the world - and indeed across the Empire. When the groundwork for Imperial lore was laid, each nation had several versions of this ritual. An early decision of the Imperial Conclave concerned how the ritual would be referred to going forward - it came down to a surprisingly intense battle between the Dawn Reading the Weave, the Urizen Light of Truth, the Freeborn Hakima's Glass and a significant faction who argued the ritual should not be placed in Imperial lore under any name because it was essentially useless.

In the end, the ritual was retained by a narrow margin. While every magician can cast detect magic, it still has some minor uses - detect magic is not powerful enough to overcome even the most basic of shrouds, whereas this ritual allows a suitably expert coven to expend additional resources to empower their divination to penetrate (in theory) any magical concealment or obfuscation. In practice though, its value is limited - many covens would rather risk a more specific divination than perform Hakima's Glass and then have to follow it with a second divination, likewise empowered to defeat a shroud.

While the ritual is known in Imperial lore it is generally rarely mastered. Today, it is primarily the provenance of divination specialists - in a pinch, it is a relatively easy matter for even magicians who have not mastered the ritual to perform it should they need to - although they will struggle to do so at an appreciable magnitude.

Common Elements

The traditional method of casting this ritual is to employ a small flame, usually from a candle, a polished piece of glass or clear crystal to reflect the target, and a handful of ash or sand which is sattered on or near the target and the results examined in the reflective surface. The flicker of the light, the dance of shadow, and the disposition of the sand or ash are all interpreted by the ritual's magic and information derived about the nature of the magic effecting the target.

Other methods involved active divination, often with runestones or cards, or the use of lenses and mirrors (with their resonances for truth and discernment) to closely examine the target, scrying for the signs of magical influence.

The runes Sular and Ophis may be evoked - the former by covens who actively examine and seek information during the performance, the latter by covens that prefer to rely on sudden revelation to deliver information to them. The former group are usually active in handling the target, while the latter focus more on drawing up (or down) magical energies and may use incense, water or even some narcotics to empower their ritual. Other covens prefer to evoke Diras or Wyr - avoiding the stark clarity of the Day runes altogether and instead focusing on their own internal perception and understanding of the magic they seek to discern.

Likewise, totems of Wisdom, Vigilance, and (in the case of examining a magic item), Prosperity may be evoked, as might creatures such as owls or Sphinxes. The eternal Roshanwe or Sadogua are commonly evoked, but when examining a magic item Prospero is also appropriate.

Hallow

Overview

By hallowing an object, the priest creates a potent item aura drawn from their virtue. Item auras produce a roleplaying effect which can influence the way the character with the item acts, but they do not act as a source of spiritual strength so they cannot be used to overcome other roleplaying effects.

An item may only have one aura on it at once, so creating a new aura automatically replaces any existing standard aura. A durable aura is more difficult to remove. Characters with the same virtue can cooperate to create a durable hallow or to remove or replace an existing one.

The hallow ceremony is not the only way that an object may acquire an influential aura. There are many stories of an item used in a significant, dramatic way acquiring a spontaneous aura associated with spiritual power - although such events are hardly common. Some curses and dangerous spirits have the ability to create effects similar in effect to hallow, especially on items central to the nature of the malediction or ghost.

Performance

- Requires a dose of liao and at least ten seconds appropriate roleplaying
- Requires the presence and assistance of a referee
- It is not possible to use hallow to create an aura on large immobile objects.
- The priest must choose which aura they are creating during the ceremony

Hallowing an item uses a dose of liao. Performing the ceremony requires at least ten seconds of appropriate roleplaying and the item must be close enough to touch throughout.

After you hallow an item it is infused with a standard item aura that makes the bearer subject to a roleplaying effect chosen by you. You must choose one aura from the list available for the virtue you are dedicated to. It may take a short time for the aura to form completely.

You must have a referee to perform a hallowing. The referee will take your liao. You should then go to GOD to exchange your ribbon for the replacement with the hallow effect added.

You can use hallow on any item - even if it does not have a ribbon.

Effects

- Hallow creates an item aura on a mundane or magic item and names the item
- A hallow on a bonded magic item lasts as long as the item remains enchanted; a hallow on a mundane item lasts for a year (until the start of the Profound Decisions Empire event four events from now).
- Anyone who examines the item will be able to sense the presence of the aura
- Orcs are affected by hallowed items just like any other character
- Hallow does not provide a source of spiritual strength for overcoming roleplaying effects.

Hallowing a bonded magical item creates an item aura that lasts as long as the enchantment on the item. A mundane item can also be hallowed, in which case the aura lasts until the start of the Profound Decisions Empire event four events from now.

In addition the item receives a unique name chosen by the character performing the hallow - this name appears on the ribbon for the item and is any player who handles the item may choose to have their character able to discern the name as a strong impression received while handling it. Comedic names or names which are obviously taken from existing works of fiction are not appropriate for item names in Empire and will be rejected when identified.

A hallow on any item that does not have an expiry date already lasts a year. The roleplaying effects from a hallow expire when the item expires.

The strength of the hallow determines how difficult it is to remove or replace.

Removal

- A hallow on a bonded magic item lasts for as long as the item retains its properties.
- A hallow on a mundane item lasts for a year.
- The hallow skill can be used to remove an existing hallow.

As with any aura, an item can only be under the effect of one item aura at once. Hallowing an item that is already under the effects of a standard aura will automatically replace that aura. A durable aura is more difficult to replace - the new hallow must have a strength at least equal to that of the existing hallow or the ceremony will fail.

Any character with the hallow skill (including one who is not dedicated to a Virtue) may attempt to remove an existing hallow rather than replacing it. In the case of a durable hallow, the ceremony must still have a strength at least equal to that of the existing aura.

The hallow skill can also be used to remove item auras arising from other sources, including those created by some magical enchancements.

If a bonded magic item is reforged, any hallow present is removed.

True Liao

- True liao can be used in place of liao to perform the hallow ceremony
- An artifact can only be hallowed using true liao
- A true item aura allows the use of one additional dose of liao when performing a ceremony

You can use true liao in place of normal liao to hallow an item. This will create a true aura, it can only be replaced or removed using true liao or something of similar power. An artifact cannot be hallowed except by using true liao to create a true aura.

A true aura on an item allows the character carrying the item is able make use of one additional dose of liao whenever they perform a ceremony, allowing them to create effects with greater strength.

Hallow of the Green World

Rules

Spring Magnitude 160

The magnitude of this ritual may fluctuate as the Empire expands or contracts.

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 10 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets the entire Empire. It must be performed at the Imperial regio at Anvil. The ritual requires a map of the entire Empire which is used to harness and focus it's power.

This spell is an enchantment. A target may only be under one enchantment effect at a time.

Effects

The ritual enchants the entire Empire. Every herb garden in the Empire produces three additional herbs over the next season. The type of herb must be chosen and named as part of the ritual.

In addition, fertility increases across the Empire for animals, plants and people. While this is not immediately noticeable, in coming seasons there will be many more healthy children born.

The effect lasts until the start of the next Profound Decisions Empire event..

Description

As of the Winter Solstice 380YE, this ritual has been interdicted by the Imperial Conclave and is illegal to perform.

This old and dramatically powerful ritual enchants the entire Empire for a short time. It affects every herb garden in every region within the Empire, giving them a significant boost to both the fertility and general health of plants and animals.

During a season when this ritual is in effect, there are increased incidences of people encountering Spring regio, or the heralds of Spring eternals. Indeed, the eternal of Spring themselves seem to become more active after periods when this ritual is performed, and more interested in the activities of Imperial citizens. There is a superstitious belief that more of the children conceived during this period will express the briar lineage in later life, but the way the briar lineage develops has made a definitive study extremely difficult. There is some anecdotal evidence that especially high-lineage briar feel especially vigorous and during this period, and are a little more likely to lash out at those who anger them.

This is a powerful ritual, and few covens can perform it by themselves. When this ritual has been performed in the past, it has usually been achieved with the use of at least one Web of Celestial Attunement and with supplies of crystal mana from the Imperial Conclave. A coven that plans to perform it often spends several days in preparation, knowing that the eyes of the Empire are likely to be on them.

Ritual performances often include the evocation of the runes of Spring especially Bravash, and of the constellation of The Fountain. Hearth magics and symbols associated with health and Prosperity are also commonly evoked, such as shedding small amounts of blood or offering libations of wine or milk. The eternal Yaw'nagrah may be mentioned, but it is more likely that Imperial heroes and the names of paragons and exemplars will be called upon. The ritual often initiates, takes place during or culminates in a raucous feast or festival that can last long into the night,

Summer Magnitude 3

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets a character, who must be present throughout.

This spell is an enchantment. A target may only be under one enchantment effect at a time.

Effects

The target may call IMPALE once per day with a two-handed weapon.

The effect lasts until the start of the next Profound Decisions Empire event.

Additional Targets

This ritual can affect additional characters from the same banner. Every two additional characters increases the magnitude by 5. Additional characters must be present throughout.

Description

This enchantment is among one of the best-known Summer rituals. Along with Swift Leaping Hare, The Swan's Cruel Wing and Strength of the Bull it provides a coven with the ability to select the right enchantment to enhance any band of warriors. In this case, it allows those who wield great weapons to strike a single devastating blow that will potentially maim or completely incapacitate an opponent.

Common Elements

This ritual usually involves both the target and their great weapon. A ritualist might trace matching runes on weapons and warrior, or might anoint them with a mixture of blood and oil. A toast is often drunk, especially when the ritual is performed on a band of warriors rather than a single target. Legendary warriors, especially those known for their strength or uncompromising nature, are often invoked as are Paragons and Exemplars of warlike mien.

Any of the Summer runes might be evoked, but Verys, the rune of strength, is the most common (although the ill-favoured rune of storms may be used by especially war-like magicians). An evocation of The Stallion or The Oak may be appropriate with this ritual, as are evocations of bears, bulls and other powerful creatures such as lions and mammoths.

Hammers of the Brilliant Shore

Rules

Summer Magnitude 60

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 10 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets a fortification, and must be performed in a strong Summer regio in the territory containing the fortification. If the territory is part of the Empire, then it may instead be performed from the Imperial regio.

This spell is an enchantment. A target may only be under one enchantment effect at a time.

Effects

Over the coming season, the target fortification is repaired, restoring 250 points of its effective strength. This is in addition to any other repair the fortification receives.

The effect lasts until the start of the next Profound Decisions Empire event.

Additional Magnitude

The magnitude of this ritual can be increased to provide more extensive repairs. Every two magnitudes repairs an additional 10 strength.

Option

Any caster who has mastered the ritual may choose to substitute ambergelt for crystal mana when contributing to it. Every 2 measures of ambergelt spent counts as 1 crystal mana when contributing to the ritual.

Description

This ritual was first codified during the reign of Empress Brannan by the (in)famous Dean of the Lyceum Callus Strategos. While it was not entered into Imperial lore, it was included in his personal memoirs, the book "Meditations" which recently resurfaced in the Empire. The current owner of the book, Silvio de Tassato, offered the ritual to the Empire as "a virtuous display of Prosperity. by a penitent soul eager to be accepted back into the Way." The Declaration to enter the ritual into Imperial lore was raised by the Master of Ice and Darkness, Luke of the Shattered Tower, during the Winter Solstice 380YE, and the funds provided by the Highborn Roman of Reumah's Redoubt, and Asael of Cantiarth's Hold.

This ritual takes its name from the Brilliant Shore, a great white granite quarry in Skarsind. It repairs the walls of a fortification or castle. At the same time it smooths over imperfections, as well as the slow damage exposure to the elements can wreak, and if sufficient power is invested it will leave the structure looking as if it had just been completed. The ritual allows sufficiently powerful magicians to quickly repair a damaged fortification, from a distance if need be, and to use crystal mana (or ambergelt) in place of wains of white granite or weirwood.

The biggest restriction on performing the ritual is the requirement that it be performed in a regio. While it can be performed at the Imperial Regio at Anvil, this is of no help if the fortification that is to be repaired is not in an Imperial territory. For example, at the time the ritual was put into Imperial Lore it could not be used to repair the Towers of the Dawn without physically visiting a Summer regio in the Barrens, as Dawnguard where the castle stands is in a territory the Empire does not control.

During the ritual, the coven must clearly indicate the fortification they wish to affect – the name of the target, and both the territory and region it occupies, are the bare minimum required.

The magic is not instantaneous; it may take several days or even weeks to complete the repairs, depending on the size of the target fortification. The more damaged the fortification is before the ritual is cast, the longer it takes. Regardless of how much restoration is to take place, performing the ritual on a fortification that is at less than half its normal strength often leaves the ritualists physically exhausted – as if they had engaged in a full day of hard labour in the hot sun.

According to the book Meditations from which the ritual text was taken, the eternal Meraud offered some assistance in the creation of the ritual. The majority of the design was done by Cassidio von Holberg and Elspeth Grigori daughter of Rebecca, but some of the inspiration for drawing on ambergelt to provide a temporary seal to damaged stonework came directly from the Summer Mage.

Some magicians, however, have reported that the performance of this ritual may occasionally call up "strange little lizard people, who call themselves koboldi" although until recently the Empire had little more than hearsay to go on. When a similar ritual was used to help restore the beleaguered Castle of Thorns, a workforce of creatures dedicated to the eternal Adamant arrived to help restore the structure. While the ritual does not directly draw on Adamant's power, it appears that the magic sometimes results in the appearance of his heralds who work quickly and earnestly to repair the fortification.

Common Elements

Performance often uses images of physical labour, rather than the more martial images familiar from other Summer rituals. The use of hammers, picks or other stoneworking or mining tools resonates with this ritual, and there are some historical notes that the ritual was performed with one or more ritualists taking on the role of a “supervisor” and the other ritualists playing the role of workers or labourers.

References to the enduring power of the mountains – or the astronomantic constellation of the Mountain itself - resonate strongly with its performance. The rune Verys, which represents strength, is another obvious component to use. In a dramaturgical context, the Bishop or the Captain would both be appropriate Personae to use.

Evoking the eternal Adamant is particularly resonant, and may increase the chances that koboldi appear to repair the fortification, but there are other eternal names whose names might also be appropriate – perhaps most obviously Cathan Canae.

Cassidio convinced the Senator for Holberg to mandate that the walls be hung with great banners worked with the constellation of the Mountain and the rune Lann for several years in the firm belief it would make it easier to perform this ritual on his home city. I have no idea if it made any difference, to be honest.

Hand of the Maker

Rules

Autumn Magnitude 8

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. The ritual targets a ribboned item that must be present throughout.

Effects

This divination ritual discovers certain information about the provenance of an item. It answers some or all of the following questions:

- Who crafted this item?
- Was there anything special about the artisan? What was it?
- Were there any special circumstances involved in its crafting? What were they?

This ritual will only work on an item with a ribbon, or a Profound Decisions ID number. Information is usually revealed in the form of a short vision, and each contributor receives the same information.

If an item has been reforged - that is, it is a magical property whose properties have been restored after they have expired - the information can become a little confused. In this case, it will usually provide information about the time the item was first crafted, and may provide more than one name, or the name of only the first or the most recent artisan to work with the item.

If the item is shrouded or obscured by an effect of a higher magnitude, the ritual will identify the realm and magnitude of the shroud, and whether there is any information to be learned with Hand of the Maker, but nothing else.

There is almost always information available about who crafted a magic item - the divination function of the detect magic spell will determine if there is any additional information beyond the simple identity of the artisan.

Additional magnitude

You can increase the magnitude to overcome stronger shrouds and masks.

OOO Note

This ritual is similar to Skein of Years, but reveals information about a single specific incident (the creation of the item), as well as the name of the crafter. Potentially, it may reveal information about any object with a ribbon - even a large object such as a standing stone - detect magic will indicate if this is the case.

Description

This straightforward divination ritual recognises the prowess and skill of an artisan. It is similar in some ways to Skein of Years, but the information it provides is very focused - the circumstances of an item's manufacture and the identity of the person or persons responsible for it. It is useful to historians, but it also has applications in unraveling mysteries or investigating crimes. Being able to prove conclusively that a sword was forged by such-and-such an artisan can provide evidence in a murder trial, or secure the conviction of a thief.

In almost all cases, the name of the crafter can be uncovered. Not every item reveals information about the nature of that crafter, nor the circumstances of the item's creation. The detect magic spell can go some way to ward determining if there is deeper information associated with the item. Sometimes the diviners gain a brief glimpse of the act of creation, or of the crafter. Sometimes the divination focuses on the materials from which the item was made - often quite tricky to express in cases where (to use a historical example) a ring was "woven from darkness and the footfalls of cats on a loom of moonlight by the taloned claws of the malevolently chuckling Brother of Wizards."

- 3 Common Elements

Common Elements

As a divination, this ritual often involves the use of runestones, cards or similar divinatory tools. A League ritualist may study a card spread, or carefully handle the item while examining it with a jewelers loupe or lens to uncover the handiwork of a specific artisan. A Marcher cunning-man might scry the face of the crafter in a metal water-bowl or polished sphere, while those of a more mystical bent may inhale narcotic fumes and allow a divinatory vision to overwhelm them.

The rune Pallas, which represents both wealth and the art of the crafter, is particularly resonant with this ritual - tracing the rune on the item in blood, sweat, or ash is a common element. Likewise, the astronomantic constellation of the Web has some correspondence with the ritual - the item and the one who forged it are connected by bonds of fate and intent.

The Summer Magician made an arcane gesture with one hand and with a loud crack angry black storm clouds spiralled into existence. They hovered six inches above the surface of the panorama laid out on the table before him, and tiny bolts of lightning struck down into the soupy pale-coloured fog beneath them.

"And what else?" he asked.

"Another, similar storm rages on the coast of ..." his apprentice double-checked his notes. "Madruga? No! Feroz. It's one of the coastal ones in the ..."

"I know where Feroz is," said the Golden Magician mildly. His apprentice fell silent, looking stricken, Meraud ignored him and made another gesture. Another tiny tempest snapped into existence on the other side of the Bay of Catazar. He crouched down, bringing his head down to the level of the table, and watched the little maelstrom churn for several moments with a pleased smile.

Then he stood up and grabbed a tall, thin glass of iced apple cordial from the tray that floated effortlessly in the air nearby. With another absent gesture he sent the unseen servant away to fetch another pitcher.

"Now we have two of That Damn Woman's fortresses in Kahraman, I see. And one in Spiral. Were there any others?"

"No, master. Not as far as we are aware. Not even one of the twisted mazes in the marshes."

Meraud nodded several times, studying the panoramic view spread out before him. The table was nearly a dozen feet across, beautifully sculpted to mirror the territories, rivers, mountains, forests, and cities of the Empire. Yet rather than mundane stone or water, each feature was picked out in precious materials, some of them unknown in the mortal realm. Here and there, tiny phenomena were picked out in the form of clouds, diamond towers, tiny marching golden soldiers ... here and there entire sections of the map were covered with undulating black shadows, scattered with tiny moving stars. The air above the table was alive with magic.

The Lord of Summer Stars absently trailed his fingers over the Bay of Catazar, then made a face as they came away sticky with liquid quicksilver.

"And we're sure this thing is still there?" he asked, not looking at his apprentice. The golden-skinned youth nodded quickly.

"Yes master. Agamen went to make sure with his own eyes. The entire northern part of the bay is still mired in the stuff. The Empire appears to have little interest in removing it - its just possible that they made it themselves for some reason. It could be an attack on the Grendel, says Agamen."

Meraud had stopped listening. He moved round the table to where silver and jet mountains towered over great jade forests, each tree carved with exquisite skill by tiny hands.

"And this aura, it is certainly magic with the tang of Spring you say?" His hand hovered over the forests of central Varushka. Tiny green sparks danced and twirled around his delicate fingers. He took an absent sip of cordial.

"Yes, master. As is ..." The apprentice looked back to his notes. "The curse on the Barrens, both storms, and the healing waters in western Freeland, and eastern Urizen."

"The people call it the Brass Coast," chided Meraud. His apprentice looked confused.

"But they are called the Freeborn, so I just assumed ..."

"I understand it is a long story. You may want to go and read about it before you accidentally call it Freeland and outrage one of their hakima."

Meraud straightened up.

"Is that everything?"

"As far as we know, yes master. Only ... Lytemna has not returned yet. She sent word that she would be delayed with the deCasillon - apparently they have some fascinating guests she wants to get to know better. Should I have word sent to her to ..."

Meraud laughed, a sudden bark of amusement.

"By no means! If Lytemna fancies a dalliance with the Navarr, then it would be rude to interrupt her. That will be all, Cassa."

The apprentice tucked his scroll under his arm, and inclined his head while clasping his hands together, and withdrew. Meraud barely noticed. He continued to prowling around the table, peering at some drama only he could see. He finished his apple cordial, and placed the empty glass on the tray that had slipped up to his elbow in anticipation of his needs.

From somewhere among his robes, he withdrew a golden-skinned apple. He polished it on his sleeve for a moment, inspected it, and took a bite. As he ate, a broad smile spread across his face, causing his eyes to dance, and he began to chuckle.

"Well, that is an interesting development," he said to nobody in particular.

Overview

The Empire is nothing if not a magical place. Much of the magic is scaled to the personal, but some is outrageously potent and spills out across the world in a torrent.

Fresh Water

Redoubt and Spiral in Urizen, and Segura in the Brass Coast all experience a particularly vibrant Spring. Powerful Spring magic resonates in the waters of these three territories. The waters are full of energy and life, and any wound that is not immediately fatal heals practically overnight.

Storms

Powerful magical storms batter the coast of Spiral in Urizen, and Feroz in the Brass Coast. For all their power, they do nothing to disrupt the magical fog - but they play havoc with local shipping. All fleets based in these two territories find their ability to trade, privateer, or support a navy penalised by as much as a quarter.

More importantly, any navy beginning the season, ending the season, or passing through one of those territories during the season, will suffer some damage from the rough seas, fog-ghosts, and lashing tendrils and serpents of animated water. It is fortunate, no doubt, that The Freeborn Storm is still safely docked in the Atalaya shipyards in Madruga.

Green Shoots

For a child to be born expressing the briar lineage is exceptionally rare. Last season, there were reports of eight such children all born in Upwold, most of them in the vicinity of Tower March. In the three months since the Winter Solstice, a further five children have been born with bark - over half the children born in the area over the last season.

At first it appeared that the phenomenon was limited to Tower March, but shortly after the Winter Solstice the first of these eerie briar children is reported in Mieriada in distant Miekarova. The children are supernaturally healthy, but almost all of them are marked with vivid emerald eyes - and with supple patches of bark, of course.

Any character from Tower March or Mieriada who is roleplaying that they have had a child in the last season is welcome to roleplay that their offspring is one of these briar children. The only thing odd about them is that they all appear to be high lineage briars at a time in their lives when it is extremely rare for anyone to manifest briar lineage. It is important to note that these babies are ageing at the normal rate, and are not appropriate character concepts for anyone older than three months (for Varushkans) or six months (for Marchers).

- 2 Significance

The eerie, glowing fog that appeared from nowhere last Autumn still clings to the shores of the northern Bay of Catazar. Imperial magicians still have no idea exactly what it is or what it does. All they know is that it is an effect of the Night realm, of thirtieth magnitude, which conceals information - including information about its own nature and properties. Magicians still agree that the effect could be examined with a suitably powerful performance of a ritual such as The Eye of the High Places, targeting one of the affected territories, but bypassing a potent shroud of this magnitude is no simple matter.

Veils of Night

The skies above Madruga, Zenith, and Tassato continue to appear strange. During the day the effect is barely noticeable, although during a rainstorm in Tassato residents were charmed by the appearance of not one but seven rainbows that lasted for several minutes and included several colours not normally seen in this sort of phenomenon.

The effect is much more obvious at night however - the skies over the three territories are transformed. The changes are sometimes subtle - stars in the wrong place, or the moon in the wrong phase. On other nights - especially in Madruga - the sky appears entirely unnatural. On one particularly strange night the Freeborn were greeted by a moon that was clearly absent because it had been destroyed - leaving in its place a conglomeration of drifting rocks. Other odd phenomena have included a night when the moon was surrounded by a dramatic green ring of light; a night when the northern half of the sky was entirely empty of stars; a night when half the stars grew bright and then faded from existence on an hourly cycle; and an occasion when all the familiar stars vanished entirely except the nine stars of the Fountain - although in this case those nine stars appeared to have become a virulent emerald in hue that lasted until morning.

Magicians agree that this is caused by Drawing the Penumbral Veil. The shroud over Madruga is the most powerful, its magnitude in the high forties. The shroud on Zenith is also quite potent, in the low thirties, while the shroud over Tassato is the least potent - but still impressive. Any attempts to divine information about or scry these territories must overcome the potency of the shroud or reveal nothing.

The Crumbling Fountain

As the final preparations are being made to travel to Anvil for the Spring Equinox, the inhabitants of the Court of the White Fountain in Redoubt notice the first signs that something is wrong. Built in the foothills of Optarion, the Court is a single massive tower of white granite surrounded by a massive semi-circular wall. It completely fills one of the few major passes between Redoubt and the Broken Shore. The great courtyards of the tower are sufficient to hold the entire armed forces of Urizen, and the open ground they represent creates a deadly killing field for the skilled Urizen archers who man the upper reaches of the tower and the walls.

The White Fountain for which it is named is a great plume of liquid fire that bursts from somewhere deep within the earth and cascades down into a black basin before the tower, before disappearing back beneath the ground ... and this plume of fire appears to be weakening. It has lost perhaps as much as a quarter of its height over the last three months. At the same time, the white granite stone of the tower itself and the encircling wall is beginning inexplicably to crumble.

The magicians who live in and protect the tower are at their wit's ends. At first, there is concern that the Spring magic that blankets the mountainous territory might be to blame, then that it was some side-effect of the eerie conjunction, but with further investigation it is discovered that the tower is under the influence of a powerful curse with the bleak flavour of the Winter realm with a magnitude in the vicinity of one hundred.

The fortification has already endured significant damage, but hopefully the worst has passed.

Significance

These large-scale magical effects are perceptible to everyone in the territory, and stories spread across the Empire. In each case, it might be possible to learn more through the use of divinatory magic such as The Eye of the High Places or possibly Dreams in the Witch House - although in the case of some of them, the magic will need to be powerful enough to overcome their shrouding effects if any significant information is to be gleaned.

Further details might require the use of an appropriately designed arcane projection however - especially those which are caused by a potent curse.

- Several other magical effects - including a number of frozen citadels, a wicked curse in the Barrens, and several exotic phenomena in Spiral - were detailed in the winds of war.

Hands of the Healer

Rules

Spring Magnitude 19

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets a character, who must be present throughout. The target character must have the magician skill.

This spell is an enchantment. A target may only be under one enchantment effect at a time.

Effects

When the target swift casts the heal spell, they need only spend 1 mana rather than the usual 2 mana. The target does not gain any additional knowledge of, or ability to cast, the heal spell if they do not know it.

They also experience a roleplaying effect: your empathy for other people is greatly enhanced. When you see a living creature in pain, you feel an urge to alleviate that pain - regardless of how you feel about that person.

The effect lasts until the start of the next Profound Decisions Empire event.

Additional Targets

This ritual can affect additional characters from the same coven. Each additional character increases the magnitude by 15. Additional characters must be present throughout.

Description

Where Fountain of Life allows a magician to perform healing spells, Hands of the Healer allows a magician who is already proficient with magical healing to use their power significantly more quickly, and removes the possibility that they can be interrupted. The ritual accelerates the use of items such as the Acolyte's Mercy wand, as well as the spells cast by a magician under their own power.

Unfortunately it does not allow a magician to use an item such as a Bloodwoven Braid, which does not allow the spell to be swift cast, any more quickly.

The ritual also explicitly does not grant the target the ability to perform the heal spell; the target must already know how to cast the spell to be able to gain any benefit from the enchantment. Speeding up the use of the heal spell has obvious applications in dangerous environments; it allows a magician to provide magical healing on the front-lines without fear of being interrupted, or requiring their patient to stop defending themselves.

Magicians who experience this enchantment speak of feeling as if the magical energy they draw on is eager to be unleashed. They recount an almost instant connection between themselves, their magic, and their target. The magic leaps easily across the gap from caster to patient; indeed, it is nearly impossible to hold it back. Experiments have shown that while a magician can choose to perform one of their healing spells in the usual manner while under this enchantment, doing so can cause them physical discomfort - one waggish hakima likened it to having a particularly full bladder.

If the ritual has a drawback, it is that it greatly increases the ability of the magician to feel sympathy for those who are in pain. Some magicians find the experience of being on a battlefield especially upsetting; some especially sensitive magicians even speak of feeling the wounds inflicted on their allies and their enemies as if they were inflicted on themselves.

It is important to note that this ritual does not affect the performance of rituals - The Hands of Sacred Life is not effected for example. The enchanted magician must be in some way "casting" heal to draw on this power.

Common Elements

As with many healing rituals, blood and water are common elements. Washing the hands with water or wine is common, as are invocations using the names of famous or legendary physicians and healers. The firebird, which heals itself instantly with the power of flame; the herbs true vervain or cerulean mazzarine; and the constellation of The Fountain are all popular images to use with this ritual.

Runes such as Rhy or the rune of thought may also be evoked - the first in its role as the rule of healing as well as bloodshed, the latter in its aspect as the rune that is concerned with education and mental skills.

Some Dawnish and Wintermark rituals paint the rune of majesty on the hands of the target, seeking to imbue them with consummate healing skill.

Hard times

Marcela could hear the crowd in the distance shouting and cheering, but it was difficult to make out what was being said and keep the interest of the guard at the same time. He clearly wasn't going to let her get any closer, but the longer she could keep him haggling, the longer she could linger her without arousing suspicion.

"Now young man - that is clearly a valuable piece of jewellery you have there - it's well made and with that moving aura on it, it is worth a pretty ring or two. But it's only made from common materials and that does limit the price... So I can't go higher than 2 crowns, but I am willing to throw in this plump, juicy chicken. I guarantee you will not taste anything finer."

She smiled at the young man's obvious hunger, but fortunately her tagelmust hid the grin as she waved Erica - the plumpest chicken to be found in Segura - in his face. The chicken squawked at the treatment, but she wasn't really listening to either of them.

"... will you join me in this righteous crusade?" the priest's words echoed over the crowd by were drowned out but were immediately drowned out by the cheers and shouts of assent.

The guard was losing interest again, so Marcela switched her focus back. She popped the chicken back in the cage and instructed the young man to pay close attention to her. Flamboyantly she began to pat down her robes making an outlandish show of searching for something.

"... has risen again..." the damn crowd were quiet now - but the priest had a good sense of drama and he had also dropped his voice "... returned from the Labyrinth to lead us..."

"Ta da" she said producing the jar that had been in her sleeve all along with a triumphant gesture - "I present to you the finest chicken sauce you have ever tasted. My own husbands personal recipe - add a little of this to your oil when you fry the meat and it will taste divine."

She uncorked the bottle and waved it under the young man's nose, letting him inhale the mix of potent spices. His hand moved to the medallion around his neck as if to keep it safe, but it was a clear tell. The sale was as good as made...

Overview

A month after the Autumn equinox, a group of roughly two hundred men and women cross the southern border of Feroz from the Iron Confederacy territory of Kalino. They come down out of the hills that were once the domain of the Lasambrian orcs. Initially they are pursued by a significant force of Iron Confederacy soldiers, but the soldiers give up the chase once it is clear that they will have to push deep into Imperial territory to catch their prey.

The people they were pursuing represent the remnants of the same faction that approached the Synod for aid last Winter - rebellious slaves fighting the Iron Confederacy in Kalino. Their priorities have evolved since then, however. Where once they were interested in learning more about the Way, now they seem to have found their own source of spiritual strength. Freeborn traders who visit the escaped slaves camp report encountering unusual auras, specifically a consecration that is not one of those associated with the known virtues.

They seem disinterested in taking refuge in nearby Bramar, and instead establish makeshift camps near the southern borders of Feroz. From here they continue their campaign of armed resistance against Duke Guiscard of the Iron Confederacy, making sporadic raids over the border. A month later representatives of Duke Guiscard make a formal presentation to the Empire, asking for assistance to help them resolve the problem. In the absence of a legitimate ambassador with authority to speak on behalf of the Empire, the civil service do their best to receive the representatives and ensure that their wishes are made known to those attending the summit.

According to the representative of Duke Guiscard, the rebels are the remnants of an armed resistance to the Iron Confederacy that is attempting to overthrow the legal ruler of those lands. The Duke recently completed a powerful fortification that makes it impossible for these people to pose a credible threat. Rather than face him openly on the field of battle, they have fled over the border into the Empire to avoid any chance of a direct confrontation. Had they been content to flee his lands and never return he claims he would have been only too happy to let these malcontents go, but they show no signs of ceasing their resistance. Instead they are using their camps near the southern border to launch regular raids across into his lands - a situation he deplures and worries will damage existing good relations.

Rather than risk a pitched battle, the insurgents have adapted their tactics and are now conducting an ongoing campaign of hit-and-run attacks against the legitimate ruler of Kalino, attacking any caravans or settlements that they can overpower. According to the Duke, they are attacking Suranni merchants as well as isolated mines and farms. Dozens of Suranni have been murdered by the group, merely for trying to defend themselves. They have also engaged in widespread acts of sabotage and vandalism, firing farm buildings and collapsing mines as well as stealing large amounts of valuable property which they are bringing back to Feroz to swell their own numbers.

The representatives of the Duke explain that the whole matter has put him in a very difficult position. He would dearly like to send his army over the border to crush his enemies, but he absolutely understands that such an action is completely unthinkable without the Empire's explicit approval. The Duke is very keen to maintain Imperial goodwill, he is clearly desperate to resolve this problem, but not so desperate to countenance an action that would jeopardise good relations with the Empire.

His envoy expresses the hope that the Empire can find a way to help the Duke resolve the problem - if the matter can be dealt with discreetly and expediently then he will be indebted to the Empire. Apparently the Duke controls the output of the Arav's Delve an important supply of white granite - a material believed to be in short supply within the Iron Confederacy. Now that his fortification is complete, if this current problem could be resolved, the Duke would be interested in formalizing a relationship with the Empire to allow any spare white granite to be sold to the Empire at an agreed price.

It is worth noting that there is currently no Ambassador to the Iron Confederacy, but the civil service will as usual have prepared a briefing for them. If the post is filled, this briefing may contain more information about this situation from the Suranni point of view.

Assisting the Iron Confederacy

There are various options that the Empire could take to support the Duke of Kalino to help him defeat his enemies. All of these are likely to improve diplomatic relations, but the more effective the assistance, the greater the benefit.

Declare the Rebels to be Barbarians

At present the rebels are largely supporting themselves by buying essential supplies from local merchants using wealth they have taken during their attacks over the border. This isn't much, but it is enough to enable them to make effective raids on their former Suranni masters. Their numbers are slowly growing as a result - and in time they could become an effective fighting force if left unchecked.

If the Imperial Senate chose to declare the rebels to be barbarians, it wouldn't cost the Empire anything, but it would significantly hamper the rebels efforts. It would no longer be legal for Imperial citizens to trade with them - and while some black market trade would still happen - the rebels would have to pay vastly higher prices for far less. Provided they weren't getting fresh supplies from anywhere else this would make it impossible for them to grow.

If the Duke is informed of the decision, then he is likely to be quietly grateful to the Empire for taking this position. He might press the Empire to do more - but in real terms the relationship between the Duke and the Empire will improve as a result of this action. This option would not bring the problem to an end, but it would contain it and prevent the situation from deteriorating. That might give the Empire the possibility exerting some leverage over the Duke in future however.

The risk of such an approach is that if they are declared barbarians then the rebels might no longer have anything to lose. At that point they may attempt to secure their position by raiding Imperial settlements, merchants or travellers.

Ejecting the Rebels

The rebels have a very low effective fighting strength - comparable with an army of barely a thousand soldiers at best. The Empire could decisively resolve the problem of the uninvited guests, by sending an army to Feroz to eject them. The army would have to engage the force - and there would be a few casualties - but the outcome would never be in question.

If an Imperial general submits any attacking order to travel to Feroz and engage the rebels then they could force them back over the border, provided they secure at least one victory point. Casualties on the Imperial side would be low. Provided the Senate supported this action by declaring the rebels to be barbarians, there would be no legal repercussion for such an order.

Once the rebels are back over the border, then the Suranni forces could engage them decisively - particularly if the Empire opted to coordinate with Duke Guiscard by letting them know of the impending action. In that latter case, the rebels would be eliminated and the Duke of Kalino has effectively stated that he would be clearly indebted to the Empire for their assistance in destroying the threat.

Permitting the Duke to Deal with Them

At the moment the Duke is unable to bring the rebels to battle because their camp is clearly well over the border in Imperial territory. To engage them, the Suranni would have to send at least one army over the border - something they are clear that they will not do without explicit permission from the Empire.

The Imperial Senate could authorise the Ambassador to the Iron Confederacy to invite the Duke to send his forces into Feroz to deal with the rebels. Obviously that would entail foreign armies entering Imperial territory and engaging with their enemies there. However provided there were no incidents, there is no reason why such an attack need cause any legal problems. It would be a clear gesture of friendship and trust towards the Iron Confederacy and would enable the Duke to eliminate his enemies.

In theory the ambassador could send such an invitation without authorisation from the Senate. That would have the same military and diplomatic effects as above, but could be of dubious legal nature and could well incur political ramifications for the ambassador if the Senate took exception to such a bold embrace of the ambassadors authority.

The Suranni are no fools - they are not going to be fooled into sending armies over the border without a signed invitation that was clearly from an ambassador in good standing; the Duke is not about to be tricked into invading the Empire on the basis of communications from any other citizen.

Ignoring the Situation

There is no requirement for the Empire to do anything at all, of course. The rebels are not engaging in illegal acts in Feroz - indeed they are happy to trade with Freeborn merchants and traders for the supplies they need. If the Empire does nothing, the rebels will continue to raid across the border into Kalino. They will rob Suranni caravans, and free slaves. Their numbers will slowly grow and they will become an increasing threat - one that may eventually come to threaten the position of the Duke himself if he is not able to take action to defeat them.

Opposing the Duke

The counterpoint to helping the Duke win his war would be to provide assistance to the people trying to over-throw him. It is highly likely that the group would welcome any credible offers of assistance. The most useful supplies would be money (with which to feed themselves) or mithril (with which to arm themselves) if either were available. Direct military assistance would be most useful but would be legally impossible without an appropriate Senate motion to change the political and diplomatic situation.

Ultimately without clear information on their position and plans, it is not possible to Imperial civil service to be sure what effects that would have on their military position. What is clear is that any direct assistance would damage diplomatic relations with the Duke and possibly with the Iron Confederacy as a whole, assuming that they found out about it.

Auras

Freeborn citizens who have visited the camp have confirmed that there are two priests there preaching to the camps and conducting ceremonies using liao that shows all the hallmarks of being Imperial in origin. There is no doubt about this last fact, as the liao is in the small purple bottles produced by the Empire to help regulate the production and use of liao. In fact there appear to be significant supplies of such liao in the camp.

The Suranni are making some effort to keep any Imperial visitors from listening to their sermons, which naturally arouses suspicion from the Vigilant! One of the Freeborn, a young hakima called Marcela i Erigo was able to acquire a hallowed item that one of the priests had created - albeit not from the priest directly but from a member of his congregation who sold it for 2 crowns and a large plump chicken.

Marcela has arranged for the item to be sent to Anvil along with a list of their concerns. The civil service have taken receipt of the item and have made arrangements for it to be given to the Imperial Inquisitor, so that they can conduct a thorough examination.

Notes

As with several other recent Winds of Fortune there are any number of things that could effect this situation. Rather than lay out a straightforward list of things that the players must do to solve the problem, we've detailed various obvious things players could do to try and address the situation of the Suranni presence in Feroz. The list is accurate but not definitive. There will be things that players might think of that we have not considered. As with a mandate - we will try to add something to the wiki if you email your idea to us in the next few days (along with an appropriate explanation of how effective it would be). Otherwise you will have to take your chances at the event!

At present there are no options for the Imperial Synod to influence the situation. The rebels did make overtures to the Synod a year ago but they were rebuffed. The revolutionaries have found their own source of spiritual strength, and consequently even less likely to respond favourably to any outreach. The Synod could still choose to involve itself in this matter using an appropriate judgement such as a statement of principle, but any mandate is likely to be more effective focusing its attentions on Imperial citizens, rather than the Suranni rebels.

Harvest Time

Lyrics by Jude, to the tune of Pull Down Lads as sung by June Tabor on her album 'Airs and Graces'.

A pdf of the lyrics and tune can be found here with an additional verse if you choose to use it.

Harvest time The corn stands tall and ready We'll reap the grain and sow again The seeds of what will be You marched with Britta's army To fight for loyalty And while you're away, it's here I'll stay Till you come back to me

Darkness falls And all the land lies dreaming The stars are bright and shine tonight They burn as bright as day They'll guide you on till morning Until the east is gray And across the land the dolmens stand Like milestones on your way

Seasons turn And autumn's changed to winter And in the sky the ravens fly Above the frozen fen We'll stand up on the hillside And light the wicker men And like beacons bright they'll burn tonight To guide you home again

Hat

Most Marcher costumes will wear some sort of headwear. Hoods, coifs, caps and hats all add to the Marcher look. There are lots of hats that would look great in the Marches, the key kinds are a simple skullcap, a square cap, an acorn cap and the bag or sack hat.

Hayaak

Eternal of Summer

Sobriquets

Hayaak is called the Gryphon-King.

He is also known variously as the Brother of Lions and the Hawk Lord.

Appearance

Hayaak is a heavy-set masculine figure with a feathered brow. When he is in a warlike mood he wears a helm shaped like the head of an eagle, armour made from the thick hide of some monstrous lion, and gauntlets with clawed fingers; when he is calm, he wears fine gold and brown clothing in the style of a Dawnish Earl with a golden crown. He is rarely without his warhorn and his great two-handed axe.

He is usually encountered in the wilds; while he apparently owns a great castle, he is most often found hunting in the vast expanse of the Forest of Arden, which surrounds his domain and the dominion of which he contests with several other Summer Eternals. Those who meet Hayaak are left in no doubt that this is a being with a quick temper; he has an aura that warns them of the danger of attracting his ire. Weak-willed individuals cannot meet his gaze, and must fight to stay in his presence if they think they have offended him.

The Gryphon-king has a well-known weakness; he enjoys and savours tales of romance, especially those that involve treachery and retribution. Some bards and troubadours have performed before Hayaak and received valuable gifts or boons when their work has pleased him, and occasionally painful curses when their work has bored or offended him.

Concerns

Hayaak exemplifies the wrath that lies at the heart of the Summer Realm. When he is in a good mood, he is gregarious, regal and welcoming. His mood can shift quickly in response to a real or imagined slight, and while it is rare for him to become angry when he does he seeks to annihilate whatever has drawn his ire. He is often involved in conflicts with other Summer Eternals.

Relatively straightforward and bluff, Hayaak is passionate about questions of honour and revenge. He encourages those who consider themselves wronged to seek redress, but seems to lack a sense of justice. One stargazer described him as being "wildly disproportionate in his retribution; tread mud through his home and he will burn down your town to settle the score."

Boons

This moody Eternal is known for his Lion-bound horn that drives foes before it, and the one-handed spear Retribution that shatters the shields of his enemies and inflicts deadly wounds on their bodies - only a knight in full harness can hope to stand against Hayaak in battle - and he will sometimes offer a fraction of these powers to mortals. He can also fan the flames of wrath or vengeance in a mortal heart, helping to harden them for the retribution they feel they must take.

Many of Hayaak's court are knights and warriors, and he is known to lend their aid to mortal endeavours from time to time, especially in pursuit of vengeance.

Head Gardener of Urizen

Overview

The Head Gardener of Urizen is an Imperial title commissioned in Autumn 380YE by the then Civilian Commissioner of Urizen, Juliana of Phoenix Reach. The position of Head Gardener is a sinecure, requiring minimal responsibility but offering a regular income of valuable herbs. It was amended in Autumn 381YE by the Imperial Senate, adding additional responsibilities and changing it from a tenured position to an annual appointment.

Responsibilities

In addition to receiving a bounty of herbs from the Garden of Pallas, the Head Gardener of Urizen is custodian and record keeper for the Prosperity fund of Urizen. They are expected to use the fund to secure the greatest Prosperity for the nation. They are also responsible for the safekeeping of the Garden of Pallas - if the garden were to be threatened in any way, it would be their responsibility to deal with those threats. Likewise, if any opportunity relating to the gardens presented itself, they would make any decisions needed to take advantage of it.

Powers

Grand Bounty of Herbs

The Head Gardener gains custodianship of a sinecure. They receive a significant amount of herbs each season: seven doses of True Vervain, and 5 doses each of Imperial Roseweald, Cerulean Mazzarine, Marwort, and Bladeroot.

Appointment

The Head Gardener of Urizen is appointed during the Winter Solstice, by a judgement of Appointment in the Urizen National assembly.

The title can only be held by a Urizen citizen. They can be revoked by the General assembly, the Urizen National Assembly, and the Assembly of the Nine.

The Gardens of Pallas

In the absence of other guidance, the Civil Service built the Gardens of Pallas in central Iteri, along the banks of the river Couros in Zenith. The gardens are carefully laid out in such a way that the various beds form the Rune of wealth when viewed from above. Likewise, the ushabtj that tend the herb beds have the rune inlaid onto their faceplates and chests. These ushabti are specially adapted to the task of looking after the gardens - each has a useful gardening tool in place of one of its "hands", and cunningly made wicker baskets for collecting herbs mounted on their backs.

Heal

Description

This powerful spell restores the physical vitality of a target, even one that is on the verge of death. It is equally effective at restoring a scribe who has taken a minor wound, or a hulking ogre who has been critically injured. There seems to be no limit to the ability of this spell to restore someone to full strength. The experience of being healed by magic is highly subjective; some patients describe it as a great burst of vitality that rushes through them like a flood; others as a slow trickle of sensation that begins at the magician's hands and spreads with growing speed throughout their bodies.

The power of this spell is indiscriminate; it cannot be used to partially heal someone (such as a prisoner). Further, it can heal almost anything animate, even things that might otherwise not be considered to be alive in the usual sense - it restores shambling husks and ushabti as efficiently as it restores a human or orc. On the other hand, it is unable to help things that are not animate - while a tree can be considered to be alive, the heal spell has no effect on it.

This is perhaps the most powerful source of emergency healing available in the Empire, but its abilities are strictly delineated. It will not help with a traumatic wound; someone may be fully healed but slowly dying from a ruptured spleen or fractured skull. It will not regenerate a crippled or ruined limb, nor combat poison, venom, curses, weakness or diseases. While magical methods of dealing with all these conditions exist, a magician who wishes to optimise their medicinal capabilities will need to learn additional spells such as restore limb and purify.

Magical healing requires the magician to focus their attention on the patient, and anything that disrupts that attention causes the spell to fail. More than any other regular spell, heal is likely to be cast in dangerous environments, and the magician must take care that neither they nor their target are in immediate danger of having to fight before they begin the spell. A single blow, regardless of who strikes it or is struck, can disrupt the spell forcing the magician to start again. Magicians who anticipate needing to heal allies caught in the middle of an engagement often make reparations to support repeatedly swift casting the spell - although it has a somewhat reduced effect from the regular casting. Others invest in specialist items or enchancements such as a Trollswave Vest or the Hands of the Healer.

There are several magical items that can enhance or empower the heal spell. They range from simple tools such as Altruist's Recompense wand that lets a magician share in some of the healing they provide, all the way to objects of great power such as the Woundbinder or the Robe of Blood and Bone which can dramatically increase the number of times the spell can be cast in a day.

Casting

- Type: Regular spell
- Cost: 1 Personal mana

Effects

This spell completely restores all lost hits to a living target. It does not affect a limb that has been affected by a CLEAVE or IMPALE call.

Swift casting

- The heal spell can be swift cast for 2 mana

When swift cast, the heal spell restores only 3 hits to the target rather than restoring all their hits

The following are sample vocals you can use to cast this spell if you don't want to make up your own.

- (touching the target with a blade) "The day is not done, it is not time to sleep / I charge you to awake, your courage revealed / Arise this moment, your battle oaths to keep / Stand now, and step forth for you are healed!"
- (evoking Rhyv) "You are wounded, and your blood has been spilled on the ground, but the well of life is bottomless. Blood calls to blood, my blood to yours, both of us bound by the ebb and flow of the eternal sea. Let me share my strength with you, it is like the ocean, let it flow into you. It leaves me undiminished, and fills you with life, healing your wounds."
- (sprinkling water) "Things heal. What is broken shall be mended. What is weak shall be made strong. Things now apart will come together and be made one. Drink now from the celestial chalice, drink deeply from the cup of the heavens and behold! You are healed!"
- "Life calls to life; I tell you now to let the life flow into and through you, to wash away your pains; your wounds are stripped away before the torrent of life, which always finds a way. My power fills you, in every corner of your being, filling you with life and raising you up. Live, stand, be healed!"

Common Elements

- Rune Magic: The rune of Blood, Rhyv, is usually invoked with healing magic and this spell is no exception. In some places, Rhyv is synonymous with healers - the Anvil Hospital bears the rune on its banners, for example. On a battlefield Verys or Tykonus, might be used especially when healing a soldier who needs the strength to return to the fray.
- Astronomancy: An astronomancer is likely to invoke the Chalice to heal someone, and may even carry an actual cup or water skin marked with the six stars of the constellation to use with this spell.
- Dramaturgy: The persona of the Witch is considered a good fit for healing magic, but the Bishop is also a reasonable choice - she restores and strengthens the spirit and the body alike. In a similar way, the boundless enthusiasm of the Mountebank can be harnessed in a way that trivialises the patient's wounds and fills them with the energy. When time is of the essence, the instrument of the Blade is evoked - there is rarely much shortage of physical blades on a battlefield; when the magician has more time, the throne of the Library is evoked with soothing words and images. Surprisingly, the Doctor is rarely used with this spell; its primal nature is seen as being at odds with the cool rationality of that persona which is more suited to cutting out infection.
- Other traditions: All traditions see value in using water or water imagery with this spell, to cleanse a wound or as a damp cloth applied to the patient. Fire is also a primal healing image, sometimes drawing on the symbolism of cauterising a wound. The herb True Vervain, even for a magical healer, has strong associations with healing and restoring strength.
- Realms: The obvious correlation of this spell is with the Spring realm. It fills a target from a bottomless reservoir of vitality and life. It also possesses resonance with the realm of Summer, however - it imbues the target with the strength to keep fighting, allowing them to shrug off even potentially fatal blows and return to the battle or escape their enemies. A few magicians, especially Varushkan spellcasters, consider the spell to have connections with Winter, preserving the target and delaying their inevitable demise for a short time.
- Further Reading: If you plan to make extensive use of this spell, you may want to read over Healing in Empire, a short article about medicine in the Empire world.

Healer's Harness

Description

This delicate suit of mage armour is well suited to protecting a magician healer who must operate on or near the front lines. Dedicated healers study physik as well as magic and so have their mage armour made with many pockets and ties for their equipment, giving the armour its name. The application of tempest jade can sometimes give the armour a shimmering surface and many dying soldiers have been overjoyed to see that oil-green colouring appear above them, giving it the name Saviour's Sheen. The harness also sees some popularity among the mountebanks of the League, giving a better chance of healing themselves if their audience turns nasty. They follow a similar design to battlefield healer's harnesses, but the pockets are more likely to be filled with cards and other people's purses.

The rune Cavul is often embossed on these suits of mage armour to help the wearer maintain concentration despite the pain of their wounds.

Rules

- Form: Armour. Takes the form of a suit of mage armour.
- Requirement: You must have both the magician and battle mage skills to bond to this item.
- Effect: When you cast, or swift cast, heal or purify spell you regain one lost hit.
- Materials: Crafting a Healer's Harness requires seven ingots of tempest jade and five measures of iridescent gloaming. It takes one month to make one of these items.

The rain lashed furiously on the hillside and the valley beneath, and the sky was grey as granite and just as hard. One by one, the six Sentinels of Coppermount Spire regained their senses, trapped to varying extents in the hungry mud of the landslide that had knocked them from their lonely road.

Castor was the first to recover his senses. Quickly the healer drew his wand, fine oak and dragonbone, and shocked himself with healing energies to stave off the worst of the harm the world seemed to wish him. He shivered, but how much worse it must have been for those who didn't boast gills and scales and a certain natural immunity to the cold and wet. He'd have to move fast, especially since they were already in gryphon territory and the damned things could smell weakness from miles away.

Looking around, the rest would all need help. Katerina and Gnaeus were the least trapped, which meant that they would be the quickest to help. He dreaded to think what injuries hid beneath the surface of the mud, but he'd sort them out when they were free.

He dug Gnaeus out quickly, and delivered a similar jolt of healing energy which made the young Merrow wince. The two of them started to dig Katerina out, Gnaeus digging his shield into the mud to provide a little shelter and stop the flow of rainwater over their best warrior's prone form.

Castor had almost freed her when someone stabbed him in the back with a handful of knives, hard enough to knock him off his feet. The gryphon landed right next to him a few seconds later, but Castor's head was still reeling. He heard a scream, not of pain but of threat, or the best Gnaeus could manage. The beast's attention was divided, and it screeched back a threat at the boy. Castor swallowed and rolled to one side to get to his feet.

Then it pounced right over Castor's head and flattened Gnaeus in an instant.

There was no time to think. Gryphons pinned their prey and bit at the throat. He knew Gnaeus would be dead in seconds.

It was so un-Urizen, it was so un-Merrow that he would spend the rest of his life wondering what tug of instinct had driven him to Zorech at that moment. Castor started casting the healing spell the boy would desperately need. He lowered his head and ran toward him. And then, with a shouted challenge, he shoulder-barged a gryphon out of his way.

He discharged the spell into Gnaeus' wounded chest as he passed over him, and the boy yelped in surprise. So did the gryphon, which fell to its side in the mud. The world spun as he landed atop it on his side. He felt ribs sticking through fur; it was hungry and desperate. Probably the runt of its litter, outcast from its pride. On a good day, they would kill a gryphon like this in seconds-

The thought was interrupted as it almost bit his arm off at the shoulder. Castor screamed. It shook him off as it stood again, and backed off to deliver another terrifying screech. He pushed himself to a kneel with his good arm and began to cast the spell that would give his other arm back.

It darted in towards him and raked him with a sharp talon. He stumbled, but the draining feeling of magic discharge didn't come. The threads of iridescent gloaming that ran through his armour pulsed briefly, and the breastplate seemed to tighten a little around his chest. It glanced down, looking puzzled at the display. He took the chance to kick it in the head and it backed off a few paces.

Castor winced and finished the spell this time. There was a flash of searing fire as the flesh of his shoulder grew in, and then he noticed Katerina, free and fighting the thing with just her spear while Gnaeus recovered his shield. He had the Captain's forethought to thank for saving him precious mana with the Healer's Harness. Castor readied his next spell, and then wondered, in a detached way, how exactly he intended to deliver it.

The fight wasn't over by a long way...

Healer of Dawn

Overview

The Healer of Dawn is an Imperial title created by the Dawnish Civilian Commissioner in Spring 380YE in order to supervise the Garden of Tiberius' Bequest in Laroc, Astolat. The position was created to help ensure that the best healers of Dawn had access to the vital herbs they need to carry out their duties - an essential ingredient for them to pursue glory.

Construction of the Garden of Tiberius' Bequest was completed shortly before the 380YE Summer Solstice. The garden was planted to testify to the skill and bravery of the Dawnish healers, and the many ballads that would not have been sung if not for their actions. The gardens are tended by the same hands who tend those injured in the great tourneys.

Responsibilities

The healer of Dawn is expected to distribute the herbs they receive among healers of Dawn that they consider worthy, in order to promote this path to glory. Most citizens who think of Dawnish glory imagine lines of brave knights clad in shimmering mail or bold war witches wreathed in mystic armour. But there are many paths to glory, the troubadour whose songs move the hearts of any who hear them perform, the smith who creates the finest weapons, enchanters whose guiles outwit the eternal. For a healer to achieve glory in the eyes of all is hard - for little of their work is seen; it is the responsibility of the Healer of Dawn to help the brilliant few whose arts serve all to shine as brightly as the warriors whose lives they save.

Powers

Bounty of the Garden

The Healer of Dawn has custodianship of a sinecure. They receive an income of herbs each season: 18 drams of Cerulean Mazzarine.

Appointment

The Healer of Dawn is appointed by unanimous decision of the senators of Dawn. If a unanimous decision cannot be reached, the title may be appointed by the Imperial Senate instead.

The title can be held by a citizen of Dawn. The Healer has tenure, and serves until they die or step down. They can be revoked by the General Assembly, the Dawn National Assembly, and by the Assembly of the Nine.

Garden of Tiberius' Bequest

The garden lies just within earshot of the fabled tournament grounds of Laroc in Astolat. Located on the crest of a low hill, a visitor walking through the entrance will pass three statues and seven empty plinths. The three statues depict Doctor Tiberius of Urizen, Isabella de Rondell of Dawn, and Peter Vorsh of Dawn. The other plinths were left empty in order to goad the physicks, chirurgeons and apothecaries of Dawn to even greater deeds.

The garden has, in addition to herbs cultivated throughout the empire, a dazzling array of beautiful flowers which are often used as favours during the tournaments held nearby. In the centre of the gardens lies a Spring Regio, first discovered following the use of the Hallow of the Green World in the Spring of 380YE.

Healing in Empire

Overview

By the nature of the game, most of the rules for healing are centred around treatment of wounds sustained on the battlefield. Of course, illness, disease, ageing and death are facts of life in the Empire world, just as they are in our own, but it is unlikely that a character will suffer from a mundane pneumonia, cancer or stroke as a result of plot, therefore there is limited need to have a specific rules mechanism in place for their treatment. However, an attempt at explanation follows.

Contents

- 1 Overview
- 2 Magical Healing
- 3 Mundane medicine
- 4 Starvation, suffocation and hypothermia
- 5 Real World Knowledge

Magical Healing

The heal spell and its variants represent the channelling of raw power to knit bone, mend sinew and close wounds, magically restoring damaged tissue to full vitality. Immensely powerful and instantaneous, when used correctly, it is life-saving. However, its very power is its limitation - that creative force cannot be used with the precision to treat more complex internal maladies - just as traumatic wounds such as a ruptured spleen or liver require the meticulous and targeted hands of an operating physick, there is no way that a healing spell could be targeted to remove a tumour, clear a clot from an artery or repair the damage caused by a heart attack or stroke.

By that same logic, 'healing' rituals are limited. While a spring ritual to channel the regenerative powers of nature might succeed in reattaching a recently severed limb, an attempt to repair infarcted brain or scarred myocardium would be doomed to failure - it simply isn't possible to control such an awesome force in such a targeted way - the healing has gone beyond simple regeneration into the reconstruction and replacement of complex tissue structures, which is impossible. It could be considered analogous to holding a cigarette in one's lips and trying to light it with a flamethrower.

Some rituals, and bargaining with eternals, may allow life to be extended by supernatural means, but this is not healing in the true sense, and always comes at a cost.

Mundane medicine

In-game, physick is both better and worse than real world medicine. In treating injuries it is far more reliable, as long as the patient is reached in time. Long term sequelae of trauma are rare, and recovery is usually complete. Magical herbs have curative effects on wounds and poisons, and full health can be restored within minutes.

All-cause mortality in the game world falls somewhere between the patterns of medieval Europe and the modern day. Deaths from accidents and trauma are rarer than in history, due to the availability of physicks and healing. The effects of local infections, too, are readily treatable, and therefore contaminated wounds and puerperal sepsis are far less common. Surgeons are skilled and hygienic; there is no bar to the study of anatomy and therefore it is well understood.

However, diseases akin to pneumonia, cholera and typhoid may still affect a population, and, like the medieval physician, IC physicks and healers may find their treatments limited to hydration, analgesia and some herbal remedies of unreliable effect. There are no effective antibiotics, no parenteral fluids and no transfusions.

Likewise, cancer, heart disease and stroke remain largely untreatable. A physick might remove a localised tumour, but there is no option to treat it once it has spread. All humans and orcs are mortal, and while physick and healing may prevent premature death, wear-and-tear and the passage of the years will still return each soul to the Labyrinth or into the Howling Abyss, and sometimes the physick's last and only ability is to relieve suffering and to ease that passage.

Starvation, suffocation and hypothermia

Mortal flesh requires food, water, warmth and air, and in their absence there is no power, magical or mundane, which can sustain it. Suffocation, starvation and hypothermia could be considered as similar to traumatic wounds - in order to restore hits, the precipitating factor needs to be removed within a given time, after which a skilled physick would be able to restore hits through treatment. Artificial respiration might be a suitable IC way of treating a nearly drowned patient ('restoring the breath?'), but it would also be fine to use any other IC method such as squeezing the water out by compressing their abdomen, moving their arms to stimulate breathing or inducing (IC) vomiting - it's the character's skills that allow the effect, which you can roleplay however you like.

Real World Knowledge

An understanding of real world medicine can be a great basis for roleplay, but it's equally valid to be an incense-burning Kallavesi shaman, a Marcher barber-surgeon armed with hot pitch and leeches, or a Highborn priest who believes his ability to heal is the direct result of his personal virtue - all will work equally well IC as long as the correct skills are used. Researching and using medieval terminology would be a great adjunct to roleplay. At the same time, more modern names for bones and blood vessels (for example), while occasionally a little jarring, are not inappropriate for a physick to use especially one who has trained at one of the Imperial institutes of higher learning such as the University of Holberg.

Heart of the Song

Song by Peter Scowther - <http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=IYY32ziq-Ag>

Chords in First Verse and Chorus.

Chorus 1 O come all you weary trav'lers, [G D G] Let us take time from our journey, [Em C G] A few moments long,
[Em C G] 'To delay all tribulation [G D G] In the cooling breath of silence, [Em C G] At the heart of the song. [G D C]
The heart of the song. [C D G]

Verse 1 As we journey through mountains, [Em G] in pursuit of our dream, [C] How we hurry to capture the prize!
[Am G C] Catching glimpses of valleys, [Em G] with tumbling streams. [C] Let us stop some day when we have time.
[Am G C]

Chorus 2 O come all you weary trav'lers, Let us take time from our journey, A few moments long, If we lose sight of each other, I will meet in the silence, At the heart of the song. The heart of the song

Verse 2 All those questions and mysteries, That discomfort your mind, O what wouldn't you give for one sign! There may not be the answers, You've been hoping to find, But the questions will glimmer and shine!

Chorus 3 Like the starry eyes of lovers, And the moon beneath the water, When the magic is strong, If we lose sight of each other, I will meet in the silence, At the heart of the song. The heart of the song

Hearth Tithe

The noonday sun was too intense for any more work. The other monks lounged in the shade of the apple trees, or cooled off after their hard morning labour in the pond at the top of the great field.

Abbott Thomas sat quietly under the Green Oak in the garden behind the cloister, reading a book. Next to him on the bench was a battered straw hat, and a long rake leant against the bole of the tree beside him. His thinning grey hair was held back by a kerchief, which also served to soak up any sweat that might otherwise have fallen onto the vellum pages. Occasionally, he would take a swig from a jug of cider, or a healthy bite of a ham-and-cheese sandwich his wife had prepared for him.

A shadow fell across the Abbott, and he looked up.

Big Jack - or Wee Jack as his friends insisted on calling him - loomed like a dolmen over the seated priest. As the abbott looked up, the burly farmer snatched his straw hat from his head, and held it by the ragged brim, nervously turning it in his hands. Thomas favoured him with a broad smile, and gestured for him to sit. He offered Jack the jug he was drinking from, but the large man demured.

They engaged in a little small talk, primarily about the weather; about the orc raids; and about the soldiers from Wintermark stationed down near the western borders. Big Jack could not conceal the fact that there was something on his mind, but the Abbott allowed him to get round to it in his own time. Some things cannot be rushed.

"Reckon that the war's come early, then." he said at last, his voice rumbling in his barrel chest.

The abbott nodded. "It was inevitable. The war was going to start some time. No point trying to scoop yolk back into a broken egg."

Big Jack chewed his thumb nail for a moment.

"Our youngest's eldest has gone off to Holberg." he said flatly. "Gone to fight with Old Tom's brigade, under Dick Talbot."

The Abbott maintained his silence; this was a time for listening not for talking. He offered the big man the jug again, and this time he did not refuse it.

"He'll ... he'll keep her safe, won't he? I mean, them Druj bastards has run off back east with they tails between they legs. Theres nowt there to fret her gran and me, is there?"

The Abbott sighed.

"Ah now, I wish I could say it would be alright Jack, but I'd be lying to you. Theres war with the Grendel in the south there, and there's Reikos too. The Bounders and the Strong Reeds are already there, helping the Highborn get their homes back. They say the sickness has taken a lot of good men and women, and more before the year is done."

Big Jack looked increasingly unhappy. This was not what he wanted to hear. The Abbott did not enjoy speaking like this - he had taught all of Big Jack's children and grandchildren their virtues, knew them all by name, and considered them family as well as flock. He tried to offer some comfort.

"But Dick Talbot is a good man by all accounts. I don't doubt he will do right by her. But we both know war is a vicious dog on a long chain."

Jack touched the old scar on the side of his neck, probably without realising he was doing it.

"It's just ... me and the wife. We feel so .. helpless. If I thought it would help I'd get my old clank back from Ham and take off after her, so I can watch out for her."

The Abbot smiled sadly.

"What would your Ham do without his armour, Jack?" He prodded the big farmer's spreading belly gently with one finger. "And how'd you fit into it? Get a tailor to let it out?"

Jack's face crumpled a little. The Abbott realised he had gone too far - it genuinely seemed like Big Jack Greenfields was about to cry and that could not be borne. The Abbott made a decision. He picked up his book again, stroked the cover for a moment. It was a biography of James of Sarcombe; James the Wise; the only Marcher ever to have trudged the dirty road to the Imperial Throne. The man who first said "enough is enough" and had the courage to confront the butcher's bill and say "no more."

"I know what you mean, though, Jack. You're not the first to talk to me. I've got my old brig out of the boxes and looked at it three times this month. But what do the armies need with a one-legged priest and a broken down old warhorse like you? What a pair we'd make! The orcs would die for laughing at us."

Jack smiled at the idea, just a little bit. Some colour returned to his cheeks. He finished the cider and gently put the jug down beside Abbott Thomas.

"I'll tell the wife you said not to fret, and we'll trust that the young lass has enough of her grand'da's sense to know when to duck then, and we'll fatten a pig up for when she comes home all full of swagger and war stories. There's nowt else to be done."

The abbott was siezed by a premonition then, a cold certainty that Big Jack's youngest's eldest would not be marching home again. It chilled him to the bone, and then filled him with the old rage. He could not accept it. He would not. He would set his will to changing that future, and damn any premonition that tried to tell him otherwise. He clenched his left fist, but let none of the wrath burning inside him show on his face. He looked out instead towards the east field, where some of the younger novices were braving the summer heat to clear and hoe the fertile soil in preparation for the new herb garden.

"Oh, I'm not so sure Jack. Not so sure at all. We may be old, but we can still fight against death. Let me tell you about the Hearth Tithe ..."

Overview

War with the Jotun was always inevitable, but up until the Summer Solstice the assumption was that the ceasefire would hold an uneasy peace until the Spring Equinox 380YE. Recent developments involving the invasion of Lasambria, however, have seen the treaty ended prematurely. In the west of the Empire, carefully laid plans have been disrupted. The fortifications at Tassato is only just complete while Overton is still under construction; the majority of Marcher armies are engaged on the eastern front; and the people of Wintermark have endured curses and indignity that have sapped their strength. The atmosphere in the Marches, and in western Wintermark, is a little grim.

The people of the western Empire are strong, however. Faced with imminent invasion by the western barbarians, they are not dwelling on the danger. Rather, there has been an upswell of community spirit and national pride. They know that they can weather the coming storm by pulling together. If the yeomen of every farm and town can work together, if the folk of every hall can overcome the lingering divisions caused by the recent curse of tradition, there is nothing that they cannot overcome.

There has been some talk of resurrecting an old tradition that dates back to the days of Emperor James. The Hearth Tithe is a practice that has largely fallen out of favour in the modern Empire, but all through bloodsoaked reigns of Emperor Guntherm and Empress Brannan, it was common practice for farmers to set aside part of their fields and cultivate beds of healing herbs. These herbs were made available to physicks who provided medical aid to their community. Other were given to apothecaries who used them to help brew Anodyne Analgesix, Ossean Solution and Elixir Vitae to be carried into battle by soldiers from the farm, village, or hold where they were grown.

It is not clear where the Hearth Tithe originated. Some stories claim that Marcher merchants selling grain in Hahnmark first observed the practice, and learned of its effectiveness in the sporadic border hostilities between Wintermark and the Marches. Other stories say that the practice came from pre-Marcher Dawn, and there are claims that it was a positive development of an unpopular practice whereby some noble houses would force their yeomen to grow medicinal herbs instead of food. Regardless of the truth, a key element of the Hearth Tithe is that it is about the community - the herbs raised were used to heal and support the families and neighbours of those who grew them. Maintaining a healthy Hearth Tithe was often seen as an expression of Loyalty and Prosperity. Some farmers went beyond what the tradition dictated, especially when their own sons and daughters were going to war, and turned more of their farmland over to the cultivation of herbs, and gained the respect of their neighbours through their willingness to share..

There has been some talk in the Marcher and Wintermark assemblies about encouraging a return to this old tradition. Not only would it provide much-needed medical assistance for the upcoming war, but it would also allow the people of the north-western Empire to make a concrete, practical contribution to the war effort.

- 4 Resolution

Significance

The Hearth Tithe was a way for Marcher and Wintermark farmers to support their communities in times of war with more than just food. The practice involved diversification of a farm, but largely fell out of practice during the Second Interregnum. It was common for priests to encourage the observation of the Hearth Tithe - especially in the Marches, where a monastery would often receive donations of herbs from the surrounding farms to be used in support of the wider community. In the north, the herbs produced were often given over to the grimnir who marched alongside the Winterfolk armies.

The practice has not been widely observed for over a century, but the conditions seem to be right to consider resurrecting it, at least in the short term. The power to do so lies in the hands of the priests. Through the creation of auras of virtue, and with the support of their congregations, it would be possible for the national assemblies to re-institute the Hearth Tithe in Wintermark and the Marches.

The national assembly of the Marches, or of Wintermark, can raise a judgement calling on every farmer and every farm worker to "do their bit" for the war effort, and return to the practice of the Hearth Tithe. If they do so, and support that judgement with virtuous auras, then they will encourage every farmer to plant a portion of their fields with medicinal herbs. The farm will lose 36 rings of production, and in their place will produce one dose of Cerulean Mazzarine, one dose of Marwort, and one dose of True Vervain each season. This temporary diversification will remain in effect for one year.

As part of the judgement, the national assembly must name a single priest that is part of that assembly to be responsible for co-ordinating the creation of the virtuous auras, and provide that priest with 50 doses of liao.

The judgement of one national assembly does not effect the production of farms in other nations.

In theory, other national assemblies could call for the return of the Hearth Tithe but it is unlikely to be as effective. In the absence of other factors, for any other national assembly to call for the return of the Hearth Tithe in their nation would require a judgement as above and 75 liao.

The exception is the Brass Coast; the idea of enforced charity was universally mocked among the independantly minded Freeborn, and for the Freeborn assembly to suggest it held value would be seen simply as an amusing joke as part of this season's Feast of the Broken Wheel.

Participation

Not all farmers will want to embrace the return of the Hearth Tith. Their farm hands and labourers, however, are likely to respond to anyone who sneers at the Hearth Tithe as lacking community spirit or virtue. Players who don't want to do this will still lose the 36 rings - representing disgruntled employees, and a difficulty selling their produce - but can hand the herbs their farm would have produced back in at GOD.

Resolution

During the Autumn Equinox, both the Wintermark and Marcher assemblies threw their support behind the reintroduction of the Hearth Tithe. The Wintermark assembly named Ealstan of Stormspire to encourage the reintroduction of the practice, while the Marcher Assembly named James Appleseeder of Upwold. For the next year, the Hearth Tithe will be in effect in Wintermark and the Marches.

Hearthfire Circle

Spring Magnitude 7

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets a character, who must be present throughout.

The ritual fails if you or the target are hit, or attack another character.

Effects

At the completion of the ritual, the target recovers all lost hits. Each limb crippled by impale or cleave is restored, and the effect of venom or weakness is removed. The target may also ignore the roleplaying effects of any traumatic wounds they are suffering until the end of the battle.

Additional Targets

This ritual can affect additional characters from the same band. The magnitude increases by five for each additional target. All targets must be present throughout, and the ritual fails if any of the targets are hit, or attack another character.

Description

This potent spell restores an individual to full health. It is more costly than similar rituals such as The Hands of Sacred Life, Blood of the Hydra, or Renewed Strength of the New Day, but much more comprehensive in its effect. In addition to the immediate health benefits it provides, it also allows the patient to temporarily overcome the immediate effects of certain serious wounds - at least in the short term.

Common Elements

This ritual is very old; in pre-Imperial times it was widely practiced by covens of many nations, especially among the Steinr, Marchers and the Varushka. The ritual often includes things that evoke or symbolise ideas of safety, home and the hearth. Consequently fires, wholesome food, drink and music are all common elements used in the performance of this ritual. Where food and drink are used, they are often passed from person to person among the coven-mates, sometimes in an intricate pattern reminiscent of a dance, before being given to the targets to consume.

A coven of Marcher landskeepers might include a bushel of grain taken from the recent harvest, or even good beer made from the same; a circle of Hakima are likely to engage in drumming and singing together with favoured friends and families and, where possible, their patient; a school of cabalists will share dark bread and honey; a League Troupe or band of mountebanks may repeat their coven oath and touch rings together to reinforce the strength provided by their guild, and then transfer that strength to their target; and a coven of Navarr vates are likely to use small amounts of blood or red paint to trace designs on the hands or faces of their target.

The important thing is to evoke healing power through such elements as the runes Rhyv, Cavul or even Queros.

Heartwood of the Great Vale

Overview

The heartwood of the Great Vale is located in is in northern Summersend in the Navarr territory of Hercynia. Custodianship of the Heartwood grants an Imperial title; a seat on the Imperial Bourse; and a seasonal bounty of valuable weirwood

The Resource

The Great Vale in Hercynia contains large areas of precious weirwood. Located in northern Summersend, the area came under threat from Thule barbarians during the occupation of Skarsind, but tthe Empire maintained control of the Heartwood - albeit barely. Even when the barbarians occupied the Glen of Shadows the production of weirwood was uninterrupted.

The Heartwood is an Imperial, rather than Navarr national resource. Unlike with the Golden Trees of Seren, there was comparatively little argument with this decision. The forest here has a bad reputation. Sometimes, when a tree has been felled and the stump excavated, the workers find a corpse. Sometimes the corpse is just bones amongst the roots, and sometimes it looks fresh enough to have just stopped breathing. No-one knows who they were, or how they got there (especially the fresher looking corpses). By tradition, any remains are handed to the Navarr, who inter them in a corpse glade set aside for the purpose. The priests who tend the glade have a reputation for being dour and odd.

Attempts to use magic such as An Echo of Life Remains reveal nothing - as if the dead had no names. Likewise, there is every indication that the dead died violently - many bear obviously fatal wounds. Their garb is strange - fur and leather, and very little iron or steel. The accepted explanation for the remains is that the Heartwood grows atop an ancient battlefield - but there are no convincing theories as to why the dead were allowed to lie undisturbed for long enough for a forest of weirwood to cover their remains. Some of the oldest trees are estimated to be more than a thousand years old, adding to speculation that the corpses belong to people who pre-date the Terunael.

To add further mystery to the Heartwood, there have been repeated sightings of a grim phantom in the forests. Called the Valewoman, the spirit appears to be that of an old woman wrapped in white fur. Stories of encounters tend to follow the same pattern; a figure appears in the distance, far away enough for detail to be obscured. She usually stands and watches, but occasionally she is seen to gesture or beckon. Whenever a witness comes closer, however, she vanishes. Despite countless attempts, no person has ever managed to get close to the Valewoman, never mind speak to her. Very occasionally, a lumberjack is found lying dead among the trees - dead without any sign of violence. Such deaths are generally attributed to the grim wraith, and as a consequence many workers view her with a mixture of awe and dread.

It is no surprise that, mentally at least, the workers of Weirwater Vales are some of the toughest in the Empire. If they know anything, they stopped bothering to talk of it generations ago.

The Bourse Seat

Responsibilities

The Seat has no particular responsibilities; they simply receive a bounty of weirwood which is theirs to do with as they will. If the Heartwood of the Great Vale were to be threatened in any way, it would be the responsibility of the Seat to deal with those threats. Likewise, if any particular opportunity were to arise related to the Heartwood of the Great Vale, the Seat would expect to be consulted as to how that opportunity might be resolved.

Powers

Seat on the Bourse

Custodianship of the Heartwood of the Great Vale comes with a seat on the Imperial Bourse. For the most part, this Seat comes with no additional responsibilities. It is an Imperial title that grants the right to participate on the rare occasion when the Imperial Bourse as a body is required to make a decision.

Bounty of weirwood

The Seat has control of a source of weirwood and receives Bourse certificates to represent that control. They can dispense this resource as they choose. Production is 25 Imperial wains of weirwood every season.

Appointment

As with all weirwood Bourse seats, the holder of the title is determined during the Winter Solstice. As an Imperial seat, any Imperial citizen may participate in the auction and hold the title.

Custodianship of the Heartwood of the Great Vale is retained for a year, or until the citizen holding the seat dies, or steps down. An Imperial Bourse seat cannot be revoked by the Imperial Synod.

Help:Adding A Page

Roughly, follow this procedure:

Create A Link

Find a page you want to link from, edit it, and put the desired page name in link brackets e.g.

[[My New Page Title]]

Think about the title as it will appear on the page itself, not as it should be in a link. If you want to change the link text, you can do so by separating it from the title with a pipe (|) character, e.g.

Now when you reload that page, you should see a red link to your new page. Click on it, and you will be editing your new page.

Add Content

Put in whatever content you want.

Note It's good to get into the habit of sprinkling double-square brackets around the first use of a new term, it encourages people to make new pages. For example:

The Alam regularly consult with their top magicky people, the [[Hakima]]...

That way, even if you don't make the page about the Hakima yourself, someone will be encouraged to.

Make It Navigable

When you're done, consider adding it to a category (or categories), so that it'll play nicely with the rest of the site. If it's a new category, you might want to consider updating the Breadcrumbs file. And you might conceivably want to add it to any of the menus.

If, for example, it's an article relevant to a particular nation, it should be put in two categories - Nations, and the nation itself. e.g. add this text to the bottom of the document.

[[Category-Nations]]
[[Category-Alam]]

Help:Categories

Putting A Page In A Category

To put a page in a category, just add a link like so:

[[Category-SomeCategory]]

preferably at the bottom of the page you want to put in the category. For example, this page has:

[[Category-Help]]

A page can be in multiple categories. The category link can be anywhere on the page (except in a tag or similar), but it is best practice to add category links to the bottom of the content.

Categories as Templates

Some categories are set up to work like templates, for example in order to automatically pull in a navigation menu (see Category-Herbs) or add related super-categories (see Category-380YE Spring Equinox winds of fortune). In that case, the template can be embedded as

{{Category-SomeCategory}}

Linking To A Category

To link to a category index page, just add a link like so:

[[ :Category-SomeCategory]]

or

[[ :Category-SomeCategory|Go to a category]]

(note the extra colon). For example, here's a link to Category-Help.

Help:Editing Breadcrumbs

Breadcrumbs

Breadcrumbs are the hierarchical links at the top of the page (for example, for this page, it's Empire / Help / Editing Breadcrumbs).

This is a very manual thing for MediaWiki. You have to edit a set of rules in Imperial:breadcrumbs.

There are lots of ways it can work, but I think the easiest is to make sure every page is in a category (see Help:Categories for how to do that), and then use the category name to define the breadcrumbs.

For example, if the Imperial:breadcrumbs trail contains:

* Rules @ [[Main Page|Empire]] > [[Rules Overview|Rules]] >
* Help @ [[Main Page|Empire]] > [[Help]] >

then anything in the Rules category will have a breadcrumb trail of Empire (links to Main Page), Rules (links to the Rules category index) and so on.

If a page is in more than one category then it'll match the first one it finds.

gives you two menu entries, Home and My Menu. Home will be a link to the page called Home. My Menu will be a dropdown, containing two submenu items that link to Page 1 and Page 2.

If you want the menu item names to be different from the pages you're going to, no problem - just use the standard Wiki retitling feature. A pipe character (|) separates the page you want to go to from the title of the page that's displayed in the menu. For example:

* [[Home|Go Home]]
* My Menu

Editing The Left Menu

You need to edit the Imperial:LeftBar page. The list format should be fairly obvious from what's in the file already. It's another type of list, consisting of section headers and wiki links. Again, you can retitle links using the pipe symbol as before.

<nav-list>
  <nav-header>A Header</nav-header>
  <nav-item>[[Page 1|Go to Page 1]]</nav-item>
  <nav-item>[[Page 2]]</nav-item>
  <nav-header>Another Header</nav-header>
  <nav-item>[[Kicking|How to kick people]]</nav-item>
  <nav-item>[[Punching|How to punch people]]</nav-item>
</nav-list>

Editing The Footer

Edit the page Imperial:Footer. It's a bit more complicated than the other two, because there's a set of three columns and then a footer line beneath. It should be obvious enough from the existing content.

Help:Empire Extras

I've added a bunch of additional extensions and such, to support the Bootstrap skin.

If you want to add to the menus, see Help:Editing Empire Navigation.

Grid Layout

You can use Bootstrap extensions to lay out things in a grid. Nice for putting together a front page. There are 9 grid elements in the main content area, and you use them by putting together fluid rows and spans. The spans need to add up to nine. For example:

<row-fluid>
<span3>A Cell</span3><span3>Another Cell</span3><span3>A third cell</span3> </row-fluid>

would give you three equally-sized cells.

You can have as many rows as you like. You can use span1 to span12.

Boxes

Help:Formatting

You can format your text by using wiki markup. This consists of normal characters like asterisks, single quotes or equal signs which have a special function in the wiki, sometimes depending on their position. For example, to format a word in italic, you include it in two pairs of single quotes like `''this''`.

Help:Images

This page explains the image syntax when editing the wiki. You or another user must usually upload an image before you can use it on a page.

Images that are stored on a MediaWiki server are usually rendered by using the File: namespace prefix. The alternate Media: namespace prefix is also usable to reference the original media file content (for rendering or downloading it separately, out of any MediaWiki page).

Supported types for images

The following file formats are supported by default:

- .jpg or .jpeg, .png, .gif

Rendering a single image

Syntax

The full syntax for displaying an image is:

where options can be zero or more of the following, separated by pipes (|):

- Format option: one of border and/or frameless, frame, thumb (or thumbnail);
Controls how the rendered image is formatted and embedded in the rest of the page.
- Resizing option: one of
 - `{width}px` — Resizes the image to fit within the given maximum width in pixels, without restricting its height;
 - `x{height}px` — Resizes the image to fit within the given maximum height in pixels, without restricting its width;
 - `{width}x{height}px` — Resizes the image to fit within the given width and height in pixels;
 - `upright` — Resizes an image to fit within reasonable dimensions, according to user preferences (suitable for images whose height is larger than width).
Note that the image will always retain its aspect ratio, and can only be reduced (not increased) in size unless it's in a scalable media type (bitmap images cannot be scaled up).
The default maximum size depends on the format and the internal image dimensions (according to its media type).
- Horizontal alignment option: one of left, right, center, none;
Controls the horizontal alignment (and inline/block or floating styles) of the image within a text (no default value).
- Vertical alignment option: one of baseline, sub, super, top, text-top, middle, bottom, text-bottom;
Controls the vertical alignment of a non-floating inline image with the text before or after the image, and in the same block (the default vertical alignment is middle).
- Link option: one of
 - `link={target}` — Allows to change the target (to an arbitrary page title, or URL) of the generated link, activable on the rendered image surface; e.g.
[[File:Example.jpg|20px|link=http://www.wikipedia.org]] renders as (external link), or [[File:Example.jpg|20px|link=MediaWiki]] renders as (internal link).
 - `link=` (with an empty value) — (MediaWiki 1.14+) Displays an image without any activable link; e.g.
[[File:Example.jpg|20px|link=]] renders as .

! Link does not work with thumb, thumbnail or frame.

- Other specific options:
 - `alt={alternative text}` — (MediaWiki 1.14+) Defines the alternative text (maps to the HTML attribute `alt=" . . . "` of the generated `<image />` element) of an image that will be rendered if either the referenced image cannot be downloaded and embedded, or if the support media must use the alternative

- description text (e.g. when using a Braille reader or with accessibility options set by the user in its browser).
- `page={number}` — Renders the specified page number (currently only applicable when showing a .djvu or .pdf file).

The options can be given in any order. If the given options conflict each other, the latter is applied, except for the format options, where the options take the priority in the order of: frame; thumb (or thumbnail); frameless and/or border.

If a parameter does not match any of the other possibilities, it is assumed to be the caption text. Caption text shows below the image in thumb and frame formats, or as mouseover text in border, frameless formats or when the format is omitted. Caption text displayed in the thumb and frame formats may contain wiki links and other formatting. In the other options, wiki-formatting will not work though transclusion will.

If no caption text is supplied, a caption is automatically created showing the file name. To completely remove the caption, set it to ``. For example, `[[File:Example.jpg|20px|]]` renders as .

Stopping the text flow

On occasion it is desirable to stop text (or other inline non-floating images) from flowing around a floating image. Depending on the web browser's screen resolution and such, text flow on the right side of an image may cause a section header (for instance, `== My Header ==`) to appear to the right of the image, instead of below it, as a user may expect. The text flow can be stopped by placing `` before the text that should start below the floating image.

All images rendered as blocks (including non-floating centered images, left- or right-floating images, as well as framed or thumbnailed floating images) are implicitly breaking the surrounding lines of text (terminating the current block of text before the image, and creating a new paragraph for the text after them). They will then stack vertically along their left or right alignment margin (or along the center line between these margins for centered images).

Linking to an image without displaying it

Link to description page

If you put a colon (:) before `File:`, the image will not be embedded and the link will lead to the description page of the file.

[[ :File:Example.jpg]]
[[ :File:Example.jpg|Sunflowers]]

results in

File:Example.jpg Sunflowers

Link to another page

Note: link does not work with thumb or frame.

This will make a 50px width picture with a link to the page MediaWiki:

[[File:Example.jpg|50px|link=MediaWiki]]

Link directly to the media file

You can use the pseudo-namespace "Media" to link directly to a file without rendering it, bypassing the description page.

[[Media:Example.jpg]]
[[Media:Example.jpg|Sunflowers]]

results in

Media:Example.jpg Sunflowers

The same result can be achieved by adding a colon before the namespace (works with categories too):

You can also use:

[[Special%3AFilePath/Example.jpg]]

which can be used to link to a potential file, even if it doesn't exist. You can also use:

{{FILEPATH:Example.jpg}}

which generates an external URL to the file inline:

<http://www.profounddecisions.co.uk/mediawiki-public/images/a/a9/Example.jpg>

Files at other websites

You can link to an external file available online using the same syntax used for linking to an external web page. With these syntaxes, the image will not be rendered, but only the text of the link to this image will be displayed.

[http://url.for/some/image.png]

Or with a different displayed text:

[http://url.for/some/image.png link text here]

Additional MediaWiki markup or HTML/CSS formatting (for inline elements) is permitted in this displayed text (with the exception of embedded links that would break the surrounding link):

[http://www.example.com/some/image.png Example rich link text here]

which renders as: Example ~~rich~~ link text here.

If it is enabled on your wiki (see Manual:\$wgAllowExternalImages), you can also embed external images. To do that, simply insert the image's url:

Currently, embedded images cannot be resized, but they may be formatted by surrounding MediaWiki markup or HTML/CSS code.

If this wiki option is not enabled, the image will not be embedded but rendered as a textual link to the external site, just like above.

Help:Links

There are five types of links in MediaWiki:

1. Internal links to other pages in the wiki
2. External links to other websites
3. External links to internal pages in the wiki
4. Interwiki links to other websites registered to the wiki in advance
5. Interlanguage links to other websites registered as other language versions of the wiki

Internal links

To add an internal link, enclose the name of the page you want to link to in double square brackets. When you save the page, you'll see the new link pointing to your page. If the page exists already it is displayed in blue, if it does not, in red. Selflinks to the current page are not transformed in URLs but displayed in bold. (If you really want to link to the current page, use an anchor (see below), or `[[#top|current page]]` which always links to the top.)

The first letter of the target page is automatically capitalized, unless otherwise set by the admins, and spaces are represented as underscores (typing an underscore in the link will have a similar effect as typing a space, but is not recommended, since the underscore will also be shown in the text).

How to avoid auto-links

When you put a URL on a wiki page it will be automatically converted into an external link, like this:

<http://mediawiki.org>

To avoid that effect, put the URL between `<nowiki>` tags, like this:

<nowiki><http://mediawiki.org></nowiki>

To get this:

<http://mediawiki.org>

Interwiki links

Interwiki links are links with the internal link markup to a website registered in advance. For example, you can link to the Sunflower article on <http://en.wikipedia.org> by typing [[wikipedia:Sunflower]], which will result in a link wikipedia:Sunflower. This is because <http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/> is registered to your wiki by default with the prefix of wikipedia. This link may not work properly, if the admin of your wiki has changed the setting. Unlike internal links, interwiki links do not use page existence detection, so an interwiki link will appear blue even if the page does not exist on the remote wiki.

Similar to internal page links, you can create piped links, with alternate link label, e.g. [[wikipedia:Sunflower|big yellow flower]], this is the link big yellow flower.

Basically this is an abbreviation for longer URLs. A very similar link could be created as a normal external link by typing [http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Sunflower big yellow flower], but interwiki links allow you to type out an easy and compact link, almost as if you are linking to a page on your own wiki.

More details are at Manual:Interwiki. To edit the interwiki table on your site, see the InterWiki extension.

Interlanguage links

If your wiki has other language versions, you may find “interlanguage links” in the sidebar, just below toolbox in the box named “in other languages.”

Interlanguage links behave similarly to interwiki links, except that they are listed in the sidebar. To create an interlanguage link from a page, just type [[language prefix:pagename]] wherever you like in the page; the language prefix is the prefix specified at your wiki for the other language version (typically the ISO language code).

If you want to make the interlanguage link appear in the content of the page, you can add a colon before the language prefix:

[[:en:Sunflower]] → en:Sunflower

When link is both interwiki and interlanguage, the order is wikipedia:en:Sunflower.

Help:Tables

Tables may be authored in wiki pages using either XHTML table elements directly, or using wikicode formatting to define the table. XHTML table elements and their use are well described on various web pages and will not be discussed here. The benefit of wikicode is that the table is constructed of character symbols which tend to make it easier to perceive the table structure in the article editing view compared to XHTML table elements.

As a general rule, it is best to avoid using a table unless you need one. Table markup often complicates page editing.

+	table caption, optional ; only between table start and first table row
-	table row, optional on first row -- wiki engine assumes the first row
!	table header cell, optional . Consecutive table header cells may be added on same line separated by double marks (! !) or start on new lines, each with its own single mark (!).
	table data cell, required! Consecutive table data cells may be added on same line separated by double marks () or start on new lines, each with its own single mark ().
}	table end

- The above marks must start on a new line except the double | | and ! ! for optionally adding consecutive cells to a line. However, blank spaces at the beginning of a line are ignored.
- XHTML attributes. Each mark, except table end, optionally accepts one or more XHTML attributes. Attributes must be on the same line as the mark. Separate attributes from each other with a single space.

- Cells and caption (| or ||, ! or !!, and |+) hold content. So separate any attributes from content with a single pipe (|). Cell content may follow on same line or on following lines.
- Table and row marks ({| and |-) do not directly hold content. Do not add pipe (|) after their optional attributes. If you erroneously add a pipe after attributes for the table mark or row mark the parser will delete it and your final attribute if it was touching the erroneous pipe!
- Content may (a) follow its cell mark on the same line after any optional XHTML attributes or (b) on lines below the cell mark. Content that uses wiki markup that itself needs to start on a new line, such as lists, headings, or nested tables, must be on its own new line.
 - Pipe character as content. To insert a pipe (|) character into a table use the <nowiki>|</nowiki> escaping markup

Basics

The following table lacks borders and good spacing but shows the simplest wiki markup table structure.

You type	You get
<pre>{ Orange Apple - Bread Pie - Butter Ice cream }</pre>	<pre>Orange Apple Bread Pie Butter Ice cream</pre>

The cells in the same row can be listed on one line separated by || (two pipe symbols). If the text in the cell contains a line break, use instead.

You type	You get
<pre>{ Orange Apple more - Bread Pie more - Butter Ice cream and more }</pre>	<pre>Orange Apple more Bread Pie more Butter Ice and cream more</pre>

Extra spaces within cells in the wiki markup, as in the wiki markup below, do not affect the actual table rendering.

You type	You get
<pre>{ Orange Apple more - Bread Pie more - Butter Ice cream and more }</pre>	<pre>Orange Apple more Bread Pie more Butter Ice cream and more</pre>

You can have longer text or more complex wiki syntax inside table cells, too:

You type	You get
<pre>{ Lorem ipsum dolor sit amet, consetetur sadipscing elitr, sed diam nonumy eirmod tempor invidunt ut labore et dolore magna aliquyam erat, sed diam voluptua. At vero eos et accusam et justo duo dolores et ea rebum. Stet clita kasd gubergren, no sea takimata sanctus est Lorem ipsum dolor sit amet. * Lorem ipsum dolor sit amet * consetetur sadipscing elitr * sed diam nonumy eirmod tempor invidunt }</pre>	<pre> Lorem ipsum dolor sit amet, consetetur sadipscing elitr, sed diam nonumy eirmod tempor invidunt ut labore et dolore magna aliquyam erat, sed diam voluptua. At vero eos et accusam et justo duo dolores et ea rebum. Stet clita kasd gubergren, no sea takimata sanctus est Lorem ipsum dolor sit amet.</pre> <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Lorem ipsum dolor sit amet • consetetur sadipscing elitr • sed diam nonumy eirmod tempor invidunt

Table headers

Table headers can be created by using "!" (exclamation mark) instead of "|" (pipe symbol). Headers usually show up bold and centered by default.

You type	You get
<pre>{ ! align="left" Item ! Amount ! Cost - Orange 10 7.00 - Bread 4 3.00 - Butter 1 5.00 - !Total 15.00 }</pre>	<pre> Item Amount Cost Orange 10 7.00 Bread 4 3.00 Butter 1 5.00 Total 15.00</pre>

Note: When using attributes as in the heading 'Item' a vertical bar '|' is used for separation. Not an exclamation character '!'.

Caption

A table caption can be added to the top of any table as follows.

You type	You get
<pre>{ +Food complements - Orange Apple - Bread Pie - Butter Ice cream }</pre>	<pre>Food complements Orange Apple Bread Pie Butter Ice cream</pre>

XHTML attributes

You can add XHTML attributes to tables. For the authoritative source on these, see the W3C's HTML 4.01 Specification page on tables.

Attributes on tables

Placing attributes after the table start tag (`{ |`) applies attributes to the entire table.

You type	You get
Orange	Apple	12,333.00
Bread	Pie	500.00
Butter	Ice cream	1.00

Attributes on cells

You can put attributes on individual cells. For example, numbers may look better aligned right.

You type	You get
Orange	Apple	12,333.00

Butter	Ice cream	1.00

You can also use cell attributes when you are listing multiple cells on a single line. Note that the cells are separated by | |, and within each cell the attribute(s) and value are separated by |.

You type	You get
Orange	Apple	12,333.00
Bread	Pie	500.00
Butter	Ice cream	1.00

Attributes on rows

You can put attributes on individual rows, too.

You type	You get
Orange	Apple	12,333.00
Bread	Pie	500.00
Butter	Ice cream	1.00

Simple one-pixel table border

The default table formatting uses the "border-collapse: separate" model, which adds table cell spacing (which also separates the table outer border from its content cells). Even with a zero cellspacing, the borders of consecutive cells (and of the overall table container) will add up, so to get a one-pixel separation between cells, you need to selectively remove one or more of the four borders of cells.

Such tables may be formatted more simply, using the "border-collapse: collapse" CSS property; in this table formatting model, the cellspacing attribute (or the CSS "border-spacing:" property) and the table's "padding:" CSS property is ignored and only the larger border of adjacent inner cells (or the table border for outer cells) will be used.

An example of the above for one-pixel table border, using each model (without need for external extensions):

You type

{| style="border-collapse: separate; border-spacing: 0; border-width: 1px; border-style: solid
!style="border-style: solid; border-width: 0 1px 1px 0"| Orange
!style="border-style: solid; border-width: 0 0 1px 0"| Apple

{| style="border-collapse: collapse; border-width: 1px; border-style: solid; border-color: #00
!style="border-style: solid; border-width: 1px"| Orange
!style="border-style: solid; border-width: 1px"| Apple

Notes :

- When using the "border-width:" CSS shortcut property, the order of the four space-separated specified values is: top, right, bottom, left. As an example from above:

When there are fewer than 4 values, the value for left takes its default from the value for right, the value for bottom takes its default from the value for top, and the value for right takes its default from the value for top.

- The HTML attributes (such as "width=", "border=", "cellspacing=", "cellpadding=") do not need any length unit (the pixel unit is assumed). The CSS style properties (which override the HTML attributes) require an explicit length unit (if the value is not 0) such as "px" for the pixel.

HTML colspan and rowspan

You can use HTML colspan and rowspan attributes on cells for advanced layout.

You type	You get
<pre>{ border="1" !colspan="6" Shopping List - rowspan="2" Bread & Butter Pie Buns Danish colspan="2" Croissant - Cheese colspan="2" Ice cream Butter Yoghurt }</pre>

With HTML attributes and CSS styles

CSS style attributes can be added with or without other HTML attributes.

You type	You get

{| style="color:green; background-color:#ffffcc;" cellpadding="10" cellspacing="0" border="1"
|Apple
|Pie
|Butter
|Ice cream

Orange	Apple
Bread	Pie
Butter	Ice cream

Attributes

Attributes can be added to the caption and headers as follows.

You type	You get
Orange	Apple
Bread	Pie
Butter	Ice cream

Column width

Column width can be added as follows.

You type:

| colspan="2" | This column width is 85% of the screen width (and has a background color)
| style="width: 70%;background-color:orange;"| ''This column is 70% counted from 85% of the screen width (and has a background color)''

You get:

This column width is 85% of the screen width (and has a background color)
This column is 30% counted from 85% of	This column is 70% counted from 85% of the screen

the screen width

width (and has a background color)

Accessibility of table header cells

Table header cells do not explicitly specify which table data cells they apply to (those on their right on the same row, or those below them on the same column). When the table is rendered in a visual 2D environment, this is usually easy to infer.

However when tables are rendered on non-visual medias, you can help the browser to determine which table header cell applies to the description of any selected cell (in order to repeat its content in some accessibility helper) using a `scope="row"` or `scope="col"` attribute on table header cells. In most cases with simple tables, you'll use `scope="col"` on all header cells of the first row, and `scope="row"` on the first cell of the following rows:

You type	You get
<pre>{ border="1" cellspacing="0" cellpadding="2" - !scope="col" Item !scope="col" Quantity !scope="col" Price - !scope="row" Bread 0.3 kg $0.65 - !scope="row" Butter 0.125 kg $1.25 - !scope="row" colspan="2" Total $1.90 }</pre>	<table border="1"> <thead> <tr> <th>Item</th> <th>Quantity</th> <th>Price</th> </tr> </thead> <tbody> <tr> <td>Bread</td> <td>0.3 kg</td> <td>$0.65</td> </tr> <tr> <td>Butter</td> <td>0.125 kg</td> <td>$1.25</td> </tr> <tr> <td colspan="2">Total</td> <td>$1.90</td> </tr> </tbody> </table>	Item	Quantity	Price	Bread	0.3 kg	$0.65	Butter	0.125 kg	$1.25	Total		$1.90
Item	Quantity	Price
Bread	0.3 kg	$0.65
Butter	0.125 kg	$1.25
Total		$1.90

Caveats

Negative numbers

If you start a cell on a new line with a negative number with a minus sign (or a parameter that evaluates to a negative number), your table can get broken, because the characters `| -` will be parsed as the wiki markup for table row, not table cell. To avoid this, insert a space before the value (`| -6`) or use in-line cell markup (`| | -6`).

CSS vs Attributes

Table borders specified through CSS rather than the border attribute will render incorrectly in a small subset of text browsers.

Common attributes for columns, column groups and row groups

The MediaWiki syntax for tables currently offers no support for specifying common attributes for columns (with the HTML element `<col />`), column groups (HTML element `<colgroup>...</colgroup>`) and row groups (HTML elements `<thead>...</thead>`, `<tbody>...</tbody>` and `<tfoot>...</tfoot>`). Those standard HTML elements are not accepted even in their HTML or XHTML syntax.

All the rows and cells (header or data) of the table are rendered within a single implicit row group (HTML element `<tbody>...</tbody>`) without any attributes or styles.

Herald of the Council

Overview

The Civil Service appoint one or more of their number as Herald of the Council. This position is designed to ensure the smooth operation of the Military Council and has powers of censure to support that.

The position of Herald is a development of a traditional Dawnish role; that of a retainer whose role is to advise the nobility and to handle mundane logistics. These heralds kept track of the heraldry of individual houses within Dawn - but they also had a traditional role overseeing and arranging the logistics of tourneys. While Tom Drake was demanding national control of the armies, Elaine de Celadorn (Senator for Astolat) was liaising with the Imperial Senate to provide the Military Council with the civilian support she felt it desperately needed.

Despite some initial resistance, Elaine was able to convince the members of the Military Council that by handing control of the logistics of the Imperial armies to the newly formed civil service, up to and including the arrangement of their meetings, they would be freed up to focus their efforts on strategy and leadership.

The Herald of the Council is an NPC only position. Its role is to ensure the smooth running of Military Council meetings - not to play the game.

Duties

The Herald of the Council acts as an impartial chair to ensure that Imperial Military Council meetings, both the muster and each Council session take place in a timely and effective fashion. They keep order in the chamber, ensure the rules are followed and try to make sure everyone has a chance to speak. They are responsible for ensuring that every general has a voice, and oversee any votes that take place. They are responsible for recording any use of the Military Council's powers and liaise with senior civil servants to ensure the Council's decisions are executed.

The Herald oversees an office responsible for preparing briefings to the Military Council, and liaising between the Council and the Imperial Scouts. They also ensure that the army orders submitted by the generals and the navy orders submitted by the admirals are distributed to the Imperial forces, and that every member of the military council knows how to use the powers they possess.

Powers

Member of the Military Council

The Herald is a non-voting member of the Military Council, and may speak freely during Council meetings. In practice, as a civil servant, the Herald tries to keep their voice impartial and restrict their comments to ones needed to ensure the smooth operation of the Council.

Recognition and Agenda

The Herald recognises people who are not members of the military council who are invited to speak during a Council session. They also manage the agenda, determining how long to allocate to each item based on other business.

Convention and Dissolution

The Herald calls a meeting of the Military Council to order, and formally declares it closed. When the Herald declares a meeting closed, its business is considered completed. For example, when the Herald closes the muster, the decision of the Military Council is fixed and cannot be changed later, even if further information comes to light afterwards.

Powers of Censure

The Herald of the Council has the power to sanction anyone attending a muster or Council session once the meeting is open. This power is used to censure rowdy or disruptive individuals, and extends equally to anyone inside the chamber. Generals or their adjutants, a priest attempting to use the right of witness to act in an inappropriate manner, a civil servant who was speaking out of turn, or even The Throne are all subject to censure by the Herald.

As with the Speaker for the Senate, the Herald can apply three sanctions, each of increasing magnitude. The Herald may use any power they judge appropriate - they do not need to start with silence and escalate.

Silence

The first sanction is silence. The Herald can silence a persistently rude or boorish individual; they will not be allowed to speak or answer points made while silenced although they may still vote. In a Council session, the sanction lasts until the discussion of the current agenda item is complete; but if a member of the Council is silenced during a muster then they cannot speak again during that muster.

Exclusion

Should this prove insufficient the second sanction is exclusion - the offending individual is obliged to leave the Military Council meeting until either the end of the muster or the end of the discussion of the current agenda item if the Council is in session. This denies them the right to vote on the matter, so it is considered a serious punishment. They may re-enter the chamber following the vote. This sanction is rarely used on anyone other than members of the military council - the Herald usually skips over it and moves straight to expulsion when dealing with a rowdy or disruptive priest or Imperial citizen.

Expulsion

The third and final sanction is expulsion - the individual is expelled from the muster or Council session. They lose their chance to vote on any issue, and forfeit any address they may have intended to make. This is an extreme sanction and historically is used on members of the Military Council only in response to grave misdemeanours such as threats of violence in the chamber.

Appointment

The Civil Service selects the Herald for the Council. Although the title is usually referred to in the singular, the civil service may grant the title to more than one citizen.

The Herald of the Council can be revoked by the General Assembly, and by the Assembly of the Nine.

The Herald in Play

The Herald is an NPC whose role it is to keep Military Council sessions fun and engaging for the participants.

Herb

Overview

There are five potent herbs that are common throughout the Empire. These herbs are infused with magic which allows them to be used by a skilled physick to cure a range of ailments.

An apothecary can instead use herbs to brew a potion, which can then be used by anyone who is not dying on zero hits.

Rules

- You can only use the magical effects of a herb if you have physick skill
- Any character who has a herb garden receives new herbs after each downtime
- You cannot use a herb without a suitable card and phys-rep present

There are five common herbs in the Empire; it is possible for fleet owners to purchase them from foreign ports but most Imperial herbs are grown in a herb garden. A character who owns a herb garden will receive 14 herbs from their resource in their downtime.

Although herbs have powerful healing properties, they require skill to apply. They can only be applied by a character that has the physick skill, usually as part of some appropriate medical roleplaying.

Herbs are indicated by a small card \(85mm x 55mm\), printed by Profound Decisions, that indicates the presence of the herb and includes the rules for using the herb. You must provide a phys-reps for any herbs that your character owns, and the cards should be kept with the phys-reps, otherwise you cannot use the herbs in game and should not carry the cards on your person.

An appropriate phys-rep for a herb is a small vial of liquid, or a pile of herbs, leaves or pieces of plant matter. You can also focus on phys-repping a suitable container for the herbs instead if you prefer.

In addition to the five potent herbs there are a number of less common herbs like Realmsroot. These herbs are hard to cultivate and often lack the power or flexibility of the five most useful herbs. These rare herbs use a potion lammy rather than a card - it is not possible to be certain what they do until they are used.

Common Herbs

Bladeroot Cerulean Mazzarine Imperial Roseweald Marrowort True Vervain

Blue Mazzarine to save a limb

Grey Bladeroot stems a weakness dim

Red Roseweald poison's power breaks

True Vervain body's healing wakes

Though Marrowort takes soldiers' pain

At battle's end they'll fall again

Herb garden

Definition

A herb garden represents an area of land where herbs grow. A herb garden can be of almost any size - it could be a tiny personal garden in an Urizen spire, meticulously tended and cared for, or it could be a vast forest in Wintermark or Varushka that a character scours in search of wild herbs.

Contents

- 1 Definition
- 2 Production
- 3 Downtime Options
- 4 Upgrades

Production

A herb garden produces 6 doses of True Vervain, 2 doses of Cerulean Mazzarine, 2 doses of Bladeroot, 2 doses of Imperial Roseweald and 2 doses of Marrowort.

Downtime Options

It is possible to obtain a higher yield from a herb garden. You may spend 6 crowns to have the herb garden produce an additional 3 true vervain, 1 cerulean mazzarine, 1 Imperial roseweald, 1 bladeroot and 1 marrowort in that season.

Upgrades

A herb garden can be upgraded using Weirwood obtained from the Bourse. Each time a herb garden is upgraded, the owner chooses a single herb from the list. The herb garden produces 2 additional doses of that herb from then on.

To upgrade a herb garden requires Imperial wains of weirwood equal to the level the herb garden is being upgraded to. So the first upgrade of a starting level 1 herb garden costs 2 Imperial wains of weirwood, from 2 to 3 costs 3 Imperial wains, etc.

Herbalist of the Hearth

Overview

The Herbalist of the Hearth is an Imperial title appointed by the senators of Wintermark. The Herbalist has custodianship of The Valley of Pride, a garden commissioned by the Civilian Commissioner of Wintermark in Summer 380YE. Construction was completed shortly after the 380YE Summer Solstice.

The position of Herbalist of the Hearth is a sinecure, requiring minimal responsibility but offering a regular income of herbs. The position is a Wintermark national Imperial title.

Contents

- 1 Overview
- 2 Responsibilities
- 3 Powers
 - 3.1 Bounty of the Herbalist
- 4 Appointment
- 5 The Valley of Pride

Responsibilities

The Herbalist of the Hearth has no particular responsibilities; they simply receive a bounty of herbs from the Valley of Pride in Wood Heath, Hahnmark. If the Valley were to be threatened in any way, it would be the responsibility of the Herbalist to deal with those threats.

Powers

Bounty of the Herbalist

The Herbalist receives an income of herbs each season: 6 doses of Bladeroot, 5 doses of True Vervain, 4 doses each of Imperial Roseweald and Marwort, and 2 doses of Cerulean Mazzarine. Bladeroot and True Vervain prosper in the northern hills, but the gardeners struggle to maintain more than a few patches of Cerulean Mazzarine.

Appointment

The Herbalist of the Hearth is appointed by unanimous decision of the Wintermark senators. If a unanimous decision cannot be reached, the title may be appointed by the Imperial Senate instead.

The title can be held by a Wintermark citizen. The Herbalist has tenure, and serves until they die or step down. They can be revoked by the General Assembly, the Wintermark National Assembly, and by the Assembly of the Nine.

The Valley of Pride

The Valley of Pride is a grand edifice built of weirwood and deep mined stone that encircles the delicate herb gardens within. This impressive sinecure has the rune of pride carved across its walls many times and its vaulted entrance archways with their crenelations and guard posts and the weirwood stockade walls stand high against the surrounding land. Trees, shrubs, herbs, and other flora stand along the paths that lead to the sinecure's mighty studded entrance doors each door has had the rune of Pallas carved upon it at eye height the flora slowly creeps its ways along and up the walls blending nature and man made might.

The edifice itself is a monument to Pride - every wall is covered in runes and carved stories concerning the accomplishments of the followers, Paragons and exemplars of pride from across the Empire. Where imagery could be found the faces of paragons and exemplars reside carved into the hard dark stone where the stories of their exploits can be read, within this huge erection resides the more common herbs found dutifully kept and tendered by household members of the Wintermark hall of Hendle Hearth.

The interior gardens are a sharp contrast to the wild, and only just recognizably tendered gardens of the harder to grow herbs of the Empire which line the hills around the sinecure. This enables maximum harvests of both easy and hard to grow herbs. The valley of pride lies next to the Hall of Hendle Hearth between Southridge and Wood Heath, just outside the village of Wood Hall . Built upon the prosperity of Tyr Brenna so that Brienne Stormborn can continue to keep the Mark, their allies, and the Empire on their feet and battling the enemy for longer, she believes,

Every herb is a life on the battlefield saved, and every herb lost is a life lost on the battlefield.

There are five common herbs in the Empire; it is possible for fleet owners to purchase them from foreign ports but most Imperial herbs are grown in a herb garden. A character who owns a herb garden will receive 14 herbs from their resource in their downtime.

Although herbs have powerful healing properties, they require skill to apply. They can only be applied by a character that has the physick skill, usually as part of some appropriate medical roleplaying.

Herbs are indicated by a small card \(85mm x 55mm\), printed by Profound Decisions, that indicates the presence of the herb and includes the rules for using the herb. You must provide a phys-reps for any herbs that your character owns, and the cards should be kept with the phys-reps, otherwise you cannot use the herbs in game and should not carry the cards on your person.

An appropriate phys-rep for a herb is a small vial of liquid, or a pile of herbs, leaves or pieces of plant matter. You can also focus on phys-repping a suitable container for the herbs instead if you prefer.

Hercynia

Overview

Ice-bound northern Hercynia is a forest territory entirely contained in the Nation of Wintermark, situated in the Great Vale, a bowl of mountains that surround both Hercynia and Skarsind. It is an inhospitable place, but where the Trods flow so the Navarr travel. Over the centuries, the Navarr have made slow but steady inroads here, reclaiming much of the forest from the particularly malicious Vallorn that dwells within it.

The trees of Hercynia are ancient, and the soil of the forests is home to a great wealth of dragonbone which for centuries was carefully harvested and used extensively by the runesmiths in the forges at Treji. Spring is short here, and Winter long and dark. On the coldest winters, when eerie lights dance in the northern sky, snow blankets the dark pines.

Recent History

The fall of Skarsind in 373YE left the people of Hercynia facing immediate danger, as the Thule orcs tried to force their way into the forest to achieve the capture of the whole of the Great Vale. Barbarian forces took the runeorges of Treji, but made no further ground. With the defeat of the Thule forces in Skarsind, it is likely that a concerted effort could be made to recover the territory claimed by the orcs.

Of particular concern to the people of Hercynia is the idea that concerted push from the orcs could result in the loss of more ground, and (coupled with the presence of the vallorn in Deer's Folly), the loss of the entire territory. Thankfully, the defeat of the Thule in Skarsind made this much less of a possibility. In the Winter of 377YE, the Summer Storm army swept down from the foothills to the north into the Glade of Shadows and shattered the barbarian presence there. The Imperial orcs liberated Treji, and freed hundreds of enslaved Navarr. Now the Imperial Orcs hold Skarsind, and the Navarr are starting to set up trade routes to the new nation.

Major Features

Treji

A stone-built steading in the heart of the winter forest at The Glen of Shadows, and one of the only places where the Navarr had a number of large forges, built with aid from the Winterfolk. Steinr apprentices are often placed with the Navarr for a time, to learn the working of wood alongside metal. The steading fell to the barbarian orcs in the fall of Skarsind in 372YE and was liberated by the Imperial orcs in the Winter of 377YE. The forges were devastated during the fighting and by last-ditch sabotage by the spiteful Thule defenders. Hundreds of Navarr slaves were liberated in the process, including a number of artisans who had been forced to create weapons and armour for their captors. A number of prisoners were unaccounted for, however - many of the runesmiths captured when the steading was taken had already been sent north to captivity in Otkodov.

Shortly before Summer 380YE, work was completed on a large wayhouse here designed to encourage trade with Skarsind, under the control of the Broker of Treji Wayhouse. Already it is bringing increased trade through the territory, and it forms the western arm of the Northern trade network.

The Heartwood of the Great Vale

The Heartwood of the Great Vale is a Bourse resource located in northern Summersend. Custodianship of the Heartwood is an Imperial Title that brings with it a Seat on the Imperial Bourse. It produces 25 Imperial wains of weirwood every season. Control is allocated to any Imperial citizen by open auction during the Winter Solstice.

Two huge stones and a top lintel stand in the middle of a clearing, carved about with boar, deer and other game, and symbols representing summer. It is covered in moss, and no-one has ever seen a hint of any magic from it.

The Vallorn of Hercynia

The vallorn of Hercynia is often characterized as "malicious" or "patient." It does not seem to be as vibrant as the vallorn in more southerly climes, and is certainly not as aggressive as the vallorns of Brocéliande or Liathaven. It is well known that the Vallorn itself is not sentient but a hostile area of land, however, it is the actions of the creatures that dwell in the Vallorn that give it this reputation. While incursions from vallornspawn are few and far between, they are especially vicious when they do come. Over the centuries, it has been beaten back to a dark heart in eastern Deer's Folly but efforts to dislodge it entirely have failed.

Regions

Northpines

The mountains of north-west Hercynia are home to several mines that have been worked since before there was an Empire. The slopes of the mountains are thick with ancient pine trees, rich in Ambergelt and Dragonbone. This was the easiest region to clear of Vallorn influence during the slow war of attrition to regain Hercynia, and there have been no major incursions of vallornspawn into the mountains in centuries. This region is famously where Myfanwy (one of the earliest companions of the First Empress) was born, and where she was called to help mediate a dispute between rival steadings during the unsuccessful first attempt to bring the Urizen into the Empire. Some conspirators claim that had Myfanwy made the trip with the First Empress, the Urizen could have been convinced to join the Empire early.

Several secluded passes through the mountains into Skarsind served as trade routes prior to the invasion of the Thule. In later years they were used to launch scouting missions into the barbarian-held territory. The steadings of the region are considered a little odd by many Navarr, and occasionally accused of having more in common with the Winterfolk than with their own cousins. There may be a little truth to this - with the loss of the Glen of Shadows to the barbarians, Northpines was cut off from the rest of Hercynia - and indeed the Empire - by a combination of barbarians and the vallorn-infested region of Deer's Folly to the south.

North Pines is the home to the Pridestalkers Striding who's rite of passage involves hunting and skinning the Snow Lions, the children of the Eternal Cathan Canae. It is also the location of the newly built House of Barbs, commissioned by the controversial senator Rhain Winters Vigl.

The Glen of Shadows

The stading of Treji still stands here, but has been extensively damaged by the battle between the Imperial orcs and the barbarian occupiers. The artisans who made their home here combined the working of wood and metal to make weapons and armour for the Thorns of Hercynia and to support their Winterfolk allies. The Iron Roots of Treji stand guard in this area to make sure that no threat will harm the area. The Glen of Shadows is known for their fine magical bows and spears, easily matching the more workmanlike produce of the Wintermark runesmiths.

The famous Shadowglyn Distillery is located here on the lower slopes of the Northpines. The once famous distillery produced some of the best drinks in the Empire until it was destroyed in a pitched battle between the Thule and Navarr defenders, during fighting in the territory. Production has recently restarted at the site, under the auspices of Wern Taur Thorntarry.

Keywords: Forested

Deer's Folly

Another mountainous area of Hercynia, but one that has fared less well than Northpines. While the mountains to the west create a natural barrier against the worst effects of the vallorn, a poisonous miasma lies over much of the region. The noxious atmosphere pools in valleys and spreads through the forest from the vallorn of Hercynia, wrapped tight around the ruins of an ancient Terunael city in the east. There are only a handful of steadings in Deer's Folly and they are all built in the western mountains - no stading established closer to the vallorn heart has survived more than a decade before it is overrun. The oldest of these is the small but ancient stading of Bont Goch. The Winterfolk Queen Ilsin is believed to have met her end here at the hands of the Vallornspawn - some scholars point to the fact that her famous standard bore a white stag and suggest it is more than coincidence the region is known as "Deer's Folly" - but if it had a name before this it is known only to historians. (OOC Note: This region is not considered to be in Imperial hands. It cannot be reclaimed until the power of the Vallorn is broken.)

Keywords: Forested, Hilly, Vallorn

Old Ranging

The forests of Old Ranging are carefully cultivated by the inhabitants of the Steadings here. The woods are rich with animal life, and many hunters make a good living providing pelts, furs and fine meats to merchants and traders who travel across the Empire. Likewise, the manystreams and shallow rivers are rich with an impressive variety of fish and a number of steadings here raise domesticated deer and even goats whose meat is very much in demand. There are several well-established trade routs from Old Ranging to Kalapheim and Winterfolk merchants are a common sight in the Summer months. It has not always been this way of course - there are several battlefields here that date back to pre-Imperial times when the ancestors of the modern Winterfolk, spurred on by their successes against the trolls attempted to conquer Hercynia. The tragic tale of Queen Ilsin is sometimes told by both Navarr and Winterfolk, recounting how her army was lead through Old Ranging by the clever Navarr and tricked into marching into Deer's Folly where the 'thousand strong army' was devoured by the Vallorn. The tale is probably an exaggeration but seems to have at least some basis in truth. It marked the last major conflict between the Navarr and the Winterfolk in Hercynia, although to this day Suaq explorers make occasional forays into Old Ranging seeking for some sign of Queen Ilsin's personal standard Winter Fury which is believed to be a potent artefact.

In recent years, as the heart of the Vallorn of Hercynia has become more restive, there has been an increase in vallornspawn attacks on hunting parties along the northern borders - but never in great numbers, and the attacks have been dealt with swiftly and effectively by vigilant Thorns.

Keywords: Forested

Summersend

The forests of Summersend are sparse, giving way to the plains of Gildenheim to the north. The Gate of Summer is found here, along with several other well-explored Terunael ruins. Several steadings are built on a foundation of old Terunael structures, and it is from here that the push to drive back the Vallorn is overseen. There are several old battlefields here, most dating back to pre-Imperial times and to attempts by the Vard ancestors of the Varushkans to conquer Hercynia. Most of these battlefields have long since been forgotten but one - Mourning Hollow on the very south-eastern borders - was said to be haunted by the unquiet spirits of dead Vard and Navarr warriors due to the result of a forgotten curse or betrayal. Due to the actions of an expedition in Winter 379YE there have been no sightings of ghosts since. Mourning Hollow is also the site of the Great Library of Hacynian.

In addition to the usual occasional incursions from the vallorn of Hercynia, there have been several skirmishes with the orcs both from Skarsind and from the Glen of Shadows to the north-west. The fortified steadings here served as a base of operations for forays into Skarsind during the recent war, and a number of Wintermark refugees were helped to safe havens in Hahnmark to the south west.

The Foxden stading is the most influential stading based in Summersend and acts as a place to run messages not only across Hercynia but across the entire Empire.

Summersend is also the site of the Heartwood of the Great Vale, and of the corpse glade where the eerie unknown remains dug from beneath the roots of the ancient weirwood are interred.

The Heartwood of the Great Vale is in northern Summersend, right on the edge of the Glen of Shadows.

Here's A Health to the Company

Trad. Tune here.

A pdf of the lyrics and tune can be found here.

Kind friends and companions, come join me in rhyme
Come lift up your voices in chorus with mine
Come lift up your voices, all grief to refrain
For we may or might never all meet here again

Chorus: Here's a health to the company and one to my lass
Let us drink and be merry all out of one glass
Let us drink and be merry, all grief to refrain
For we may or might never all meet here again

Here's a health to the dear lass that I love so well
For her style and for her beauty, there's none can excel
There's a smile upon her countenance as she sits on my knee
There is none in this wide world as happy as me

Chorus

Our ship lies at anchor, she's ready to dock
I wish her safe landing without any shock
If ever I should meet you by land or by sea I will always remember your kindness to me

Hero's Girdle

Description

These sturdy suits of mage armour help a magician survive the dangers of the battlefield. In Wintermark this armour has been used for centuries. Both the icewalkers who ranged across the north alongside the hunters and warriors of the Suag and the warrior-magi of the Steinr relied on this simple magical armour to strengthen themselves in dangerous environments. When the Steinr fell from the heavens, their runesmiths combined their heavier designs with the lighter, more mobile designs of their new allies. Today's Hero's Girdle usually incorporates a solid leather belt (or a leather pectoral) marked with one of the runes of Summer - most commonly Verys, the rune of Might.

These are among the earliest enchanted items mentioned in the annals of Urizen, as armoursmiths strove to improve their designs for mage armour. This was one of their first advances, made from the hides of a hardy breed of goat which lived only on the highest peaks of Morrow, studded with gems in the pattern of constellations. Though other designs for mage armour soon surpassed it, the technique is still taught to apprentices early in their careers as a practice piece.

Dawnish war witches often have Hero's Girdle bearing the heraldry of their Noble House, while all across the Empire, covens with a love of battle have matching sets made, emblazoned with imagery symbolising their coven oath.

Rules

- Form: Armour. Takes the form of a suit of mage armour.
- Requirement: You must have both the magician and battle mage skills to bond to this item.
- Effect: You gain one additional rank of endurance.
- Materials: Crafting a hero's girdle requires no special materials. It takes two months to make one of these items.

"Quarterly Or and Gules, in the first quarter a mullet Argent."

Justin hated these spot tests, especially when he was busy with something else. The squire had enough to think about with his Noble's armour and well-being without worrying about heraldry. He set down the pails of water from the well and brought the heraldry to mind - this one, at least, he knew. "Um... Robert Arnheim, Earl-Enchanter of House Arnheim."

"Correct," Tomas nodded briefly; it was the most approval that Justin ever saw from the Cambion Noble. "Barry nebuly of six Gules and Or."

"Renee, Earl-Enchantress of House Coudray." That was an easy one.

"Argent, three chevronels Sinople."

Damn it. That one always came up. And the very fact that he could never remember it seemed to be the very reason he could never remember it. It was self-perpetuating. He hung his head. "I don't know, my Lord," he admitted at last.

"Fool! You must know all of these and more and you have only two days before the tourney. Imagine the shame you will bring to us when the Lady Willemina de Gera notices you staring at her girdle with your lips moving, trying to work out her name to announce her!"

The young Changeling bit his lip in annoyance. Why all the Enchanters had to wear their livery on their girdles was quite beyond him. Would the hearts of their cuirasses not have sufficed? Why must it be their precious girdles with their precious magic in them? "I will learn them, my Lord, I promise you," he said, affecting shame to smother the flare of his annoyance.

"See that you do, or there will be a bitter surprise for you once they are departed. Not for nothing do they wear their livery on their girdles," he said, as if he could read the boy's mind, "Many of them have been saved by the power in that armour. Many of them would not be alive if it were not for the skill and devotion of the armour-smiths who made them. And the armour would not serve them if it were not made their own. See that you pay due respect to that fact, and do not spend undue time staring at them in public." Tomas made a gesture of dismissal and went on his way.

Justin sighed and gritted his teeth. One day he would be a Noble, and then, he supposed, all this would come naturally. Protocol, livery, respect. He hefted his water-pails again and set off across the courtyard. It was going to be a long, long day.

Heroes' Horn

Description

A Heroes' Horn allows a priest to use a musical performance to draw on the power of the consecration of Courage to inspire their audience. Listeners are filled with a profound sense of their ability to change the world if they only trust themselves and stick to what they know to be right. The power of the magical musical instrument itself is only part of the process that brings about this spiritual experience - the performance itself helps connect the spirit of the audience with the power of the potent consecrated aura.

A common form for this musical instrument is a horn or trumpet, something that can be used to sound a rousing note before a battle. Some priests on the other hand, especially those of the Brass Coast and the Navarr like to use big, deep drums. During a ceremony, the drums are beaten with a slow rhythm that echoes a heartbeat, helping the celebrants to achieve the right mental state. In Wintermark, Courage is represented by Jotra, Rune of Battle, and many artificers choose to include this rune as part of the decoration of the instrument. In Dawn it is more likely to see these instruments decorated with the images of gryphons.

It is common for a priest using this musical instrument to intersperse inspiring poetry or readings from the lives of the Paragons and Exemplars of Courage between their music, or to perform as part of a group who combine their playing with inspiring songs.

As with many religious magic items, it is common for an Heroes' Horn to be hallowed. A popular choice is the Hallowing of the Bard, perhaps unsurprisingly.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of any kind of musical instrument.
- Requirement: You must have the dedication skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: You must be dedicated to Courage to use this item. Once per day, while you are in an area consecrated to Courage, you may spend ten minutes of appropriate roleplaying that includes playing this musical instrument. Any listener who was in the area for the entire period recovers all hero points. You cannot use this ability if you are on a battlefield or in a similar stressful environment. A listener who has lost the ability to recover hero points overnight is not effected by this power.
- Materials: Crafting a Heroes' Horn requires 7 ingots of orichalcum, 9 ingots of green iron, and 5 measures of dragonbone; It takes 1 month to make one of these items.

Heroic skills

Heroic Skills

- You must purchase the hero skill before you can take any other heroic skills

You must purchase one or more hero points before you can purchase any of the heroic skills listed in this section. These skills (and some items that can be gained in play) allow you to expend hero points to achieve game effects.

To use a hero point you must use appropriate roleplaying for the skill or ability that you are using. A heroic blow might be bold and dramatic and accompanied by a mighty roar, other skills should be roleplayed as appropriate.

If you are using an offensive heroic ability and the target does not visibly respond to your heroic call then your blow has not affected and the hero point is not spent. You only expend a hero point when using a heroic call if the target is affected by the call.

Your character's hero points replenish overnight.

Hero

- You must purchase hero points before you can take any other heroic skills.

The first time you buy this skill you receive 2 hero points. You may expend a hero point at any time to act as a source of spiritual strength to allow you to overcome or resist a roleplaying effect that your character is subject to.

Extra Hero Points

You gain one additional hero point each time you purchase this skill. The cost to purchase this skill increases by 1 pt each time you purchase the skill.

Cleaving Strike

- Requires a weapon between 24" and 84" long
- You can expend one hero point to call CLEAVE once

If you have a hero point then you can expend it to call CLEAVE when striking a single blow with any one-handed weapon that is between 24" and 42" long. If you also have the weapon master skill then you can use the skill with any weapon up to 84" long.

Mortal Blow

- Requires a weapon between 48" and 60" long
- Requires a phys-rep of a sword, axe, hammer, or mace
- You can expend one hero point to call IMPALE once

If you have a hero point then you can expend it to call IMPALE when striking a single blow with any two-handed weapon that is between 48" and 60" long. You cannot use this skill with a weapon, even a two-handed weapon, that is shorter than 48" in length.

You may only use this skill with a suitable weapon - such as a great sword, Dane axe, or a two-handed hammer or mace. You cannot use this skill with a flail, spear or other polearm regardless of length. If you are in any doubt whether your weapon could credibly deliver a mortal blow, then check with a ref.

Please note, although a great weapon can be between 42" and 60" long - you cannot use a great weapon shorter than 48" with this skill.

Mighty Strikedown

- Requires a weapon between 60" and 84" long
- You can expend one hero point to call STRIKEDOWN once

If you have a hero point then you can expend it to call STRIKEDOWN when striking a single blow with any two-handed polearm that is between 60" and 84" long.

Relentless

Effects that would cripple your limbs are less effective when used against you. By spending a hero point and engaging in at least five seconds of appropriate roleplaying such as slamming your arm against a tree, shaking your head to clear it of pain, or loudly exclaiming that you feel no pain, you can regain the use of one of your limbs that has been ruined by the cleave or impale call. If you make an attack while using this skill the attempt fails. You do not lose the hero point but the roleplaying must be begun again.

Unstoppable FAQ

You possess an almost uncanny will to survive, or seemingly bottomless reserves of physical stamina allowing you to take blow after blow and keep fighting. You may restore up to three lost hits by expending a hero point and spending at least five seconds appropriate roleplaying of visibly catching your breath, letting forth a roar of renewed vigour or similar.

You may also use this ability immediately after being reduced to zero hits. You fall to the ground as normal, but may then immediately spend a hero point and engage in at least five seconds of appropriate roleplaying. You are not dying and are instead restored to 3 hits. It must be obvious to everyone within ten feet that you are using a heroic skill - this ability cannot be used secretly. Once you have completed the roleplaying you are free to pretend to be dead, but must still follow the disguise rules. If you are paralysed when you are reduced to 0 hits, you cannot use this ability and will not be able to use it once the paralysis wears off.

You cannot attack another character while you are using this skill.

Unstoppable does not restore a limb that has been CLEAVED or IMPALED, nor does it remove the venom condition, and (as usual) you cannot use this skill while under the effect of WEAKNESS.

Stay With Me

You may restore one hit to a bleeding companion and stop them bleeding to death by spending a hero point and performing at least five seconds of uninterrupted roleplaying encouraging them to get back on their feet. If you or your target attacks another character or either of you are hit then the attempt to use stay with me fails. Your hero point is not lost but you must begin the roleplaying again. You must be close enough to touch the target and it does not restore the use of a limb that has been CLEAVED or IMPALED.

Get it Together

You may restore three hits to a companion who still has hits remaining by expending a hero point and performing at least five seconds of uninterrupted appropriate roleplaying encouraging them to pull themselves together. If you or your target attacks another character or either of you are hit then the attempt to use get it together fails. Your hero point is not lost but you must begin the roleplaying again. You must be close enough to touch the target and it does not restore the use of a limb that has been CLEAVED or IMPALED.

Heroism

The Winterfolk admire heroism and believe that it speeds your passage through the Labyrinth of Ages. Although heroism is not one of the seven Virtues, acts of heroism encompass any or all of them to some extent. Heroism does not require success, but it does demand that the possibility of triumph exists; there is nothing heroic about wasting your life in a foolhardy charge. Heroism is often easiest to notice in battle, but many noble qualities or outstanding achievements demonstrate heroism. A clever Suag who outwits an Eternal in a battle of riddles or a wise Kallavesi surgeon whose herb-lore saves a dozen lives are both heroes.

Heroic acts are distinguished by what is achieved or attempted, not how difficult or dangerous they are. Deliberately making an act more difficult than it need be impresses no-one in Wintermark. Equally the heroism is not diminished if the act is accomplished with others; indeed the more people who are involved in act the more heroic it becomes. It is brave to charge the orc line, but it is heroic to lead the charge.

The Winterfolk regard heroism as superior to Dawnish ideals of glory. In their eyes glory is needlessly vain; a Winterfolk hero does not need to have other people know of their accomplishments. They believe that the pursuit of glory encourages people to make their challenges needlessly difficult and denies the value of wit and guile. In Wintermark nobody demands that your actions be impressive; it is enough that they are effective.

High Bard of the Empire

Overview

The High Bard of the Empire is an Imperial title appointed by the the Assembly of the Nine. It was created by the Imperial Senate during the Winter Solstice 380YE summit. Following some controversy, the title was granted a stipend during the Summer Solstice of the same year.

The title as first presented passed through the Senate during the Winter 380YE session, but there was some opposition from the Constitutional Court. While the discussion continued, Kaywenn du Launcet was appointed the first High Bard and the situation was resolved in Summer 381YE.

The title seems to court controversy; the first address by Kaywenn du Launcet took the form of a highly political song apparently lauding convicted criminal Dogri Thulebane of Wintermark, and criticizing the Varushkan army of the Iron Helms who were instrumental in his capture. It remains to be seen if this will create a trend for future addresses, and for future High Bards.

Responsibilities

The High Bard is expected to leave a personal composition as a legacy. They are expected to keep the Senate apprised of matters of inspiration to the Empire, and to promote and encourage excellence and passionate demonstration of artistic performance across all the nations of the Empire.

Limitations

One Year Only

The High Bard serves for up to one year unless removed from office early. In addition, no person may hold the title of High Bard of the Empire more than once in their lifetime.

Powers

Address the Senate

The High Bard has the right to make an address to the Senate once per summit. This is intended to allow them to keep the Senate apprised of matters of inspiration to the Empire, and may commonly take the form of an artistic performance. To use this power, the High Bard informs the Civil Service that they wish to address the Senate. Their address will be added to the agenda for the next Senate session.

Stipend

The High Bard receives a stipend of 1 Throne each season.

Appointment

The High Bard is appointed during the Spring Equinox. The Bard is appointed by the Assembly of Nine. The expectation is that the appointment will follow "a public tournament of song and satire" that allows participants to demonstrate their suitability to the role in fair and open competition. There is no legal requirement for the Assembly of Nine to arrange, or acknowledge, such a tournament however.

Any Imperial citizen may hold the title. They can be revoked by the General Assembly and the Assembly of the Nine.

The High Bard will embody the artistic spirit of the Empire and should carry songs in passion and courage to embolden and encourage our soldiers and should deliver spirit-crushing feats of satire and rebuke against the Barbarian Generals and our hated foes! By these means we will demonstrate the power of artistic inspiration from all

High Exorcist

Overview

The position was established by unanimous vote of the Senate in Winter 377YE. The High Exorcist exists to advise the Military Council on the use of ceremonies on the battlefield. The intent is that the priest who holds the title will co-ordinate the use of liao against malign auras and creatures during Imperial military actions. A stipend was assigned to allow the High Exorcist to obtain, commission and distribute such items or works as are needed in support of this goal. Examples of the latter might include liao for use in ceremonies of exorcism or magical items such as a Beneficent Sigil or an Icon of the Justicar.

The original motion to create the title attempted to grant the Right of Address in the Military Council, but at the time this was ruled unconstitutional. Further examination of the situation led to a reversal of that decision in 378YE. In Spring 379YE the Senate voted to increase the High Exorcist's stipend from the original 3 Thrones each season to 7 Thrones each season.

During the Spring Equinox 381YE the Senate voted to remove the High Exorcist's stipend and replace it with the power to withdraw funds. A veto was raised before the Synod against this motion, but it was not upheld.

Responsibilities

The High Exorcist is expected to advise the Military Council on the use of religious ceremonies on the battlefield, and to co-ordinate volunteers using liao against malign auras and spiritual enemies.

Powers

Right of Address

The High Exorcist has the right to make a address to the Imperial Military Council once per summit. This is intended to allow them to advise the Military Council on spiritual matters, to offer assistance or to ask for assistance in helping the priests of the Way to better support Imperial forces. To use this power, the High Exorcist informs the Herald of the Council that they wish to make an address, which will then be added to the agenda for the next Council session.

Withdraw funds

The High Exorcist may remove up to seven Thrones each season from the Virtue fund without requiring a vote. To use this power, the High Exorcist must still place a judgement before the Synod, but it is considered to pass automatically at the point it is presented. Judgements to remove money from the Virtue Fund are in addition to any existing judgements they have raised normally. When using this power, the High Exorcist should still indicate the group or individual that is to be rewarded.

Appointment

The High Exorcist is appointed by judgement of the Assembly of Nine during the Winter Solstice.

Any Imperial citizen can hold the title of High Exorcist. They can be revoked by a lesser majority of the General Assembly.

To Veto the Senate proposal to abrogate the High Exorcist Stipend of 7 thrones per season from the Imperial Budget and grant them the power to withdraw 7 Thrones from the Virtue Fund without the Synod being at to vote or veto.

High Herbalist of Sybella

Overview

The High Herbalist of Sybella is an Imperial title created by the Highguard Civilian Commissioner in Summer 380YE. It is responsible for overseeing the Sybella Cross Physician's Hall, a ministry built at Sybela in Bastion. When it was established, the expectation was that the hall would give preferential treatment to the Anvil Hospital & Imperial School of Medicine sodality, but it remains to be seen whether successive High Herbalists adhere to this vision for the Physician's hall.

Responsibilities

The High Herbalist is expected to supply herbs at a preferential rate to the Anvil Hospital & Imperial School of Medicine - although of course this is merely an expectation and exerts no legal restrictions on the holder of the title who is free to do with the resources provided by the ministry as they see fit. If the Physician's Hall were ever threatened, it would be the responsibility of the High Herbalist to deal with those threats - but also to deal with any opportunity to expand the Hall, or work more closely with the physicks, apothecaries, and herbalists of Sybella Cross.

35 Crowns	26 True Vervain, 6 Imperial Roseweald, 6 Bladeroot, 6 Cerulean Mazzarine, 6 Marrowort

Purchase of Herbs

The Sybella Cross Physician's Hall is a ministry. The High Herbalist can purchase quantities of herbs at a set price. The High Herbalist makes their decision how much money to spend during downtime from their character page. Money is removed from, and resources are placed into, the character's inventory when the downtime is processed.

Appointment

The High Herbalist of Sybella is appointed by unanimous decision of the Highborn senators. If a unanimous decision cannot be reached, the title may be appointed by the Imperial Senate instead.

The title can be held by a citizen of Highguard. The High Herbalist has tenure, and serves until they die or step down. They can be revoked by the General Assembly, the Wintermark National Assembly, and by the Assembly of the Nine.

Sybella Cross Physician's Hall

Built in Sybella Cross in Bastion, the Physician's Hall purchases herbs from citizens and provides medicinal support to the inhabitants of Sybella Cross. As one of the richest towns in Bastion, and a central hub for trade, the Hall is ideally placed to take advantage of herb traders traveling to and from Urizen and Therunin, or those en route to or from the new Gardens of High Chalcis in Reikos.

Much of the trade at the Physician's Hall is between private citizens, but the High Herbalist and their representatives often receive first refusal or access to special opportunities to acquire herbs at bargain prices.

The Hall also serves as an academy for training herbalists, physicks, and apothecaries. While it does not rival the great physicians schools of pre-Druj Reikos, it has attracted students and teachers from across Bastion, Casinea, and Necropolis - especially in the wake of the coronataion address of Imperatrix Lisabetta.

Highguard Egregore

Escon

Escon is the Highguard Egregore. Escon has three primary interests; to embody the Imperial Faith and commitment to Virtue, to promote the martial spirit of the Highborn, and to expand the knowledge of the Nation. The spirit encourages competition, but as a means to the end of promoting and encouraging Highborn in the pursuit of excellence, rather than as an end in itself. Most of all, Escon encourages the Highborn to embrace their history and pursue Virtue with every part of their being.

Escon always tries to help people make up their own minds and come to their own conclusions, through careful questioning and encouragement to examine motivations, actions and beliefs. This is not done to demonstrate intellectual superiority, but rather to encourage the Highborn to develop their own powers of deductive reasoning. Escon is quite capable of making definitive statements when the situation demands it.

Current Hosts

Ehud, Son of Leah, of Reumah's Redoubt

One of the current host is Ehud, Son of Leah, of Reumah's Redoubt. Formerly having served in Reikos during and after its fall as an Unconquered before injury caused him to retire to Bastion. There he take up the role of an artisan within the Redoubt, specialising in stained glass works of art when he was not producing shields for his Chapter and the frontlines of battle.

Wearing a gold circlet at summits, as during the season, he moves from Chapter to Chapter listening to his people's conversations, asking questions for them to ask of themselves and playing games of skill.

Eden, Daughter of Eve of Tamar's Rest

In YE380 as Reikos burst into Spring and a crown sat upon the head of a new Empress the spirit of Escon called to her, seeking her out in dreams and waking visions to quietly ask if she would take up the mantle and become a host, which as a loyal servant of Highguard and the Empire and following her virtuous path she did.

Before she became host to Escon, Eden was based in Necropolis as a low ranking steward of the dead with her chapter Tamar's Rest. When she was young she served for several years with one of the Highborn armies, The Granite Pillar, wielding virtuous blessings and powerful winter magic to aid on the battlefields of the Empire until she retired from active service.

Now she travels the Empire collecting and sharing the tales of Imperial citizens and offering counsel to those that might seek it.

Highguard history (Redirected from Highguard History)

The founding

Seven centuries ago, the Highborn arrived on the Bay of Catazar. Seventeen great vessels carrying pure souls crossed the sea from the south looking for new lands. They left behind a land and people slowly being consumed by corruption and darkness. They were steered by the legendary Navigators, a pair of visionary twins named Atuman and Atun who were later acknowledged as an Exemplar of Ambition and a Paragon of Wisdom respectively.

Upon landing, Atuman founded the city of Pharos at the mouth of the river Couros. Atun – following a vision of her own – took only the flagship, bade her brother farewell and set sail, never to be seen again.

The navigators of the first vessels formed a council of Patricians to advise Atuman the Navigator. After his death his eldest daughter took the title of Navigator and ruled in his place while the Patricians also named heirs from amongst their offspring. The council ruled wisely for many years but as the generations passed the Navigator and the Patricians became more obsessed with preserving their power and their bloodlines and degenerated into self-interest and corruption.

During this time, trade with the Navarr introduced the Highborn to Vinum, a herb which was used medicinally and recreationally. However, the Scions of Atun, a group of ascetics and mystics, discovered a process of refining into a substance called Liao. They used Liao to experience visions, and in other ceremonies, that revealed the Labyrinth of Ages. This enlightenment, about the immortal nature of the human spirit and the power of virtue, sparked a period of time now referred to as The Revelation.

The Revelation stirred a spiritual yearning within the people and swept across the land, awakening many to a new and profound understanding of life. This awakening was further fuelled by widespread disillusionment with the venal ways of the Patricians. The Scions and other groups born of The Revelation left Pharos, sicked by the corruption that riddled the city. Along the borders of the nation they built their own communities, called chapters, each dedicated to teaching a profound way of living inspired by The Revelation and guarding against corruption.

As the chapters grew, the Patricians became jealous of their influence and passed laws to try to control them. Things came to a head in the time of the Navigator Permion, who later generations would call the Lawmaker – a Navigator who strove to serve the people rather than his own interest. Permion sought to reach out to the leaders of the chapters, starting with the most influential, Lepidus of the Seven Stars. Lepidus is now acknowledged as a Paragon of Pride. He taught Permion about the greatness of the Highborn, what they had been and could be again, and helped him find the will to oppose the wickedness of the Patricians.

Permion the Lawmaker's judgements and actions brought the Patricians into conflict with him and also with each other. Rather than allow the nation to fall into anarchy, Permion declared martial law and dissolved the Patrician Council. In its place, he invited the chapters to form an Assembly of the Virtuous to advise him.

The response of the Patrician Council was swift and bloody, and a bitter civil war ensued. Permion was assassinated, along with his wife and three of his four children. Various Patricians tried to claim the title of Navigator and the city of Pharos was burned to the ground by rival armies. Eventually the Assembly was forced to act. After mobilizing the military strength of the chapterhouses it crushed the remaining Patrician forces and assumed the governance of the nation. Today, the Lawmaker is recognised as an influential Exemplar of Courage.

The Assembly of the Virtuous elected to turn the ruins of Pharos into the Necropolis, a great mausoleum to house the bodies of all those slain in the war. They also ordered the construction of Bastion, a new city which would serve as a civic and religious centre for the Highborn thereafter and vowed that no Highborn would ever war with other Highborn again.

The horses of Highguard

The Highborn fleet carried with them a great herd of horses. These legendary beasts embodied noble virtues of loyalty, strength and dignity. Mounted on their mighty warhorses, the Highborn were unbeaten in battle and the creatures became the iconic symbol of the nation, reflecting the martial spirit of the people. The venal ways of the Patricians caused the herds to dwindle until none remained and since the dawn of the Empire they have passed into legend. Highborn parents tell their children the tale of the loss of their horses to teach them never to take blessings for granted.

The First Empress

The First Empress was Highborn, and the last to ride a legendary Highborn steed. After taking liao, she revealed that all human souls are re-incarnated on the same wheel, regardless of whether they were Highborn. Therefore, to preserve the future of Highguard and enlighten all worthy human souls, it was essential to unite all of humanity under a single banner, such that Highborn reborn elsewhere would still come to know their heritage and the Way of Virtue. From Highborn faith, the Empire came into being, changing the face of the world forever.

Archivists

Highguard looks to the past to understand the present and predict the future. Its scholars, priests and wizards thirst for tomes and artefacts that reflect on the Empire. There is a roaring trade in books, scrolls and tablets, the more obscure the better. While relics of the holy prophets or antique magical articles are valuable in and of themselves, high prices are also paid for tangible evidence of past life experiences.

Archivists collect the histories of Highguard, and of the Empire. They see history as a story that exists not to record dead facts, but to inspire the living. As a consequence, facts that undermine the central truth of an event or the life of a historical character are actually dangerous. A new fact that suggests a wise historical judge never existed, or that a brave general was actually a coward, could do irreparable damage. It could destroy the faith of the living in the individual hero but also undermine the very idea of learning the lessons from history. Destroying or discrediting such lies is as important as revealing the facts that encourage and inspire the living.

This means the Highborn archivists are often at odds with their counterparts in other nations, especially the Urizen seers and torchbearers. In recording and publicizing “facts”, without applying any moral judgement, Urizen historians deny the inspiration offered by history and its role in making the present and the future better. A common rumour suggests that Highborn archivists maintain hidden storehouses of knowledge deemed too dangerous for the common people. This rumour is baseless. If a piece of information uncovered is considered dangerous to the Empire, it is destroyed so that no future generation can be harmed by its rediscovery.

Archivists are romantic figures in Highguard. While the truth is that many of them are quiet scholars and scribes, the popular image is of them as active, energetic people who go to dangerous locations to retrieve valuable information or artefacts for the good of the nation and the Empire as a whole. They face danger frequently, and often have to work against those who want to foolishly spread dangerous information or unleash deadly magic.

Highguard lineage and species attitudes (Redirected from Highguard Lineage and Species Attitudes)

Highguard is not a generous nation to the less than fully human. In the crudest and simplest of terms, they are perceived as being spiritually suspect. While it is undeniable that they embrace the virtues with great passion, they must continually resist the siren call of their blood, or risk corruption by their lineage. As a result those with lineage are watched until they have proved themselves. Even then, many Highborn still regard them with suspicion for fear that they may eventually succumb. Individuals of lineage whose humanity has triumphed are upheld as inspirational tales of how the human spirit can conquer anything.

A few Highborn cambion and changelings choose to remove or disfigure the visible marks of their lineage. Calling themselves the Unveiled, they saw their horns down to stumps, to demonstrate to everyone that they have renounced their heritage.

The briar lineage is considered especially suspect. It is believed that the area around a dead briar may be seeded with alien, supernatural foliage. The bodies of dead briars are commonly burnt and their ashes scattered over water; while there are a few monuments to heroic briars in the the Necropolis, there are none of this lineage actually interred there.

Orcs and other non-humans are judged more harshly than the lineaged. Their inability to use liao casts doubt over their ability to reincarnate, and so it is considered impossible for them to meaningfully embrace the Imperial Faith. This makes them less than human in the eyes of many Highborn.

The issue of Imperial Orcs is a thorny one in Highguard. The Highborn Senators were united in opposing the admittance of orcs into the Empire, and called on the Synod to veto the move when they were defeated in the Senate. Today, some Highborn are inclined to treat them charitably for making the effort to be civilised, whilst others maintain a traditional attitude of contempt and hostility. Very few have any enthusiasm for seeing the orcs gain further power and influence within the Empire. As long as the orcs are seen to embrace Imperial values, there is little their Highborn critics can do beyond providing the voice of caution. It seems inevitable that in the end, the orcs will undermine the strength of the Empire either as part of a long-term treachery, or simply by diluting the traditions which have formed and sustained its greatness.

Sharp horns, gold eyes, stop your ears against their lies

Knife ears, stag's horns, rue the day that they were born

Scaled skin, fangs white, never meant to see the light

Neck gills, webbed toes, best kept where the pondweed grows

Beast's eyes, white skin, bar the door lest they come in

Bark skin, green vine, forgotten be till end of time Traditional Highborn children's rhyme now frowned on in Imperial society

The Music of Highguard

Contents

Style summary

Highguard's music draws its inspiration from Western church choral music, plainsong and shapenote music (also known as Sacred Harp). Of these, the last probably best exemplifies the musical style - Highguard music is robust and enthusiastic, and accessible to all levels of talent. They enjoy rich harmonies and proudly devotional texts, although amongst themselves a wicked sense of humour occasionally emerges in some soldiers' songs and there are also some surprisingly tender lullabies.

Commonly known songs

- Virtues Anthem - usually led by one singer with everyone joining in the refrain
- Circle March - very easy repeating song
- Hymn to Vigilance - usually led by one singer with everyone joining in the refrain

Popular with all strata of Highguard society, these three songs are heard in chapters, the necropolis, and the fields. It is when the army marches to war with its battle choir, however, that the full majesty of Highguard music is best displayed.

A musical tradition

The Highguard Battle Choirs are a great imperial tradition - no nation matches to battle with the same holy fervour in their singing. Usually accompanied by a single drumbeat, the sound of the Highguard army in full voice is an awe-inspiring and intimidating sound. Often a small number of more confident singers lead the chant in a call-and-response pattern. At least in this context the choirsters are warriors first and musicians second - the singers need not be particularly talented, as it is holy fervour and their indomitable will that characterises the battle choir.

One for the kids

- Circle March - very easy repeating song
- Nursery Rhyme about Lineage - a very naughty chant, not to be repeated in front of anyone with Lineage!

Songs about notable people and entities in Highguard

- Enoch and Levi - romantic ballad, Highguard style...
- Pride of the Highborn - anthem of Adina's Charge
- Silent Tide - anthem of the Chapter of the same name.
- Anthem of Cantiarth's Hold
- Vigilance Guide Our Faithful Watch - A song commemorating the founder of Felix's Watch.

Further examples

Songs

- For Once I Was A Young Man - cautionary tale about the virtuous life
- The Ritual for the Departed - haunting funerary song
- Gone - another song for partings and funerals
- Virtues Anthem - shapenote song with chorus

- The Navigators - shapenote song, medium
- Circle March - very easy repeating song
- Hymn to Vigilance - medium call and response plainsong
- Idumea - medium shapenote song about reincarnation
- Naughty Pilgrim Song, an alternative to all the serious songs sung in Highguard!
- O Oriens - easy plainsong
- Virtue Never Falter - rousing song with chorus, also popular in the Brass Coast
- Least of my Kind - stirring battle song
- Farewell Farewell - rousing funeral song from Highguard but also popular in the Brass Coast due to boat references
- Highguard Go To War - Battle anthem
- All Come Listen - a well known, simple song that can be sung as a round

Instrumentation

- Highborn musical traditions favour the flute and other wind instruments. On days when the wind is high, a chapterhouse resounds with the song of wind chimes, aeolian harps and bells.
- Trumpets and bugles are often blown before a battlefield charge.

Other performance traditions

How to adapt your repertoire

- If singing in harmony, try to sing in consecutive 4ths or 5ths. This gives a fantastic 'plainchanty' sound perfect for Highguard. An example is Circle March \(arranged by Katy Cooper\) which starts in unison then goes into 4ths before full harmony.
- Many songs can be made to sound plainchanty by just pulling the rhythm all over the place. Have a listen to some church psalms and simply substitute your own lyrics.

Highguard is not a populous nation and every child is considered a precious blessing. Although children are forbidden by Imperial law to use liao before they come of age, they are expected to study and embody the virtues from a young age. As heirs to the great heritage of the Highborn, children are encouraged to push themselves to live up to the heroes of the past.

Children are encouraged to question what they see and experience, especially where the Virtues are concerned. They are encouraged to talk about the things they have seen with their parents, especially the actions of others which they could not see the Virtue in. This allows them to gain a better understanding of the Virtues by asking their parents to explain how they apply in everyday life, as well as helping their parents to be vigilant against any corruption in their children's lives.

Children who have a solid grounding in the Way are often given a purple ribbon or seven pointed star by the priests, so that they can help other children learn about the Virtues.

Things every child should know

- Know the Seven Virtues. Try to be as virtuous as possible and inspire the same in those around you.
- Learn about the Paragons and Exemplars. Study their lives and follow their example, you may yet become one!
- Be vigilant! Look for signs of corruption and report them to a trusted adult, so that they can take appropriate action.
- Practice makes perfect. Look for opportunities to perfect your arguments by trying them out on people, challenge your friends to races or competitions, never pass up the chance to test yourself and hone your skills.
- If you don't understand something, ask. It's the only way you'll learn. It's an adult's job to be able to explain things.

Look and feel

The Highborn look is generally practical and restrained. Its beauty is in both the small touches – the geometric trim on the robes, the exquisite jewellery. Colours are deliberately stark and contrasting, and outfits in black and white are commonplace. Many members of a chapter choose to adopt similar garb, with the symbol of their chapter displayed prominently on the chest, shoulders, or at the breast. This is particularly true for Highborn warriors who show their solidarity and loyalty with their fellows by marching into battle decked in identical garb. Of all the nations of the Empire, the Highborn are the most inclined to uniformity, a visible display of their inner commitment to their shared faith and destiny.

Rather than displaying impractical frivolity in the cut of their garments, Highborn show their taste and wealth in jewellery, and the decoration of cloth. Jewelled and embellished trims at the hems of garments are popular, as is the intricate braiding of hair and heavy, elaborate jewellery.

Highguard is one of the nations with the least historical inspiration. It draws its influence heavily from classic fantasy such as Lord of the Rings, with a real emphasis on the Numenorian and Gondorian styles brought to life in the Peter Jackson trilogy. The look is strong and stark, and what makes it relatively easy to create a strong and distinctive look is the colour scheme - almost any western European medieval look in black, white and a touch of jewel toned colour will look excellent.

Similar nations

Dawn

Highguard probably has most in common with Dawnish costume - the love of rich, lavish fabrics, elegant in cut but with elaborate trim and jewellery is a feature they share. However, Dawnish costume should be a vivid pageant of colour; by contrast, Highguard clothing should be high contrast, mostly in black and white, with a hint of jewel-toned colour. Veils and cowls help to keep the look distinct.

Marches

Monks in the marches will wear similar robes to those in Highguard. Sticking to black or white, and adding geometric trim around your robes, possibly with the addition of a mitre-like hat for high status priest looks very Highborn.

Research

An excellent source of information on making fantasy costumes inspired by Lord of the Rings is Alley Cat Scratch. It covers everything from garment patterns, metalwork and sourcing trim. Re-enactment sources referenced on the Marches, Dawn and Wintermark pages are all good for inspiration - the colour palette, more than the shape of the garment, gives the uniform look to the nation.

Books The Medieval Tailor's Assistant, Sarah Thursfield – Pretty much the bible for medieval costumes. Covers the layers from underwear to outerwear for the periods 1200-1500, plus headwear and accessories. Goes into detail about how to make the garments, which fabrics to use etc. A really excellent book.

In detail

High status characters

A rather severe look - black velvet or brocade works beautifully in contrast with silver fasteners or buttons. For any gender, a close fitting gown looks suitably Highborn, referencing without overtly stating their faithfulness.

A gown is a reasonably close fitting robe, usually buttoning down the front, with long close fitting sleeves to the wrist. It persists to this day as the cassock and in the clothes of choirsters and some very traditional public school uniforms, all of which means both patterns and off-the-peg versions are fairly readily available.

It's a very adaptable look - a fantasy treatment could take the basic silhouette and standing collar, and shorten the overall length, either with full length or half length sleeves, as worn by Boromir, Uther Pendragon and Jamie Lannister for a "warrior's coat". It looks good worn open over chainmail. A close-fitting variant of this is the cotehardie which usually has lots of closely spaced buttons down the front and the sleeves - try googling "cotehardie". It can be a tough look to pull off, but well worth it!

For a high-necked gown on a woman, you could also use Simplicity 4940 making both the body of the gown and the yoke in matching black velvet. You then have the option to highlight the join with embroidery or sewing on links from a chain necklace, or you could just let it become invisible for a very elegant severe look.

This look could be achieved reasonably inexpensively with about 5m of cotton sheeting or cotton muslin (<£10) and a metre of wool or velvet for the over-bodice. Use Simplicity 4940 for a version with full sleeves, or make a narrow sleeved gown and use the over-bodice, but back lace with eyelets it rather than using a zip. For trim, this ebay seller usually has a lovely selection of silver, gold and coloured jacquard trims reasonably inexpensively. For heavy beaded and jewelled trim at very reasonable prices I use this eBay shop. About 2m of silver and black trim would do a great jewelled belt; they also sell shaped pieces designed to go on the necklines of dresses. Here is an exhaustive breakdown of the inspiration dress.

You could also use Simplicity 4940 for this dress, making the body in cotton velvet and the yoke in a metallic brocade. Here is this dress in detail, with lots more images and suggestions on how to get the look.

Priests

Highborn priests usually dress in white or dark robes with decoration in a stark colour to stand out.

Priests who choose not to dress like Templars (below) might draw inspiration from the images above. Based on the Eastern Orthodox tradition, these priests have layered robes with decorated over-garments, perhaps with a mitre-type hat or a padded roll on their head. A how-to for a basic robe, tabard and hood is linked below. Over the top, you could make a "stole", which is essentially a long scarf worn around the neck and falling past the waist - trimmed with an ornate ribbon trim this would look very dramatic. Try searching for ecclesiastical trim on ebay - there is a huge variety available relatively cheaply. You could also make a tabard or circular cape and trim it in matching colours.

An alternative look, ideally suited to the Keepers of the Dead, is a more monk-like costume. This is made up of similar layers - an ankle-length robe, with or without a simple over-tabard and with a hood or cowl. The robe can be worn loose or belted with a cord or narrow braid of cloth for convenience and ease of movement. Coarse, heavy fabrics such as linen, silk noil and wool work well for this look, in dark grey or black. To make it slightly more fancy (and avoid confusion with the marches) you could trim the edges with a contrasting geometric trim (perhaps a greek key or swirl) such as those available from this ebay seller or similar.

Templars

Most Highborn warriors cover their armour with a long flowing surcoat. The ideal surcoat is black or white with a design in a stark contrasting colour. The Crusader knights exemplify this tradition in real history, although an original design for a chapter's emblem is ideal if possible.

The key to the uniform Templar look is a surcote or tabard in their chapter colours with a design on it. While lightweight fabrics such as polycotton are cheap and easy to work with, if your budget allows, consider using a heavier cotton, linen or silk, with or without lining, as these materials drape better, look better and wear better. That said, a unit in matching surcotes, even lightweight ones, looks fabulous, so don't worry too much about your materials.

If you have fabric left over, consider making a circular or semicircular cloak to match, perhaps with your chapter symbol on the breast or on the back.

The Unconquered

Most avoid the distinctive high contrast clothing favoured by most Highborn in favour of something more concealing and many wear lighter armour or forego armour altogether.

The base layer for the Unconquered is a knee-length tunic, either without armour or with lighter armour worn over it. A palette of neutral forest colours helps them scout and remain unseen when in the field, so choosing browns, greens and greys is in keeping with this. Less elaborate than many other Highguard costume, there is still a role for contrasting trim, particularly if the character is wearing their "special occasions" clothes. Adding a fur or fake fur mantle might add to the look - a cheap and cruelty-free way of adding fur trim to your costume is to get old fur coats from charity shops and cut them down - sometimes they also have 1940s style capelets which need very little alteration to be used as a shoulder piece.

Cowl

At its simplest, a cowl is a cylinder of fabric that sits around your shoulders and over your head. Choosing a soft, drapery fabric like muslin will help it sit properly. A 1 yard piece of muslin or silk habutai that's 45 inches wide, seamed down its length and hemmed at either raw end will make a very full, drapery cowl. For the "monk" or "Keeper of the Dead" look above, use a yard of fabric that matches the rest of your robes.

Veil

Again best made using a very soft, drapy fabric like muslin, a veil is a circular, oval or rectangular piece of fabric to sit on your head. The Freeborn use veils to cover the lower half of their face; the Highborn look is far more concealing and drapes over the entire head, usually held in place by a circlet, crown or ribbon band. Don't skimp on the fabric - muslin is very cheap and a 2 or 3m length will give a sumptuous look to your veil. Consider edging it in lightweight trim for a finished look, or round the corners and turn a narrow hem. If you wear it just by putting it on your head then holding it on with a circlet, over time the veil will shift and ride up, leading to the dread "muffin head" look. For comfort and style, you might want to consider pinning it to a ribbon tied around your head, or utilising the methods in this tutorial, though bear in mind that for the SCA they wear the veil in a more historical fashion to cover the hair, rather than to sit over the face.

To uncover your face while wearing a veil the Highborn way, flip it back over the crown or band holding it in place, like a bride's veil, without taking it off your head. It's then ready to flip forward and cover your face again whenever you want.

Cloak

A cloak is a near-essential part of your costume, and a great opportunity to give your kit a finishing touch and keep you cosy. For light fabrics such as muslin, you can make a gathered-neck cloak with a drawstring for ease of construction - with heavy wools and velvet, a semicircular or circular mantle works best to reduce bulk at the neck and drapes beautifully. For a priest's mantle, a semi-circle or 3/4 circle cloak works best.

Jewellery

The Highborn are a people with a manifest destiny, to unite the human nations and lead them to a virtuous future. Their jewellery reflects their heritage, it is refined, elegant and regal. Gold or silver worn on the brow suggests authority.

Any refined and elegant jewellery works in Highguard, best in matching sets to tone with the costume. Particular emphasis is on crowns and circlets. Lord of the Rings replica jewellery is an expensive but very beautiful way of getting the look, but there are numerous "inspired by" items, often on ebay, and several excellent tutorials on how to make your own out of wire, clay and beads.

Highborn culture and customs

“A pure soul in a pure body.”

Washing and cleanliness

Cleanliness is important to the Highborn. Highborn bathhouses are complex affairs with steam rooms, cold plunge pools, as well as heated baths and massage tables. A Highborn's first impulse on arriving somewhere after a journey is to clean away the dust of the road. Small fountains, pools and fonts are commonly found outside Highborn chapterhouses, and even individual homes, so that those entering can perform a token cleansing of hands and face. Scented finger-bowls are common between courses at a meal.

In foreign lands or on campaign, cleanliness can be more difficult to maintain. If limited clean water is available, most Highborn will preserve the ritual aspects of washing, such as flicking a few drops over head and shoulders, dabbing a little on the eyes and forehead, or merely wetting the tips of fingers. If no clean water is available, symbolic gestures are performed instead; raising both hands to the face, then passing them over the head is a gesture that means “I would wash myself if I had water.” This gesture is occasionally used to mean “I wash my hands of this situation” and can even be used during an argument to express a sentiment roughly equivalent to “I am tired of you and want you gone”.

Recording history

Personal, as well as national, history is important to the Highborn. Many Highborn keep journals - diaries or collections of letters are the most common forms. These writings may be private, but it is also common for Highborn who are away from home to write short pieces intended to be shared with friends and family - reading travelogues and biographies are popular pastimes. The best writings are those that are considered to give a very personal viewpoint on events. Full of passion, they let the reader share the insights of the writer, and empathise with their emotions.

On death these personal writings are usually bequeathed either to a favoured family member or to the Stewards of the Dead, to form part of the library at the heart of the Necropolis. It is considered a great honour for an individual's thoughts and experiences to be preserved as an inspiration and guide to future generations.

Competition and skill

Not all Highborn are warriors, but most enjoy competition, whether tests of fitness, skill or intellect. Especially popular at present is the Cathleon, a challenge based on a training regime favoured by many of the Unconquered, consisting of a footrace, javelin throws and a second footrace. The entire event is run in a single sequence, testing speed, skill and endurance. To win, the victor must run to the target, throw three javelins through a target hoop and then return to the start. There are no set distances or target-sizes; the competitors agree these details before a Cathleon begins.

Physical prowess is not the only way to earn respect from Highborn. Prestige lies in skill with tactical games such as chess, backgammon, othello, draughts, tafl and go. They also enjoy wagering on these games, although there is a general distaste for games of pure chance such as roulette or dice.

Art

Mosaics are popular, their swirling patterns recall the winds and the tides; at their hearts, stylised representations of the heroes of old. Vast and vaulted marble domes; dusty cloisters smelling of old parchment; cool villas with fountains at their heart fill the household with the song of the water. An artistic movement has been growing over the last two decades that moves away from the traditional complex mosaics towards a simpler style involving the shaping of coloured stone to fit together in designs reminiscent of stained glass – a more elegant and modern refinement of an ancient art.

Highborn musical traditions favour the flute and other wind instruments. On days when the wind is high, a chapterhouse resounds with the song of wind chimes, aeolian harps and bells.

The cowl

Before the dissolution of the Patrician Council, the tradition amongst the Highborn was that those carrying out funerary rites went hooded when doing so as a mark of respect. When the Navigator dissolved the Council, he did so hooded, a gesture believed to indicate the Council's "death". Since that time, a practice has arisen amongst many Highborn, particularly those in authority, to wear hoods or cowls, usually in the colours of their Chapter. The custom has it that when the hood is down, the wearer is speaking informally as themselves, but with the hood up they speak formally, such as representing others or passing a judgement. The act of raising or lowering the hood can, in such cases, change the atmosphere in a room significantly, and there are few sights as intimidating as a group of hooded Highborn moving with purpose.

Funerals

Death is an important moment in each spirit's cycle, with an opportunity to celebrate the virtues shown in the life that has now passed and meditate on whether the spirit might at last escape the Labyrinth. Mourners customarily wear sombre veils and cowls. Traditionally the dead have their hands and face carefully washed once they are in repose. They are then veiled for a final time and each person who has something to say upon the virtue of the individual takes their turn before the will of the deceased is read aloud. Bells are tolled throughout the proceedings to carry the words to the dead.

Testaments are common in Highguard. It is normal for bequests to be made on the basis of the virtues displayed by the recipient, rather than on any ties of blood. Any remaining chattels are gathered by the Chapter itself. All of this is done with some haste so that the body may be properly prepared for internment within their Chapter's mausoleum or, if they are particularly virtuous, within the Necropolis itself. Regardless of whether mortal remains are involved every Highborn wants their name inscribed on a monument in the Necropolis. Those of the briar lineage are almost never interred; their bodies are burnt and the ashes scattered over water.

Day of the Dead

Taking place on the second day of the Winter equinox, the Day of the Dead is an important celebration that serves as a memorial for those lost in the preceding year. Respects are paid throughout the day with Chapters remembering those they have lost in their own traditional sombre and serious manner until dusk comes. As light fades from the sky it is common for the Highborn to begin a candle- and lantern-lit slow procession around their homes or chapterhouses. The celebrants walk in silence except for the intoning of bells or the speaking of the names of those who have passed into the Labyrinth; the procession often visits places that were important to a deceased individual in life.

Once the procession is complete, a celebration of those lives usually begins with songs and stories of the virtues of the Highborn. It is common for friends and loved-ones to share anecdotes and readings from their own journals or letters, or those of the departed.

The following morning is often used to celebrate those who have been born to, or joined, the nation in the last year, with many taking the opportunity to re-swear their oaths to Chapters and to Nation. It is also a common that Highborn give small meaningful gifts on this day, the most precious ones being considered by some to be those made by the gift-giver.

In pre-Imperial times, midnight on the Day of the Dead marked the end of one year and the beginning of the next. Old Highborn documents (and some traditionalist historians) still count the Day of the Dead as the last day of the year which can occasionally lead to confusion.

Highguard economic interests

“The pursuit of wealth is the foundation of suffering.”

There is a deep-seated distrust of the pursuit of wealth for its own sake amongst the Highborn. Highguard is founded on the concept that only action can be virtuous, and their culture rewards assiduous effort and self-improvement. “Wealth” by itself is a passive force; usury – charging interest on a loan – is considered despicable because the lender has no active role in what transpires.

In place of the moneylenders common elsewhere, the Highborn are proud of their benefactors. Often older merchants, benefactors make their wealth work for themselves and others. They try to encourage virtue by acting as patrons to other merchants. They may help a young trader get established, or participate in a risky but ambitious venture that has potential benefits beyond purely economic ones. Rather than lending money and charging interest, benefactors invest in enterprises and in individuals, sharing the risk – and sharing the profits.

Gambling on games of chance is as dubious as usury, since there is no action the participants can take to improve their chances of winning other than to cheat. That said, the Highborn love to wager on contests of skill, whether they are participating or not. Professional book-keepers collect wagers and distribute winnings, taking a small percentage for their service; some specialise in organising contests and competitions specifically to encourage wagering.

Permanence is a civic virtue in Highguard and there is no doubt that the nation produces the best architects and masons in the Empire. The quarries of Casinea produce a breathtakingly beautiful marble that absorbs heat when it is warm and exudes it when cold, making it the ideal building material. Other crafts include the creation of decorative mosaics and fabrics with complex geometric patterns. The Highborn also produces fine quality paper and coloured inks, used extensively to record the histories and archives of the nation.

Bells and chimes

The Highborn hang wind-chimes in their doorways to bring back memories of those they have lost, and the echoes of wisdom from earlier days. Meditating to the sound of wind chimes is said to help to attune one to thoughts of one's ancestors and prior incarnations, and allow the dead to "speak" to the living through their memories. The household use of bells endures for similar reason, in the belief that the wind carries the breath and words of the departed. It is commonly held that bells can speak for those who have no breath or voice. The sound of bells ringing encourages the Highborn to remember the words of dead people who are important or inspirational to them.

More practically, bells and chimes exert influence over the unquiet dead. Restless spirits will not approach the sound of wind chimes, and the ringing of bells causes such creatures to flee in terror. As a consequence, most people who spend any time around the dead - especially the stewards of the dead and magisters - will keep a bell on their person at all times.

Cowls and Veils

Properly prepared and worn head coverings conceal the identity of the wearer. Unlike the masks of the League, they do not present a false-face to the world; this is a hearth magic of obfuscation, not deception. The wearer maintains their sense of self, but they present a blank exterior to outsiders, an enigma. They step away from the world for a short time and become apart from it - a tradition that leads to many Highborn circles ceremonially donning cowls or veils when they must talk of matters of justice, or frankly discuss sensitive matters. The wearer of the cowl or veil metaphorically ceases to be themselves for the duration of such a discussion.

When the Highborn don veils or draw up their cowls as a group, it means they are about serious business. For some, it means they have stopped being individual humans and for a short time embody primal forces of virtue.

This concealment can grant supernatural protection; creatures of the realms often find it hard to identify whom they are speaking to when dealing with people who have ceremonially concealed their features with a cowl or veil.

Highguard history

The founding

Seven centuries ago, the Highborn arrived on the Bay of Catazar. Seventeen great vessels carrying pure souls crossed the sea from the south looking for new lands. They left behind a land and people slowly being consumed by corruption and darkness. They were steered by the legendary Navigators, a pair of visionary twins named Atuman and Atun who were later acknowledged as an Exemplar of Ambition and a Paragon of Wisdom respectively.

Upon landing, Atuman founded the city of Pharos at the mouth of the river Couros. Atun – following a vision of her own – took only the flagship, bade her brother farewell and set sail, never to be seen again.

The navigators of the first vessels formed a council of patricians to advise Atuman the Navigator. After his death his eldest daughter, Acenath, took the title of navigator and ruled in his place while the patricians also named heirs from amongst their offspring. The council ruled wisely for many years but as the generations passed the navigator and the patricians became more obsessed with preserving their power and their bloodlines and degenerated into self-interest and corruption.

During this time, trade with the Navarr introduced the Highborn to vinum, a herb which was used medicinally and recreationally. However, the Scions of Atun, a group of ascetics and mystics, discovered a process of refining into a substance called liao. They used liao to experience visions, and in other ceremonies, that revealed the Labyrinth of Ages. This enlightenment, about the immortal nature of the human spirit and the power of virtue, sparked a period of time now referred to as the Revelation.

The Revelation stirred a spiritual yearning within the people and swept across the land, awakening many to a new and profound understanding of life. This awakening was further fuelled by widespread disillusionment with the venal ways of the patricians. The Scions and other groups born of the Revelation left Pharos, sicked by the corruption that riddled the city. Along the borders of the nation they built their own communities, called chapters, each dedicated to teaching a profound way of living inspired by the Revelation and guarding against corruption.

As the chapters grew, the patricians became jealous of their influence and passed laws to try to control them. Things came to a head in the time of the Navigator Permion, who later generations would call the Lawmaker – a Navigator who strove to serve the people rather than his own interest. Permion sought to reach out to the leaders of the chapters, starting with the most influential, Lepidus of the Seven Stars. Lepidus is now acknowledged as a Paragon of Pride. He taught Permion about the greatness of the Highborn, what they had been and could be again, and helped him find the will to oppose the wickedness of the patricians.

Permion the Lawmaker's judgements and actions brought the patricians into conflict with him and also with each other. Rather than allow the nation to fall into anarchy, Permion declared martial law and dissolved the Patrician Council. In its place, he invited the chapters to form an Assembly of the Virtuous to advise him.

The response of the Patrician Council was swift and bloody, and a bitter civil war ensued. Permion was assassinated, along with his wife and three of his four children. Various patricians tried to claim the title of navigator and the city of Pharos was burned to the ground by rival armies. Eventually the Assembly was forced to act. After mobilizing the military strength of the chapterhouses it crushed the remaining patrician forces and assumed the governance of the nation. Today, the Lawmaker is recognised as an influential Exemplar of Courage.

The Assembly of the Virtuous elected to turn the ruins of Pharos into the Necropolis, a great mausoleum to house the bodies of all those slain in the war. They also ordered the construction of Bastion, a new city which would serve as a civic and religious centre for the Highborn thereafter and vowed that no Highborn would ever war with other Highborn again.

The Highborn fleet carried with them a great herd of horses. These legendary beasts embodied noble virtues of loyalty, strength and dignity. Mounted on their mighty warhorses, the Highborn were unbeaten in battle and the creatures became the iconic symbol of the nation, reflecting the martial spirit of the people. The venal ways of the patricians caused the herds to dwindle until none remained and since the dawn of the Empire they have passed into legend. Highborn parents tell their children the tale of the loss of their horses to teach them never to take blessings for granted.

The First Empress

The First Empress was Highborn, and the last to ride a legendary Highborn steed. After taking liao, she revealed that all human souls are re-incarnated on the same wheel, regardless of whether they were Highborn. Therefore, to preserve the future of Highguard and enlighten all worthy human souls, it was essential to unite all of humanity under a single banner, such that Highborn reborn elsewhere would still come to know their heritage and the Way of Virtue. From Highborn faith, the Empire came into being, changing the face of the world forever.

Highborn on the Throne

Aside from the First Empress, two other Highborn have sat on the Imperial Throne.

Empress Aenea was appointed in 103YE, and instituted a wide-scaled program of public works. Among other things, her reign saw the creation of the Lyceum - the Empire's premier college of magic; the creation of many roads and highways still in use today; the construction of several fortifications; and a general overhauling and refinement of the Bourse, the Senate, and Imperial law. Her reign is also marked by conflict - she had little interest in foreign affairs, being focused entirely on building and strengthening the Empire.

Emperor Barabbas took the throne in 180YE, and like his predecessor he focused on strengthening and expanding the Empire. Unlike Aenea, whose interests were very much in the land and its structures, he was fascinated by the sea. An ambitious and charismatic man, he had a vision of an Empire that dominated the entire Bay of Catazar. He is best known today for the manner of his death - lost at sea during a terrible storm along with the great armada he had nearly bankrupted the Empire to create. While modern historians are not kind to Barabbas, the Highborn are often quick to point out that his reign was also a time of great Imperial Ambition and a period of expansion and improved emphasis on securing diplomatic relations with foreign powers.

Archivists

Highguard looks to the past to understand the present and predict the future. Its scholars, priests and wizards thirst for tomes and artefacts that reflect on the Empire. There is a roaring trade in books, scrolls and tablets, the more obscure the better. While relics of the holy prophets or antique magical articles are valuable in and of themselves, high prices are also paid for tangible evidence of past life experiences.

Archivists collect the histories of Highguard, and of the Empire. They see history as a story that exists not to record dead facts, but to inspire the living. As a consequence, facts that undermine the central truth of an event or the life of a historical character are actually dangerous. A new fact that suggests a wise historical judge never existed, or that a brave general was actually a coward, could do irreparable damage. It could destroy the faith of the living in the individual hero but also undermine the very idea of learning the lessons from history. Destroying or discrediting such lies is as important as revealing the facts that encourage and inspire the living.

This means the Highborn archivists are often at odds with their counterparts in other nations, especially the Urizen seers and torchbearers. In recording and publicizing "facts", without applying any moral judgement, Urizen historians deny the inspiration offered by history and its role in making the present and the future better. A common rumour suggests that Highborn archivists maintain hidden storehouses of knowledge deemed too dangerous for the common people. This rumour is baseless. If a piece of information uncovered is considered dangerous to the Empire, it is destroyed so that no future generation can be harmed by its rediscovery.

Archivists are romantic figures in Highguard. While the truth is that many of them are quiet scholars and scribes, the popular image is of them as active, energetic people who go to dangerous locations to retrieve valuable information or artefacts for the good of the nation and the Empire as a whole. They face danger frequently, and often have to work against those who want to foolishly spread dangerous information or unleash deadly magic.

Highguard icons and artistry

The first Empress fought under a banner depicting a rearing grey stallion on black, and so the horse became the symbol of the Empire and its leader. But to many Highborn only the best sculpture and art in the grand cathedrals in Highguard can capture the true qualities of the horse. Although their great steeds are gone, the horse remains an image of strength, willpower, speed, loyalty and grace.

Today the heraldic beast of Highguard is the Basilisk, a crested aquatic lizard. It can be found drowsing in marble, curled around alcoves or uncoiling across mosaic floors. Its eyes are always depicted shut as though asleep – except on the banner of war. The legend has it that Isora, the daughter of Permion the Lawmaker, used magic to command a Basilisk from its Eternal Realm. Where once it had been a threat, it became a guardian creature who slumbered at her command to be awoken in defence of Highguard at the time of the Highborn's greatest need. It is a reflection of the Highborn magical and physical might, and also of the fact that even the mightiest Eternals must bow to the will and magic of mortals.

Highguard's flag is the Basilisk coiled around the Black Bell of the Necropolis. Bells are frequently used in Highborn heraldry. Bells also form a key part of decoration, architecture, ceremony and even fashion. The way in which they remind the living of the dead, and recall the past to the current generation, works just as well in imagery as sound.

Benefactors use the symbol of the unbalanced scales, the upper pannier containing coinage and the lower (heavier) pannier containing some symbol of morality or humankind such as a heart or a skull.

Mosaics are popular, their swirling patterns recall the winds and the tides; at their hearts, stylised representations of the heroes of old. Vast and vaulted marble domes; dusty cloisters smelling of old parchment; cool villas with fountains at their heart fill the household with the song of the water. An artistic movement has been growing over the last two decades that moves away from the traditional mosaic as a fiddly mass of tiny squares towards a simpler style involving the shaping of coloured stone to fit together in designs reminiscent of stained glass – a more elegant and modern refinement of an ancient art.

Most Highborn live in or near one of the chapters, the great walled settlements, that are spread across the plains that surround the river Couros. Each is a fully functional community incorporating families and individuals from all walks of life, who share a common set of beliefs in the form of a creed.

Each chapter chooses one of their own, called an exarch, to provide the chapter with civic and moral leadership. The exarch is most commonly the one who best embodies the chapter's creed; a priest or one who has been schooled in philosophy and faith is usually chosen. As a result, most Highborn who are politically ambitious begin by seeking training as a priest. Highborn history clearly shows the perils of choosing a leader who is not virtuous, so they make no apology for placing this criterion above any other.

The holy city of Bastion is the capital of the nation. Every chapter maintains a hostel of some kind here, so that members who make the pilgrimage have somewhere to stay. At one time the Assembly of the Virtuous would meet here regularly to decide the business of the state. When Highguard agreed to join the Empire, the Assembly of the Virtuous was used as the cornerstone for the Imperial Synod, becoming the Highborn Assembly wholesale, and spreading the mandate to watch for any sign of moral decay in the soul of the Empire.

Most political business moved to the Senate after the creation of the Empire so those members of the Highborn Assembly interested in politics now meet when the Imperial Court meets, the better to appoint Highborn Senators. Bastion is no longer the seat of government of the Highborn Nation, but it remains the spiritual home of the Way of Virtue and pilgrims from all over the Empire travel here.

Leading a territory

In the days before the Empire the Exarchs were subject to the approval of the Assembly of the Virtuous, to ensure that chapters were led by devout individuals. That power lapsed generations ago; now only the senators come before the Assembly for ratification.

The Highborn Assembly selects senators by interrogation. Each chapter whose chapterhouse is in the contested territory may put forward a single candidate for consideration by the Assembly. Chapters are assumed to have sufficient wisdom to be able to select their most virtuous member. On the rare occasion where a chapter is unable to pick a single candidate, they forfeit their right to be considered during that election.

Candidates come before the Highborn Assembly where they are expected to answer questions designed to assess their moral rectitude. The Assembly does not exclusively select priests to high office, but it is clear that those who have priestly training have a considerable advantage in answering the moral dilemmas and philosophical questions put to them. After examining the candidates, each member of the Assembly secretly votes to indicate which candidate they felt was least trustworthy. The candidate with the least votes against them is then declared the winner. If two or more candidates receive equal fewest votes, then all other candidates are eliminated and another round of voting takes place.

The senators for each Imperial territory are re-elected at specific equinox and solstices during the year. The senator for Reikos is elected at the Spring equinox, the senator for Bastion is elected at the Summer solstice, the senator for Casinea is elected at the Autumn equinox, and the senator for Necropolis is elected at the Winter solstice.

Tallying the votes

Every Highborn character with a congregation is automatically a member of the national assembly. Each character receives ten votes, plus two additional votes each time they have upgraded their resource. Votes in the synod gained from a sinecure or other Imperial title do not count during the election of a Highguard senator. It should be noted that the effects of enchancements such as Mantle of the Golden Orator do provide additional votes in Highguard senatorial elections, as the extra citizens they attract to the enchanted congregations are quite real.

Highguard lineage and species attitudes

Highguard is not a generous nation to the less than fully human. In the crudest and simplest of terms, they are perceived as being spiritually suspect. While it is undeniable that they embrace the virtues with great passion, they must continually resist the siren call of their blood, or risk corruption by their lineage. As a result those with lineage are watched until they have proved themselves. Even then, many Highborn still regard them with suspicion for fear that they may eventually succumb. Individuals of lineage whose humanity has triumphed are upheld as inspirational tales of how the human spirit can conquer anything.

A few Highborn cambion and changelings choose to remove or disfigure the visible marks of their lineage. Calling themselves the Unveiled, they saw their horns down to stumps, to demonstrate to everyone that they have renounced their heritage.

The briar lineage is considered especially suspect. It is believed that the area around a dead briar may be seeded with alien, supernatural foliage. The bodies of dead briars are commonly burnt and their ashes scattered over water; while there are a few monuments to heroic briars in the the Necropolis, there are none of this lineage actually interred there.

Orcs and other non-humans are judged more harshly than the lineaged. Their inability to use liao casts doubt over their ability to reincarnate, and so it is considered impossible for them to meaningfully embrace the Imperial Faith. This makes them less than human in the eyes of many Highborn.

The issue of Imperial Orcs is a thorny one in Highguard. The Highborn Senators were united in opposing the admittance of orcs into the Empire, and called on the Synod to veto the move when they were defeated in the Senate. Today, some Highborn are inclined to treat them charitably for making the effort to be civilised, whilst others maintain a traditional attitude of contempt and hostility. Very few have any enthusiasm for seeing the orcs gain further power and influence within the Empire. As long as the orcs are seen to embrace Imperial values, there is little their Highborn critics can do beyond providing the voice of caution. It seems inevitable that in the end, the orcs will undermine the strength of the Empire either as part of a long-term treachery, or simply by diluting the traditions which have formed and sustained its greatness.

Sharp horns, gold eyes, stop your ears against their lies

Knife ears, stag's horns, rue the day that they were born

Scaled skin, fangs white, never meant to see the light

Neck gills, webbed toes, best kept where the pondweed grows

Beast's eyes, white skin, bar the door lest they come in

Bark skin, green vine, forgotten be till end of time Traditional Highborn children's rhyme now frowned on in Imperial society

Highguard look and feel

Overview

The Highborn look is generally practical and restrained. Its beauty is in the small touches – the geometric trim on the robes, the exquisite jewelry. Colours are deliberately stark and contrasting, and outfits in black and white are commonplace. Many members of a chapter choose to adopt similar garb, with the symbol of their chapter displayed prominently on the chest, shoulders, or at the breast. This is particularly true for Highborn warriors who show their solidarity and loyalty with their fellows by marching into battle decked in identical garb. Of all the nations of the Empire, the Highborn are the most inclined to uniformity, a visible display of their inner commitment to their shared faith and destiny.

Rather than displaying impractical frivolity in the cut of their garments, Highborn show their taste and wealth in jewellery, and the decoration of cloth. Jewelled and embellished trims at the hems of garments are popular, as is the intricate braiding of hair and heavy, elaborate jewellery.

Feel

Breakdown

Influences

Gondor, Crusader Knights

Materials

Highborn materials are usually processed, such as wool, cotton, silk and velvet. They are typically solid and of the highest quality available as befits the rank of the wearer.

Colours

Black with a white contrast is most common but where there is colour, it is likely to be dark - bottle green, red, charcoal and midnight blue - and always set against the contrast of white or cream.

Clothing

The Highborn dress in simple, practical lines – wearing long, layered robes and tunics in starkly contrasting colours, most often simple layers of black and white or sometimes using black or white as a contrast to different colours. Decorative mosaics and fabrics with complex geometric patterns are popular.

Some Highborn may choose to wear a dress rather than a robe. Highguard dresses are constructed along simple but formal lines in dark fabrics. They often have a high neckline or standing collar; lengthwise they always come at least to the ankle.

Veils are commonly worn by all genders both in funeral rites and on other sombre occasions. They set the wearer apart, offering anonymity and a sense of de-personalisation. They are often worn when distasteful actions, or those associated with a rank or position of authority rather than an individual, have to be undertaken

Some Highborn, particularly those in authority, wear hoods or cowls, usually in the colours of their chapter.

Highborn costume is elegant and flowing, long layered robes and tunics, dark coloured in starkly contrasting colours, most often simple layers of black and white or sometimes using black or white as a contrast to different colours.

The Highborn are a militant people and this is reflected in their dress.

Cowls & veils

Highborn veils are designed to cover the face to conceal the wearers identity and project anonymity. Cowls are a common feature of Highborn costume, especially for the powerful.

Jewellery

The Highborn are a people with a manifest destiny, to unite the human nations and lead them to a virtuous future. Their jewellery reflects their heritage, it is refined, elegant and regal. Gold or silver worn on the brow suggests authority.

Armour

Highborn armour tends to be full length and layered or segmented. Heavy black leather is common, sometimes with pieces of plate worn over it. The Unconquered usually leave their head uncovered, but Cataphracts favour a full helm, ideally decorated with wings. Carved or decorated black vambraces are often worn for additional protection.

Traditional lorica in hard leather or metal can work for Highborn, particularly if the suit is tooled or decorated or the outfit incorporates a Highborn style surcoat or cloak.

Surcoats

Most Highborn warriors cover their armour with a long flowing surcoat. The ideal surcoat is black or white with a design in a stark contrasting colour. The Crusader knights exemplify this tradition in real history, although an original design for a chapter's emblem is preferable.

Uniforms for some Highborn chapters include cloaks with the chapter's emblem repeated on each shoulder.

Shields

Large kite or heater shields are common. They are usually decorated in a uniform design with the chapter emblem in stark contrast.

Weapons

Highborn warriors prefer to fight in close formation and prefer weapons suited to this style; short swords, spears, and bows.

Priests

Highborn priests usually dress in white or dark robes with decoration in a stark colour to stand out.

A common element of Highborn priestly costume is a stole - a band of cloth worn round the neck and shoulders that hangs down over the front of the body. Commonly these are decorated with a Chapter symbol, and a symbol important to the character's personal faith or sect.

Magister

Magisters dress in a similar manner to priests, but they are often marked out by their magical accoutrements.

Unconquered

The unconquered serve as scouts, often operating far behind enemy lines. Most avoid the distinctive high contrast clothing favoured by most Highborn in favour of something more concealing and many wear lighter armour or forego armour altogether.

Chapters

Members of the same chapter will often adopt a uniform look using identical or matching items like surcoats. The visual unity emphasizes the unity of purpose and helps a chapter project power. Of all the nations, the Highborn have the strongest tendency to form shield walls and fight in close-order formations.

Children

Clothing for Highborn children is usually sombre and simple but good quality, with more elegant garments reserved until they come of age.

Highguard magical traditions

Priests who work to master magic are called magisters in Highguard. The early magisters studied methods of communicating with the dead and uncovering the secrets of the past. The Highborn Magisters strive to be the foremost masters of Winter magic in the Empire. Most operate out of hostels based in the Necropolis, where the silence and contemplative atmosphere of the city of the dead lends itself perfectly to measured and contemplative study.

While there is no doubt they possess powerful magic, the magisters are still considered to be priests. They study virtue alongside magic, and many work hard to try and inspire virtuous behaviour in wizards of other nations – or an understanding of magic in other priests.

Magisters tend to be cautious of the Eternals, as they are not only powerful, but they clearly seek to use that power to influence humanity. The Highborn believe that as masters of their own destiny, humans should seek to outwit Eternals wherever possible, seizing opportunities to take their strength and harness it in service to the Empire. Eternals are clearly monstrous and inhuman. It is a source of continual frustration to the magisters that other wizards fail to recognise this, no matter how seriously the magisters try to educate them in their dealings with other realms. The magisters treat most often, and most comfortably, with the Eternals of Winter, who they see as more open and honest, as they do not try to deny or conceal their evil nature. The Eternals of the other realms are equally dangerous, but present a pleasing and deceptive face, which many accept without scrutiny.

The magical tradition of Highguard combines movement and sound. The slow beating of drums, the sonorous chime of bells and the recitation of ceremonial passages form the basis of their ritual magic, often accompanied by stylised and graceful gestures.

Highguard military concerns

“We are the thunder on the earth, we are the steel tide that drowns the foe.”

Highguard has a military heritage of which it is justly proud. Most Highborn serve with one of the three Highborn armies as part of their “coming-of-age”. This service is considered necessary to the formation of Highborn character and maintains the connection between the people of today and their warrior ancestry. Most skills can be put to use in a military context, although those serving as medics, quartermasters and ancillary troops do not earn as much respect as their more warlike colleagues.

Guardians

Most Highborn return to their chapter after leaving the army. The most skilled soldiers become part of the elite guards that protect the chapter against barbarians and other threats. These warriors, called guardians, train daily with their comrades learning to fight as a unit in close formation. Chapters outfit their guardians with weapons and armour and most provide a surcoat adorned with the chapter’s heraldic device, usually in black and white or similarly contrasting colours. Some groups of guardians choose to specialise, training to become cataphracts or unconquered, in line with the oldest martial traditions of the Highborn.

Cataphracts

In the earliest days of Highguard, the cataphracts rode into battle on mighty war horses, devastating their enemies with shield and lance. Today the horses are gone, but the cataphracts remain, embodying a warrior tradition that embraces the highest virtues of the Imperial Faith. Heavily armoured, they serve as living standards, encouraging and supporting those who fight alongside them with their commitment to achieving victory. The best of them burn with fervour, filling them with righteous fury when they face the enemies of the Empire in close combat. Likewise, when an army must fall back, it is the cataphracts who guard the retreat.

Unconquered

The counterpart to the cataphracts are the unconquered. These skilled warriors undertake scouting missions, employ sabotage and terror as weapons to weaken their foes, and seek out specific targets on a battlefield. In contrast to the archers and skirmishers of many other nations, the unconquered favour medium armour and short bows, and are not shy about engaging in close combat with hand weapons if the tides of battle make retreat-and-fire an unappealing option.

The unconquered are used to operating with a high level of autonomy, often behind enemy lines or in unknown territory. Despite this independence, the best of them know that they operate as one part of a larger plan, that their duty is to ensure that the forces they accompany achieve victory. Unconquered who arrogantly assume they can win the day all by themselves generally meet unpleasant ends.

The Vigilant War

Highborn generals and soldiers alike embrace the concept of a vigilant war. This principle teaches that strong defences and preemptive strikes are the most effective way to curtail an enemy’s ability to be an aggressor, minimising the impact on civilians, and making it the most practical and moral solution to the matter of war. On the battlefield their troops work together to utterly overwhelm their enemies as quickly as possible, cataphracts driving them from the field while the unconquered deny them any chance to regroup and counter-attack.

Imperial Armies

Highguard fields three Imperial armies; the Granite Pillar, the Seventh Wave, and the recently created Valiant Pegasus.

The Granite Pillar

The guardians of the Granite Pillar are usually arrayed in heavy armour with shield and sword, supported by cataphracts and martially inclined magisters. They practice tactics designed to emphasise their discipline, and are always accompanied by military chaplains who dedicate themselves to supporting and blessing the soldiers, helping them to remain focused on the battlefield and highlighting the virtues of Loyalty, Courage and Pride.

The first Highborn General leads the Granite Pillar army, and is appointed (or re-appointed) at the Summer solstice each year.

The Seventh Wave

While the core of the Seventh Wave is heavily armoured guardians, it is supported by a number of unconquered, scouts, skirmishers and magicians. The army makes great use of mixed-arms tactics, supporting shield-and-sword with bow, or bow with polearm and pike. They are adept scouts, capable of quickly sizing up their enemies and giving clear reports on all elements of the military campaigns in which they are involved.

The second Highborn General leads the Seventh Wave, and is appointed (or re-appointed) at the Autumn equinox each year.

The Valiant Pegasus

The Valiant Pegasus is a relatively new army; recruitment was only completed in 378YE. Initially, the force incorporates some of the finest Highborn siege architects, and was well prepared both to take advantage of Imperial fortifications and bring down barbarian strongholds. Following the opportunity offered by the celebration of Empress Lisabetta, the Valiant Pegasus refocused its efforts to the preservation of life on the battlefield, supported by many apothecaries. As a new army, it has yet to establish a particular identity or reputation for itself.

The third Highborn General leads the Valiant Pegasus, and is appointed (or re-appointed) at the Spring equinox each year.

The Thundering Tide (Defunct)

The venerable Thundering Tide was composed of the descendants of the old Highborn light cavalry units. They adapted their mounted tactics as best they could, becoming experts in maneuverable, fluid tactics designed to outflank their opponents. Many soldiers of the Thundering Tide were trained to fight with pole-arms - an echo of the lances they once used to ride down the enemies of Highguard.

The army was disbanded by Empress Mariika as part of the sweeping changes she made in pursuit of saving the Empire from bankruptcy.. The last general of the Thundering Tide, Abishai of Judah's Evasion, took his own life after. Many of the unconquered and cataphracts that used to belong to this army would go on to join the Seventh Wave.

Highguard music

The Music of Highguard

Contents

Style summary

Highguard's music draws its inspiration from Western church choral music, plainsong and shapenote music (also known as Sacred Harp). Of these, the last probably best exemplifies the musical style - Highguard music is robust and enthusiastic, and accessible to all levels of talent. They enjoy rich harmonies and proudly devotional texts, although amongst themselves a wicked sense of humour occasionally emerges in some soldiers' songs and there are also some surprisingly tender lullabies.

Commonly known songs

- Virtues Anthem - usually led by one singer with everyone joining in the refrain
- Circle March - very easy repeating song
- Hymn to Vigilance - usually led by one singer with everyone joining in the refrain

Popular with all strata of Highguard society, these three songs are heard in chapters, the necropolis, and the fields. It is when the army marches to war with its battle choir, however, that the full majesty of Highguard music is best displayed.

A musical tradition

The Highguard Battle Choirs are a great imperial tradition - no nation matches to battle with the same holy fervour in their singing. Usually accompanied by a single drumbeat, the sound of the Highguard army in full voice is an awe-inspiring and intimidating sound. Often a small number of more confident singers lead the chant in a call-and-response pattern. At least in this context the choirsters are warriors first and musicians second - the singers need not be particularly talented, as it is holy fervour and their indomitable will that characterises the battle choir.

One for the kids

- Circle March - very easy repeating song
- Nursery Rhyme about Lineage - a very naughty chant, not to be repeated in front of anyone with Lineage!

Songs about notable people and entities in Highguard

- Enoch and Levi - romantic ballad, Highguard style...
- Pride of the Highborn - anthem of Adina's Charge
- Silent Tide - anthem of the Chapter of the same name.
- Anthem of Cantiarth's Hold
- Vigilance Guide Our Faithful Watch - A song commemorating the founder of Felix's Watch.

Further examples

Songs

- For Once I Was A Young Man - cautionary tale about the virtuous life
- The Ritual for the Departed - haunting funerary song
- Gone - another song for partings and funerals
- Virtues Anthem - shapenote song with chorus

- The Navigators - shapenote song, medium
- Circle March - very easy repeating song
- Hymn to Vigilance - medium call and response plainsong
- Idumea - medium shapenote song about reincarnation
- Naughty Pilgrim Song, an alternative to all the serious songs sung in Highguard!
- O Oriens - easy plainsong
- Virtue Never Falter - rousing song with chorus, also popular in the Brass Coast
- Least of my Kind - stirring battle song
- Farewell Farewell - rousing funeral song from Highguard but also popular in the Brass Coast due to boat references
- Highguard Go To War - Battle anthem
- All Come Listen - a well known, simple song that can be sung as a round

Instrumentation

- Highborn musical traditions favour the flute and other wind instruments. On days when the wind is high, a chapterhouse resounds with the song of wind chimes, aeolian harps and bells.
- Trumpets and bugles are often blown before a battlefield charge.

Other performance traditions

How to adapt your repertoire

- If singing in harmony, try to sing in consecutive 4ths or 5ths. This gives a fantastic 'plainchanty' sound perfect for Highguard. An example is Circle March \(arranged by Katy Cooper\) which starts in unison then goes into 4ths before full harmony.
- Many songs can be made to sound plainchanty by just pulling the rhythm all over the place. Have a listen to some church psalms and simply substitute your own lyrics.

Highguard people

The Highborn have always known their destiny. From the first, they brought civilisation, and carved a nation from the wilderness, driving the barbarians before them as they expanded. This civilisation, intimately connected to their notion of Virtue, has only grown and strengthened over the years, finally reaching its maturity at the birth of the First Empress and the formation of the Imperial Creed.

Most dwell in chapters, fortified settlements spread across the plains and linked by roads, rivers and canals. The chapters are united by a common purpose, a creed that defines their own subtle interpretation of the Way of Virtue. The Highborn pride themselves on the strong sense of community within a chapter. They work together and often eat together, meeting daily in the chapterhouse for prayers and to break fast.

It is said – only half in jest – that every Highborn, no matter what their calling, is also part-soldier and part-priest. The grain of truth at the heart of the proverb is that the Highborn are raised from a young age not to take what they have for granted, but to be constantly alert to threats both martial and spiritual.

Highguard is a distinguished nation. Their days of rapid change, hurried conquest and shifting rulerships are behind them, and their culture has reached a pinnacle of insight and stability. The Highborn are proud of their accomplishments; if they are wary of change it is because they have worked so hard to achieve what they have. This caution has served them well through the founding and expansion of the Empire, allowing them to strengthen their culture and faith without the dilution of barbarian customs. Their love for Imperial civilisation drives them to defend it from those who would diminish it – whether invading foreigners, well-meaning Imperial converts or the sinister eternal.

Although the Highborn are justifiably proud of their role in creating the Empire, they are vigilant against the vices of hubris and indulgence. In Highguard, everyone must do their part to ensure the triumph of nation and Empire. Those that are raised up to positions of power are expected to do more than most. To the Highborn way of thinking, senators and the like are the servants of the Empire, hand-picked by the citizens to display moral rectitude and provide leadership. With power comes a tremendous responsibility: to be decisive and proactive, to use the power you have been given to benefit all. Those who use such positions to make themselves wealthy or idle are regarded with contempt.

A sense of history is profoundly important to the Highborn. More than the dry recording of facts, Highborn history is explicitly written as a chronicle to inspire future generations. Elements such as an invigorating narrative, a strong central character, and an enlightening lesson are considered far more important than useless – or worse, negative – details. Highborn scholars consider speculation over the accuracy of any given historical account (all of which are by their nature subjective) pointless, and instead focus on its relevance as a lesson to the present and future. This has been known to bring them into conflict with the Urizen archivists. The Highborn abhor the indiscriminate Urizen approach to source material and their refusal to apply a rigorous moral judgement to what they record and propagate.

Names

Highguard first names are primarily Old Testament Biblical in flavour.

They are chosen carefully for the child in order to establish the appropriate resonance and also consideration of the surname they will bear. Within a chapter there is usually little need for a second name, where there is confusion people often identify the specific individual by referencing a notable parent, i.e. Dinah, daughter of Eli.

When being formally introduced or described to people from outside a chapter, it is customary to append the individual's chapter to their name, reinforcing that it is the community in which the Highborn is a member that is more important than matters of blood. Chapters themselves are normally named after their founder and where, or why, they were founded, i.e. Ezekiel's Guard or Rebekah's Haven.

This means a Highborn might be called, for instance, Dinah of Ezekiel's Guard or Saul of Rebekah's Haven, using the previous chapters. If the Highborn changes chapter, for some reason, it is normal to take a completely new name to represent the change of direction in the individual.

Sample names

- Male: Aaron, Amos, Caleb, Eli, Enoch, Ephraim, Gideon, Hiram, Hosea, Ira, Levi, Mordecai, Noah, Reuben, Saul, Seth.
- Female: Abigail, Delilah, Dinah, Esther, Jemimah, Leah, Miriam, Naomi, Rebekah, Sarah, Tamar.

Bastion is the birthplace of the Way of Virtue and the Imperial Synod was founded here. In the days before the Empire was founded, chapters like the Winds of Virtue sought to take The Way to other nations. This in turn led many pilgrims to travel to Highguard seeking to experience their past lives. During the early decades of the Empire a constant influx of visitors came to the great city, many of whom engaged in discussion with the Highborn priests and each other before carrying the seeds of the Way of Virtue back to their own nations.

Highborn priests are dedicated to the Way of Virtue, and in ensuring that it does not become corrupted by outside forces. Through virtue, the Empress was able to forge a union of the disparate human nations. It is that same virtue that keeps the Empire strong to this day. Highborn priests at home, in the Synod and throughout the Empire continue to preach the Orthodox Imperial Creed, ever vigilant for heresy that might undermine it.

Wayfarers

Highborn priests know that the strength of the Empire is intimately bound to the Imperial Faith. This has led to the tradition of the Wayfarers - priests who act like missionaries, travelling the Empire to encourage the people to actively embrace not only the Imperial Faith but the ideals of the Empire itself. They often make a close study of the people they move amongst, reminding them of their own heroes and virtuous exemplars.

Wayfarers tend to wear a wide sash of braided black and white cloth as a symbol of their office. It is usually worn over a traditional Highborn robe with a heavy cowl or veil. They try to help people make up their own minds and come to their own conclusions, through careful questioning and encouragement to examine motivations, actions and beliefs.

The Inquisition

Highborn history teaches the dangers inherent in the senate system. When the Patrician Council turned from serving the good of the nation and became self-serving, it nearly destroyed Highguard. Ever mindful of the dangers, Highborn priests are vigilant for treason, hypocrisy and corruption. They watch the Imperial Senate for warning signs that it has become corrupted, and are prepared to take action to ensure it remains the servant of the Empire and not its master. They also look closely at outside influences – foreigners, Eternals, so-called “free thinkers” and the like.

The Highborn know how important it is to preserve the purity of the Imperial Faith, and the Empire as a whole. Highborn priests ensure that the Imperial Synod retains the powers of Inquisition and Revocation, and actively use those powers to ensure the Empire thrives. Priests who embrace an inquisitorial role often use the image of the Basilisk Awake – a lizard with terrible red eyes that legend says can strike the unworthy dead with its piercing gaze.

The Synod has occasionally debated requesting the Senate authorize the formalization of an official Imperial Inquisition, to give it additional binding powers. Support for this is mixed; some priests argue that enhanced powers would make the Inquisition more effective, others argue that the duty of vigilance and inquisition is one that all priests should exercise - that it should not be restricted to members of a separate body. All attempts to create a formal body have foundered in the past - instead there have been countless unofficial groups, often acting in secret, who have dedicated themselves to the spirit of Inquisition, looking to root out heresy and those guilty of less-than-virtuous behaviour.

Stewards of the dead

Some priests become stewards of the dead. Dedicated to recording the deeds of heroes of the Empire, they maintain the tombs and mausoleums of the Necropolis. Their calling means they do more than simply tend graves – they collect stories and histories of the dead, and use these stories as a method to encourage and inspire the living. They officiate at funerals in Highguard, generally an entombment of the body, but regardless of whether mortal remains are involved every Highborn wants their name inscribed on a monument in the Necropolis.

By tradition, every dead Emperor and Empress should be entombed in the Necropolis, and the stewards take this responsibility very seriously. They also “collect” the bodies of heroes of other Nations, and offer to inter them in the Necropolis which serves as a reminder of the deeds of heroes.

It is also the role of the stewards to deal with the excursions of dead spirits. Usually this takes the form of a shade or spirit with pressing business that reaches out towards its living relatives in a terrifying manner. The stewards are charged with interceding and laying the spirit to rest. At the same time they work with the Magi to ensure that the occasional ambulatory corpses that appear in the necropolis are dealt with respectfully but effectively.

The stewards generally dress in simple robes in the style of whichever chapter they belong to. They often carry a book to record the deeds of heroes, and at festivals recite tales to bring to life the memory of those who have gone before. They ring bells and speak to the accompaniment of wind-chimes, allowing the breath of the dead to add their own contribution to the tales of their deeds.

Highguard territories

Overview

Highguard dominates the southern Empire. Bastion is the heart of their nation, a civilised and well-settled land of wide plains dotted with well-tended woodlands. Wherever they go, the Highborn bring civilisation - even the sparsely populated forests and fields of Necropolis are liberally scattered with chapterhouses that protect the people from threats internal and external alike. Their cities lie along the length of the river Couros; from the Necropolis at the river's mouth, past the rich and fertile fields and plains to the holy city of Bastion, and then up past High Chalcis to the very eaves of the Great Forest of Peytaht.

Bastion

Bastion presents the calm, serene visage of the Highborn to the world. After the civil war, the White City was built on the banks of the Couros as the heart of a reborn nation. Bastion is also seen as the heart of the Way; followers all over the world look to it for guidance and it is a place of pilgrimage for the faithful. Faith, politics, and the manifest destiny of the Highborn are all bound up in the fabric of Bastion.

During the founding of the Empire, Bastion very nearly became the "official" capital of the Empire in 3YE; at the last minute the Senate decided to hold their quarterly gatherings in Anvil instead. Outside its walls, beautiful rolling plains are dotted with woodlands and carefully maintained parks. When Reikos fell to the Druj, Bastion suddenly found itself on the front lines. Many of the chapterhouses in the northern regions in particular still have a strong military aspect, although now that Reikos has been liberated this may change.

Casinea

In Highguard's northwest, Casinea is an old and wealthy territory. It is the site of the town of Anvil, the political heart of the Empire. In the past Casinea was threatened by enemies both human and otherwise - only with the foundation of the Empire was peace assured. That peace is fragile, however - the vallorn of neighbouring Brocéliande stirs in its slumber, and the recent occupation of Reikos by the Druj sent a stark message of the dangers of complacency. The wealth of Casinea lies in its hills and their rich mines and quarries, and in the timber and rare materials found in its western forests.

The first Highborn settled along the coast of the Bay of Catazar here, driving out the orcs to conquer the territory. They called the territory Pharos, and built a great city here to serve as their capital. That city burnt to the ground during the civil war, and was then rebuilt as a memorial to all that had been lost. Today, the great cemetery holds the mortal remains of some of the greatest Imperial citizens who ever lived - the heroes and Thrones who built the Empire and continue to defend it.

Necropolis is a land of sorrow, first and foremost. Poets wax lyrical about the sad grandeur of the landscape, but even the least sensitive sometimes have to suppress a shiver at the realisation of their own mortality. Yet the sorrow of Necropolis is tempered with the knowledge that all things pass - that sorrows teach valuable lessons, and that loss is part of life. Even the most bustling chapterhouse in Necropolis will contain some memento mori, some little touch that is ignored consciously but that subconsciously reminds them every day that people die.

This formerly peaceful stretch of the Couros river was once known for its pleasant gardens, gentle parks, and beautiful countryside. It became wealthy thanks to the bounty of stone and wood from the Vigilant Swan and the Great Forest; herbs from the Gardens of High Chalcis; trade with Therunin and Morrow; and from the beauty that made it a favourite place for Imperial citizens from across the Empire to convalesce after illness, or to spend time away for the cares of everyday life. Then the Druj came, and after them the merciless rejuvenating power of the eternal Llofir, and the face of Reikos was changed perhaps forever.

Today Reikos is in flux. The chapters that fled are returning, those that weathered the storm are rebuilding. The parks and gardens are gone, overwritten with new forest or drowned in blood during the war and subsequent liberation. A malign miasma still clings to the hidden places where the Druj performed their abominable rites, while the desperate spirits of those who fell to their blades continue to haunt the living. Perhaps the beauty of Reikos may be restored, tempered by the knowledge of how fragile it is. Perhaps the new Reikos will be a darker place forged in bitterness and loss.

Highborn Territories in Play

Every Highborn chapter is located in a single territory. During character creation, you select your home territory - the territory where your personal resource is located - and under normal circumstances this would be the territory where your chapter is based.

Highguard elections are only partially based on considerations of territory. The senator for each territory is decided by the National Assembly - every Highborn character with a congregation can take part regardless of their home territory - but the actual candidates are put forward by the chapters based in the territory that is being elected. As a result where you are from can still effect your ability to take part in politics.

You don't need to declare which region you live in, but it's often useful for your group to define the location of your chapterhouse for purposes of plot, and for making the game world feel more real. You might live in or near one of the established settlements, but your chapterhouse could be built anywhere in the territory - the named villages and towns are by no means the only settlements in Highguard! Your character background, or your group background, can include a few details about your home if you like, and many chapterhouses come with their own small settlement that looks to them for protection and guidance.

Each of the four territories has certain themes, which are often used as a starting point when plot writers create plot. Furthermore, certain personal resources lend themselves to certain territories better than others. These are suggestions, however, rather than hard and fast rules. In particular, the personal resources of congregation and military unit are appropriate to any of the four Highborn territories - although it's still a good idea to flavour your resource to reflect the individual character of your home territory.

Being from Bastion

Bastion is the heart of Highguard, and has themes of faith and destiny. The most important settlement is without doubt the city that shares its name with the territory - the White City of Bastion. There is something of an echo of the real-world Vatican about the White City - it is the centre of a world-wide faith after all. It's also a politically charged place - the Highborn see themselves as the shepherds of human destiny, but not everyone agrees as to where that destiny might lead.

Outside the city, this is a very civilised territory. It is widely settled, and even its woodlands tend to be reasonably safe. Bastion is not much troubled by bandits or monsters, for example. The key conflicts in Bastion are likely to come through disagreements with fellow Highborn, or with people of other nations who question the assumption that Highguard should guide the future of the Empire.

Bastion is a good place to be from if you intend to be involved in the politics of Highguard, regardless of your personal resource. The White City is full of priests, and makes an excellent place to maintain a congregation, while the chapters along the border with Reikos have had a lot of recent experience fighting the Druj and might lend themselves to an interesting background for a military unit. Farms and businesses alike make sense here, and the carefully cultivated woodlands would be an excellent site for a forest resource.

Being from Casinea

Casinea has themes of tradition and the vigilance required to protect those traditions. The most important settlement in Casinea is without doubt Anvil - the political heart of the entire Empire - which contributes to the undercurrents of conflict and suspicion in the territory. It is easy for visitors to forget that Anvil is by no means a truly Highborn settlement - and several of the chapters here look askance at the unvirtuous behaviour that takes place there during the seasonal Summits. There are deep divisions beneath the surface of Casinea - between the prosperous chapters of the east and the insular chapters of the west, as well as between the traditional, insular chapters and those who embrace the benefits of being part of the larger Empire. Historically, Casinea is where the Highborn fought other humans - the people of Dawn, the Navarr, even the Marchers on occasion.

Casinea is a good choice for chapters that are interested in sources of raw materials - especially mines but also forests. This is also a territory with a long history of trading with other nations. With the proximity of the League, the regular influx of traders and travellers heading to Anvil, and the completion of the Blood Red Roads it makes an excellent choice for a character or chapter interested in business.

Being from Necropolis

Necropolis has themes of sorrow and also mystery. The Necropolis itself is the heart of the territory, and a reminder of the dangers of a lack of Vigilance can lead to. After all, the Necropolis was once Pharos - the capital of the Highborn - until it was destroyed by a civil war that grew out of corruption, indolence, and arrogance. The barriers between the living and the dead are thin here, and this means that of all the Highborn territories it is perhaps the most magical in nature. It's also where the Highborn first settled, and is steeped in history - a character who wants to explore the complex relationship between Highborn history and truth could find an appropriate home here.

The territory is sparsely settled, and has a slightly exaggerated reputation for being full of ghosts. The Necropolis itself is strongly associated with the study of Winter magic, and this is an excellent territory for a chapter that is interested in magic to be based. A magister will be right at home here, and there is plenty of space to maintain mana sites. As with Bastion it is also a good choice for a congregation. In the case of Necropolis, however, the priests have a tendency to be more practical than political in nature - their congregations are more important for allowing them access to the liao they need to practice their ceremonies than for the votes they provide in the Imperial Synod.

Being from Reikos

Reikos is about loss and new beginnings. The largest remaining settlement in Reikos is High Chalcis, but it is a shadow of its former self. For fourteen years, it was occupied by the Druj orcs - orcs known for their cruelty. The people were mercilessly dominated, enslaved, forced to work until they dropped, and slaughtered if they showed the slightest sign of rebellion. Hundreds were killed as an example, or a threat, or on a whim. The territory itself was ravaged from one end to another, ruined, and rebuilt in as a corrupt mirror of what it had once been. After the liberation, the signs of the occupation were washed away by the tide of Llofir's magic, but the scars on the souls and memories of those who experienced them first hand will not be healed so easily.

Without a doubt, Reikos is the best for for a chapter or individual interested in herbs and herb gardens. The presence of the Gardens of High Chalcis gives an immediate benefit to anyone who maintains a herb garden. Thematically Reikos was not only a place of healing but was occupied by the Druj - experts in herb lore. it is also a particularly good fit for a martial chapter - the triple threats of the Forest of Peytaht, the vallorn of Brocéliande, and the presence of Llofir in Tamarbode are all good reasons for the captains of military units to take an interest in Reikos.

The Scythe, Rune of Dominion

Affiliated with the Realm of Autumn

Hirmok is the well-tended field, the orderly demesne of the strong ruler. It is the boundary that defines a sphere of influence and rejects all else. That which is Hirmok is bent to one service; all strength and resources moulded into something greater.

Amongst its concerns are the orderly imposition of the will over the vagaries of mortal nature and the elements. As such it can be a harsh rune, and is sometimes called the Tyrant's Rune, but in truth it could be seen as perfectly in accord with the Imperial Virtue of Loyalty.

This is also a rune that indicates mastery of the self, or of outside forces. In Urizen for example it is sometimes combined with Aesh the Rune of Thought to represent Arete.

More than reach, the rune concerns itself with grasp, it is a claim that has been staked and will be defended. The ancient trolls often erected stone piles with this rune to mark the boundaries of their petty kingdoms, and Marcher beaters sometimes employ a similar scratchmark when beating the bounds. The great gates of Holberg are said to have it stamped on every brick, every piece of timber and every nail as one simple warning: what's ours shall never be let go.

Using Hirmok in magic

The Rune of Dominion is evoked in magic that controls other forces, and it is often used as part of dangerous or destructive rituals to control and channel the release of energies. It is sometimes evoked in magic of binding or geasing, especially when one of the parties involved is not voluntary. Finally, it is a powerful rune when used in magic that identifies possessions or defines an area especially for warding purposes. Some magicians evoke Hirmok when performing the entangle incantation.

Crafting with Hirmok

While it has some negative connotations, it is a common rune found on jewellery that is used to signify leadership, such as the Seigneur ring of League Merchant Princes or the coronet of an Earl.

Call upon that which beats back the wild growth of spring, carefully stores up the golden harvests of Summer and guards against the ruin of winter.

His Banner's Not Mine

This song is popular in various parts of the Empire, and the nationalities of the lovers are often changed to suit the audience.

Lyrics by Daisy and Jude, music traditional Scottish as sung by the Poozies.

A pdf of the tune and lyrics can be found here.

His banner's not mine, not mine, not mine His banner's not mine, bonny though the colours be

I saw him in the market square In the sunlight standing there A bonny boy with flaxen hair And oh his smile is dear to me

Next day I buckled on my shield And lifted up my sword to wield Who should I see there on the field But the lad that was so dear to me...

His banner's not mine, not mine, not mine His banner's not mine, bonny though the colours be

My love he is a Marcher born And to a Dawnish Earl I'm sworn And oh, in two my heart is torn But still his banner's dear to me

Come dawn the army will depart And many months we'll be apart I'll hold forever in my heart His banner that's so dear to me

His banner's not mine, not mine, not mine His banner's not mine, bonny though the colours be

He's off defending distant shores And I must fight another war Perhaps I never shall see more His banner that's so dear to me,

But maybe there will come a time When our two nations stand combined He'll raise his banner next to mine The banner that's so dear to me

His banner's not mine, not mine, not mine His banner's not mine, bonny though the colours be

Historical research

Overview

The department for historical research was established by Emperor James in an attempt to repair the damage done to Imperial scholarship by Emperor Nicovar. Fifty years passed between the devastation of the libraries and the establishment of a formal order dedicated to regaining what had been lost - five decades for the situation to deteriorate further. Staffed by dedicated civil servants, and taking direction from the Imperial Senate, the new department worked tirelessly to recover damaged documents, and reconstruct those that had been lost forever to the fires of the mad Throne.

The Empire has been in existence for nearly four hundred years, but human civilization stretches back much further than that. The relatively recent arrival of Dawn and the Highborn were preceded by centuries of orc barbarian chaos. And before that the Bay of Catazar area was home to the sprawling kingdoms that were the ancestors of Navarr, Wintermark, Urizen and Varushka. Any given scholar today knows only a part of the epic history of humankind.

The best records the Empire kept were destroyed by Emperor Nicovar, and much of the early history of the Empire, and the history of the nations that preceded it, was lost. What documents and histories endure are kept in the personal histories and records of communities scattered across the Empire. The civil service works under the direction of the Senate, to recover knowledge that has been lost and to push back the boundaries of Imperial understanding of the past and the present. Finding specific information in the decentralised Imperial memory is a daunting task. Teams of people must spread out across the Empire to seek out lore buried in any of the countless personal libraries.

The civil service has the resources to research up to two subjects each season. Prior to the murderous events of 379YE, the civil service was able to perform more research each season; the loss of so many experienced researchers significantly curtailed their ability to perform scholastic study.

Since the death of Empress Britta, the Senate devolved much of the responsibility for guiding historical research, creating three individual titles - the Minister of Historical Research, the Dredgemaster of Feverwater, and the Advisor on the Vallorn.

Commissioning Historical Research

The power to direct the civil servants in the department of historical research lies with the Imperial Senate. Until recently, this power was employed by use of a senate motion. In recent years, senators have created three new Imperial titles, who may all commission a piece of historical research using a senate announcement. The Dredgemaster and the Advisor on the Vallorn may only announce one historical research each, but the Minister may in theory make any number of announcements. In practice, since only two pieces of historical research can be conducted each season, whichever two subjects are announced first will be undertaken.

Regardless of how the power is employed, the thrust of the research should be clear. It is possible to commission broad research into a significant topic such as "the history of the Brass Coast" or "Exemplars of Pride", giving the civil service a free reign as to how to proceed. It is more common, however, to select a tight focus such as "the life of Myfanwy" or "the Crown of Three Tears".

Each season, the researchers will provide a report summarising their findings in the previous three months. This often takes the form of a written document detailing what they have uncovered, sometimes presented by one of the civil servants responsible for collating the information. It may sometimes take the form of a discussion with an expert on the issue, or a lead that will secure specific information that requires direct action by an Imperial hero.

The report will often include suggestions for where to take the research next, if there are any avenues of research left that the researchers believe might be beneficial, explaining the problems with uncovering more information, or presenting an opportunity for some action that might help move the research forward. If the researchers do not believe that any further work on a subject will provide additional useful information then they will report that.

For the Benefit of the Empire

During the season following the presentation of a historical research report, the civil service will make the contents available to any scholar who asks as well as dispatching copies of the report to libraries, universities, and colleges across the Empire. This is done to help ensure that the information discovered can never be lost again, and to expand the collective knowledge of the Empire.

Dangers of Historical Research

OOO Explanation: The downtime after a report is received, the contents will be added to the main wiki. Depending on the nature of the report this may mean a new page detailing the results of the research, or edits to an existing page. Any scholar is free to roleplay that they have received copies of the research document.

Uncovering information about the past is not a safe occupation. At the very least the eternals known as the Whisper Gallery have demonstrated numerous times that they are prepared to take extreme steps to interfere with historical research, including murdering civil servants. The Imperial Conclave has placed them under enmity, but this does nothing to prevent their mortal associates causing trouble for the department of historical research. The Senate treasury pays a significant amount of money into a fund to protect civil servants associated with the department, but sometimes a project is too dangerous for them to explore directly. In this case, they may call on the citizen with the appropriate Imperial title to undertake dangerous actions, or request additional materials that they cannot acquire themselves.

Citizens who hold one of the titles associated with historical research should be aware that they are potential targets not only for the Whisper Gallery but for other secretive organisations that have a vested interest in preventing discovery of historical information in general, or specific to whatever is being researched.

The Department of Historical Research

The department of historical research is ultimately overseen by the Imperial Archivist, Leontes the Scribe, who is a member of the Constitutional Court. He is said to be a notoriously curmudgeonly individual whose deep knowledge of the history of humanity has left him with a perpetually dismal view of it. The day to day running of the department defaults to the most senior scholars, each of which in turn directs the remaining handful of researchers, scribes, and investigators. As of the Autumn Equinox 381YE, there are two senior researchers in the department. Each is a veteran civil servant and respected scholar of Imperial history.

Rosalind Friedlin von Holberg

A graduate and former professor at the University of Holberg, Rosalind is also a veteran of the Druj occupation, and an expert in pre-Nicovar Imperial history. She has extensive contacts among - and some influence over - the various Imperial centres of learning. Rosalind encourages researchers to adopt a detached, academic style with their studies and prefers them to include plenty of references to existing Imperial scholarship.

Peter of Hintown

Something of a maverick, this adventurous Marcher scholar discovered both the Gildenheim runeforge and the mithril deposits that eventually lead to the creation of Pride of Ikka's Tears. In contrast to Rosalind, he has an extensive network of contacts and correspondents outside of established academia, preferring to associate with independent scholars. His main area of academic interest lies with pre-Imperial artifacts, and what little is known about the history of the orc barbarians - especially the Empire's battles with them.

Other Researchers

There are a handful of other respected scholars associated with the department of historical research. They are often assigned specific roles by one of the two senior researchers. Current members of the faculty include:

- Octavia of Stream's Source spire, an Urizen who has written several well-researched treatises on the causes of significant events in Imperial history.
- Eilian Sweetwater, a respected Navarr expert on the Vallorn and the Chaos period Bay of Catazar.
- Snowstorm Henk, a young Imperial Orc academic who has an extensive interest in lost Imperial artifacts.

No Imperial Archives

While there is an Imperial Archivist, there are no Imperial Archives any more - no secret libraries maintained by the civil service. Instead, there are numerous small libraries, archives, records, and similar spread across the Empire.

Navarr Stridings carry books and scrolls with them in their wagons. Every Wintermark hall keeps a tally of judgement stretching back generations. Every Dawnish house keeps records of its most glorious members. Each Highborn chapter records the deeds of its worthy scions, every Urizen spire maintains libraries both arcane and more mundane in nature. The Marchers have memories written and oral that stretch back to the times before there were any Marchers, while the Varushkan Wise Ones and Cabalists maintain written records and keep the rich tradition of stories and cautionary tales alive from generation to generation. The tribes of the Brass Coast maintain family archives the first scrolls of which were carried with the exiled Founders when they left Highguard. The League cities build white granite libraries dedicated to the history of the city-folk and jealously guard the personal histories of guilds and grudges and debts owed. While the Imperial Orcs are new to the Empire, their cultural drive to education and their reverence of the written word have already begun amassing records, books and scrolls.

There are millions of documents in the Empire. Once upon a time, hundreds of years were spent copying tomes and collecting documents together... and then Nicovar the Mad burnt them down. Recreating these Imperial Archives would cost millions of thrones and take centuries. The closest the Empire has to an Imperial archive at the moment is the great disparate body of writing that is spread across the entire Empire.

Imperial history (Redirected from History)

Imperial historians date from the foundation of the Empire. Events that happened after the Empire is created are recorded as YE for "Year of the Empire" and BE for "Before the Empire." Most nations had their own calendars before the foundation of the Empire so historical documents that predate the Empire use different systems. A very few Highguard historians stubbornly cling to the numbering SL for "Since Landfall" dating from the point at which they first set foot on these shores, but this is a largely discredited system.

The distant past

According to historians among the Navarr, Urizen and Winterfolk, the orcs occupied land that had once belonged to early human kingdoms. What is known is that there were some powerful human kingdoms at this time, but that they were ultimately defeated and overthrown by the orcs.

When the first waves of human colonization began, most of the initial inhabitants were in retreat - the Navarr to their forests, the Urizen to their mountains, the Suag and the Kallavesi to the inhospitable north, the Ushka huddled around their camp fires, and the Feni lurking in their wilderness. There were also humans living among the orcs, largely as chattel, slaves or subjects. Where these humans were freed from orc oppression, they were usually assimilated by the conquerors leaving no records of their own culture.

Formation of the nations

Three waves of colonization brought people that founded new human nations. The Highborn are generally held to be the first, landing in the south, the forebears of Dawn and The Marches settled in the east and the Steinr and Vard appeared in the north leading to the creation of Wintermark and Varushka respectively.

These nations grew in size and power through constant warfare with their neighbours, particularly the barbarian orcs who claimed the land as their own. While the nations were successful, life was hard and brutal for the initial settlers and historians believe that it was only a matter of time before these new human nations would have been overrun and subjugated, like their predecessors.

Foundation of the Empire

Year Zero

With an eye to the conflict between the human nations and the risks posed by the orcs, the First Empress began her crusade in Highguard. She gathered around a small group of like-minded individuals from various nations and with their assistance, and with the aid of the Navarr, she brought together the leaders of humanity to discuss the barbarian threat. Her vision and charisma - and the hard work of her allies - convinced many of them to recognise the value of an Empire. The people of Urizen declined to join, but sufficient folk from The Brass Coast, Dawn, Highguard, The League, The Marches, Navarr, Varushka and Wintermark accepted the proposal to allow them to form the Empire.

(1 YE - 5 YE) Internal conflict

In the early years the Empire concentrated on consolidating its position. The creation of the Empire led to a brief but bloody civil war in the Marches and the first of many battles with the orcs. During this time the first Egregores were created through a ritual created by the Hakima of The Brass Coast to ensure that the various nations are able to maintain their distinct cultural identity.

The most significant conflict was in Varushka where the Imperial forces engaged those of the corrupt boyar Alderei the Fair who threatened to conquer Varushka and create his own corrupt Empire. With the magical aid of the Volodny magicians, his armies proved to be a match for the Imperial forces. The efforts of powerful magicians ultimately neutralised the Volodny and the tyrant boyar was defeated by the Marcher general Tom Drake, although his body was never recovered.

(6 YE) The Senate, The Synod and the Military Council

The Empress and her advisors laid the groundwork for Imperial structures to support and empower the Empire. Building on traditions of government in Wintermark, the Senate was created to advise the Empress and give the nations a voice in the rule of the Empire. Following a plan developed in the Marches, the Military Council of generals was set up to coordinate the military forces of the various nations. The Synod was formed by the priests of Highguard, allowing the Imperial Faith to serve as a unifying force with a remit to ensure that the leaders of the Empire did not become corrupt.

(22 YE) Death of the First Empress

The First Empress led her troops from the front, rallying and inspiring them in their campaigns against their enemies. She died on campaign in battle against an orc barbarian tribe on the Brass Coast who were subsequently wiped out. She was interred in the Necropolis at Highguard, creating the tradition for many dead Emperors and Empresses that followed.

The last known horse, the mount of the First Empress, died at this time. Highguard tales described the pair's final battle, but Urizen records of army logistics from this period suggest that the horse died before the Empress. Although the first Empress is always shown on a horse, there were no more horses after this time.

After the death of the First Empress, Emperor Giovanni of Tassato was chosen by the Senate to replace her. An advisor to the late Empress, Giovanni was a statesman and politician rather than a military leader like his predecessor. He set about ensuring the Empire had the infrastructure required to help it prosper. His first act was to initiate a tradition of meeting once every three months at the site of the first meeting where the Empire was formed. A Senate building was built on the site, and it was declared Imperial Territory.

Giovanni approached the people of Urizen with an invitation to join the Empire, and this time they accepted. In return they offered their expertise as scholars and mages. Urizen scholarship slowly helped to raise levels of education and literacy across the Empire. Harnessing the power of Urizen divination with the expertise of the civil service helped Giovanni to transform the Imperial Civil Service into its current form.

The Urizen worked with the Empire to create the Imperial Conclave, inspired by experiences during the war with Alderei the Fair in Varushka. The divided magicians of the Empire, each jealously guarding their own secrets, were barely able to neutralise the much smaller force of the Volodya, and the Senate was keen to ensure that this does not happen again.

Giovanni also laid the foundations of the Imperial Bourse, and worked with the Senate and Synod to codify the body of Imperial Law. During his reign he established a single currency based on steel coins issued by the Imperial Mint, based in Tassato under the ultimate control of the Civil Service. Giovanni died in 34 YE but his legacy was at least as durable as that of his predecessor. His relentless commitment to civilisation earned Giovanni the epithet "Peacemaker".

Consolidation of the Empire

(36 YE - 69 YE) Reign of Empress Richilde, the Sun Queen

Following the reign of Emperor Giovanni, there is a brief period during which the Throne is unoccupied. The next Empress is Empress Richilde of Dawn. Senator for Astolat, this accomplished Dawnish noble parlayed her cleverness and charisma into political influence. She instituted the Imperial bards, served as a patroness of the arts, accompanied the Imperial armies on campaign as an inspirational symbol of the Throne, and worked extensively to encourage both national and Imperial pride. After her death, she was recognised as an Exemplar and later a Paragon of Pride.

(46 YE) Karsk captured

Imperial armies from Wintermark and Dawn supported the Varushkan force's conquest of Karsk. The war was long and did not produce tales of heroism or glory.

(52 YE) Semmerholm defeated

An unusual alliance between Marcher and Dawnish forces caused the destruction of a major orc tribe in the territory now known as Semmerholm.

(54 YE) Scouring of Redoubt

A combined Imperial force assisted the seers of Urizen in systematically removing the majority of orc occupants from the territory of Redoubt. Urizen control of the territory expanded allowing it to be represented in the Senate.

(56 YE) Reikos gained

Highborn forces finally succeeded in conquering the Reikos on the borders of the Great Forest of Peytaht. The territory was accepted as part of the Empire although it took over a year to return the first senator for the territory.

71 YE - 91 YE Reign of Empress Teleri the Pious

This Navarr Empress was deeply involved in the business of the Synod, and it was during her reign that they first began to exert the political powers they possessed. During her reign, the Synod gained increasing influence over all other parts of Imperial life, especially the Imperial Senate.

(74 YE) Westward expansion

A campaign to secure the western flank of the Empire took the Mourn from orcs and secured Mitwold to the sea, giving the Empire a western coastline.

(88 YE) Invasion of Kahraman

Freeborn and Marcher armies concluded a successful pincer invasion of the mountainous territory of Kahraman. The occupants were split in two by the invasion and forced out of the territory in the following years.

92 YE - 102 YE The First Interregnum

Following the reign of Empress Teleri there is a period known as the First Interregnum during which there was nobody seated on the Throne. This period is marked by close co-operation between the Conclave, Bourse, Senate and Military Council with the Imperial Synod serving a vital role as supporters and intermediaries. As the interregnum progresses, however, there is increasing dissatisfaction with the dominance of the Synod.

103 YE - 120 YE Reign of Empress Aenea the Builder

The Highborn Empress Aenea spent most of her reign improving the infrastructure of the Empire. Several border wars occurred during Aenea's time on the throne, and at various points the Empire was at war with Faraden, the Iron Confederacy, Axos, Skoura and even (technically) the Sumaah Republic.

125 YE to 167 YE Reign of Empress Varkula, called 'The Undying'

Taking advantage of a weakened and divided senate the ruthless Varushkan Empress Varkula manipulated (and in some cases, allegedly extorted) her way to the throne. She then set about dramatically increasing the military strength of the Empire. Her reign saw the Empire's borders expand, and also saw a reduction in the powers of the Synod that had expanded in the reigns of more pious Emperors and Empresses.

(125 YE) Assimilation of Zenith

The seers of Urizen completed the assimilation of Zenith after a lengthy campaign involving Highborn and League forces and a long sequence of powerful rituals.

(136 YE) Fall of Holberg

Imperial armies from Dawn conquered the territory of Holberg. The city of Holberg was convinced to join the Empire by League diplomats, leading to a political coup in the Senate that resulted in the territory being assigned to the League.

(154 YE) Skarsind pacified

Although it proved impossible to drive the barbarian orcs from Skarsind, enough of the territory was conquered and fortified for it to be declared an Imperial territory.

(167 YE) Domination of Miekarova

Steady expansion by the Varushkan boyars over the preceding century led to the inclusion of Miekarova within the Empire.

168 YE to 179 YE Reign of Emperor Frederick, called 'The Philosopher'

Frederick Ritter van Holberg reigned for eleven years, over a time of relative peace during which the Empire consolidated the gains secured in the reign of Empress Varkula. He was a philosopher and political scholar who fiercely protected the rights of the individual over those of the state, and encouraged citizens of all nations to view the prosperity and security of the Empire as both their responsibility and something in which to take great pride.

(180 to 198 YE) Reign of Emperor Barabbas

The Highborn Emperor Barabbas was driven by the desire to expand the Empire to control the entire Bay of Catazar. He was only marginally successful, managing primarily to alienate the people of Surann and Skoura and ultimately seeing his Barabbine fleet sink in a terrible storm that would have left the Imperial Navy crippled if not for the foresight of his Freeborn allies.

(183) Expansion into Segura

A united front by the Hakima of the Guerra and Riqueza led to the Brass Coast expansion into Segura.

Stability

(200 YE - 209 YE) Reign of Emperor Nicovar "the Mad"

The first reversals in the Empire's fortune occurred during the reign of Emperor Nicovar. Initially a brilliant administrator, Nicovar expanded the role of the civil service in support of the Empire. However, a decade of attempting to micromanage every element of the Empire, as well as a reliance on the magic of Day to gather and interpret ever greater amounts of information, eventually caused him to descend into madness.

The draughir Emperor became increasingly unstable, perceiving patterns in events that appeared paranoid to others. His unpopular policies divided the Senate and the Synod, and there were rumbles of civil war. He began to demand extreme amounts of record keeping and it became clear that he was not in his right mind.

Things came to a head in 209 when Emperor Nicovar sent his troops to burn down the Empire's libraries. There was a revolt, which culminated in the destruction of the central repository of records in Highguard and several key spires in Urizen. The mad emperor was executed by the captain of his own guard, the Navarr Thorn Isaella. Despite appeals for clemency from the Synod, Isaella took full responsibility, and was convicted as a traitor, while simultaneously being lauded as an exemplar of courage and duty and a hero of the Empire.

The destruction of the libraries left a big hole in the history of the Empire - thousands of books and scrolls are lost. While records still existed, there were many gaps and those that remained were fragmentary. Since then scholars have attempted to recreate the books and records they had lost, but with mixed success.

(204 YE - 259 YE) Years of turmoil

This period was characterized by a sequence of military defeats as earlier conquests were lost to resurgent barbarian forces beginning with Segura in the Brass Coast in 204 and ending with the war in Karsk in 259. Most of the defeats were eventually reversed, with the borders moving back and forth. By the end of the years of turmoil, the Empire actually controlled slightly more land than at the beginning, but the period is still regarded as a low point in Imperial history.

(212 YE - 234 YE) Reign of Empress Mariika

After three years without an Emperor or Empress, the Suag Empress Mariika ascended the Throne. The Empire was on the verge of financial collapse, and Mariika's reign is remembered for her ruthless and efficient reorganisation of the Imperial Economy. She disbanded two entire armies, slashed funding to the Military Council, gave the Bourse control of a number of raw material surpluses, recognised several informal positions as Imperial offices, and generally took steps to ensure the Empire avoided economic disaster.

(239 YE - 248 YE) Reign of Emperor Guntherm

The Steinr Emperor Guntherm ascended the Throne after a series of successful campaigns against the Jotun barbarians. He was committed to expanding the reach of the Empire, and chafed under the economic restrictions placed by his predecessor. The early part of his reign is committed to strengthening the borders of the Empire, and a number of castles and fortresses were built during his reign. The latter part of his reign is known for some of the bloodiest battles in Imperial history.

(249 YE - 257 YE) Reign of Empress Brannan

The Navarri Empress Brannan followed Guntherm to the throne, and was another military-minded ruler dedicated to smashing the orcs and expanding the borders of the Empire. Ultimately, her abusive attitude to the powers of the Throne, and allegations of improper relations with certain Eternals resulted in her being the only Emperor or Empress to be revoked by the Imperial Synod. Despite her failings, some of the most glorious battles in Imperial history take place during her reign, she showed what the Empire was capable of when sufficient resources were given to its armies, and with her support the Navarr made great advances in their fight to destroy the vallorn and reclaim their lost cities.

(257 YE - 281 YE) Reign of Emperor James

The Marcher Emperor James took the throne as a peacemaker - not to make peace with the barbarians, but to make peace within the Empire. He was responsible for fixing the borders of the Empire..

(265 YE) Fixing the borders

The Senate decreed that the Empire was now large enough and argued that further expansion was counterproductive, despite vociferous argument from the Synod and the Military Council. Trade routes with various foreigners were established, and peace treaties were signed with various barbarians, ushering in an era of economic growth and prosperity.

Some barbarians continued to threaten the borders, but the armies shifted to a more defensive role.

(281 YE - 300 YE) The Second Interregnum

After James' reign, a period of relative peace settled on the Empire. The borders were reinforced, relationships between the Senate, the Synod and the Military Council achieved a degree of status quo, and both the Conclave and the Bourse focused on their own interests. Modern scholars suggest that this was a period of increasing complacency and introspection for the Empire, but others point to the high quality of life for most citizens, the various advances in magic, the arts and technology, and consider it a golden age built on the solid foundations laid by Emperor James' reign.

(300 YE - 318 YE) Reign of Empress Deanne

(322 YE - 324 YE) The Orc Rebellion

Prior to 322 YE, many orcs that were defeated in battle were enslaved. Orcs had no rights in the Empire before this time, as they were not considered people in the eyes of the Constitution. There were slave populations in Dawn, Wintermark and Highguard and especially in Varushka and The League.

During this period an orc hero arose among his people, leading them in armed revolt that saw them occupy parts of Varushka, the League, Dawn and the Marches. The Freeborn Emperor Ahraz arranged a deal with the orcs, and a motion to recognise them as people was brought before the Senate. The motion passed by a tiny margin, making the Imperial Orcs citizens of the Empire.

(324 YE - 329 YE) Reign of Emperor Ahraz "the Liberator"

The only Freeborn Emperor to date, Ahraz came to the throne with promises to end the Orc Rebellion. He did so by bringing the slaves into the Empire, and by recognising the right of orcs to be citizens. His reign was marked with turmoil, and he abdicated in 329 YE a broken man.

(324 YE - 328 YE) The Freedom Heresy

A briar priest preaching the heretical virtue of freedom ultimately inspired an attempt to secede from the Empire. When the rebellion was defeated by Imperial forces, the priest led her followers into The Barrens where they attempted to found a rogue state; the kingdom of Mountane. In 328 YE the heretics were destroyed by barbarian orcs, and in 329 YE the ringleaders of the heresy were tried and executed for heresy and blasphemy.

Decline

(331 YE) The Decline begins

In 331YE the territory of Spiral was lost to Urizen. This marked the start of the current period called the decline. A greedy and corrupt Senate, more concerned with internal political manoeuvring than the strength of the Empire, supported two weak occupants of The Throne (Empress Giselle de Sarvos and Emperor Hugh the Fat of House Rousillon) and a third catastrophically incompetent Emperor (the weak and self-indulgent naga-lineaged Emperor Walter Upwold who did not enter the Senate once during his two year reign).

The Synod was mostly concerned with dogmatic disputes and began to lose sight of its mission.

In 346 YE the territory of Holberg was lost to the barbarians. This triggered a defensive mindset and a period of recriminations. More territories were lost, leading to further defensiveness and less inter-nation cooperation. The generals of the Military Council found it impossible to collaborate effectively during this period. The addition of the first Imperial Orc generals in 351 YE simply made the matter worse.

Several more territories on the edges of the Empire were lost during this time.

(331 - 346 YE) Reign of Empress Giselle 'the unwise'

Empress Giselle de Sarvos of the League takes the throne following the loss of Spiral in 331 YE and despite some early efforts entirely failed to re-take that territory. Her reign is marked with a period of political upheaval largely caused by the Empress herself whose blatant favouritism towards the League splits the Senate and the Synod, and causes problems among the generals and the archmagi. Her reign ends with her death during the battle for Holberg which sees that territory lost to the Empire.

(348 - 368 YE) Reign of Emperor Hugh, called 'the fat'

After the death of Empress Giselle de Sarvos, Hugh de Rousillon of Dawn takes the crown. Nephew of the Dawnish general Leon de Rousillon, and a noble of a politically and militarily powerful Dawn noble house, Hugh was a personable, enthusiastic and idealistic knight with extensive battlefield experience. Unfortunately, he was an absolutely abysmal administrator, incapable of delegation, torn between the realities of political life and his personal idealism. His reign is marked by a dizzying number of feasts, banquets and tourneys during which he desperately tried to woo an increasingly jaded Imperial Senate, as well as a sequence of crushing military defeats as Generals began to compete with each other over dwindling resources.

By the end of his reign, the Emperor was almost unrecognisable as the energetic young man he had been when he took the Throne. Decades of feasting had left him corpulent and unhealthy, barely able to fit into his harness. Trying to stay ahead of the manipulations and machinations of the Senate had left him exhausted and despondent. According to those who saw him in the fateful battle for Karsk that spelled the end of his reign and ultimately his life, he was a broken man who embraced the peace offered by death.

(371 - 373 YE) Reign of Emperor Walter, the ham-fisted

Emperor Walter Upwold was a Marcher naga who took the throne under dubious circumstances and was widely considered to be a disaster for the Empire. Under his 'reign' the Senate fell even further into open bickering and factionalism. He choked to death on an olive pit in 373 YE during a state dinner with a group of Sarcophan and Jarmite diplomats.

(374 YE) Coronation of Empress Britta

A Steirn woman named Britta became the nineteenth Empress. In the wake of the disastrous Emperor Walter (who was already being termed "the Ham Fisted") she took up the sword and shield and challenged the corruption of the Senate and Synod. She surrounded herself with competent generals, and began to formulate and prosecute a campaign to recover lost territories and drive the barbarians back.

A popular and charismatic figure, she united the people of the Empire behind her and dealt ruthlessly with her enemies. She had the wisdom to select competent advisors. People began to call her the Young Empress, and hailed her as the reincarnation of the First Empress, come to protect the Empire in its time of need.

(376 YE) Death of the Young Empress

The Empress Britta was killed during a disastrous attempt to retake Skarsind. The first event in the game took place four weeks after her death was confirmed.

Holberg

Build strong city walls and the world must come to you - and it will come to you, if only to marvel at your walls.

Overview

Holberg joined the League in 136YE under a riot of political strife in the Senate. The lands that surrounded the city were under the control of barbarian orcs until they were driven back in an epic five year war of conquest by Dawnish nobles and forces loyal to them. But Holberg itself was never conquered; the city was protected by a dozen high walls and the Dawnish armies had little taste for a lengthy siege. When the city was convinced to side with the Empire by League diplomats, it also successfully requested the Senate assign the territory to the League. Dawnish senators were incandescent with fury but there was nothing they could do and Holberg became the prosperous fourth city of the League.

In the decades that followed Holberg grew rich and prosperous. The lands around the city possessed a rich agricultural heritage, well known for their fine vineyards.

Recent History

In 346YE, however, barbarians attacked the territory, sacked the vineyards, burnt the hardwood groves so precious to the city's crossbow makers, and laid siege to the walled city. The Senate remained paralyzed throughout this time, unable to secure funding and forces to raise the siege and in the end the territory was lost to the orcs and remained under Orc rule for over thirty years.

By early 377YE, the walls of Holberg were in a sorry state. The Imperial Senate passed a motion to supply emergency aid to the citizens of the city, following a plan suggested by the master engineer Rhiner Van Hesselman. Money and resources supplied to the city allowed for emergency repairs to be made to the walls, while herbs and medical supplies helped to counter the insidious effects of Druj poisons. Despite the fact that the city was under siege, heroic action meant that the defences were restored to full strength.

In Summer 378YE, the defenders had been forced back to defensive positions within the upper city. The Druj, made overconfident by earlier victories, pressed their advantage in Autumn ... with disastrous consequences for the barbarians.

Over Winter 378YE, Holberg was liberated by a massive force of Imperial troops. The Druj fortress of Rebishof was devastated, and the barbarian invaders driven back to the northern forests. At the same time, however, their magicians unleashed a dreadful curse on Holberg, causing malignant spirits to animate aggressive trees throughout the area.

Is Holberg cursed?

Empress Giselle met her end here and Emperor Hugh spent much of his reign trying to get support to retake the city. Some claim that when Empress Britta decided to concentrate her efforts on the western Empire it was as much due to her belief in the curse as it was about any amount of residual nationalism. According to the scandalous Sarvosian novel The Waters of Rebishof, the curse was the work of a Weirwater weaver cabal seeking vengeance for the humiliation of the Dawnish. No evidence to support these scurrilous claims has ever come to light.

Major Features

The City of Holberg

Holberg itself has never fallen - even the Empire was only able to "conquer" it because the burghers of the city opened the gates to them. Famous for its engineers, builders and architects, the city is immensely fortified and defenders held out against barbarian attack for over thirty years. The only approach to the city that remains viable is through a narrow pass that leads over the mountains and into Dawn. Now Holberg is back in Imperial hands the people look forward to their newly appointed Senator rebuilding the city to its former glory.

Holberg has always been a vital part of the League. The city is notorious for its inventive brilliance, its ability to think of ingenious solutions to problems. Holberg invented the crossbow, but it is not inventions it is known for, so much as the ability of the inhabitants to use what they have to find solutions never before seen. Many Holberghians see life as a complex puzzle, one for which they are seeking the solution. They do not respect flights of fancy - but these people have found ways to build a city on a mountainside. They are utterly pragmatic but ingenious with it.

There is also an emphasis on learning and study that is found nowhere else in the Empire outside Urizen. Holberg already had its own university when it joined the League, something the other cities soon copied. It does not have great libraries to rival Urizen or Highguard - although it has more than its fair share of specialists such as the bookbinders of Leger Domain - but it is a centre of excellence for tutelage, particularly in practical skills like engineering and surgery. There have been several free companies from Holberg whose reputation as siege engineers was unrivalled throughout the Empire. Holberg gives the League a scholarly excellence that allows it to hold its own with rival nations like Urizen - they may not have been able to retake the lowlands without help from the Empire, but they ensured that the city did not fall to the Druj.

One of the finest engineering guilds in Holberg is Wunderkind. With a legacy that reaches back to the time before Holberg was part of the Empire, the engineers of Wunderkind were known for centuries for the creation and design of everything from toys to fountains to siege engines and crossbows - and everything in between. The Grand Clocktower - a unique wonder in the Empire, a mechanical time-keeping device on a massive scale, was built by the founders of the guild.

Holberg is also known for its doctors - many of whom gave their lives fighting on the front lines. The warrior-healer of Holberg is already becoming a popular mythopoetic figure and characters such as the late physick and apothecary Doctor Ventner are appearing in plays and pamphlets as far south as Sarvos.

The Great Pits of Ennerlund

The Great Pits of Ennerlund are a Bourse resource located (unsurprisingly) in Ennerlund. Custodianship of the Pits is an Imperial Title that brings with it a Seat on the Imperial Bourse. It produces 27 Imperial wains of mithril every season. Control is allocated to any Imperial citizen by open auction during the Autumn Equinox. The Pits were severely damaged by the Druj during the last months of their occupation, and repaired at great expense to the Empire. The lower levels are in constant danger of flooding due to the spread of marshland into Ennerlund, placing an increased demand on the Imperial treasury.

Holmauer Park

During the Druj occupation, the suburbs of Holmauer were reduced to rubble choked with vermin - both the four-legged and two-legged kind. In Spring 380YE Katarzyna Von Carstein - a Jarmish immigrant now a citizen of the League - presented a bold proposal to reclaim the ruins. The Imperial Senate agreed with her ambitious plan, although the construction took at least twice as long as first estimated. Over time the shattered wasteland was cleared and the region laid out as broad parkland.

In contrast to the cramped, bustling, brick-and-stone aesthetic of the city proper, Holmauer is now a gentle, restful area of open parks and well-maintained orchards dotted with buildings of white granite and fine marble. The extensive landscaping of the park has led to pleasant paths snaking through flower gardens, grassy banks and natural forest areas. There are row boats for hire on the lakes and river and a new folly on the island for visitors to enjoy. The park includes a beautiful open-air venue for concerts and plays, a public bath house built by the finest Highborn artisans, and the wonderful Imperial Menagerie. At the North-East corner is the Sculpture Garden, a meandering series of paths through a rose garden scattered with statues of recent citizens of Holberg. All in all, the park is a great work that transforms Holmauer into one of the richest, most beautiful, and most desirable areas to live in in the entire League.

Close to the entrance from the city of Holberg is placed a plaque bearing the names of all the citizens who contributed funds to pay for the creation of the park.

Lorenzo's Legacy of Courage

Spread across the entire territory, even in the wild woodlands of Misericorde and the sodden marshes of the Morass are a sequence of red stone stelae. Adorned with axes and roses, and surmounted with a pair of butcher's cleavers, their bases are engraved with phrases celebrating Pride, Loyalty, and Courage around the base. The keystone for this great work stands outside Wunderkind in the city of proper. Commissioned in Autumn 381YE with the use of an Imperial Wayleave by Lorenzo “La Volpe” Macelliao von Temeschwar, these crimson monoliths help to harness the flows of mana through Holberg.

Regions

Holfried

Quality: City

This is where the great fortified city of Holberg stands. It is one of the greatest fortifications in the Empire and was the only reason that the defenders managed to withstand the siege of hostile barbarians for a little over thirty years.(OOO Note: The walls of Holberg are a rank 2 fortification).

In Spring 378YE the Imperial Senate arranged the creation of a cemetery at the foot of the southern wall. Marcher soil and apple trees were imported and watered with waters taken from streams in Mitwold, Upwold and Bregasland.

Holmauer

Quality: Parkland

The sprawling suburbs of Holmauer are a region unto themselves. Outside the walls of Holberg proper, they were devastated by decades of war, cannibalised by the barbarians and citizens of Holberg alike to shore up their fortifications. Makeshift barricades gave way to increasingly sophisticated fortresses, and then to rubble. The walls of Holmauer finally ceased to be a consideration in the Autumn of 378YE - a shattered casualty of the ebb and flow of battle against the Druj.

After the liberation, a few refugees sought to regain their homes in Holmauer, but in most cases literally nothing remained. The priests of the Eastern Front did what they can to help these homeless unfortunates - and ministered likewise to the few survivors who, like them, stayed behind even as the outer city collapsed around their ears. Rebuilding the suburbs of Holberg represented an immense undertaking, especially in the absence of the walls that once protected them. During the Spring Equinox 380YE, the Imperial Senate commissioned a project to restore Holmauer, turning the region into a great park as per the ambitious plans of architect Katarzyna Von Carstein. Following a long delay, work finally began on the park shortly after the Autumn Equinox 380YE, but stalled over Winter. For a long time, the only part of the park open to the public was the Imperial menagerie, but work was finally completed shortly before the Winter Solstice 381YE.

Holmauer is no longer a broken ruin, but rather a beautiful stretch of parkland dotted with clusters of aesthetically pleasing buildings, homes, and businesses. It presents a highly desirable alternative to the cramped conditions in the city proper, and real estate here in Holmauer is very much in demand.

Misericorde

Quality: Forest, Poisonous

The northernmost region of Holberg, these dark forests were once a haunt of bandits and brigands – the bandit “warlord” Graffler made his base of operations here – and have a poor reputation as a result. After Graffler's death, some of the bandits were forced by necessity to fight for their survival against the Druj - the most committed of whom have since sought clemency and formed a military company in service of the League. Misericorde touches the shores of the Semmerlak, but there has never been much fishing here - the banks of that great lake just across the river are part of the Mallum (claimed by the Druj, and to the west by the folk of Semmerholm). Still, it is not impossible that a small port could be constructed here - especially if the Mallum were freed from Druj domination.

Since the retreat of the Druj, there have been stories of odd activity in Misericorde and neighbouring Utterlund. Shortly before the Summer Solstice 380YE, the threat of poisonous briars, and a venomous fog, were confirmed in the region giving it the poisonous quality.

Utterlund

Quality: Forest, Poisonous The forests of Utterlund are tamer than those of Misericorde. At one time they served as a hunting preserve and the were the site of several cultivated woodland preserves such as the beautiful Sorensdromen that in addition to being places of natural wonder produced valuable raw materials for use in several industries. Owned and worked by local people, many forest workers were enslaved by the barbarians during the Druj invasion and suffered greatly at the hands of the orcs.

As with Misericorde, Utterlund gained the poisonous quality shortly before the Summer Solstice 380YE.

Ennerlund

The Great Pits can be found here. Most of the region is dotted with light woodland, although great swathes of it have been clear-cut by loggers and by labourers associated with the mithril mine - indeed the area directly surrounding the mineworks was entirely stripped of trees long ago and is sometimes referred to as the "Ennerlund Wastes". Now that the Druj are gone, the area is slowly recovering - new mines such as Uitgang have been opened, for example.

Unfortunately, as of the Summer Solstice 380YE, Ennerlund is threatened by the expansion of the Morass. If the marshes engulf Ennerlund as they have Rebeshof the Great Pits will need powerful pumps to keep them operational, and it will mark the loss of the last bits of good quality farmland in the territory.

Rebeshof

Quality: Marsh

A wide plain, once dominated by an unsightly fortification built over the several decades by the orc invaders with looted stone. Human slaves were used to work the remaining farms here, providing food to their conquerors. In Winter 378YE the fortress was destroyed by Imperial armies during the liberation of Holberg.

Rebeshof was originally marshland. It was drained at great expense by the people of Holberg between 18YE 20YE. During their occupation, the Druj destroyed many of the dikes and dams that held back the Morass, and in the time since the farmland here has slowly been reclaimed by the waters of the southern marshes. The situation was exacerbated by the sheer amount of Spring magic laid over the territory during the war with the Druj. Following the Spring Equinox 380YE, in combination with the effects of Empire-wide Spring magic, the marshes finally reclaimed Rebeshof.

The Morass

Quality: Marsh In the past, the Morass has been partially drained. Since the territory of Holberg fell the waters have risen and the swampy land expanded, turning most of the region back into boggy marsh and drowning a great many farms that once exploited the naturally fertile soil of the reclaimed land, such as the old pear orchards of Kröger Steading. There have been several reports of marshwalkers in the last decade although whether these are natural creatures or part of the Druj forces is unclear - the Druj will be sure to exploit them given the chance, however.

The poisonous quality

The forests of Utterlund and Misericorde gained the poisonous quality shortly before the Summer solstice 380YE. Each campaign army that moves through, or fights in, one of these regions will suffer 250 casualties during that season of campaigning.

OOO Notes

- As of the beginning of Spring 379YE the Empire controls all regions of Holberg.
- All farms in Holberg suffer a penalty of 18 rings production each season due to the lack of good quality farmland in the wake of the expansion of the Morass.
- Holfried is a level two fortification.
- Between them the Blood Red Roads and Holmauer Park provide a total of 1660 rings shared between all League owners of a business in Sarvos.
- The Blood Red Roads are a great work that provides a dividend of 450 rings each season, spread between every farm in the territory owned by a citizen of Holberg who attended the previous summit.
- Lorenzo's Legacy of Courage is a great work that provides 37 crystal mana each season, spread amongst those citizens of Holberg who own mana sites.
- The level one fortification at Holmauer was destroyed in Autumn 378YE, along with the last remaining coherent structures in Holmauer.
- The level one fortification at Rebeshof was destroyed in Winter 378YE.
- Attempting to build a permanent fortification in one of the regions with the marsh quality is likely to encounter additional difficulties.
- A list of the spoils of war, that were allocated by the Military Council at the Summer Solstice 379YE, can be found here.

The Frieze of Flowers

Constructed during the legendary celebrations following the coronation of Empress Lisabetta, the Frieze of Flowers is a breathtaking work of art that covers an entire wall of the Casequo Gallery in the heart of Holfried. Painstakingly crafted from the finest materials, inlaid with dragonbone, orichalcum, and tempest jade, it is a true wonder that combines modern artistic techniques with traditional sensibilities. It is a delight of autumnal colours, invoking Prosperity and Ambition.

The central part of the frieze depicts the Empress, triumphant, with a backdrop showing the rebuilt walls of Holberg, and surrounded by symbols associated with her early life (the image of the Seven Mirrors for example), and coronation (fields of white and gold flowers). She rests one hand on the mane of a mighty lion, its head bowed but its strength undiminished by its expression of respect.

There are many other subtle touches however, relating to the past and future not only of Holberg, but of the League and the Empire itself. In one part, depicting the armies of the League taking back Holberg, is a image of the late General Giovanni Saverio di Sarvos. By contrast, around the borders of the frieze are images of the present and the future - the four Senators of the League in the corners, and the Cardinals of Prosperity, Ambition, and Vigilance; the Imperial Inquisitor; the Ambassadors to Asavea and Faraden; the Imperial Consul; and the Grandmaster of the Golden Pyramid along the top and bottom edges.

The frieze was created by an affiliation of Holberg artists and citizens, partially commissioned by Aureliana Saverio di Sarvos and Othello von Holberg, and created with permission from Benedict Parelli of the Empress's household and the consent of the Senator of Holberg.

Holberg spoils of war (Redirected from Holberg Spoils of War)

Following the liberation of Holberg by Imperial troops in Spring 379YE, these resources have been presented to the Military council for assignment as spoils of war during the Summer Solstice, 379YE following the assignment of Holberg to an Imperial nation.

Spoils of War

Wunderkind

Business / Rank 5

Founded well before Holbeg joined either the League or the Empire, Wunderkind has a long and distinguished history. Established by graduates of the university, it specialised in the design and commission of devices that showcased the excellence of Holberg engineering. In addition to ingenious mechanical toys commissioned by the wealthiest citizens, the guild designed and built everything from fountains, to water pumps, to cranes, and even dabbled in landscaping, siegeworks and the development of precision crossbows. The invasion of the Druj changed the focus of the guild, as they worked closely with the Towerjacks in the defence of the city. Now, their expertise honed by thirty years of experience in the manufacture of war machinery, the Wunderkind Guild seeks a patron to lead them into a new era of Prosperity. Not only is there a queue of potential customers attracted by the Wunderkind name, but the guild is well respected in the city and brings with it a significant number of votes in the election for Senator.

The Eastern Front

Congregation / Rank 4

When the Druj got as far as Holmauer, many gave up and retreated into the upper city. They left their homes and many of their possessions behind them. The congregation of the Holmauer Vigils never gave up, however, and refused to leave. They waged a quiet, subversive war against the invaders for a generation, often using the same tactics of ambush and traps as the barbarians. Even after the outer city fell to the Druj they refused to give up, and their numbers were bolstered by others dedicated to ideals of Pride, Courage and Ambition who would stop at nothing to city liberated. When their church was destroyed by catapults, and overrun by Druj, they renamed themselves the Eastern Front; they not only fought the Druj, but ministered to the Imperial citizens who stayed behind to resist the barbarian orcs. Now that the Druj have been driven back, they have kept their wartime nickname, but turned their attention away from war and towards the reconstruction of Holmauer and the reclamation of the devastated land that has suffered three decades of occupation by the Druj.

Sorensdromen

Ambergelt Forest / Rank 3

Sorensdromen is a small, well-hidden preserve in the forests of Utterlund which was once a recognised place of outstanding natural beauty. Famed as a lover's retreat, it also produced quantities of ambergelt prized for their translucence and clarity. Sadly, thirty years of Druj occupation have twisted the entire area. Beautiful groves of centuries-old trees have been ruthlessly cut back, and the ambergelt pines themselves warped by the blackest arts of the orc foresters. While their production has been improved, it has left the once-gorgeous trees twisted and misshapen; when the ambergelt flows it looks as if the trees are literally weeping at what has been done to them.

Uitgang

Green Iron Mine / Rank 3

When the Druj brought down the Great Pits at Ennerlund over the Winter Solstice of 378YE, a group of slave miners were lucky enough to be trapped in one of the upper levels and survived the initial collapse. Desperate to find a way to escape, they used the limited mining equipment they had to try and make an escape. The threat of a slow painful death by suffocation, hunger, thirst - or a quick death by drowning as the pumps gave out - spurred them to heroic endeavour.

Through a combination of mining knowledge and abandoned tunnels, they managed to make their way to the north and west of the Great Pit - where they encountered a hitherto-unknown deposit of green iron; the few who made it out alive immediately staked a claim and are now looking for someone to invest in their new mining enterprise.

Kröger Steading

Farm / Rank 3

On the edge of the reclaimed the Morass lies the Kröger, an orchard farmstead bounded by the swamp to the south and west and by great wooden barricades to the north and east well-known for the variety and piquancy of its pear harvest. The hardy inhabitants held out against Druj incursions partly through stubbornness, partly by making themselves too much trouble to capture, and partly due to being on a defensive position on a peninsula sticking out into the treacherous marshes. While they have largely been able to maintain their levees, they are beginning to lose the southern edge of their land to the encroaching marshland. Like many of the surviving Holberg natives, the Krögers are looking for a partnership to help sell their produce and preserve their legacy.

Business / Rank 2

While their modest business was never directly threatened by the orcs - being sited as it is near the centre of Holfried - Ledger Domain nonetheless struggled through lean times during the Druj occupation. Manufacturers and binders of books and parchments, they were particularly known for fine quality illustrations and delicate gilding - as well as for using only the best quality paper. They survived the siege primarily by selling their wares to the University, but now they are looking for new markets - their work has always been particularly popular with the Reckoner guilds of the south.

The Revelry

Military Unit / Rank 2

Previously, these hard-bitten ex-bandits served under the self-styled bandit warlord of Misericorde, Graffler, who was slain by heroes of the Empire some time in 377YE. With the demise of their leader, the group was riven by internal squabbling and forced deeper into the forests by the retreating Druj. They spent two years fighting a guerilla war against the orcs, and now a group of them have decided to give up banditry and turn themselves in for clemency. Comprised of many of the more level-headed and practical bandits, they now have their official reprieve and form an effective military unit ready to fight for the Empire - provided an appropriate captain can be found who has the chutzpah to keep their baser tendencies in line.

Doctor Ventner's Greenhouse

Herb Garden / Rank 3

Production: 6 doses of true vervain, 2 doses of cerulean mazzarine, 2 doses of bladeroot, 4 doses of Imperial roseweald and 4 doses of marrowort.

Amongst the recent casualties of the war was the late Doctor Ventner, who even at the height of the conflict insisted on frequent trips to the Morass to gather ingredients for potions and poultices to treat the wounded. His remarkable greenhouse, for him by a grateful architect patient, still stands in eastern Holfried. Despite being built of hundreds of panes of glass, it has survived more-or-less intact for thirty years despite being dangerously close to the walls and the bombardment of Druj siege weaponry. Now it is vacant, and urgently needs a skilled horticulturalist to take it over and preserve the many wonderful medicinal plants within.

Opportunities

The Great Pits of Ennerlund

Not actually a spoil of war, but worth mentioning: the Great Pits of Ennerlund were a fine mithril mine. At their height, they were one of the richest sources of mithril in the Empire. work has begun to rebuild them after they were devastated by the Druj in Winter 378YE. Once work is complete, the Imperial Senate will make the decision about whether to allocate them as an Imperial resource once again, or to make them a National resource controlled by the League.

The Towerjacks

Until thirty years ago, the Towerjacks of Holberg were the second League army alongside the Wolves of War. When the territory fell, they chose to dedicate themselves to the protection of the city and its remaining citizens. With the Druj in retreat, and the liberation of the entirety of Holberg looking certain, their officers are believed to have entered negotiations regarding their return to active duty. As befits an army that has traditionally drawn many of its leaders from the westernmost of the League cities, the Towerjacks are well versed in all forms of siege warfare. To bring the Towerjacks back up to full strength would require 125 wains of Mithril, take 6 months and require a motion before the Imperial Senate. The Towerjacks officers have quietly let it be known that if they have not been recommissioned by the end of the Autumn Equinox 379YE, it is likely that they will seek employment elsewhere.

The Druj Legacy

The full extent of the Druj damage to the territory of Holberg has yet to be determined. One obvious concern is that the Druj employed powerful Spring magic in their subjugation of the territory, leading to widespread disease and the destruction of the levees around the Morass in the south. Indeed, thanks to their parting shot the trees of the northern forest and the southern marshes alike have been possessed with a malign awareness and are actively attacking armies and structures alike. Most settlements outside Holfried itself have been destroyed - and the suburbs of Holmauer have been absolutely levelled. Regardless of the outcome of the liberation it may be years or even decades before Holberg is back on its feet.

Holberg Wine

Holberg Wine Lyrics by Jake Wilson Music and recording by Chris and Harriett Robins Kennish

Holberg wine - Dark as mountain skies, Holberg wine - Stains the skin where it touches, Holberg wine - Wets the earth where it falls, Holberg wine - Soaks into the ashes.

(Chorus) The shadows of Winter, Must harden the fruits, To wait for the morning, Of Spring's bright new shoots.

Heady wine - So sweet to the taste, Heady wine - May fall from the cup, Heady wine - As it darkens the lips, Heady wine - Dark rivers run over.

(Chorus)

Did you see the smoke from the vines? Hear the roar as they came? From the flames, from the foe. To the walls, to the city, Behind the gates, And a life hard as steel.

(Chorus)

City gates - High mountain walls, City gates - Keep your weapons together, City gates - And your loved ones close, City gates - Mud turned by hard boots.

(Chorus)

Holberg wine - Dark mountain halls, Holberg wine - Nothing grows but Courage, Holberg wine - Where the land has been burned, Holberg wine - To the deep, thirsty roots.

On the edge of the reclaimed the Morass lies the Kröger, an orchard farmstead bounded by the swamp to the south and west and by great wooden barricades to the north and east well-known for the variety and piquancy of its pear harvest. The hardy inhabitants held out against Druj incursions partly through stubbornness, partly by making themselves too much trouble to capture, and partly due to being on a defensive position on a peninsula sticking out into the treacherous marshes. While they have largely been able to maintain their levees, they are beginning to lose the southern edge of their land to the encroaching marshland. Like many of the surviving Holberg natives, the Krögers are looking for a partnership to help sell their produce and preserve their legacy.

Business / Rank 2

While their modest business was never directly threatened by the orcs - being sited as it is near the centre of Holfried - Ledger Domain nonetheless struggled through lean times during the Druj occupation. Manufacturers and binders of books and parchments, they were particularly known for fine quality illustrations and delicate gilding - as well as for using only the best quality paper. They survived the siege primarily by selling their wares to the University, but now they are looking for new markets - their work has always been particularly popular with the Reckoner guilds of the south.

Military Unit / Rank 2

Previously, these hard-bitten ex-bandits served under the self-styled bandit warlord of Misericorde, Graffler, who was slain by heroes of the Empire some time in 377YE. With the demise of their leader, the group was riven by internal squabbling and forced deeper into the forests by the retreating Druj. They spent two years fighting a guerilla war against the orcs, and now a group of them have decided to give up banditry and turn themselves in for clemency. Comprised of many of the more level-headed and practical bandits, they now have their official reprieve and form an effective military unit ready to fight for the Empire - provided an appropriate captain can be found who has the chutzpah to keep their baser tendencies in line.

Doctor Ventner's Greenhouse

Production: 6 doses of true vervain, 2 doses of cerulean mazzarine, 2 doses of bladeroot, 4 doses of Imperial roseweald and 4 doses of marrowort.

Amongst the recent casualties of the war was the late Doctor Ventner, who even at the height of the conflict insisted on frequent trips to the Morass to gather ingredients for potions and poultices to treat the wounded. His remarkable greenhouse, for him by a grateful architect patient, still stands in eastern Holfried. Despite being built of hundreds of panes of glass, it has survived more-or-less intact for thirty years despite being dangerously close to the walls and the bombardment of Druj siege weaponry. Now it is vacant, and urgently needs a skilled horticulturalist to take it over and preserve the many wonderful medicinal plants within.

Opportunities

The Great Pits of Ennerlund

Not actually a spoil of war, but worth mentioning: the Great Pits of Ennerlund were a fine mithril mine. At their height, they were one of the richest sources of mithril in the Empire. work has begun to rebuild them after they were devastated by the Druj in Winter 378YE. Once work is complete, the Imperial Senate will make the decision about whether to allocate them as an Imperial resource once again, or to make them a National resource controlled by the League.

The Towerjacks

Until thirty years ago, the Towerjacks of Holberg were the second League army alongside the Wolves of War. When the territory fell, they chose to dedicate themselves to the protection of the city and its remaining citizens. With the Druj in retreat, and the liberation of the entirety of Holberg looking certain, their officers are believed to have entered negotiations regarding their return to active duty. As befits an army that has traditionally drawn many of its leaders from the westernmost of the League cities, the Towerjacks are well versed in all forms of siege warfare. To bring the Towerjacks back up to full strength would require 125 wains of Mithril, take 6 months and require a motion before the Imperial Senate. The Towerjacks officers have quietly let it be known that if they have not been recommissioned by the end of the Autumn Equinox 379YE, it is likely that they will seek employment elsewhere.

The Druj Legacy

The full extent of the Druj damage to the territory of Holberg has yet to be determined. One obvious concern is that the Druj employed powerful Spring magic in their subjugation of the territory, leading to widespread disease and the destruction of the levees around the Morass in the south. Indeed, thanks to their parting shot the trees of the northern forest and the southern marshes alike have been possessed with a malign awareness and are actively attacking armies and structures alike. Most settlements outside Holfried itself have been destroyed - and the suburbs of Holmauer have been absolutely levelled. Regardless of the outcome of the liberation it may be years or even decades before Holberg is back on its feet.

Hold Back Frozen Hunger

Rules

Winter Magnitude 14

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. The area to be enchanted with this ward must be clearly apparent to those within, and without, its bounds.

This spell is an enchantment. A target may only be under one enchantment effect at a time.

Effects

This ritual targets a building or well defined, walled area. It must be performed inside that location.

At the completion, the area is warded against undead creatures. An undead creature approaching the boundary is always aware that the area is warded; if it enters it is immediately weakened for as long as they remain in the area. Even undead creatures that are larger-than-human-sized will be weakened by the power of the ward if they enter it.

When used inside a building, the ward protects the entire structure. Any openings in the structure - doors and windows especially - must be clearly marked with runes or symbols of warding. The building must be a reasonably permanent structure, preferably of wood or stone; the ritual will not work on a tent or other entirely similar structure.

For purposes of this ritual, a walled area must be composed of solid posts, preferably wooden. Posts should be placed at least three paces, and at most five paces, apart and protrude out of the ground at least three feet. The posts should be clearly visible, and ideally clearly marked as 'special' - carved or painted with runes for example.

As with anything you might be taking onto a battlefield, or that is likely to have people fighting around or near it, the phys-reps should be as safe as possible (no sharpened points, for example). Please do not tie rope between the posts; if it is not clear where the boundary is, you will need to use more posts.

The ward can be taken down by moving, removing or defacing the warding signs, but undead cannot do so themselves. Assuming it is not interfered with, the ward stays in place until the duration expires.

If undisturbed, the ward remains until the next sunrise.

Description

This is a powerful ritual that keeps undead or unliving creatures such as husks, wights, wraiths, restless spirits at bay or weakens them if they enter the warded area. Husks and other weak undead will usually hesitate before entering the area; the more powerful the undead creature is, the more it has to lose and the less likely it is to enter the ward if it has any choice. There are stories that suggest that the ward has had some success at keeping some other unnatural creatures at bay; specifically those that are unliving, rather than undead - volodny and the grim warriors of the legion of the eternal Kaela are both said to be weakened by this ward, as are some sovereigns. Not many experiments have been done - in the words of the itinerant vollhov Pakaanan "The time to experiment with this kind of thing is when there is an angry sovereign in your village, slaughtering your warriors; if you try to find out earlier, there's a good chance that your experiments will end with an angry sovereign in your village, slaughtering your warriors."

In parts of Varushka, and with some places near the Highborn Necropolis it is common practice to have warding runes carved or painted above the doors and windows of a house, or on fence posts set up to surround a shrine, church, hall or similar structure. Then, should undead enemies threaten, those unable to fight flee to the safe location, which is then warded through the reasonably quick ritual. The alternative - to create the ward afresh each morning - would quickly deplete the mana reserves of an entire coven without useful effect, and leave everyone vulnerable should undead creatures attack.

Common Elements

The most common runes to use with this ritual are the Wintermark runes Yoorn and Kyrop and the common tower symbol associated with Vigilance. In Varushka these wards are often supplemented with staring humanoid faces or the heads of geese, while in Wintermark bird-heads are common on the top of any warding poles. In The Marches the warding symbols often include stylised figures of guardians, or straw poppets- sometimes with small daggers, needles or shields bound to their limbs. Highborn ritualists usually ensure there is a bell to hand, and bells are rung throughout the warding ritual itself - not least because they serve to warn the community that there is danger.

When performing the ritual, the ritualists often walk the boundaries of the warded area, invoking protection. They often burn incense, or scatter ashes, and check that all the warding symbols are intact. Some ritualists place bowls of fresh- or salt-water at each entry point. Fire is often used as well, especially when the ritual is performed at night.

Honesty

Overview

The idea of the honest life is held up as the ideal by those who cling to the oldest and most important Freeborn traditions. Legends claim that the three sisters left Highguard because they were frustrated by the hypocrisy of the Patricians, and so they swore to lead an honest life, speaking their minds openly without a care for politeness or subtlety. Those that traveled with them took up the vow; the name of the Brass Coast derives from this tradition, not the people who found it. It is literally the brazen coast, a land where the people strive to live their lives boldly and without guilt.

The sisters understood that the path of honesty is hard, so they encouraged those who joined them to see honesty as an ideal to aspire to, as something to achieve, rather than a state from which one might fall. Mendacious freeborn merchants who use their lies to trick others damage the reputation of the Brass Coast for honest dealing - they are dealt with harshly because the price of their deceit is paid by other Freeborn merchants. But no Freeborn expects to live every moment of their life in a state of grace, rather they see honesty as a goal that they should constantly aspire to, in everything they do.

In the Brass Coast, the ideal of honesty is not about discretion; the lack of lies that comes from omitting the truth is exactly the kind of hypocrisy that receives wide disdain in the Brass Coast. The sisters taught everyone to believe that it is precisely because real honesty is hard to achieve that everyone should strive to accomplish it openly and without shame. Hence comes the reputation for being brazen, for being shameless about your dealings, the goal is to be bold and forthright and unashamed of your actions. The Freeborn are "direct, notoriously frank and gloriously unabashed".

Fairness

The Freeborn ideal of honesty should not be confused with "generosity" or "fairness". Freeborn merchants are expected to be honest, to represent their goods truthfully and to be faithful in their dealings with others. Many Freeborn scoff at the very idea of a "fair price" for things and point out that it is hard enough to be scrupulously honest without having to also strive to be "fair". Crucially honesty is an internal thing - every individual knows in their own soul if they spoke honestly and truthfully or not; but the idea of "fairness" is something dictated by others, it is not something any individual can know for themselves.

In fact many Freeborn merchants cheerfully reject any idea of a fair price. Freeborn scholars argue that those who talk of "fair" prices are actually trying to use shame to force the Freeborn to act against their own best interests. If the goods belong to you, then they are yours to sell, the only fair price is the one you choose to sell them at. But a powerful bargaining tool is argue that some higher authority exists that can dictate the true or fair price for something - and thus shame the merchant into lowering their prices to those that the customer demands. A key part of the Freeborn reputation for brazenness is their willingness to demand prices for their goods which are above this imagined "fair" price and to refuse to be shamed for doing so.

Did I charge him a fair price for the mithril Cardinal? That was a very long speech but I think was your only real question wasn't it?

Well I sincerely hope I did not sell him the mithril for a fair price!

I've no idea who should set this "fair" price of which you speak. Is it this august body? Have the Council of Nine given up advising our souls and taken up commerce instead? Perhaps all the merchants of the Empire should inquire of the Throne that we might know what the "fair" price to sell our goods should be. Can the Highborn magisters call up the soul of some long dead paragon to inform us? Or will our good civil service now issue us with tables of acceptable prices to charge? Who? Who will set your fair price?

What I charge Cardinal is an honest price - I make no bones of the profits I make, because I am not ashamed of them. And the current price is ten thrones a wain to any who asks. Well unless you are a member of this Inquisition... in which case the price for mithril is now twelve thrones a wain. And honestly?... that's because you've all wasted my time and I find you manipulative and self-serving.

Now if this body is quite finished, some of us have to work for a living. Joachim i Flaya i Riqueza, Master of the Brilliant Star

- 1 Overview
- 2 Fairness
- 3 Respect
- 4 Honesty In Play

Respect

No-one in the Brass Coast cares about the white lies you tell the friends you like. The Freeborn ideal of honesty is about yourself and who you are - it's not about other people. If the customer you are haggling with tells you he has a starving family to support he is trying to manipulate you to get you to lower your prices... you can laugh in his face and tell him the price is unchanged. If they try to shame your senator on the enormous payments you took from the League to vote for their motion on a huge bridge to Holberg, laugh and tell them about the beautiful villa you plan to spend the money on. The essence of Freeborn honesty is about being bold and brazen about the things you do - it's not about other people. If someone asks you if their new trousers make their bum look fat, you can answer that question without having to look. Freeborn honesty is about laughing in the face of your peers when they try to shame you, it's not about trying to shame others.

Honesty In Play

Honesty is a clear handicap in a political game in which lots of your rivals will cheerfully lie to your face. One of the reasons to play the Brass Coast is because you find the idea of playing a character who is handicapped in this way appealing. Lying to people all the time is incredibly easy and live roleplaying games are no fun at all if they are too easy. By striving to be honest you can play the game on hard mode and have more fun!

But there are two ways that you can turn honesty into an advantage in play. The first is by rigorously policing your nation to punish those who seek to gain through duplicity. A reputation for probity is an advantage in business because it creates trust. People fear being over-charged, but not as much as they fear being robbed or cheated. If the Brass Coast is able to generate a reputation for honest dealings with each other and with characters from other nations then the benefits are small but tangible. Characters (not just merchants) who cheat those they deal with, selling them false goods, renegeing on deals they have agreed, or the like damage the reputation of the whole nation, so be vigilant for anyone who is seeking to profit by squandering the honest reputation that the nation has generated and deal with them harshly.

Honesty can be a big advantage in another way - by giving you a core of resilience to resist the attempts of other characters in the game who will try to convince you that what you are doing is morally wrong. In Empire, like any social setting, people's actions are often curtailed by the risk of disapproval of those around them. Imperial citizens will tell you that it's wrong to sell your goods for a big profit, that it's wrong to take bribes, wrong to blackmail or bribe your rivals, etc. By enforcing their own ideals on your character, they force you to act the way they want you to... which you will find is often to the detriment of your character and your game.

The secret of life is honesty and fair dealing. If you can fake that, you've got it made.

Groucho Marx

To be Freeborn is to glory in shamelessness - to laugh in the face of those who try to shame you into doing what they want. It takes some confidence to brazen out your actions in the face of the criticism of others, but if you strive to achieve that as part of your character goals then it can help your character get ahead and help you have more fun at the event.

Hood

Hoods are a staple of Marcher headwear. They are best made out of wool, or leather for beaters in particular. Hoods are a very variable garment with dozens of options for length, colour and decoration, meaning a hood can be a simple or fancy as you like.

Hordalant

Overview

Hordalant is a Jotun territory that lies to the west of Bregasland and Liathaven. Its climate is comparable to that of Bregasland and Upwold - there are cold winds and heavy snows during the Winter, but Summers are comparatively warm and pleasant. The Jotun appear largely unfazed by the weather except when it is at its most violent.

The population is overwhelmingly Jotun orc, and there while the majority of those living here are thralls there are many warriors to protect them. The northern borders of the territory open onto the Gullet – the sea between the kingdoms of southern Narkyst and northern Kalsea, on whose shores the town of Meade also stands. To the south lies further Jotun territory. There are many Jotun settlements here. They tend to be reasonably fortified with palisades and low stone walls. Many of the larger settlements here appear to be concerned with trade or agriculture.

Hordalant is relatively rich. There is a great deal of mineral wealth in the Ash Mountains, and the fields of Kalmar, Alsterbo, and Sigla provide a great deal of both grain and meat to the jarls of Álftanes and Alsterbo. The land is worked exclusively by thralls, overseen by scattered halls belonging to favoured Jotun warriors loyal to their respective jarls. The Kings' Road and the South Road see a great deal of traffic – including great heavily guarded caravans transporting mithril south from Kierheim and white granite north from the Jotun to the south. Exports see wagonloads of grain, ore, and crates of green iron, orichalcum, and tempest jade transported north and south – indeed a great deal of the grain raised here is exported, with many local thralls living on steady diets of fish (which is harder to transport).

Guðmundur Arason, King of Narkyst, He Who Calls Himself Jarl-of-Jarls, Who is Chieftain of the Southern Tribes technically rules here but in practice he does so as “first among equals” - the powerful Jarls of Álftanes and Alsterbo wield the majority of political power here.

During the reign of Emperor Guntherm, Imperial forces seized parts of eastern Hordalant. They claimed the marshes of Blutgahn and the plains of Ashahon. For several years adventurous Marcher settlers attempted to carve out homesteads here under the watchful eye of Imperial forces and the fortification of the Nail in Ashahon. The occupation did not last - when the famous ceasefire with the Jotun ended in 248YE, the would-be settlers retreated back into Bregasland and the Jotun ultimately captured the Nail.

Recent History

In Spring 379YE a spy network was commissioned by the Imperial Senate in Hordalant, but it was not until the Winter of 379YE that a significant force of Imperial scouts was assigned to cautiously explore this prosperous Jotun territory. The Wintermark scouts (assisted by Navarr explorers) were able to prepare a map of the territory including some details of the main settlements, but the information they uncovered during the particularly harsh

The Marcher armies headed down the southern coast of the Gullet, into Narkyst, and made a spirited attempt to capture the territory named Hordalant on the border of Bregasland; they successfully overran the marshes of Blutgahn and the plains of Ashahon but were incapable of making further progress.

These actions enabled the Empire to recapture a great many prisoners taken from Wintermark and the Marches during the recent Jotun invasion, but there is plenty of evidence that efforts to liberate the humans of Kalsea and Narkyst did not go so well.

The local thralls were found to be almost fanatically loyal to their Jotun masters, and slowed the advance and capture of Jotun territory; those that had taken up the offer of citizenship were convicted of treason in unprecedented numbers, and the local population was essentially wiped out in Imperial-controlled regions, being replaced by settlers from Wintermark and the Marches respectively.

winter of 379YE was patchy at best. The details of this exploratory force can be found on the Imperial Roll of Honour.

Hordalant has been invaded by

Imperial forces on more than one occasion - the most recent, and [most successful, [invasion took place during the reign of Emperor Guntherm. A more recent attempted invasion took place in Summer 381YE. The Black Thorns under general Ulric Y'Basden evaded a Jotun trap in Liathaven by crossing the border to the west; their short-lived attempt at conquest was handily repulsed by the orcs.

While this offensive was being undertaken, the rest of the Imperial armies were engaged with the Thule in Miekarova and Volodmartz - indeed, there was some considerable unrest that Guntherm and those loyal to him were engaging in military adventures along the coast of the Gullet when long-held Imperial territories were endangered. The [[Campaigns of Emperor Guntherm]]

After the Summer Solstice 381YE, significant Imperial forces were assigned to the spy network in Hordalant. Primarily from Wintermark, with the aid of a few courageous Imperial Orcs, they were able to significantly update information about the territory, as well as providing an improved map and key information about the major Jotun forces camped in the territory. The identity of these captains is recorded on the Imperial Roll of Honour.

Major Features

So far Imperial scouts have not identified many sites of major significance in the territory, but this is likely to be due to the small number of scouts rather than the lack of such sites in Hordalant.

The Kings' Road and the South Road

To the surprise of many, the territory of Hordalant has a well-built network of roads that connect the major settlements. The roads themselves are patrolled by Jotun warriors, and maintained by cadres of thralls. While not comparable to the roads of Varushka (and showing no signs of magical wards) they are wide, paved, and supplemented in several places by stone bridges.

The Kongegǫr

The Kongegǫr, stretches from Alsterbo to Kierheim where the Gullet is at its narrowest. Known to the sailors of Wintermark and the Marches as a treacherous area of shifting islands and dangerous rocks, the Jotun have a slightly different perspective. The thralls of Dalvi maintain a series of hidden routes north across the causeway, allowing Jotun armies to travel by land from Alsterbo to Kierheim and vice versa. An army that controls Alsterbo or Kierheim can effectively cross to the other side of the Gullet without the assistance of a navy, and can block the ability of enemy armies to cross should they so wish.

The Palaces of the Eternals

The Summer Palace, the Hawk Eyrie, and the Fortress of the Pale Queen are of great interest. The Fortress is a significant fortification that controls the heart of the territory, but along with the Palace and the Eyrie represents a type of construction the Empire is unfamiliar with. They seem to serve as embassies to the eternals of the Summer realm. Jotun magicians – but not exclusively magicians – deal directly with representatives of the eternal the embassy is dedicated to, in much the same way that an Imperial ambassador might deal with a foreign nation.

The White Shore

South of Foss, in Kalmar, is found the White Shore. It is not clear how much the salt flats here have been artificially expanded, but Imperial scouts report an area of very shallow water where carefully constructed traps capture seawater and expose it to the sun. As the water evaporates, great chunks of salt are formed. The salt is farmed by thralls, packed into barrels, and exported across Hordalant and beyond. The salt seems to be considered a luxury item – and a particular source of wealth for the Jarl of Álftanes.

Regions of Hordalant

Hordalant is broken up into seven regions.

Blutgahn

Quality: Marsh

A large marshy area on the east of Narkyst, it is largely uninhabited (at least by the Jotun, who appear to give it a wide berth) - but there are signs of a significant Feni population dwelling within, mostly clustered around the mouth of the two rivers, the small Hjatter and the much larger Volg estuary. The Feni are not interested in receiving visitors - Wintermark forces are warned off but the Feni appear more than prepared to take pot shots at any scouts they identify, especially if they are Navarr.

Alsterbo

Quality: Coastal

The deep dangerous marshes of Blutgahn give way to more open and accessible fens, with significant dykes built to drain the land and keep the sea out. On the other side of the King's Road the land is dryer still - a result of over a century of work to drain and protect it. Here the land is completely given over to farmland. The King's Road leads to Dalvi on the coast, a large port ruled over by the Jarl of Alsterbo. Dalvi is heavily fortified, defended against attack from both land and sea. (OOO Information: In game terms it is a rank one fortification). The less prosperous rival port of Raufarhöfn lies on the western side of the promontory, but is notable for the inclusion of a large Grendel embassy.

Kalmar

Quality: Coastal

The open fields of Alsterbo continue into the rich prosperous region of Kalmar. To the south begins the Forest of the Mures, a dense forest of tall dark pines. The King's Road runs along the border of the forest as it heads west into Ashahon. The busy trading town of Álftanes lies at the junction between the King's Road and the South Road - the prosperous settlement is the seat of the Jarl of Álftanes. The jarl's rule extends to the coastal settlements of Bjark and Foss where predominantly human thralls engage in extensive fishing. They harvest fish not only from the coast, but also brave deeper waters to bring back tuna and whale meat. South of Foss lies the White Shore, believed to be a significant part of the wealth of the Jarl of Álftanes.

Ashahon

Quality: Hill

This crucial region at the centre of the territory is largely filled by the Ash Mountains, a line of tall grey mountains that runs north-south through the territory. The Kings Road goes through Ashahon, passing through the Fortress of the Pale Queen which guards the pass as well as serving as the most important Kirkja of the Skjaldir. The name of the fortification refers to the legend that Cathan Canae took Skjaldir, the Jotun faðir of the Skjaldir as a shield bearer and lover. Spies report seeing several creatures that are clearly not Jotun orcs around the fortress – servants and heralds of Cathan Canae.

Imperial scouts report that it would be challenging to pass from Ashahon into Kalmar without first conquering or destroying the Fortress of the Pale Queen. With the peaks of Angfors being quite inaccessible, an Imperial force would otherwise need to skirt round the hills and mountains and pass through Alsterbo to reach Kalmar. (OOO Note: The Fortress of the Pale Queen is a rank 2 fortification).

Sigla

Quality: Forest

A large region, dominated by the Forest of the Mures that dominates most of Sigla. There is significant forest clearance along the South Road - with small settlements surrounded by farmland on either side - all the way down to the town of Sig near the southern border of Narkyst.

Along the eastern borders of Sigla, where the forest gives way to the Ash mountains, stands the Lion Palace – a large stone fort built as a residence for Eleonaris, the Lion of Summer. The building seems to serve a ceremonial function but according to Imperial scouts it is built around a potent Summer regio, and appears to be inhabited by both Jotun orcs and a small court of heralds of the Lion of Summer – something like an embassy to Eleonaris.

Angfors

Quality: Hills, Impassable A hilly, mountainous region defined by the border between the Ash Mountains and Forest of Mures in the West to the line between the mountains and the Dead Forest in the east. There are few settlements in the east, only the Hawk Eyrie – a tall and imposing tower of mithril and white granite built for the Hawk Lord Hayaak. As with the Lion Palace, it seems that the structure serves as a kind of embassy between the Jotun and the Summer eternal.

The western side is dominated by the mining towns of Geets, Flud, and Hekla. Each of the three mining towns supports several deep and apparently quite prosperous mining endeavours, cutting deep into the depths of the mountains, and providing a steady stream of green iron, orichalcum, and tempest jade to the Jarl of Álfanes.

There appears to be no easily accessible passes through the Ash mountains here; an Imperial army would struggle to pass through Angfors to attack the settlements on the western side, or to reach Sigla or Kalmar without going through the pass in Ashahon controlled by the Fortress of the Pale Queen.

Vallorberg

Quality: Forest

A largely uninhabited region under the grip of the Dead Forest, the Jotun name for the massive forest that covers Liathaven and beyond. Some of the forest here has been cut down - and the land cleared for farming - focussed around the two rivers, the Hellis in the north and the Volg in the south.

At the point where the two rivers meet, there is the great Green Iron Eye, a set of metal monoliths arranged in the shape of an iris. According to legend it was created by Jarnsmidr, the greatest of the Jotun smiths, to ward against "the evils of the East". What its purpose is (if any), Imperial scouts are unable to say, but it appears to be built over and around a potent Winter regio.

Jotun Forces (Autumn 381YE)

During the Summer Solstice 381YE, there were six orc armies in Hordalant. Camped all around the territory, for the most part they had set up their own encampments, greatly swelling the populations of Alsterbo, Kalmar, Sigla, and Ashahon. This information has been gleaned from the extensive spy reports and is presented here as an example of how the Jotun armies operate when they are in friendly territory. it is correct as of the beginning of the Autumn Equinox 381YE.

Lion of the North

Quality: Clever

The Lion of the North were primarily camped as guests of the Jarl of Alsterbo. They are an army that seems to make great use of specialised groups of fighting orcs. They travel with many more thralls than similar Jotun armies – thralls known for their craftiness. Their leader is Yrsa Jansdottir, Queen of the North – the actual Queen of Kalsea, She Who Calls Herself Jarl-of-Jarls, Who is Chieftan of the Northern Tribes.

While the bulk of the army was resting at Alsterbo, large numbers of scouts were active throughout Hordalant. Bands of Jotun supported by cunning thralls were actively searching the territory for signs of enemy influence. This was extremely bad news – there were several engagements between warriors of the Lion of the North and scouts attached to the Spy Network. It is extremely likely that the Jotun scouts discovered the Hordalant spy network by the end of this season's campaigning.

Skjaldirborn

Quality: Untiring

The immense host of the Skjaldirborn were camped in the eastern hills of Ashahon, below the Fortress of the White Queen. Their leader was reported to be the relatively inexperienced Jorgen Hyllasson, successor to Hylas Viersdottir who was killed in the Mournwold.

The Hierro

Quality: Defensive

The great Hierro orcs were camped in Kalmar. The Jotun seemed to have embraced them entirely – their service in the Mournwold appears to have dispelled any suspicion. Their leader is currently Eahgoh Blackhammer. Imperial scouts reported that they appear to be taking every opportunity to share their understanding of the Seven Virtues with the Jotun of Kalmar, although what progress (if any) they are making is not clear.

Roaring Thunder

Quality: Heroic

The Roaring Thunder were camped in Sigla under the command of Kyrac Gerdasdóttir. They are a northern army out of Kalsea. They have many musicians among their number, and are known by reputation to be extremely tenacious – once committed they are very hard to call back. Their leader is apparently quite ambitious, and apparently covets the throne of Kalsea

Howling Night

Quality: Furious

The Howling Night were camped in Vallorberg. They are a rough army, with a great many Ulvenwar among them. They wear the skins of the first beast they slew unaided, and have a reputation for being mystics. Their leader is called the Dire Prince, and they have a significant number of ghodi and shamans among them.

Iron Host

Quality: Challenger The Iron Host are camped in Sigla, and are apparently a comparatively new army. They appear to be an army composed of warriors of several lesser clans of southern Jotun, eager to prove themselves. They are allegedly favoured by a "Great Power" the Jotun call "The Lame Jarl" - almost certainly the eternal Barien.

Game Information

- While Jotun presence in some regions is limited, they still appear control all seven regions of Hordalant and seem to have to have uncontested dominance of the territory.
- Information about Hordalant is discovered through the use of a spy network. This information was last significantly updated after the Autumn Equinox 381YE.
- The fortified port-town of Dalvi in Alsterbo is a rank one fortification.
- The Fortress of the Pale Queen in Ashahon is a rank two fortification. It would be very challenging for invaders to pass between Ashahon to Kalmar without first neutralizing this fortification, There appears to be no easily accessible passes through the Ash mountains; an Imperial army would struggle to pass through Angfors to attack the settlements on the western side, or to reach Sigla or Kalmar without going through the pass in Ashahon controlled by the Fortress of the Pale Queen.
- The Kongegór is a causeway that appears to allow armies to cross the Gullet without needing the assistance of a navy. Precisely how it works is not certain at this time,

Horizon's Razor Edge

Rules

Day Magnitude 3

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets a character, who must be present throughout.

This spell is an enchantment. A target may only be under one enchantment effect at a time.

Effects

The target may call CLEAVE once each day with any melee weapon except a pike.

While under the enchantment the target experiences a roleplaying effect: you feel focused and ready, you are on the lookout for an opportunity to act decisively, achieving your goals with as little unnecessary effort as possible.

The effect lasts until the start of the next Profound Decisions Empire event.

Additional Targets

This ritual can affect additional characters from the same banner. Every two additional characters increases the magnitude by 5. Additional characters must be present throughout.

Description

With the power of this ritual, a warrior is granted clarity of purpose, empowered to strike a single decisive blow that can cripple a limb or render a lightly- or unarmoured opponent incapacitated with one swift strike. It is also known as Strike of Running Water among the Navarr who make good use of it with spear-and-shield fighting style, and as The Sentinel's Poise in parts of Urizen.

This enchantment provides similar power to that granted by Swan's Cruel Wing, a Summer ritual. When the ritual was entered into Imperial lore by the Dean of the Lyceum in 96YE there was some criticism - that there was little value in duplicating the power of Swan's Cruel Wing. At the time, the counterargument was made that while Summer magicians may excel at combative magic, their realm is not the only one that sees virtue in magic that allows warriors to strike decisive blows, and not every coven is trained in the lore of Summer.

Common Elements

This ritual usually involves both the target and their armoury. A ritualist might trace matching runes on weapons and warrior, or might encourage them to run through a weapon-drill. Some magicians encourage the targets to remain absolutely still, sometimes in an uncomfortable martial pose, until the climax of the ritual when they explode into action with a single dramatic strike. A toast of fresh water or fruit juice is often drunk, especially when the ritual is performed on a band of warriors rather than a single target. Legendary warriors, especially those who fought only when necessary, are often invoked as are Paragons and Exemplars who showed great patience

Any of the Day runes might be evoked. Cavul, the rune of clarity and Aesh, the rune of thought, are commonly marked on the weapon and the wielder respectively. An evocation of The Key may be appropriate with this ritual, as might evocations of creatures such as mantids or birds.

Horn Resounding

Description

A Horn Resounding allows a priest to use a musical performance to draw on the power of the consecration of Pride to inspire their audience. Listeners are filled with a profound sense of self-esteem, their inner strength revitalised and empowered to face the challenges that are to come. The power of the magical musical instrument itself is only part of the process that brings about this spiritual experience - the performance itself helps connect the spirit of the audience with the power of the potent consecrated aura.

These items often take the form of a brass instrument - horns or trumpet especially - although any musical instrument is appropriate. The metal used to create them is infused with orichalcum and polished with tempest jade with dragonbone decorations or keys. A more traditional artisan may make the instrument from the horn of a mighty beast, inlaid with dragonbone and with an orichalcum mouthpiece. In Wintermark, Pride is represented by Feresh, and this rune is often worked into the decoration of the instrument.

The loud, resounding tones a musician coaxes from these powerful instruments stirs the heart of the audience, filling them with pride and confidence. Often, a priest will intersperse their performance with short readings or recitations of poetry specifically chosen to inspire their audience - tales of Paragons and Exemplars are common but as an instrument of Pride it is just as effective to evoke the names of cultural heroes and the work of beloved poets. A Horn Resounding is often employed by soldiers to greet the dawn and the dusk, and to sound the mournful dirge at a warrior's funeral. In Wintermark and Highguard particularly there is a belief that notes played on this instrument at twilight are audible to the dead; a reminder of what they gave their lives for and an assurance that their deeds are never forgotten.

As with many religious magic items, it is common for a Horn Resounding to be hallowed. A popular choice is the Hallowing of Lepidus, which inspires the bearer to inspire others, or the Hallowing of Richilde which inspires the bearer to strive to create beautiful music.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of any kind of musical instrument.
- Requirement: You must have the dedication skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: You must be dedicated to Pride to use this item. Once per day, while you are in an area consecrated to Pride, you may spend ten minutes of appropriate roleplaying that includes playing this musical instrument. Any listener who was in the area for the entire period recovers all hero points. You cannot use this ability if you are on a battlefield or in a similar stressful environment. A listener who has lost the ability to recover hero points overnight is not effected by this power.
- Materials: Crafting a Horn Resounding requires 7 ingots of orichalcum, 9 ingots of tempest jade, and 5 measures of dragonbone. It takes 1 month to make one of these items.

Horses

The Highborn fleet carried with them a great herd of horses. These fabulous beasts embodied Loyalty and the noble virtues of strength and dignity. Mounted on their mighty warhorses, the Highborn were unbeaten in battle while swift messengers allowed distant settlements to remain in contact with one another and fostered a sense of community and unity. They were the emblem of the fiery spirit of adventure and strength that made the Highborn unconquerable – companions but never servants, allies but never subjects.

Such a great asset, however, commanded a tremendous price, and eventually the sacred bond of person and horse was corrupted by economics. A single gelded male when traded could sell for more than its weight in gold and gems, a market that was hard for the corrupted Patrician Council to refuse. Several patrician families grew rich and powerful through trading horses, and through careful business practice and astute management of market forces created a near-monopoly on horse-trading within the kingdom.

Short-sighted self interest, and poor husbandry brought tragedy. Through over-selling and over-gelding, the population of Highborn steeds dwindled and their vigour and fiery spirit diminished through in-breeding. The orcs, perhaps sensing that their much feared enemies were mortal after all, embarked on a vicious raiding campaign to murder as many horses as possible, which exacerbated an already growing problem.

All of this might have been overcome, however, but the horses themselves were wasting away. Once comrades-in-arms and brother warriors, their status had been reduced to that of military assets and livestock, too much for their proud spirits to bear. Even after the power of the patricians was broken the damage was done and all attempts to restore them were in vain. The last horses perished in the early years of the Empire, the last few broken relics and curiosities of a once magnificent species. History tells that they died of grief, their spirits destroyed by the exploitation of greedy men and women who should have protected them as a sacred charge.

The loss of the horses during the early years of the Empire was a huge loss to Highguard, and one from which the Highborn took many years to recover. To this day the phrase “horse-trading” remains a powerful insult. In honour of their lost steeds, and as reminder of the lesson learned, they preserve the image of the horse as a powerful symbol of nobility and pride, and a sobering reminder of the perils of taking blessings for granted.

Pegasus

A common image in heraldry, and in fanciful tales, is that of the winged horse. Indeed, there are still suits of horse barding in Highguard with decorative wings attached that protected the legs of the rider from attackers on the ground. The winged horse itself, however, is a creation of legend and mythology - while horses were swift, they did not fly and it is unlikely one would ever be able to fly in the manner the pegasus is depicted. Rather, the pegasus is a heraldic symbol of speed, grace, and pride - even beyond the characteristics associated with horses normally.

Hose

Medieval leg wear is practical and slim fitting. Close fitting trousers are practical and easy to come by or make. One example for such legwear are hose.

Woollen hose come as split hose, which are two separate legs with or without integral feet, or joined hose which are one piece with a flap at the groin. Split hose should be worn with long braies, which are a mid thigh length, baggy boxer short style garment. Joined hose, and some split hose will tie or 'point' to either a doublet, or to a 'pourpoint' (literally meaning 'for pointing'), which is a waistcoat style top worn in much the same way as modern braces are! Split hose can also be held up by a belt, if they have loops at the tops of the legs.

- Basic trousers

Hose is also easier to make and wear than you might think and can be very practical for both day to day wear and fighting.

Both braies and split hose are very easy to make from scratch, although joined hose are fairly complex to get the fit right, which is the vital component to stopping them splitting! The other important factor for making hose is to make them stretchy. This can be done by using boiled wool, which is naturally stretchy, or 'cutting on the bias' to use fabric's natural stretchy-ness.

House of earth

Gwen stared at the board laid out before her, looking desperately for a way to save her jarl, but it was hopeless. There were warriors closing in on every side, he was as dead as a fallen tree.

She leaned back in her chair and glowered at Hjordy. "Wipe that bloody smirk off your face you smug bastard".

Hjordgar grinned at her "That's three straight games you've lost Gwen - perhaps you'd like to play against one of the children?"

"Very funny. Isn't it enough already that you've won? Anyway, I didn't walk all this bloody way just to play games - there's news."

Her companion's smile disappeared in an instant and he turned serious. He swept the tafl pieces back into the bag and then poured her another mug of ale. For the next thirty minutes he said almost nothing, just drank it all in, as she proceeded to relate what she'd heard from Landry who said he'd got it from Shem who'd got it from Edda. Finally he spoke.

"So what does it all mean? Are they going to let us stay? Keep our farms? What?"

"Paragons! I don't know - I wish I did. I'm not sure they know." He nodded at that musing over it while she continued "One thing's for sure - there won't be any thralls no more. They don't hold with that."

He snorted then "Right - well that'll make all the difference in the world that will. I'll bet there'll still be taxes though? You're not going to tell me they don't hold with taxes are you Gwen?"

She grinned at him "Would I piss on your back and tell you it was raining? Course there'll be bloody taxes. Some things never change. Now enough of my yapping, what's the news from your side?"

"Not good... Ysra and Gudmundur have had some almighty falling out. Each side blames the other for the thrall deaths. Only thing they both agree on is that the Empire has to pay. They say Gudmundur has sworn a blood oath not to lay off the killing until the ancestors fall silent.... It's not good..." He shook his head and his voice trailed off. He picked up the flagon but it was empty and now he realized that the fire was almost out. "I've no more ale Gwen" he said apologetically.

"It's an omen!" she said her eyes wide with alarm... and then ominously "It is time".

"An omen... time for what... what does it mean?" he asked a note of fear creeping into his voice.

"It means it's time for me to go home you daft bastard." Gwen's face broke into a wide grin - she'd got the better of the little bugger at last.

Overview

Not all the Jotun have left the Mournwold - there remain significant numbers of Jotun thralls living throughout the Mourn, but especially in Green March, Southmoor, and Greensward. These people are very different from the people that the Empire have been fighting, in temperament at least, for they possess no effective weapons and seem to have little or no interest in fighting. Large numbers of them fled west marching with the Jotun armies as they retreated before the Empire's advance, but the majority remained behind. And now the question is what to be done with them.

Two seasons ago, the Empire distributed 75 thrones to pay for supplies to feed the orcs. They have had little help since then, but is increasingly clear that they may not need additional help. While many were displaced by the advancing armies, the majority have now returned to their farms and begun to work them once more. They are clearly cautious of the Empire but they appear intent on staying.

Which raises the difficult question of what to do with them. It is well known that some of the Marchers in the Mourn are trading with the thralls. At present the magistrates are largely turning a blind eye, pending further guidance from the Senate. Technically they are still barbarians - technically they are still Jotun. Presumably something will have to be done,

- 3 The Way To Where
- 4 Plain Truths
- 5 Further Reading

not least because somewhat inconveniently they are currently occupying some of the most important farmland in the Mourn.

A Question of Status

The first question seems simplest to answer but has potentially complex consequences. The Imperial Senate can declare peace with the thralls in the Mournwold, just as they did with the orcs of the Great Forest in 380YE. This would immediately resolve the question of their status - they would be treated as foreigners rather than barbarians. It would be legal to trade with them and they would receive the protection of Imperial law.

The protection of Imperial law is a two-edged sword however. It would not be legal to displace them from the farms (and other resources) they have claimed and certainly not legal to send an army to drive them out of the Mournwold.

At the last summit, the Marcher Assembly passed a judgement encouraging people to take the Way to the former Jotun slaves. The civil service have

We invite Marcher and Imperial Orc preachers to the Mourn to talk to the free orcs of the Mourn (the former Jotun thralls) and preach to them about the Way. We encourage the Virtuous folks of the Mourn to support these preachers and ensure their voices are heard. In return, we invite stewards or other leaders of the free orcs of the Mourn to come to Anvil and make their concerns heard, so that the Empire will not decide for them, but with them.

Hrodin, Marcher Assembly, Autumn Equinox 381YE, Upheld 62- 0

attempted to assess what would happen if a suitable mandate following on from this statement of principle were passed, but the outcome of such an action is difficult to forecast. Matters of faith are always complex and very resistant to any attempt to use day magic to forecast them. The last time this was attempted was with the Lasambrians, and that was not an unqualified success.

The Way To Where

At the request of those cut off from the Empire in the Mourn, and in conjunction with our statement of principle and shared understanding on the use of cruel tactics, we intend to send missionaries to bring the Way and support reintegration of the Mournwolders, led by Bloodcrow Losak.

A suitable priest, presumably a Marcher and ideally

even a Mournwolder could attempt to spread the faith to the Jotun thralls. There are a large number of them so it would take a few seasons and significant amounts of liao to take effect. In some ways the time required is a benefit, as it means that the civil service could update the Empire each summit to let them know how successful the attempt was being, what the current results were and advise on any further possibilities.

If an attempt to convert the thralls was successful, the obvious question that would raise is what next? The Marcher egregore is adamant that these people cannot become Marchers - while they do share some characteristics of their neighbours (the most obvious of which is a well developed sense of attachment to their land) - they are not Marchers and there is no realistic possibility that they ever could be. In theory they might become Imperial Orcs. Nobody has yet had a chance to ask the Imperial Orc egregore for their opinion, but the Orcs are traditionally quite dismissive of the idea that all orcs can be Imperial Orcs. And how would that work anyway... if they continue to live in the Mournwold rather than Skarsind?

These are all difficult questions - but perhaps they might be easier to solve once the Jotun thralls have been successfully enlightened to the Way of Virtue. For the coming season that would require an appropriate mandate and 50 doses of liao.

The Marcher Assembly sends X with 50 doses of liao to the orcs of the Mournwold to bring them to the Way of Virtue. We encourage the Virtuous folks of the Mourn to support these preachers and ensure their voices are heard.

Marcher Mandate

Because of the Imperial Orc Assembly's statement encouraging an approach to the inhabitants of Mournwold and the Marcher Assembly's statement inviting the Imperial Orcs to support the efforts to reach out to the Jotun thralls it is also possible that the Imperial Orc Assembly could pass a similar mandate with a similar effect. Imperial Orcs are not able to use liao of course, but there are a number of skilled friars and monks in the Mournwold who can assist if they are given the necessary supplies and the right leadership and direction by someone appointed by the Imperial Orc Assembly.

There is - in effect - an outstanding invitation to the Jotun thralls to send representatives to the Empire to negotiate, but it is clear that there is not yet sufficient trust for that to happen. These people seem genuinely fearful of the Empire, they are prepared to trade for what they need with their Marcher neighbours but not much more. They don't currently trust the Empire to keep their word and of course just as many of them as Marchers lost their lives to the indiscriminate curses that wracked the Mourn, and they are not ignorant of the source of those curses.

The one thing that the civil servants have been categorically able to determine is that if the mandate above is spread, then among any other effects, it will generate sufficient trust that representatives will be forthcoming. That would categorically give the Empire's diplomats someone to treat with.

Of course diplomacy is just one of the ways that the problem could be resolved...

Plain Truths

At present the Marchers in the Mournwold occupy around two fifths of the territory. The Feni infested woods at Alderly are largely a no-mans land but the rest is held by the Jotun thralls. This is not a matter of military control - all the regions here are now fully under the political and military control of the Empire. It is simply a question of who lives where.

Unfortunately the failure of the Jotun thralls to leave alongside their warlike masters does cause some military and economic complications. It won't be a problem for taxation into the Imperial treasury - civil servants are already compiling lists and it's clear that the thralls who own farms will pay taxes just like any Marcher would. However their participation in the Empire ends there - they certainly aren't going to sign up to support the Imperial armies - indeed it is fairly clear that they do not want to fight as part of any military force. Any Jotun thrall with the will to fight would have ceased being a thrall when they came of age.

If the thralls were gone, then the Marchers could move onto the land, spreading out across the territory as they took over the best farms. If that happened then it would not be long before the Mournwold would then become self-sufficient enough to support an additional Marcher army. But that isn't going to happen for as long as the Jotun thralls remain occupying the fertile farms and running the most profitable businesses.

The other problem is the issue of ownership. Whenever a territory is conquered, the Imperial civil service identify the most valuable resources in a territory which are not legitimately owned by Imperial citizens. These assets are claimed by the Military Council as spoils of war - who are then entitled to dispose of them as they see fit. That presence of the Jotun thralls has complicated that process - as three of most prestigious resources identified by the civil service have been claimed by the thralls. One of these was built by the thralls - the Golden Hoof. The other two - the Black Hill and Eversweet Orchard - were seized by the Jotun during the original invasion and redistributed to their thralls. There are no living descendants of the original owners, but that is exactly the sort of thing that would normally be added to the spoils of war.

These spoils of war can be redistributed by the Military Council just like the others identified in the Mournwold by the civil service - as long as the thralls have not been recognised as foreigners by the Imperial Senate. While the Jotun thralls are technically barbarians, it would effectively be an act of war to seize the properties - but the current owners have no way to resist the Empire. If the assets are claimed, the current owners will simply have to accept that fact and move on. Presumably they will be able to start again somewhere with a new farm or whatever - or more likely they will follow the Jotun armies and go back where they came from over the border to Hordalant.

The general population is a more difficult problem, simply because of their numbers. However, they could also be dealt with, provided the Military Council were prepared to commit sufficient military force to oversee their eviction - and again assuming their legal status has not been changed by the Imperial Senate. One army could clear the thralls from the territory in two seasons by issuing a suitably worded order to carry out a cautious advance - two armies acting together could sort the problem in a single season. There might be some sporadic fighting, but very little. These people just don't seem very interested in fighting, so there would be no real casualties. So few in fact that the army could still resupply while engaged in the basic operations needed to clear the thralls.

Although they don't want to fight, the thralls also don't want to leave. They appear to have acquired the same stubborn streak that everyone who lives in the Marches acquires, and of course there would be a dangerous trek back west through Liathaven. But assuming the Navarr or the vallorn didn't attack them on the way, most of them ought to be able to reach the Hordalant.

Once they are gone then the land would become available to the Marchers - and that would enable to the Marchers to raise an additional army, assuming that the mithril can be found and that the Imperial treasury will stand it.

How Assemblies make Judgments

This is a placeholder page for content that PD are actively working on.

Summary

- At each summit weekend, every Synod priest can put one judgment before an Assembly they are a member of.
- At each summit weekend, Synod priests can vote on any judgment before an Assembly they are a member of.
- It is recommended that Synod priests check at regular intervals, two or three times a day, to see if there are any judgments they have been asked to make.

Contents

- 1 Summary
- 2 Raising a Judgment
- 3 Resolving a Judgment
- 4 Congregation Influence
 - 4.1 Further Reading

Raising a Judgment

To put a judgment before an Assembly, the Synod Priest needs to seek out an appropriate civil servant who will normally be available at the Hub or other designated location at Anvil.

The priest then needs to identify:

- Which of the Synod's powers they are looking to utilise
- Against whom the judgment is directed, for example, which General they seek to revoke, or whom they wish to reward with money or resources from the Virtue Fund
- Which of the Assemblies they are looking to place it before

The Civil Servant will record the judgment in their records, and on a notice which is displayed in a prominent, public, location. The notice will include a deadline, by which time the priests of the Assembly will have been expected to render their judgment.

Marrok of Dawn wishes to raise a judgment of inquisition against members of a League coven believed to be consorting with Wendigo. Marrok seeks out an appropriate civil servant and indicates that he wishes to do this through the Assembly of Vigilance, of which he is a member. A deadline is set for four hours after Marrok raised the judgment, at which time the judgment will be resolved.

Resolving a Judgment

During the time between a judgment notice going up, and its deadline, priests of the appropriate Assembly can register their judgment either for, or against, the notice raised. They do this by seeking out an appropriate civil service, usually at the Hub. Members of an Assembly can request that a civil servant accompany them to a location of their choosing. This is most commonly to record multiple judgments that have been agreed in a meeting.

For a judgment to be successfully made, it needs to achieve a majority. There are two kinds of majority:

- A lesser majority is one where the votes in support of the judgment exceed those made against it
- A greater majority is one where the votes in support of the judgment exceed one half of the Assembly's voting strength

Where a judgment achieves a greater majority, it can be resolved ahead of its deadline as it cannot be defeated.

Marrok's judgment of inquisition would normally only require a lesser majority to pass. However, the Assembly of Vigilance are not minded to wait for the potential evil-doers to cover their tracks and ensure over half their number support the judgment well before the deadline, securing a greater majority and the right to deliver swift inquisition.

Congregation Influence

The votes of Synod priests in determining a majority are not equal. A priest's judgment is measured in influence, and their influence is weighted by the size, or importance, of their congregation. Information about how to increase the influence of a congregation is available here.

How To - Make a Surcote

How to make a surcote

Contents

Over your bliaut, why not show your loyalty with a glorious surcote made in your House's or Lord's colours? This is a garment that is fundamentally really simple - at its simplest, four pieces of cloth and four seams that looks fantastic and is (you guessed it!) historically correct. The fun comes in decorating it. This tutorial not only teaches you how to make the basic version, but talks you through a fabulous stripy alternative either as a walk-through to copy it in this or other colours, or as inspiration for making your own heraldic designs.

- 1 How to make a surcote
 - 1.1 Instructions
 - 1.2 Optional: decorating one or both sides
 - 1.3 How about adding a heraldic logo or beast?
 - 1.3.1 You will need
 - 1.3.2 Too complex?

First, a note on heraldry. This is not a re-enactment. There are no rules.

Historically, there are a million rules governing what you can and can't do in heraldry. Ignore them. This is not a re-enactment. You can do pretty much whatever you like with colours and symbology, and if anyone tells you that it's wrong, feel free to ask them what the elves wore in the Hundred Years War. One thing that's worth saying, though, is that heraldry should be about recognisable designs and high contrast. For that reason, I'd recommend thinking about sticking with the colour rules that talk about metals and colours. Confused? Read on.

"Metals" in heraldry are actually white and yellow. This is because on your shield, you could leave them as metals, but on your surcote which was made to match, they'd have to be in the nearest two colours of cloth. Heraldic "colours" are all the other colours. The rules say that when you're putting a design in one colour onto another colour, "Metals" should go on "Colours" and vice versa, but a "Colour" shouldn't go on a "Colour", and a "Metal" shouldn't go on a "Metal". So a gold lion on a red shield is fine, but a white lion on a yellow shield is right out, and so is a green lion on a blue shield.

If you think about these examples, it kind of makes sense. If you're trying to see the Earl of Warwick at a hundred yards through a pitched battle at dusk, you want something that's high contrast and really stands out. White and yellow are the perfect contrast to all the other colours and make your unique heraldry much easier to see. For that reason, I've put black stripes (Colour) on a yellow field (Metal) - it works for wasps and it works for me,

Anyway, it's something to think about. Mull it over, and if you still want that purple dragon on a black shield, you go right ahead.

Instructions

Things you will need

- 1.5m of wool fabric in two different colours for the 2 colour version
- 1m of a third colour of wool as well if you're making the magnificently stripy version. (I used red and yellow for the base and black for the stripes)
- Black thread
- A tape measure
- A pen
- An iron. I really mean it this time.

Here is your basic shape:

You're going to cut two exactly like this, and two mirror images. The dimensions on this image will make up something that will fit over the T tunic in the previous tutorial. The neck hole can be approximated - you want something a little bit narrower and a little deeper than your under-tunic, so you get a flash of contrasting colour.

Again, make sure that the dimensions will go round your chest and add to them if necessary. If you're going to wear it over armour, make sure you have your armour on when you measure, and add at least 5 inches in total to your armoured chest measurement. You may have to make the armholes deeper.

Here is a picture showing you how to sew it together - it's really as simple as sewing the shoulder seams (front to back on both sides), then the sides of the surcote. At the front, sew it from the neck down to about half way, then hem the edges below that - this gives you a split for mobility.

Hem the front split and the bottom, the armholes and the neck. Bias tape is a nice way of doing the curved edges. (<http://tutorials.abbott.me.uk/home/bias-tape>)

Optional: decorating one or both sides

While it looks great in one or two colours, you can make your heraldry really unique by putting stripes, chevrons or any design on one or both sides of your surcote. It's easiest to do before sewing it up.

First, mark your stripes. The easiest way of doing it is to cut a piece of cardboard about 3 inches wide by 3 feet long and use it as a guide to mark your stripes at the angle you like on two cut pieces. You can choose to make the back and the front identical, or they can mirror each other so on the back the colours are reversed - there's no problem with either, so just do what you prefer. Mark your stripes on your fabric.

Now, cut your "stripe" fabric (black in this case) into 4 1/2 inch wide strips. You can usually just rip across the fabric, but check your fabric rips nicely and evenly before doing too many.

On your first marked line, pin your black stripe along it like so:

Sew this line, using your pins as a guide to get your stitches on the marked line.

Then, turn the stripe over so that the stitched seam is covered by it, and press it.

You can then turn the other side under and pin it in place ready to be hand or machine stitched down from the top. Then do this with every alternate line marked on your coloured piece.

Eventually all your black stripes will be sewn on, and your machine stitching will be covered under the fold of the black fabric.

Well done. Now do it again on the matching piece. This is fiddly and time consuming, but don't mistake that for being impossible. Take your time, pin and press where necessary, and you'll get great results.

To fix the other side of the black stripes, you can either topstitch them down by machine, following the line of your pins that are holding them in place, or, if you don't want machine stitching to be visible, you can slipstitch them down by hand.

If your black stripes are at the neckline, you might want to topstitch round the edge before you trim off the excess black stripes, just so it behaves as one piece of fabric as you work with it. Even if you don't want any machine stitching to be visible, this will be concealed in the shoulder seam and in your neck finishing, so don't worry about it.

Then just sew your four pieces together as above, remembering that the stripy side is the correct side, so you want your seams on the reverse.

Here it is with the bliaut underneath.

Hang on - can't I just sew strips of the two colours together to make a stripy bit of fabric, then cut my pieces from that?

Yes you can. In fact, I've done it that way before. Two caveats - if your stripes aren't going to be horizontal or vertical, the fact that you have to cut out the pieces at an angle to make the stripes slant means you waste a lot of fabric. Second, because you're cutting on the bias (i.e. not on the straight grain of the fabric) your stripy piece will drape and sag in a different way to the other side. Not too much of a problem, but it can look a bit uneven. But if you're going to have horizontal or vertical stripes, it's a time saver.

How about adding a heraldic logo or beast?

You will need

- The cut bits of your surcote
- Contrast fabric
- Thread to match your contrast fabric
- Machine set to zig zag
- Quilters fusible web - Wonder-under, heat-n-bond, fuse-a-web or similar
- Optional: Gold seed beads (I use Guterman)
- Beading or sharp needle

1. Trace or draw your design onto the heat-n-bond. Some brands will tell you which side to use, others not. If it's not clear, very gently separate the layers at one corner. The paper will adhere more to one side of the web than the other - use the MORE adherent side to draw on. If your design is asymmetrical, remember it will be facing the opposite way when you transfer it, so you might want to reverse it first.

2. Once you've copied it, roughly cut out a square around each design.

3. Carefully peel the less sticky paper from the web. Your design side should still be attached to the web.

4. Press the sticky side of your fusible web to the WRONG side of the contrast fabric. This should stick pretty well.

5. Carefully using nail scissors cut around your design. You should now have your design with a paper patch stuck to one side.

6. Peel off the remaining paper, giving you a sticky fabric logo.

7. Position as desired!

8. Using a dishtowel or pressing cloth to sit between the garment and your iron, press several times briefly with a hot steam iron. This should stick the design to the fabric.

9. Using a narrow zig zag on your sewing machine, topstitch the edges of the patch to the fabric. This is fiddly, so take your time.

10. Optional: Finally, using your patch-coloured thread, couch beads around the design, covering your machine stitching. Thread two needles and knot them - bring from wrong side to right side. String beads onto one and use the other to couch the beady string down, trying to get it to look like a seamless string of beads around the design..Do this all the way around. Bring both needles to the back and secure. Finished!

Some fusible webs don't have paper on both sides - this is ok. Just trace onto the one side of paper that you have, then, when it comes to sticking it to the fabric, lay it in position and give it a quick press with a hot steam iron - not too long but a second or so should be enough to stick it. The rest is the same.

You can see a project featuring this technique here:

http://www.profounddecisions.co.uk/empire-wiki/Civil_Service_Look_and_Feel

Too complex?

If you want something a bit simpler, try using felt for your appliqued patch - the edges won't fray, so you can just stitch round with a straight stitch, or by hand, and not bother with the beads to cover the stitching. Felt won't wear as well as woven fabric, but that's ok if you're careful.

How To - Make an easy kids cloak

How to make a really easy kids' cloak

This pattern makes a cloak to fit a 2-4 year old - you could make it for a bigger kid by using a longer piece of fabric and increasing the length of the body -the head hole and the hood won't need altering. You could even make it longer with a really deep hem which you can let out as your child grows.

You will need

1m of fabric at least 60 inches wide - wool for a warm cloak (polar fleece makes a nice machine washable substitute)
Thread in a matching or co-ordinating colour
A brooch to pin the neck shut, or a fastener to sew on.

Instructions

Following the picture below, cut out two pieces - the big wide one will be the body of the cloak, and the littler one will be the hood.

Now, following the picture below, fold the hood piece as shown and sew down one edge - this will be the back of the hood.

Now, carefully matching the middle of the LONG EDGE of the body piece to the seam at the back of the hood, and matching the FRONT EDGES of the hood to the SHORT EDGES of your body piece, gather or pleat the LONG EDGE of the body piece to the NECK EDGE of the hood piece. Sew this seam all the way around. Your cloak is now basically done.

Finally, hem all the way around.

Get your child to stand still for long enough to pin it around their neck - the neck hole is deliberately large to a) allow for growth and b) allow them to slip out without getting stuck if their cloak gets caught on something, but you can overlap the edges if you prefer a tighter fit. If you want, sew on a fastener, or just pin it shut with a brooch.

How to - Make a Suaq Coat

How to make a Suaq costume out of an old fur coat

Paul Bassinder's awesome photo guide

1. Long fur coat, turned inside out with the lining removed

2. From the back

3. Coat cut to length and sleeves shortened

4. Collar cut down to the neckline

5. Hood: Rectangle cut out of the base (removed in step 3).

6. Hood stitched on with waxed thread.

7. Any holes, including those from pocket removal are roughly over-stitched with fur edges turned out.

8. Stencils: Images printed out on thin card and only black pieces cut out.

9. Images drawn on in pen and filled in with black leather dye.

10. Edging: Leather straps cut to length. Stitching line, zig zag and circles added. Stitching holes marked and punched.

11. Leather stained.

12. Edges glued in places to hold whilst stitching. 1" bone tubes added to arms for extra decoration.

13. Holes punched for thonging to do up front of coat.

14. Thonging in place on innermost side.

15. Thonging pulls through outermost side and simple fastening used.

16. Back of coat.

How to - Make a felt hat

Varushkan Felt Hat

Contents

This is a traditional European style of hat, simple to make using very basic materials and tools. Traditionally it would be made starting with raw woollen fleece. This would be wound around a conical wooden former, wetted with urine and pounded with wooden bats until the wool compressed together to form a cone of felt. Once dried the cone would be dampened and reshaped into any of a variety of styles. Thankfully, today we have access to ready-made felt...

The instructions below give a quicker and less smelly way of achieving the same.

You're welcome to have a go at using the more traditional method though I suggest using a strong detergent solution instead of urine!

- 1 Varushkan Felt Hat
 - 1.1 Choosing Fabric:
 - 1.2 Marking up:
 - 1.3 Sewing:
 - 1.4 Stretching to shape:
 - 1.5 Finishing:

Choosing Fabric:

The hat needs to be made from an unstructured felt rather than a felted woven fabric as it has to be permanently stretched. Ideally you need a heavy-weight felt (at least 4mm) to give you the proper stiffness but most modern craft felt is quite thin. You can get round this by using the felt doubled.

Depending on the size of your head, the width and the thickness of the felt you'll need about 3/4 meter, or a whole meter if you're doubling up the fabric.

Marking up:

The hat starts out as a cone shape so you need to cut a quarter circle. Measure round your head just above the eyebrows and use this measurement (A-B) to mark out an arc from one corner. CLARIFICATION: This measurement is just to give you the right proportions for the hat, neither of the straight edges or the curved line actually fit around the brow line. If you are doubling up, mark out a second piece about 1cm smaller (grey).

Sewing:

Pin the straight edges of the cone together, overlapping the straight edges rather than making an edge to edge seam. Sew by hand using a loose running stitch. If you're doubling up, make sure the smaller cone is inside. TIP: It's easier to sew from the pointed to the open end rather than the other way round.

Turn under the edge of the open end about 1cm (if you've doubled up, just turn the overlap. Sew along the turn to hold it in place, again using a loose running stitch, but leave a long tail of thread and don't fasten off the end. You need to allow the thread free to pull through the felt when you stretch the brim.

Stretching to shape:

Thoroughly wet the felt then press out the excess water with a towel (don't wring!).

Now you start to stretch the brim, working from the very edge round and round and working inwards. Pull from side to side, stretching along the edge of the brim, NOT outwards from the crown. The brim will get narrower from edge to crown – this is normal.

Some felts don't need much force to stretch, others will take a lot of pulling so start gently. This is where you'll need to use your judgement as to how far up the hat you need to go and how much you need to stretch to get the shape you want. You'll end up with a brim that curves gently into the crown rather than sharply.

Finishing:

Leave the hat to almost dry. While it's still very slightly damp press the brim with a hot iron to fix the shape. Leave to dry completely.

Repeat the stretching and finishing steps until you're happy with the shape.

Decorate & trim to taste (or lack of...)

How to - Make a wizard's or monk's outfit

How to make a Wizard or Monk's outfit

Wizard!

This outfit consists of three parts - an undertunic, a long circular cloak, and a circular mantle. Make it in soft wool or similar for a cosy, easy costume - it takes a lot of fabric, so if your budget is tight, look for a wool/synthetic blend - this stuff was £2 per metre, and looks and handles just like wool.

You will need

- 6m of fabric which is 60 inches wide for the long cloak, 2m for the mantle and 2 1/2 metres for the undertunic - 10 1/2 metres will be expensive if you don't shop carefully, so do look around. A quick ebay search brought up grey and black for £2.99 per metre - you might do better - try searching for "wool blend suiting".
- Thread in a matching or darker colour. (TIP: if you think you might dye the garment later, get cotton or silk thread. Normal sewing thread won't dye and you'll end up with visible stitching. Coats cotton thread is very good. Guterman quilting cotton thread is too coarse.)
- Bias binding
- 2 fasteners or brooches

Total cost - about £32 for fabric

Tunic

Make one of these: http://empire.crew.profounddecisions.co.uk/empire-wiki/How_To_-_Make_a_T_-_Tunic

Overcloak

1. Cut a circle with a diameter of about 14 inches for a generous, elbow-length cape. It's easier if you fold your fabric into quarters and just mark out a quarter, cutting through all four pieces at the same time.
2. Cut a tiny neck-hole. If folded in quarters your neckhole radius should be about 2 inches.
3. Cut from one edge in a straight line to the neck hole.
4. Hem or bias-tape all edges.
5. Put a fastener or brooch at the neck edge.

alt text
alt text

Long Undercloak

Do exactly as you did for the short cloak, but use a circle whose radius is the full width of the fabric. To achieve this, you'll need to cut two semicircles, like this:

Two semicircles

Then cut your neck hole, and sew one to the other down one long straight edge to make a whole circle when you lay it out flat on the floor.

Put your cloak on, and fasten it at the neck. Get a friend to position the cloak so that the centre back seam runs right down the middle of your back. With pins or chalk, mark a point on your arm just below your shoulder on both sides, and your elbow height with your arms hanging by your side. Connect these two points in a straight vertical line, one on each side.

Take your cloak off and cut a slash along these lines - this lets your arms poke out. Adjust for comfort. Hem or bind the slashes.

You can tack the neck edges of your cloak and overcloak together, keep them separate or sew them together, whatever you like. Keeping them separate means you can put a tabard in between though, which is nice if you want to. You don't really need a pattern for a tabard, but here's one anyway:

<http://tutorials.abbott.me.uk/home/really-simple-costume-1>

Wizard!

What else can I do with this pattern?

- Want to save fabric? Make a semicircular cloak rather than a full circle and save 3m. Make the cloak from this one but leave off the fur:

http://empire.crew.profounddecisions.co.uk/empire-wiki/How_to_-_Make_an_awesome_furry_mantle

- Ignore the full length cloak, and lengthen the T tunic to ankle length for a different look.
- Add a matching hood, tabard or cowl.

How to - Make an awesome furry mantle

How to make a fur-trimmed mantle

furry cloak

Winter is coming... Stay cosy!

TIP: always cut fur or fake fur with a scalpel or Stanley knife from the wrong (leather) side. Scissors will cut the pile and leave it looking messy and weird.

You will need

- 3m of fabric which is 60 inches wide. Wool, the thicker and softer the better. Ebay is your best bet for this - try searching for wool coating in the colour of your choice - often remnants are available in 3m lengths for about £15. You probably won't do better than this in the shops, but the sales are good. (<http://history-explorer.co.uk/> does lovely heavyweight wool for £5-6 per metre)
- Thread in a matching or darker colour. (TIP: if you think you might dye the garment later, get cotton or silk thread. Normal sewing thread won't dye and you'll end up with visible stitching. Coats cotton thread is very good. Guterman quilting cotton thread is too coarse.)
- Fur. Cheap option: an old fur coat, or a fur collar from a charity shop. Expensive option, a coyote pelt from <http://www.houseofdeclifford.com> - try their coyote seconds or thirds, or the backs or pieces, depending on your budget (these pelts are from necessary culls in north America - House of Declifford have an excellent reputation as an ethical supplier).
- Bias binding - about 9m. $c=2\pi r$, so you can work it out exactly if you want.
- A fastener or brooch

TIP: often charity shops won't display fur collars or coats, but if you ask they'll usually bring them out from the back room. You can also leave your details and they'll call you when they get one donated.

Total cost - about £15-20 for wool. £10 for an old fur coat, or £20 upwards for coyote fur

First - take a look at this picture:

This is the basic shape of your cloak, where r =the width of your fabric. If your fabric is very long and you're not, you might want to make your circle a little smaller, but in fact you're as well to do that at the end when you hem it, as you lose quite a bit of length as you go. 60inch wide fabric makes a good cloak for most people, varying from ankle to mid calf length depending on your height. If your fabric has a nice finished edge (selvage) you can position the long flat edge along it, which saves you having to have to hem the front edges.

For your head to go through, you'll need to cut another, smaller semicircle as shown:

Make this hole smaller than you think - 3 inch radius is a good start, and gradually widen it out if that's not enough, but remember when you bind or hem the neck edge it'll get bigger.

Bind your neck edge and hem with bias binding for a neat finish, or just turn a hem, accepting that it'll go bobbly. Here's why you should do it with bias tape:

<http://tutorials.abbott.me.uk/home/bias-tape>

At this point, you can stop, and have a cloak which looks like this:

no fur on this one

Putting the fur on

Coyote version:

Put your cloak on, and position the coyote pelt over your shoulders with the face on one side and the tail on the other - they should hang about level with each other, but sometimes it looks a bit better if it's asymmetric. Put a couple of pins in at either side, and one right at the nape of your neck to hold the pelt in place (a friend can help here).

Slip the cloak off, and stitch from the centre back around to the front, oversewing the edge of the pelt and the edge of your cloak. Leather needles can help here, or a thimble to drive it through. You might find a few tacking stitches holding the face and tail of the pelt to the front edges of your cloak helps.

Add a brooch or fastener to hold it shut. Two matching brooches and a chain is a nice way of holding it on over your armour.

Old Fur Coat Version

<http://tutorials.abbott.me.uk/stay-warm/furry-cloak>

And there it is! Done! You've made an awesome furry cloak.

furry joy!

What else can I do with this pattern?

- Make it in different colours! Line it for extra cosiness!
- You could use fake fur if you prefer - choose the expensive stuff, often in the bridal section, as it looks and wears much better. Cut a semicircle of smaller radius than your cloak, with the long straight edge along one of the CUT edges of your fur fabric, not the selvage. You can then cut out the same neck semicircle and sew the fur fabric to the cloak fabric right side to right side along the neck edge. You can hem the front edges together or separately.

How to - make a really easy Medieval cote

How to make a Medieval Cote

A cote is a front fastening overgarment that looks very medieval - often it's worn in colours that reflect a character's allegiance to a household or group. It's ideal for the Marches, Dawn and Highguard, and could be adapted for other nations through imaginative use of fabrics. You can vary the length from a daring 14th century mid thigh to a conservative late 1400s knee length, or even longer for a scholar or doctor character.

You will need

- 2m of wool, cotton velvet or heavyweight linen 60 inches wide
- 2m of cotton lining (Bomull from ikea is great - £1.75 per metre for unbleached calico - the one in the walkthrough is actually lined in polar fleece/old ikea blanket for keeping a small person cosy at night)
- Thread in a matching or darker colour.
- A tape measure
- A pen, soft pencil or chalk
- Buttons - pewter if you're feeling fancy, wood if you're feeling understated
- An iron

The Basic Process

What we're going to do is draw a simple pattern consisting of two back and two fronts based on your body measurements. We'll then assemble the lining and the outer fabric step by step, with no visible machine stitching or need for hand finishing except for the bottom hem which you can choose to finish by machine or by hand depending on your preference. There are quite a few steps to the process but none of them is hard, and by taking it a bite at a time even a beginner can make a success of the project.

Making your pattern

pattern pieces

These are the two pattern pieces that you're going to map out - a torso piece where the back and front only differ in the depth of the neckline (about 1 inch at the back, about 3 inches at the front) and a sleeve piece.

When you're cutting out, cut the back of the coat on the fold of your fabric - it saves you having to sew up the back seam.

The coat you'll see being made in the walkthrough is a toddler sized one but the process is the same (the neckline is a bit shallower on both sides and there's a little less ease in the body, but it otherwise follows the same process.

Key to measurements

- a) point of shoulder to base of neck. Point of shoulder to centre back distance is ($1/2$ of the distance between left and right shoulder points, +1 inch)
- c) shoulder to a couple of inches below your armpit - give yourself a bit of room here
- d) 2 inch + $1/4$ of your chest measurement
- e) nape of neck to length you want the coat to be, + 2 inches
- f) shoulder point to knuckles, + 1 inch
- g) put the measuring tape round your wrist in what feels like a comfortable cuff width. Make sure your hand can slip through easily. Add 1 inch.
- h) is actually easier just to measure on one of the body pattern pieces, then use that length to shape a nice shallow curve for the top of the sleeve piece.

using armhole to measure the sleeve head directly sleeve shape

When you're patterning out your sleeve, you might find it easier as I've done to do it on the fold so both halves are identical. Just remember to half g) if you're doing it that way, otherwise you'll get excitingly baggy sleeves.

Cut two fronts, two back and two sleeves of both outer and lining fabric.

Sewing it up

Body

If you have a preferred way of assembling garments then do it whichever way suits you! Here follows a step by step walkthrough for one way of many to do it. 1/2 inch seam allowance is about right.

Very important! The difference between a good outcome and a great one is pressing your seams as you go along.

Set your iron up now beside your sewing table. Every time you sew a seam, press it open. You can sew a few then press them in batches to save time if you like, but don't sew across a seam before you've pressed it. Promise me!

- Take your lining pieces and sew the fronts to the backs at the shoulder seams. Press the seams open. Repeat for the outer fabric.

Just the same as the kirtle tutorial, you note...

- Next, lay your lining on top of your outer, right side to right side, matching seams and shapes.
- Pin up the front, round the neckline and down the other front.
- Stitch along your pin line.

You can see the stitching line around the neckline in this picture

- Now clip your curves. This means cutting little v shaped notches out of your seam allowance, almost to your stitching line, which allows the fabric to curve neatly when you turn it the right way out.

Once you've clipped your curves it should look a bit like this

Press the front edge, neck edge and armholes.

- Next you're going to sew up the side seams - outer layer, right side to right side, then lining, right side to right side. You should now have a fetching waistcoat shape!

Looking good...

- Before we go on to the sleeve, pin the outer and lining together, wrong side to wrong side round both armholes, then stitch or zigzag the two layers together very close to the edge. You're going to treat both layers as one at the armhole from now on.

That weird looking pink thing is my knee

Sleeves

- Right side to right side, sew one outer sleeve to one lining sleeve along the cuff edge. Repeat for the other sleeve.

You can see the stitch line along the straight edge

- Now open those two layers of fabric out, and, matching the seam, fold the sleeve in half down its length, and pin down the long edge. Making sure you've matched the seam, stitch all the way down the outer and keep going all the way down the lining.

You can see the stitch line along the straight edge

- Turn it so the outer is on the outside with the lining on the inside. You can turn back the cuff - this is why the sleeves are so long!
- Tuck the lining down the sleeve - you don't want it getting caught in the next bit.

Attaching sleeves to body

- Matching the underarm seam of sleeve and body, and the midpoint of the top curve of the sleeve with the shoulder seam, pin the sleeve into the armhole, matching right side to right side. The pattern gives you ever so slightly more sleeve length than armhole length - usually you can fudge this with the pins, but if you've got too much sleeve for the armhole shave a little bit off the top curve.

Sleeve pinned in - only the outer of the sleeve is pinned to both layers of the body. Sleeve lining is still stuffed down the sleeve, out of the way.

- Now sew round the armhole, attaching the sleeve. Repeat for the other side.
- You are nearly done! Just a bit of hand sewing and buttonwork to do.

Basically done

- Now let it hang, ideally overnight on a hanger or a dressmaker's dummy.

Finishing

You've got three more jobs to do- deciding on fasteners, sewing the sleeve linings into the body of the coat, and hemming the bottom edge.

Hemming

Use a method of your choice. For this I like to turn the hem up and tuck the raw edge in, then handstitch it down.

Basically done

Attaching the sleeve lining

Pull the sleeve lining up so it's poking out of the armhole on the inside. Pinning as you go, turn the raw edge of it under, and pin the sleeve lining into the armhole, matching seams.

Pin all the way round

Now handstitch the sleeve lining to the lining of the body, trying not to catch the outer fabric of either. Your stitches don't need to be too tiny or neat, but secure your thread well and put a few extra stitches in to lock your thread every few inches.

Fasteners

If you have a buttonhole attachment on your machine, you're laughing for the next bit - just mark your buttonholes at the desired spacing with the button-marks equally spaced on the other side, and away you go. I like to use these buttons spaced one inch apart.

You can work your buttonholes by hand, too - folk in the middle ages didn't seem too fussed about making them all that neat. Or, if that amount of handsewing doesn't appeal, you could use Norwegian clasps like these ones for a different look.

And here's one I made earlier

I'm still waiting for the buttons to arrive for the blue velvet one, so photos will have to wait too.

Wearing it

Wear it belted over a close-fitting pair of trousers or hose, and you'll look very swish. A narrow charity shop belt (about 1/2 inch wide) with a plain brass buckle will set you back about £1 and looks very authentic with it - in my opinion more so than a broader one.

Got an extra £5? Make Harry happy by making some shoulder or headwear

Buy im of nice wool and use one of the patterns on this page to make yourself a hood or chaperon.

Got an extra £20 and want something really useful and special?

Order yourself a medieval belt in a colour of your choice, like one of these. Tie round waist with the end dangling down and feel brilliant.

How to - make an amazingly easy kirtle

How to make a Kirtle

What's a kirtle, I hear you ask? Well, it's a term used to describe a close fitting dress or underdress, worn through a lot of the middle ages. The one we're going to make today is roughly based on the ones they were wearing in the 15th century, and it's a lovely comfortable and practical garment that's cool in summer and works as a great underlayer in winter. This one is sleeveless but you could add sleeves, or make a separate pair and lace or pin them on for a different look.

If you're part of the Marcher Authenticity Brigade (of which I'm a fully paid up obsessional member) you'll be pleased to see these historical images of women wearing sleeveless kirtles just like the ones we're going to make. In late 15th century art you see women painted in domestic situations in just this kind of sleeveless kirtle, particularly in pictures about births. For everyone else, they do look cool, don't they?

You will need

- 3m of cotton, linen or lightweight wool, 60 inches wide (if you're making a particoloured dress like mine get 1.5m of each) (I used linen look cotton at £5 per metre - you could use ikea coloured cotton at £3 per metre if you wanted something cheaper - £15)
- 3m of cotton lining (Bomull from ikea is great - £1.75 per metre for unbleached calico) (£5.25)
- Thread in a matching or darker colour. (TIP: if you think you might dye the garment later, get cotton or silk thread. Normal sewing thread won't dye and you'll end up with visible stitching. Coats cotton thread is very good. Guterman quilting cotton thread is too coarse.) (£1)
- A tape measure
- A pen, soft pencil or chalk
- A packet of eyelets (£4)
- 2-3 metres of ribbon, cotton tape or cord (£1)
- An iron

Total cost - £26.25

The Basic Process

What we're going to do is draw a simple pattern consisting of two back and two fronts based on your body measurements. We'll then assemble the lining and the outer fabric step by step, with no visible machine stitching or need for hand finishing except for the bottom hem which you can choose to finish by machine or by hand depending on your preference. There are quite a few steps to the process but none of them is hard, and by taking it a bite at a time even a beginner can make a success of the project.

Back and front pattern pieces

These are the two pattern pieces that you're going to map out. As written you'll get a pattern for a close-fitting, supportive dress with little or no ease - if you're anxious about the fit or want a looser kirtle then add a couple of inches to the seam allowances at the sides, and pin it to check the fit and adjust before you start sewing.

Key to measurements

- a) nape of neck to waist + 1/2 an inch. Point z is 2 inches below this line.
- b) base of neck to shoulder - point x should be about 1 inch higher than point y so the shoulder line slopes nicely.
- c) 1/2 inch + 1/2 of the distance between your shoulders measured behind your head
- d) 1 inch + 1/4 of your underbust measurement
- e) 1 inch + 1/4 of your waist measurement
- f) waist to armpit measurement (get the tape right into your armpit!)
- g) waist to ankle + 2 inches
- h) nipple level to waist, measured straight down your side (don't measure down the curve of your breast)
- i) underbust level to waist, measured straight down your side
- j) 1 inch + 1/2 x (bust measurement - 1/2 your underbust measurement)
- k) 1 inch + 1/4 of your underbust measurement

The straight line and the dotted line down the front piece show two alternative cutting lines for the front skirt. If you're not very curvy (like me) it's can look nice to have a relatively straight front to this. Alternatively if you want more volume in the skirts or have more of a difference between your waist and hip measurements you can flare it along this seam line too. If you want lots more volume in your skirts you could add triangular gores of fabric down the lines marked g.

Cutting out your pieces

Fold your lining fabric in half across the way, selvedge to selvedge. You can either scale your pattern up on pattern paper or newspaper then lay it on, or draw it directly on to your fabric - either works. The picture below shows roughly how you can arrange them - depending on your size you might get a more efficient layout than I have. If you're experienced and happy to play around with it you can waste less fabric if you cut gores to give the skirts more width - you can even add them to this pattern out of your leftover scraps if you want.

Suggested cutting layout

You can see from the faint lines in the picture below how the back looks drawn directly on to the fabric.

Scaled up back piece

And now cut them out - you should have two front, and two back pieces of lining as below.

Front and back pieces cut out - I'd definitely flare the centre back skirt piece a bit more than I've done here if I were to make this again

Next you can use your lining pieces as a pattern for cutting out your outer fabric - cut them on the fold exactly as above.

Sewing it up

If you have a preferred way of assembling garments then do it whichever way suits you! Here follows a step by step walkthrough for one way of many to do it.

Very important! The difference between a good outcome and a great one is pressing your seams as you go along.

Set your iron up now beside your sewing table. Every time you sew a seam, press it open. You can sew a few then press them in batches to save time if you like, but don't sew across a seam before you've pressed it. Promise me!

- Sew the two back pieces of the lining together down the centre back seam. Press the seam open. Sew the fronts to the backs at the shoulder seams. Press the seams open. Repeat for the outer.

The red half doesn't show up very well on the red carpet. Blue looks good though!

- Next, lay your lining on top of your outer, right side to right side, matching seams and shapes. Make a mark or notch on both sides of the centre front about six inches below your waist.
- Pin the two layers together around both armholes, and starting at the mark or notch you just made, pin them together up the centre front on one side, all the way round the neck and down the other side of the centre front until you reach the mark or notch again.
- Stitch along your pin line around both armholes, and from the notch or mark to the matching one on the other side as you just pinned them.

You can see the stitching line around one armhole and around the neckline in this picture

- Now clip your curves. This means cutting little v shaped notches out of your seam allowance, almost to your stitching line, which allows the fabric to curve neatly when you turn it the right way out.

Once you've clipped your curves it should look a bit like this

- Now, pull the fronts through the shoulder straps to turn them the right way out. Suddenly this should start looking a lot like a finished project!

Press the front edge, neck edge and armholes.

Even though you haven't sewn the side seams up yet it's starting to look like a dress

- Next you're going to sew up the side seams. The easiest way of doing this is finding the seam at either end of the armhole where the outer and lining are sewn together, matching the two seams together and putting a pin in at the point with the right sides together. You should then be able to match the lining front to the lining back down the side seam, and the outer front to the outer back down the side seam, and if you pin them together you can start at the lining hem and sew all the way up to the armhole and all the way down to the hem of the outer fabric. Do this on both sides.
- You then need to do something similar to match the centre front seams at your notches. Where your stitching lines end on both sides, open the two layers out at the seam and again put a pin in at the join with the right sides together. You can then match the right sides of the outer fabric, and the right sides of the lining. This time it's easier to sew from the "crotch" seam all the way down to the hem, first on the outer, then on the lining.
- Phew! Got that? Ok, now look at your dress and be very proud. You have basically constructed your garment.

The dress is now basically made

- Now let it hang, ideally overnight on a hanger or a dressmaker's dummy. You can now pin both layers together around the hem and hem it up by your preferred method - I like to sew bias tape to the hem, press it up and slipstitch the bias tape to the lining by hand. You may prefer to use the machine!

Lacing up the front

To look really historical, I recommend spiral lacing. This involves slightly offsetting your eyelets so that the top and bottom match perfectly, but the rest don't, so that when you're lacing up the cord runs up in a spiral. It holds the edges together very nicely. Of course, if you prefer the criss-cross look (like a shoelace!) then just space your eyelets evenly. Either way I like them with a one inch gap.

You can see how the marks are offset for spiral lacing

- Make holes - the safest way to do these is to puncture the fabric with an awl, then widen the hole out with a knitting needle - this pushes the fibres apart rather than cutting them and will make your eyelets more durable. I'm a glutton for punishment and I'll be oversewing my eyelets, so I just punched holes.
- Following the manufacturer's directions, put your eyelets in. I recommend 2 part eyelets (the ones that come with a washer) for durability.

Now with the eyelets in

- Now add your ribbon, tape or cord to lace it up the front, and you're done!

It gapes a little bit on Mabel because I squish and she doesn't. Still looks good though!

Wearing it

Wear it over a white shift or blouse, and this will look bloody amazing!

What now?

Got an extra £1?

Buy yourself an extra 1/2m of Bomull cotton and make yourself an apron by cutting a rectangle about 14 inches wide by 36cm long, hemming it and sewing the top edge to a bit of cotton tape to act as a waistband for instant workwear.

Got an extra £2 and like handsewing?

Buy two skeins of embroidery thread and oversee your eyelets. Not only will you please the Marcher Authenticity Brigade, you'll make your eyelets a lot more durable. And it looks nice too.

Got an extra £5? Make Harry happy by making some headwear

Buy 1m of nice wool and use the pattern on this page under the heading "Cynthia's version" to make yourself an open hood. Tie some leftover lining round your head like a headscarf, pop your hood on top and you'll look great.

Got an extra £20 and want something really useful and special?

Order yourself a medieval belt in a colour of your choice, like one of these. Tie round waist with the end dangling down and feel brilliant.

Hungry for more?

Why not use the How to make a t-tunic tutorial to make a shift to go under it - if you get an extra 2m of ikea bomull cotton it makes a great lightweight underlayer and you're still under £30!

How to adapt a commercial pattern to make a high status dress

Attempting something that looks as complex as a medieval style dress can be a pretty daunting prospect, even for someone with a bit of experience in dressmaking. Fortunately, there are lots of patterns available, ranging from some very "costumey" ones made by pattern companies such as Simplicity, Butterick and McCall's, through to incredibly well researched and complex ones by the likes of Reconstructing History.

The beauty of using a pattern is that you don't have to do it exactly like the instructions say. The pattern gives you the basic shapes, and from there you can play with colours, lengths, trims and buttons until you get something uniquely your own. Using this pattern, I made a dress in heraldic colours with buttons down the front, as a good approximation of a medieval cotehardie, suitable for a Dawnish lady, a wealthy marcher Steward, or even a Highguard noble, particularly if you made it in black or black-and-white to match her Chapter's colours.

Butterick 4287 is a good pattern for a medieval dress that you can have a lot of fun with. Here's how I did it, with a few pointers that might save you some time, and spark off your own creativity.

Working with commercial patterns

If you've got experience using patterns, feel free to skip this bit! Here are a few things to be aware of if you're just starting out.

Pattern sizes don't match ready-to-wear If you wear a size 14, for example, in day to day clothes, don't assume that you'll cut and make a size 14 in your pattern. When you go to get your pattern, make sure you know your waist, bust and hip measurements, and buy the pattern that matches them (you usually get a range of three sizes for each pattern). When you're cutting out, use the size that matches your largest measurement.

Patterns tend to run a little big Generally they make up a little large. Part of this is the design, and part of it is that the seam allowances are usually larger than you think. Make sure you read the instructions and sew the correct distance from the edge of the pieces.

You may not be 5 ft 6, but the pattern thinks you are If you're much taller than this, I suggest adding a bit to the length of the skirts. If you're shorter, you can trim it off at the end.

It's not as hard as it looks Take your time, read the instructions through and take it one step at a time.

Butterick 4827

This is a princess seamed, full length dress with a small train, long straight sleeves and a scoop neck. The pattern shows it with a shaped neck facing, a faced back opening and a laced closure with eyelets.

Fabric

You will need-

- 3m of each of two colours of fabric. I used linen-look cotton - cheap and cheerful at £4.50 per metre. Pre-wash it on a hot wash to get all the shrinkage out of the way.
- 54 small round metal buttons or thereabouts (mine cost 10p each)
- 1m lining fabric for the sleeves - cotton curtain lining at £1.75 per metre from ikea looks good
- Thread
- 1m bias binding

Walkthrough

- 5 What else could I do?

Cut out your pattern pieces - 1, 2, 3 and 4 are the front, side front, side back and back of the dress, in the size that matches your measurements. Cut the sleeve piece out too.

Now, lay out your unfolded fabric, with one colour on top of the other, and pin the pattern pieces on. Ignore the cutting layout given in the pattern - it's rubbish and wasteful. Move your pieces around so you can fit them all in, and so that you waste as little fabric as possible. You can always widen or narrow the skirt parts of the pattern pieces to fit the cloth you have. Then cut your pieces of fabric out- you should end up with one set of front, side front, side back, back and a sleeve in each colour. Ignore all the other pattern pieces.

Pin your pieces together- the pattern instructions will help here. Where the front meets the side front, you'll have to be quite careful - match the notches and slightly stretch one piece of fabric more than the other so that they line up perfectly along the seam line (1,5cm from the edge). Pin all the pieces together, then slip the gown over your head and see if you can get it on - pins should be on the outside.

The pattern is really big!

I found it was enormous at this stage- way baggy at the neck, and I could slip it on without any need for a closure (which is handy, and I decided to keep it that way). I moved the pins at the centre front and centre back so that at the top it was tighter- from the bust down I kept it the same, but pinned in a good two inches front and back at the neck, smoothly tapering that line until it met the seam line lower down. You might find getting a friend to pin the back in helps

Check you're happy with the fit, and slither out, losing as few pins as you can at this stage. Sew down your pinned lines, removing the pins as you go (otherwise you might break a sewing machine needle). Once sewn, remove all the pins. Try the frock on again. Re-pin and stitch if you need to alter the fit in some areas.

Now iron all your seams. I mean it! Finish your neck line with bias tape - sew it right side to right side round the neck, then turn it to the inside so it's invisible, and stitch it in place by hand.

Take your sleeve pieces and make sure you've got them the right way round. Then match each sleeve to its lining and sew the cuff edges together. You can then sew the sleeve and its lining continuously into a long tube, then turn the lining inside the outer fabric and tack it together at the sleeve head, having made a complete lined sleeve. You can stitch around the top to hold the two layers together - stitch close to the edge, and this will be hidden in the armhole of your dress.

Next, fit the sleeve to the arm hole in the dress, following the instructions in the pattern (and easing it a little bit as you go) and stitching your sleeves in place. Start by matching the underarm seams of the sleeve and the dress, and pin the shoulder seam so it matches the middle of the top of the sleeve, then pin it evenly all the way round. I put the sleeves in backwards this time. (See, there isn't a mistake you can make that I haven't done already!)

Hem the bottom edge of your frock. No one will see it, so use the sewing machine and spare your sanity.

Then, down the centre front seam, mark 1 inch intervals in dots of marker pen, and sew your buttons on for decoration. I advise getting a good movie while you do this. It's fiddly and time consuming, but details like this can really make your costume stand out.

Done! Total cost: £38, plus whatever you paid for the pattern - which, if you've cut and pinned it carefully you can use again. Wear with a belt.

What else could I do?

I found the sleeves on the original pattern a bit wide, so I tapered them down to a narrow cuff. You could do that if you want, or cut them off at the elbow, or keep them wide so you can roll them up.

You could change the length of the dress to make it ankle, knee or thigh height - you could put the buttons on in groups of 2 or 3, or space them out more.

You could alternate coloured panels in the dress, make it in one colour, put lacing down the front, add trim round the collar...

Make it your own! Now go have fun.

How to make a fur hat

Overview

A fur-edged hat is a simple piece of kit to make that particularly suits Wintermark, Varushka and a League citizen hailing from the northern city of Temeschwar. It's easy to imagine a well-travelled Marcher or Navarr wearing something like this as well, or perhaps even a Dawnish yeoman pulling one down over their ears on a freezing winter morning.

This guide was written by Oliver Busby, and has been rated "suitable for a beginner" by our local costume expert.

Making the hat

I first had the idea thanks to this article here, and conveniently I had some short haired dark brown fake fur that I bought a couple months ago along with a whole load of purple wool I bought before Christmas. This should be the kind of thing that anyone can make with very little materials and is of course perfect for Norse inspired settings or other similar cultures (Varushka or Wintermark in Empire LRP for example) but to be honest I think you could use it at most events and get away with it to keep your head warm.

Materials

The only materials that are needed are the wool, the fake fur and some thread. I used a strip of fur about 6 by 24 inches (obviously will be less if you have a smaller head) and a length of wool about 30 by 7 inches (but if you were smarter than I was, you could manage it with less fabric thanks to better template placement). I don't know the exact price but I would be surprised that it come to more than £6-10 or so, and most of that due to the expense of the fake fur I picked up.

Washing the wool

The first thing was to wash the wool, which I was reliably informed was a good idea. I think there are more professional ways of doing it, but my wool was washed in the machine, with a bit of liquid detergent on a 30 degree wash for 50 minutes. I didn't see much difference so i washed it again at a higher temperature and when it came out there was a noticeable difference in the amount the cut edges frayed (much less after washing) which makes the project a lot easier thanks to there being no need to hem it.

Constructing the hat

Onto the construction. There are various ways of doing this but they all consist of cutting triangles of fabric and stitching them together. Depending on the style you can just cut out two large and long triangles that are sewn together leaving a long section that is folded over and held by a pin like this one or it can be made with smaller panels like the one I linked at the start.

I decided to follow the more generic skullcap version and go with 4 panels, the length of which I got by measuring the circumference of my head and then dividing it by 4, and I got the height by following these instructions. I also added an inch or two to the circumference to take into account the fur I would be adding later and my hair. I recommend erring on the side of caution here, far better to make it too big and cut out later then find yourself with too small a hat.

I used some old card to work up the template as I didn't have any spare fabric around, and then cut 3 more triangles out of card that I pinned together to check the fit. I had my fair share of dud attempts, so don't get disheartened if you have to re-do the template a few times to get it right.

For my finished template, I ended up with four triangles in the hat and gave each one a 90 degree angle on the top - I did this just by using the corner of my ruler.

After the fit was right I cut the four triangles out of the wool, and pinned them together to check the fit on my head before stitching them together with a blanket stitch. It is an incredibly easy stitch to do, just lie the two pieces of fabric flat and follow this tutorial here, with this tutorial laying out how to finish your sewing. It also gives a nice border if you were to use a thicker thread in a different colour (which I should have done) and want to leave the seams showing.

Now you have your basic hat shape, try it on again for the fit. I actually had to unpick one side of sewing and cut it down a bit to ensure a better fit. Don't worry if it appears to be about half an inch or an inch too big, this space is needed for the fur trim you are adding in a moment.

Trimming

Take your strip of fur and cut it to match the circumference of the hat then pin a small part of it wrong side up to the inside of your hat like so. Take care to use a stanley knife or something similar to cut along the backside of the fur and not scissors as it causes a huge mess and ruins the fur.

Use a running stitch or a backstitch to sew the fabric and the fur together then remove the pins. This anchors the fur to the hat and helps to tighten the fit to your head ensuring that the hat should fit snug.

Now you decide how wide of a fur trim you want on your hat and trim it down accordingly. I think my fur was about 5 inches wide including the part tucked on the inside but it is up to personal taste.

Pin the fur in place alongside the outside of the hat and then just like before sew the fur onto the fabric. For this bit I flipped the hat inside out which was a lot easier as it meant the fur wasn't obscuring the needle and thread.

There you have it! One fur lined hat.

Working out the point

This is a fairly simple guide for working out the angles involved in making the hat come to a point.

How to make a t-tunic

How to make T - Tunic

Every outfit needs a foundation, and here's a tunic that's a great place to start. Even though we're not re-enactors, it's basically historically accurate, and has several nice practical features. All you need to be able to do is thread a sewing machine and sew a straight line - you could even do this with handsewing, though it might take a while. The measurements supplied are for a garment which will fit up to a relatively large man (44in chest) but as it's an unfitted garment it will work on people a lot smaller - just shorten the arms.

TIP: If you'd like a more personalised fit, measure across your shoulders from one edge to the other, add an inch and use this for the width of your front and back pieces (you might want to check that it is larger than half of your chest measurement +3 inches - otherwise use the larger of the two measurements). For the arm length, measure from the edge of your shoulder to the bone at your wrist, and add an inch. Always err on the side of largeness - you can always trim it down.

You will need

- 2.5m of fabric which is 60 inches wide. We suggest linen, as it's comfortable, cool in summer and warm in winter, reasonably cheap and looks fantastic.
- Thread in a matching or darker colour. (TIP: if you think you might dye the garment later, get cotton or silk thread. Normal sewing thread won't dye and you'll end up with visible stitching. Coats cotton thread is very good. Guterman quilting cotton thread is too coarse.)
- A tape measure
- A pen
- An iron

Total cost - about £13. You should be able to get linen for £3-6 per metre (try ebay). Shown with a charity shop belt (£2.75)

First - take a look at this picture:

This is basically what your tunic looks like, laid flat, from the front. Looks like a T shirt, right? The body is a big rectangle, as are the sleeves. The little blue bits under the arms are triangles of fabric called gussets, which act to give you a little bit of room under your arms for comfort and movement, and take the stress off the seams at that point. The red triangles are called gores - they're sewn on to the straight piece to give leg room.

This is how it looks before you sew up the side seams:

Looks fiddly! Why can't I just cut that shape in one piece?

The answer is that there's no reason why not. In fact, you can find specific instructions on just how to do that here: <http://tutorials.abbott.me.uk/odyssey/rome>

The trouble with the one piece construction method is that you waste a lot of fabric, and if you're big you'll find the sleeves too short. Historically, loom width was far less than the width of modern fabric, so they invented ingenious solutions like piecing the garment to save money when fabric was expensive and labour was cheap. But try it this way - the underarms are more comfortable and hard wearing, and you'll save fabric and money.

Ok. But why do I need an iron?

You'll get a much better result if you press your seams at every step. Once you've sewn a seam, put it on the ironing board and press it open - it will look like this:

You can sew several seams then press them open, but a good rule is don't sew across a seam until you've pressed it. Feel free to ignore this bit if it's too complex or you can't be bothered, but I guarantee it'll improve your final result.

Cutting out the pieces

- The Fronts (white): Cut two pieces measuring 25 inches by 42 inches
- The Sleeves (yellow): Cut two pieces measuring about 18 inches by 25 inches
- The gussets (blue): cut four pieces which are right angled triangles with the two short sides measuring 6 inches (in essence, cut two 6x6 squares then cut them in half along the hypotenuse, like a posh sandwich)
- The gores (red): cut four right angled triangles, about 24 inches long by 14 inches wide.

Here is a possible cutting layout for 60 inch wide fabric - if you do it this way you should get your garment cut out of 2.1m of fabric, but it's always best to have a bit spare for cockups.

Putting it together

The best place to start is sewing the front to the back along one of the short edges. Cut the neckhole by cutting a shallow scoop shape, like in the diagram, about 8 inches across and about 2 inches deep - start small, you can always enlarge it later. Now, fold the sleeves in half along the SHOR T edge, and mark the centre point on both. Sew your gussets on to the sides of your sleeves - they should look like this:

Match the mark you made to the shoulder seam on each side, and sew the sleeves to the body pieces (front and back). It should look like this:

Optional extra step

If you omit this step, you'll have a perfectly wearable garment, but it will have quite wide sleeves. That's fine if that's the look you're going for, or if you're planning on tucking them into vambraces. If you want a neater look, you'll need to taper the sleeves. This is dead easy.

After you've sewn the gussets on, but before you sew the sleeves onto the body, lay your sleeves out flat. The edge without the gussets is the end that's going to be at your wrist. Fold the sleeve in half down its length, and measure out five inches from the folded edge at the wrist, then mark that point on both sides of the folded cloth. When you unfold it, you'll have two marks which are ten inches apart, centred on the mid point. Draw one line from each of these points to connect to where the gusset meets the sleeve at the other end, then trim off the excess cloth. This sounds clunky - the picture shows it much better:

So you see you've now got a nicely tapered cuff. If you want the wrist to be tighter or baggier, just increase or decrease the width of the fabric at the cuff end.

Now sew in the gores. TIP: start from the bottom edge and sew up. Now if you lay it flat, we're back to this picture:

Now all you do is fold it in half along the line in the drawing, and sew along the dotted lines, like so:

Hem the cuff and the lower edge - you can do this by hand or by machine, either is fine.

To finish the neckline, you can turn the raw edge inside and hem it by hand. Check your head goes through the hole before you start! Or, to make it neater, use bias tape. You can read a short article on how to do that here (Part A - how to make a nice curved neckline on your garment). <http://tutorials.abbott.me.uk/home/bias-tape>

And there it is! Done! You've made your very own historically accurate tunic. Belt it, add your trousers and you're good to go.

What else can I do with this pattern?

- Try making it longer, for a robe or dress. Make the sleeves elbow length for a different look.
- You can make it in different colours and materials for different nations - black or white for Highguard, bright heraldic colours for Dawn, a nice muted natural brown for the Marches.
- You can make the skirts much wider by making wider gores. However, if you do, you should change the shape of the gores from right angled triangles to isocese triangles, otherwise the sides of your bliaut will be much longer than the front and back. The pictures shows how:

How to submit a background

Developing a background FAQ

The descriptions of the Empire and the world are presented on the wiki as a broad but deep overview. They include all the detail you should need to be able to create your background including culture, history and geography relevant to your character. When you develop your personal background the briefing material is designed to allow you to perhaps add some small details to the setting during the submission process.

Submitting a background

- Submit your background online when you create your character or group
- Our plot team will check your background

Your background will be checked by our plot teams who will ensure that it fits with the detail of the Empire setting. If your background is not possible within the setting then they will be able to give you feedback so that you can amend your background accordingly. They may also be able to give you some additional input or ideas to enhance your background. Please ensure that your email address is up to date on your Profound Decisions account, as this is how they will contact you.

Language

The pre-dominant language in the Empire, and the surrounding region, is called Imperial, which is phys repped by the English language.

Common misunderstandings

We have already noted some consistent errors or misunderstandings.

- Inheritance - the Empire is a meritocracy where there is negligible inheritance of property, lands or titles.
- Lineage - lineage is not a genetic inheritance and can occur in many ways. Individual lineages are passed on in different ways.
- The Throne - Personal relationships with previous incumbents of the throne are not appropriate background material.
- Avoid inappropriate references - Themes Not appropriate for Empire include non-consensual sex; please do not include these references in your background.
- Orphans - Please consider the way children are raised and treated in the Empire when writing your background.
- Law and Order - The Empire is an orderly place. Our NPC magistrates are equally happy to prosecute crimes that players have written into their character backgrounds as they are crimes they have committed on the field - there have been some high profile cases in which characters were executed for murders committed in their backgrounds.
- Prisons - The Empire does not imprison criminals. Criminals in Empire are generally either fined or executed, depending on the severity of their crimes.
- Social mobility - The Empire categorically has no slaves, and every citizen is equal under the law. While some citizens are richer or poorer than other, there are no serfs and any peasant can end up a landowner simply by taking two years of military service.
- Relatively wealthy - Every character has a persona resource. The game assumes that characters attending the Anvil summits are influential people - it is tricky to characterise yourself as a beggar when you have access to money, herbs, resources, crystal mana or the like.
- Equality - Unlike some of the historical settings the game uses for inspiration, the entire Empire world is egalitarian and gender-blind. Nobody anywhere discriminates against anyone based on gender or sexuality. There are plenty of other things that they can discriminate on. Our equality and diversity rules apply in character as well as out of character.
- Arranged marriages - People may marry for political reasons, but the idea that someone might feel they had the right to force someone to marry someone else against their will is laughable, and also a crime.
- Highguard & Lineage - While Highguard "is not a generous nation to the less than fully human" it is not an oppressive state.

Amending a background

You cannot use the website to change a character background once you have played your character at an event. If you need to change any details on your background then email admin@profounddecisions.co.uk with any changes you want to make.

Submitting a personal background

Creating a Personal background

- A personal background is a brief biography of your character.
- A personal background should be no more than 2000 characters in length (including spaces).
- Please contact us at empire.backgrounds@profounddecisions.co.uk if you want additional help or information when writing your background.
- Please spellcheck your background before submitting it.

A background summarises the things you have done and your reasons for being at Anvil for the meetings of the movers and shakers of the Empire. Creating a background can help you develop a sense of who your character is and how they interact with the world in which the game is set. Detailed information about the campaign setting is presented in the Empire wiki. The information presented in the Wiki is all available to any Imperial character and if you read the sections of the wiki that are relevant to your character then they should help you develop a background that is in keeping with the setting. You will not be provided additional briefing material after you have generated your character; all the information available is kept on the wiki.

It is also important to keep it simple enough that you will remember it! It is quite possible that two years down the line a plot writer may see an element of your background and include it in a plot. If you don't remember your background, you are likely to be left out or miss your opportunity.

What to include

- A short character history.
- Any secrets that your character might have.

When submitting your background for the plot team to read, please try to bear in mind that there are hundreds of players in the campaign so the plot team have a lot of backgrounds to read through. A background that is informative but concise is ideal. A background that includes a short in-character piece or description is fine, but lengthy in-character documents are not necessary. Occasionally the plot team will make use of details submitted in backgrounds when creating plot for events. This is fairly unusual; your background is intended for your use, to help you create goals and a motivation for your character. The kind of background that is most useful to the plot team is a short summary of the things you have done and how your character fits into your nation's and the Empire's history. Descriptions of your personality or your arch-nemesis are not used by the plot team.

It is also useful to focus your background on your character and what they have done. Knowing your parents' names and their actions is only relevant to the plot team if those actions somehow reflect on your character. Knowing you are the child of someone executed for treason, who strives to clear their name, is cool. Knowing that your parents were bakers called Lois and Clark who met during a bar fight is much less useful.

Submitting a group background

Creating a Group background

- A group background is a brief history of the group.
- It should be a short summary, providing key details, of no more than 4000 characters (including spaces).
- The Group's Oath should be no more than 1000 characters (including spaces).
- Please contact us at empire.backgrounds@profounddecisions.co.uk if you want additional help or information when writing your background.
- Please spellcheck your background and oath before submitting them.

A group background summarizes the history of your group, how it came into being and what it has done since its founding. Creating a group background can help develop a sense of what your group is, how the characters in the group relate to each other as well as provide you all with objectives and activities for fun at events. Detailed information about the campaign setting is presented on the Empire wiki and should provide a number of possible group types for each nation that might be very applicable to your group - some of these have their own pages that discuss how to create that type of group.

What to include

- A short group history.
- Any secrets that your group might have.

When submitting your background for the plot team to read, please try to bear in mind that there are hundreds of players in the campaign so the plot team have a lot of backgrounds to read through. A background that is informative but concise is ideal. A background that includes a short in-character piece or description is fine, but lengthy in-character documents are not necessary. Occasionally the plot team will make use of details submitted in backgrounds when creating plot for events. This is fairly unusual; your background is intended for your use, to help you create goals and a motivation for your group. The kind of background that is most useful to the plot team is a short summary of the things your group have done and how you fit into your nation's and the Empire's history. Howling Despite of the Yawning Maw

Winter Magnitude 50

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets a character, who must be present throughout. The target character must be a contributor participating in the performance of the ritual.

Effects

This enchantment allows the target to call MASS WEAKNESS once during the duration. The character must be able to cast spells to make this call - it explicitly will not work if they are wearing armour.

While under the effect of the enchantment, the target experiences a role-playing effect: the target finds themselves urged towards savagery. They feel an urge to mercilessly slaughter anyone who threatens them, their friends, or their family. They find it easy to suggest courses of actions that others might view as atrocious, if those actions would destroy or weaken their enemies. The longer the enchantment remains without being unleashed, the more bloodthirsty they become. When they do use the power granted by the ritual, they feel an almost irresistible urge to voice a savage howl, yell, or bellow. This effect is particularly pronounced among characters of the draughir lineage, and has in the past prompted physical violence between high lineage winterborn and anyone they perceived as threatening "their" people.

The effect lasts until the end of the next battle, skirmish or quest the character participates in; or until the end of the current event, whichever is sooner. The power of the ritual can be invoked only once during this time.

Additional Targets

The ritual can affect additional characters from the same coven. Each additional character increases the magnitude of the spell by 30. Additional characters must be present throughout, and each must contribute to the performance of the ritual.

Option

Any caster who has mastered the ritual may choose to substitute beggar's lye for crystal mana when contributing to it. Every 2 measures of beggar's lye spent counts as 1 crystal mana when contributing to the ritual.

OOO Note

If you enter a battle, skirmish or quest with one of these enchantments active on you, you must let a referee with a radio know about it shortly before or after your passage through the Sentinel Gate.

If you are expecting to deploy one of these effects, you are invited to bring this to the attention of any nearby referee or marshal shortly before you do so; they will then be able to assist the targets in taking the call correctly

Description

This battlefield ritual allows a powerful magical attack to be unleashed against a group of enemies, weakening them and leaving them incapable of casting spells, using enchanted items or performing heroic deeds.

For many Winter ritualists, the Howling Despite of the Yawning Maw is superior to both the weakness spell and rituals such as Hungry Grasp of Despair because it spreads the curse of weakness among many enemies at the same time. Used wisely, this ritual can neutralise an elite band (such as an orc chieftain and his bodyguards), or cut-off an entire enemy coven from their magic. It is at its most useful when combined with a keen awareness of enemy capabilities.

- 2 Description
- 3 Common Elements

The late enchanter Bauris d'Werwell made good use of the ritual when facing the Jotun on the eastern front. His knights would identify and taunt groups of barbarian Ulvenwar, luring them into a charge against their apparently exposed position. At the last moment, the Earl would unleash the power of this ritual, depriving them on their strength and making it impossible for them to smash through the Dawnish defences. The startled orcs could then be quickly slaughtered. Eventually, the Jotun refused to charge any group they saw in the black-and-silver cockatrice heraldry of House d'Werwell at all - which the canny strategists of the house quickly found new ways to exploit. Sadly the majority of the noble house died fighting the Thule alongside Empress Britta during the fall of Skarsind.

Howling Despite of the Yawning Maw also sees some use when fighting supernatural threats. It can prevent a mob of husks from rising again when they are struck down, for example. While it is an expensive option, the curse the ritual unleashes can weaken a magician, magical healer, or creature with dangerous powers lurking within a group of other opponents - the ability to weaken everyone within range should not be overlooked. There are very few other ways for magicians to exert their power beyond the reach of their implement, after all.

When the power of this ritual is unleashed, the ritualist doing so often feels an overpowering urge to unleash a screaming howl. This has led to some concern that the ritual in some way draws on the power of the Wendigo, and calls for it to be subject to interdiction, given Wendigo has the enmity of the conclave. Extensive research by Torval of Highwatch was presented to the Conclave in Autumn 348YE that demonstrated that the ritual is not associated with Wendigo directly, despite the boons that creature claimed to be able to offer to enhance its performance.

In the Marches this ritual is sometimes called Topple the Lofty Pedestals, while in The Brass Coast it is referred to as Calling the Black Wind.

Common Elements

When performing this ritual, the coven often invokes forces of despair, fear and hunger. Oppressive music or thundering rhythms that begin fast and become slower and slower, symbolic of the way power ebbs from those effected by this curse, are common; so are frenzied dances that reach a climax with the performers collapsing as if from exhaustion. The slow ringing of bells often accompanies this ritual.

The target of the ritual is always a contributor, and the ritual should reflect that. Some ritualists, especially in Varushka use the target's implement as a focus, passing it from magician to magician, whispering curses and dire promises of doom to the tool before returning it to the ultimate target. Others might prepare an infusion of bladeroot which is drunk by the magicians, and causes them to experience momentary symptoms of nausea, weakness, and uncertainty.

Other elements might include the runes Kyrop or Naeve, or a dramaturgical scene in which the Captain succumbs to despair and frailty. For an astronomancer, the ritual has a clear correspondence with the Drowned Man constellation. Some Dawnish - and even a few Highborn magicians - consider evoking the spirit of the malign manticore.

If the coven intends to draw additional power through the use of beggar's lye, it is not uncommon to dilute the lye in water and use it to paint designs on the skin of the target. If the concentration is high enough, the caustic solution will cause slightly painful minor burns that fade over the course of an hour or so - tracing runes in this way is especially appropriate. Some covens take the risky decision to prepare an extremely dilute solution, often in a central cauldron, which the target drinks a little of at the climax. Any physick would counsel against consuming what amounts to a poisonous acid, but the belief is that the magic of the ritual protects the subject from the worst effects of consuming dilute beggar's lye.

Hunger of the Draughir

Rules

Winter Magnitude 2

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets a character, who must be present throughout.

This spell is an enchantment. A target may only be under one enchantment effect at a time.

Effects

The target gains one additional rank of fortitude

In addition, the target gains the draughir ability to eat carrion: the target can get sustenance from anything they can eat or drink, even if it would normally cause them to become sick, and don't need as much food, drink or sleep as normal. They can eat rotting meat, spoiled vegetables and uncooked flesh or drink blood, stagnant water or rancid milk without ill effect.

They experience a roleplaying effect however: You feel hungry all the time, and no amount of food can satisfy you, although you suffer no physical disadvantages.

The effect lasts until the start of the next Profound Decisions Empire event.

Additional Targets

This ritual can affect additional characters from the same band. Every two additional characters increases the magnitude by 3. Additional characters must be present throughout.

Description

The target of this ritual is imbued with a splinter of the Winter Realm's relentless hunger; it lodges in their gut and writhes there, leaving them ravenous. Yet at the same time it causes some of Winter's cold, hard resilience take root in them, turning their blood cold and thick.

In today's Empire it is rare for anyone to starve; yet this has not always been the case. In pre- and early-Imperial times this ritual would sometimes be performed by a runesmith or a volhov on volunteers from an isolated community, who would then be able to live on leftovers and carrion while their families and friends shared out the best of their meagre provisions through periods of drought, poor-harvest or long winter. It is a common tale that some of those who volunteered sired or gave birth to draughir as a consequence of the ritual, and even today there are magicians who counsel against being intimate with others while under this enchantment. In times of reasonable plenty, this spell is mostly useful for enhancing the constitution of an individual who is already quite tenacious, or as an adjunct to the use of an Abraxus Stone.

This ritual is sometimes associated with the Eternal Sorin; some ritualists evoke the name of Wise Rangara and claim that this ritual represents hard decisions and sensible, practical solutions to problems. A very few ritualists invoke Wendigo; those who do so, do so secretly and use the fortitude this ritual grants them to engage in unspeakable feasts. When such ritualists are uncovered, they are often declared sorcerers by the Imperial Conclave, or at the very least brought before magistrates to answer charges of murder or desecration.

As with many enchantment rituals, common elements include the consumption of food and drink; unlike many such rituals, it is common to use spoiled food or drink rather than wholesome sustenance. Unsurprisingly, the rune of hunger is often used, painted onto the skin especially the skin of the belly. Likewise an evocation of The Drowned Man, or of carrion beasts such as crows, rats or even hyena may be appropriate. Navarr ritualists may mark the target with the blood of a draughir, but usually only if one of the ritualists is of that lineage.

Hungry Goat

Hungry Goat Song

Lyrics by Jude

Melody traditional Gaelic, as sung by Karine Polwart here:

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=jSsmZsZhVac&feature=youtube_gdata_player

Early in the morning And without any warning My goat ate all the pants That were hanging on the line

Chorus: Goaty, goaty, hungry little goaty Goaty, goaty, hungry all the time

Daddy went to borrow Some pants to wear tomorrow But the goat had eaten mummy's And had eaten all of mine

Chorus: Goaty, goaty, hungry little goaty Goaty, goaty, hungry all the time

Daddy started cursing And the goat looked full to bursting But it went back to the washing 'cause we didn't see in time

Chorus: Goaty, goaty, hungry little goaty Goaty, goaty, hungry all the time

So later in the morning And with hardly any warning My goat ate all the socks That were hanging on the line...

Hungry Grasp of Despair

Rules

Winter Magnitude 14

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying.

Effects

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets a character, who must be present throughout. The target character must have the magician skill.

This spell is an enchantment. A target may only be under one enchantment effect at a time.

Effects

The target gains the ability to cast the weakness spell four times each day as if they know it without spending any mana.

They also experience a roleplaying effect: You feel powerful and deserving of respect. You experience an urge to punish people who disrespect you or your authority.

If the target regains all spent personal mana by resting in a magical aura such as that provided by the Chamber of Delights, or drinks an Elixir of Empyrean Art, they also regain all spent uses of this ability at the same time. Other methods of restoring personal mana do not restore the ability cast weakness.

The effect lasts until the start of the next Profound Decisions Empire event.

Additional Targets

This ritual can affect additional characters from the same coven. Each additional character increases the magnitude by 11. Additional characters must be present throughout.

Option

Any caster who has mastered the ritual may choose to substitute beggar's lye for crystal mana when contributing to it. Every 2 measures of beggar's lye spent counts as 1 crystal mana when contributing to the ritual.

Description

With the power of this enchantment, a magician can curse, demoralize, and disempower an elite band of foes or an enemy coven. It is at its most useful when the ritualists are supported by (or are themselves) battlemages and warriors who can take advantage of the confusion that comes from being denied the use of potent techniques. It is also useful for disrupting magical workings - weakened magicians are unable to contribute to rituals for example swiftly ensuring that an enemy working will fail quickly and efficiently.

The ritual is also surprisingly effective when dealing with husks - dead bodies possessed and animated by spirits of the realms or by angry ghosts. These malignant creatures tend to possess supernatural vitality, and can prove particularly resistant to being destroyed. Sapping their strength removes their ability to rise again, and has the added advantage that it will prevent them from using any supernatural attacks they may possess.

Several eternals of the Winter realm are known to offer boons related to this ritual, and to the weakness curse as a whole. Kaela in particular may offer a boon that makes this enchantment easier to cast, or allows the power to be drawn on more possible. The lesson this ritual teaches - that strength is transitory and that it will eventually fade - appeals particularly to her grim sensibilities. Tharim of the Thrice-cursed Court by contrast appreciates the way that magicians who master this ritual can punish their subordinates at a whim, removing the power of their thralls as they wish. He is said to have provided magical foci to make it easier to perform the ritual, which also allow even more weakness to be bestowed by those under its effects.

Similar to Unending Cascade of Blood's Fire, the Hungry Grasp of Despair creates an enduring curse on those subjected to its power - one that it is not necessarily within the power of the magician to remove. Magical weakness does not fade over time, and those brought low by this magic usually require treatment by a physick, the aid of a magician versed in more wholesome lore, or an apothecary-brewed potion before they can restore their strength. This treatment can often prove tricky to find on a battlefield, of course.

This ritual has existed in one form or another since the earliest records, and it is possible that the weakness incantation itself began as a refinement of the power it grants. Among some League mountebanks and more cynical troupes it is called Fear for the Mighty. This references the idea that it is the powerful who have the most to lose from the effect of this ritual. In Wintermark it is sometimes called Kyrop's Balance; in The Marches it is Levelling the Playing Field. In some parts of Dawn it is scurrilously called Humble the Errant Knights; a name with multiple meanings depending on who is performing the ritual. A number of Varushkan cabalists refer to it as the Scourge of the Foolish and several stories recount how it has been used to prevent apprentice magicians with more power than sense from harming themselves and others.

Common Elements

When performing this ritual, the coven often invokes forces of despair, fear and hunger. Oppressive music or thundering rhythms that begin fast and become slower and slower, symbolic of the way power ebbs from those effected by this curse, are common; so are frenzied dances that reach a climax with the performers collapsing as if from exhaustion.

Other elements might include the runes Kyrop or Naeve, or a dramaturgical scene in which the Bishop slowly succumbs to weakness and frailty (often in the Tomb). An astronomancer might invoke the power of the Drowned Man constellation, while a practitioner of heraldic magic might call on the spirit of the insidious manticore or the echoing roar of the terrible chimera. A goeticist will find the names of Sorin and especially Kaela resonate well with this ritual, although in Varushka Wise Rangara is also popular especially when the ritual focuses around the need for the wise to control the powers of the foolish.

Hunt of Alderei the Fair

Overview

The Hunt of Alderei the Fair is located at the foot of the Opascari mountains in the Varushkan territory of Volodmartz. Custodianship of the Hunt grants an Imperial title; a seat on the Imperial Bourse; and a seasonal bounty of valuable weirwood

The Resource

The hunt is a great weirwood forest that was also the site of one of the most vicious battles against the forces of Alderei the Fair, the tyrant-boyar of pre-Imperial Varushka. At the foot of the Opascari mountains, this vital strategic asset was nearly burnt to the ground in the wake of the Imperial victory, and said to be haunted to this day. The site is believed to take its name from the treasure seekers who combed the surrounding woods looking for traces of Alderei the Fair in the decades after his defeat.

As an Imperial, rather than national, resource the Hunt is a sore spot for some Varushkans. As with the Granites of Veltsgorsk, there is strong local opinion that the Hunt should be a national seat. After all say the citizens of Volodmartz, it is the Varushkans who endure the darkness beneath the trees so that they may claim the riches of their haunted land. Why is it then that the white granite and weirwood bounty of Varushka are in the hands of foreigners?

And the Hunt is bounteous indeed. One of the richest resources of Volodmartz, the great weirwood forest was the site of one of the most vicious battles during the war with Alderei the Fair. The forest was once even richer - yet in the last days of the war this vital strategic asset was nearly burnt to the ground. Only quick action by Imperial forces prevented the fire consuming all the trees, and to this day on certain nights of the new moon the living trees are sometimes engulfed in a shimmering copper effulgence that seems to have no natural origin.

There is some controversy over the name of the this great weirwood forest. Some say it is named for the three nights of pursuit, when Imperial forces chased the retreating forces of Alderei south-west toward Alderei's Run. Others that it is named for the treasure seekers who combed the surrounding woods looking for traces of Alderei the Fair (more cynical souls say they are looking for traces of his abandoned supply train, and the riches it held) in the decades after his defeat. Darkest of all is the belief that Alderei used to hunt Varushkans through the great forest, for his sport or as part of some dark rites used by the volodny.

Whilst the eerie weirwood trees lend a haunted, supernatural air to the forest, they do not deter visitors. Many are lured by tales of the lost treasures of the baggage train. Others come following rumours that the body of Alderei himself lies somewhere in the deep woods. The workers are often forced to shoo these "hunters" on their way so they can get their work done. And, from time to time, a hunter disappears forever or is found broken and torn in a ditch - this is Varushka, after all.

The Bourse Seat

Responsibilities

The Seat has no particular responsibilities; they simply receive a bounty of weirwood which is theirs to do with as they will. If the Hunt of Alderei the Fair were to be threatened in any way, it would be the responsibility of the Seat to deal with those threats. Likewise, if any particular opportunity were to arise related to the Hunt of Alderei the Fair, the Seat would expect to be consulted as to how that opportunity might be resolved.

Powers

Seat on the Bourse

Custodianship of the Hunt of Alderei the Fair comes with a seat on the Imperial Bourse. For the most part, this Seat comes with no additional responsibilities. It is an Imperial title that grants the right to participate on the rare occasion when the Imperial Bourse as a body is required to make a decision.

Bounty of weirwood

The Seat has control of a source of weirwood and receives Bourse certificates to represent that control. They can dispense this resource as they choose. Production is 26 Imperial wains of weirwood every season.

Appointment

As with all weirwood Bourse seats, the holder of the title is determined during the Winter Solstice. As an Imperial seat, any Imperial citizen may participate in the auction and hold the title.

Custodianship of the Hunt of Alderei the Fair is retained for a year, or until the citizen holding the seat dies, or steps down. An Imperial Bourse seat cannot be revoked by the Imperial Synod.

Hunters and wolves

"I'm sorry, but I'd like to just take a look in your sack, neighbour." Jeanna's tone made it clear she would brook no-nonsense.

The militiawoman's face was neutral, but her hand rested on the head of her axe.

The hairy man flinched away slightly as she reached for him, grimacing, twisting his face into what he obviously intended to be a disarming grin. All he managed to do was make her even more certain he was up to something - the grin accentuated his staring yellow-tinged eyes, and his broken teeth.

"No no no officer, it is nothing, nothing to worry about." he tried to reassure her. "Just a head. A pig head. Yes! Just a pig head for my supper!"

The man glared at her, and clutched the bag protectively.

"Don't try to steal it now!"

The militiawoman looked past the drooling beggar to her two companions. Ranulf peered down into the ditch and then jumped back, swearing. He began to run down along the path to where Jeanna stood, waving his arms, shouting. The man looked back over his shoulder to see what was going on, his brow furrowing.

Jeanna took an executive decision and grabbed the sack away from the beggar-man while he was distracted. It was surprisingly heavy. She tipped it out, and two human heads thudded onto the snow. Her stomach lurched.

As soon as she took the sack, the maniac stopped capering and launched himself at her, howling like a cornered wolf. He tore at her face with his broken, bloody nails and tried to get his hands around her neck.

Ranulf reached them just as Jeanna stopped beating him unconscious.

"The ditch was full of bodies," he said breathlessly, then looked down at the prone figure. "Is he dead?"

"Not yet," said Jeanna..She gingerly touched the bruise on the side of her neck. "But I think we might have solved the mystery of the Hahnmark strangler..."

Overview

Three incidents involving Winter eternal have been brought to the attention of the Imperial citizenry in the last few months. The Tomb-King Sorin has dispatched a herald to recruit participants for a trial of suffering. The Bound-King Tharim of the Thrice-cursed Court has taken advantage of the recent Declaration of Amity to send heralds to the Empire. In Hahnmark, an agent of Wendigo is captured while trying to sow discord and distrust between Wintermark and Varushka.

The Trials of the Pallid Wolf

I am Exquy and I speak for Sorin, The Hungry Wolf.

It is my duty to organise the Trials of the Pallid Charm.

These trials concern themselves with hard choices and suffering, which will be of no surprise to those who understand the concerns of the Tomb King. Nominations for the trial are open to those who have an aching need that drives them. This dark and barren ache is often carved out of past suffering, of wrongs survived, and sharpened to a hungry bite with time. Some nurture it, others suppress it. Those who face the trials of the Pallid Charm will need to be ready to face the truths that lie in the pits of their bellies and the marrow of their bones. Through the trials the Empty One will choose where his aid might best be placed, and what sacrifice should be asked in return for that aid.

- The grim eternal Sorin seeks participants in a trial of hard choices and suffering.

When the soberly dressed draughir arrives at the Castle of Thorns shortly before the Autumn Equinox she is at first assumed to be bringing messages from Highguard Senators.

It is quickly established, however, that she is actually acting as a messenger on behalf of a herald of Sorin named Exquy - presumably on behalf of the Hungry Wolf himself. She politely asks that the message she delivers be circulated to as many Imperial Citizens as possible; and the civil service have tried to make this letter available to anyone who may be interested.

It is clear that Sorin is not offering a general means of communication with this offer. Any information other than the specific details requested are likely to be ignored by the human agent and heralds alike.

Accessibility Info

The First Trial of the Pallid Charm is a tent encounter with good wheelchair access available and optional seating. It is not well lit by default and uses some smoke effects, though we can amend both these on request. (just add this OOC request to your IC details when submitting them). It is designed as a high stress experience and this cannot be changed due to the nature of the Eternal. Although combat is possible dependant on player action, the trial operates IC rules to ensure that safe and fair declarations of non combatant status are possible should combat break out. Subsequent trials will base their accessibility on the needs of participants that progress.

In the Copse of the Bone Birch

Three weeks after the Summer Solstice, three peculiar creatures emerge from a stand of birch trees in Birchland, near the village of Bickwoll. Known as the Copse of the Bone Birch, the area is part of a Winter regio. Wrapped in black cloaks, each one is accompanied by the clank of chains and shows the marks of mortification on their bodies. They are by all accounts heralds of the eternal Tharim.

Their appearance interrupts the ceremonial watering of the birch trees - a ritual designed to protect the local trees from disease and parasites - and causes some consternation. In cold, arrogant tones they explain to the gathered coven that their presence is in accord with the wishes of the Imperial Conclave. They then split up. One heads north, the other east, and while Beaters manage to follow them for a while they soon lose them in the dark woods.

The third creature, calling itself Obligatus picks an old stump near the middle of the regio, sits down ... and doesn't move for two months. Landskeeper Benjamin Bickwoll is keeping a close eye on the situation and has grumpily allowed that he might be prepared to receive and maybe even answer any winged messengers any other Landskeepers might want to send to him. (OOO NOTE: Benjamin Bickwoll, the Copse of the Bone Birch, near Bickwoll, Birchland, Upwold should do it.)

The Hahnmark Strangler

In recent months there have been various lurid reports of mutilated corpses in Skarsind and neighbouring parts of Wintermark. These reports have been investigated thoroughly by the Imperial magistrates who discovered that several of the reported acts were the work of a deranged fanatic, a devotee of the Wendigo who lost all reason in a terrible storm a few winters back. The individual had murdered at least one person and appeared to be deliberately defiling bodies.

The Varushkan National Assembly support our allies in Wintermark. The rumours of assault and mutilation on the bodies of Wintermark citizens have been investigated and found to be the work of a common enemy bound to create division between our nations. Varushka stands with Wintermark, proud citizens of the Empire, Loyal allies.

Rooslan Stanvich Prochnost, Varushkan Assembly, Summer Solstice 381YE, Upheld 120 - 10

The Wintermark Assembly support our allies in Varushka. The rumours of assault and mutilation on the bodies of Wintermark citizen have been investigated and found to be the work of a common enemy bound to create division between our nations. Wintermark stand with Varushka. Proud citizens of the Empire and Loyal allies.

Ylmiska Ferbow, Wintermark Assembly, Summer Solstice 381YE, Upheld 178 - 0

The individual has been caught, tried and executed and there is no reason to expect any further influence from Wendigo on this matter. It appears that his intentions were to try and deepen the divisions between Wintermark and Varushka arising from the incident with Dogri Thulebane and the Iron Helms. Fortunately these attempts appear to have conclusively failed.

OOC Note

This entry is not a plot - but rather an in-character explanation for in-character events that came to light at recent events in which the Iron Helms were accused of mutilating bodies. The source of the stories was a player who had not intended to deceive anyone but had unfortunately misinterpreted the nature of the ongoing events and assumed that it would be ok to create personal events to reflect them. It is usually fine for players to check minor background elements in response to ongoing events but it is always important to check with us before creating events of this significance - so that we can confirm if they are consistent with the campaign or not.

Hurry, Hunter

Original Music & Lyrics by Anna Clifford Tait and Stephanie Heath

RECORDING of this song : Hurry Hunter

Hunter steps through shadows swiftly Creeping, creeping carefully Following the signs that lead him Signs of promise, signs of life

Chorus: Hurry, hunter, darkness chases Don't let nightfall catch you out Once the sun sets, your role changes Blood on snow, you are the prey

Up ahead a movement flashes Hunter freezes, senses strain There she is - the bow swings ready, Arrow nocks to bring her down.

Chorus

Still the moment, silence rings out Arrow looses, flying fast At the last, the gentle doe hears Shivers, bucks and off she goes.

Chorus

Hunter runs, a trail of crimson Stains the snow, the shot was true But the doe is fleeting, fleeing Chase is on to win the prize.

Chorus

Blood on snow the trail grows thicker Weaker, slower, still she runs Hunter thinks of crying children Follows on as darkness falls.

Chorus

Silver body lies before him Crumpled on the forest floor Hunter sees, then come the growlings Children they are crying still.

Hymn to Vigilance

Original tune Akk Fader. Very quiet recording of original here.

I arm myself with sword and shield To take the battlefield And daily armed with faith I go To face a subtler foe An empire pure and whole Must ever be our goal O let me ever vigilant stand Defending faith and land

False doctrines and deceitful words Across the lands are heard And all our sacrifice has bought In the end shall be for nought, If malcontents and fools And raised on high to rule O let me ever vigilant stand Defending faith and land.

These words shall ever be our charge Upon our souls writ large The Empire is our destiny Its guards and lords are we For should we ever fail The darkness shall prevail O let me ever vigilant stand Defending faith and land

I Come and Stand at Every Door

I Come and Stand at Every Door Original lyrics by Nazim Hikmet

I come and stand at every door But no one hears my silent tread I knock and yet remain unseen For I am dead, for I am dead.

I'm only seven although I died In ancient cities long ago I'm seven now as I was then When children die they do not grow.

The last I saw was fell Vallorn My eyes grew dim, my eyes grew blind Death came and turned my bones to dust And that was scattered by the wind.

I need no sleep, I need no breath I need no fruit, nor even bread I ask for nothing for myself For I am dead, for I am dead.

All that I ask is that for peace You fight today, you fight today So that the children of this world May live and grow and laugh and play.

I Wish My Baby Was Born

Trad.

See <http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=H9maHQiDw-A> Tim Eriksen, Riley Baugus & Tim O'Brien

Very slightly filked lyrics below:

I wish, I wish my baby was born
And sitting on its papa's knee
And me, poor girl, were dead and gone
And the cold marsh growing o'er my feet

I ain't ahead, nor never will be
Till the sweet apple grows on a sour apple tree
But still I hope the time will come
When you and I shall be as one

I wish, I wish my love had died
And sent his soul to wander free
Then we might meet where ravens fly
Let our poor bodies rest in peace

(optional) The owl, the owl is a lonely bird
It chills my heart with grief and terror
That someone's blood there on his wing
That someone's blood there on his feathers.

I will make you brooches

Words by Claire Sheridan, to a traditional tune.

A song for the Flower Festival, which is held in Urizen in the Spring. It is a time for the citizens of Urizen to comment and receive comment on their Virtues from other Urizeni citizens. It can also be a time for expressing feelings of love or attraction to others, or letting other citizens know that, as busy as one may be in search of Arete, one would like to share that search with someone else.

I will make you brooches and flowers for your delight, Of birdsong at morning and star-shine at night, I will make a purpose, fit for you and me, Of working together, and so all may see.

I hope you will Prosper, with wealth that you may share, So yellow's one flower that I'd have you wear, With Wisdom you will find the path that suits you best, And so I would place a white bloom upon your breast.

To take action takes Courage, so I'd deck you out in red, And with pink to take Pride in what's done and said, I'd never want a coward to work beside of me, I'll always take Pride in those I keep close to me.

We should all be Loyal, so I'll make a bloom of blue, When those vows are spoken may we keep them true. I'd have you see the danger before the danger's here, For Vigilance green is the colour we wear.

The purple of Ambition I'll give to drive you on, May our works remain long after we're gone, Now bound up in ribbons, this gift I give to you, Now give me an answer before this song is through.

Icon of Judgement

Description

These ceremonial tools, in common with several other, allow a priest to perform or assist with a Liao ceremony that they have not personally mastered. The Icon of Judgement is the rarest of its kind. They are often crafted from thin rods or even short staffs, or from a bundle of thin rods bound together with bands of precious metal. This last form is a metaphor for the idea that a single stick can be broken, but several sticks bound together are almost impossible to snap. Given the uses to which this item, and the ceremony it provides, are commonly put the bundle's symbolism is especially apt.

An Icon of Judgement requires months of work by a skilled artisan, commonly with a set of tools inlaid with dragonbone used especially for crafting religious items. The materials used are usually carefully purified, and in the The Marches in particular a crafter will not embark on creating one of these icons without first being shriven by a trusted priest. Unlike most other icons, an Icon of Judgement is rarely ornamented. They are serious items with a very serious purpose.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of an icon.
- Requirement: You must have the dedication skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: While you are wielding this icon you can perform the excommunicate ceremony as if you knew it.
- Materials: Crafting an Icon of Judgement requires no special materials. It takes two months to make one of these items.

Icon of the Devoted

Description

The Icon of the Devoted allows a priest to perform ceremonies as if they were dedicated to the virtue of Loyalty. It generally takes the form of a piece of religious art, usually depicting a paragon or exemplar of Loyalty such as Bolstering Bill. The Icon is not always a portrait, however - in Wintermark it is sometimes crafted in the form of a medallion or short rod decorated with the bones and feathers of hawks and falcons, generally decorated with the Rune of Bargains, which is known as an Icon of the Hawk. In Varushka, the icon commonly takes the form of a statuette of a dog and is known as a Loyal Hound. Other less common variants are certainly possible - from the beautifully calligraphed scrolls of the Brass Coast to the delicately embroidered favours of Dawn, the only constant is that the Icon of the Devoted be a piece of art that inspire the bearer with the essence of Loyalty.

The icon is equally valuable to a priest who is dedicated to one of the other six virtues as it is to a priest who is dedicated to none of them. It allows them to perform ceremonies such as anointing, consecration, and hallow, and create auras of Loyalty in place of the auras they would otherwise have access to. It also allows a priest to cooperate with priests dedicated to Loyalty who are not part of their sect.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of an icon.
- Requirement: You must have the dedication skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: You may perform ceremonial skills other than dedication as if you were dedicated to the virtue of Loyalty.
- Materials: Crafting an Icon of the Devoted requires 7 ingots of green iron, 5 measures of iridescent gloaming, and 9 measures of dragonbone. It takes 1 month to make one of these items.

Icon of the Driven

Description

The Icon of the Driven, also known as an Icon of the Ascendant, allows a priest to perform ceremonies as if they were dedicated to the virtue of Ambition. It generally takes the form of a piece of religious art, usually depicting a paragon or exemplar of Ambition such as Tian (often called an Icon of the Burnt), Aldones di Sarvos, or Adelmar the Lion. The Icon is not always a portrait, however - in Wintermark it is sometimes crafted in the form of a medallion or short rod decorated with the bones and feathers of rooks, generally decorated with the Rune of Hunger, which is known as an Icon of the Rook or, more rarely, an Icon of the Hungry. In Varushka, the icon commonly takes the form of a statuette of a fox and is known as a Wily Fox. Other less common variants are certainly possible - from the expertly illustrated scrolls recounting the great deeds of the Freeborn, to the beautiful three-panel triptych favoured in the League (generally showing the humble origins, great struggle, and eventual success of the character depicted - with the final panel invariably suggesting that rather than resting on their laurels the ambitious person will not work towards a new goal).

Icons of the Driven are significantly less popular than other, similar icons. Priests who rely on them sometimes encounter an unspoken, perhaps even unconscious, prejudice from dedicated priests and lay followers of Ambition. Splitting one's focus - using a magical item to allow one to wield the auras of Ambition is sometimes seen as reflecting a lack of character, drive, or commitment. To many ambitious people, it simply makes no sense to be dedicated to another virtue and use an Icon of the Driven - it is much more appropriate to be dedicated to Ambition and use the tools provided to employ the auras provided by lesser virtues. It is rarely acceptable to put such sentiments into words, of course.

The icon is equally valuable to a priest who is dedicated to one of the other six virtues as it is to a priest who is dedicated to none of them. It allows them to perform ceremonies such as anointing, consecration, and hallow, and create auras of Ambition in place of the auras they would otherwise have access to. It also allows a priest to cooperate with priests dedicated to Ambition who are not part of their sect.

- Requirement: You must have the dedication skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: You may perform ceremonial skills other than dedication as if you were dedicated to the virtue of Ambition.

Icon of the Forge

Description

As with other, this ceremonial tool allows a priest to perform a Liao ceremony. These icons often bear images of paragons and exemplars such as Isenbrad who are closely associated with crafting; or characters such as Bolstering Bill or Inga Tarn whose legends are connected with special objects. An icon of the forge is sometimes designed to open so that an object can be placed inside it during the ceremony. Other common forms include a bowl or jug used with purified water or oils, or a hefty aspergil or thurible.

It can take months for a skilled artisan to create an icon of the forge. The materials used often include small amounts of magical materials, and it is very common for a crafter to use tools inlaid with dragonbone when working on an icon. More so than other icons, the icon of the forge tends to be intricately worked and some artisans who specialise in making religious accouterments take great care and Pride in making an icon that allows a priest to lay auras over the work of their peers. In Wintermark it is common to see one marked with runes, while in some parts of The Marches and Dawn these icons tend to be more practical in appearance - but still solidly made and decorated.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of an icon.
- Requirement: You must have the dedication skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: While you are wielding this icon you can perform the hallow ceremony as if you knew it.

Icon of the Hearth

Description

As with other, this ceremonial tool allows a priest to perform a Liao ceremony. These icons often bear images of paragons and exemplars closely associated with the home, with defending places or with hospitality but in truth it is difficult to make definitive statements about their appearance beyond the fact that they tend to be significant religious items wielded during a ceremony.

It can take months for a skilled artisan to create an icon of the hearth. The materials used often include small amounts of magical materials, and it is very common for a crafter to use tools inlaid with dragonbone when working on an icon. It is also quite common for an icon of the hearth to be beautifully inlaid with precious metals and stones, and for it to be left in pride-of-place in a shrine when not in use. In many devout homes, an icon of the hearth is the first ornament seen when one enters through the main door, even if the home itself is not consecrated to one of the Virtues.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of an icon.
- Requirement: You must have the dedication skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: While you are wielding this icon you can perform the consecrate ceremony as if you knew it.
- Materials: Crafting an icon of the hearth requires no special materials. It takes two months to make one of these items.

Icon of the High Tower

Description

An icon is generally a ceremonial tool that allows a priest to perform a Liao ceremony they have not personally mastered. The icon of the high tower often bears symbols associated with Wisdom or Vigilance, or the images of paragons and exemplars who showed great insight or clarity of thought, especially the sentinel. The Highborn are sometimes call one an icon of the beacon, while Freeborn, Navarr and Urizen alike may wield an icon of the clear sky. For various reasons they often take the form of a stout walking stick or rod with a sphere of clear gemstone, polished metal sphere or crystal set into one end.

An icon of the high tower requires months of work by a skilled artisan, commonly with a set of tools inlaid with dragonbone used especially for crafting religious items. They often including trace amounts of the magical materials, especially tempest jade and weltsilver.

Icon of the Industrious

Description

An Icon of the Industrious allows a priest to perform ceremonies as if they were dedicated to the virtue of Prosperity. It generally takes the form of a piece of religious art, usually depicting a paragon or exemplar of Prosperity such as Zemress or the Little Mother. The Icon is not always a portrait, however - in Wintermark it is sometimes crafted in the form of a medallion or short rod decorated with the bones and feathers of a magpie, and known as an Icon of the Magpie. Often these icons bear the Rune of Wealth, but they are equally as likely to bear the Rune of Victory. While Pallas is traditionally associated with Prosperity, the idea that Tykonus - which represents struggle and success more than mere wealth and material possessions - is a better fit has gained some purchase in recent decades. In Varushka it often takes the form of a statuette of bees surrounding a hive, and is known as a Hive of Industry. Other less common variants are certainly possible - such as the colourful illuminated scrolls recounting the lives of the exemplars popular in the Brass Coast.

This Icon is especially popular in the Marches. While all the Virtues are recognised and celebrated, many Marchers feel a strong connection to Prosperity. These Icons are often given more down-to-earth names by Marcher priests and lay folk and it is more common to hear talk of an Icon of the Exhausted, Icon of the Aching, or Icon of the Sweated Brow than it is an Icon of the Industrious. A particularly Marcher form of this icon is that of a carefully braided cord, often decorated with tiny silver charms or drops of ambergelt, used to cinch up a handful of corn or wheat stalks to create a Prosperous Sheaf.

The icon is equally valuable to a priest who is dedicated to one of the other six virtues as it is to a priest who is dedicated to none of them. It allows them to perform ceremonies such as anointing, consecration, and hallow, and create auras of Prosperity in place of the auras they would otherwise have access to. It also allows a priest to cooperate with priests dedicated to Prosperity who are not part of their sect.

- Effect: You may perform ceremonial skills other than dedication as if you were dedicated to the virtue of Prosperity.

Icon of the Insightful

Description

An Icon of the Insightful is also known as an Icon of the Measured, Icon of the Shrewd, Icon of the Astute, and of course an Icon of the Wise. It allows a priest to perform ceremonies as if they were dedicated to the virtue of Wisdom. It generally takes the form of a piece of religious art, usually depicting a paragon or exemplar of Wisdom such as Zoria or Avigliana. The Icon is not always a portrait, however - in Varushka it often takes the form of a statuette of a squirrel, and is known as a Wise Gatherer. In Wintermark it is sometimes crafted in the form of a medallion or short rod decorated with the bones and feathers of ravens, generally decorated with the Rune of Wisdom (or the Rune of Thought), which is known as an Icon of the Raven or an Icon of the Blade (Staff). Other less common variants are certainly possible - from the finely written scrolls of the Brass Coast to the clear crystal trapezohedron the Urizen call a White Star.

The icon is equally valuable to a priest who is dedicated to one of the other six virtues as it is to a priest who is dedicated to none of them. It allows them to perform ceremonies such as anointing, consecration, and hallow, and create auras of Wisdom in place of the auras they would otherwise have access to. Icon of the Justicar

Description

As with other icons, this ceremonial tool allows a priest to perform a Liao ceremony. These icons often bear images of paragons and exemplars who defended people against false virtues, corrupt individuals or supernatural threats.

An icon of the justicar is the fruit of months of work for a skilled artisan. The work often includes small amounts of the magical materials, and it is very common for a crafter to use tools inlaid with dragonbone when working on an icon. Icons of the justicar take their name from a title given to some exorcists and inquisitors in the pre-Imperial history of the Brass Coast, who specialised in driving out malign spirits or cleansing unpleasant auras from people, places and objects. In many parts of the Empire they are crafted to resemble torches or braziers, or may actually be censers used to burn strong-smelling materials. In some parts of Varushka they are commonly created in the shape of sturdy metal candlesticks, in which beeswax candles are burnt during exorcism ceremonies.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of an icon. You must be holding this item in hand to use its magical properties.
- Requirement: You must have the dedication skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: While you are wielding this icon you can perform the exorcism ceremony as if you knew it.
- Materials: Crafting an Icon of the Justicar requires no special materials. It takes two months to make one of these items.

Icon of the Pilgrim

Description

As with some other icons, this ceremonial tool allows a priest to perform a Liao ceremony. These icons often bear images of paragons and exemplars closely associated with ideas of travel and stories of service to others, but it is difficult to make definitive statements about their appearance beyond the fact that they tend to be significant religious items wielded during a ceremony.

An icon of the pilgrim is the fruit of months of work for a skilled artisan. The work often includes small amounts of the magical materials, and it is very common for a crafter to use tools inlaid with dragonbone when working on an icon. Icons of the pilgrim take their name from their use in preparing a devout traveller for a journey away from home, granting them spiritual strength when they must go into dangerous situations or even when they simply have to spend a period away from their family and friends. They often take the form of an aspergil, thurible or bowl of water or oil that is used to literally anoint the body of the ceremonial subject.

In some parts of Highguard they take the form of a polished bowl in which the priest and the pilgrim alike wash their hands, or even sometimes their feet. In Wintermark, The Brass Coast and The League they commonly appear as a large chalice or goblet with which the priest and the pilgrim share a drink of wine or fresh water as part of the ceremony.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of an icon.
- Requirement: You must have the dedication skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: While you are wielding this icon you can perform the anointing ceremony as if you knew it.
- Materials: Crafting an Icon of the Pilgrim requires no special materials. It takes two months to make one of these items.

Icon of the Proud

Description

The Icon of the Proud is, paradoxically, rarely actually called an Icon of the Proud. Rather, every bearer tends to refer to it by a name that has personal meaning for themselves and their people. In Dawn, unsurprisingly, it is an Icon of the Glorious. In Wintermark an Icon of the Hero; in Urizen an Icon of Excellence, in the Brass Coast an Icon of Glass. It might be an Icon of the Resolute or Faithful, an Icon of Sacrifice, or an Icon of the Calloused Hand. And these are just the common names that reflect pride in a nation, rather than the myriad other names that represent more personal pride.

It generally takes the form of a piece of religious art, usually depicting a paragon or exemplar of Pride such as Richilde. Usually, the image is of a figure that the bearer personally finds inspiring and this may mean that it contains the likeness of someone who is not technically a paragon or exemplar. Some League priests bear a particular Icon of the Clever that bears the image of Emperor Giovanni for example, inspired by his practical politics. The Icon is not always a portrait either - even more so than other icons it is common for an Icon of the Proud to take the form of a piece of art particular to a given nation. In Varushka for example, it often takes the form of a statuette of an eagle, and is known as a Proud Eagle or occasionally (and a little paradoxically) a Wise Eagle.

The icon is equally valuable to a priest who is dedicated to one of the other six virtues as it is to a priest who is dedicated to none of them. It allows them to perform ceremonies such as anointing, consecration, and hallow, and create auras of Pride in place of the auras they would otherwise have access to. It also allows a priest to cooperate with priests dedicated to Pride who are not part of their sect.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of an icon.
- Requirement: You must have the dedication skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: You may perform ceremonial skills other than dedication as if you were dedicated to the virtue of Pride.
- Materials: Crafting an Icon of the Proud requires 5 measures of iridescent gloaming, 7 ingots of orichalcum, and 9 measures of dragonbone; It takes 1 month to make one of these items.

Icon of the Righteous

Description

An Icon of the Righteous allows a priest to perform ceremonies as if they were dedicated to the virtue of Courage. It generally takes the form of a piece of religious art, usually depicting a paragon or exemplar of Courage such as Inga Tarn or Isaella. The Icon is not always a portrait - in Wintermark it is often crafted in the form of a medallion or short rod decorated with the feathers and bones of jackdaws, painted with the Rune of Battle, and called either a Jackdaw Icon or a Thunderhead Blade. In Varushka, it is commonly crafted as a statue called variously a Brave Bear or a Courageous Boar. In some parts of the Marches, the Varushkan style of Icon has proved surprisingly popular - a statuette of a boar called a Brave Pig is used by many friars.

The icon is equally valuable to a priest who is dedicated to one of the other six virtues as it is to a priest who is dedicated to none of them. It allows them to perform ceremonies such as anointing, consecration, and hallow, and create auras of Courage in place of the auras they would otherwise have access to. It also allows a priest to cooperate with priests dedicated to Courage who are not part of their sect.

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of an icon.
- Requirement: You must have the dedication skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: You may perform ceremonial skills other than dedication as if you were dedicated to the virtue of Courage.
- Materials: Crafting an Icon of the Righteous requires 7 ingots of tempest jade, 5 measures of iridescent gloaming, and 9 measures of dragonbone; It takes 1 month to make one of these items.

Icon of the Seer

Description

An Icon of the Seer, like some other icons, is generally a ceremonial tool that allows a priest to perform a Liao ceremony they have not personally mastered. Sometimes called an Icon of the High Tower, they often bear symbols associated with Wisdom or Vigilance, or the images of paragons and exemplars who showed great insight or clarity of thought, especially the sentinel. In parts of Highguard, the item is called an Icon of the High Tower and takes the form of a tall, thin tower carved with eyes, or an Icon of the Beacon, which depicts a lighthouse rather than a tower. Freeborn, Navarr and Urizen alike may wield an Icon of the Clear Sky. For various reasons they often take the form of a stout walking stick or rod with a sphere of clear gemstone, polished metal sphere or crystal set into one end.

An Icon of the Seer requires months of work by a skilled artisan, commonly with a set of tools inlaid with dragonbone used especially for crafting religious items. They often including trace amounts of the magical materials, especially tempest jade and weltsilver.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of an icon.
- Requirement: You must have the dedication skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: While you are wielding this icon you can perform the insight ceremony as if you knew it.
- Materials: Crafting an Icon of the Seer requires no special materials. It takes two months to make one of these items.

Icon of the Smith

Description

Also known as an Icon of the Forge, Icon of the Weaver, or Icon of the Carpenter, this ceremonial tool allows a priest to perform a Liao ceremony in the same manner as several other icons. These icons often bear images of paragons and exemplars such as Isenbrad who are closely associated with crafting, or characters such as Bolstering Bill or Inga Tarn whose legends are connected with special objects. An Icon of the Smith is sometimes designed to open so that an object can be placed inside it during the ceremony. Other common forms include a bowl or jug used with purified water or oils, or a hefty aspergil or thurible.

It can take months for a skilled artisan to create an Icon of the Smith. The materials used often include small amounts of magical materials, and it is very common for a crafter to use tools inlaid with dragonbone when working on an icon. More so than other icons, the Icon of the Smith tends to be intricately worked and some artisans who specialise in making religious accoutrements take great care and Pride in making an icon that allows a priest to lay auras over the work of their peers. In Wintermark it is common to see one marked with runes, while in some parts of The Marches and Dawn these icons tend to be more practical in appearance - but still solidly made and decorated.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of an icon.
- Requirement: You must have the dedication skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: While you are wielding this icon you can perform the hallow ceremony as if you knew it.
- Materials: Crafting an Icon of the Smith requires no special materials. It takes two months to make one of these items.

Icon of the Steward

Description

As with other icons, this ceremonial tool allows a priest to perform a Liao ceremony. Also known as an Icon of the Hearth, these icons often bear images of paragons and exemplars closely associated with the home, with defending places or with hospitality but in truth it is difficult to make definitive statements about their appearance beyond the fact that they tend to be significant religious items wielded during a ceremony.

It can take months for a skilled artisan to create an Icon of the Steward. The materials used often include small amounts of magical materials, and it is very common for a crafter to use tools inlaid with dragonbone when working on an icon. It is also quite common for an Icon of the Steward to be beautifully inlaid with precious metals and stones, and for it to be left in pride-of-place in a shrine when not in use. In many devout homes, an Icon of the Steward is the first ornament seen when one enters through the main door, even if the home itself is not consecrated to one of the virtues.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of an icon.
- Requirement: You must have the dedication skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: While you are wielding this icon you can perform the consecrate ceremony as if you knew it.
- Materials: Crafting an Icon of the Steward requires no special materials. It takes two months to make one of these items.

Icon of the Watchful

Description

An Icon of the Watchful allows a priest to perform ceremonies as if they were dedicated to the virtue of Vigilance. It generally takes the form of a piece of religious art, usually depicting a paragon or exemplar of Wisdom such as Vardas or Berechiah. The Icon is not always a portrait, however - in Varushka it often takes the form of a statuette of a goose, and is known as a Vigilant Goose - or occasionally a Vigilant Swan; when a visitor queries the name, pointing out the statue is obviously a goose, they are congratulated on their keen perception. In Wintermark it is sometimes crafted in the form of a medallion or short rod decorated with the bones and feathers of the same bird, generally decorated with the Rune of Revelation, which is known as an Icon of the Goose or a Bright Icon. Other less common variants are certainly possible - from the colourful illuminated scrolls recounting the lives of the exemplars popular in the Brass Coast to the delicate green crystal spindles wrapped in weltsilver the Urizen call an Emerald Beacon.

The icon is equally valuable to a priest who is dedicated to one of the other six virtues as it is to a priest who is dedicated to none of them. It allows them to perform ceremonies such as anointing, consecration, and hallow, and create auras of Vigilance in place of the auras they would otherwise have access to. It also allows a priest to cooperate with priests dedicated to Vigilance who are not part of their sect.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of an icon.
- Requirement: You must have the dedication skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: You may perform ceremonial skills other than dedication as if you were dedicated to the virtue of Vigilance.

Icon of the Witness

Description

These ceremonial tools, in common with several other icons, allow a priest to perform or assist with a liao ceremony that they have not personally mastered. The Icon of the Witness is often decorated with images of exemplars and paragons who have exalted others more than themselves, or whose tales include inspirational moments of judgement, revelation and the like. It is common for one of these icons to include themes of measuring or weighing - scales are often used, but so are short staves marked at regular intervals. The paragon Zoria is said to have crafted the first Icon of the Witness, an artefact in the shape of a three-foot rod marked in inches, although the truth of this claim is difficult to ascertain.

An icon of judgement requires months of work by a skilled artisan, commonly with a set of tools inlaid with dragonbone used especially for crafting religious items.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of an icon.
- Requirement: You must have the dedication skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: While you are wielding this icon you can perform the testimony ceremony as if you knew it.
- Materials: Crafting an Icon of the Witness requires no special materials. It takes two months to make one of these items.

Icy Maw Devours the Spark of Essence

Rules

Winter Magnitude 15

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 10 minutes of roleplaying. During the ritual the casters must be in a strong Winter regio. This ritual targets a territory, and must be performed at a regio in that territory. If the ritual is used to target an Imperial territory, it may instead be performed at the Imperial regio at Anvil.

This effect is a curse. A target may be under more than one curse at a time.

Effects

The target territory is scoured with unpleasant weather, and magicians in the area begin to feel increasingly uncomfortable. In some cases they become depressed and lethargic, in others short tempered and aggressive.

All mana sites in the territory provide only half as many mana crystals as they would otherwise produce in the coming season. The ritual may also damage weak regio, as well as encouraging some magical beasts to either become lethargic or dangerously aggressive.

The effect lasts until the start of the next Profound Decisions Empire event.

Description

The power of this ritual encourages bad weather across the territory, but also brings with it a malaise that seeps into the spirits of magicians - while their personal mana reserves are not effected, they often become either lethargic and depressed or short-tempered and aggressive if they spend an extended period in the territory.

The ritual also effects supernatural creatures, either encouraging them to become lethargic and docile or aggressive and ill-tempered. Used against the barbarians, it is most likely to penalise the Thule and the Druj rather than the Jotun or the Grendel.

The ritual is only known to have been invoked once in the last hundred years by Imperial citizens on an Imperial territory; during a dispute between a Freeborn covens based in Siroc and several troupes in Sarvos, the ritual was used by the Freeborn to drain the mana sites of the City of Jewels. In this case, the Freeborn coven were exonerated by the Imperial Conclave who deemed the matter to be resolved internally without the intervention of magistrates. The ritual is not deemed to involve theft - the mana is simply depleted, not stolen.

A few scholars are concerned about where the mana is going if it is not forming mana crystals; suspicious types suggest it is being stolen by or channelled into the Winter Realm in some way.

Common Elements

The ritual releases a malign, oppressive force into a territory. Grim, throbbing musical rhythms, slow threatening movement and invocations of dread and hunger are all used to raise and direct this malign power. It is common to evoke the rune Naeve or Kyrop with this ritual. Some Wintermark covens attempt to channel or mitigate its effects with Hirmok, or to channel the depleted mana towards their own mana site but they do not report much success.

Contact Details: idiomleather@gmail.com

Idiom specialises in custom hand crafted leatherwork, encompassing styles and projects limited only by the imagination.

Idiom designs to your needs. Detail and style can vary from one item to another: from a fur lined tunic to moulded, hand-tooled plate armour, finished with gold seal. The quality however, remains consistent.

We will assess any job offered to us: If we can't offer you our services, we will at least offer you our advice.

Find us at <http://www.facebook.com/idiomproductions> and

Under construction <http://www.idiomproductions.co.uk/home>

Below are a few of our custom orders which could be used for Nations in Empire.

Dawn

One of our projects was to produce a Medieval plate armpiece. This would be perfect for Dawnish light armour and could be tooled with your personal emblems.

The League

This Breast plate used tailoring techniques to give it a rigid curve to the front and back in order to achieve an historical plate effect. It would work well for a street bravo or lightly armoured soldier.

Wintermark

A large part of our recent work has been in producing fantasy leather armour with a dark ages feel.

Highguard

We have produced many sets of lorica. The image below shows one decorated with knotwork, but for highguard the emblem of your choice (feathers or wings for example) could be used

Religious Crimes (Redirected from Idolatry, Blasphemy and Heresy)

Religious Crimes

The Imperial constitution charges the Synod with the responsibility for the spiritual welfare of the Empire. The Imperial bureaucracy has interpreted this, in part, as a remit for the Synod to investigate religious and spiritual crimes.

Central to this responsibility is that the Imperial faith does not undermine, or in any way supplant, Imperial law. Consequently, whilst the priests of the Synod may investigate religious crimes, they must present their case to the judiciary, who will then rule on the guilt of the identified person or persons, and determine their punishment.

The Synod powers relevant to this process are inquisition and condemnation.

Further information on the relation to Imperial Law can be found here.

The current list of religious crimes includes Idolatry, Blasphemy, Heresy, Abuse of Powers and Desecration.

Idolatry

The crime of idolatry is defined as: Subsuming human will and destiny to any inhuman entity or force. This includes the worship, veneration or exaltation of any such being or power.

This crime incorporates the worship of "gods", Eternals and other supernatural beings, though some priests have considered applying it in a political context as well.

Blasphemy

The crime of blasphemy is defined as: The denigration of the Paragons and the Paths of Virtue. This includes promoting False Virtues and the teachings, or example, of False Exemplars or False Paragons.

The Feast of the Broken Wheel practiced by the Freeborn is contentious and some priests in other nations have accused it of being blasphemous, though, to date, no attempted condemnation of any participant has been successful.

Heresy

The crime of heresy is defined as: The willful rejection, or perversion of, the Orthodox Doctrines of the Faith as laid down by the Imperial Synod, or actively teaching and promoting False Doctrines.

The Synod does permit the discussion, and debate, of the doctrines, and potential variations thereof, as part of theological investigation and learning. The criminal act is the teaching of "truth" that has not been recognised as such by the Synod. Virtuous priests will first seek to change Doctrine in the Synod, rather than undermine it.

Abuse of Powers

The crime of abuse of powers is defined as: The misuse, or abuse, of the powers of a priest. This includes the powers of the Synod, as well as liao ceremonies.

The Synod is charged with ensuring the proper conduct of all priestly Imperial citizens, whether they are Synod members or not. Abuse of Synod powers may include looking to use confession and clemency to pervert the law, rather than promote virtue. Abuse of priest ceremonies may include use of the excommunication ceremony on an Imperial citizen without them having first been excommunicated by the Synod.

Desecration

Contents

- 1 Religious Crimes
 - 1.1 Idolatry
 - 1.2 Blasphemy
 - 1.3 Heresy
 - 1.4 Abuse of Powers
 - 1.5 Desecration

The crime of desecration is defined as: The removal of spontaneously created auras such as legacies of ascendance to paragonhood. This includes such auras arising on areas, objects and people.

The Senate passed this into law in Autumn 377. The Magistrates' interpretation is that in order for this law to accord with constitutional principles it must be tried as a religious crime. The reference to paragonhood in the example makes it clear that this law deals with complex issues around virtue and doctrines of the faith and accordingly any prosecution requires condemnation by the appropriate synod assembly.

Anger radiated from Garath, filling the tent in which he was sat. The Sentinel by the doorway tensed in response. Conversely, Casia, her black-eyes unblinking, appeared entirely unperturbed and gently stroked her barbels as she considered the broker.

"This is a travesty, and a waste of time," spat Garath, "Do you really have nothing better to do with your time, fendweller?"

Casia merely considered him in silence.

"You had no right to haul me in like some criminal!" Gareth railed, "I was in the middle of an important trade deal. You've cost me a lot of money and I'll have every ring of it out of your sodden hide."

The merrow Illuminate simply lifted her cup and drank from it. Taking her time to finish it if full, she turned again to Garath. Rising from her seat she circled his seat before she finally spoke.

"I'm curious," she said, without irony, "I have spoken at length to some of your business partners. You are a successful trader, there is no doubt. Yet the part that I do not understand is what you do with the liao you purchase from the Bloodhammer legion. No one I have spoken to reports you ever selling any of it."

Garath snarled, "Is that it? My cousin Gwyn is a Guide. I provide it to him as part of the work of the Faith. Go and ask him."

Casia nodded, and paused to produce a notebook in which the name was carefully inscribed. As she was putting her pen away, the tent flapped jostled and another Sentinel entered carrying a bag.

Garath blanched, "That's mine! You've no right..."

"I think you will find that priests of the Synod have the right to go a great many places," Casia interrupted calmly, as she took the bag from the armed man. Reaching in she produced a handful of small documents.

"Oh my," she said, her tone unchanged despite the expression of surprise, "I do believe I have seen some of these in the tavern. Leaflets extolling the glory of Elora, Goddess of Hope."

The black eyes fixed themselves on Garath again, "I do believe that's heresy, blasphemy and idolatry in one single stroke. Thank you for your time Broker Garath, your inquisition is concluded. I would suggest you do not make any plans to leave Anvil as I am quite sure the magistrates will be wanting a word."

As Garath rose, Casia gestured and the two Sentinels moved to either side of him. Garath glared at his shadows, but said nothing as he left the tent with the two following him.

And am I born to die? To lay this body down! And must my trembling spirit fly
Into a world unknown?

A land of deepest shade, Unpierced by human thought
The dreary regions of the dead, Where all things are forgot.

Soon as from earth I go What will become of me?
As through the Labyrinth I'll go And then reborn I'll be!

But through the twisting maze, My soul will find rebirth
To seek the truth through night and day Upon the turning earth!

If Varushka Wills

Original Music & Lyrics by Anna Clifford Tait and Stephanie Heath

RECORDING of this song : If Varushka Wills

Come listen to my song Join in and sing along The fire burns, its orange light Will keep us safe all through the night.

Tell a tale, play your part Burns the fire, burns the heart Play and sing, drink and dance Now's your moment, now's your chance.

Find the path through dark and cold Man and woman, young and old Keep the fire, keep the spark Keep us dancing through the dark.

Winter cares not for your name Dark will take us all the same Hold together, standing strong Noise and music, bind our throng.

Turns the season, turns the wheel Hunger bites, a sting like steel Passions burn through snow and ice Our family, our land, our life.

We are many, we are one Come together, day is done Gainst the darkness, gainst the night Build our shield of blood and light

Share our warmth, take a hand Tap your feet and join our band Through the night the flames grow higher To match the dancers, flying fire

What the morrow brings, who knows? Still the river onward flows Will we all be standing still? If Varushka wills, we will!

If it had a Heart

Original Song: If I had a Heart by Fever Ray (<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=EBAzINJonO8>)

New lyrics by Gabrielle Falquero

Thought it couldn't end and wanted more More, then Vallorn, then Vallorn Thought it couldn't end and wanted more
More, then Vallorn, then Vallorn

If it had a heart it would hate you If it had a voice to scream After the night when I wake up I'll see what tomorrow brings Aaaaaah aaaaaah aaaaaahhh ... If it had a voice to scream

Dragging feet, a husk insane Will it ever ever reach the floor? More, then Vallorn, then Vallorn Crushed and filled with all it found underneath and inside just to come around More, then Vallorn, then Vallorn

Aaaaaah aaaaaah aaaaaahhh ... If it had a voice to scream

Ilium

Overview

Ilium is a rare mineral that falls from the sky. In any given year very little Ilium actually falls, but it has been falling for a very long time indeed. It is primarily found in three places; deep underground, under the sea and occasionally in craters - the latter very rarely indeed. One of the most valuable pieces of jewellery one can own is a ring of Ilium – indeed, it is often measured in terms of the amount required to make a ring.

Sometimes called star metal, Ilium is a pale, dull metal that when polished up looks quite a lot like platinum. It is always cool to the touch, and is almost impervious to heat – it is difficult and time consuming to work. However, artisans who work with Ilium are prepared to put in the extra effort because this exceptionally valuable material allows them to extend the lifespan of their crafted items indefinitely and create artefacts.

Ritual magicians also have a use of ilium. It can be used to give a ritual enchantment or curse a permanent duration. It can also be used by apothecaries in the preparation of the valuable Elixir of Exalted Puissance and Elixir of Empyrean Art.

Unlike other materials, ilium is not produced by mines or forests. Imperial ilium is allocated through campaign resources, most of which are assigned to the Imperial Bourse. Occasionally a small deposit of ilium will be found by a lucky NPC mine owner, diver, fisherman or farmer. Found ilium is usually publicly auctioned at Anvil.

Using Ilium in Rituals

- Ritualists can use Ilium to make some enchantments and curses permanent
- A permanent rituals requires at least three rings for every level of magnitude of the ritual

To make the effect of a formulaic ritual permanent requires a number of rings of ilium equal to three times its magnitude, with a minimum of ten rings. It is not possible to make a spontaneous ritual effect permanent using ilium.

Effects that lower the magnitude of an effect do not change the amount of ilium it requires to make it permanent. The ilium must be consumed when the ritual is performed; an existing enchantment cannot later be made permanent with ilium.

Only enchantments and curses with a duration of season or year can be made permanent in this way.

Some other rituals can also incorporate ilium to get additional effects such as Distill the Serpent's Stone; such cases are specifically mentioned in the ritual description.

Roleplaying Effects

- You cannot use religious skills to remove the roleplaying effects of a permanent ritual

Some rituals such as The Chamber of Pallas and The Conspirator's Cloak create auras that can be removed with ceremonial skills. If such a ritual is made permanent, the effects cannot then be removed with the ceremonies such as anointing or consecration, and will overcome even a durable auras created using such skills. In theory, a dose of true liao could be used to remove or supplant such an aura. However, the relative rarity and high value of true liao to the Way means that to date there is no definitive proof one way or another.

Removing a Permanent Effect

- Permanent enchantments are not replaced by a new enchantment, the new enchantment fails
- Permanent rituals can still be removed by other methods

Making an enchantment or curse permanent only affects the natural duration of the effect, it does not impede other methods of removal or other restrictions on their duration.

A ritual requires an additional condition to prevent it ending prematurely (for example, a mark on the face or that the target be incapacitated) then a permanent effect still ends if that condition is not being met.

For example, the various rituals that grant additional production to farms such as Blessing of New Spring are rarely performed using ilium because such rituals always end at the start of winter.

There is one exception; an enchantment that is made permanent with ilium is not supplanted if the target is subject to another enchantment unless that enchantment also uses ilium. The permanent enchantment persists and the new enchantment fails. A permanent enchantment can be removed with ritual magic, although there is no formulaic ritual in Imperial lore at the moment that does so. The magnitude of the ritual must equal or exceed the number of rings of ilium used to create the permanent enchantment.

Creating Artefacts

- Artisans can create artefacts, permanent magic items, using ilium
- Creating an artefact requires at least one ring of ilium for each ingot or measure required to make the item

An artefact is a magic item whose properties are permanent. An artisan can create an artefact version of any magical item they know how to craft.

Creating an artefact requires one ring of Ilium for each ingot and measure required to make the item, with a minimum of 10 rings of Ilium. For example, crafting a permanent Duelist's Scales sword, which requires seven ingots of orichalcum, three ingots of tempest jade, three ingots of weltsilver and three units of beggar's lye will require sixteen rings of Ilium to craft as an artefact.

The ilium must be imbued into the item at the same time it is crafted; it is not possible to make an existing magic item into an artefact.

Roleplaying Effects

- All artefacts created by artisans have roleplaying effects on the user
- You cannot use exorcism to remove the roleplaying effects from an artefact

Every artefact has a name, which appears on the item ribbon. Artefacts also exert strong influence over their wielders in the form of roleplaying effects. Over time these roleplaying effects may become more pronounced, or subtly shift, based on the significant events in which the item is involved. This is a permanent part of the item and cannot be removed with a ceremony of exorcism.

The creator can attempt to give an artefact a unique name when they craft the item. They may also try to imbue the item with roleplaying effects that they would like, however artefacts seem to have a life of their own and some artisans even claim the item chooses its own name. When you create an artefact you should e-mail Profound Decisions with details of the item, the name and the roleplaying effect that you would like. We will pick a name and roleplaying effects for the item based on the information you provide. We are most likely to change comedic names or effects that are inappropriate for the setting.

The best roleplaying effects reflect the nature of the artisan, or the purpose for which it is intended. For example, Guntherm's Hammer is an artefact greathammer crafted for the Steinr Emperor Guntherm which shares the magical qualities of a Captain's Command weapon but fills the wielder with a strong desire to kill any orc standing on Imperial soil.

Destroying an Artefact

- Artefacts cannot be destroyed by mundane means
- Artefacts are affected by SHATTER, but can be repaired with the Mend spell

Artefacts can only be permanently destroyed with the Words of Ending ritual or by certain powerful creatures (including some eternals). The permanent magic imbued in the item make it immune to mundane methods of destruction.

An artefact is still affected by the shatter call, but can always be repaired with the mend spell.

Creating Schema

In conjunction with a runeforge, ilium is also used to create schemata. Schemata are magical "texts" that describe the method of creating a magic item. Any artisan can study a schema and master the methods involved in creating the magic item it describes.

Illuminate the Higher Mind

Rules

Day Magnitude 4

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets a character, who must be present throughout. The target character must have the magician skill.

This spell is an enchantment. A target may only be under one enchantment effect at a time.

Effects

The target gains the ability to cast one spell as if they knew it. The spell is chosen during the ritual, and must be known to at least one character who contributes to the performance.

The effect lasts until the start of the next Profound Decisions Empire event.

Additional Targets

This ritual can affect additional characters from the same coven. Each additional character increases the magnitude by 3. Additional characters must have the magician skill and be present throughout; each target receives the ability to cast the same spell.

Description

Illuminate the Higher Mind provides spellcasting ability. Like Ascendance of the Highest Mind and Transcendent Mastery imprints precise knowledge of how the incantation is performed, its effect and limitations, into the mind of the target. By using that knowledge they can perform the spell 'by rote'.

It is very useful for allowing a coven to expand their versatility; a common use is to allow members to perform useful spells such as heal, empower, or purify that might be useful in a coming battle. Its use is not limited to coven-mates however; some covens and magicians make a point of mastering as many incantations as possible, selling the ability to perform a useful spell to other magicians. For example, a coven might temporarily teach a band of Dawnish war-witches how to perform the venom spell when they must enter an area infested with vallornspawn husks, or to give a Navarr magician-messenger the ability to perform the night pouch incantation to help them conceal valuable documents.

While it is often used by a coven, it is a simple enough ritual that a single scholar of Day magic might perform it; it might even be improvised if there is enough need. It is slightly more useful to a coven merely because there is likely to be a larger number of spells available among the contributors.

Common Elements

The ritual usually involves a symbolic transfer of knowledge between the character or characters who know the chosen spell, and the recipients. Often this mimics the master/apprentice or student/teacher relationships, and sometimes it involves the casting of the spell to be taught.

Tokens marked with the rune Aesh may change hands, and there may be a symbolic (or very real) payment between student and teacher, especially in a Freeborn or League ritual. The Navarr may enact a merging or exchange of blood, but they are as likely to pass written scrolls from one to another.

 - 1.1 Day Magnitude 4
 - 1.2 Performing the Ritual
 - 1.3 Effects
 - 1.4 Additional Targets
- 2 Description
- 3 Common Elements

In Varushka this ritual often involves a spoken oath from the recipient to use the spell granted responsibly; an oath which is often taken very seriously by the magician who is the source of the spell knowledge. Among Imperial orc warcasters a combination of copying the incantation down and an oath to use the spell for the good of the legion may be combined (often overseen by an oathwright). Some Imperial orcs ritualists call on an ancestor to inspire the target with the chosen spell, but this is rarely attempted unless the target is a shaman. In a similar way, some Highborn magisters seek to inspire their target so that one of their past lives may awaken enough to let them channel the chosen spell.

Illuminates' Amulet

Description

These amulets are most often found among the Highborn and the Urizen, where magician-priests are relatively common. The first amulets were used by Urizen illuminates, but a number were given as gifts to Highborn missionaries and priests, and the Urizen freely shared the secret of crafting them with the ashen priests. It should come as no surprise that the Highborn normally refer to one of these items as a Magisters' Amulet. While this appears on the surface an altruistic act on behalf of the Urizen, cynics suggest it was motivated more by a desire to encourage more priests to study magic, and more magicians to study religion.

Constructed from dragonbone and woven with threads coloured with gloaming, they provide the wearers with the ability to refresh their magical reserves through spiritual activity. They are often crafted in the form of amulets or medallions bearing the image of one of the symbols of the Way, or of a specific image associated with one of the Imperial virtues. In some places the amulet bears the rune Cayul or Aesh, or occasionally Irremais, or (especially in Urizen) the image of a constellation such as the Phoenix or the Key.

As with many such items, it is common to hallow an illuminates' amulet.

Rules

- Form: Talisman. Takes the form of ceremonial regalia.
- Requirement: You must have the dedication skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: Twice per day when you use a dose of Liao during a religious ceremony, you can regain one point of personal Mana.
- Materials: Crafting an illuminates' amulet requires five measures of iridescent gloaming, five ingots of weltsilver, and five measures of dragonbone. It takes one month to make one of these items.

Immortal hand

The sound is deafening.

Hammer against stone, with glowing metal caught between. Fast, certain, unstinting, timeless. Strike, strike, strike. The hammer pauses for a moment - the blade is examined critically for a heartbeat and then tossed to the side. Before it lands, sliding down the hillock of identical blades, the hammer is striking again, a new length of metal on the great anvil.

The heat is suffocating.

The anvil stands before a lake of crimson rock, sluggishly stirred to motion by subterranean fires. Squat figures toil on the shore, using the churning lava to melt ingots of metal, pouring them into black stone moulds. Squint against the glare, you can make out their glinting metal eyes in dark skinned faces, their flexible aprons of some peculiar black material. The great gauntlets. Perhaps one scoops up a handful of liquid stone and tosses it playfully at a companion - a handful of fire that would devour flesh shrugged off with a growl and a grunted obscenity.

The air is choking.

Clouds of black smoke and ash billow from the forges, interspersed here and there with columns of windblown white smoke and white ash. Beneath the deafening sound of the hammer, the distant roaring of a wind. A vertical gale, carrying anything it catches up, up, up into the darkness. There are stars here, close enough to touch ... but look at them closely enough and you would realise they are not stars in the sky at all but forges, foundries, smelters, workshops build all along the walls of this immense chamber.

Clank, clank, clank. Between the hammer blows, in rhythm with them, metal footsteps. Approaching the forge is a figure in dull bronze armour - no! a figure that is dull bronze armour. Beautifully forged and sculpted and engraved, a towering figure of living metal. It stands smartly to attention, saluting simultaneously with both pairs of arms.

it provides a dizzying sense of perspective. The squat figures working on the shore of the volcanic lake dwarf it, as they in turn are dwarfed by the figure at the forge. Her hammer does not pause; another blade lands on the pile, a new piece of metal is placed on the anvil and the hammer rises again.

"Speak," she says. Her voice is harsh, cutting through all the other sounds of the immense industrious hive.

"The Imperial Archmage sends greetings. There are requests. The lost Art of the Marches is mentioned. An offer of Amity is mentioned."

The titan woman continues to work, swiftly completing another great blade. In the shadow of the anvil, a smooth skinned figure in a pale lemon toga, its face a mask of white porcelain, makes a tiny mark on a slate. There are several other slates piled at its side, covered on both sides with identical tiny marks.

Then after a timeless moment, the great smith laughs. A short, sharp bark. The workers do not pause in their labour, but they turn their faces toward her for a moment, judging her mood, before looking back to the tasks at hand.

"Yes." she says. "Supervisor Quench. Bring them."

The bronze giant salutes again in a clash of metal on metal, turns, strides away.

Another sword clatters onto the pile, another tiny mark on the slate, another length of glowing metal smacks into the anvil, another hammer blow. And another. And another.

Overview

The eternals are powerful supernatural beings who inhabit magical realms beyond the reach of the mortal world. Any Imperial magician can speak to eternals and their heralds, but communication with these beings can be a little hit-and-miss even at the best of times. The six Archmagi represent the Empire to the eternals, and the eternals to the Empire. Each possesses the power of plenipotentiary - the power to send a formal message to one of the eternals of their realm each summit, guaranteed to reach the eternal. No eternal who wishes to maintain relations with the Empire will fail to respond to the missive - even if those relations are currently strained.

◦ 2.5 The Whisper Gallery

The nature of the plenipotentiary missive is such that it serves as a powerful invitation making it easier for the eternal to respond. An eternal who is sent a missive by an archmage of the Conclave is able to enter the Hall of Worlds at the next summit regardless of any state of enmity that may exist. It is not unknown for an eternal to take the opportunity to appear with their entourage in the Hall of Worlds in parley, though most choose a more low-key response. A peaceful response is not the only option however though it is exceptionally rare for an eternal to respond with force.

During the Winter Solstice, five of the Imperial Archmagi used their power of plenipotentiary to contact eternal, and the eternal have responded publicly.

Significance

Eternal do not always respond publicly to plenipotentiary messages, but in this case each of the five has chosen to make an open, formal response. Magicians of the Empire who are politically active have many ways of being apprised of these messages. In cases where the eternal requests a formal parley the civil service plays a role in publicizing and arranging the meeting. In other cases, creatures of the realm about their business in the mortal world will mention the upcoming meeting - or may deliver formal messages to powerful or influential magicians directly.

Yaw'nagrah

Rosamund Holt, Archmage of Spring, has contacted the Green Mother, Yaw'nagrah. During the Winter Solstice, Yaw'nagrah was declared an enemy of the Empire by the Imperial Conclave, and it seems the Archmage has called on it to face charges of interfering with Imperial affairs. It is not illegal for an archmage to use the power of plenipotentiary to send a missive to an eternal who is under enmity, although it is possible that the contents of such a missive might constitute a crime - and any resulting parley is likely to be carefully observed.

A month before the Spring equinox, two heralds of Yaw'nagrah - walking tree creatures with creaking woody voices - deliver a curt message that the Green Mother will send her Voice to a formal parley in the Hall of Worlds. The creatures seem to have limited understanding of time, but the civil service are able to confirm that the meeting will take place at two-o'clock in the afternoon on Saturday, and will make arrangements to offer support to the Archmage of Spring.

Any magician of the Empire may attend, but it is at the discretion of the Spring Archmage who may speak during a formal parley.

Cathan Canae

Solomon of the Shattered Tower, Archmage of Summer, has contacted the Queen of Ice and Darkness, Cathan Canae. While relations between the Immovable One and the Empire are strained, they have not deteriorated to the point of enmity. In the months since the Winter Solstice, heralds of Cathan Canae have brought short, clipped messages to the Archmage, but also to covens with a strong Summer focus across the Empire. One even appeared in the Varushkan vale of Volchitrava, with a message for the Gremani - but perhaps rather pointedly not for the Master of Ice and Darkness at the college above.

The message in each case is straightforward enough. Cathan Canae sends the Warden of the Adamant Tower to speak with the Summer Archmage at six-o'clock on Saturday evening. This will not be a formal parley - and the Warden will be accompanied by any of her heralds who wish to attend. They will discuss the Icy Crag of the Eternal Sun, among other things.

Her heralds invite any Imperial magician versed in the lore of Summer magic to attend, but also make one additional, odd request. Cathan Canae wishes William Talbot of the Marches, or their champion, to attend the meeting and speak to the Warden of the Adamant Tower. No further explanation is given.

While this is not a formal parley, the Warden of the Adamant Tower is known to be a high-ranking herald in the service of Cathan Canae. She may not have requested a parley, but she is taking the Archmage's invitation seriously.

Estavus

Maurice de Gauvin, long-serving Archmage of Autumn, has formally requested a meeting with the Forgemistress, Estavus, on behalf of himself and the magicians of the Marches. A formal reply was delivered a week after the Winter solstice to the Imperial Civil Service offices at Anvil. While Estavus does not request a formal parley, she will send a herald entitled "Supervisor Quench" and several of his assistants to the Hall of the Worlds at four-o'clock Saturday afternoon to represent her interests. The "lost Art of the Marches" will be discussed, as will sundry other offers made by Maurice in the plenipotentiary letter.

Again, this is not a formal request for parley - it is rather a formal expression of interest and advance warning that the Eternal intends to send representatives to speak to the magicians of the Empire.

Tharim

Syrus Skybreaker, Archmage of Winter, has sent a plenipotentiary message to Tharim, the Bound King of the Thrice-cursed Court. A solitary, pale herald has publicly thanked the Archmage for their letter, and vouchsafed that he will discuss the matters involved privately. During the Spring Equinox, Tharim will arrange an audience with the Archmage, and with the Keeper of Tharim's Throne. The latter has caused a little confusion, as Keeper of Tharim's Throne is not an Imperial title. Regardless, it appears the Winter eternal is not interested in a public discussion and will presumably make his own arrangements.

The Whisper Gallery

Elyssiathain of Endsmeet, Archmage of Night, has arranged for the Dawnish yeoman Ancel Steward, Seneschal of House Vexille to communicate with the enigmatic entities of the Whisper Gallery. As with Yaw'nagrah, the Whisper Gallery are currently declared enemies of the Empire. The magistrates note that the an archmage has special dispensation to treat with an eternal under enmity, but this does not extend to other Imperial citizens.

Regardless of whether an act of treason is about to be perpetrated or not, Ancel Steward was, along with Earl Guisart Vexille, Guiniveve Vexille, Gui Fletcher, and Arlen Weaver, declared a sorcerer during the Winter Solstice. Due to an amendment to the law regarding sorcerers passed by the Imperial Senate in Spring 378YE, "a declared Sorcerer is barred from knowingly interacting with eternal and their heralds." If an accused is found guilty of contravening a declaration of sorcery then the normal punishment is death; anyone who helped a sorcerer to break the law in this manner would risk a similar penalty for aiding and abetting the crime.

The magistrates have expressed their intention to investigate this situation during the Spring Equinox, and determine whether the law has been broken, and if it is who is responsible. While the Conclave supported a Declaration of Concord raised by the Grandmaster of the Celestial Arch, indicating that they "understand this to be neither treason nor sorcery", the magistrates have pointed out that this declaration has absolutely no legal standing and will not affect their decision.

The Whisper Gallery themselves. have not replied directly but on the night of the new moon a month after the Winter Solstice, scrolls were nailed to the stones of the Imperial regio at Anvil bearing the Diras rune, a beautifully drawn dramaturgy mask identifiable as the kind worn by silver mask, and a simple message "WE WILL SPEAK TO ANCEL."

Imperial Censor

Overview

The imperial Censor is an Imperial Title appointed by the Conclave. It was created at the Summer Solstice summit of 380YE. The intent is that the Censor works as part of the Conclave to protect Imperial citizens from dangerous magic.

Responsibilities

The Imperial Censor is responsible for safeguarding the Empire from malign magical items, especially those of unknown or unacceptable provenance.

Powers

Interdiction

Once per summit, the Censor can raise a Declaration of Interdiction to the agenda of a Conclave session for free.

Appointment

The appointment, replacement, or removal of the Imperial Censor is made by the declaration of candidacy as part of a Conclave session. Any Imperial citizen may hold the title. The Censor serves until they are replaced by another magician using the Declaration of Candidacy. As a title in the Conclave, they cannot be revoked.

Imperial Chaplain Consular

Overview

The Imperial Chaplain Consular is an Imperial Title appointed by the Cardinal of the Way. The title was created by the Imperial Senate during the Spring Equinox summit of 379YE.

The first Imperial Chaplain Consular was Hywel Summercrow of Navarr, appointed in Spring 379YE by Cardinal Bishop Beodun Snowlock of Wintermark. The decision has prompted some speculation that the Cardinals of the Way intend to follow the traditions surrounding the Conscience of the Senate - specifically that it is customary to select a candidate from a nation other than that of the Cardinal.

Responsibilities

The Chaplain Consular has three main responsibilities. They are expected to advise Imperial Ambassadors on matters pertaining to the Way - to offer them theological guidance and spiritual counsel in their dealings with foreign nations. They are to provide oversight of Imperial Ambassadors for the Synod - to ensure that the representatives of the Empire are free from heresy, and do not become seduced by the strange ways of foreign nations. Finally, they are expected to study foreign religions, and to share their conclusions in order to facilitate comparative theology.

Powers

Inquisit Imperial Ambassador

Once per summit, the Imperial Chaplain Consular may call an inquisition against an Imperial ambassador without the need for a vote in the Synod. This is in addition to any existing judgements they have raised normally. This use of the power may be escalated to sanction just like any other inquisition. To use this power, the Imperial Chaplain Consular must still place a judgement before the Synod, but it is considered to pass automatically at the point it is presented.

Withdraw funds

The Imperial Chaplain Consular may remove up to five Thrones each season from the Virtue fund without requiring a vote. To use this power, the Imperial Inquisitor must still place a judgement before the Synod, but it is considered to pass automatically at the point it is presented. Judgements to remove money from the Virtue Fund are in addition to any existing judgements they have raised normally.

When using this power, the Imperial Chaplain Consular should still indicate the group or individual that is to be rewarded.

Appointment

The Chaplain Consular is appointed by the Cardinal of the Way, during the Spring Equinox.

Any Imperial citizen may hold the title. They can be revoked by the General Assembly or the Assembly of the Way.

Imperial Constitution

Overview

The Constitution was produced at the dawn of the Empire, by the First Empress and her supporters. It is a set of axioms which dictate how the Empire can be governed and the rights of the nations of the Empire and their citizens. Although it is possible to change the Constitution, it is intentionally difficult to do so and impossible until The Throne is occupied. Even then, the NPCs of the Constitutional Court must ratify any changes to the constitution or to the way it is interpreted.

Purpose

The point of the Constitution is to ensure that Empire remains an enjoyable game to play. Senators have wide ranging powers to change the laws of the Empire, but the Constitution exists to reduce the chance that they use these powers to make the game less enjoyable. It inhibits players from reducing the complexity of the political system and tries to prevent them using undue power in the Senate to punitively victimize disenfranchised groups. Ultimately the Constitution limits the powers of players in the interest of keeping the game fun. Any attempt to change the constitution which we believe will adversely affect the enjoyment of the game will not be ratified by the Constitutional Court.

The Imperial Constitution

In concord with the representatives of our great nations, we declare the founding of our Empire⁽²⁴⁾. Let us be joined together by common destiny; to build a great Empire; to serve and protect its people; to let them prosper and achieve greatness and spread across the face of Creation together in unity.

Let this constitution set out the strong principles upon which our Empire will be founded; to serve as the solid base upon which we will build our glorious undertaking; and to mandate the responsibilities and duties of our people, our nations and our Imperial future.

By signing these accords of Empire we⁽¹⁾ agree to be joined in a single union to be governed in accordance with the principles of this constitution.

We shall be united in law and policy, but free to maintain the traditions that have made each of us strong. The nations of our Empire will be embodied by the spirit of an egregore, created to preserve its essential character. Our Empire will recognize as citizens those whose oath to accept the culture of a nation; to honour the virtues of the Way, and to support the laws of the Empire⁽²⁾, is accepted by those egregore.

To these citizens we will guarantee dignity⁽³⁾, freedom⁽⁴⁾, and prosperity⁽⁵⁾. Each citizen that owns land or property will tithe annually wealth equal to a single crown⁽⁶⁾ to be used in service of the Empire that protects them. Citizens shall not hold more than one high office at a time and must exercise their powers in person⁽⁷⁾; those whose virtue causes them to be offered numerous Imperial titles must choose between them. In this way no citizen shall accumulate so much responsibility that they consider themselves better than their fellows.

The Throne shall lead the Empire and represent her in all things. It shall be a beacon to her people and a terror to her enemies. Whenever the Throne sits in the great councils laid out in this constitution, then their voice shall carry the greatest weight⁽⁸⁾.

The Civil Service shall serve The Throne and the people, and be bound in oaths of loyalty to the Empire⁽⁹⁾. They will be civil in their dealings and treat each citizen by their virtues, without prejudice or favour regardless of wealth, nationality or title. They will choose amongst them those who will serve as magistrates, to ensure the law is a friend to no-one but instead the servant and the master of all.

The Senate shall ensure the good governance of the Empire. The Senate will assume responsibility for relations with other nations, for the creation of just laws and for the allocation of Imperial taxes as the Senate sees fit, by majority vote. The confirmation of the Empress's⁽¹⁰⁾ right to occupy the Throne requires the approval of the greater majority of senators⁽¹¹⁾. Matters of similar weight⁽¹²⁾ require similar consideration and the approval of the Throne and must be ratified by the magistrates to ensure that this constitution is protected⁽¹³⁾.

Each territory of the Empire⁽¹⁴⁾ will elect a single senator to participate in the Senate, according to the traditions of the nation that claims it. Territorial nationality shall be decided by vote of the existing Senate, where it is legitimately disputed⁽¹⁵⁾.

The Military Council shall ensure the rigorous defence of the Empire. Each nation in the Empire will raise armies as directed by the Senate. The Senate will appoint a general for each army, but only where the will of the nation in this matter is not clear⁽¹⁶⁾. The Military Council will execute the strategy of war without interference from the Senate. If the Throne finds complaint with the worst of their number then she may carry the burden of their office until an acceptable replacement may be found.

The Civil Service will ensure that those who soldier to defend our Empire will be equipped and provisioned to meet this challenge. Citizens who render two year's service to the Military Council will receive 50 acres of land or equivalent wealth or property if land is not to be had.

The Synod shall ensure the virtuous behaviour of the Empire. The Synod will remove from Imperial office those whose behaviour is deemed unvirtuous whether they sit upon the Throne; serve the people in the Senate or on the Military Council or in the Civil Service; or serve within the councils of the Synod itself.⁽¹⁷⁾ The Synod will ensure the behaviour of individual citizens does not debase the Empire.

Those who stand in the Synod shall express the views of their congregation. The Synod will establish assemblies that each may know their virtue and select the most virtuous amongst them to lead. Voting in the Synod will be performed by such assemblies as are rightfully able to weigh the virtue of an action or individual, in accord with their nationality and authority. The civil service will render to these priests such liao as is needed to minister to their congregation. The Throne and those amongst them with the greatest virtue will be given True Liao to distribute as they see fit, excepting one dose which shall be rendered to whichever citizen has demonstrated the greatest prosperity, in service of the Synod.

The Conclave⁽¹⁸⁾ shall ensure the fit and proper use of magic in the service of the Empire. They will identify those arcane practitioners whose arts work against the Empire, so that they may be condemned. The Conclave will accord a voice to those citizens who demonstrate command of magic and demonstrate the necessary commitment to the authority of the Conclave. The Conclave will appoint leaders who will assist in the allocation of such resources as are needed to further its aims; it shall be guided by fraternities of magicians under the general aegis of the Senate, and without interference from the Synod⁽¹⁹⁾.

The Bourse⁽²⁰⁾ shall control access to those resources that are essential to the prosperity of any great empire. Appointment to the Bourse shall be established by auction and shall be free of all interference of the Senate, or from the Synod⁽²¹⁾. Such resources as are already controlled by the Imperial nations shall remain in the careful custody of those Nations; those that are discovered or conquered after the founding of the Empire may be eligible to any Imperial citizens. The funds raised by the Bourse through distribution of its estates will remit what profit they can support to the Senate⁽²²⁾.

No coin may be accepted that has not been produced in the Mint⁽²³⁾ and which does not bear the rightful stamp of The Throne.

By these principles, councils, and virtues we agree to be governed in perpetuity; not as chains of unchanging servitude, but as inspiration to exalt us and drive our great endeavour.

Commentary on the constitution

1. One copy of the Imperial Constitution was created for each of the eight nations present at the creation of the Empire. Further copies were created when Urizen and later the Imperial Orcs joined the Empire. All original copies of the constitution are stored in the capital in Highguard.

2. The wording to “support the laws” rather than simply uphold or obey the laws is used to justify the requirement for all citizens to render all reasonable service to a magistrate when required.
3. The guarantee of citizens’ “dignity” is always invoked when citizens or senators attempt to propose motions or laws that would restrict or require particular dress codes or speech. It is occasionally seen as a rebuke for individuals who are perceived to be wasting the Senate’s time with frivolous motions.
4. The guarantee of citizens’ “freedom” ensures that slavery of Imperial citizens is illegal throughout the Empire, but it also prevents incarceration for crimes committed, a punishment common in some foreign nations. The guarantee originally only extended to Imperial citizens, but the joining of the Imperial Orcs to the Empire was conditional on this protection being extended to all ‘people’. It required a constitutional vote of the Senate to change the interpretation of the Constitution such that that guarantee of “freedom” was taken to outlaw all slavery.
5. The guarantee of citizens’ “prosperity” is presented by nations like the League and the Brass Coast as proof that the Empress intended citizens to be able to pursue their own wealth and prosperity without consideration for the Empire itself. It has been used countless times to rule unconstitutional motions and laws intended to raise additional taxes for the Senate or to seize control of the estates of the Bourse. As a result taxation remains fixed at levels laid out in the constitution.
6. In the original document this amount was rendered as “a measure of silver coin” but was amended when Emperor Giovanni founded the Imperial Mint and the Empire moved to the modern currency of rings, crowns and thrones.
7. “No citizen shall hold more than one high office at a time” expresses the clear restriction that no citizen can hold two offices of state at one time. All attempts to define individual Imperial titles and positions as outside this restriction have always been ruled to be unconstitutional.
8. The phrase “their voice shall carry the greatest weight” has changed interpretation twice since the beginning of the Empire. In the Senate and the Military Council The Throne may veto any motion or vote that has just passed. They may vote normally in the Assembly of Nine but are able to cast an additional deciding vote in the event of any tie.

The Throne has never held a position in the Conclave or the Bourse, which allegedly reflects the lesser status of these bodies compared with the Senate, Military Council and Synod. The Bourse does not take decisions as a body, but the Conclave categorically does. Critics of the current situation claim that The Throne’s absence from The Conclave reflects the fact that the First Empress possessed no magical abilities; but this raises the prospect of how any occupant of The Throne who did not possess magical abilities might sit in council there. In theory The Throne might nominate a magician to sit in their place, but scholars point out that this would run counter to the spirit of the constitution which requires a citizen be present if they wish to act in their name.

In all cases the clause that The Throne must be present to exert their powers remains pivotal. Emperors and Empresses have regularly been forced to choose in which council they will sit; although their power is considerable, it cannot be used after the fact.

9. “Oaths of loyalty to the Empire” - this paragraph establishes the role of the Civil Service. These oaths are rarely spoken of in public, but they are believed to include powerful hearth magic that guarantees the probity of those who serve.
10. Although the wording is the same on all copies of the constitution, citizens of any gender are able to assume the Throne.
11. Most motions before the Senate are decided by majority vote of those Senators present. The “greater majority of Senators” requires the support of two-thirds of all the senators of the Empire, whether or not they are present or have even been elected.
12. “Matters of similar weight” is taken to indicate any law or ruling that would change the constitution or its interpretation, or change the balance of powers between the different bodies of the Empire. The practical implication of this is that while the constitution can be changed, the the Senate may only do so by a vote of the greater majority (commonly referred to as a constitutional vote).
13. “Founding principles are protected” empowers the Magistrates to refuse to allow changes to the law and the constitution which are deemed to not be in accordance with the founding principles of the Empire. There have been three attempts by the Senate and the Throne to force through the implementation of laws that were deemed unconstitutional since the founding of the Empire; two attempts to increase taxation in the Empire and one attempt to limit the power of the Synod. All three attempts were firmly rebuffed by the Civil Service and were ultimately abandoned.

14. The Civil Service use a combination of magic and essential geographic features like rivers and mountain ranges to identify a territory. These are divided into regions. The civil service define a “territory of the Empire” as any territory where the majority of the regions in the territory are under Imperial control. Any territory where the majority of regions are not under Imperial control does not receive representation in the Senate.
15. The nationality of a conquered territory has only been disputed once in the history of the Empire, when the city of Holberg surrendered to the League, after the surrounding regions were conquered by Dawnish forces. The ensuing Senate vote confirmed that Holberg would be treated as a League territory. Attempts by Dawnish senators to introduce a motion to over-turn this decision in Dawn’s favour were ruled to be unconstitutional, due to the absence of any factors that meant that Holberg’s status was “legitimately disputed”.
16. The “will of the Nation” is taken to mean the unanimous decision of the senators appointed to represent that nation in the Senate. Only where a unanimous decision cannot be reached does the appointment of the generals fall to a majority vote of the whole Senate.
17. The Synod have in the past removed senators, generals, cardinals, civil servants and even an empress. They do not have the ability to remove the officers of the Conclave; neither do they have the ability to remove citizens from seats on the Bourse.
18. These provisions regarding the Conclave were added during the reign of Emperor Giovanni the Peacemaker. Previous references to the Conclave were aspirational - “We shall establish a body of magicians to use magic to strengthen and protect the Empire.” It was not until Giovanni brought the Urizen into the Empire that the Conclave in its current form took shape.
19. The Orders of the Conclave are created and dissolved by the Senate, rather than the Synod. The magicians who helped to form the Conclave were adamant in their belief that they should serve the Empire, not the Synod. In theory, a constitutional change could be used to grant the Synod powers over the Conclave, but to date no such attempts have been successful.
20. These provisions regarding the Bourse were added during the reign of Emperor Giovanni the Peacemaker. Previous references to the Bourse were aspirational - “We shall establish a market to protect the economic interest of the citizens from those who would exploit or tax them in the name of good government.” The restriction on access to the resources is interpreted to mean access to the mines, forests and other resources which produce mithril, weirwood, white granite and ilium in large quantities, not the actual materials themselves. There are no legal restrictions on the purchase and sale of such materials in the Empire.
21. Although the Bourse enjoys immunity from revocation (like the Conclave), its members are still subject to excommunication, as this power is considered to be used against the individual - not the office they hold.
22. The paragraph about resources was added during the reign of Empress Mariika, who oversaw an extensive modification of the role and responsibility of the Bourse. She ensured that the profits raised by auctions in the Bourse went to the Senatorial treasury.
23. In the original document this amount was rendered as “a measure of silver coin” but was amended when Emperor Giovanni founded the Imperial Mint and the Empire moved to the modern currency of rings, crowns and thrones.
24. In the original document this wording was “In concord with the representatives of the great nation of humanity, we declare the founding of our Empire.” It was amended by a constitutional vote in Spring 381.

Imperial Consul

Overview

The Imperial Consul is an Imperial title appointed by the Imperial Senate. It was created by the Senate during the Summer 379YE summit, and sparked considerable controversy leading to a clash between the senators and the civil service over the recommendations of the Constitutional Court.

Responsibilities

The Imperial Consul is expected to liaise with Imperial ambassadors and similar positions and report back to the Senate. The Imperial Constitution is clear that authority for negotiation with foreign powers lies with the appointed ambassador- the Consul has no legal right to direct the ambassadors in their work - their role is to liaise with the Imperial ambassadors and help keep the Senate abreast of diplomatic developments.

The Imperial Consul is however responsible for handling diplomatic relations with any foreign and barbarian power with which the Senate has not created a separate ambassador. The Imperial Constitution grants the power of authority for diplomatic relations to the Imperial Senate - by creating this title, the Senate divests itself of their remaining authority in this area to the Consul. When dealing with such a nation, their responsibilities are similar to those common to an ambassador Foreign nations have agendas of their own, and may seek to draw the Empire into their intrigues. The existence of the Imperial Consul does not automatically mean that a foreign nation will engage with them - most nations are disinclined to deal extensively with the Empire while there is no embassy. The civil service and the Secretary to the Diplomatic Corps will do their best to appraise such nations of the role of the Imperial Consul.

Limitations

The Imperial Consul can only represent the Empire in dealings with foreign or barbarian nations where there is no existing Imperial ambassador with responsibility for doing so. If an embassy for a foreign nation has been completed then the legal powers of the Consul do not cover dealings with representatives of that nation - even if the ambassador is absent or the post has not yet been filled; the existence of such a title is sufficient.

Powers

Right of Address

The Imperial Consul has the right to make a Senate address once per summit. This is intended to allow them to present important information for the senators consideration. To make an address, the Consul must inform the Speaker for the Senate of their intention, so that the Speaker can add the address to the agenda for the next Senate session.

Representative of the Empire

The civil service provide support to help an ambassador to represent the Empire when dealing with foreign dignitaries from any nation where there is no existing ambassador. They have all the available legal powers of an ambassador; the power to receive a delegation and compose a treaty when dealing with a foreign or barbarian nation.

As there is no existing embassy, there is no mercantile support and no regular briefing.

The Imperial Consul is an Imperial position appointed by the Senate. Any Imperial citizen can hold this title, and the consul serves for a year. They can be revoked by the General Assembly and by the Assembly of the Nine.

Constitution

During scrutiny by the Constitutional Court several significant issues were raised with this title. These issues included concerns about the use of the Right of Address, the implicit authority of the title to command other Imperial citizens, and the use of the word "High" in the original title.

The Constitutional Court returned the motion creating the title to the Senate with a series of proposed amendments, leading to extensive and energetic debate between the Senators and Magistrate Karkovich. After spirited discussion, the administrative motion suggesting changes to the presentation of the title was accepted by the Senate.

Imperial Delegate to the Temple in Feroz

Imperial Delegate to the Temple in Feroz is not an Imperial title.

Overview

El oficial de enlace imperial con los sacerdotes de Balo y el Toro Negro or Delegato Imperiale presso i sacerdoti di Balo e del Toro Nero (depending who one asks - it translates roughly as Imperial intermediary/delegate to the priests of Balo and the Black Bull) is charged with maintaining good relations between Imperial citizens and the Asavean priests at the Temple of Balo and the Black Bull. As part of their work, they are able to purchase Asavean good at a set price.

The Temple of Balo and the Black Bull was completed shortly before the Spring Equinox 381YE. Construction was significantly over budget, and took half a year longer than expected, due to opposition from the Imperial Synod.

The position of Delegate is not an Imperial title; rather it represents access to a Campaign resource.

Responsibilities

The Delegate is responsible for maintaining the relationship between the Imperial Synod, the people of Oran, and the priests and worshippers at the Temple of Balo and the Black Bull. For the most part, this is likely to involve smoothing over any conflicts, and dealing with any problems of opportunities related to the Temple.

Powers

Point of Contact

The Asavean priesthood, both that local to Feroz and the temples of Asavea, will look to the Delegate to resolve any issues between the Asaveans and Imperial citizens, in conjunction with the Ambassador to Asavea.

Ministry

As a ministry, the title Imperial Delegate is able to purchase quantities of special materials at a set price. The Delegate spends their money

Total Money Spent	Production
7 Crowns	5 Cerulean Mazzarine, 4 Orichalcum, 3 Iridescent Gloaming, 2 Tempest Jade
17 Crowns	9 Cerulean Mazzarine, 8 Orichalcum, 6 Iridescent Gloaming, 4 Tempest Jade
35 Crowns	13 Cerulean Mazzarine, 12 Orichalcum, 9 Iridescent Gloaming, 6 Tempest Jade
48 Crowns	17 Cerulean Mazzarine, 16 Orichalcum, 12 Iridescent Gloaming, 8 Tempest Jade

and makes their choices during downtime from their character page. Money is removed from, and resources are placed into, the character's inventory when the downtime is processed.

Appointment

The decision as to who will serve as Delegate is in the hands of the Asavean priesthood. The speaker for the Asavean priests involved in this project, Hueva Joaon, has indicated that he would like the temporal power in the land where the temple is being built - specifically the Senator for Feroz - to guide the selection by presenting a candidate or candidates who would be open-minded and interested in cementing closer ties between the Archipelago and the Empire.

Contents

- 1 Overview
- 2 Responsibilities
- 3 Powers
 - 3.1 Point of Contact
 - 3.2 Ministry
- 4 Appointment
- 5 OOC Note
- 6 The Title in Play

Anyone may hold the position of Delegate; as this is not an Imperial title, there is no requirement for the holder to be an Imperial citizen.

The Delegate can be removed at any time by the Asavean priesthood. The Imperial senate could close down the Temple of Balo and the Black Bull, making the title meaningless..

As this is not an Imperial title, the holder cannot be revoked, and would not lose access to the benefits of their position even if they were the subject of a Writ of Excommunication.

OOC Note

This position is not an Imperial title. A character could hold this position and still have an Imperial title. The Empire has little control over the position; in theory possession of the title and how it works is at the mercy of non-player characters. The Senate can effectively abrogate the title by shutting down the Temple of Balo and the Black Bull, but cannot amend its powers or responsibilities.

The Title in Play

The role does not provide additional information about events in the Empire, nor allow the player holding it to request special reports or downtime actions. These details are assumed to be below the abstraction layer. The title holder is encouraged to create their own stories about their activities within reasonable limits and to get involved in events appropriate to their title during the game, but they do not have any powers beyond those explicitly listed in the section on powers.

These details exist partly to provide context and character to the role - and partly to allow our writers to use the title as a plot hook. Plot that involves the position will be rare - but all the campaign positions in Empire have these details to create the potential for it to happen.

Imperial elections (Redirected from Imperial Elections)

All Imperial titles are elected or appointed at one of the quarterly gatherings at Anvil. These take place at the Summer and Winter Solstices and the Spring and Autumn Equinoxes. This is also when the Imperial Institutions meet and exercise their legal powers.

Some titles have tenure, the citizen may hold the title until it is revoked, they die or they relinquish the position. Most titles are either re-appointed each year following the Imperial election schedule. Titles in the Conclave can be reappointed at any time by successful declaration.

Elections are held by various different means (for example each nation uses their own traditional voting method to appoint their senators whilst generals are usually appointed by unanimous agreement of a nations senators and sinecures vary) and are observed to ensure there are no election irregularities by Merlot, the Civil Service Overseer of Imperial Elections. For example, with a few exceptions, an imperial citizen can only vote once per year on a particular matter. This is most commonly an issue with citizens of Navarr who as wanderers, often change the territory they are in, but are not then allowed to vote in their new territory until a full year has passed since they last had the opportunity to vote in their previous locations senator elections.

For a list of who currently holds every imperial title please refer to the imperial titles recent history page.

Eligibility to Vote

- Where relevant, the Empire identifies where your character lives based on the location of their resource
- To change territory, you must obtain a new resource in a new territory

In nations such as the Marches, the League and Navarr, your eligibility to vote in a senatorial election is based on your territory. Imperial citizens (especially the Navarr) may move freely around the Empire as they choose, however a resource cannot move. Because of this, the civil service use the location of your personal resource to determine your "territory" for determining eligibility for voting in senatorial elections. If you are a member nation that votes by territory and you wish to vote in a different territory then you must get a new personal resource in the new territory.

The need to change resource still applies if you own a military unit or a fleet. Both these resources include the active service and involvement of a large number of Imperial citizens. These citizens have homes, families and roots in the territory they are based in - and they do not wish to change territory even though you do.

The laws for Imperial elections state that, if eligibility to vote in a senatorial election is restricted in some way, then you cannot vote if you participated in an equivalent election in the last twelve months. Participation is defined as being eligible to vote and present in Anvil while the election takes place (it does not matter if you did not actually vote). You must abstain from voting in an election if it occurs less than four events after the previous election in your old territory. If you are in any doubt about your eligibility then you should consult Merlot, the civil service overseer of elections who can advise you.

Some nations do not restrict eligibility to vote in this way - for example, Highborn citizens with a congregation may vote in every Highborn election, regardless of their territory.

Any Imperial citizen who believes that another citizen is committing electoral fraud by voting in an election they are not eligible for should bring the matter to the attention of the election overseer and the magistrates.

Eligibility to Stand

- You must be an Imperial citizen to be eligible for an Imperial position or for a virtue position
- You must be a member of the appropriate nation to be eligible for a national position.
- You do not need to be present to be granted an Imperial title

Only Imperial citizens may hold an Imperial title which is an Imperial or virtue position. If the title is a national position, then only a member of the appropriate nation is eligible to hold the title. In all cases, the rules for eligibility may restrict who can vote in the election for the title, but they do not restrict who is eligible to hold the position. For example, only League citizens who possess a business in Sarvos may vote in the Sarvos senatorial elections - but they may choose to vote for any citizen of the League.

It is not necessary for a citizen to be present to be granted an Imperial title, it is perfectly legal for citizens to elect a proxy or support a candidate who is absent for any reason.

Multiple Titles

- It is not legal for a citizen to accept two Imperial titles

The constitution mandates that no Imperial citizen may wield the power of two Imperial titles at the same time. If a citizen who holds an Imperial title is granted a second Imperial title, then they must either renounce their current title or turn down the new position. To avoid any risk of being prosecuted for subverting Imperial law, a citizen should not wield any powers of their new Imperial title until they have had a chance to inform the civil servants in charge of elections which title they intend to renounce.

Imperial Fleet Master

Overview

The Imperial Fleet Master is an Imperial title first created by the Imperial Senate in Spring 378YE, then amended in Spring 380YE, with the responsibility to coordinate with fleet owners to support Imperial navies.

The last time the Empire had significant naval strength was during the reign of Emperor Barabbas. The majority of the Barabbine fleet was destroyed when it encountered a supernaturally intense storm two days south of Joharra. This resulted in the first, biggest – and most expensive – naval disaster of Imperial history and goes some way toward explaining why modern Imperial fleets are mercantile, rather than military, concerns. With the first launching of The Freeborn Storm just before the Winter Solstice 379YE, the Senate chose to redefine the title of 'Imperial Admiral' into the Imperial Fleet Master, opting for the title to focus on supporting navies rather than raiding barbarians.

Responsibilities

The Imperial Fleet Master exists to coordinate Imperial citizens who own fleets in order to best support the Imperial navies.

Powers

Address the Council

The Imperial Fleet Master has the right to make a address to the Imperial Military Council once per summit. This is intended to allow them to discuss matters of resupply with the Council. To use this power, the Imperial Fleet Master informs the Herald of the Council that they wish to make an address, which will then be added to the agenda for the next Council session.

Appointment

The Imperial Fleet Master is appointed by the Military Council. It is elected by simple majority of any members of the Military Council who are eligible to vote who are present when the election takes place. Appointments by the Military Council are traditionally carried out with a show of hands at a Council session.

Any Imperial citizen may hold the post. The Imperial Fleet Master serves for one year.

They can be revoked by the General Assembly and the Assembly of the Nine.

Imperial Inquisitor

Overview

This Imperial title was established by vote of the Senate in Spring 378YE. The holder is responsible for coordinating and overseeing inquisition in the Empire working with the Imperial Militia to ensure inquisitions occur correctly within the Empire. Although the title holder has no power to limit or direct the use of inquisition by the Synod they do have the power to carry out an inquisition in their own name.

Responsibilities

The Imperial Inquisitor is responsible for overseeing and co-ordinating the use of inquisition in service of the Empire. They are expected to work with both the Imperial militia and the Imperial Synod to ensure inquisitions are performed correctly.

Powers

Inquisitor

The Imperial Inquisitor is an Imperial title in the Synod. Once per summit, they may call an inquisition without the need for a vote in the Synod. This is in addition to any existing judgements they have raised normally. This use of the power may be escalated to a Condemnation just like any other inquisition.

To use this power, the Imperial Inquisitor must still place a judgement before the Synod, but it is considered to pass automatically at the point it is presented.

Appointment

The Imperial Inquisitor is appointed by judgement of the Assembly of the Nine, during the Summer Solstice.

Any Imperial citizen can serve as Imperial Inquisitor. They can be revoked by the General Assembly and by the Assembly of the Nine.

Imperial law (Redirected from Imperial Law)

Overview

Imperial Law is the body of law which has been created by the Imperial Senate and which extends the principles laid down in the Imperial Constitution. The law is prosecuted by magistrates, members of the Imperial Civil Service who are trained in Imperial jurisprudence. Magistrates act as judges during trials, determining guilt and sentencing and are able to deputise individuals to help them enforce the laws. The Throne and members of the Imperial Synod may appeal for clemency on behalf of the accused to obtain a reduced sentence.

Contents

- 1 Overview
- 2 Magistrates and trials
- 3 Magistrates and the Constitution
- 4 Purpose
- 5 Further Reading

Magistrates and trials

The implementation of the Law is overseen by the magistrates. They instigate an investigation into any potential crimes they are aware of; any character who believes a crime has been committed may bring the matter to the attention of a magistrate. The magistrates have far-reaching legal powers to allow them to go anywhere in the Empire and demand an audience with any citizen, similar to those possessed by the Synod. The magistrates may also deputise citizens to act on their behalf, either to gather evidence or to arrest a suspect.

Trials are inquisitorial rather than adversarial. There are no juries and no barristers. Trials are conducted by the magistrate who weighs the evidence and determines guilt and the accused is expected to speak in their own defence. The magistrate has the authority to silence anyone from speaking in their court and will use this power to ensure that trials remain short and dramatic.

Modern legal frameworks do not apply. There is no right to silence; if the accused refuses to answer a question, the magistrate may make an adverse inference about their guilt. Hearsay and circumstantial evidence are admissible. If a person has been murdered late at night, reports that the accused is known to dislike the accused may be weighted as evidence.

If the magistrate finds the accused guilty then they will proceed to sentencing. If the accused has pleaded guilty, a member of the Imperial Synod may submit a plea for clemency on their behalf. The plea must be based on Virtuous grounds; that is they must establish that the accused was acting virtuously, albeit illegally, when they committed their actions.

Magistrates have considerable power but are known to be bound by powerful magical oaths to uphold the spirit of the Law. As such they are considered to be above reproach. Their decisions may be incorrect - they are not infallible - but they are known to be absolutely impartial and honest.

Magistrates and the Constitution

Any motions passed by the Senate which change the Imperial Constitution or the way it is interpreted require authorization by The Throne and approval by the NPC magistrates.

These magistrates perform a dual IC and OOC function:

- IC They are responsible for ensuring that the founding principles of the constitution are protected.
- OOC They will not ratify a change to the constitution which Profound Decisions believe will adversely affect the enjoyment of the game. As the IC wording of the constitution is already written with this in mind, we believe that they will be able to provide IC reasoning for any rejection of a constitutional change.

Normally there are three chief magistrates who rule on constitutional matters in addition to their other duties. There is no right to appeal against their verdict. These magistrates are usually happy to discuss senatorial motions which may have constitutional implications and they will offer advice as best they can.

Examples of things which are guaranteed to be rejected by the magistrates include expelling a nation from the Empire, dispossessing citizens of their wealth and property, centralizing additional powers to the Throne or Senate, disestablishing the Bourse, Conclave, Military Council or Synod or frivolous or stupid laws.

Purpose

The point of the Law is to attempt to create a game in which there is a strong effective legal sanction against theft and murder. The goal is to create a convincing, compelling and original setting and also to encourage the majority of player-vs-player activity in the game to remain political rather than murderous. By making murder difficult to get away with, we hope to ensure that it is the least attractive option open to a player in dealing with their political enemies, rather than the most attractive option. The goal of Empire is to focus on a high degree of political interaction between players but have the balance of combat take place between players and monsters.

All magistrates will be NPCs, so that they work solely towards the goal of making the Law be trustworthy and effective. Any player character in this role would be minded to have other in-character considerations, other than to promote the game. The magistrates are also briefed to ensure that trials remain short and sweet, rather than running on interminably which is common in situations where they are not rigorously controlled.

Because the magistrates primary role is to make the law effective, they will never be used to run plot around corruption or other themes. They can be swayed by clever or charismatic testimony but they cannot be bribed, blackmailed or browbeaten.

Imperial Law Overview

This page is intended to provide an out-of-character summary of the Imperial Law; it details the basic principles of the law and the key concepts. Most players should be able to get a general feel for the laws of the Empire from reviewing this page.

Principles of Imperial law

The principles of Imperial Law are contained in its constitutional documents. The Imperial Constitution sets out:

- the principles underlying the relationship between the Nations and the Empire and the role of the Imperial Civil Service;
- the organs of the state and their appointed representatives; and
- the principles underlying the relationship between the citizen and the state.

Contents

- 2 Key Concepts
- 3 Individuals and the law
- 4 Five things about Imperial Law
- 5 Further Reading

Key Concepts

The nations which comprise the Empire are governed by Imperial Law which applies equally everywhere in the Empire. While each nation has its own traditions and customs they are superseded in circumstances where they conflict with Imperial Law. Imperial law is based on principles rather than legalistic precedents set by previous cases.

Any member of the Imperial Senate may submit a bill or motion to the civil service who will table it for debate by the Senate. There are additional requirements which apply to pass any legislation which amends the constitution. The Synod General Assembly have powers to veto legislation, particularly where it changes the constitution.

Those accused of crimes or engaged in civil claims are normally be expected to speak for themselves. Accordingly, there is no tradition of barristers within the Empire. You can play a lawyer who advises their clients about the law, but imperial law is intended to be simple to understand without being an expert.

Magistrates are non-player characters who are accorded wide-ranging discretionary powers under the constitution to investigate and try those accused of crimes and arbitrate in civil disputes. We will never run plot in Empire involving the corruption of magistrates or any other NPC civil servants.

The Imperial Synod have a number of legal powers which they use in furtherance of their role to ensure the spiritual wellbeing of the Empire. They also have a key role to play in the prosecution of religious crimes.

Individuals and the law

All characters in Empire will fall into one of the following broad categories in relation to the law:

- Citizens of the Empire must fulfil their obligations to the State and in return they receive associated rights, including protection under Imperial law.
- The child of an Imperial citizen has the full protection of the law as if they were a citizen. Until a child becomes a citizen their parents or guardians are responsible in law for any criminal or civil offences that they commit.
- Barbarians are defined as anyone with whom the Empire is at war. They have no recourse to Imperial Law (with one major exception, see below) but they may be the subject of it. Eternals and the Heralds of Eternals who are the subject of a declaration of enmity by the Imperial Conclave are considered enemies of the Empire and treated as barbarians. Unauthorised dealings with barbarians is illegal and will be investigated as treason. More information, including a list of Eternals currently under Enmity, can be found here.
- Any delegations from barbarian nations who arrive on the field of anvil under a flag of peace have protection under the law as if they were imperial citizens for the duration of their visit and for their direct passage out of the empire.
- Broadly, foreigners are any person who is neither a citizen nor a barbarian. Foreigners are subject to the law and are accorded protection by it as if they were a citizen, but they do not otherwise enjoy the benefits of citizenship. However, Eternals, and the Heralds of Eternals, are not treated as foreigners (thereby receiving protection under the law) unless they are the subject of a declaration of amity made by the Imperial Conclave.

- If a citizen forswears their oath to their Egregore and thereby ceases to be a citizen they become a foreigner (and so still benefit from the protection of the law). Citizens and former citizens who fight against the Empire will (if feasible) be tried for their crimes, rather than be treated as barbarians. Humans of the Mourn are granted full legal protection.

Five things about Imperial Law

- There is no right to silence for those accused of crimes. When questioned by a magistrate or deputised member of the militia in furtherance of their duties an accused must answer. If they do not a magistrate may draw an adverse inference. All citizens who witness crimes are expected to promptly inform either a member of the militia or a magistrate. Concealing crimes or assisting others to evade arrest is a serious offence.
- There are no prisons in the Empire. Those accused of crimes are usually released upon swearing an oath that they will attend their trial at the time set by the magistrate. Thief-takers will be ready to recapture them for a reward if they abscond.
- A citizen cannot be punished for saying that they will do something (which is illegal) before they have done it. Accordingly there are no laws which prohibit blackmail, threats of violence and so on. However, anything a citizen says may be used in evidence against them. So if a citizen threatens to kill someone and that person is then murdered, their death threats are potential evidence.
- Slavery is illegal in the Empire.
- Magistrates will use their absolute discretion as to what evidence they will consider when coming to their verdict. So a magistrate might choose to hear out a particular witness's testimony, or they may stop, redirect or dismiss them, entirely as they see fit.

Imperial Law at sanctioned events

Overview

What follows are some suggestions about running plot involving legal matters at sanctioned events. Although all the laws are publicly available on the wiki, there are some particular considerations to bear in mind for legal plot at sanctioned events.

Magistrates at Events

While trials at sanctioned events will probably be relatively rare, organisers may want to be prepared to conduct one if the need arises. Trials may only be carried out by NPC magistrates. Sometimes a magistrate from the main Empire events will be in attendance, and if so they will carry out such duties as the circumstances require. However, as their presence cannot be relied upon, you may want to consider giving a member of your crew the role of magistrate, if that's appropriate. All the material you need to do so is publicly available on the wiki, but please remember that magistrates are bound by powerful oaths to prevent corruption and will always try their utmost to be fair and just. We would also ask that your NPC magistrates refrain from giving out sentences of penal military service to players at sanctioned events. This is because we believe there are very limited circumstances in which it would be an appropriate punishment.

Trials of Player Characters

We think it is normally preferable for magistrates to conduct all trials at the sanctioned event that the alleged criminal activity was committed at. However if the suspect is a player character then they can be tried by the Magistrates at the next event at Anvil, if that would be more appropriate (e.g. your event is set in a wild area) or if you are not confident you can run a fair trial in accordance with imperial law at your event. We think this may often be less desirable than an immediate trial, as memories will have faded and key players may not be in attendance, but if you do this, please get in touch before the next event so we can make any necessary arrangements.

The Role of the Militia

The militia players are vital to the process of justice in Anvil. They typically perform the bulk of any investigation work and brief the magistrates before cases go to trial. There may be players who are members of the militia at a sanctioned event who can conduct any required investigations, but if no PC militia are attending, or if your plot requires NPC militia, then organisers can give the militia roles to members of their crew. If numbers are limited then investigations can also be conducted by a magistrate acting alone.

Plots involving Trials

It's worth bearing in mind that any plots you run involving potential sorcerers, heretics, idolators, blasphemers and the like may be complicated by the fact that there are really no legal mechanisms for dealing with them outside of the institutions of Anvil. So for example, someone can't be prosecuted for heresy at a sanctioned event because the appropriate assembly of the synod is not available to condemn them for it. If someone took the law into their own hands to deal with the problem they may be prosecuted for any crimes they have committed (e.g. murder) either at the sanctioned event or at a later event.

Bear in mind that similar issues do not arise if you run a plot involving someone who was declared a sorcerer, heretic etc in a time before the game began (before Winter 376YE).

Results of Trials

We would find it very helpful for sanctioned event organisers to provide the results of any trials conducted by their magistrates at their events. Please let us know details of the accused, the charge, their plea, the verdict, the punishment and anything else you think we should know. If there was anything else that happened at your event that you think the Magistrates should know about, please pass that on too.

Formulaic ritual (Redirected from Imperial Lore)

Overview

Formulaic rituals are rituals whose techniques and practices have been successfully refined to make the ritual as efficient and easy to cast as possible. Formulaic rituals are highly focussed - the caster gives up flexibility to gain reliability and efficiency. In addition magicians can learn to master formulaic rituals, making them even easier to cast.

There is a large body of formulaic rituals that have been promulgated throughout the Empire by the Imperial Conclave called Imperial Lore. These rituals are not the only formulaic rituals in existence, but they are so well known that they can be attempted by anyone powerful enough to do so.

Players interested in creating a new formulaic ritual should make sure they read through the information on ritual theory.

Imperial Lore and the Ritual List

- Imperial magicians can attempt any ritual that is in Imperial Lore if they have the ranks to do so
- An Imperial magician may choose to master a formulaic ritual that is part of Imperial lore

The ritual list describes all the formulaic rituals which are part of Imperial Lore. These rituals are known throughout the Empire and any magician or coven that has sufficient magical power can attempt to cast them.

Magicians can learn to master formulaic rituals that are part of Imperial Lore. Mastering a ritual means that any crystal mana used is doubled in effect, which makes the ritual much easier and cheaper to cast.

It is possible to master a ritual that isn't in Imperial Lore using a ritual text. A coven of magicians can only attempt a formulaic ritual that is not in Imperial Lore if one or more of the contributors has mastered the ritual.

Creating a New Formulaic Ritual

- Creating a new formulaic ritual would take an individual decades
- Some Imperial titles are able to direct scores of magicians to create formulaic rituals more quickly
- Creating a new ritual requires the magicians to cooperate to create a ritual text
- Ritual theory summarizes the known lore of what is and is not possible with a ritual

Creating a new ritual is a significant undertaking. In pre-Imperial times it might take decades to formulate even a simple ritual. There is a large body of ritual theory that Imperial magicians have discovered through painstaking research. Reading this lore will help any player who is interested in discussing or creating a new ritual.

To improve the speed with which new formulaic rituals could be created, the Empire created titles such as the Dean of the Lyceum and Provost of the Halls of Knowledge to co-ordinate the research efforts of many disparate magicians. By working together these magicians are able to create formulaic rituals much more quickly. The citizen who holds either of these Imperial titles can direct the research of Imperial magicians allowing them to create one or more new formulaic rituals.

To create a new formulaic ritual, a magician must start with an appropriate arcane projection, which will form the basis for the ritual being created. It is not always possible to duplicate a spontaneous effect using formulaic magic, so the final ritual may not end up identical to the original spontaneous effect. It may be more or less difficult to perform, and some elements of the ritual may have to be changed. In particular, formulaic magic is more flexible than spontaneous magic, for example divinations that can be cast on any item or enchantments that can be cast on a variable number of targets. The formulaic version of a ritual will automatically take advantage of these benefits where possible, but other than this it will be as close to the original spontaneous effect as the magicians involved can make it.

The new formulaic ritual is only complete once a ritual text has been produced. The ritual text is given into the care of the magician who held the Imperial position when the work was completed.

Ritual Texts

- A ritual text describes a formulaic ritual
- A magician or coven can use a ritual text they possess to perform the ritual
- Magicians can learn to master the ritual contained in the ritual text
- It is not possible to copy a ritual text

A ritual text is a rare, magical item that contains all the details necessary to perform a ritual. Most (though not all) ritual texts take the form of a description of the ritual, including all the rules, and at least some in-character commentary on the ritual. A ritual text contains sufficient information that any coven that holds one may use it to attempt to perform the ritual, exactly as if the ritual were part of Imperial Lore.

A magician who has the physical ritual text can also choose to master the ritual it describes by buying the extra ritual skill or using an empty ritual slot. This follows all the other rules for learning a skill during time-in. The text must be taken to GOD or shown to a referee to allow the ritual it contains to be mastered in the field.

If one of the contributors has mastered a ritual, their coven may attempt to perform that ritual exactly as if it were part of Imperial Lore, even if they no longer have access to the original text.

Unless a ritual text is formally added to the body of Imperial Lore (through Declaration of the Imperial Conclave), only someone who has possession of the text can master it. A magician cannot teach mastery of the ritual to another character without the text present.

Adding a Formulaic Ritual to Imperial Lore

- The Imperial Conclave can pay to add a ritual text to Imperial Lore
- The ritual text is used up as part of the process

If the owner of a ritual text wishes then they can ask the Imperial Conclave to add the ritual to Imperial Lore. If the Imperial Conclave agree and the costs are met, then the ritual text is consumed but the ritual becomes part of Imperial Lore.

Once a ritual text has been added to Imperial Lore it follows all the normal rules for formulaic rituals in Imperial Lore. Any Imperial magician may attempt to cast the ritual; they may choose to master the ritual if they have a slot available; and they could then teach any other magician to master it.

Imperial Magus

Overview

The Imperial Magus is an Imperial Title appointed by Declaration of the Imperial Conclave.

When it was initially created, the title was Conclave Liason to the Senate and had only the right to address the Senate. At the Autumn Equinox summit 378YE the powers of the title were amended, and re-titled Imperial Magus. During the Spring Equinox 379YE, the responsibilities of the title were further expanded to include a responsibility to keep the Imperial Conclave appraised of the Senate's position on magical matters.

Responsibilities

The Liaison is expected to take responsibility for providing the Senate with advice on magical matters. Following further discussion, these responsibilities were expanded to give the Imperial Magus the responsibility to advise the Imperial Conclave of the Senate's position on magical matters.

Powers

Right of Address

The Imperial Magus has the right to make an address to the Senate once per summit. This is intended to allow them to present important information for the Senators consideration. To use this power, the Magus informs the Civil Service that they wish to address the Senate. Their address will be added to the agenda for the next Senate session.

Member of the Senate

As a non-voting member of the Senate, the Imperial Magus is entitled to enter the Senate chamber at the start of a Senate session and participate in the debates. They do not have the power to raise motions or to vote on a motion. This power is intended to be used to participate in Conclave related discussions.

Addressing the Conclave

Once per summit, the Imperial Magus can raise an address to the agenda of a conclave session for free.

Appointment

The appointment, replacement, or removal of the Imperial Magus is made by the declaration of candidacy as part of a Conclave session. Any Imperial citizen may hold the title. The Magus serves until they are replaced by another magician using the Declaration of Candidacy. As a title in the Conclave, they cannot be revoked.

Imperial Master of Works

Overview

The Imperial Master of Works is an Imperial Title appointed by the Senate. The title was created at the Autumn Equinox summit of 377YE. The title has been amended several times since its creation. At the Spring Equinox 378YE, the Senate voted to remove the Master of Works' ability to create new fortifications. They also removed a 10 Throne stipend the title had initially enjoyed. The Imperial Mater of Works has further amended in Spring 380YE; it was limited to a single commission each season in line with other similar titles.

Responsibilities

The Master of Works is responsible for overseeing the maintenance and improvement of fortifications on behalf of the Senate. When first created, the Master of Works had the ability to commission new fortifications, but that power was removed by the Imperial Senate in Spring 378YE.

Powers

Maintain Fortifications

The Master of Works can repair fortifications. The materials required to repair the fortification are provided by the Master of Works.

To use this power, the Master of Works provides an announcement to the Civil Service, who present the decision to the Senate. No voting is possible by the Senate at this point, as the power has been delegated to the Master of Works. The Imperial Synod may, however, choose to exercise their veto over the Master's decision.

Improve Fortifications

The Master of Works can improve an existing fortification. The materials required to improve the new fortification are provided by the Master of Works.

To use this power, the Master of Works provides an announcement to the Civil Service, who present the decision to the Senate. No voting is possible by the Senate at this point, as the power has been delegated to the Master of Works. The Imperial Synod may, however, choose to exercise their veto over the Master's decision.

When the title was created, this power was unlimited. In Spring 380YE the Senate chose to amend this power in response to an administrative motion.

Appointment

The Imperial Master of Works is an Imperial position appointed by the Senate. Any Imperial citizen can hold this title. The Imperial Master serves for a year, and they can be revoked by the General Assembly and by the Assembly of the Nine.

Imperial Orc music

The Music of Imperial Orcs

Contents

Style summary

Taiko drumming, repetitive chants, early English songs as sources.

Born from the armies of Thrace and the freed slaves of the Empire, the Imperial Orcs have settled near the City of Anvil and created many family groups and Several Legions. Having lived for many generations as slaves, there is little that remains of any tribal history or culture. Consequently, the music of the Orcs is derivative of many influences. Also, Orcs lived in many parts of the Empire, where snatches of songs were overheard and adapted.

Slave songs - These were composed in many mines and sung to simple beats played on improvised percussion instruments, these are often sombre laments for lost freedom and tales of a terrible life in slavery.

War songs - Composed by the legions during and after the rebellion. These are songs of great deeds, the joy of battle and the comradeship of arms. Played with drums and often consisting of rhythmic chants. Also marching songs for those long days on the way to war.

Songs of 'Worth' - The Orcish culture of recalling the history of objects and investing them with worth, alongside the worship of, and connection to, the ancestors, has led to many stories and songs being composed that are handed down from singer to singer or from Shaman to Shaman. Some are told as epic tales and sagas, and some are made into simple songs. The recent exposure to many of the Empire's cultures has brought many musical influences into the orc encampment and songs can be done in many styles, although they still have an orcish feel of chants and repetition to them, and instrumentation is often simplified to percussion, drones and layers of voices.

Commonly known songs or chants

- Blood and Bone - very easy chant, good for improvising
- Erthe Upon Erthe - a rhythmic chant or song with difficult early English words
- An Orcish marching chant. <https://www.dropbox.com/s/rt63e2g9soxgk2e/Orc%20March%21.wma>
- A song about the habits of Orcs. (based on the lyrics of Stan Nichols) <https://www.dropbox.com/s/ftfui32zsk7lyoa/Rant%20and%20Roar.mp3>

Instrumentation and tunes

Use drums and Bodhrans for percussion.

Use of simple chords or even drones.

Other performance traditions

Tales of how 'objects of worth' have gained their value are popular. For example a banner that has been carried through several campaigns would have the battles that it was carried in told as a long story. It may mention the chiefs that fought under it, and warriors who performed great acts of courage or sacrifice. This could be told as a saga with some sections sung or chanted, and be accompanied by a drumbeat or clapping to help get the audience involved.

How to adapt your repertoire

It is important that music for the Orcs has the correct 'feel'. It should not be too folkly or modern in feel. If you want to adapt a song that you know, try performing it with just drums or unaccompanied.

There could also be a simple chorus to allow others to join in with or another vocal line. Try to add underlying bass lines or simple chants to run under the verses or choruses. Layered vocals make an excellent effect.

Imperial Orcs children

Children are very important within orc society, as the survival of the legions relies on the young. Most Imperial Orcs feel a special affection for children of their legion, even those that are not their own and will fight to the death to protect them from harm. Harm is seen as real risk to life and limb however; orc children are not spoiled. There is a belief that life is hard and that children must learn this from an early age. There is an orc saying that to shield the child is to expose the legion. Young children are never taken on campaign into enemy territory but they do travel with the legions as they march around the Empire. Sharing the harsh conditions that their parents experience is seen as character building.

Although children cannot legally take the battlefield before they pass their citizenship tests, they are still expected to serve the legion from a young age. Young children run messages for warlords, shamans and other important figures while older children work with bonesetters to acquire wealth and resources for the legion or acting as lookouts for thief-takers. Youth is seen as a handicap, since a child is prevented from taking the battlefield, they must compensate and look to help their legion in other ways.

When not working children are encouraged to fight and play games that teach them tactics and strategy or to study magic, literacy and history. It is accepted that children will want to engage in frivolous games that will not ultimately benefit them, but such things are seen as rewards for hard work.

Imperial Orcs live tough lives and those who fight in the Imperial armies know that death may find them at any point. As a result, they often look to pass on important belongings to children from an early age. Items of worth are particularly important. It is believed that learning to value the worth of an item, being able to recite its history and legacy, helps a child learn what it means to be an Imperial Orc as well as inspiring them to worthy deeds of their own. Weapons are common, once a child is old enough to carry one responsibly but pieces of jewellery, bones and other worthy pieces are all considered suitable for children. A young orc who carries an item of worth is expected to know its provenance and be able to tell stories of the deeds that helped it acquire worth. Some adult orcs, especially preachers like to challenge youngsters carrying such items to tell these tales, as a way of instilling pride and building confidence.

Once a child has passed the warrior test they are then old enough to fight in the fighting pits. The first fight is often a short, nervous affair and considered something of a rite of passage by many parents, but young orcs are encouraged to treat the pits with due respect. An orc should have reason to go to the pits, not simply because they are looking to prove they have become an adult.

While younger orcs do not hear their ancestors as often or as strongly as adult orcs do, it is important to teach them the difference between 'good' ancestors (those who offer guidance that helps them grow as part of the Empire) and 'bad' ancestors (those who give bad advice, or encourage them to do things at odds with the Imperial Orc way of life).

Things every child should know

- You have just one life, use it wisely. It should be your goal to become an ancestor.
- Your legion is your family. Wear your legion's symbols with pride.
- Support the Empire. You are part of the greatest power on earth, work hard to be worthy of it.
- Items have stories. These stories tell you what a person or item is worth, learn them well.
- Keep the laws. Without law we are nothing – Imperial law must be upheld at any cost.

Imperial Orcs culture and customs

Worth

In addition to the intrinsic value of an item, Imperial Orcs believe that some items have an additional quality they call "worth" that is defined by their provenance. This quality is based on the history of an item, who made it, what happened to it and how it came to be in the Orc's possession. It is based on the belief that a person's unique personal effects are imbued with qualities of that person during important moments. Items gain worth over time, as they are passed down generations, so old heirlooms are particularly prized.

Items also have worth if they are fashioned by the individual that used them so most Imperial Orcs take great pride in creating and maintaining as many of their own belongings as they can. Few orcs have the time to master such skills, so their personal effects may often have a rough, crude appearance, but this is of little concern to an orc compared to the idea that their belongings should have worth. When an Imperial Orc dies in battle, those who fought alongside them will often take one of the fallen's worthy items as a mark of respect. To be buried with all your belongings is considered a great shame for an Imperial Orc, an indication that your death had no worth.

Symbols

Orcs feel a strong need to be part of a well-defined group. They tend to see the group's identity as an essential part of their own identity, and they like to have clearly visible symbols of membership. This group identity is almost never expressed as uniformity, as that would deny individual choice and hark back to the time when Imperial Orcs were slaves. They prefer the items they use to be unique to them and to have as much worth as possible. For orcs, the solution is to paint or carve symbols onto belongings like shields and armour, or to paint or embroider them onto clothing. In some cases specific items such as skulls or jewellery may be attached to equipment as a symbol. The ability of symbols to draw groups together and create identity is a form of hearth magic.

Orc symbols are usually added to items by the owner themselves. The simplest are painted or drawn, but more skilled orcs will burn, gild or embroider symbols onto their belongings. Orcs dislike uniformity so symbols are usually recurring interpretations of a theme rather than a specific design used by everyone. In a legion of orcs that use a dagger as their symbol for example, each design may be a slightly different shape, size and colour, but provided they make the individual's legion clearly identifiable then they achieve their purpose. It is the underlying motif that is prized; the visible demonstration of allegiance.

When items change hands, old symbols are rarely painted over, rather they are allowed to fade, so that they become part of the story of an item, a way to tell its worth. New symbols are usually painted over the top of old symbols on items like shields, but multiple symbols of allegiance on clothing and armour add to the worth of an item so they are kept provided the bearer can still advertise their identity and allegiance clearly with their own symbols.

Many Imperial Orcs have adopted the Imperial Horse as the unofficial symbol of their nation. They embellish personal equipment with the image and incorporate it into banners and other symbols. Most orcs belong to a legion and the Imperial Horse usually takes pride of place next to the legion symbol.

Writing

Literacy is considered a defining symbol of adulthood by Imperial Orcs; in some ways more important than the ability to fight. As slaves, orcs were unable to learn to read and write and many older orcs endured years of difficult lessons following their freedom – some still struggle to read or write well. Literacy has become a prized skill by Imperial Orcs, symbolic of the freedom they fought to achieve and children raised by Imperial Orcs have its value drilled in to them from an early age. Imperial Orcs assume that any orc can fight by the time they reach adulthood, but they do not take literacy for granted.

The written word is regarded with some reverence by many orcs. While books are less interesting to them, the idea that you can record the words someone has said, and thereby immortalize what would otherwise be lost, has a mystical quality to many orcs. This ability to continue to inspire or advise generations after the individual speaker has died is seen as akin to the way an ancestor can inspire or advise after they are dead.

Pit-fights

Most orcs enjoy fighting or watching others fight in much the same way a citizen of the Marches might enjoy a ball game. Consequently wherever Imperial Orcs are found there is likely to be a place set aside for pit fighting. This practice allows for weapon training and grudge settling in front of an appreciative audience, while on a practical level fighting allows orcs to deal with frustration or boredom while keeping a clear head at other times. Pit fights are never to the death; killing someone in a pit fight is as much murder as killing someone in the tavern.

Some orcs find the experience of pit-fights to be so powerful that they dedicate themselves to becoming professional pit fighters, drawn by the roar of the crowd, the challenge, or by the profound spiritual experience of unleashing the violence that thunders in the blood of all orcs.

Clothing

Almost all Imperial Orcs wear wraps around their ankles, wrists and neck. When the first Orcs were freed from slavery the wraps were used to hide the scars caused by chains and manacles. Although there are few remaining Imperial Orcs who bear the scars of slavery, the wraps have become a mark of solidarity in the nation. Wearing them is seen as a acknowledgement of the past, recognizing the sacrifices made by your forebears.

Many orcs now use other garments to cover these areas, but almost all orcs cover them in some way. To leave the skin in these areas exposed is considered shameless by most Imperial Orcs - a taboo akin to public nudity - it is thought to show disdain for your parents and implies that the individual thinks they are better than older Imperial Orcs because they are not scarred. More than one young orc who thought to flaunt the custom has been taught the error of their ways in the pit.

Families

When they were slaves the orcs became used to the idea of raising their children, only to lose contact with them when they came of age. Imperial slave owners regularly sold young orcs as soon as they became adults. As such, orc parents came to believe that they had to teach everything their child needed to know about the world before they reached maturity. Even after they liberated themselves, the orc parents continued this tradition of preparing them to make their own way in the world.

A young orc is unlikely to follow their parent into the "family business". They are even unlikely to join the same legion as their parents. They are much more likely to join another legion, encouraged by family and stranger alike to make their own way in the world. In doing so they keep the nation strong, but they also keep it connected and prevent it breaking up into tribes - siblings in two legions maintain a bond and recognise each other as kin. Having blood relatives in many different parts of the nation helps the orcs maintain a sense of that nation as being part of their family.

Outsiders imagine that orcs do not care much for their children but this is an entirely mistaken view. They send their children away because they value them, wanting them to grow up to be strong and independent adults capable of taking responsibility for themselves. Children are so precious to Imperial Orcs that they find the idea of orphans horrifying. As a result it is not uncommon for Imperial Orcs to adopt abandoned human orphans and raise them as their own children. Such individuals must join another nation when they come of age, but most remain firm allies of the Imperial Orcs for the rest of their life.

Funerals

Imperial Orcs believe it is essential to stay together even in death. Every effort is made to ensure that the fallen are not left alone on the field of battle. Orcs bury their dead in mass graves and the fallen are carried in ceremony until they are joined by others or their bodies can be added to an existing grave.

When a shaman or an Imperial Orc ritualist dies, it is common to claim a few bones from the body. These bones are carved or etched and used to create talismans useful in orcish ritual magic.

When I am old, with skin of white / my children with me late at night / 'Tell us a tale' They'll beg of me / 'Tell us all in your memory'

I'll tell you of those fallen down, / the dead and dying on the ground / I'll tell the tales of their worth / Their bodies rotting in the earth

I'll sing the songs of legions strong / A wall of legionnaires, miles long / the ring of steel upon my shield / none of us would ever yield

My memories will keep me strong / when fighting days are far far gone / My face of joy when our first crop grows / and the time I broke that butchers nose

And when I pass, my last breath gone / I hear that chilling ancestor song / I hear their voice one last time / As over the abyss I must climb.

Imperial Orcs economic interests

Overview

Imperial Orcs see money as something that separates free citizens of the Empire from slaves. Perhaps more so than many humans they understand the freedom that comes with being able to buy and sell things freely. A number of the first generation were raised in League cities, and possessed a well-developed appreciation for the power that comes with wealth. In keeping with their instinctual desire to be part of a group, however, many Imperial Orcs see a distinction between personal wealth - enough money to live in comfort - and the wealth of the legion - the wealth that comes from and is used to keep everyone in the legion well equipped, fit and capable of doing their jobs.

Bonesetters

Many legions pool the majority of their wealth and resources, using it to provide for the members of the legion on the basis of need. A warlord will usually appoint one or more individuals to look after a legion's wealth. By tradition these people are called bonesetters and are usually trained apothecaries, physicks or both.

Bonesetters are expected to attend to the physical needs of the legion, but their remit runs well beyond this. Most bonesetters proactively work to enrich their legion, investing the legion's resources as they see fit to try to increase the legion's wealth. Bonesetters have no formal powers but they often broker deals for the skills of individual legion members or even the whole legion, if they are confident that their warlord will support them. A competent bonesetter who is working in the best interests of their legion can usually count on their support. Few Orcs want to annoy the individual whose responsibility it is to treat the wounded but more importantly, the genuine bonesetter is assumed to be making deals for the benefit of the entire legion.

Thief-takers

Orcs despise criminals or indeed anyone who puts their own interests above that of their group. As a result Imperial Orcs find themselves natural supporters of the Imperial legal system. If an Imperial Orc witnesses corruption or lawbreaking, they are likely to take steps to immediately arrest the criminal, and take them straight to the nearest magistrate for judgement. As a result many have found a niche for themselves serving as thief-takers.

Thief-takers earn their income by collecting bounties on criminals who have fled the law and more rarely by taking payments from private individuals looking to identify perpetrators of crimes. Thief-takers are overseen by the Imperial magistrates and the most effective work closely with them. Some legions encourage their members to take this work, believing that it earns wealth for the legion as well as performing a valuable service, but some Orcs enjoy the work so much that they make a life for themselves outside the legion forming small bands with other successful thief-takers.

The large number of Orcs prepared to carry out this work, and their strict adherence to the letter of the law, particularly enacting magistrates' orders which would make others' lives politically very uncomfortable has meant that in recent years more and more of this work is brought directly to the Imperial Orcs. In particular a number of magistrates have adopted the "culprit's walk" where suspects are forced to walk around the Orc camp before being released on bail. The culprit's walk makes it easier for Orc thief-takers to identify suspects that fail to return for trial as well as making the culprit aware of the resources available to bring them to justice. There have been three attempts by the Senate to ban the culprit's walk but thus far they have all been unsuccessful.

Reavers

A handful of legions no longer maintain links with the armies. They have come to enjoy the freedom and wealth afforded by mercenary work. These groups, called reavers, support themselves by raiding, adventuring, and hiring themselves out as guards and escorts to merchants prepared to pay to secure the martial might of an orc military unit. With their income not tied to the vagaries of the Imperial Guerdon, or the strategies of the Imperial Military Council, bands of reavers may quickly become wealthy.

Reavers are mostly tolerated by other Imperial Orcs; as often as not their wealth helps to enrich the Imperial Orc nation and thus can still claim to be serving the Empire in their way. The primary bone of contention used to be that reavers were often loyal to their own band first, and to the rest of the Imperial Orc nation and the Empire a distant second. However with Imperial Orcs legions increasingly abandoning the Summer Storm and the Winter Sun to follow the Guerdon, the distinction between the two groups is increasingly blurred.

Reaving is seen as a good way of life for those Orcs who chafe under the leadership or strict discipline of army life. Furthermore, the line between legions and reavers is easily crossed. Legions that find themselves unable to respect a general or the demands of the Military Council may up the reaving lifestyle, sometimes for years at a time. Reavers who become prosperous may enjoy the luxury of supporting one of the Imperial Orcs armies without concern for Guerdon shares, or as a route toward taking a more significant role in Imperial Orcs society.

Resources

Until recently most Imperial Orcs favoured military units and only a few invested in herb gardens, mana sites or other static resources. Now that their dream of a homeland of their own has been realized, increasing numbers of them are moving there to take up stewardship of the valuable resources left by the departing Wintermarkers. They are swiftly proving themselves to be capable as farmers, business owners and more, and for the most part they are able to fill the many needs of their nation's people.

However most Imperial Orcs still regard mines with a great deal of distaste and few Orcs can be convinced to work them. As a result the Imperial Orcs usually avoid them and those that do own them often have to hire Wintermarkers or other Imperial citizens to work them. The shortfalls in metals and other materials that the Imperial Orcs need were traditionally provided by reavers, but increased opportunities to trade with other Imperial nations and even the Thule means that there are now more options available to ensure that an Imperial Orc can avoid the stigma of having to work a mine.

The Foreman of the Mines of Gulhule in particular plays a role in keeping the Skarsind mines operational. This ministry involves ensuring that sufficient mine workers are employed to exploit the rich mineral wealth of the Skarsind mountains.

Imperial Orcs hearth magic

Symbols

Symbols as marks of identity and loyalty are culturally important to Imperial Orcs, but they are also a form of hearth magic. Symbols are used to bind people together, and can be used to strengthen magic that affects groups of people. Imperial Orcs dislike uniformity, so the symbols they use are rarely identical in size and shape; what is important is the thematic image and implied unity. The power of the hearth magic lies in the repetition of the symbolic meaning, rather than in the shape and colour.

The hearth magic of symbols can also be used to create or enforce identity. For orcs, the decision to adopt a symbol is never taken lightly because they know that wearing the symbols of others creates bonds that work to encourage loyalty and unity.

Worth

Imperial Orcs believe that items have worth based on their history and deeds, how they have passed from one owner to the next and how they have been used. Worth is important in to the ancestors, but it is also an effective hearth magic because the item can influence the owner as much as the owner influences the item. As items gain worth, they pass the essence of that power on to their wielder. A sword used to perform courageous deeds helps the bearer be courageous; a sword used to perform cowardly backstabbing encourages the wielder to be a cowardly backstabber.

This means that the orcs believe that some items with worth are better off being destroyed. An example might be the crown of Alderei the Fair - nobody can deny it has worth but that worth is tainted and corrupt because of the terrible deeds it was part of. Anyone who takes that item runs the risk of becoming cruel and tyrannical.

Imperial Orcs history

Slavery

The Imperial Orcs began as slaves. By the time the First Empress was putting her Empire together, generations of orcs had been born, lived and died as slaves to the human nations. Slaves were rare in Navarr and Urizen, because they had little use for them, and in the Brass Coast because slavery was an abomination to many. However it was commonplace everywhere else in the Empire; just as it was common for humans to labour as slaves in the lands the Orcs controlled. For the forerunners of the Imperial Orcs the founding of the Empire swelled their numbers as more Orc tribes were conquered but it brought no respite from their toil.

Orc children were traded like livestock. The old and the weak were left to starve. Thoughtless cruelty was commonplace. The most common attitude of slave owners was that orcs were lucky to be alive, the only alternative they saw was death for those who resisted the expansion of the Empire. Those orcs who escaped captivity were simply never seen again, unless they were hunted down and brought back to the camps to face execution as a warning to the others.

Orcs taken as slaves were deliberately separated from their tribes to make them easier to handle. The result was that the orcs had lost all sense of identity, stripped of their tribal heritage by generations of slavery. As a result when an orc managed to escape, they made no effort to rescue anyone else.

The Uprising

The uprising began in Varushka with the legendary orc warlord Thrace. Young, confident and strong-willed, he saw something that no previous orc slave had seen. The other orc slaves were not strangers, they were part of his legion - his tribe. Through force of will and physical might, he bound his fellows together. He engineered a collapse in the mine allowing the entire legion to escape as one. A single escape was not enough for Thrace and his legion - they had decided that all the slaves kept by the Empire were their people, and they set out to free as many of their tribe as they could.

Thrace's legion began raiding nearby slave enclosures, freeing other orc slaves and appropriating weapons and food for their growing band. Wherever Thrace's legion went, they offered the slaves they liberated a simple choice. Join our legion and come with us, or stay by yourselves and try to make it alone. The majority chose to join the legion, and their numbers quickly grew. Throughout the Summer there were numerous battles with Varushkan troops sent to deal with the uprising, but the results were indecisive and with winter closing in, the Varushkans were forced to abandon the pursuit.

By this time the legion had grown so large that Thrace was forced to split his forces in three to allow them to survive the winter. They spent the cold months practising with the armour and weaponry they had captured. Messengers were sent to the barbarian tribes, to seek aid, but they were bloodily rebuffed. If anything, the barbarian tribes seemed to hate the liberated slaves even more than the humans. From surviving emissaries, the news trickled back that no escaped orc slave had ever been accepted among the barbarians; those few who had survived the arduous trek to the lands claimed by the barbarians, and those slaves in territories that had fallen to the barbarians, were simply killed.

With the first thaws of spring, the Imperial army tried to catch the orcs in a decisive engagement, but Thrace and his warlords resisted. The Imperial generals called in reinforcements, and finally they managed to corner the orc force with no opportunity for escape. The orcs still had the advantage of numbers, but they had only a fraction of the weapons, armour and training of their enemies and it was clear that defeat was certain without a miracle of some kind. Determined not to allow the uprising to be crushed, the legion sent the best warriors out in small groups in the night with orders to slip past the Varushkan armies and carry the uprising to all the lands of the Empire. To give them cover to make their escape, Thrace led the legion in a surprise attack against the encamped Varushkan armies near Kolvy in Karov.

Woefully under-equipped compared to the Imperial troops, the legion managed to keep the Varushkans busy until late in the day. They fought valiantly, desperately, but they were no match for the massed might of two imperial armies. It is widely believed that Thrace died in the engagement with the Imperial armies. To date no Imperial Orc can claim reliably to have heard his voice and some believe this means he is not actually dead. It seems unlikely that he is alive, but equally unlikely that such a pivotal figure would not have become an ancestor after death.

The Empire crushed the slaves and on the orders of the Varushkan generals no prisoners were taken. Every orc not killed in the battle was executed, and survivors were mercilessly hunted through the early winter months. The bodies were burnt in massive funeral pyres, and the Empire considered the matter at an end.

The Revolt Spreads

On the first day of spring of the next year, the soldiers that Thrace had ordered to flee Varushka attacked slave camps in Wintermark, Dawn, the League and Highguard. They had spent the winter spying out all the weakest defended areas where slaves were being held and they fell on them slaughtering any Imperials not smart enough to run. Their numbers swelled rapidly, just as they had done in Varushka, while the Empire struggled to respond to a widespread threat erupting in lands it considered secure.

There were atrocities on both sides during this period - stories of entire camps put to the sword by terrified owners, or villages sacked and every human within slaughtered by rampaging orc slaves in search of supplies. Not all contact between orcs and humans was hostile however; a handful of notable Freeborn and League merchants realized the potential for profit and began to sell weapons and provisions to the orc legions in return for plundered ores.

While the orcs tried to avoid pitched battles, their groups became too large to move effectively especially in open lands. Several major engagements took place in Dawn and Wintermark and although the orcs suffered a number of defeats there were always more camps to raids so their numbers continued to grow. The message of the revolt spread through the orc population, no matter how hard the Empire tried to prevent it. "We are one tribe," it ran. "We are one people, and we will not be slaves any longer." Several camps spontaneously revolted and while most such mini-uprisings were ruthlessly suppressed enough succeeded, forming new legions who set out to join up with their free fellows.

As the year drew on, the disparate orc forces created a massive encampment near the city on the League city of Temeschwar where thousands of slaves were held, The city was well defended however and it was clear that they lacked the numbers to take it so they pushed north into Varushka intent on surviving the winter there as they had done the year before.

It was there, that Emperor Ahraz of the Brass Coast made contact with them, initially via contacts cultivated by Freeborn merchants, and later in person. While the Empire tends to take a dim view of Ahraz, the orcs mostly speak of him as a man of great sincerity and passion who convinced them that he could not only save their people, but give them a purpose and a home. All they had to do was swear to serve the Empire and the Imperial Throne.

Several legions refused to accept Ahraz' offer - to join the Empire that had enslaved them - and even the Emperor could not ensure their safety. They headed into the Varushkan wilderness, and out of the Imperial Orc histories. Some were exterminated by the Imperial Armies, others were prey to monsters, and a few exist today as beleaguered bandit tribes.

Those who accepted Ahraz' offer marched along with his forces to Anvil, in a calculated show of force, to where the Senate was sitting. The Emperor presented the agreement to the Senate, and hours of frantic politicking took place. The Emperor's faction won the vote. Several far-reaching changes took place as a consequence; it became illegal to keep orcs as slaves and those who swore to serve the Empire were accepted as Imperial citizens.

Citizens of the Empire

Acceptance of the orcs as citizens of the Empire meant the end of slavery. Those few orcs still enslaved were brought to the vast camps based near Anvil. Tents and provisions were provided but life in these refugee camps was crowded and dirty. As months passed these camps became the de facto home for the Imperial Orcs. The Civil Service made a great push to recruit orcs into the Imperial army; the discipline of army life suited the orcs and keeping their people together made it possible to exert leadership over them.

The years that followed also required each of the now-Imperial Orcs to take the Tests of Adulthood. They learned to read and write first from Urizen teachers, and then from each other. These were the first of the skills that the orcs had been denied as slaves, but others followed - metalworking, building, sewing - all had to be relearned.

Many orcs were keen to abandon the past and embrace the opportunity they had won for themselves as citizens of the Empire. The legacy of Thrace was to show the orcs that they were a people, and one that existed long before Ahraz made them citizens of the Empire. The orcs know that the Emperor did not make them one people, it merely gave their people a name.

The Plan

After the orcs agreed to join the Empire, the first problem that had to be addressed was where they would live. The human nations that had formed or joined the Empire held lands of their own. Territories that were liberated from the barbarians were incorporated into existing nations. But as slaves, the orcs claimed no lands of their own and no Imperial senators, not even the Freeborn were keen to offer the Imperial Orcs a home within their borders. To resolve the problem the representatives of the orcs proposed a simple plan - the orcs would become a nation without territories, claiming no land of their own until they could conquer one following Imperial statute. This proposal relieved the fears of many senators and helped to win the support of the League, although it was heavily criticized by the Highborn.

So the Imperial Orcs fought and died in the service of the Empire - always seeking to pursue "The Plan". Help the Empire conquer new lands and eventually the senate would assign one to the Imperial Orc nation so that they will have a homeland of their own. The Orcs were not naive about the obvious military, political and historical challenges they faced, but most believed that their journey to full citizenship in the Empire would never be complete until they held a territory. As a result the leaders of the Imperial Orcs and the legions themselves make a deliberate effort to keep the orcs together as a people, enduring the hard life in the legion camps as an essential sacrifice in order to achieve their ultimate goal. Individuals who settled down in other nations were seen as undermining the moral imperative for the Imperial Orcs to be given lands of their own and regarded with open hostility by many.

When Empress Britta took the Throne, she made overtures to the Imperial Orcs bringing them into the inner circle of her advisors. With their drive for conquest undimmed by the decades since the uprising, the Imperial Orcs were key to her ambitions to reinvigorate the Empire and take the fight to the barbarians who pressed their borders. Some claim that she made secret pacts with the leaders of the Orcs, promising them lands in return for their support. The truth of such matters probably died when Britta was ambushed and killed along with many of her most ardent supporters. However some years later, when the Imperial Favour of Britta was discovered - those who held it reported that it had been placed in trust for the Imperial Orc nation.

Skarsind

In 379YE the Imperial Orcs helped the Wintermarkers fight off a cruel assault by the forces of the Thule Dragons. During the battle, the Orcs recovered the Crown of Three Tears, the ancient Wintermark symbol of unity. After the fighting was complete, members of the Irontide and Skywise legions returned the priceless crown to their allies. It is claimed that this great gift was instrumental in awakening the Wintermark people to the long suffering of the Imperial Orcs. In gratitude Wintermark proposed to give the Imperial Orcs a gift that would far surpass even the crown - a homeland - the territory of Skarsind. There were significant political and constitutional hurdles to overcome but eventually the territory was relinquished and then assigned by the Senate to the Imperial Orcs.

Some of the history of that momentous decision and the events that followed is recounted here. A few Imperial Orcs remain conflicted about the decision to this day; they say that the Plan had always been to claim a nation through their own military force, not to gain land from the beneficence of others. For the majority however, Skarsind represents the culmination of three generations of struggle; the Imperial Orcs proved themselves time and again on the battlefield until eventually the Empire - led by Wintermark - saw fit to give them what was long owed. As the news spread, tens of thousands of Imperial Orcs from across the Empire have moved to Skarsind, eager to finally put down roots and grasp the opportunity presented by this rich land. For many Orcs, Skarsind seems like everything they have ever wanted.

A Future Unwritten

This land is the vision that Emperor Ahraz promised their forebears, this gift from Wintermark is Britta's legacy. It is in the nature of orcs to strive - the Plan may be over - but now there is a new challenge facing the Imperial Orcs. Can they build a nation worthy of Thrace and every Imperial Orc who went before them? Now they have a seat at the great table, can they build a nation to become the equal of any other?

Imperial Orcs leadership

The Legion

The legions are the backbone of the Imperial Orc armies, and most Imperial Orcs are (or were) a member of one of the countless different units of tight-knit soldiers. Each legion has its own identity but most are organized along military lines, and are an official part of one of the two Imperial Orc armies. In practice the legions are a cross between a regiment and an informal family group. Although not all the members of a legion are warriors, or even members of the army, the camaraderie and mindset of the career soldier tends to permeate throughout a legion.

Each orc legion chooses its own name and symbols but most can also be identified by their favoured fighting style. One legion may have a bias for plate armour and pole-weapons, while another favours sword and shield. Warriors are usually expected to have at least a basic mastery of their legion's favoured style. Each legion is fiercely proud of its identity in battle, and a healthy, good natured rivalry exists between legions with regard to tactics and combat style. This rivalry is put aside on the battlefield, and warlords are careful to ensure that it never undermines loyalty and service to the Empire; the place for combat between members of rival legions is the fighting pit, not the battlefield.

Banners and standards are particularly important to Imperial Orcs. Legion camps are often decorated with banners displaying legion symbols, as Orcs find it reassuring to be surrounded by images that reinforce their group identity. Many bear an image of the horse as a symbol of the Empire alongside specific legion markings and colours. Imperial Orcs differentiate between banners, which are general symbols of legion identity, and a legion standard. Many legions have a legion standard, which is a symbol of the legion's pride. Trophies from particularly notable legion members or items of exceptional worth that once belonged to someone in the legion are often added to a legion standard.

Legions chose their own commanders, called warlords, with individuals chosen for their ability to provide clear effective leadership in battle, according to the traditions of the individual legion. Orcs expect their leaders to be inspirational as well as astute so the majority of warlords are powerful warriors who lead from the front. Those who lead by cunning alone need to be particularly smart and their legions are often small but very tight knit. Warlords appoint members of the legion to a chain of command beneath them, so that if they fall in battle they can be quickly replaced – the life of the legion is always more valuable than the life of any individual.

Most legions have a clear chain of command with harsh punishments for disloyalty or disobedience. Imperial Orcs usually have little sympathy with individuals who refuse to follow orders. In battle, those who find themselves at odds with a legion's leadership face summary court martial, at other times they are usually expelled from the legion. In such cases a group of orcs usually form their own rival legion, while an individual must attempt to join another legion or face existence alone.

Few Imperial orcs have much time for or interest in the sophisticated political intrigues so popular in places such as the League. They are perfectly capable of understanding that a senator might say one thing and mean another, but among themselves they expect plain talking. In part this is because Imperial Orcs expect and demand an unyielding chain of command. Leaders amongst the orcs will usually explain the details of a plan because they want their followers to understand it, but they rarely if ever feel the need to justify it. In the view of most Imperial Orcs you either trust your leaders implicitly or you choose someone different to follow. Undermining your leaders weakens the whole legion, and is regarded with contempt when done to advance your own position.

Leading a territory

With the new Imperial Orc homeland being established in Skarsind, the Orcs now elect a senator to represent them in the Imperial Senate. Any Imperial Orc citizen can stand for election as senator, but only those Imperial Orcs who are soldiers living in Skarsind have a say in choosing the senator.

This limited enfranchisement reflects the Orcs martial history and their militaristic nature. Soldiers includes more than just warriors - the fighting strength of the Imperial Orcs is made up of all those individuals who travel to

OOC explanation

- Anyone can stand as senator
- Only soldiers who are from the territory can vote
- The egregore will settle any disputes about who is a soldier
- Candidates make a speech about an item of worth
- Voters place a weapon before their chosen candidate.
- Majority support takes the seat

battle through the Sentinel Gate as part of the Imperial Orc force. If any orc questions the right of another to call themselves a soldier then the egregore will arrange for them to show their will to face danger in the fighting pit against an opponent of the egregore's choosing. Once mettle has been proven, no further challenges will be accepted that summit.

Once the candidates have made themselves known, each in turn is invited to present an item of worth and explain its significance to the candidate or the nation. The egregore has recommended this method because the Orcs need to be represented by someone who can hold their own in an arena where debate and the ability to express oneself are key.

After each candidate has spoken, those orcs eligible to vote can place a weapon in front of the speaker they support. Once every orc has had their chance, the number of weapons is counted and the orc that has received the most becomes the new senator.

When the Imperial Orcs had no territories of their own, they did not possess senators. As a result the effective leadership of the nation lay with the warlords, and most especially with the two Imperial Orc generals. Generals were chosen by bouts between legion members under rules agreed when the orcs joined the Empire. When they gained control of the territory of Skarsind, this process was abandoned in favour of appointing a senator who in turn appoints both generals.

Shamans

Shamans play an important role in the leadership of Imperial Orc society. Their link to the orc ancestors is considered to provide valuable insight and wisdom. By tradition shamans are consulted by Imperial Orc senators, generals, and warlords before significant decisions are made, so that they can provide the ancestor's guidance. A warlord or similar individual might have a specific favoured shaman they regularly consult, but senators and generals are more likely to speak to all the shamans present. Individual Orcs also seek out shamans for advice when they make important decisions, either to receive guidance in making up their minds or to see how the ancestors feel about the course of action they have decided on.

It is not uncommon to ignore the advice shamans give though it should always be weighed and considered. The orcs' barbarian ancestors do not understand the life of the Imperial Orcs, and their voices tend to be the loudest of those heard by the shamans. There are exceptions; some shamans possess enough wisdom that their advice is valuable even when it does not come directly from an ancestor, and other shamans have an affinity for one or more helpful ancestors whose words often seem to be more relevant to their Imperial descendants.

Imperial Orcs lineage and species attitudes

Orcs do not have lineage. To most Imperial Orcs, humans with lineage are still citizens of the Empire, and they do not discriminate against them especially. Many orcs see no difference between humans with lineage and humans without lineage.

A small number of Imperial Orcs are not descendants of the original slaves freed after Thrace's rebellion. Occasionally a band of bandits will seek out the egregore and petition to join the nation, sick of their lives living hand-to-mouth in the wilderness. Recently, a small handful of Lasambrian orcs from the Hierro clan made the trek to Skarsind after their people were conquered by the Jotun and refused shelter by the Empire. Perhaps two hundred former slaves from the eastern Principalities of Jarn, educated at the College of the Liberated, became part of the nation in 380YE.

Not all Imperial Orcs welcome these newcomers, often claiming that anyone whose grandparents were not enslaved by the Empire should not be allowed to join the nation. However those who have settled in Skarsind have been accepted by the Imperial Orc egregore as they are willing to adopt Imperial Orcs culture and customs and thus become part of the nation. That is more than good enough for most Imperial Orcs.

For many years there has been a common enmity between barbarian and Imperial orcs. During the uprising efforts were made to make contact with the barbarian tribes but they were rejected. In some cases the emissaries were simply killed, but some tribes made offers of help or sanctuary only to betray them to the Empire.

Prior to the uprising it was often claimed that slaves who managed to escape were welcomed by those tribes who were hostile to the Empire; in fact it has become increasingly clear that those who did manage to reach to the barbarian lands did not find the welcome they had hoped for. Most likely they were summarily slain - but nobody is quite sure. What is certain is that nobody has ever found any trace of such people living among the barbarians.

The motivation for the barbarians' hatred of the Imperial Orcs is not clear, but it seems to stem from a fundamental belief that they are somehow dirty or spiritually corrupt. What is notable is that this hatred has diminished or even entirely disappeared in recent years. Imperial Orcs are no longer singled out for attack by the enemy on the battlefield and the enemy now seems to regard them as little different to any other Imperial. Nobody is quite certain what actions or events have caused this change - but it has been noted by observers of all four barbarian tribes.

Imperial Orcs look and feel

Overview

The Imperial Orc look is a patchwork of second-hand clothing and equipment collected together. Equipment is aged and worn, a reflection of the Orc preference for old items with history and story over things that are new. Imperial Orcs have been free for barely the span of two generations, enough time to learn basic skills but not enough to master them. Moreover most orcs take pride in being able to make and maintain their own clothing and equipment but they have little interest in their appearance. As such Imperial Orc craftwork lacks sophistication - it is simple and practical.

Base colours are dull or dark; brown is seen as a practical colour that hides mud and dirt stains. These will be contrasted with stark colours like blood red or midnight blue. The surface of weapons and armour are often treated, dulling, darkening or painting the metal to protect them against further rust. Clothing and equipment are all marked with symbols of identity, painted, carved or stitched onto the surface.

Imperial Orcs are practical people who like their belongings to reflect their physical lifestyle. As a result clothing tends to be strong and hard wearing, to resist wear. Leather is common, as are linen and wool - practical materials that will wear well and can be patched and repaired. Tailoring is basic; most orcs wear a simple tunic often combined with a warskirt made up of pieces of leather hung from a belt.

Weapons are heavy and solid, designed to withstand the most brutal impacts without shattering and to pulverize bones rather than cut the flesh. Bows and crossbows are both used occasionally, but most orcs prefer to get close to their enemy.

General

- Feel: Proud, practical, poor, old, worn, independent, physical, fierce.
- Influences: Costume is heavily influenced by the Dark Ages; weapons and armour by the Lord of the Rings.
- Materials: Practical and hard wearing materials like wool, hessian, canvas and especially leather. Materials are usually dyed or stained to protect them and to hide mud or dirt. They also use iron reinforcing clothing with plates of iron and patches of chain.
- Colours: Dull or dark natural shades, particularly brown. Primary colours such as blood red or midnight blue may be used for contrast or to highlight an item.

Clothing

The basic Imperial Orc costume is a woolen t-tunic or similar linen tunic with a simple cut. Dark Age fabrics and costume patterns with their simple cuts are ideal for Imperial Orcs. These drawings show some of the art team's original ideas for Imperial Orcs in the Empire setting based on the ideas that their clothing is simple practical items they have taught themselves to make since winning their freedom.

Clothing is often supplemented with patches of mail or pieces of plate. Orcs are no more likely than any other Imperial Citizen to wear armour all the time, but armour is considered a mark of status, so small pieces of armour demonstrate the wearer's right to dress as they please.

Many things owned by Imperial Orcs are ripped and torn or pitted with rust, their appearance hopelessly affected by the rigours of age and hard use. Orcs regard these signs of age as a necessary improvement for a thing to gain worth and care little for the aesthetics. As a result their appearance is usually a motley collection of clothing and items that have been worn and used for decades.

Imperial Orc clothing is often heavily patched and repaired. Being independent of others means being able to maintain your own belongings, so most orcs mend their own clothes. Ever pragmatic, the repairs are usually made with whatever materials are readily to hand.

War Skirt

A war skirt is a common piece of Imperial Orc clothing, fashioned from layers of leather worn over each other and secured to a heavy leather belt or hero belt.

Leg and Arm Wraps

Almost all Imperial Orcs wear wraps around their ankles, wrists and neck to hide any scars once caused by chains and manacles. Many orcs now use other garments to cover these areas, but almost all orcs cover them in some way. To leave the skin in these areas exposed is considered shameless by most Imperial Orcs - a taboo akin to public nudity. Wraps are less common in battle, but heavy gauntlets and boots cover the ankles and bevors are a common piece of armour worn to protect the neck as well as cover it.

</row-fluid>

Wraps or similar are not essential, but they are a very effective way to easily hide skin on the wrists ankles and neck. This means you don't have to bother painting it and avoids all the usual complications and problems when make-up runs.

Imperial Orcs Warriors

Heavy, layered armour, thick leather, mail and plate are common. Imperial Orc armour usually shows signs of wear. Mail and plate is often rusted while the surface of leather armour will usually be cut and notched. It is extremely rare for armour to be made as a complete suit - it is much more common for pieces to be cannibalized from various disparate sources.

They prefer weapons that can endure for generations without shattering or corroding away. As a result they favour oversized weapons with plenty of heft designed to smash through bone rather than to thrust or pierce the flesh. Swords usually have thick heavy blades almost like cleavers. Many continue the blade over the guard of the handle giving the weapon a fierce and brutal demeanour.

Round shields are preferred, usually painted or daubed with crude symbols. Warcasters often use a kite shield rather than a round shield both to have the biggest shield possible and to make up for their lack of heavy armour.

Imperial Orcs Magicians

Mage armour is often fashioned from thin leather with symbols interwoven with runes and other decorations.

Shamans prefer implements fashioned from or decorated with with bone. Warcasters prefer heavy iron rods that can serve as effective weapons without the aid of magic.

Jewellery

Camp

Children

Icons and Artistry

Orcs feel a strong need to be part of a well-defined group. They tend to see the group's identity as an essential part of their own identity, and they like to have clearly visible symbols of membership.

Orc symbols are usually added to items by the owner themselves. The simplest are painted or drawn, but more skilled orcs will burn, gild or embroider symbols onto their belongings. Orcs dislike uniformity so symbols are often recurring interpretations of a theme rather than a specific design used by everyone. In a legion of orcs that use a dagger as their symbol for example, each design may be a slightly different shape, size and colour, but provided they make the individual's legion clearly identifiable then they achieve their purpose. It is the underlying motif that it is prized; the visible demonstration of allegiance.

Many Imperial Orcs have adopted the Imperial Horse as the unofficial symbol of their nation. They embellish personal equipment with the image and incorporate it into banners and other symbols. Most orcs belong to a legion and the Imperial Horse usually takes pride of place next to the legion symbol.

Orc iconography itself is often stark, hard edged or stylised and almost seems to be an opposite to the extravagant artistry of Dawnish heraldry. It often depicts chains, manacles or other items associated with slavery and hard labour alongside more martial symbols like weapons or armour.

There is always some element of Imperial imagery included in Legion banners, though they are also depicted with a similar martial aspect. For example the horse is generally armoured, the crown mounted on or part of a helm.

The colours used often ape the limited palette of Highguard with red, black and white being popular, as well as occasional use of Imperial gold and purple. However the main body of many Legion and group banners come in a wide range of colours with each one bearing some significance to the individual Legion or group.

Less Appropriate

In defining the ideal look and feel for the Imperial Orcs we have chosen not to include some images. Orcs are a common feature in many settings but we wanted to create our own version of orcs that fit with the story and setting of Empire. For this reason we deliberately omitted elements from other settings that are so striking and memorable that it is impossible to see them without thinking of the game that created them.

We've listed some of the items we chose not to include in the look and feel below along with a short explanation of why they are not perfect for the Imperial Orcs. It is okay to use these items as part of your kit, creating a costume is always a compromise as time and money are limited. What we want to do is be clear on the suggestions we are making, so that players who are looking to create new kit or add to their existing kit can be confident about what will look great for the nation.

Warhammer and Warhammer 40K

The Games Workshop settings are iconic and memorable and have inspired many LRP characters. The imagery is instantly recognizable to anyone who is familiar with the games and conjures up images of the culture and style of Games Workshop orcs. We have deliberately chosen to draw most of our inspiration from the orcs and the Uruk-hai presented in the recent Lord of the Rings movies rather than the Games Workshop setting. For this reason it is much better to avoid iconic Games Workshop symbols like the yellow crescent of the Bad Moon Orcs or the vibrant green of their green skins if humanly possible.

The Lidless Eye and the White Hand

Orcs in Empire are far from the bestial creatures presented in the books and films but Tolkien's orcs are one of the inspirations that we have used. However neither Saruman nor Sauron exists in Empire so it is better to avoid their iconic symbols, the lidless eye and the white hand, if possible.

Imperial Orcs magical traditions

Much of the magical arts of the Imperial Orcs were lost during the generations in which they were enslaved. Since winning their freedom, they have experimented freely as well as employing techniques, spells and rituals learned from other nations. Urizen in particular was adamant that the orcs needed to learn magic and arranged for Urizen magi, runesmiths and icewalkers from Wintermark, and volhov and cabalists from Varushka to teach the orcs.

Ancestors and Rituals

Learning ritual magic proved a painstaking process for the Imperial Orcs. Attempts to incorporate loud passionate drumming to get the blood pumping in the way some barbarian tribes perform rituals seems to draw the attention of the ancestors in much the way battle does. These ancestors were hostile and disruptive as is the way with many Imperial Orc ancestors and this made mastering ritual magic incredibly difficult. For a while some magi worried that the orcs might simply be incapable of mastering the art at all.

Eventually the shamans discovered a way to solve their problems using a combination of two powerful Imperial Orc hearth magics. The first is to encourage as many members of the ritualists' legion to be present as possible while performing a ritual, along with banners and flags bearing the legion symbols. The presence of the legion members and their symbols helps to reinforce the sense of identity and belonging that all orcs feel and increases the chances that one of the legion's ancestors will be able to return to watch the ritual.

By itself this is not sufficient; to be effective it must be combined with the second hearth magic, employing worth to ensure the right ancestor is called. Shamans and ritualists keep dozens of items of worth from older ritualists who have died. These trinkets are rarely weapons, magical implements are common but the best items are bone talismans, pieces of bone of varying size taken from a dead shaman's body and carved or etched with the story of their worth. The icewalkers were able to teach the orcs techniques to invoke the names of these ancestors while presenting bone talismans and other items of worth linked to them. When done right it ensures that that ancestor comes to witness the ritual and if the participants have chosen wisely then even the shamans receive advice and help at best or relative quiet at worst.

Shamans took an interest in ritual magic from the start, but this ability to gain moments of clarity and lucidity has served to make ritual magic even more appealing. As a result many seek out any opportunity to perform ritual magic.

Warcasters

The highly physical traditions of the Wintermark runesmiths appealed to some orcs who adopted a similar approach. As their confidence with magic developed they began to craft their own approach to battle magic and moved away from the runesmiths' emphasis on magical runes. What the warcasters wanted was a way to use magic whilst clearly remaining part of their legion. Two core approaches have developed, but regardless of the tactics they favour, all warcasters strive to be disciplined soldiers, used to fighting shoulder-to-shoulder in the thick of battle.

Some warcasters favour the best mage armour they can acquire, a heavy rod and a large shield. Unlike most Imperial Orcs, warcasters favour the kite shields more commonly seen among the Dawnish and Highborn. They also favour offensive spells that repel, entangle or paralyse their foes - many practice delivering a paralysis or entangle spell so as to get the best defensive benefit from their shields. These warcasters seek to fight alongside their legion comrades in toe-to-toe engagements with their enemies.

Other warcasters prefer to fight in the second rank, eschewing a shield and instead claiming the right to carry the legion standard. The logic for this honour is clear - the standard marks their location for the rest of their legion, but is less of an encumbrance than it might be for a warrior as it still leaves a hand free to cast spells. Warcasters who favour this combat style master support magic such as spells that mend or heal their fellow soldiers.

Oathwrights

The Oathwright tradition grew out of Imperial Orc experiences with the create bond spell. They began to question what exactly was happening when a bond was forged between an orc and an item. Discussions with several of the volhov tutoring the orc magicians lead them to question how the bonding interacted with the concept of worth, and to become fascinated by the oaths and promises that served as the underpinning of some Varushkan magic.

The common attitude that a bond is simply a practical application that allows an individual to use a magic item is seen as naïve by these orcs. Imperial Orc items, especially magical items, often have worth and the decision to create a bond between a person and an item is not a decision to be made or unmade lightly. Oathwrights believe that the bond between an item and a person affects them both, items may gain worth by being owned and bonded to the right person and the right item affects an individual's hopes of becoming an ancestor.

Bonds between individuals are even more important and oathwrights take a special interest in these. They often help people craft oaths, offering words of caution and advice and helping them to create vows that are articulate but precise. All magicians can create bonds, but most Imperial Orcs prefer to seek out an expert in the field. Oathwrights take their responsibilities very seriously and often counsel against foolhardy oaths or question an individual about situations where they might feel compelled to break their oath. The best charge for their services, expecting to be paid for their time and their wisdom.

Their interest in oaths, agreements and bargains made them a natural fit for serving as diplomats to the Eternals, where they work hard to extract binding promises from these powerful supernatural beings to aid the Empire and the Imperial Orcs.

Imperial Orcs military concerns

Overview

At present there are two large Imperial Orc armies, each roughly fifty percent larger than a standard Imperial army. Plans have been mooted a few times for splitting the forces to create three armies, but the two armies were created when the orcs joined the Empire and have a long and noted history that few orcs are willing to give up - most take great pride in their army's achievements. Imperial Orcs are also aware that much of their political unity arises from the tight-knit nature of the armies and the legions attached to them and they are keen to prevent their loyalties being divided amongst too many armies and generals. Ultimately though the biggest consideration has simply been the practical costs involved in reforming the orc armies - the costs involved, the loss of efficiency as the armies are reorganized and the time in barracks required to complete the change.

It is commonly assumed that the Orc love of battle would cause them to throw themselves into the thickest fighting without a care for their own lives. Such behaviour is sometimes observed of the forces of barbarian tribes; their warriors are often overcome by battle-lust. However the Imperial Orcs are painfully aware of their limited numbers and the need to preserve every life to ensure that future generations of their nation prospers. The burden of this responsibility tends to fall squarely on the their military leaders - the generals who command the armies and those who lead the heroes at Anvil. Life is precious - an Orc has but one life to make their mark.

Although orcs strive to preserve themselves and their legion, cowardice is one of the most heinous of crimes – an act of self-preservation which threatens others. By contrast, the truest form of courage an orc can show is to give their life so that the legion can survive; it is difficult to become an ancestor if you fall before old age, and as this is the very zenith of orcish achievement, it takes a truly selfless orc to make the hardest sacrifice. Tales are told of such heroes, but they are always tinged with regret at the waste of life. Every orc that falls in battle is seen as a cause for sorrow, an early death prevents them from becoming an ancestor as well as diminishing the strength of the legions.

The barbarian orcs once harboured a particular hatred for the Imperial Orcs, often singling them out on the battlefield where possible. Some claim this hatred goes back to the time of the uprising when the barbarians refused to aid Thrace and his kin and slaughtered any orcs who made their way over the border. In recent times however this old hatred appears to have abated to be replaced by something akin to a grudging respect. There is a great deal of speculation as to why this may be the case, but no concrete conclusion has been reached.

Imperial Armies

The Imperial Orcs field two large Imperial armies, the Summer Storm and the Winter Sun. Although Imperial Orcs are increasingly putting down roots in Skarsind, the armies remain an important source of identity and a reminder of their peoples' history. Founded in the aftermath of the revolt, membership of the armies was initially influenced by considerations of geography. Today, however, the third generation of orcs attach themselves to the army with which they feel the greater philosophical attraction rather than basing their decision on which army their grandparents' legion belonged to.

Orcs do not generally wear a uniform symbol of the army they belong to, but some may add a white sun or a red lightning bolt. Since each army is made up of many different legions it has become common to refer to the armies collectively as "the legions" and in recent times Imperial Orcs at Anvil have taken to describe the Winter Sun and Summer Storm as the First and Second Legion respectively.

The Winter Sun

This army began with a core of orcs who had been slaves in Varushka, Temeschwar, and Wintermark. Vicious fighting against the Varushkan armies had decimated the numbers of the freed slaves in that nation, and harsh winters had contributed further to the death toll. After the revolt, their numbers were supplemented with orcs who had been enslaved by the Highborn. The first magicians among the Imperial Orcs belonged to this army, however; they found it easiest to absorb the teachings of the Varushkan and Wintermark tutors the Urizen magi arranged for them. The hard core of the army were made up of many who had known Thrace and the other founders of the revolt personally, and they continued to develop the vision of freedom that had first spurred them to escape the mines.

Today the Winter Sun is the more politically active of the two Imperial Orcs armies, but it is also the army most likely to use magic in pursuit of their goals. They garner favours, both through military aid and careful use of their magical resources. More warcasters and oathwrights fight under the banners of the Winter Sun than the Summer Storm, and they have more Preachers.

The first Imperial orc General leads the Winter Sun, and is appointed (or re-appointed) at the Winter solstice. This is a large army with a history of fighting in difficult terrain.

The Summer Storm

This army was formed from orcs who had originally been slaves in Dawn, The Marches and the southern and eastern cities of The League. Their uprising had taken part in the rich heartlands of the Empire, and they did not need to deal with the harsh northern climate that troubled orcs in Varushka, Wintermark and Highguard. They also tended to be better equipped; they were more able to loot weapons and armour, and were in a good position to deal with the 'war profiteers' from The Brass Coast and League cities. Perhaps just as importantly, the southern slaves were often surprisingly well versed in tactics, subterfuge and trade than their northern cousins - many more of them had spent their time as bodyguards, bouncers or gladiators than in the north.

Today the Summer Storm pride themselves on their military acumen. They are the hammer of the Imperial Orcs, well armed and armoured, versed in strategy and tactics, and supported by cunning bonesetters and thief-takers. They tend to be richer in terms of wealth and crafted items, and the first smiths and artisans were part of the Summer Storm.

Shortly before the Summer solstice 380YE, while fighting the Jotun in the Mournwold, the soldiers of the Summer Storm experienced a profound moment of connection with a Jotun ancestor, Sjöfn of the Bittenblade. Apparently an ancient Jotun who appears unconcerned by the nature of the Imperial Orcs; her voice encourages them to fight heroically, gloriously, and revel in the clash of steel on the battlefield. (OOC Note: Any Imperial Orc who might have been present during that campaign can hear this ancestor if they wish; she encourages them to take actions that are in line with the five things of the Jotun.)

The second Imperial orc General leads the Summer Storm, and is appointed (or re-appointed) at the Summer Solstice. This is a large army, known for its ruthless commitment to the arts of war, and its indomitable fighting spirit.

Supply

The Imperial Orcs have long faced a crucial challenge posed by their relatively small population. At present they are able to maintain two large Imperial armies in the field - but only just and only because so many of their people are members of the legions. As things stand it is impossible for them to raise a new army and if one of the current armies were wiped out it is clear that it would be difficult for them to replace it. Imperial Orc generals have learned to be careful about how they deploy their forces - preserving lives where they can - to keep the nation vital.

Gaining Skarsind has given them a homeland but it has done nothing to remedy the limitations of their sparse numbers. When the Highborn liberated Reikos, they were able to supply a fourth army as much because the people of Reikos stood ready to be part of that army as because of the wealth and prosperity the territory eventually regained. The few original inhabitants of Skarsind who still dwell here are Wintermark humans - so there is no indigenous population to swell their ranks.

The harsh reality is that unless the Imperial Orcs can find a way to significantly increase their population in some way, they will never be able to raise another army, no matter how many territories they claim, and they will struggle to replace one of their existing armies should it be destroyed.

Imperial Orcs people

Orcs tend to become anxious and uncertain when alone and seeking solitude is often taken as a sign of illness. They expect individuals to seek out company and welcome those who do but they are often suspicious of those who choose to stand alone, whether human or orc. Orcs act primarily in the interest of their legions and they expect others to do likewise; they are particularly distrustful of individuals who claim to represent only themselves. An individual, or better still a group, acting on behalf of a larger body are usually much better received.

For many years, most Imperial Orcs were soldiers. They enlisted in one of the two Imperial Orc armies with the rest of their legion, fighting the enemies of the Empire. Orcs have an instinctive desire to belong to something, to be part of something bigger than themselves, and most enjoyed the camaraderie and the sense of commitment and purpose they gained from being part of an army. For an Imperial Orc, their legion, their army, and the Empire itself were fundamental to their identity. They took great pride in being part of something greater than any individual, and the triumphs of the Empire were their triumphs. For the Imperial Orcs, the Empire was their tribe.

Even those who did not serve in the army tended to live in one of the many legion camps dotted around the Empire. Some dwelt there permanently, others moved from camp to camp with one of the Imperial armies. Life in the legion camps was crowded; orcs slept in large communal tents and ate, trained, and worked together. This military discipline extended even to those who were not formally part of one of the armies - most orcs are comfortable with the rough but unyielding discipline of legion life.

Now they have a homeland of their own. The military camps have mostly been disbanded, their inhabitants relocating to Skarsind. Where once the orcs lived in tents and makeshift buildings, they have begun to construct permanent towns, villages, and homesteads of their own. Human visitors often find these settlements a little cramped - the orcs have lost none of their affection for communal living.

This change has prompted some Orcs to question if they still need to devote their lives to martial service. Thousands of Imperial Orcs have given their lives already in service to the Empire. Nobody can question their sacrifice, but if their dreams of nationhood are to mean something more than endless war then the Orcs will need to find new ways to serve the tribe. Others point out that martial prowess has always been the Imperial Orc's greatest strength. Are they to become a nation of bookkeepers to rival the League or farmers that can outdo the Marches? They have gained a measure of acceptance from the Empire, why give up the path that has served them so well?

The Imperial Orcs are still a profoundly martial people - a passion for fighting is literally "in their blood". Like many humans they enjoy battle and take great pride in fighting for their Empire and their legion, but for Orcs the elation they feel during a battle goes much further - becoming a definitively spiritual experience. For many it is the only time that they can hear their ancestors communicating to them. Some hear only half-whispered voices urging them on or shouting warning or advice, some hear nothing at all, but almost all derive a cathartic fulfilment from the act of fighting. The fact that all orcs receive guidance from their ancestors is central to their religious beliefs.

The danger, of which the Imperial Orcs are only too aware, is that the thrill of battle is seductive and becomes addictive. Barbarians often lose their sense of self-preservation completely when urged on to fight by their ancestors, but their numbers are almost limitless. The individual barbarian dies, but the tribe lives on. The population of Imperial Orcs by comparison is perilously small and they cannot afford to fight recklessly. Discipline does not come easily to the Imperial Orcs, but the legions train to ensure that they are capable of withdrawing when a retreat is called or holding themselves in reserve until the order to advance is given. Many Imperial Orcs have come to consider that this battlefield discipline and command of tactics is one of the things that makes them superior to their barbarian cousins. All are aware that it is essential if they are to survive long enough to win territories of their own.

Nobody likes to be considered stupid, but Imperial Orcs take particular exception to the idea that they are uneducated or "slow." Some orcs react very negatively indeed to any suggestion that they might not be able to follow someone's train of thought, or might not be able to read something for themselves. They make little distinction between someone inadvertently patronising them in a well-meaning way, and someone who is trying to directly insult their intelligence. Actively mocking an orc's ability to read or write is to openly insult their status as a civilised citizen of the Empire.

Most Imperial Orcs identify with the Empire on a personal level, viewing its triumphs as their triumphs. They view a crime against the Empire as a crime against them personally; to an Imperial Orc a betrayal of the Empire is the same as being personally betrayed. Many even take a crime against another Imperial citizen as seriously as a crime against a member of their own legion, making little distinction between citizens in this regard. As such they are staunch supporters of Imperial Law and will go to great lengths to hunt down criminals. They especially despise thieves and robbers; the right to own belongings was denied to them as slaves and many Imperial Orcs see theft of their possessions as a crime that attacks their rights as Imperial citizens.

In the mind of most Imperial Orcs, the laws have no grey areas - one is either innocent or guilty and punishment is required to absolve the guilty of their crimes. Although they accept the authority of the magistrates without question, Imperial Orcs believe that only retribution can allow a criminal to rejoin their legion with honour. In cases where individual circumstances have mitigated a crime and reduced the punishment imposed, Imperial Orcs often regard the convicted as marked and shamed, even going so far as to express open distrust thereafter. A criminal who “gets off lightly” is unlikely to be welcome in the Orc camp in the future, and some Orcs convicted of crimes have been known to ask that their sentences be increased to avoid such a fate.

"You don't think this enormous sash is a bit much?"

"It's fine, stop fiddling with it, just act like you wear it all the time."

"It looks ridiculous over my doublet, why would anyone believe I wear it all the time?"

"Because they don't like individuals and they don't like people who claim to work for themselves so we are buying this Biting Blade on behalf of the Illuminated Guild of Temeschwar, and that's why we are wearing sashes with lanterns on them. I've been through this with you twice, just stand behind me, nod occasionally and look like you care. You're getting paid 3 rings for this charade, think about that if it helps to focus your mind."

"Won't they realize you're just buying it for yourself?"

"Possibly... almost certainly if you can't play your part properly. But if they do, they'll still appreciate that I've made the effort. So I'll still get a cheaper price. But I hired you because you're supposed to be an actor, so for goodness sake, act."

"So long as I don't end up in the cooking pot. I hear they eat people they don't like."

"And I hear that failing actors who can't pay their debts displease the Prince."

Orc Names

Legion Name

Imperial Orcs who have served in the Imperial army use their legion name in a similar way that a human might use a family name. Most orcs put the legion name first, so an orc might introduce themselves as "Irontide Cled", "Bloodcrow Emmal" or "Sunhammer Sutin." Legion names tend to be two words that describe their goals, their fighting style or some major event in their history. For example, the Irontide Legion favours heavy armour, whereas the Bloodcrow Legion favours lightly armoured skirmishers and the Sunhammer Legion prides itself on its weaponsmiths and jewellers.

Those Orcs who have never served in the legion will usually adopt the name of whatever group or affiliation they have joined. For example a reaver who had never served in the Imperial army might call themselves Whiteclaw Neb setting the name of their reaving band before their own.

Personal Names

Literacy has only become widespread amongst the Imperial Orcs since they won their freedom. As a result most names are short and simple and tend not to have silent letters - they are written the way they are spoken.

Male orc names are clipped; short, sharp sounds. Very few male orcs have a name with more than two syllables.

Female orc names are usually two-syllable with a double consonant in the middle. Many female orc names are palindromes - written down they read the same backwards as forward. Very few female orcs have a name with more than three syllables or less than two.

Honorifics

Imperial Orcs avoid boastful honorifics. An orc will use an Imperial title when on official business, but the rest of the time tends not to draw attention to it. Likewise, they avoid honorifics such as "the Mighty" or "Icebinder." The individual orc expects others to recognise them by their legion and personal name, and if they need to add some additional element detailing their deeds, they suggest their history or personal story is not strong enough to stand by itself.

Imperial Orcs religious beliefs

Liao and the Labyrinth

Imperial Orcs derive no benefit from taking liao and do not believe that they reincarnate. It is a key tenet of Imperial Orc belief that each orc has only one life, and that after they die there is no coming back.

Exactly what happens to the soul of an orc after death depends on how they have lived their lives. Most orcs fall into the Howling Abyss that they believe waits for them after death. The Howling Abyss tears their soul to pieces and casts those pieces into oblivion. Such orcs are utterly annihilated and gone forever. It is literally a fate worse than death.

Some humans claim that the lack of reincarnation is proof that orcs have no souls, but the Imperial Orcs believe that the souls of orcs are simply different to the souls of humans. Experiment has shown that auras created with liao ceremonies still affect orcs as do ceremonies such as insight and testimony so the majority of synod members accept that orcs must have souls even if doubt remains over their ability to enter and pass through the Labyrinth of Ages.

The Howling Abyss

The greatest, the most powerful, the truly legendary orcs, those capable of inspiring a generation with their deeds, are able to cross over the Howling Abyss to the other side. What lies on this farthest shore is not known, for these ancestors never speak of it, but they are strong enough to pass back through the darkness. By doing so they are able to influence and guide their descendants, to speak to them, and to lead them through the Abyss after death - provided they are worthy.

Orcs who have powerful ancestors may receive help from them when they die. The ancestors come for those who have managed to achieve greatness, who strive and succeed against the odds, and help them cross the Howling Abyss. These orcs will return across the Howling Abyss many times, seeking to help their allies and offspring grow strong, but eventually they become too weak to make the journey and can no longer return. Only the most powerful ancestors, those capable of making the journey unaided are able to continue to aid their descendants forever more.

Orcs hear the words of their ancestors in battle when roused to fury. These voices are those of orc ancestors whose greatness allows them to cross the Howling Abyss to offer guidance to their descendants, or those who have been aided in crossing the Howling Abyss by the ancestors.

Imperial Orc ancestors

For Imperial Orcs, the words of their ancestors are often confused and incoherent urging battle with the Empire, rather than its enemies. They have identified three rough groups of ancestors whose voices they can hear. The smallest group is made up of a tiny handful of first- and second-generation Imperial Orcs whose voices are hard to hear. The second group is made up of a small number of slaves whose voices are also weak, and who mostly advise the Imperial Orcs to fight the humans or flee them. The largest group is made up of ancestors connected to the barbarian tribes from which the Imperial Orcs were originally taken - they tend to be angry, barely comprehensible voices that generally urge you to take violent or aggressive action against the rest of the Empire.

It is an unspoken fear for many Imperial Orcs that their ancestors are not strong enough to carry them across the Howling Abyss, and that their slave and barbarian ancestors will never guide them through the darkness because they do not embrace the violent, anti-human teachings of these resentful ancestors. They are left with the inescapable conclusion that unless they can produce strong, inspirational ancestors their people are doomed to oblivion after they die.

Imperial Orcs seek new Imperial Orc ancestors – ancestors who can understand the Empire and the lives the Imperial Orcs have chosen, and offer them support and guidance. The only way this can happen is for Imperial Orc heroes to emerge, and through their deeds and the reverence of their people, gain the strength to cross the Howling Abyss.

Becoming an ancestor

To become an ancestor, an orc must be carried within the proud hearts of their people. They must pour their tale into the soul of future generations and become a legend while still alive, respected and admired by their peers and offspring. It is not, however, one that is easily achieved. Each victory in battle, each notch on their blade and each new story to tell around the fire adds to their legacy, and the quest towards becoming an ancestor. Some Imperial Orcs seek triumph in battle in the name of the Empire, aiming to fell the mightiest foes while still living to fight another day. Others seek to remain in the hearts and memories of their people for their wisdom or cleverness, strengthening and nurturing their fellow orcs and building an enduring legacy for later generations.

The ancestors in play

How well your character can hear the ancestors is left almost entirely to the individual player's character and roleplaying. The usual time to hear the ancestors is when you're in a heightened state of anger or fear, especially in combat. You become aware of them around you; usually it's a rumbling of many voices where you can't make out the meaning, but sometimes you can hear an individual ancestor offering guidance.

It is extremely unlikely that a ref will ever inform you that an ancestor is talking to you - or what they are saying. What is important to bear in mind is that you aren't just making this up - orcs really do hear voices when they are agitated, and when they compare notes they often hear the same kinds of voices telling them the same kinds of things. The ancestors really do move orcs to acts of heroism and glory, or try to encourage them to stab an insolent Dawnish knight in the guts in the middle of a tense negotiation...

Orcs can only hear an ancestor if they are a direct descendent of them, knew them well when they were alive or are a descendent of someone who knew them well. This means that you may hear your uncle or your grandfather, if you regard that figure with respect and admiration, but other Imperial Orcs probably won't unless they are also have a link to your ancestor.

Things the ancestors say

The ancestors are only dimly aware of your character and what you are doing, so the guidance they offer is invariably quite general in nature. In battle, they may alert you to imminent danger with a shout of warning. It is very common for them to exhort you to action but the words they use are never specific. If they do use a name, it is as likely to be someone else's name as your own. Despite this the advice given is applicable to what you are doing, at least most of the time.

Although it may sometimes appear as if the ancestors are talking to you, they cannot hear your words. The ancestors are only dimly aware of you and your actions. Long experience has taught the orcs that the ancestors cannot hear you speak and cannot hold a conversation with you; they have a message to deliver, and they deliver it.

When your grandad urges you to charge the enemy, and you do, there might be a few parting words of approval; if you decline to follow his advice, there may be a feeling of anger and some shouted abuse, but grandad does not enter into a dialogue about why he wants you to charge the enemy or what alternative courses of action might be equally good.

Ancestors and hero points

When an Imperial Orc spends a hero point, they are much more likely to hear the voice of an ancestor. You may want to roleplay that an ancestor is guiding your hand when you use cleaving strike for example, or that it is the voice of an ancestor shouting at you that gives you the strength to get back on your feet when you are down. It is especially appropriate to roleplay hearing an ancestor when you use a hero point to change your response to a roleplaying effect - the urging of an ancestor lets you act in a way counter to that the external influence is causing.

Shamans

Most orcs only experience communion with the ancestors when battle is upon them but a few individuals - called shamans - are able to hear the voices more frequently. Shamans occupy a unique position in Imperial Orc society, as a result, but many are moon-struck, their minds affected by the constant attempts by the ancestors to communicate with them.

Preachers

The Imperial Virtues are clearly a part of what makes the Empire what it is. As a result most Imperial Orcs at least pay them lip service and there is a drive amongst some orcs to embody the virtues as keenly as possible, to prove themselves the equal of any human citizen of the Empire. Those Imperial Orcs who embrace the Way and become priests are called Preachers.

Two such preachers, Bonewall Rek and Bonewall Cole - presented and secured a significant change of doctrine during the Symposium of Revelation of Winter 380YE. These changes incorporated the Doctrine of the Howling Abyss and the Doctrine of the Ancestors into the Doctrines of the Faith.

The Imperial orc National Assembly

Originally, the orcs did not have their own national assembly within the Imperial Synod. During the Winter summit of 377YE, a motion to create such an assembly was brought before the Imperial Senate by the Conscience of the Senate - the Imperial orc Skywise Gralka. The motion passed with unanimous support, and an Imperial orc assembly was established.

Imperial Orcs territories

Overview

The Imperial Orcs were granted freedom and citizenship of the Empire by Emperor Ahraz shortly after he was elected in 324YE, The Freeborn helped the Orcs to perform the ritual to create an egreore allowing them to become the tenth nation of the Empire - but there was nothing anybody would do to provide them with lands of their own. For over fifty years the Orcs fought and died in the Empire's wars, fighting for the promise of a land of their own. Not until 379YE would the Empire finally make good on that promise when the Wintermark people bequeathed Skarsind to the Imperial Orcs.

Now the Orcs have a territory of their own, tens of thousands have travelled from across the Empire to settle the lands. The Imperial Orcs now have a homeland, a senator speaks for them in the Imperial Senate - but more than a few have begun to ask what happens next? Some believe that they should concentrate all their efforts on Skarsind, to make the territory demonstrate how powerful and prosperous the Orcs have become in such a short time. But others argue that it was military strength that caused the Imperial Orcs to be given Skarsind; that the only way honour their ancestors is to remain true to the Orcs martial traditions and seek to conquer more land.

Skarsind

Skarsind is a place of alpine slopes and valleys, pine forests and rising mists, set in what's known as the Great Vale, a bowl of mountains that holds both Skarsind and the forest of Hercynia. Summer is short, but Winter is long, and haunted by eerie lights in the sky. The land has an ancient history - one that long predates the Empire or even humankind. The largest settlement - Gildenheim - stands over the entrance to a frozen underworld cavern into the walls of which are carvings in a mysterious alphabet that are widely believed to be the source of the magical runes used throughout Wintermark.

Now, the majority of people here are Imperial Orcs. There are still some Winterfolk here, but since the rise and fall of Dogri Thulebane, the number of Imperial humans living in the hills and forests of Skarsind has tailed away to a handful scattered here and there. The Imperial Orcs do nothing to make them unwelcome, but for many there is simply nothing left for them in Skarsind. Regretfully in many cases, they leave to start new lives in Hahnmark, Kallavesa, and Sermersuaq.

Imperial Roseweald

Description

The Imperial Roseweald, also called the sanguine hibiscus, is a reddish-brown plant whose trumpet-shaped flowers are the colour of dried blood. It grows well in temperate climates. The roots of the plant are prized for their medicinal qualities, but must be carefully prepared. Incorrectly prepared it can induce symptoms including profuse sweating, temperature fluctuation and fever.

Imperial Roseweald is easily confused with common roseweald. While the petals of that plant are often dried and used to make a tangy and flavoursome tea (popular both hot and cold), it has no medicinal properties.

Properly applied, Imperial Roseweald can be used to remove venom.

Rules

- Can only be applied by a character with the physick skill.
- Using 30 seconds of appropriate roleplaying the physick can remove the venom condition from a target.
- The herb use fails if you or your target are hit or attack another character during application, but the herb is not consumed

Imperial Seer

Overview

The Imperial Seer is an Imperial title created by the Imperial Senate in autumn 379YE. It is appointed through the Imperial Conclave. They are responsible for coordinating the use of divination magic by the magicians of the Empire.

Responsibilities

The Seer is responsible for coordinating the use of divination magic by Imperial magicians. While this most obviously involves ensuring that the Empire is making the best use of rituals such as Eyes of the Sun and Moon, The Eye of the High Places, and Dreams in the Witch House, the title has potentially broader implications. "Divination magic" would also cover the use of rituals such as the potentially valuable visions provided by Signs and Portents, Whispering Shadow Courtiers, or the consumption of Goosewhisper Infusion. It might also cover gathering historical information of note through Skein of Years, communion with eternal through powers such as Swim Leviathan's Depth or Clear Counsel of the Everflowing River, and the coordination of magicians who work with the magistrates and Imperial militia to uncover information vital to law enforcement.

The responsibilities and powers of the Imperial Seer have obvious overlap with those of the Warmage and the Imperial Magus, and it remains to be seen how these three titles will interact.

Powers

Address the Conclave

Once per summit, the Seer can raise an address to the agenda of a Conclave session for free. This power allows the Seer to report on significant divinations, or ask for volunteers, but they are free to address the Conclave however they wish.

Address the Senate

The Imperial Seer has the right to make an address to the Senate once per summit. This allows them to present important information for the Senators consideration. To use this power, the Seer informs the Civil Service that they wish to address the Senate. Their address will be added to the agenda for the next Senate session.

Address the Council

The Imperial Seer has the right to make an address to the Imperial Military Council once per summit. To use this power, the Seer informs the Herald of the Council that they wish to make an address, which will then be added to the agenda for the next Council session.

Custodian of The Hawk's Demeanour

Following the appearance of a powerful magical shroud covering the entire Empire in Winter 380YE, an obscure coven based in Wintermark known as the Augurs of the Opalescent Gloaming presented the Imperial Seer with a unique magical ritual mask called the The Hawk's Demeanour. This artefactual Strigine Mask is possessed of an additional power that allows the bonded wearer to employ tempest jade in place of crystal mana when performing Eyes of the Sun and Moon or Eye of the High Places. The mask is legally part of the regalia of the Imperial Seer. When the Imperial title changes hands the item should be given to the new Imperial Seer with all appropriate haste.

The Augurs of the Opalescent Gloaming have also committed to providing the Imperial Seer with two doses of a magical liquid they call "Waters of the Shimmering Shore" each season. This translucent magical substance can empower a divination ritual to penetrate the power of magical shrouds (although interestingly not to rituals such as Piercing Light of Revelation that do not by their nature gather information). Details of its provenance are not common knowledge, but it is believed to be drawn from the Day realm, possibly as a consequence of an agreement with an eternal.

Appointment

The appointment, replacement, or removal of the Seer is made by the declaration of candidacy as part of a Conclave session. Any Imperial citizen may hold the title.

The Seer serves until they are replaced by another magician using the Declaration of Candidacy. As a title in the Conclave, they cannot be revoked.

Imperial Sodalities

Overview

There are organisations in the Empire that have grown in influence beyond the confines of a single nation. These organisations are collectively referred to as Imperial Sodalities. They are associations or societies that have a common purpose and sufficient reach or influence to be relevant to the Empire as a whole - but they are not part of the Imperial government and most do not receive financial assistance from the Senate or logistical assistance from the civil service.

Sodalities in Play

From time to time we will create new sodalities and add them to the wiki, to use as a vehicle for ongoing plots. This may represent a sodality that has recently been created, or one that has been around for a while but has not been active an Anvil previously. Most Imperial citizens have at least heard of the Imperial Senate or the Imperial Synod but a sodality is vastly less powerful and prestigious than these bodies and it is common for people to be unaware of their existence before they encounter them.

Creating a Sodality

It is not possible for players to create a sodality as part of character creation - the banners, sects and covens that new players can create are based in the nation they choose to play, but the definition of an Imperial sodality is a group with a reach or scope that extends beyond a single nation.

It is possible for players to create a sodality in play - a good example of this is the Anvil Field Hospital which players have created. If players establish an organisation that clearly has an influence that extends to all Imperial citizens at Anvil that persists for more than a year then we will try to update the wiki with information about them.

Secret Societies

The Empire has a number of secret societies - sodalities who wish to avoid operating openly. Some of these societies have good reason to hide, they may have criminal or heretical intent - others simply prefer to remain in the shadows. If the existence of a secret society becomes common knowledge in the Empire, due to the actions of players, then we will update the wiki with information on what is commonly known about them.

Current Sodalities

- Anvil Field Hospital - The Anvil Hospital and Imperial School of Medicine
- Iron Raptors - A clearing house that pay Imperial citizens to carry out difficult and dangerous work.

Imperial title (Redirected from Imperial Title)

Overview

An Imperial title grants the bearer wealth or legal powers. Most come with a set of responsibilities that the recipient is expected to undertake. The most famous Imperial title is Empress (Emperor for a man or sometimes the Throne) but senator, cardinal, general, archmage and the Bourse seats are all examples of powerful Imperial titles.

Eligibility

Any Imperial citizen is eligible to be appointed to an Imperial title, but the constitution explicitly forbids any citizen from holding two Imperial titles simultaneously. A senator cannot be a general - nor can they be appointed to the Keeper of the Dark Groves of Boroz. Any title may be surrendered at any time, so a citizen who is elevated to a second Imperial titles must immediately select which office they wish to hold.

National Title

Some Imperial titles are only eligible to members of a specific nation. For example, only a League character can become a League senator or hold a League position in the Bourse. These titles are commonly referred to as national titles, they are governed by all the same rules as a normal Imperial title - you cannot hold more than one Imperial title at once - but they can only be conferred on a member of the appropriate nation.

Responsibilities

Most titles come with a responsibility or duty that the holder is expected to perform. For instance a citizen granted the title of Defender of the Senate might be charged with ensuring the defence and security of the Senate during the meetings at Anvil.

There is no contractual obligation to uphold the responsibilities of an office - it is not possible to create a title that requires specific action or dictates how the responsibilities must be discharged. However the responsibilities of an office are important - it is not unknown for citizens to face the threat of revocation by the Synod for failing to adequately discharge the responsibilities of the title they have accepted.

Powers

All Imperial titles include either a stipend or one or more powers of state. Powers of state are legal powers exercised by one or more of the five house of government. For example, the General Assembly of the Synod is able to veto a Senate motion, but The Throne can also wield this power - without needing to consult the Synod. A stipend is a regular income which is drawn directly from the Imperial treasury.

Term of office

Lesser Imperial titles usually have tenure. Once elected, the holder of the title remains in place until they die, resign the position or are revoked by the Synod. More powerful titles are usually subject to re-selection on an annual basis.

All Imperial titles have clearly defined rules that state how the occupant can be removed.

Ceremonial titles

There are many other titles that an Imperial citizen may possess. For example, a prominent Marcher citizen may hold the title of Steward, an influential Conclave magician may be appointed as the Mouthpiece of Meraud, a powerful Eternal from the Summer Realm. Any title that does not include a stipend or one or more legal powers of the Imperial state is officially classed as a ceremonial title, even if it the position grants the bearer tangible benefits.

Imperial army (Redirected from Imperial armies)

Overview

The Empire is defended by its armies. Each army is a large force, capable of acting independently and supported by their own logistics with baggage trains, siege engines, and foragers. They are therefore able to venture beyond the boundaries of the Empire and, so long as their casualties are low, remain fully capable despite being engaged in prolonged campaigns.

The typical member of an Imperial army is fed and billeted by the civil service but is not paid in coin. These volunteers have signed up for two years Imperial Service - they are trained and equipped and then assigned to an Imperial army. If they choose to leave the army at the end of that period they receive payment in land from the Empire (equivalent to a level one farm).

Although the lure of land is what draws most citizens to Imperial Service, the training and equipment received can be valuable. Most members of the many independent military units spread across the empire are former soldiers.

Each Imperial army is commanded by a general. While generals are chosen by Senators, once appointed the general has sole authority to order the army to move or attack as they choose. Traditionally the generals of one nation will cooperate but it is not a requirement and a general is within their rights to give orders as they see fit.

Army Size

To allow players to make sensible and meaningful comments about the capability of their armies, each army has a fighting strength (usually 5000). This number represents the effective fighting force of the army - equivalent to 5000 raw recruits. The civil service uses complex day magic to quantify the effective fighting force of each Imperial army, providing this IC information to the Imperial generals. An actual Imperial army may have more or less than 5000 soldiers in it, the civil service only provides the Generals with precise information on the actual fighting strength, since this is the critical number needed to make effective strategic decisions.

Barbarian armies tend to be much larger than Imperial armies, although in practice their fighting strength is usually similar.

As an army takes casualties its fighting strength drops. An army whose fighting strength falls below 1,000 will immediately disband.

The majority of campaign armies have a maximum strength of 5,000 fighting force. A large army, however, has a maximum fighting strength of 7,500 but still counts as a single campaign army.

Special Quality

Each Imperial army has a unique quality that is permanently fixed at the time the army is created and which reflects the character and flavour of the army.

When a new army is being created it will automatically develop a quality dependent on the nation raising the army. In many cases the quality will depend on events at the time and be influenced by decisions taken by the characters involved in raising the army.

Senate Commissions

The Imperial Senate can pass a motion to commission a new Imperial army, or to resupply, improve, or enlarge an existing army.

Costs

- Materials: 200 wains of mithril and 50 Thrones
- Time: 1 year to construct
- Upkeep: 50 Thrones per season.

Recruitment

All Imperial armies must use recruits drawn from a single nation. Each nation can only physically support a limited number of armies at one time; this number cannot be exceeded.

When the army is complete a new Imperial title of general is created in the Imperial Military Council. Appointment follows the normal constitutional process (human generals are selected by the senators of the nation) and re-appointed each year after that.

A newly created Imperial army is at its maximum strength of 5,000. It begins play mustered in one of the Imperial controlled territories belonging to the nation where it was raised.

Resupply

The strength of an Imperial army declines as it suffers casualties. While an army will slowly resupply and reinforce itself over time, the Senate can pass a motion to provide the army with additional resupply. The army to be resupplied must be in a friendly territory, and may not be engaged with any enemies.

Further details of how an Imperial army can be resupplied by the Senate can be found here.

Enlargement

The Senate can contribute resources to increase the strength of an existing army, making it large. It takes three seasons and costs 50 wains of mithril and 100 crowns each season until complete (for a total cost of 150 wains of weirwood and 300 crowns). The army can continue to operate, moving and fighting as normal, while it is upgraded. The additional fighting strength is added to the army when the enlargement is complete.

Upkeep

Although the soldiers in an Imperial army are not paid for their service, an army still costs a huge amount of money to operate. Each Imperial army costs 50 Thrones per season, paid for from the Imperial Senate budget. Each large army costs 75 Thrones per season.

Maximum numbers of Imperial Forces

The Empire cannot sustain an unlimited number of armies and navies. In addition to the significant drain on the treasury of the Imperial Senate, each individual nation can only provide so many soldiers. The supply number for each nation represents the maximum number of Imperial forces (armies and navies) that nation can sustain at any given time. The Senate cannot raise a new Imperial army or navy of that nation if it would take the nation over its supply number.

At this time, the maximum number of forces a nation can support are as follows:

- Dawn and the Marches: 4 armies each
- The Brass Coast, Highguard, Navarr and Wintermark: 3 armies each
- The Imperial Orcs, Varushka, and the League: 2 armies each
- Urizen 1 army

A nation cannot contribute its support to maintain a force from another nation. The only way for players to increase the number of armies and navies a nation can support is to conquer additional territory. Likewise, the loss of territory to the barbarians may reduce the supply number for that nation.

Military Units

Some wealthy or powerful citizens maintain their own independent military unit. These units can be attached to an army to increase its effective fighting strength. This is done by the orders of the military unit's commander (submitted using the personal resource downtime system).

The experienced and capable troops in a starting military unit provide an advantage out of proportion to their numbers, adding the equivalent to 100 raw recruits to the strength of the army they support.

At present there are 22 Imperial armies.

Army Size

A fully rested and supplied Imperial Army consists of around 5,000 trained soldiers. The civil service monitors the fighting force of each Imperial army using Day magic, providing this IC information to the Imperial generals, so that they can make effective strategic decisions. The effective strength of a full strength army is measured at 5,000 strength - roughly one point of effective strength for each soldier.

Barbarian armies tend to be much larger - though most have a similar effective strength. Day magic rituals such as Eyes of the Sun and Moon, or the intelligence reports received by scouting armies provide good estimations of the effective strength of a barbarian army using the same scale used for the Imperial armies.

The majority of campaign armies have a maximum strength of 5,000 fighting force. A large army, however, has a maximum fighting strength of 7,500 but still counts as a single campaign army. Overview

Rituals that are part of Imperial lore are widely available to any Imperial citizen. Any Imperial magician can learn to master a formulaic ritual that is part of Imperial lore, making the ritual significantly easier and cheaper to cast.

New rituals are added to Imperial lore by this declaration. The declaration instructs the civil service to arrange for a specific ritual text to be duplicated and disseminated to magicians across the Empire, adding it to the body of Imperial lore that is available to every citizen.

Declaration

The ritual to be included in Imperial lore must be explicitly named as part of the declaration. At the point in the Conclave session where the civil service invite the magician raising the declaration to present it, that magician must present a completed formulaic ritual text for the named ritual. If they cannot hand over the ritual text at the start of the declaration then the agenda item is immediately cancelled and matters move to the next item.

The civil service will hold the ritual text throughout the declaration. The civil service will not pause the Conclave session to allow examination of the ritual text - but any grandmaster may send a single representative to examine the text while the declaration is debated. The declaration proceeds as normal, and given the time constraints it is common but not required for the magician raising the declaration to ensure the grandmasters are already familiar with the ritual text.

If the vote passes then the civil service will keep the ritual text so that it can be used to disseminate the ritual; if the vote fails then ritual text will be returned to the magician raising the declaration.

Resolution

To be successful a declaration of Imperial lore requires two additional criteria to be met.

- A ritual text detailing the ritual must be provided to the civil service. The ritual text is expended as part of the process of disseminating the ritual.
- Ten thrones to pay for distribution of the ritual (OOO: These funds should be placed in the inventory of a character, who should email plot@profounddecisions.co.uk with details of their CID and the ritual being paid for after the event.)

Once a ritual is added to Imperial lore it is currently impossible to remove it. The best the Conclave can do is attempt to declare performance of the ritual to be illegal with the Declaration of Interdiction.

During a recent conclave session, a ritual was the subject of a declaration of Imperial lore on the strength of an arcane projection. The declaration passed and a similar codified ritual was eventually added to Imperial lore, but the civil service note that it is not legal to proceed in this matter and it would not be allowed in the future.

Imperial navy

Overview

Until recent years, the Empire had not had an Imperial navy since the days of Emperor Barabbas.

A navy represents a large force of warships, capable of acting independently. They are able to venture to sea, but they cannot cross open oceans due to the difficulty of keeping a navy together while out of the sight of the coast. A navy is harder to maintain than an army - while a platoon of new recruits can swell the numbers of a damaged military force on land, repairing and replacing damaged ships requires more specialist facilities.

Navies can fight at sea, but they can also transport an Imperial army, or support land engagements in a limited way. A navy must be supported in the same way as an Imperial army, and counts towards the maximum number of armies that a given nation can maintain.

As with soldiers in an Imperial army, sailors who are part of an Imperial navy are fed and billeted by the civil service but are not paid in coin. These volunteers have signed up for two years Imperial service - they are trained and equipped and then assigned to an Imperial navy. If they choose to leave the navy at the end of that period they receive payment in land from the Empire (equivalent to a level one farm).

Each Imperial navy is commanded by an admiral. While admirals are chosen by Senators, once appointed the admiral has sole authority to order the navy to move or attack as they choose.

Navy Size

To allow players to make sensible and meaningful comments about the capability of their armies, each navy has a fighting strength (usually 5000). This number represents the effective fighting force of the navy in terms of both ships and combat-capable personnel - equivalent to 5000 raw recruits. The civil service uses complex day magic to quantify the effective fighting force of both armies and navies, providing this IC information to the Imperial admiral who commands the navy. This is an assessment of the impact the navy will have during an engagement; it takes into account warships, deck-mounted weapons and other equipment, marines, battle-trained sailors, and the ease with which the ships communicate with each other. The civil service only provide their assessment of the fighting strength of a navy to the admiral who controls it.

Barbarian navies are usually larger than Imperial navies, but tend to lack cohesive communications or command structures meaning that in practice their fighting strength is usually similar.

As a navy takes casualties its fighting strength drops. An navy whose fighting strength falls below 1,000 is destroyed as the remaining vessels sink with all lives lost.

Large Navy

A large navy has a maximum fighting strength of 7,500. A large navy still counts as only a single campaign navy. A large navy disbands if its fighting strength falls below 1,500.

Special Quality

At present the Empire lacks the expertise in constructing warships to be able to create navies with special qualities. The Empire lacks the experienced shipwrights and associated expertise to create specialized warships like those possessed by the Grendel, the Asaveans, or the Sarcophan Delves.

Senate Commissions

The Imperial Senate can pass a motion to commission a new Imperial navy, or to resupply an existing navy.

Costs

- Materials: 200 wains of weirwood and 50 Thrones
- Time: 1 year to construct
- Upkeep: 50 Thrones per season.

Recruitment

All Imperial navies must use recruits drawn from a single nation. Each nation can only physically support a limited number of forces at one time; this number cannot be exceeded.

A navy can only be constructed in a region with the Coastal quality that contains a shipyard. At the moment, only the docks at Atalaya allow the construction of an Imperial navy. It is worth noting that the shipyard does not have to be in a territory from the same nation as the navy will belong to.

When the navy is complete a new Imperial title of admiral is created in the Imperial Military Council. Appointment follows the normal constitutional process (human admirals are selected by the senators of the nation) and re-appointed each year after that.

A newly created Imperial navy is at its maximum strength of 5,000. It begins play docked in the territory where it was raised.

Resupply

The strength of an Imperial navy declines as it suffers casualties. While a navy can slowly resupply and reinforce itself over time, the Senate can pass a motion to provide the navy with additional resupply. The navy to be resupplied must be in a friendly territory with a Coastal region, and may not be engaged with any enemies.

A navy cannot resupply in a territory in which there is an ongoing damage effect such as Foam and Spittle of the Furious Sea. This does not stop a navy that has taken damage while moving through a territory from resupplying as long as they end their movement in a territory where no such effects are in place.

Further details of how an Imperial navy can be resupplied by the Senate can be found here.

Enlargement

The Senate can contribute resources to increase the strength of an existing navy, making it large. It takes three seasons and costs 50 wains of weirwood and 100 crowns each season until complete (for a total cost of 150 wains of weirwood and 300 crowns). The navy can continue to operate, sailing and fighting as normal, while it is upgraded. The additional fighting strength is added to the navy when the enlargement is complete.

Upkeep

Although the sailors and marines in an Imperial navy are not paid for their service, a navy still costs a huge amount of money to operate. Each Imperial navy costs 50 Thrones per season, paid for from the Imperial Senate budget. A large navy costs 75 Thrones per season.

Fleets

Some wealthy or powerful citizens maintain their own independent fleet of vessels. These units can be attached to a navy to increase its effective fighting strength. This is done by the orders of the fleet's commander (submitted using the personal resource downtime system).

The experienced and capable vessels in a starting fleet provide an advantage out of proportion to their numbers, adding the equivalent to 100 raw recruits to the strength of the navy they support.

Current Navies

The Empire currently floats a single navy, the Freeborn Storm. This is the first Imperial navy since the time of Emperor Barrabas. During the reign of Barrabas, the Empire raised three Imperial navies; the Highborn Basilisk Arisen, the Freeborn Golden Fleet and League Hullbreakers. All three were lost during the disastrous attempt to invade the Grendel territories, during which the Emperor himself perished.

Imperial theology

We are Travellers on the Way.

*Our spirits are immortal;
They have endured before and will again.
We follow in the footsteps of the paragons,
Who showed humanity the Paths of Virtue.
By uniting the Paths and creating the Synod,
The First Empress showed us The Way.
Across the Labyrinth of Ages, the Virtues guide our spirits.
We shall not surrender our destiny to inhuman powers.
Death is not the end of our journey.
With each generation, Virtue makes us stronger.
Until as paragons we shall conquer Death itself.*

The Creed of the Winds of Virtue Chapter of Highguard

Introduction

For the average Citizen of the Empire, it is sufficient to know the Seven Virtues and how they apply to your life so that your passage through the Labyrinth of Ages can be swift and assured and you can be reborn stronger. Even simple lay preachers of The Way need not concern themselves with the subtleties and complexities of the Imperial Religion.

However, for many senior Priests within the Synod, as well as keen scholars, the foundations of the faith are a source of much discussion, debate and analysis. Senior clergy of the Synod may be asked about their opinion on key points of contention.

Imperial title

Overview

An Imperial title grants the bearer wealth or legal powers. Most come with a set of responsibilities that the recipient is expected to undertake. The most famous Imperial title is Empress (Emperor for a man or sometimes the Throne) but senator, cardinal, general, archmage and the Bourse seats are all examples of powerful Imperial titles.

Eligibility

Any Imperial citizen is eligible to be appointed to an Imperial title, but the constitution explicitly forbids any citizen from holding two Imperial titles simultaneously. A senator cannot be a general - nor can they be appointed to the Keeper of the Dark Groves of Boroz. Any title may be surrendered at any time, so a citizen who is elevated to a second Imperial titles must immediately select which office they wish to hold.

National Position

Some Imperial titles are only eligible to members of a specific nation. For example, only a League character can become a League senator or hold a League position in the Bourse. These titles are commonly referred to as national positions, or sometimes national titles. They are governed by all the same rules as a normal Imperial title - you cannot hold more than one Imperial title at once - but they can only be conferred on a member of the appropriate nation.

Responsibilities

Most titles come with a responsibility or duty that the holder is expected to perform. For instance a citizen granted the title of Defender of the Senate might be charged with ensuring the defence and security of the Senate during the meetings at Anvil.

There is no contractual obligation to uphold the responsibilities of an office - it is not possible to create a title that requires specific action or dictates how the responsibilities must be discharged. However the responsibilities of an office are important - it is not unknown for citizens to face the threat of revocation by the Synod for failing to adequately discharge the responsibilities of the title they have accepted.

Powers

All Imperial titles include either a stipend or one or more powers of state. Powers of state are legal powers exercised by one or more of the five house of government. For example, the General Assembly of the Synod is able to veto a Senate motion, but The Throne can also wield this power - without needing to consult the Synod. A stipend is a regular income which is drawn directly from the Imperial treasury.

Term of office

Lesser Imperial titles usually have tenure. Once elected, the holder of the title remains in place until they die, resign the position or are revoked by the Synod. More powerful titles are usually subject to re-selection on an annual basis.

All Imperial titles have clearly defined rules that state how the occupant can be removed.

Imperial treasury

Each citizen that owns land or property will tithe annually wealth equal to a single crown(6) to be used in service of the Empire that protects them.

The Imperial Constitution

Overview

The Empire receives taxation drawn from each of the territories under its control. To this are added donations by private citizens and the proceeds of any auctions carried out by the Imperial Bourse. This money forms the Imperial treasury and is under the control of the Imperial Senate. They must be careful however, for the treasury will be called on to pay for the upkeep of the Imperials armies, fortifications and other Senate motions.

Taxation

Taxation is fixed according to the terms of the Imperial Constitution which mandates the tax that every citizen who owns property in the Empire must pay. Attempts to change the level of taxation - or introduce new taxes - have always been ruled unconstitutional. As a result it is not possible for the Senate to pass motions that change the level of taxation coming into the treasury from existing territories.

The amount of taxation raised varies by territory. Populous lands like the city of Sarvos and the surrounding regions are filled with many prosperous businesses - and as a result they provide a great deal of tax. In contrast territories with much smaller populations on the fringes of the Empire, like the icy regions of Sermersuaq, provide very little.

New Territories

When a territory is conquered by the Empire then it will be subject to taxation by the civil service. It can take several seasons for Imperial control to be fully established in a territory so the taxation derived from a territory will usually rise in the first year of Imperial rule. In some cases, where a territory has suffered badly from war or other turmoil that has damaged the infrastructure in the area, it may be possible for the Senate to pass motions to rebuild what has been lost. This will help the territory recover more quickly which means the taxes flowing to the Senate reach their final level more quickly.

This exception to the normal rules on raising taxation, is an opportunity, it only arises as a result of plot. It only increases the speed with which the taxation reaches its final level, it does not increase the final amount raised by a territory.

The funds raised by the Bourse through distribution of its estates will remit what profit they can support to the Senate.

The Imperial Constitution

Bourse Auctions

The profits derived from auctioning off the rights to control the Bourse seats and related titles are incorporated into the Imperial treasury. Although the payments are added to the income of the treasury the season after the seat is auctioned, the full amount is not guaranteed. The auction represents a contract between the Empire and the citizen who wins the auction for the following year. If the Empire is not able to complete the agreement for any reason - for example if there are insufficient funds in the Imperial treasury to operate the Bourse resource - then the auction money must be repaid. The amount refunded to the citizen is in proportion to the number of seasons of lost production.

Individual citizens are entitled to make donations to the Imperial treasury. Significant donations are usually announced on the floor of the Senate - so that everyone is aware of the benevolence. Although sizeable donations are rare - they are not uncommon in times of crisis when the Empire lacks the funds to pay for its armies - or when individual citizens wish to advance their personal standing for whatever reason.

Although it is common for the Senate to choose to disburse funds to Imperial citizens in times of plenty - often of an amount equal to an earlier donation in times of crisis - such arrangements cannot be enforced with a legal contract because it has repeatedly been ruled unconstitutional for the Empire to borrow money and thus go into debt. A private arrangement between individuals is fine - but it cannot carry legal weight or standing using a Senate motion or similar device.

Disbursements

The Senate is able to pass a motion to disburse funds from the Imperial treasury. In this way funds can be given to a senator to spend on behalf of the Empire. They can also allocate a budget as part of another motion where appropriate. If a senator requests. Once funds have been transferred from the treasury, then they become the legal property of the recipient.

The Senate cannot disburse funds it does not have. A running tally of the current level of the Imperial treasury is made available by the civil service during a Senate session.

Outgoings

Before any disbursements can be made, the treasury will allocate sufficient funds to pay for any regular expenditure that will occur in the coming season. These include the upkeep for every Imperial army as well as fortifications, spy networks, Bourse resources and the like, as well as stipends for Imperial titles and the costs associated with the upkeep of the Empire.

If there is insufficient funds to pay for the Empire's commitments then the Senate can use the summit to address the situation. They may either increase the Imperial treasury by procuring sufficient donations from private citizens - or they need to pass motions to abrogate one or more of the Empire's commitments. For example, if the Empire choose to abrogate the motion to raise an army - then the army will be disbanded - and the Empire will no longer be obliged to meet the ongoing upkeep costs.

If the Senate are not able to pass enough motions of abrogation to balance the books, then at the end of the summit, the civil service will automatically abrogate sufficient motions to bring the Senate in line with its constitutional requirements not to go into debt. Which motions have been abrogated will be announced by the Auditor of the Imperial treasury at the conclusion of the final Senate session. The civil service have the power to choose - but by tradition they will abrogate the fewest number of motions of commission first, provided this will increase the size of the Imperial treasury. When armies or fortifications are abrogated, this is done starting with the one on the lowest fighting strength first.

The effects of abrogation vary depending on the commission.

Spy Networks

The upkeep of spy networks is small but essential to maintain the secrecy of the network. If the motion to abrogate a spy network is abrogated then the spy network will be revealed to the power that controls the territory it is in. Foreign nations have responded negatively on discovering an Imperial spy network in their lands in the past.

Fortifications

A fortification that is abrogated will not be staffed - so it cannot defend the territory and region it is in and cannot be maintained. An abrogated fortification does not disappear - but it will lose 10% of its existing strength each season that it is not maintained. More crucially the fortification can be easily captured by any enemy armies in the vicinity since it is not defended. The decay will continue each season until the fortification collapses, is captured or is re-commissioned.

Imperial armies

If the motion to raise an army is abrogated, then the army is disbanded. It no longer exists, exactly as if it had been destroyed.

Bourse Resources

It is possible for the Senate to abrogate a Bourse resource. However a resource that has been auctioned through the Imperial Bourse will normally provide more money than it costs to upkeep. This income must be returned if the resource is abrogated, so doing so will usually worsen the Senate's debt - rather than improve it.

Stipends

The Senate may abrogate an Imperial title that includes a stipend - or pass a motion to modify the title to strip the stipend from it. No disbursements or stipends will be issued by the civil service while the Senate remains in debt, no matter what motions are passed.

The Audit

The budget of the Empire - the complete list of all incoming and outgoing expenses is compiled and maintained by the civil service. The final total - the size of the debt or the amount of credit in the treasury is available to any member of the Senate - but the breakdown is shared by the Auditor of the Imperial treasury with the Master of the Imperial Mint during a meeting that takes place each summit.

Imperial wain

An Imperial wain is a unit of measurement equivalent to five hundred kilograms in modern units.

Historically, it was the amount of material that filled an average-sized wagon. Standardized in the reign of Emperor Giovanni, it is commonly used to describe the amounts of mithril, white granite and weirwood used in the construction of a resource and large-scale projects such as bridge and dam building.

Wains in Play

The definition of an Imperial wain is a caravan load of material. We don't remotely expect players to phys-rep these commodities; the intention is that players trade the promissory notes provided by the civil service instead. However, if we choose to phys-rep a wain of material on a battlefield then we will try to get the weight as close to 500Kg as reasonably possible. You can expect that to be a volume of around half a cubic metre.

Improvement Suggestions

Explicit in the social contract of Empire is the commitment that players make to improve their kit between events. It's a daunting prospect; you spend all that time and money putting together a decent set of kit, then you have to think of ways of improving it after every event. It never ends! Some people like their costume and don't want to change it; others just don't know where to start. Here's a page of suggestions that might inspire you.

Kit isn't just costume

When it comes to this sort of thing, your kit isn't just the clothes you wear at the event - it's everything that your character uses and interacts with as part of their personal equipment, from the pouch on their belt to the Grand Pavillion they sleep in. One of the easiest ways to start improving your kit is by replacing the modern essentials with historical or fantasy-looking equivalents; with a few easy (and cheap!) swaps, not only your immersion but also the look of the field as a whole gets better and better.

Food

Whether you bring your own food or eat from the traders, paying a little attention to your eating equipment is a great way to get started. Plastic fork and polystyrene container doesn't really fit with the fantasy aesthetic, so, why not try one of the following?

- Got £2?

A wooden bowl from a charity shop and a spoon from your cutlery drawer instantly makes mealtimes look IC.

- Got £5?

Ikea do a nice big wooden bowl for £4.50 - it holds a lot of stew with room for your bread as well.

- Got £10?

For a really lovely touch you could consider a reproduction pewter spoon like the ones from Lionheart Replicas

- Got £25?

How about an eating set that you can hang on your belt in a little leather sheath like the ones from Two Js? It comes with a spike (a pricker...heh) and a knife (or you could get one with a fork if you're into that fancy league stuff).

- Got £50?

The Grand Expedition Trading Company does a feasting set in a bag - a full set of crockery and cutlery in a nice looking IC bag to carry them in.

Drink

Plastic pint glass? No thanks. Help your costume and the environment by getting an IC drinking vessel!

- Got £2?

Many charity shops will sell metal tankards, old steins or even earthenware pottery for a few quid. Add a loop of leather or cord to tie it to your belt and you're ready for a drink whenever the mood takes you.

- Got £7?

Why not get a 100% medieval and surprisingly sturdy pint tankard from Court Potteries?

- Got £25?

- 2 So there you have it!

How about a personalised decorated cover for your plastic pint glass? White Rose Apparel will make them to order in a design of your choice, and have a lovely selection off the peg. If you're the kind of person who doesn't like washing up this might suit you!

Accessories

Once you've got your basic outfit, you can have a lot of fun personalising it to your nation with accessories and trims. For nations that love bling, like Brass Coast, The League and Dawn, Primark is well worth a visit for its costume jewellery selection. There's often "statement pieces" or cocktail rings which really add to the opulence of your look. For Navarr and Wintermark you can often find wooden beads or things with a more "tribal" look like these custom pieces by Kelly, which can accent the more primitive end of the costumes. For the Marches, don't despair - how about medieval-looking livery badges? Etsy can be a nice place to look for handmade jewellery, and Ebay is full of bargains on old costume jewellery.

Hats and Headwear

Ever seen a fantastic costume that goes all the way to the neck- then stops? Pictures of Renaissance Fairs in America often have good examples of fantastic costumes which are amazingly detailed below the chin, and are topped off with a bare head that looks somehow incongruous. A good hat completes your outfit!

- Got £2?

A simple length of ikea cotton tied round your head makes a great headscarf for a low status outfit. It's particularly good for women, and gives you something to pin your hood to.

- Got £5?

You can get fake flowers from lots of home dec shops (also Ikea..) and make yourself a flowery headband. Or if you can sew a little bit make one of these out of an old pillowcase or a scrap of fabric. Many larp traders will also sell you one for not much money if you really can't face needle and thread.

- Got £10?

How about making a hood? Here's a nice way of doing it

Props and Phys Reps

One thing that lots of us are guilty of is using herb cards or mana cards instead of the phys rep themselves. Rather than just tucking them into a pouch and taking them out to rip, why not make a dedicated pouch which could actually hold the quantities that you carry - for Phyicks or Apothecaries, why not five pouches of different colours, one for each herb then filling them with appropriately coloured household herbs. This tutorial explains how. Again, they're something you can pick up at Traders but they're so easy to sew, even by hand, that you might not even need to.

So there you have it!

This is a tiny selection of ideas that might spark off your creativity for improving and developing your kit between events. It doesn't have to be big, or flashy, or expensive, but everyone from the first-event-beginner to the seasoned pro has something to bring to make the game cooler and more immersive for everyone.

Imurement of Leaden Chains

Rules

Autumn Magnitude 10

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying.

Effects

At the completion of this ritual, all contributors gain the ability to cast the entangle spell once as if they knew it and without spending any mana.

When cast with more than one contributor, this ritual always counts as a use of the coven bond and counts towards the number of rituals the coven can perform that day.

The power granted by this ritual lasts until it is used or for ten minutes, whichever comes first.

Description

This battlefield ritual allows a coven of Autumn magicians to lock their enemies in place. Used with care, it allows each of them to exert their ritual mastery to immediate tactical effect. The most common battlefield use is to allow a coven to hold a group of skirmishers in place, prevent auxiliaries coming to the aid of their comrades, or take advantage of a group that has become separated from the main body of an army, preventing them from rejoining the central force. It is at its most useful when the ritualists are supported by (or are themselves) battlemages and warriors.

The ritual is more powerful the more members of the coven are present, and reaches its highest potential the more ritualists who have not personally mastered the ability to restrain their foes through spellcasting.

Some ritualists find that their implements become increasingly heavy when this ritual is performed. As the ten-minute duration drags on the rod, staff or wand seems to grow more and more massive in their hands; it eventually requires a major effort of will to heft it into place.

This ritual has existed in one form or another since the earliest records, and it is likely that the entangle incantation itself began as a refinement of the power it grants.

Common Elements

When performing this ritual, the coven invokes themes of binding, restraining and dominating others. Methodical, slightly threatening music or implacable drum rhythms are common. The effect of the ritual itself is to prevent movement, so music and dance often begin violent and then suddenly stop, pause or slow. A Freeborn coven often combines loud drumming with energetic, whirling dances that suddenly pause mid-beat at the climax; a circle of Marcher landskeepers may invoke themes of trespass or invisible boundaries, especially if using the ritual on a Marcher battlefield. Ritualists of The League and the Imperial Orcs often use themes of capturing and restraining criminals in their ritual invocations.

Other elements might include the rune Hirmok, or the totem spirits of animals that trap and restrain such as spiders or pythons; the brazen lictors of the Autumn Realm may also be invoked.

In brightest day

"The thing about art is, right, that when you come down to it it's just paint or a lump of wood or a load of noises, right?" Sierra i Cassava i Riqueza sucked her bottom lip for a moment thoughtfully, brow furrowed as she searched for the right words. "But something transforms the basic material into something else, something spiritual, right? I mean, in human hands -"

"Or orc hands," interjected Blackspear Tak.

"Yes or orc hands, in people's hands it's like alchemy. It transmutes the ... the ... the medium and that in turn transforms the spirit of the person who experiences it. Good art does, I mean. Not bad art. Bad art is ... well bad art I guess is ..."

"Shit." provided Blackspear Tak.

"Yes that's it. But I mean, who gets to decide something is bad? But then I suppose you're talking about passion, and whether that can make up for a lack of ... of skill. But anyway."

Abraham of Bastion rolled his eyes, but kept his peace. The conversation - monologue really - had been going on for quite some time now and it was really starting to get on his nerves.

"Empress Richilde was the first person who really understood this, mind. Before her, people made art and they made shrines and temples look good, but they didn't really understand why they were doing it. She's a paragon because she understood it, really understood it. How art can promote a profound sense of ... of ..."

"Pride?" suggested Blackspear Tak, distracted. The wiry orc was only half listening.

"Yes but more than that. Communion. There's a play about her I saw in Tassato that time, there's this beautiful speech it's like ... I was drunk but I remember it it was like ..."

The Freeborn woman struck a pose and declaimed, misty eyed "Beauty is the memory of a past that might have been, and the memory of a future that could be. It burns in the eye and in the ear; in the heart and in the soul. It is one breath, catching, an inhalation before singing, or gasping, or cheering, rising like thunder from the crowd, flowing gently in the darkened room where pen nibs scratch on parchment. It ... it .. dammit!"

She couldn't remember the rest. It had been so powerful in the crowded, sweaty little theatre. So important. For a moment she'd forgotten where she was. The crowd - pretty drunk by this point - fell away and for a moment she felt like she was there, actually there, when Empress Richilde met with the Freeborn Senators. She felt something swell inside her, at the way the playwright had captured the spirit of the Erigo, the Riqueza, and the Guerra - and at how the actor playing the Empress had convinced them all to support her with honest words. That was how it had really happened, she was sure of it. Sure that ...

Abraham of Bastion was trying to get her attention, pulling at her sleeve.

"Mate," he said urgently. "Mate!"

"It was something like 'there is truth in art, it is as honest as a ... was it a fire or a flower I don't remember . But the thing is..."

"MATE!" Abraham gave up, grabbed Sierra around the knees and tackled her to the ground.

An iron javelin sailed through the space where, a moment before, her heart had been. Blackspear Tak caught it on his shield, and was knocked back a step by the force of it. The orc's two human companions lay prone behind the barricade. Several of the other soldiers, crouching low, with their shields up to repel the rain of projectiles falling around them, glanced over briefly.

Abraham glared at Sierra, who looked both winded and a little surprised to find herself on the ground.

"Focus!" he snarled. "For the love of the paragons you daft knife-ear, focus!"

Beyond the barricade, the battle raged on.

Following the Autumn Equinox, a powerful Night magic enchantment settled over the entire Empire. The effects were subtle but far-reaching. The magic encourages and inspires artists and performers to seek new heights of artistic expression. It also encourages everyone to take pride in, appreciate, and celebrate the art and artists of their nation. As a side effect, philosophers and scholars are encouraged to expound on topics of national Pride, and the role that art plays in a civilized society.

The effects have been particularly marked in the cities of the Empire - Meade, Siroc, Kalpaheim, the four cities of the League, and even Gildenheim have seen a flourishing of artistic expression and interest in the arts unprecedented since the reign of Empress Richilde.

Significance

The full power of the enchantment has largely run its course by the Winter Solstice, but until time-out on Saturday night, everyone in the Empire experiences a roleplaying effect: you feel an urge to create, and appreciate, works of art.

The Inspiration of Art

Any priest who uses the hallow ceremony to create the Hallowing of Richilde will find that the resulting aura is somewhat more powerful than they might normally expect. The aura will automatically have a strength two points higher than normal. This special effect fades at time out on Saturday and any Hallow of Richilde created after that will have the normal strength. This effect is not optional - every Hallowing of Richilde created in the Empire during this time will be significantly more resilient.

The Power to Exalt

As the paragon Empress Richilde proved, art has an incredible capacity to inspire the virtue of Pride in a nation, and in the Empire as a whole. This magical effect has inspired many artists to create works of art that celebrate their identity as members of a nation. It is possible that the lingering effects could be harnessed, should the Imperial Synod be interested in doing so.

The Senate may commission great works to take advantage of this flowering of artistic expression. These great works will take the form of art galleries, museums, and performance spaces appropriate to the nation where they are built. Even after the inspirational magic fades, they will serve as focal points for pilgrims of Pride, as well as places where artists and performers who want to celebrate their cultural traditions can congregate. Some will also be used to store relics connected to individuals who exemplify the history and beliefs of the various nations.

These great works will require commission by the senate as normal. Each will require 15 wains of white granite and 5 wains of weirwood and have a labour cost of 5 Thrones. They will take three months to complete. Once construction is complete, the great work will provide a pool of 30 votes in the Imperial synod and 15 additional liao spread among the congregations in that territory overseen by priests belonging to the Assembly of Pride.

The civil service recommends that any such commission be built in a settlement within the appropriate territory at least the size of a small town. They further predict that the results of the supernatural surge in national pride and artistic appreciation will have returned to normal levels by the start of the Summer solstice, and any commissions not completed by that time will be ineffective at capturing the imagination of the citizenry (that is, they will result in follies rather than being great work). They also remind the Civilian Commissioners that they will not be able to commission one of these great works as it is not legal for them to create anything that provides votes in the Imperial Synod.

OOO Note

The Power to Exalt represents an opportunity for the Imperial Senate - under normal circumstances it is not possible to create great works that provide additional liao or votes in the Imperial Synod.

For future reference, the magnitude of this ritual was significantly lower than would normally be expected. Anyone creating a future enchantment that targets the entire Empire should anticipate that such a ritual will have a minimum magnitude of at least 160 regardless of what benefits it provides if any.

House of Bourné

One additional flowering of Art in the Empire has had a very specific effect. The House of Bourné is a small, yet extremely wealthy, guild of artisans and artists based in the League city of Sarvos. Formed some forty years ago by a union between a League Merchant Priest and a family of Dawnish Weaver cabal, they specialise in the creation of magical robes for a very select clientele.

In consultation with representatives of The Looking Glass - an influential League broadsheet - the House has recently revealed that they have made a unique breakthrough in the creation of magical raiment of interest to ritual magicians - likely inspired by the powerful enchantment laid over the Empire. Details are sketchy at the moment, but there is a buzz of interesting gossip coming out of Sarvos that suggests the Looking Glass are planning to reveal the existence of a set of new schema to the Imperial Conclave, schema believed to be in the possession of the House of Bourné.

More details are apparently available in issue nine of "The Looking Glass".

House of Bourné Resolution

With the aid of the Empire's leading fashion-and-gossip magazine The Looking Glass, a Sarvosan guild called House Bourné has revealed the existence of six schemata, each providing a pattern for a magic robe that empowers ritual magic from a single realm, through the combined power of dramaturgy and the hearth magic of girding. Each raiment also comes with a potent roleplaying effect tied to the Persona it draws power from.

Following an announcement in the Imperial Conclave on Friday night, the House has thrown open its doors to any Imperial artisan who wishes to visit and study one or more of the schema, to learn how to duplicate their effects. The six ritual raiments are:

- The Bishop's Ensemble, which enhances the practice of Day magic.
- The Captain's Garb, which enhances the practice of Summer magic.
- The Doctor's Attire, which enhances the practice of Winter magic.
- The Mountebank's Guise, which enhances the practice of Spring magic.
- The Prince's Raiment, which enhances the practice of Autumn magic.
- The Semblance of the Witch, which enhances the practice of Night magic.

The schema remain the property of House Bourné - the only way to learn them is to spend some time visiting their estate in Sarvos - but mechanically any character can learn one or more of these recipes in the normal way - when they pick the artisan skill, or when they buy the extra item skill. It is not possible for someone who knows how to make one to simply teach someone else - although House Bourné is not placing any restriction on who can learn the patterns as long as they are Imperial citizens.

With these robes, it is now possible for a ritual magician to be bonded to three magic items, greatly enhancing their ranks of ritual lore (within the limitations of the normal rules for additional ranks).

In the tents of prosperity

"And you're sure it will be safe?" the young orc demanded.

"Yes - Druj" she snarled "It will be perfectly safe. The Bourse certificates are guaranteed by the word of the Empire." Isobel Hoop had joined the civil service with dreams of becoming an advocate or similar. It hadn't worked out - but a life operating a civil service warehouse had never given her cause to question her choice - until today.

"The word of your Empire? That is not worth so much in these days I hear? The Grendel claim they trust us more than you these days!"

He was laughing at her. Not subtly mocking her with his words as before - now he was just laughing. In her face. Really - it was too much. She considered trying to stab him with the letter opener she carried. Probably best not to... the best possible outcome she would be up for murder of a "foreigner". More likely the bloody creature would probably eat her.

"If you would like your Mithril back - perhaps you would prefer to ship it to the Grendel?" She smiled sweetly trying to inject every ounce of bile into her facial expression.

The Druj "trader" (why would a trader be armed to the teeth she wondered) shook his head. "We have a treaty with your Empire - mithril for white granite. An excellent rate, very profitable. Very profitable. Even the most simple-minded Grendel would never give us such an easy profit."

And there it was again... Pride! You were definitely allowed to murder people if you did it out of Pride. She was sure she'd read that in school - something to do with clemency.

"Our Bourse certificates are valid anywhere in the Empire - and in any civilized land beyond it." Oh that was fun - any more emphasis on civilized and she'd had spat the word in his face.

"Huh - you think your Empire is better than ours eh?" the orc snarled, clearly annoyed.

"Only while the sun rises in the east and sets in the west." Isobel Hoop, who had once dreamed of being an advocate, smiled sweetly and gave thanks to the paragons for giving her that moment as she thrust the certificates into the ungrateful Druj's hands and walked away.

Bite the Hand

Druj traders have passed out of the Barrens and into the Empire. They have registered eighteen wains of mithril with the civil service and are travelling to the summit where they intend to exchange the certificates them for the white granite that was promised. They have other traders in their number though - magicians seeking business with the Conclave and one among their number looking to trade herbs for resources and mana.

The magistrates have asked the civil service to remind citizens that these Druj traders are treated as foreigners under the law - that means it is illegal to attack, rob or kill them - even if they do insult your Pride. Citizens are warned to expect the Druj around in Anvil around 2pm on Saturday.

Droplets of Night

The last boggart hung lifeless, the fine silver chains holding the limp body over the table. Yacasta felt a slight pang of sympathy for the creature, this was bloody work and she was no butcher. Boggarts were a terrible threat to any Spire, but it was a cruel way to end one of the little creatures lives in this way. Cruel but useful - as the black ichor ran down the chain it was collected in the vial below. Soon it would be full and then she would be able to send the vials to Prascylla and finally clear her debt.

And who knows maybe more Night boggarts would appear? There had been none near the spire for centuries - there wasn't so much as a weak night regio within a days march of here, so why they should suddenly have appeared in the Spire's cellars at this time she had no idea. If only they had not killed the first dozen so quickly before one of her colleagues had though to check the remainder for traces of magic. Whatever strange magic had brought the boggarts to this world had also left them filled with potent night magic, and it was then just a matter of careful excision to acquire it.

A careful excision - hab! She wished it had been as clean as that made it sound - the bloody things bit hard and never stopped struggling. Well... not until the deed was done. And now it was done - time to write to House Cudo, and then she could return to her studies

House Cudo in Redoubt are somewhat unusual in Urizen for their obsession with money, something that might have begun with their origins as a Holberg guild of Autumn magicians who immigrated to Urizen in the Second Interregnum. The magi of House Cudo have strange views about the role of value in the Net of the Heavens. Their arbiter Prascylla, is a notoriously shrewd woman who drives a hard bargain and is known to keep in contact with a dozen agents in towns and cities across the League who send her information about local market conditions. In previous years the House has been a regular source of useful items of value on the Bourse Private auction, but now they are planning to attend the summit in person.

Prascylla's agents have in their possession three droplets of night these small glass vials allegedly contain "tears of the Night realm" - a mawkishly poetic turn of phrase to describe what is almost certainly nothing more than some form of magical geode, a compression of magical energies trapped in the mortal realm. Still such things are always unusual and usually valuable. According to the magicians of House Cudo, drinking the contents of the vial during the performance of a Night magic ritual will invoke the power of the tears and reduce the magnitude of that ritual by ten levels of magnitude (to a minimum of two). Sadly the effects cannot be combined - only one can be used on a given ritual. It is not clear where House Cudo came by the tears, but the indication is that they do not believe that the source of the droplets will endure beyond this season.

The agents are under instruction to present the droplets for sale to the magi of Urizen, one for coin, one for mana, and one for ingots of common artisan resources, beggar's lye, green iron or the like. Their arbiter is quite specific, her agents will only take payment in the specified forms for each of the three droplets. In the case of the resources, they will treat all resources the same - and exchange the droplet for the largest total quantity of resources. They plan to arrive at the summit at approximately 6pm on the Saturday - in time to conduct their business before the Conclave begins.

A Spirited Find

"Well? Is it genuine?" She stared at the magister, trying to sound more confident than she felt.

The magician put his wand and the relic back on the table with exacting care. "Fascinating. Absolutely fascinating. Where did you say you found it again?"

"I didn't. Now I've paid you for the ritual... so how old is it?" The magister was holding out on her - that was a good sign.

"Well it's definitely pre-Imperial - but I can't be certain exactly when - I'd need to check some details with a colleague in the Necropolis. Realistically it's probably not worth that much - but I'd be prepared to offer you two thrones and three crowns for it?"

She smiled as placed a defensive hand over the relic. "I don't need the sales pitch magister... just the results of your ritual will do. Now what else did you see?"

The Wandering Star is a minor chapter house based in Necropolis whose members are devoted to painstaking maintenance of historical records of genealogy. In fact, while most of the members of the house are meticulous archivists - Naomi, the eldest daughter of the chapter's exarch is known to have a little more active approach to curating history. She has led her group across Highguard on numerous expeditions seeking lost tombs, ruined libraries, and abandoned shrines. All of these expeditions have been expensive, most have been a failure.

This time however she appears to have made a significant find - a pre-Imperial relic recovered from a small Highborn village near the border between Reikos and Brocéliande. A number of tombs have been disturbed by Llofir's magic so Naomi and her followers have been combing the area looking for items of interest. It seems their prosperity has finally paid off, as the item they have found has been confirmed to be pre-Imperial in nature by Tobias Gard, a local magister with a good reputation.

Naomi has a number of debts from outstanding expeditions... and a number of expeditions planned. As a result she is travelling to Anvil seeking to find a buyer for the relic. She has sent word ahead so that benefactors and others who might be interested in the item will be in a position to make an offer when she arrives on the Saturday afternoon. She would like to sell the item to a fellow Highborn if she can - but she has made it clear that she will not part with the relic for less than it is worth. Those with an interest in pre-Imperial history would be well advised to seek her out, if only to get a chance to see the item before it disappears into some private citizen's collection.

Seal the Deal

"How much for that sausage?"

The old woman pointed to the large sausage, surface covered in spice and seasonings, prepared in the classic Temeschwari style. It sat impudently atop a pile of similar sausages, jutting proudly. The pile was just one of many on the stall - furs, carved whalebones, trinkets, Varushkan dolls, pickled cabbages, even some wood carvings which was distinctly Imperial Orc in style. Behind it, a man stood, well-dressed and with a wide smile on his face.

"Well, ordinarily, it'd be five rings, but to you, Good Lizzy, I'll sell you it for three - and I'll throw in this fetching pair of gloves." The man picked up a pair of fur gloves that could - optimistically - be described as fetching.

"Three rings? I could get two just like it for the same price down the street, and it'd be Marcher pig too."

"It's the fact this isn't Marcher pig that makes it costly, Liz. Look, I enjoy a plate of nice sausages and good vegetables as much as the next Marcher, but this is special stuff. They do some wonderful things with spices up north. And you know it's getting harder to get sausages made round 'ere, so much going to the war effort."

"...Fine." Grumbling, Lizzy counted out her coins. "I has to try it, I think. I was hoping to get summat for the wife, too. Been saving special and it's her birthday soon. Gloves'll be nice..."

She looked around at the stall, and pointed to something hung up at the very back. "Although that'd be nicer. Looks like it'd keep the rains off. How much for it? I'll pay a bit more instead of the gloves."

Walter looked round, and smiled his big smile.

"Ah, Lizzy. You couldn't afford that in a thousand seasons, I'm afraid, not with what your bakery makes. And anyways... it's got a buyer. But can I interest you in these socks instead? Made of seal skin too, you know, very waterproof - it'll be just the ticket for your missus..."

Walter Applecart is a trader based out of Meade. A relatively well-known figure amongst those that buy and sell at the Grand Market, he specialises in importing goods from the northern nations of the Empire and finding buyers in the south. Mostly, these items are food, trinkets, clothes - and their sale has made Walter very rich. He is said to have a knack for always getting the most out of a deal, a shrewd operator always looking for an opportunity - the very archetype of the moxie that the market towns represent.

Rumours have been spreading for some months that on his last trip to Sermersuaq, he brought back a strange seal skin, said to be imbued with powerful magic. He is apparently heading to Anvil after receiving some interest in buying it - though given that he has not been public about its properties, it seems strange that someone has inquired, perhaps they know more about it? However they have heard about it, there is clearly at least one party interested, but Walter would not be as rich as he is today if he were to sell to the first person who makes him an offer. It is likely - given his background - that he might want to talk to others in the Marches who represent the interests of the market-towns - he will likely pay well for information regarding any and all potential buyers.

A New Dance

Emris Oakhaven sat on the ground, exhausted. The last few months travelling along the Paths of Lan Thuven were ones that he would never forget. Although many of his striding had been slain by the Jotun over the last year, Emris and his elder sister, Catrin, had stayed together and stayed healthy. He was not the warrior she was and he remembered proudly the day she sworn her thorn oath. A solitary tear ran down his cheek. He wiped it off his brow with the sleeve of his shirt. She would not want him to grieve for her, she had died a thorn, proudly standing fighting the creatures of the Vallorn as part of the rear guard as the army walked through the vallorn-filled Westwood.

Emris, looked at the road ahead. Across the trods that wove across the Marches, and then to Miaren to start a new life. He had finished his term of military service two seasons ago but stayed with his sister who had sworn to serve the Black Thorns until she fell. In his hand was a small pouch of rings, a small leaf shaped pendant and small knife wrapped in cloth. He slowly unwrapped the knife and looked at the blade, old and covered in dirt and moss where it had rested in the ground for many years. He had found the knife half buried in the ground by Catrin's fallen body. As one of the vates had spoken the words to turn the circle, Emris remembered looking around at the many bones that seemed to be in the undergrowth, small scraps of metal too and then he had seen the knife. He had performed the incantation and knew that there was history and power in this knife. If he could get to Anvil and get a good price, then he could find his place in the Great Dance as a broker. He was determined to get a fair price, this was for Catrin.

Emris Oakhaven is travelling to Anvil to speak to brokers about the new path he is to start walking. Like many who had called Liathaven their home for many years, the transition to other regions is a difficult one and they all know loss in their own way. Emris has an ancient relic, lost long ago in the darkness of Lan Thoven. He would prefer it to go to a Navarri, one that would honour the history it represents, although he has sworn an oath of pride that he will get the money that is needed to set up a new life as a broker and allow him to start a prosperous business.

Incantation's Mystic Mask

Rules

Night Magnitude 4

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying.

Effects

This ritual masks the nature of the next ritual performed after it is complete.

The mask conceals all details of the second ritual; effects such as detect magic and any divination effect of a lower level can only determine that the magic exists; that it is concealed by a Night Realm effect; and the magnitude of that effect.

If this ritual is performed by a solo caster then it effects the next ritual that character casts by themselves before the next sunrise.

If this ritual is performed by a coven then it effects the next ritual cast with that coven bond.

Divination effects that match or exceed the magnitude of Incantation's Mystic Mask can learn information about the ritual or its effects, but the mask remains intact. This mask extends to the fact that the ritual was cast, and to any auras, curses or enchancements created as a result of the ritual.

The ability to mask the next ritual persists until a ritual is performed, or until sunrise, whichever comes first. The mask itself lasts for as long as the masked ritual endures.

Additional Magnitude

You may increase the magnitude of the ritual to create a more powerful mask.

Removing the Shroud

The shroud can be penetrated by any divination magic of sufficient magnitude, but this does not remove it. It can be removed prematurely by the performance of Piercing Light of Revelation, provided the magnitude of that Day ritual is at least twice the magnitude of the Penumbral Veil.

Description

The main purpose of this ritual is to deter snooping into the doings of Night magicians. It adds a little to the perception of students of Night Lore as being underhand and untrustworthy - after all, claim their critics, why would they want to conceal their magic in this way if they have nothing to hide? When they can be bothered to reply, specialists in the Lore of Night wonder why their detractors want so badly to monitor what they are up to ... and the debates continue and so the world turns.

The ritual can be valuable when using enchantments or curses on land claimed by barbarians, as it makes it much harder for enemy magicians to work out precisely what is going on, and how it might be stopped.

Pedants claim that this ritual ought to be called Invocation's Mystic Mask but they are usually given short-shrift by students of Night lore. Most rituals contains a certain amount of incantation, after all. Still, there is an ongoing competition among many students of Night magic to see who can come up with the most outlandish name for this ritual to use when speaking among themselves or with outsiders; the potential confusion created by dozens of different names for the same ritual effect amuses both the Night magicians, and the Eternals.

The magicians who perform this ritual almost always conceal their identities behind masks and hoods, and many include gloves and robes as well. It is common for the ritual to be performed in darkness and conditions of as much secrecy as the coven can arrange. Lighting is likely to be dim, and music subdued. Many ritualists work hard to create an atmosphere of confusion and uncertainty when they perform Incantation's Mystic Mask, swapping masks and identities, and weaving nonsensical words into their invocations as they work.

The runes Diras and Wyr are used interchangeably with this ritual, and some ritualists include Sular, Cavul, Irremais and especially Ophis, but in defaced or inverted forms. The constellation of The Wanderer is also invoked, as are the names of Eternals such as Sadogua and especially members of the Whisper Gallery, the Keepers of Secrets.

Inescapable Chains of Bitter Glass

Rules

Autumn Magnitude 40

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets a character, who must be present throughout. The target character must be a contributor participating in the performance of the ritual.

This spell is an enchantment. A target may only be under one enchantment effect at a time.

Effects

This enchantment allows the target to call MASS ENTANGLE once during the duration. The character must be able to cast spells to make this call - it explicitly will not work if they are wearing armour.

While under the effect of the enchantment, the target experiences a role-playing effect: the target feels an urge to organise everyone around them, especially on the battlefield. The need for people to be in the correct "place" (literally or metaphorical) nags at them constantly. In a non-martial context, this effect urges them to try and arrange political promotions for their allies, and demotions for their enemies. During a fight, they find it hard not to shout orders at those nearby. The effect is particularly pronounced if the subject is of the cambion lineage; it is all too easy for them to overtly treat others as playing pieces to be moved around as suits their long-term goals.

The effect lasts until the end of the next battle, skirmish or quest the character participates in; or until the end of the current event, whichever is sooner. The power of the ritual can be invoked only once during this time.

Additional Targets

The ritual can affect additional characters from the same coven. Each additional character increases the magnitude of the spell by 25. Additional characters must be present throughout, and each must contribute to the performance of the ritual.

Option

Any caster who has mastered the ritual may choose to substitute ambergelt for crystal mana when contributing to it. Every 2 measures of ambergelt spent counts as 1 crystal mana when contributing to the ritual.

OOO Note

If you enter a battle, skirmish or quest with one of these enchantments active on you, you must let a referee with a radio know about it shortly before or after your passage through the Sentinel Gate.

If you are expecting to deploy one of these effects, you are invited to bring this to the attention of any nearby referee or marshal shortly before you do so; they will then be able to assist the targets in taking the call correctly

Description

This battlefield ritual allows a powerful magical attack to be unleashed against a group of enemies. It binds them in place for a short time, allowing the magician's allies to overwhelm them if they act quickly. It is especially useful when used to support soldiers with pole-arms against enemies with short weapons, or to pin down skirmishers so that archers can devastate them with arrows or crossbow bolts.

Of all the similar battlefield rituals, this is the easiest to perform, but it also requires the most strategic thinking if it is to have an impact. Unless the magician's allies are prepared to take advantage of the period of confusion the power of this ritual provides, then it is likely to be wasted. One place where the ritual excels is in capturing high-value targets; the ability to entangle a group of opponents from a distance (albeit a short distance) is a rare power usually unavailable to even the most powerful magician. The magic is also indiscriminate - it can be hurled into a group, entangling them all, and then the target can be picked out of the (hopefully) subdued unit. Finally, unlike rituals such as Howling Despite of the Yawning Maw, the magic has no lasting effect on those caught by it - which means that it is less important to ensure no allies are caught in the area.

Common Elements

When performing this ritual, a coven often invokes symbols of binding, stagnation and hesitation. Some magicians weave invocations of doubt and uncertainty, while others evoke subtle forces intended to subvert the battle-plans of their enemies. Skirling pipe-music may often be involved, as might interweaving flutes. Sinuous dances are common, but so are things that bind - chains, threads, ropes, nets and even ribbons.

Other common elements in this ritual might include runes, especially Hirmok. Beasts such as spiders and great serpents that crush their prey may be mentioned, and some Freeborn use images of octopi, squid or even kraken in their magic. The constellation of The Chain are sometimes invoked, as are the names of the Autumn Eternals know as the Lictors.

If the ritual draws additional power from the use of ambergelt, it is common to dissolve the material in strong alcohol and use it to paint runes on the target's clothing, mage armour, and implement. Such a solution sets quickly, leaving behind resinous, translucent runes and sigils.

Inevitable Collapse into Ruin

Rules

Winter Magnitude 40

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 10 minutes of roleplaying. The ritual targets a single mage implement which must be present during the ritual.

Effects

The power of the ritual is stored in the target implement. Any of the contributors can touch that implement to a battlefield fortification to seriously damage or destroy it.

The power of the ritual can be invoked only once.

The power granted by this ritual lasts until it is used or for ten minutes, whichever comes first.

Description

This battlefield ritual deals with similar forces to Ravenous Tongue of Entropy, but on a much larger scale. it locates and exploits weaknesses in a fortification. Beams warp and split, mortar crumbles, hawsers fray and snap and the entire edifice groans under the attack of magic that speeds decay and ageing.

It often takes a short time for the full power of the ritual to manifest, which can make it a particularly dangerous ritual for the contributor charged with delivering the final stage and touching the target fortification. Some foolish covens have tried to perform the ritual while physically touching the fortification, while protected by heavily armoured warriors with powerful shields, but all it takes is a single arrow-shot from the defenders and the ritual collapses. It is much more common to see one or more well-defended ritualists fight their way through to the fortification with the charged implement, relying on the fact that at least one of them will make it into position - and then either hold against the defenders, or retreat while the magic does its work.

This ritual targets the weakest parts of a defensive structure. While it may not collapse or destroy an entire wall, it is likely that the ritual will create multiple breaches, tear down a gatehouse, collapse a row of mantlets or the like.

Common Elements

When performing this ritual, a coven often invokes symbols of slow destruction - wind and rain - and forces of neglect, incompetence and misfortune that can combine to bring even the strongest structure into ruins. The eternal Kaela may be invoked, and it is also common to use pieces from a ruined structure to help grant the ritual power.

The implement charged with this spell is a key element in the ritual, and the role it plays in the performance is very important. Some covens may create a special staff or rod, often constructed from the wood of a collapsed building or rotted tree, specifically for use with the ritual, which is then discarded after the battle. The implement may be passed between the ritualists, or placed at the centre of the ritual as a focus for the magic of the coven.

The runes Yoorn and Mawrig are often evoked with this ritual, and some Wintermark ritualists complete their casting by carving or painting them onto the structure they wish to destroy. The constellation of the Key is sometimes evoked, as is the Wanderer.

Inez y Guerra

Words by Jude to the tune of Cuncti Simus Concanentes. Call and response.

When I first laid eyes upon her Inez y Guerra Golden sun was shining on her Inez y Guerra

She was brave and she was daring, Captain of a swift corsair Grace was in her every movement, fiery eyes and flowing hair

With the crew she'd sweat and toil Inez y Guerra Every one was true and loyal Inez y Guerra

Every word she spoke was treasure, when she smiled it brought me joy Every soul aboard adored her, first mate down to cabin boy

Though she scorned both shield and armour Inez y Guerra When she fought no foe could harm her Inez y Guerra

If I were a wealthy Captain, with a ship upon the sea I would sail a golden galleon, 'Fair Inez' her name would be

Like a ship upon the ocean Inez y Guerra Beauty in her every motion Inez y Guerra

With a hold packed full of treasure, home upon the storm I'd ride I would lay it at her feet if only she would be my bride

Though I never could deserve her- Inez y Guerra All my lifelong days I'll serve her Inez y Guerra

Information for 11-15 year olds

Overview

Children of this age are becoming adults and many players of this age are just as capable of remaining in-character all day as any adult. We assume that roleplayers at this age are able to participate and roleplay fully in the game setting. The additional rules are designed only to ensure that all participants are fully protected.

Ticket costs £20 less discounts

We expect a child of this age who is attending to have a character and roleplay at an event, with full participation in many areas. If the parent or guardian attending the event is eligible for a discount (a student or in receipt of benefits or a pension) then the ticket costs £10.

Parental responsibility where appropriate

At this age it is acceptable for participants to roleplay for long periods without their parents present. You should still be aware of what your child is doing and they should check in regularly with you.

Must have suitable costume

All participants of this age should dress in costume appropriate for their character. Footwear is difficult in LRP, but sports trainers are no longer acceptable at this age.

IC tests to become an IC adult

Children mature at different rates and our rules are designed to encourage them to seek to become full citizens of the Empire. Older participants in this age range may take the Test of Citizenship which is a basic IC test designed to ensure that a young player is capable and ready to be treated as a full member of the game. Once a young live roleplayer has passed this test, then their character will be treated as an adult character and will be allowed to choose a personal resource, operate campaign resources and spend eight character points on skills as a starting character. Until this point, they will have no skills, and will therefore be able to utilize the Apprentice Ability

Characters begin as non-combatants

Children of this age cannot participate in a skirmish or battle before they have passed the Test of Arms. Parents may allow their children to spar with other children using standard latex weapons, but they should not attack other characters under other circumstances. Fights on the main field are likely to be rare at Empire, but if one does start, then your child should know to leave the immediate area by the most effective route, to ensure their own safety. Young players of this age who are involved with The Academy will have the opportunity to fight while on quests organized through the Academy.

Older participants in this age range may take the Test of Arms with permission from their parent(s). This is a basic IC test designed to ensure that a younger live roleplayer is ready to take the battlefield - our refs will check they are a safe combatant, understand the combat rules and are physically mature enough to participate in the battles. Young players who are judged to be ready to pass will be allowed to take the Test once they are 14 or over.

IC Area for young players

The IC site includes a large tent and courtyard area dedicated to IC activities for young players called The Academy. The crew in attendance when the tent is open, offer supervised sparring and combat training, lessons in Imperial Geography and History and similar. These activities are intended to be for parents and children; parents may not leave their children here by themselves.

Information for 16-18 year olds

Overview

At this age we consider young people to be full participants in the game and they will be treated, as far as possible, as adults. However, if any roleplayer believes they are the target of abusive behaviour then we encourage them to speak to one of our staff. At this age, roleplayers do not need to be accompanied to the event by a parent or carer and can automatically play a full character that can take the battlefield.

The bar

Roleplayers who are under eighteen should be conscious of the legal restrictions placed on them. Attempting to buy alcohol from the bar risks damaging the entire event. Anyone caught attempting to buy alcohol from the bar will be refused further entry to the event until they turn eighteen.

Information for 7-10 year olds

Overview

We expect children of this age to be able to roleplay and participate in our game, albeit with restrictions and limited expectations for those at the lower end of this age band. At this age children are becoming more independent and our rules reflect this.

Children at the lower end of this age range are unlikely to want to roleplay for long periods of time. Parents should consider this and make suitable arrangements, for instance bringing books and toys and taking regular breaks in your own tent or camp or in the OOC area.

Ticket costs £10 less discounts

We expect a child of this age who is attending to have a character and roleplay at the event, and the charge reflects this. If the parent or guardian attending the event is eligible for a discount (a student or in receipt of benefits or a pension) then the ticket costs £5.

24/7 responsibility required

You do not have to supervise your child at all times, however your child should only be out of your direct supervision with your permission and must return in the timeframe set by you. Our golden rule at this age is: "You must know where your child is at all times. Your child must know where you are at all times."

Must have suitable costume and toys

Children should dress in costume appropriate for their character. Footwear is always difficult in LRP, particularly for children who are still growing quickly, so neutral coloured footwear (plain shoes, trainers or wellies) is acceptable. Wooden toys are ideal for young children; bright plastic or battery-operated toys are not allowed in the IC area.

Game participation is encouraged

Parents are encouraged to keep their children with them while roleplaying on site and to involve their children in what they are doing. You should return to your own camp or to the OOC area if your child ceases to enjoy the roleplaying.

A character but no skills

The intention for Empire is to create a world in which children play children as realistically and credibly as possible. We intend to try to make the experience of being a child in the world of Empire as epic as possible, but children are not great heroes risking their lives to save the Empire, they merely have the chance to become one as they grow up in the game.

Because of this, children are expected to create a character on our system. However children cannot have skills or resources until their character passes the Test of Citizenship. There is no lower age limit, although most graduates are around 11 or older. We intend to deliver a game aimed at our young players that is based around their characters and what they want to learn and do and is not contingent on skills or resources.

Until they pass their Test of Citizenship, young players have no skills, so they may utilize the Apprentice Ability

Characters are non-combatants

Children of this age cannot participate in a fight without the express prior agreement of a member of our referee team. This is only likely to be forthcoming for children taking part in supervised IC activities arranged for children; they will not be allowed to take the battlefield. Fights on the main field are likely to be rare at Empire, but if one does start, then your child should know to leave the immediate area by the most effective route, to ensure their own safety.

Parents may allow their children to spar with other children using a suitable phys-rep for a child's sparring weapon (like the wooden sword that Arya uses in the first series of Game of Thrones).

Information for under 7s

Overview

The rules for under-7s are based around the assumptions that a young child cannot engage significantly with the roleplaying and that they need constant supervision by their parents. The goal of these rules is to ensure that parents are clear about what they need to do to ensure that their young children do not damage the event for others.

Some of these rules will only apply to the IC area. There is obviously no requirement or restrictions for costume or toys in the OOC camping field.

No charge but must book in advance

We do not expect a young child to play a significant role in the game, so there is no charge for them to attend. However they must be booked in advance of the game, in the company of a booked adult who is their parent or carer. This is to ensure that we have an accurate list of young children attending the event.

24/7 supervision required

Any under-7 must be supervised at all times by a parent or nominated carer. This can be onerous; parents should consider whether it is worth attending an event with an under-7 if they do not have two or more adults to share the responsibility. Parents of young children must be aware that they can easily disrupt the game for other players. You must remove your child from an area where other players are roleplaying if they become disruptive. Young children are prone to wandering off, so parents must take care to ensure that they remain close at all times.

The requirement for supervision applies even when your child is asleep. You cannot leave a young child sleeping without their parent or carer present.

Must have suitable costume

A baby should be swaddled or dressed in blankets or costume which are appropriate to the setting. Young children should have suitable costume. Footwear is always difficult in LRP, particularly for children who are still growing quickly, so neutral coloured footwear (plain shoes, trainers or wellies) is acceptable.

Must have suitable toys

A young child will want to play with toys. The perfect toys are ones that are passable in the setting, such as wooden farm animals. You must not bring bright coloured obviously plastic toys or any toys that are battery operated into the IC area.

A character but no skills

The intention for Empire is to create a world in which children play children as realistically and credibly as possible. We intend to try to make the experience of being a child in the world of Empire as epic as possible, but children are not great heroes risking their lives to save the Empire, they merely have the chance to become one as they grow up in the game.

There is no lower age limit, although most graduates are around 11 or older. We intend to deliver a game aimed at our young players that is based around their characters and what they want to learn and do and is not contingent on skills or resources.

As under 7s have no skills, they may utilize the Apprentice Ability.

There are no circumstances under which it is acceptable for an under-7 to be involved in combat. Since a parent or carer must be supervising the child at all times, this means that that individual cannot be involved in combat either. It should not be difficult to avoid combat at Empire, however if combat does occur near you or your child, then you must gather up your child and immediately leave the area by the most effective route. It is exceptionally unlikely that another character would want to attack you while you are doing this, but if that does appear to happen then you must put a hand in the air and follow the rules for being non-contact.

IC area for young players

The IC site includes a large tent and courtyard area dedicated to IC activities for young players called The Academy. Older children in this age group may participate in children's activities organised by PD and other aspects of the game if they are able to roleplay appropriately. They must be accompanied by a parent/carer at all times and should be removed from the area if they cease to roleplay.

Infusions of Feathers

These mystic infusions grant those who inhale them supernatural insight. They are intended to be poured into hot water and the resulting steam drawn into the lungs, from where its semi-narcotic effect flows throughout the entire body. Extensive use of these infusions can have a detrimental effect on the peace of mind of the user, and they are best employed sparingly.

These potions are, unsurprisingly, popular with the Kallavesi and with mystics of all nations. The modern recipes used to brew the infusions were refined over centuries in the swamps of Kallavesa, but the Navarr used similar preparations for centuries, and can claim the credit for first developing the Ravenwing infusion at the very least.

Magpie Infusion

This volatile oil dissolves quickly in warm water, or can be thrown directly onto hot coals or open flame to create a small cloud of strongly scented steam. Taken deep into the lungs, it allows the drinker to perceive magical auras, or gain an instinctive feel for the qualities of a ritual being performed nearby.

- Form: Infusion.
- Description: This oily blue substance smells of summer flowers. When exposed to the air, it begins to evaporate. A tiny amount on your fingertip immediately begins to bubble and soon evaporates into a thin blue-tinted cloud.
- Roleplaying Effects: Your tongue and lips are numbed, meaning your speech is slurred. You find yourself blinking rapidly, or suffering from watering eyes. Any spell that you hear being cast causes you to perceive dramatic displays of colourful light that can be quite distracting.
- Mechanical Effects: Inhaling the steam from this infusion grants you the ability to use the detect magic spell once during the next ten minutes without requiring you to know the spell or expend any mana.
- Recipe: Two drams of Cerulean Mazzarine.

Ravenwing Infusion

This pale red concoction produces a thick, lingering steam that hangs in the air for several moments unless actively inhaled. It causes a momentary dizziness, and then the individual who has partaken of it can perceive auras around living beings. By closely examining these auras, the imbiber can potentially gain useful insights. The infusion also causes the user to have exceptionally vivid dreams for up to a full day after using it, and many mystics believe that there were hidden messages in those dreams, either hints of the future or insight into the nature of the skein.

Initially this preparation was of most use to mystics who interpreted the information gained from auras in various esoteric ways; several mystics. With the slow spread of the Imperial faith, Ephraim son of Miriam, a Highborn archivist that the preparation also allowed the user to perceive the effects of certain religious ceremonies, without the use of Liao.

- Form: Infusion.
- Description: This crumbly red substance smells strongly of exotic spices. When rubbed between finger and thumb the spicy scent intensifies dramatically.
- Roleplaying Effects: You feel suddenly dizzy, and then lose the ability to see colours; everything becomes visible in shades of grey. The exception is that you can see colourful auras around living creatures, with the colour and intensity reflecting how you feel about that person. The night after taking this infusion you will have exceptionally vivid dreams.
- Mechanical Effects: Inhaling the steam from this infusion grants you the ability to use the insight skill once during the next ten minutes without requiring you to know the skill or expend any liao.
- Recipe: One dram each of Cerulean Mazzarine, Imperial Roseweald, Bladeroot and Marwort.

Goosewhisper Infusion

This midnight blue liquid hisses and bubbles when exposed to heat, and releases a cloud of shimmering barely visible steam. If it is inhaled deeply, a chill sensation emanates from the chest through the whole body. After a moment, the imbiber enters a hypnogogic trance during which they receive symbolic visions concerning important events. These are visions of things that may come to pass in the near future, or have recently occurred, or which are currently occurring. There is no way to focus these visions towards specific topics of interest.

- Form: Infusion.

- Description: This midnight blue solution is a thick, resinous liquid. It has a sweet, sharp scent that causes your nostrils to tingle and chills your lungs. The unpleasant, acrid flavour makes drinking it unappealing.
- Roleplaying Effects: For around an hour after experiencing this infusion you see things out of the corner of your eye; anyone you are not looking at directly appears to be surrounded by a shimmering multicoloured halo. You tend to see things in symbolic ways, and may see weird images hanging around people you know, relating to how you feel about them. These effects are very pronounced if you are a member of the naga lineage.
- Mechanical Effects: Inhaling the steam from this infusion causes you to enter a trance during which you suffer a brief but intense vision. This vision is provided by a referee, and will contain information about things that are happening, have happened or may happen at the event. There is no way to direct this vision towards a specific topic. These visions are the same as those received from the Signs and Portents ritual; you will receive the same vision if you are part of that ritual, or have already performed it.
- Recipe: Two drams of Bladeroot and one dram each of Marrowort and True Vervain.

Inga Tarn

Virtue

In 308 YE, Inga Tarn was declared an Exemplar of the Virtue of Courage by the Assembly of Courage.

Biography

Inga was the daughter of a Stein blacksmith and grew up helping her parents at the forge. From an early age she was remarkably strong, possessed of a stubborn spirit and unparalleled boldness. Throughout her life she wielded a massive two-handed maul that she crafted herself, marked with runes, and used to scatter the enemies of Wintermark and the Empire, including at least one ancient horror uncovered from an icy tomb.

Inga Tarn was a famed companion to Empress Mariika. She met Empress Mariika during one of her earliest visits to Anvil, and the pair remained fast friends until Inga's death in 230 YE fighting to defend the Varushkan territory of Miekarova against a Thule incursion. In life Inga served several times as a Wintermark general, but was possessed of a great wanderlust and thirst for adventure. She spent a great deal of time traveling the Empire and fighting its enemies, with an ear for the concerns of the 'common folk' of the Empire.

There are many stories about her adventures still told today in the Empire. She is known to have spent a year in Varushka fighting alongside several of the Warden fellowships - in one tale her prodigious fortitude allows her to defeat three monstrous mora in a drinking contest, leaving the creatures insensible and unable to harm anyone in the settlement where she was staying. She travelled with several Navarr Stridings, and lead a small contingent of Wintermark heroes to aid the thorns against the Vallorn of Therunin. In one popular (if apocryphal) tale told in the Marches she single-handedly won every contest of strength during a great fair held near the town of Sarcombe in the Mournwold before being outwitted in a game of riddles. A popular site of pilgrimage to those who revere the exemplar is the Burden of Igna Tarn, a great rock marked with Wintermark runes that she apparently carried almost to the White City itself as part of a quest. The exemplar herself never entered the city - shortly before she arrived, she received a cryptic messenger calling her away urgently to an undisclosed location.

Inga Tarn never claimed to be fearless, but her bravery in the face of terrible enemies strengthened the spirits of those who fought alongside her. She often served as a living banner, encouraging cowed villagers standing up to the bandits who terrorised them, or serving as the bulwark that prevented soldiers from routing in the face of dreadful odds.

To this day Inga Tarn is remembered as a larger-than-life hero, a woman who seized life by the throat and never apologised.

Signs

The Assembly of Courage cited the following signs of Inga's exemplardom:

- Inga left behind a legacy in the form of Avalanche, her famed rune-forged two-handed hammer, that played a significant part in many of her adventures.
- Inga is also attributed with miracles in relation to her superhuman physical strength.
- For both her service to the Empire as a General of Wintermark, and for her deeds in defence of citizens during her adventuring days, Inga was credited with the sign of benevolence.
- However, the strongest sign of Inga's exemplardom is held to be her inspiration. Not only did her heroic courage serve as a rallying point for her allies on the battlefield, but she stands as an example of someone unafraid to speak her mind, seize the opportunities life offered her, and pursue the things she believed in regardless of the odds against her or the opinion of strangers.

Inquisition

Yes, I know they will lie. Everyone lies. I want to hear what they sound like when they are lying. I want them to know I can see through them.

Inquisitor Reuben, of the Assembly of Vigilance

Synod Judgement

- Any Assembly
- Lesser Majority

Overview

The primary purpose of inquisition is to investigate and expose unvirtuous behaviour. The target or targets of the inquisition are compelled to appear for questioning before the Imperial Synod at the appointed hour. The priest who raised the judgement is expected to lead the proceedings; some prefer to conduct the inquisition entirely by themselves, while others will ask one or more peers to help them question the accused. Whatever they decide, they have one hour to asking probing questions to discover the truth behind the actions and motives of the accused.

Contents

- 1 Overview
- 2 Judgement
- 3 Performing an Inquisition
- 4 Outcome
- 5 Further Reading
 - 5.1 Core Brief
 - 5.2 Additional Information

Judgement

A judgement of inquisition may be raised by any assembly of the Imperial Synod. When the judgement is raised in a national assembly, it may only be used to inquisition members of that nation. The virtue assemblies may raise a judgement against anyone - but they are expected to restrict the remit of their inquisition to matters concerning their virtue.

The judgement must name each specific individual who will be covered. A judgement may only name more than one individual if they are members of the same oathsworn band - either a banner, sect, or coven at the time the judgement is raised. If there are multiple names on the judgement, then members of the Synod must either vote for or against the entire list - they may not split their votes.

When a judgement of inquisition is submitted, the priest who raises the judgement is expected to agree a time for the questioning with the subject of the inquisition. If there is evidence that this has not happened then the Tribune will take steps to attempt to inform the subject of the judgement. Usually they will send a messenger to find the citizen to ask them to attend the Hub so that they can be briefed on the development.

A judgement of inquisition requires a lesser majority to pass. An individual or group can only be the target of inquisition once per summit.

Performing an Inquisition

Hearsay is half lies.

The priest who raises the judgement of inquisition must decide the time and place that the inquisition will take place. Attendance is a legal requirement, but magistrates are satisfied that that the choice was reasonable and was agreed with the target. The expectation is that the priest will work with the targets of the inquisition to ensure that the venue and date are practical for them to attend where possible. The legal duration of an inquisition is up to one hour. The subject may choose to leave at any point after the hour has passed.

Marcher Proverb

An individual may not be subject of an inquisition more than once per summit; anyone who has already undergone a inquisition that weekend is not obliged to attend another.

The priest who raised the judgement is expected to lead the questioning at an inquisition, but at their discretion they may choose to invite other priests to assist them in questioning the accused. Whatever happens, Imperial law is still in force during the inquisition. and any unlawful treatment of the person under inquisition is still a crime.

Outcome

If the inquisition identifies behaviour that warrants bringing to the attention of the wider Empire then the priest who raised the judgement may proceed to escalate this to a sanction. This escalation is considered to be an extension of the inquisition, it will be submitted by the Tribune of the Synod on behalf of the priest who raised the original judgement at their request.

Refusal to attend an inquisition is usually sufficient grounds for condemnation and prosecution for subverting the agencies of state, provided that the target or targets could reasonably have attended.

Magistrate Elsbet, plucked her pince-nez from her nose and laid it carefully on her desk. She rubbed the weariness of a long day from her eyes, and then returned her gaze to the advocate standing in the doorway.

"So your judgement of inquisition for the Mourn Senator passed the Assembly of Ambition but James did not show up?"

"That is correct magistrate - we condemned him for his absence. And now we are passing the matter to yourselves to deal with."

"How generous. What time did you set for your inquisition?"

"Two hours past midday magistrate."

The faintest flicker of a smirk passed over the Dawnish man's face. Elsbet sighed again. She briefly contemplated trying the case but her time wasn't worth the fine the advocate was going to get, so she opted for sarcasm instead.

"Two hours past midday. But wait! By sheer misfortune you chose exactly the time of the Senate Session - and with that important vote on the assignment due. What a coincidence. I'm surprised James didn't mention the conflict when you sent word of the inquisition."

The man's face turned sour, there was no smirk in sight now. "It's still a crime magistrate - failing to appear before an inquisition is subverting the agencies of state!"

Elsbet snorted in derision. "Oh a crime has been committed - of that I have no doubt. Inquisition is a delicate tool citizen, a scalpel to be wielded by a clever surgeon to expose wrong-doing. It is not a club with which to bludgeon your political rivals. Your transparent ruse to inquisit the senator at a time he clearly could not be expected to make is self-evidently an abuse of powers - by you. Fortunately for you, I can't prosecute without a judgement of condemnation by the Synod. So either you leave me to get on with some real work - or I shall speak to the Gatekeeper of Wisdom about raising a suitable judgement."

She picked up her pince-nez as the advocate turned and fled. Sighing again, she put them back on her nose and returned her attention to the militia report. It had been a long day.

Inquisitor's Cassock

Description

A cassock is an ankle-length robe especially popular with priests of Highguard and The League. It may be tight or loose-fitting, and is often sumptuously dyed in rich colours with gold, silver or mithril embroidery. Among priests of the Freeborn, Varushka and Navarr it is more likely to be a long coat, usually of stout wool but also likely to be richly coloured and decorated.

The inquisitor's cassock is favoured by priests who judge, weigh and evaluate the spirits of those around them. While popular with inquisitors, it is also useful to spiritual advisors, and especially to Navarr guides. A priest in a guide's robe or coat of judgement was often a common sight at trials, considering the spiritual debts and marks on the aura of those for whom he might later ask clemency. This vestment is also useful to those who make a habit of examining the victims of wicked spirits, or those under the thrall of dark powers. Not all malignant forces warp the soul, but the signs of spiritual damage are often a clear sign of the involvement of a corrupt entity - which makes the inquisitor's cassock especially useful to spiritually adept wardens and Wise ones.

Rules

- Form: Armour. Takes the form of a robe.
- Requirement: You must have the dedication skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: Twice per day you may perform an insight ceremony without expending any liao. You must be able to perform the insight ceremony to use this ability.
- Materials: Crafting an inquisitor's cassock requires twelve measures of beggar's lye, seven ingots of weltsilver, seven ingots of tempest jade, seven measures of iridescent gloaming, four measures of dragonbone and three measures of ambergelt. It takes one month to make one of these items.

Insight

Overview

Through the power of this ceremony, a priest can perceive the aura that surrounds living people, and gather information about spiritual effects. There is some disagreement among priests as to whether what they are seeing is the "soul" of the individual - the core of their essential nature that persists from one life to the next - or simply some spiritual penumbra that surrounds thinking beings.

Whatever they are perceiving, the ceremony allows them to gather information about the person by observing it for a few moments. The quickest information to discover is if someone is a human, an orc, or an inhabitant of another realm, whether they are under the effects of any auras, and the effects of any spiritual wounds they are experiencing. All of this can be found out with a quick overview of a target's aura.

The priest can also perform a slower, more potent version of the ceremony to allow them to identify if the target is dedicated and reveals the presence of spiritual marks like the ones created by testimony as well as any malign spiritual effects such as curses or possessions. This version of the ceremony is also effective on items to discover information about any hallow they may possess, and again will determine the presence of a spontaneously arisen aura, a spiritual curse, or the presence of a haunting spirit - it can be used to identify a ghostly anchor for example.

There are also plentiful reports of priests detecting other marks on their subject that do not appear to be the result of the testify ceremony yet still contain information. A commonly cited tale refers to a Varushkan wise one from Karov who used the ceremony to observe a band of travelling musicians only to discover that they each bore a mark indicating they bore a twisted boon from Wendigo. When the minstrels attempted to murder the people of the vale in their sleep, their wicked plan was stymied when they discovered not sleeping victims but fully-armed and prepared schlacta!

The ceremony can also be used to examine objects, but unlike people items do not innately generate auras than can be read with insight. Objects that bear spiritual marks visible to this ceremony have usually been touched by a potent spiritual force - whether a religious ceremony, by close proximity to a profound spiritual event, or by the attentions of ghosts or spirits. It is especially useful for gathering information about spiritual auras on relics whose provenance is uncertain, as well as to glean information about the anchors of a ghost, or how to combat a malignant curse.

It is possible to conceal information from Insight, but doing so is of limited benefit. It seems that even powerful magic items such as a Shackle of the Unvirtuous or a philtre such as a Shadowcrow Infusion can only conceal the entire person from insight, rather than specific pieces of information - and the ceremony will always detect the presence of such obfuscation, even if it cannot penetrate it.

Performing a Quick Insight

- Requires a dose of liao and ten seconds of appropriate roleplaying
- Does not require a referee
- Reveals the target's race and any aura present
- Reveals the effects of any spiritual traumatic wounds
- Orcs can be the subject of a quick insight

Performing a quick insight on a character uses a dose of liao. This performance of insight requires ten seconds of appropriate roleplaying and target must be close enough to touch throughout. The target need not be willing. After the insight is complete, you should call "Insight" loudly enough for your target to hear and make clear that they are the target of the effect.

If their aura is not concealed then they must inform you of their species (human, orc, creature of the realms, ghost, other), and tell you what personal aura they are under the effects of if any. If the target is suffering from one or more spiritual traumatic wounds, then your character becomes aware of and may open the cards and read the effects. The target of the insight should keep the cards (but not read them) in case any other priest wishes to perform insight on them.

You cannot normally perform a quick insight on an object.

Performing a Thorough Insight

- Requires a dose of liao and at least ten seconds of appropriate roleplaying
- Requires the presence and assistance of a referee
- The target must be within 20'
- Reveals information about the aura of the target
- Orcs can be the subject of a detailed insight

If you have a referee then you may perform a more intense of the insight ceremony to gain more detailed information. Performing a thorough insight requires at least ten seconds of appropriate roleplaying and the target must be within 20' and in clear line-of-sight throughout. The target need not be willing. After the insight is complete, the ref will approach the target to check the results with them.

If their aura is not obscured then you will discover the presence of any malign spiritual effect such as a curse or possession. In addition to the basic information provided by a quick insight, the detailed version of the ceremony reveals the details of restimony, excommunication, anointing, or dedication (including the strength of durable auras where appropriate); it will reveal the presence of other spiritual auras and may give information about what they are, what has caused them, or how they might be combated.

When used on an object, a thorough insight reveals if the item is under the effect of a hallow, or bears a spontaneous aura, along with details of the effect (including strength, and how to combat it, when appropriate); it will also reveal if the item is an anchor for a ghost or similar creature, and may provide additional awareness depending on the nature of that entity.

Awareness

- It is not possible to perform insight without the target being aware
- Most targets will experience the effect as a potentially familiar powerful sense of being observed

You can perform insight against the target's will, but you cannot perform the ceremony without the target being aware of what has taken place. Most targets experience the effect of being insighted as a powerful sense of being observed. Most Imperial player-characters are sufficiently familiar with insight and the effects that they will recognize and understand what has taken place.

The awareness is not immediate; it occurs at the point where the priest calls "Insight" or the ref asks the target for their insight response. In effect, this means that a character is always aware they have been insighted, not that they are being insighted.

Concealment

- Insight is blocked by any effect that conceals a character's aura
- Insight will still reveal that the aura is concealed

If your aura is obscured through the use of effects such as Shadowcrow Infusion then other characters cannot use insight to read your aura. However you must respond to any attempt to insight you by stating that their aura is concealed.

It is not possible to dispel or overcome any effect that conceals an aura.

Cooperation

- There are no benefits from cooperation using the insight skill

While priests can cooperate to perform an insight ceremony, there are no benefits to doing so. Specifically, there are no methods of shrouding an aura that can be overcome with a more powerful insight.

True Liao

- There is no benefit to using true liao to perform the insight ceremony.

While true liao can be used in the place liao to perform an insight ceremony, it provides no additional information.

Inspirational tomb

This is a placeholder page for content that PD are actively working on.

Overview

An inspirational tomb is a sacred site devoted to the memory of an exemplar or paragon. Often the feted individual is buried at the site, though some sites described as tombs are actually a cenotaph - a memorial to their memory that does not contain the mortal remains. By using a dose of true liao to sanctify the site, a permanent aura is created that becomes a source of spiritual strength and inspiration to all who visit the tomb, drawing pilgrims from across the Empire and beyond.

It is not possible to create an inspirational tomb for someone who is not a paragon or exemplar - that would be an act of blasphemy. Thus it is only possible to create this focal point for the faith if the Synod have given formal recognition as an exemplar or paragon.

It is not essential to create an inspirational tomb for every exemplar or paragon. In fact, given the great cost involved, it is rare to do so. The inspirational lessons provided by the life of an exemplar or paragon will last as long as the memories of those who recognized him or her. The reason to create an inspirational tomb is to spread knowledge of the individual throughout the Empire, ensuring they become renowned with their memory immortalized for generations to come.

Costs

- Materials: 1 dose of true liao and 4 crowns
- Time: 3 months to construct

The costs listed are for the smallest possible tomb. It is possible to commission a grand structure built of white granite and weirwood that would contain the tomb and serve as a place of worship for the faith, but that would be in addition to the costs listed above. The commission would work in a similar fashion to a sinecure, the more impressive the structure, the more synod votes and liao it will provide.

Benefits

Grandeur

Upon consecration of the tomb, we will update the wiki entry for that region to include a description of the site, with a length appropriate to the size and scale of the construction. In addition the Imperial Archivist will visit Anvil to meet with those responsible for the recognition of the paragon or exemplar (if they still live) and those who have paid for the creation of the tomb. They will discuss the life of the paragon or exemplar and take notes to allow them to document the site so that news of it can be spread throughout the Empire.

We will then use that information to help us create a wiki page for the exemplar or paragon detailing their life, their accomplishments and the signs of their virtue.

Inspiration

A tomb attracts pilgrims from across the Empire and beyond, who want to learn more. It can also encourage people who already possess little-known or significant information about the individual to come forward. In the past, the construction of a tomb has led to an interest in relics of a new exemplar's life, to examination of and emulation of their heroic deeds, and to the formation of sodalities dedicated to pursuing their legacy. The individuals responsible for creating the tomb are often caught up in these events.

Lost Tombs

Many records were lost when Emperor Nicovar destroyed the great libraries of the Empire. This coupled with the problem that the Empire is a vast land that includes large areas of dangerous wilderness between civilized settlements means that it is certain that the location of some inspirational tombs has been lost over the centuries. Without suitable protection these sites may have been destroyed - but in theory some may yet endure. No inspirational tomb has been known to fail through age, since the power of true liao withstands the ravages of time, so it is possible that one day some or all of these lost tombs might be found and reclaimed.

Icon of the Driven (Redirected from Inspiring Refrain)

Description

The Icon of the Driven, also known as an Icon of the Ascendant, allows a priest to perform ceremonies as if they were dedicated to the virtue of Ambition. It generally takes the form of a piece of religious art, usually depicting a paragon or exemplar of Ambition Tian (often called an Icon of the Burnt), Aldones di Sarvos, or Adelmar the Lion. The Icon is not always a portrait, however - in Wintermark it is sometimes crafted in the form of a medallion or short rod decorated with the bones and feathers of rooks, generally decorated with the Rune of Hunger, which is known as an Icon of the Rook or, more rarely, an Icon of the Hungry. In Varushka, the icon commonly takes the form of a statuette of a fox and is known as a Wily Fox. Other less common variants are certainly possible - from the expertly illustrated scrolls recounting the great deeds of the Freeborn, to the beautiful three-panel triptych favoured in the League (generally showing the humble origins, great struggle, and eventual success of the character depicted - with the final panel invariably suggesting that rather than resting on their laurels the ambitious person will not work towards a new goal).

Icons of the Driven are significantly less popular than other, similar Icons. Priests who rely on them sometimes encounter an unspoken, perhaps even unconscious, prejudice from dedicated priests and lay followers of Ambition. Splitting one's focus - using a magical item to allow one to wield the auras of Ambition is sometimes seen as reflecting a lack of character, drive, or commitment. To many ambitious people, it simply makes no sense to be dedicated to another virtue and use an Icon of the Driven - it is much more appropriate to be dedicated to Ambition and use the tools provided to employ the auras provided by lesser virtues. It is rarely acceptable to put such sentiments into words, of course.

The icon is equally valuable to a priest who is dedicated to one of the other six virtues as it is to a priest who is dedicated to none of them. It allows them to perform ceremonies such as anointing, consecration, and hallow, and create auras of Loyalty in place of the auras they would otherwise have access to. It also allows a priest to cooperate with priests dedicated to Loyalty who are not part of their sect.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of an icon.
- Requirement: You must have the dedication skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: You may perform ceremonial skills other than dedication as if you were dedicated to the virtue of Ambition.
- Materials: Crafting an Icon of the Driven requires 7 ingots of orichalcum, 7 measures of iridescent gloaming, and 9 measures of dragonbone; It takes 1 month to make one of these items.

Interdiction

Overview

The Conclave may censor specific rituals, items, or materials that represent a significant magical danger to the Empire. In the case of rituals, interdiction does not prevent anyone knowing the ritual, nor remove it the ritual from Imperial lore - but performing the ritual (or using ritual magic to produce the magical effect that that ritual creates) is henceforth illegal.

Declaration

The specific ritual, item, or material must be explicitly named in the declaration. A declaration of interdiction involving an item or material may specify that rather than being destroyed, it should be placed out of reach. This is usually done when an interdiction is intended to be temporary (as with the Imperial Crown, for example).

Resolution

If a ritual is interdicted, it is illegal to perform that ritual. It is not illegal to master that ritual, nor to possess a ritual text containing the named ritual. The specific effect created by the ritual is interdicted - using an arcane projection to substantially duplicate a ritual that is subject to interdiction is considered the same as performing the illegal magic.

For magic items and materials, it is illegal to use or possess the interdicted items or materials. It is the legal responsibility of ever Imperial citizen to hand them in promptly to the civil service to be destroyed or placed out of reach, as appropriate. An object placed out of reach is not made available to anyone - it does not become the property of the Conclave and cannot be the target of a declaration of Dissemination, for example. If the Declaration of Interdiction is later reversed, an item that has been placed out of reach will be returned to the owner at the time the interdiction was placed. If that owner is not available, the civil service will do their best to return the item to an appropriate citizen as part of the original owner's estate.

Declaration of Reconciliation

The Conclave may remove or modify a ban placed by the declaration of interdiction with a declaration of reconciliation.

Remorse

In recent times, people have queried if a ritual might be removed from Imperial lore. In theory there is no legal mechanism by which such a thing might be accomplished, but Harry Archer, an enterprising thresher from Mitwold recently proposed an option. The Imperial Conclave could interdict a ritual text - and they could give instruction for the thing they interdict to be destroyed. This declaration is usually applied to an item - or a small class of items - but Harry points out that in theory the Conclave might choose to interdict every single known copy of a ritual text - giving orders for them to be destroyed. If that were done - then the effect would be identical to if the ritual had never been added to lore.

While there is no fundamental constitutional bar to this approach, it is not consistent with the current law. While interdicted magic items or materials should be handed in promptly to the civil service this explicitly does not apply to interdicted rituals, which are simply illegal to perform. Magistrates advised that a change to the law (requiring the intervention of the Imperial Senate) would be required to create a new Conclave power to accomplish this. They warn that it would be expensive - they calculate it would cost 25 thrones per named ritual to seek out and destroy every copy of each of those ritual texts in the Empire. It has been impishly suggested that this power could be called a Declaration of Remorse.

Into the woods

The five of them stood huddled against the tree, in their dark cloaks invisible in the cloudy winter night.

"So we're agreed?", said Halina - she'd taken the lead for this little enterprise. The siblings Piotr and Agnes nodded, drawing their swords as one. They were to provide the muscle.

"Sure - I'm certain I can slay them with this before the rest of you have time to blink" - with a mean smile, Fritz took his crossbow and began to settle into position in a nearby tree. Only Greta hesitated.

The young mountebank spoke, suspicion in her voice. "You swear we'll split it five ways? No funny business? I've got people waiting for me, you know that. Let's not... we get the coin, we take our shares, we never see each other again."

Halina laughed. The older actor was amused at Greta's reluctance; but she couldn't fault it. "I swear on our city, the City of the North, greatest of the four - we will all receive our dues." Greta scowled.

From the shadows where she had concealed herself, Agnes also spoke. "I think the time for objecting was that bar in town where we all met, no? We are out here in the dark and the cold of the north on the Karov road and it is now that you are getting cold feet? Tsh."

Greta sighed. "Fine. I'll get into posi- what was that?!" Halina rolled her eyes. "Greta. Come. I can hear the approach of the wagon in the distance. We must be ready."

"You don't understand. I heard a scream, I think... or the sound of a bell?". Now it was Piotr's turn to sigh in the shadows. "Greta. Come on. We are all wanting to get back into the warm and spend a large amount of money on sausages and beer. Well, I mean... that's my plan; fuck the rest of you. So get it together."

Greta finally relented, and as agreed took up the position of the injured traveller on the road. When the merchant from the city came past with her guards, they would stop for her; her acting skills would see to that. And that Halina's knife and Fritz's bow and the swords of the twins would see to the rest, and the prize of the merchant's cargo would be theirs.

She waited there in silence. In the distance, she heard the slow trundle of the cart, the tread of the oxen, indistinct conversation between the travelers. They would be here in a few minutes; she could already see their lights. The other four had hidden by now... she could no longer see them against the shadows.

She waited. She began to moan in mocked pain, and she saw the figures up ahead start to hurry and talk amongst themselves. Finally she saw them - the merchant and, yes, just two guards. This would be easy.

"Help, help! I was injured on the road, my ankle!" The figures ran up, bending down concerned, Greta the plaintive youngster to them. In a moment, Fritz would loose his bow, and that would be that.

A scream rang out from the tree, and the merchant and the guards wheeled around. Greta lay there still, confused. "What's that?!"

Something fell from the tree. Even in the dim light, Greta recognized the face... or what was left of it. It was - or had been - Fritz.

"Oh, fuck this!" - the twins lept out, and Halina, and then, and then - they descended. Figures dressed in dark robes, flesh pallid and slightly ethereal. They seemed to melt from the trees themselves. "And through the woods the shadows creep." said the first - how many were there, though, they seemed to surround the three of them, while the merchant, the guards, and Greta - still pretending her injury - just watched.

"The servants, bloodied, wounded deep." As one, the dark figures spoke, advancing on the ertswihle bandits. "Their hearts lie empty, full of spite." They spoke again, and took another step forward, Piotr and Agnes raising their swords, Halina readying her dagger.

Once more they spoke. "Their voices, empty, bitter, ice." On this final word they descended on Halina, and Piotr, and Agnes, and tore them apart, into flesh, and the ground was thick with blood. One of them turned to Greta, and she steeled herself, preparing for the blow. And it spoke again. "Safe passage granted to the four of you, by the Prince of the Icy Heart. Metri is his domain. By will and compact, he protects. Travel safe."

And then the dark figures, uncountable in their number, seemed to vanish into the night as quickly as they had appeared.

The merchant ran forward to Greta, her lantern lighting the concern and horror on her face. "Are you... are you alright? Be well, child, do not fear. Let us leave this place, before... but who were these poor people?"

"Bandits and thieves," spoke one of the guards, "I recognize Fritz von Locul here from his poster. But what those things were..." The four of them stood in torchlight, trying not to look at the remains of what had been Greta's companions.

"Come, child, rest on the cart. We shall have to return to the city and report this." The merchant offered to lift Greta up, and she accepted, carefully keeping up the pretense of her injured leg. She'd have to do so for a while, but... it was better than being left in this forest with... whatever they were.

As the cart was turned around and she sat upon it, the last she saw of her comrades was the remains of Halina's face, eyes glinting in the fading light. Accusing. That sight would stay with Greta for a long while after the rest of this night fell into the haze of drunken memory... but it was that she longed to forget the most.

Overview

Something very strange has happened to the region of Metri in the northern territory of Temeschwar. Since the coldest night of the winter thus far - when the ground was frosted with snow and ice - a darkness has crept into it. Strange spirits are seen, ghostly figures in the night. The dead are said to wander abroad. And yet they do not seem to wish those travellers ill - quite the contrary.

Since the darkness fell across the paths of Metri, there has been no reported incidence of bandit attacks, roadside muggings or opportune violence. The trade routes passing through Metri north to Skarsind and east to Karov have never been easier to travel. Instead, those who intend violence and threaten others are torn apart by ghostly figures that seem to come from nowhere, muttering doggerel and professing themselves servants of "the Prince of the Icy Heart, who offers safe passage". After the first few such incidents... well, word soon gets round. Those who practice the art of robbery choose different tracks, far from Metri where the roads have become surprisingly safe.

Not that people feel safe. The scattered murders are brutal and messy, and there is a constant feeling of being watched by many eyes. According to a story coming from the Fortress of Salt - the mithril mine which is Metri's only notable feature - an argument over spilt beer in the miner's quarters turns messy. One miner, advancing on the other with blood in her eye has his heart torn out by a gaunt figure erupting from a nearby passage. Since then, everyone is being very civil to one another in the mine... just in case. No more incidents have occurred since then but the workers are deeply uneasy. They remain at their posts for now - they are paid well, after all - but the atmosphere at the Fortress is strained, to put it mildly.

Significance

The region of Metri in Temeschwar has gained the haunted quality. A presence lurks there. Ghosts and shadows seem to wait behind every crag and tree. Diviners in the territory indicate that they do not think this is the result of an enchantment - that it is somehow the influence of creatures of the realms - but the presence of the potent shrouds covering the Empire means it is hard for them to be absolutely certain. a few more superstitious types, especially those fleeing homes in Metri for the presumed safety of Temeschwar, whisper that this is no temporary curse or magical aura, but that something dark has quietly slipped over the border and set up home.

The major landmark of Metri is the Fortress of Salt, and though as a mithril deposit it is inherently resistant to magical interference, the unease has spread here too. The production of mithril at the Fortress of Salt has not been interrupted, but the current holder of the seat may wish to take precautions to ensure that the current ominous state of affairs does not grow worse. Nobody seems to have any suggestions for how the current affliction might be healed, so perhaps it is nothing to worry about. Still, in the days leading up to the summit, a number of strange looking individuals have been seen around and about in Metri - all asking after Tobias Shanks...

"So the riddle is, how far can you go into the forest?" said the woodcutter.

The smart-mouthed child pondered the question sucking her thumb.

After a moment she pulled it out of her mouth with a loud popping noise and, in a self-satisfied tone of voice, said: "Halfway of course! Because after that you are coming out of the forest.

The woodcutter grinned, and the child was a little frightened by how many teeth were in his mouth.

As his smile broadened, he leaned close to the smart-mouthed little child, and put a hand on each of her shoulders. The child was even more frightened by how strong and bony his fingers were.

But she was even more frightened when the woodcutter's eyes began to glow, and as the meaty stench of his breath washed over her he whispered

"Oh child ... silly child ... you do not know the half of it." Traditional Varushkan Tale

Investigative Theology

Investigative Theology

The Imperial religion is not the product of one text or one teacher, but the accumulated wisdom of many investigative theologians. The first to refer to themselves as such were the Scions of Atun Chapter from Highguard's history. It was the Scions who thoroughly investigated the properties of liao and its various states, and constructed the first gateway. From there, they - and other investigative theologians - have studied the effects of liao and the visions, learning about the nature of humanity, virtue, the Labyrinth and history.

Under Imperial and Synod law, investigative theologians are permitted to consider alternatives to the doctrines of the faith, but are not permitted to teach these as truth. Doing so without having amended the doctrines through the General Assembly is heresy and a threat to the unity of the Imperial Synod and the Empire. The truth, it is maintained, has its own authority and will be recognised by the General Assembly of sound spiritual leaders.

It has been necessary in Imperial history to remind some investigative theologians that their studies are on, and in relation to, the soul of the Empire herself, and are not merely academic in nature.

Nevertheless the following are the most commonplace strands of investigative theology:

- Visionary Theology - The discovery of pure liao was a revolutionary breakthrough for theology, and many investigative theologians pursue it ardently. Others seek to replicate similar discoveries through other non-liao means.
- Archaeology - It was the discovery and analysis of sites and relics of the past that confirmed that pure liao visions were rooted in truth. Consequently, there are several investigative theologians who seek funding for expeditions to battlegrounds, known locations of paragons, and other key sites. In some cases, this is an essential part of confirming whether a virtuous person was truly an exemplar or even a paragon.
- Comparative Theology - Although clearly backward and ill-informed, the various Foreign nations have their own religious traditions which have arisen without the insights that the Empire possesses. Whilst the Synod guards the Empire against idolatry and blasphemy, some investigative theologians also believe that study of foreign religion may yield insights in the Labyrinth of Ages. Equally, there may be foreign paragons or exemplars of Virtue whose qualities have gone unrecognised in their homelands.
- Theology of Reason - The doctrines of the faith are founded on the analysis of the phenomena collected and observed by past theologians. This analysis is rooted in the sound judgement of the members of the Synod. The Synod is required to defend the doctrines of the faith but, within the Synod itself, they may be discussed more robustly to refine and purify mortal understanding of the spiritual world.

Invite Grendel delegation

The senate issues an invitation to The Grendal to discuss terms by which the war between The Grendal and the Empire can cease, with the proposer and seconder as representatives of the Empire. A representative of The Grendal is invited to Anvil to discuss terms under the usual terms of diplomatic visitors to Anvil Proposed by Therunin, seconded by Weirwater.

Overview

- This motion follows on from the Senate refusing the Grendel peace treaty at the Summer Solstice of 379YE
- Passed

Date

- Autumn 379YE.

Campaign Outcome

- The civil service, as of yet, has received no response from the Grendel.

Invite an Archmage to address Senate

To invite an archmage of the conclave to address us on the activities of the conclave and how they can assist the empire.

Proposed by Kallavesa, seconded by Sermersuaq.

Overview

- Passed 25 votes to 3.

Date

- Passed Autumn 377YE.

Progress

- Savik Summerstorm, Archmage of Winter, addressed the Senate Summit of 377YE.

Constitution

It is very rare for it to be deemed constitutional for the Senate to have the power to compel an Imperial citizen to appear before them, that power more normally resides with the Imperial Synod, but they can grant the power of address to an Imperial citizen, either on an ongoing basis or to be used once.

Iron Confederacy

Introduction

The Iron Confederacy lies to the south-west of the Empire, across the Lasambrian hills from the Brass Coast. Their nation is made up of a number of large duchies allied in a loose confederacy. The northern duchies are heavily forested, while the western duchies are hilly and craggy rising to a low mountain range. The central duchies are warm, fertile plains that serve as a breadbasket for the rest of the nation.

The long coastline of the Iron Confederacy is particularly treacherous, and there are comparatively few areas within sight of land where large ships can travel safely. In many places sheer cliffs rise steeply, and in others there are great shoals of sharp rocks just below the surface.

The people of the Iron Confederacy call themselves the Suranni, the Children of Surann, and believe they are descendants of a divine forbear who ascended to heaven after founding their nation. Their noble families trace direct lines of descent to this deified ancestor. They are a highly warlike people, characterised by cruel and uncompromising nature, respect for martial might, suspicion of 'magic' and said to be envious of the Empire and indeed all other human nations.

People

The ancestors of the Iron Confederacy came from across the sea around 800 years ago. They quickly subjugated the local human population and engaged in a gleeful war of extermination against the orcs, driving the survivors north into the Lasambrian Hills. At this time, according to their legends, they were ruled by a single divinely inspired Queen who, on her death, ascended to heaven and became a goddess. Her eldest child followed her onto her throne, and for several centuries the Surann as they called themselves were ruled by a hereditary monarch.

They are a hard, proud, jealous people whose society is fundamentally feudal. All real power rests with the dukes and duchesses, and they appoint barons to oversee their lands. The peasants are at the bottom of the pyramid and have few rights. Unlike their Imperial neighbours, they believe that people are born into their station in life and should accept their place in the world. The reward for living one's life according to one's status is to be reforged (reborn) with a higher status in the next life - the most virtuous and hard-working servants of their kingdom are reborn into the noble families. The most respected form of service to the gods is to serve as a soldier, and soldiers who die in battle against the enemies of their duchy are guaranteed to be forged as soldiers in their next life.

All lineages are known in the Iron Confederacy, but the naga bloodline is among the most common. It is very rare outside the nobility or the priesthood, but all the noble families of the Confederacy have threads of naga lineage running through them. Naga children born to commoner households, as well as non-naga lineaged children born to nobles, are usually given up to the priesthood which has led to a very strong lineaged presence among the priests who are themselves prohibited from marriage.

The duchies are ruled by a duke or duchess, a member of a hereditary noble caste that enjoys many privileges at the cost of grave responsibilities. There are seven duchies in all, each with a reasonable amount of autonomy within the confederacy but bound together by their shared faith and a politically neutral priesthood.

Culture and Customs

The Iron Confederacy knows that justice and virtue come from uncompromising strength. The strong dominate the weak, and the weak offer tribute to the strong to secure their protection and patronage. Strength most often comes from martial might. As such, the warriors and soldiers of the confederacy rule over the farmers and artisans. The best weapons and armour belong to the noble families, each of which traces a descent from the original monarchs and thus has divine blood in their veins.

Their highly feudal culture, the Iron Confederacy is bound by iron-clad laws overseen by priestly judges. Even a duke can be called to answer for crimes against the confederacy. The greatest Suranni knights live and breathe the laws of the nation as handed down by Divine Surann Herself to Her priests. Many of these laws have to do with how a warrior should fight, but there are also very clear instructions to merchants, miners, farmers, artisans and priests about their responsibilities to their duchy and the Confederacy as a whole.

The Suranni are deeply suspicious of magicians, and rogue sorcerers are usually executed by beheading. They consider the religious skills granted to the Imperial priests of the Way (and those of the Faraden as well for that matter) as being a form of magic that is especially offensive to their deities based on the exploitation of narcotics and the base credulity of ignorant people. Liao is quite illegal in the Iron Confederacy - but then so are a great many other 'narcotic' substances. Even trade in medicinal herbs such as sanguine hibiscus (which the Suranni never call Imperial Roseweald, for obvious reasons) and bladeroot are carefully controlled, and several potions with so-called narcotic qualities (OOC: roleplaying effects) are illegal outside of the nobility unless administered with the approval of a priest.

Abridged History

The forebears of the Iron Confederacy came from overseas, seeking to carve out a kingdom. Their early history is full of glorious battles, as noble houses fought against the orcs and drove them out of the fertile lands to found their kingdom. United under the strong leadership of Queen Surann (a possibly mythical figure), the people lived in harmony until her death. She was followed onto the throne by four generations of divinely-inspired monarchs until her great-great-great-grandson tore the kingdom apart by producing no clear heir. The duchies fought among themselves in a bitter civil war that saw the orcs of the Broken Shore and the Lasambrian hills slowly begin to push back the frontiers of civilisation.

At the height of the crisis, however, the goddess Surann inspired her favoured priests to bring the warring dukes and duchesses together. Wielding her divine glory, they were able to create a system of laws based on respecting the sovereignty of the individual duchies but also highlighting their duty to the Suranni people as a whole. The line of kings and queens was declared to be at an end, and the previous monarchs' divine right to rule would be wielded by their mortal descendants - the noble families of the new Iron Confederacy.

The priesthood has been responsible for maintaining the confederacy ever since. There have been squabbles between the duchies in the centuries since, but they have never again erupted into civil war. The legal system of the Iron Confederacy leaves some 'safety valves' which the duchies can employ to work off their frustrations and engage in struggles for land and dominance, but these are suspended in times of national crisis such as attempted orc invasions (or their occasional united attacks against outside forces).

There have been several skirmishes between the Confederacy and the Empire. The Freeborn have borne the brunt of these conflicts, but not uniformly. During the Highborn civil war they attempted naval landings south of Necropolis and attempted an invasion of the (then) free city of Sarvos. Both attacks were rebuffed. In the early years of the Empire, while the Imperial army was busy facing the threat of Alderei the Fair, a major assault was against the Brass Coast that was defeated by a combination of Freeborn and Marcher armies supported by timely intelligence gathered by The League. During the reign of Empress Brannan the Suranni navy landed a small army south of the Necropolis near Rebekah's Leap in response to a perceived threat from the Empire. The fighting was short-lived and ended with the surrender and repatriation of the Confederacy armies.

For the last century, the Iron Confederacy has mostly concerned itself with protecting its borders from the raids of the Grendel, and slowly expanding its reach to the south and south-west, adding its seventh and newest duchy in 342YE.

Iron Confederacy Social Structure

The seven dukes and duchesses control all the land, and all inhabitants of their duchy are their subjects. The priesthood and the Knights of the High Temple stand off to one side, serving as a neutral body that oversees the laws and helps mediate disputes between duchies. Each duchy is ruled by a single hereditary noble family that descends from the original deified founder.

The priesthood serves as judges, with their Knights of the High Temple (often abridged to temple knights or simply templars) as the active enforcement arm. The Knights of the High Temple are independent of the duchies and have the right to cross any boundary in pursuit of fugitives or to arrest criminals whose activities threaten more than one duchy. On occasion an entire order of these 'templars' will take the battlefield, supported by the divine blessing of the priesthood, and form an almost irresistible force that serves to keep the Suranni duchies 'honest' in their dealings with one another.

The lowest of the low are the slaves. Most slaves who work in fields, mines or households are humans. The Iron Confederacy does not have many orc slaves, and they primarily serve in the military as shock troops, considered ultimately expendable because they are not human. They are routinely set to fight to the death for the entertainment of their masters, and any signs of rebellion are brutally put down. Some humans who breed orc soldiers function as mercenaries in the rivalries between the duchies, offering bands of murderous inhuman troops to the service of one duke and then another.

While outsiders see the people of the Iron Confederacy as brutal and amoral, they consider themselves disciplined adherents to a harsh code of justice. They think nothing of cutting the hand off a thief or beheading a magician. A man or woman who breaks their marriage vows, regardless of station, will be exiled and imprisoned for their crimes. Those who voice or teach heresy against the divinities deserve to be hanged, because they are attacking the very basis of Suranni society. Cruel as it may be, the foundations of the Suranni legal code lie in mutual respect, filial piety, duty to the nation and loyalty to the state - married to an absolute conviction that the nobles are simply better than everyone beneath them in status - after all, divine blood flows in their veins.

Iron Confederacy Military Concerns

The might of the Iron Confederacy is found in its knights. Wearing the heaviest armour surmounted with a nasal helm, they form an irresistible wave of metal that sweeps their enemies before it. They favour heavy kite shields and swords, or large two-handed weapons. They usually wear a nasal helm and wear brightly coloured tabards and surcoats that announce their allegiance to one of the noble houses. They often bear blessings bestowed by the Suranni gods through the agency of their priests.

The majority of knights are nobles, although they are supported by a lower caste of minor landless knights (usually in chain over leather) who may come from common stock and are selected for their strength and martial ability. They are often much more brutal and unyielding than their noble masters, having much more to 'prove'. A particularly successful minor knight may receive a grant of land from their duke, usually a farmstead or two or a small village, which they oversee on behalf of their betters.

Minor knights are often responsible for rounding up the peasant levies and militia that support the armies of the Iron Confederacy. They are usually poorly armed and armoured, relying on heavy leather and often without shields. Peasant levies fight with polearms and bows. While they are not considered especially effective, only the most stupid battlefield commander throws her levies away pointlessly - sacrificing peasants without achieving victory is seen as the height of folly by the nobility, because ultimately it is the peasants that put food on the noble tables.

All Confederacy armies are supported by priests wielding enchanted staves. These priests use divinely granted power to provide miraculous healing to the soldiers, and deliver powerful blessings that strengthen knights and peasant levies before battles. Priests are rarely armoured, preferring to rely on their faith to protect them from the blows of their enemies.

Finally, the Iron Confederacy uses some units of slave troops - conquered orcs who are trained to fight and die for their noble lords. These orcs are sent ahead of them to attack their enemies and are considered absolutely expendable.

Iron Confederacy Economic Concerns

The Iron Confederacy is not very good at commerce. They trade among themselves, paying for goods and services with coins of silver, electrum and gold (42 silver pennies to a shilling, 5 (electrum) shillings to a gold crown). Imperial merchants who have examined their coinage claim that it is heavily adulterated with nickel and copper. The rarest and most prized of their coins are bloodmarks (there are 13 gold crowns to each Bloodmark). Forged from an alloy of orichalcum and gold, it is illegal for anyone other than a Suranni noble to carry or use a bloodmark.

The Confederacy maintains a small fleet of warships, which tend to be slow and heavy with oars run by slaves. They focus their attentions on defending the shores of the Confederacy from the Grendel. Thanks to the good job the Freeborn corsairs do keeping the Bay of Catazar free of Grendel vessels, the confederacy takes the brunt of the occasional orc aggression from the Broken Shore. Their few merchant vessels are likewise heavy and slow-moving, and their involvement in foreign trade seems to be limited to exchanges of goods with the Faraden and some southern parts of the Brass Coast.

The most common resources in the duchies of the Iron Confederacy are green iron in their western hills, and ambergelt in the northern forests. The Dukes are also said to hold fortunes in mithril in their vaults - indeed, all trade in mithril and weirwood is controlled by the nobility, and endangering a duchies' supply of these valuable materials - or trading them to foreigners - is a capital offence. The Confederacy seems to have comparatively little access to white granite, and what it does have is largely locked up in fortifications and walls.

Religious Beliefs

The Iron Confederacy believes in the existence of divine spirits, gods and goddesses, who rule over the material world from a hidden heavenly realm. Their priests teach that these gods and goddesses observe the mortal world, and the Suranni are their favoured people. The priests are the intermediaries of the Divine Court, and as such they wield the power to bless the favoured and curse the enemies of the nation. Imperial scholars believe that these gods are deified Imperators.

The gods are often depicted in statue form in Suranni homes. Indeed, children regularly paint images of the gods onto cards, creating a small deck that is sometimes used for divination. Most Suranni adults own a set of these cards made when they were young - a constant reminder of the power of their Pantheon over everyday life.

While some priests may privately favour one or more of their divinities over the others, they worship all the deities as a group rather than separating into individual temples. They point to the way the Empire divides its gods up as yet more proof that their theology is ultimately flawed.

Every noble house has a cadre of priests who serve as advisors; while the first loyalty of the nobles themselves is to their own family and kingdom, the priests are united across national bodies. They help to keep the Confederacy united, and serve as mediators and judges outside the immediate control of the noble houses. A sufficiently powerful cadre of priests can bring even a Duke to brook for a transgression against the laws of the Confederacy.

Priests maintain monasteries throughout the kingdoms, living apart from the rest of the Suranni. Unwanted children - especially lineaged children, and most especially naga born to non-noble families or non-naga born to noble families - are commonly given to the priests to raise. By law, priests are celibate. Although they are not required to be sexually abstinent, any children they sire or bear are removed and raised apart from their parents in another monastery. The priesthood teaches that this is a burden placed on them by their Goddess, as well as a reminder that it was an ungrateful child (Dumon) who tore the earlier golden age of the monarchy apart. External scholars suggest it may be rooted in a precaution to prevent the priesthood forming a dynasty that might threaten the ducal families.

The priests of the Iron Confederacy point to the blessings their gods bestow on them as proof of their power. They can perform great rites together that grant strength and fortune in battle, ensure good harvests, provide weapons and armour, discern the truth and strike down enemies and the unfaithful in the name of their gods.

Details of the Suranni Pantheon can be found here.

Magic Traditions

There are few magicians in the Iron Confederacy, because most people would rather rely on the tried-and-trusted rites of the priesthood. Magicians are suspicious, untrustworthy characters seen as being in league with Dumon the Liar, the dark god of the Suranni pantheon. Some magicians, accepting their innate corruption, seek out the priesthood and live out their lives in seclusion using their magic under the watchful gaze of the priests; others denounce Dumon and make the priesthood their vocation.

Magicians who do not accept the corrupt source of their power and denounce Dumon are executed without mercy. A foreign magician taken in battle by the Iron Confederacy is often summarily executed unless there is a priest present - in which case there will usually be a quick trial followed by execution. The most common form of execution is beheading; the head is taken by the priests and incinerated in a furnace along with certain aromatic herbs. Magical tomes and implements are usually thrown into the furnace alongside the heads.

Priests warn against dealing with the Eternals as demonic agents of Dumon. Magicians who deal with Eternals are subject to hanging, drawing and quartering when they are uncovered.

Look and Feel

The strongest influence of the costume of the Iron Confederacy is 12th- or 13th-century Norman (wikipedia has a passable reference here). Their knights wear chain, fight with kite shields, and wear the iconic nasal helm. They top the entire thing off with brightly coloured surcoats or tabards in the colours of their noble house. Plate is less common than in the Empire, and usually a sign of nobility.

Noble heraldry is much more rigid than that used in Imperial nations such as Dawn or the Marches; each duchy has a simple livery that is generally two colours, favouring dark shades. These are often combined in simple geometric shapes. Each Duchy has a single image that is strongly associated with it and appears regularly on surcoats, banners. Commonly known symbols are the raven, the wolf's head, and the coiling dragon. While a shield may bear this heraldry, it is much more common for the shield to be unadorned or daubed with a simple symbol, in preference for a finely coloured surcoat or tabard

Knights of the High Temple favour heater shields over kite shields, and are more likely to wear mithril plate over heavy steel chain. They wear surcoats or tabards of a single colour, rather than the dual-colours that represent allegiance to a noble house.

Both men and women wear their hair long, often tying it back in a long strip of cloth. The wimple sees extensive use, especially among older women.

A common element in both noble and peasant costume is a short cloak, worn over one shoulder and secured with a brooch.

Priests tend to a slightly more Roman-inspired look. They wear loose single-coloured robes or long tunics and invariably cover their heads with a wimple or long cotton shawl. Some go so far as to cover their entire face with a veil or shawl, in honour of the god-king Kavol. Priests almost invariably wield staves, and never bear weapons longer than a dagger or wear armour.

Peasants wear whatever scraps of leather and wool they can get together, often in the form of shapeless smocks with hose and sandals.

The Iron Confederacy in Play

The Confederacy lies near to the Empire, and the Suranni speak the language known as Imperial, represented by English. Some of their more archaic terms and words may have their roots in real-world French (represented in-character as one of the tongues of the Asavean Archipelago).

On the whole, the Suranni do not like the Empire. Imperials tend to consider them to be one step removed from barbarians, backwards feudalists who give up all control of their destiny to a patently fictional pantheon of 'gods' and enforce brutal, oppressive 'justice' to keep their people under control. The Suranni, in turn, characterise the Imperials as weak, fractious milksops who lack the courage to face reality unless they are in a drug-induced stupor and allow cowardly politicians to chain their warriors in bonds of paper and formality. They haven't even got a proper legal system, and they have so little gold that they have to make their coins out of tin!

It doesn't help that the Suranni (and indeed, arguably, the Empire) are convinced that they have a 'heavenly mandate' (or 'manifest destiny') to rule and that their way of life represents the pinnacle of human achievement.

The information here should be sufficient to create a character with a background connection to the Iron Confederacy. While the Confederacy largely dislikes the empire and does not engage in much trade, that is not to say that individual duchies are entirely anti-Imperial in nature. Some of the northern duchies have a history of trading with the Freeborn, and at least one of the coastal duchies sends regular vessels north to Sarvos, Temeschwar and The Marches.

There are no ports in the Iron Confederacy that are currently open to Imperial trade, but you could represent connections to the Iron Confederacy with a business that diversifies into ambergelt or green iron - although this is likely to make the most sense in the Brass Coast, Sarvos, Temeschwar or the Marches.

While they are not barbarians (at the moment) the Confederacy as a whole makes little secret of its dislike of the Empire. Even a connection to one of the ducal families is likely to be of limited use. By living in the Empire, a character has effectively cut ties with their family, and may well be treated as a traitor regardless of their motivation for being in the Empire. A much more likely characterisation would be one where your family left the Confederacy (quite possibly by stealth) a generation or so ago to avoid the oppressive regime - or to escape punishment for a crime. This might be especially appropriate for a character with the magician skill which is grounds for execution or imprisonment in the unenlightened Confederacy.

A background that would require you to have further information about the religion of the Iron Confederacy or its gods is unlikely to be approved. The nature of the Suranni deities is intentionally left vague, and precisely how their divine blessings work is a secret that is intended to unfold in play, not in a 'secret briefing sheet'.

Iron Raptors

Overview

The Iron Raptors is a clearing house for difficult and dangerous work. Private citizens with money who want barbarians driven back from their lands, bandits cleared from their roads or monsters removed from their forests will pay the Raptors to find someone to attempt the job. The Raptors collect these commissions and take them to Anvil where they look to hire heroes, glory-hunters, and mercenaries willing to take a few risks.

The work is dangerous and poorly paid. Despite this the Raptors are rarely short of warriors willing to take their coin. A few crowns is too low a price for any sane man or woman to risk her life, but the hired Raptors are able to keep any valuables acquired in the course of the work - provided it is legitimate bounty - and that can be enough to make the meagre pay worth the risk.

More likely most folk who hire on with the Raptors are young, desperate or both. Anvil is overwhelming for citizens coming to their first summit and it is a sorry truth that folk looking to get ahead will hire on with the Raptors in the belief that the enterprise offers them a chance to make a name for themselves. In a world where everyone is busy with their own business, the Raptors offer an open door and a warm welcome to anyone who looks like they can swing a sword or cast a spell.

Over the course of the Raptors' chequered history, a few who have hired on with them have done fabulously well. Those who run the Raptors are quick to tell tales of a few lucky souls who won extraordinary wealth - and while the tales are older than the hills - the lure of striking rich on a job is enough to convince the ambitious and the greedy to sign on.

The Raptors even claim that some who sign up with them do so to serve the interests of the Empire. A Dawnish knight-errant might hire on with the Raptors as a way to win glory slaying a wolf in the dark forests of Varushka. A band of Highguard guardians might sign up to fight off bandits or barbarians simply for the satisfaction of knowing their work makes the Empire safer and more prosperous. Most folk keep their reasons to themselves and those who run the Raptors rarely bother to ask too many questions.

History

The Iron Raptors were originally a band of Varushkan wagon raiders. They took advantage of an opportunity to make money by serving as middle-men, rather than by spilling their own blood directly. By bringing skilled individuals together with rich people with problems that needed solving, they were able to afford a comfortable lifestyle - and accept many more contracts than they could hope to fulfill by themselves.

The Iron Raptors tend to come and go at Anvil. Most years they have a prominent position in the market place - but when work dries up and there is no profit to be made, they may not show up for years on end. They were absent in the first year after Britta's death, but they have returned to Anvil now that the Empire is reestablishing itself and the wheels of commerce are once again turning.

The Magistrates keep a close eye on the Raptors - it would be easy for the jobs they peddle to cross the line that separates a citizen from a criminal. For their part most Raptors try to stay the right side of the law and make themselves available to the magistrates when needed. The work is hard enough without adding any trouble with the militia.

On occasions the Raptors have worked for the Military Council - offering soldiers, battle mages and scouts for vital missions. More commonly though the Military Council is able to handpick volunteers for these essential missions and prefers to remain aloof from these mercenaries.

The Bourse is a more reliable ally. Affluent men and women all too often have reason to hire those who will risk their lives for money. The existence of the Raptors is useful to those who can afford the fees. As a result they have often publicly defended the Raptors when something has gone amiss.

The Synod tends to have mixed relationships with the Raptors. Notable priests of Wisdom have publicly decried the tragedy of sending young citizens to their death in foolhardy death or glory missions. But other priests have been just as quick to point out the virtue in the Raptors' work - ambitious prosperous citizens of the Empire courageously seeking their fortune in the world.... in some ways the Raptors are just a metaphor for the Empire itself.

Raptors in Play

The Empire setting describes many dangers - raids into barbarian lands, attacks on bandit strongholds and battles with the creatures that lurk in the dark recesses of the Empire. The Raptors will help to bring this aspect of the setting to the fore by giving players - especially new players - a chance to risk life and limb in the dangerous wilds of the Empire. It is a chance for high adventure, for glory and for the more worldly - for some rings and crowns that will help you pay for your way in Anvil.

You will be able to find the Raptors in the market place, opposite the tavern. The Iron Raptors are effectively mercenaries though they have nothing to do with the battles and wars of the Empire leaving that work to the League Free Companies. The kind of plots accessible through the Raptors are especially designed to appeal to new players who have not yet got involved with the politics of the Empire where a chance for adventure and reward appeals. For those with everything to gain - or nothing to lose - the Raptors offers a chance for adventure and glory.

Iron and wine

Maria expertly sucked the olive from round its stone and spat the pit into the purple-and-gold water below.

Some of the dancing phantasmal horses that had been called up by one of the Reckoner covens were still prancing and turning on the surface of the river - albeit with a lot less definition. She expertly spat the pit so it passed through the forehead on a particularly fine stallion, and felt a rush of satisfaction as it exploded into shimmering droplets of water and mist.

She was more than a little tipsy. It had been a good night, but she was considering retiring now. There had been no fireworks for nearly half an hour, and even the musicians back in the main hall were beginning to become a little unsteady - probably more due to the drinks they had been putting away than due to exhaustion. She tried to decide if she wanted more more drink before bed, and whether she was prepared to endure another half hour of political maneuvering from the other guests to get it.

The decision was made for her. Quick, slim fingers plucked the spent glass from her hand and tossed it into the river, replacing it with a fresh glass of something tall, translucent and gold. Luija slumped heavily against the parapet next to her, and took a big sip of her own dark violet concoction. She set the half-full ambergelt goblet down on the smooth marble of the railing, and pushed her golden mask up onto the top of her head, dislodging several of her butterfly hair pins. She was flushed, and sweaty. She mopped her face, and snapped open a small practical fan to try and cool herself down.

"I thought you might have taken refuge out here," she said as Maria took a sip of her drink. It was surprisingly refreshing - a hint of apple and orange companionably mixing with more than a subtle suggestion of strong spirits. "It is far too damned hot in there."

Maria made a face. "No, it wasn't the heat. Bloody d'Bauser will not take a hint, even when it's wrapped around a fairly pointed insult and jabbed into that gut of his."

Luija winced. "Oh dear. Still on at you about that Temeschwar business?"

Maria nodded. "Yes. And some new madness of Duke Ferrero's. And of course the election. He kept trying to bribe me into going to Anvil to support him as Senator. Can you imagine d'Bauser as Senator for Tassato? They'd eat him alive!"

Luiga paused at her fanning for a moment, coincidentally covering her mouth with her fan. "I was talking to a delightful little naga just this evening who reckons that d'Bauser is being funded by the vyig."

Maria was not surprised, but neither was she entirely convinced.

"Yes, but people say that about everyone from Temeschwar. And d'Basuer is too much of an idiot even for those tattooed thugs. Anyway, I thought they were all done and dusted?"

Luija made a noncommittal noise. Before Maria could ask for more details, her Prince suddenly burst out laughing.

"Oh my! Maria! Could you imagine dear Cesares face if d'Bauser actually turned up to try and challenge him?"

Maria could, just about, it made her smile. Cesare Sanguineo Rezia Di Tassato, Senator of the Twin City, had cleverly managed to get himself named to oversee the collection and expenditure of funds for the grand celebrations. She could not fault his commitment to excess. The wise had marked fairly quickly that there were as many posters of Cesare looking stately - nay, regal - in his role as "Prince of the League" as there were banners and flags with Empress Lisabetta's face on them. It had been his idea to dye the Vassa with wine and gilding - and his idea to shower bunting across the entire city. Golden horns in Mestra, red foxes in Regario. There was a man of ambition. A man to watch. The two sipped their drinks companionably for a few moments, then Maria furrowed her brow and asked:

"Did you and he ever ..." she left the sentence hanging.

Prince Luija composed her features into a coy look. "A lady does not brag about such matters, and another lady should not speculate."

"Yes," said Maria. "But this particular lady knows you have a fondness for rugged cambions, so"

Luija smiled, but she made the subtle gesture with her fan that meant "I would like to change the conversation", and Maria complied.

"Actually, on a related topic, I've been thinking about the Empress' message. Especially with the barbarian practically at our door, as it were. I think we should do something."

Luija nodded, gestured "go on" with her fan. Pulled a piece of yellow fruit out of her drink, inspected it owlshly for a moment, then flicked it into the river.

"Before d'Basuer turned up, I was talking to Pesca. She knows someone who knows someone at military procurement. We make a reasonable profit through potion sales to the rich, but I think that if we invested slightly in refitting the Temple Street shop a little, we could look at a different market. The soldiers of the Empire are forever being injured - stabbed, cut, shot with arrows, bludgeoned, hacked, trampled, gored -"

She realised she was just listing ways a soldier could be injured and realised she was a good deal more tipsy than she had at first thought. With an effort she stopped talking and took a breath.

"Anyway. Pesca thinks - and I agree - that we could negotiate a pretty good deal with the civil service to supply the big five potions - the easy ones everyone knows how to make but nobody ever makes in bulk. Bulk for potions, I mean obviously. With our contacts in Feroz and Madruga, and with Pesca keeping an eye out for good deals at the Apothecary House, we could make a reasonable profit, I think."

Luija had been nodding along for several moments as she spoke.

"I like it, but ... we make enough as it is. Would the profits really be worth the effort?"

Maria pondered for a moment. "Not really," she said slowly. "But ... there are other benefits. Once you have your feet under the table at military procurement you're in a better position to secure other opportunities. We'd be known as people supporting the Empire, and that never hurts not with the Jotun just over the horizon. But really ... well ... destiny. The Empress ... you know."

She trailed off, blushing. Prince Luija chuckled, but gently.

"Yes, yes I do know. I do indeed know." She pulled her mask back down, resettled her hair, and extended an arm for her sister who slipped her own through it companionably.

"Look into it first thing in the morning." Luija looked Maria over, checked herself. "First thing tomorrow afternoon, I meant to say. Now! Let's go and see if we can't snag ourselves a couple of ambitious nephilim to make sure the evening ends with a bang!"

Laughing together, the sisters returned to the party, leaving their empty glasses balanced on the stone wall above the wine-red river.

The coronation of Empress Lisabetta took place at Anvil during the Summer Solstice. Crowned with a wreath of flowers, rather than with the Imperial Crown, before the assembled leaders of the Empire, she formally became the twentieth Throne of the Empire in a glorious and touching ceremony. Celebrations quickly spread across the entire Empire, inspired by the Empress' coronation address and supported by funds donated by private citizens, the Imperial Senate, and the Imperial Synod alike.

Proud, loyal and prosperous Imperial Citizens, now is a time to join together in joy and celebration, the like of which has not been seen in our lifetimes! But let us not forget, in the midst of our revelry, that our necessary wars have a terrible cost in Imperial lives. I ask that all of us act howsoever we can, to stem this tide of Imperial blood. Let us ensure that our sisters and brothers, fathers and mothers, daughters and sons, may continue to fight on in pursuit of our Empire's great destiny.

The Senator for Tassato, Cesare Sanguineo Rezia Di Tassato, took the lead in arranging disbursement of funds to help these celebrations spread joyous festivity across the entire Empire. The impressive five-hundred Thrones raised at Anvil encourages private benefactors from all the nations to reach into their own pockets and supplement those monies with donations of their own.

The celebrations begin extravagant, but rapidly expand to become legendary in scope.

Revelry in the League

Unsurprisingly, four League cities lead the way with a week of non-stop revelry that allows nothing so paltry as the rising or the setting of the sun to curtail their festival. Given the location of the cities, it would be a mistake to think that the revelry in the League is only for the League. Citizens from all nearby nations are welcomed to the cities to enrich the festivities.

The citizens of Tassato Mestra and Tassato Regario (as always) compete to outdo each other but under the guidance of Prince Cesare the festivities are not marred by unnecessary levels of violence. Indeed, between them, they manage to turn the Vassa purple-and-gold as far south as the Sapphire Stair through a combination of prodigious amounts of red wine, and gilding from Imperial Mint, thrown into the river.

*Let us join our souls in song, Let us sing together
In honour of our Empress, crowned in rose and heather
Sing with us, sing her name, Empress Lisabetta
Anvil forges steel her heart, Holberg's walls protect her
Battle tempers her resolve to tread the path ahead her
Everybody sing her name, Empress Lisabetta
The virtues always guide her thoughts,
Her actions guide the Empire
Through courage and ambition
May the Empire thrive forever*

*All the nations sing her name, Empress Lisabetta
Vivier Iskander van Temeschwar*

Some celebrants focus on the Empress' well known affection for Empress Richilde, seeing this as an opportunity to focus on matters of art and culture. A group of citizens in Holberg works feverishly to complete a great frieze, celebrating the Empress who many see as a patron of their city. In Temeschwar, a beautiful statue of the eternal Janon commissioned by Lorenzo La Volpe of the Bloody Butchers has little effect itself but does inspire discussion of the role of public art in a city traditionally considered more dour and brutalist than their cousins in the other cities. A song written by Vivier Iskander van Temeschwar, commissioned specially for the celebrations, proves extremely popular ensuring that Vivier's name is heard throughout the League and in the more civilized parts of the Empire as a whole.

Down in Sarvos, even the accursed statue of Mirislav in Caricomare gets involved in the festivities. Where once the statue possessed the scandalous, conspiratorial mien of a snake-person, it now shows the ex-Senator smiling triumphantly mounting a set of stairs with an oddly reflective coin in one hand and a lantern in the other. No sculptor claims credit for the alterations, and so it has been simply chalked up as yet another miraculous occurrence by the residents of Caricomare.

Across the Empire

From the League, the celebrations spill out across the Empire. Every nation places their own unique stamp on the festivities, whether it is drifts of enchanted lightstones illuminating the night sky in Urizen, or great fairs and competitions in the Marches. It almost goes without saying that a Grand Tourney is held in Dawn, on the fields surrounding the Castle of Thorns. Despite the lingering influence of the curse on Astolat, troubadours whisper that this tourney has never been matched before, certainly not since the days of Empress Richilde ... and perhaps not even then.

People will talk about the celebrations following the coronation of Empress Lisabetta for decades to come.

Beyond the Empire

Not only the citizens of the Empire participate in these celebrations. The rest of the world takes note, albeit in a more restrained fashion. The foreign ambassadors leave the embassies - with the notable exception of the Sumaah embassy - and merchants from the Commonwealth, Asavea, Jarm, Sarcophan, Faraden, Axos, and even the Iron Confederacy make small fortunes providing the festivities with foreign delicacies from across the world. While Sumaah does not take part in the celebrations, the dour ambassador preaches a sermon on the steps of the in Necropolis in which they readily admit that if nothing else the Empire understands the role of celebration in the path of Prosperity.

The scope of the festivities is sufficient to attract the attention even of the eternal realms, especially Summer and Night. Barien opens a regio near the Semmerstones, and welcomes the nobles and yeomen of Dawn to attend a grand fair where heralds of all the competing Summer kingdoms rub shoulders under a flag of truce. Sadogua and Janon both waste no time in unleashing as many of their heralds as can travel to the Empire, to join the celebrations with gifts of strange liquor and exotic fruits. Prospero, Sovereign Lord of the City of Bridges, sends his heralds to Meade, to Siroc, and to the cities of the League, to join in the festivities, and a quiet trade in small favours weaves and wends through the drunken streets.

To grant 30 Thrones from the Virtue Fund towards the Empire-Wide coronation celebrations. The bulk of the costs are being met by private donations but we believe this endeavour should be supported by the Synod also. It will lead to lasting benefits for our Empire.

Astrid Fjellrevening Rezia di Tassato

Significance

However extravagant and exotic the celebrations become, they are guided by the celebratory message of Empress Lisabetta. Supported by the legendary festivities, there can be nobody in all the ten nations who has not heard this message and given at least some sort to what it might mean

The Empress' message seems quite clear on two points. That the Empire is engaged in necessary wars, in pursuit of its grand destiny; and that the Empire must do whatever it can to stem the flow of Imperial blood being spilled by the barbarian foe. The effects of this message on the people of the Empire are subtle, but far reaching.

Physicks and Healers

There are a number of skilled physicks, chirurgeons, and healers who are not combatants. Since the celebrations, many of these skilled practitioners of life-giving medicine have been filled with a fervor to help the Imperial armies. Furthermore, young magicians are choosing to focus their studies on the magics that preserve life - heal, restore limb, and purify]. These doctors and magicians turn their attention to supporting the Empress' vision of Imperial destiny - expanding the Empire while doing everything in their power to reduce the cost in Imperial lives that must be spent to achieve it.

Going forward, a new basic army order will be permanently available to all Imperial armies (but not navies). This is an attacking order, and will always cause a military campaign to be initiated in the territory if there is an opposing force present. If an attacking force is victorious - they will capture land - the greater the victory the more land they will take in a season.

Steady Conquest

- Casualties suffered by this army are reduced by a fifth
- Casualties inflicted by this army are reduced by a fifth
- Only Imperial armies may take this order.

Every army is now accompanied by a cadre of battlefield physicks and chirurgeons, and magicians skilled in healing magic, who are more than prepared to take risks to help minimize Imperial losses. By adapting strategies to make the most use of these resources, a general can ensure no part of the army is ever too far away from skilled medical attention. At the same time, the general ensures that the soldiers in their army eschew risky tactics, or those that would lead to unnecessary loss of life, in pursuit of spilling enemy blood.

Steady conquest is as effective as balanced attack in claiming enemy territory and securing strategic objectives, but significantly reduces the casualties suffered by the army - at the cost of inflicting less casualties on enemy forces. This order became possible after the coronation of the twentieth Throne, Empress Lisabetta, when Imperial strategy was reassessed in the light of significant losses inflicted by the barbarian orcs.

Opportunity: The Quality of Mercy

In addition, there is significant interest among more battle-hardened healers in doing their part to help the Empire. From the grimnir of Wintermark, to the herb masters of Navarr and Highguard, to the warmage healers of Urizen, to the weavers and war-witches of Dawn, there are folk in every nation who are no strangers to warfare and have experienced first hand the need for reliable, skilled healing on the battlefield.

The Imperial Senate could take advantage of this interest to encourage the battlefield healers of one of the Imperial nations to focus their attentions on a single army. One existing Imperial army may be chosen to be the focus of this interest - representing Imperial support for the war healers of that nation. A motion of the Imperial Senate can select an existing army that over the coming season will lose its current army quality and instead permanently gain the physick quality. There would be no cost to the Empire, and with the aid of the civil service the change can be made without impeding the chosen army's ability to campaign.

To take advantage of this opportunity, a senator would need to raise a motion in the Senate that the Empire should make this change. At the next senate meeting, any senator would be able to put forward an army as a candidate (following the same guidelines as an appointment by the Senate).

While there is a great deal of interest in the armies this season, that interest will quickly wane. This opportunity remains available only until the end of the current Imperial year (380YE), so if no decision has been reached before the end of the Winter Solstice (the first event next year), the opportunity is wasted.

Participation

Obviously the grand celebrations take place in downtime, which is one of the reasons we have glossed over the specifics of how each nation made those celebrations their own. We encourage anyone who enjoys such things to come up with their own stories of extravagantly excessive festivities their characters might have thrown or participated in.

Ironbound Axe

Description

The vicious Ironbound Axe most often takes the form of a heavy one-handed battleaxe. Historically, they have been most popular in Varushka where they can provide a significant edge in fights against Wolves. Indeed, many creatures of this sort can be dispatched with a single mighty blow from an Ironbound Axe or similar potent weapon. It is equally useful, of course, when fighting enemies of a more mortal provenance, especially magicians and lightly armoured skirmishers. Properly employed, it can hobble an opponent or leave them incapable of wielding a weapon, implement, or shield - some wielders wax lyrical about its versatility.

The weapon takes several forms, but whether it is an axe, a sword, or a mace it usually appears dangerous and utilitarian. As a mace it is called a Schlacta's Fist, while as a sword it is known as a Limbhewer's Blade or Bloodthirsty Spatha. The weapon tends to have a brutal, utilitarian appearance and is rarely decorated. It is often marked with the Wintermark runes Verys or Tykonus, although a few artisans prefer to use the much more sinister Naeve or Yoorn. Over time, these weapons often become stained with the blood they have shed, and no amount of cleaning will remove it. Artefact versions, or Ironbound Axes that have been repeatedly reforged, often turn completely black over time from the amount of blood they have absorbed. Some superstitious warriors claim that the weapons somehow feed on the suffering of those who are maimed by blows struck with them - and that leaving a crippled foe alive makes the weapon "happy" in some indefinable way.

The ability to deliver crippling blows also made them the weapon of choice for captains and officers associated with the fearsome Iron Helms army. Stories are still told of Hunger (or Golod as it was known originally), the artefact weapon wielded by the generals of the Iron Helms since before the founding of the Empire. The deadly waraxe is said to have been carried by the hero Mihaela Malinovia when she "fell from the heavens" along with the other Vard. It was wielded in the battles against the Ushkan people, and passed down from hero to hero through Varushkans often troubled history. Today, it is believed to be in the possession of the Malinov family of Karsk who claimed it when the Iron Helms were disbanded in the reign of Empress Mariika. Only cursory efforts were ever made to recover the item for the Empire - it is said that it is so old and has shed so much blood that it has developed a dark spirit that urges its wielders to commit unspeakable acts in pursuit of their goals. Perhaps the Empire is better off without it.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of a one-handed weapon.
- Requirement: Any character can bond to this item.
- Effect: Three times per day, you may call CLEAVE with this one-handed weapon.
- Roleplaying Effect: You feel an urge to cripple or maim anyone who opposes you. The more this weapon is used to kill living foes, the stronger this urge becomes.
- Materials: Crafting an Ironbound Axe requires fifteen units of orichalcum, nine ingots of green iron, and five measures of beggar's lye. It takes one month to make one of these items.

Ironbrand Thorn

Description

Sometimes called a Greensteel Spear, these weapons have a long history of being carried by Navarri brands. Service to the wandering nation is a difficult calling and those who bear it require a determined spirit. These spears bolster the soul bonded to them, often feeling reassuringly solid in their owner's hand. Some brands have likened their presence to that of a faithful companion, ever ready to defend and reassure their masters. While bonded to such a spear, brands find it a little easier to shrug off malicious influences which might drive them to fail in their duty to their people. These spears are sometimes decorated with patterns reflecting the wielder's tattoos and brands to strengthen the bond between them. Historians agree that a Greensteel Spear was the weapon used by Isaella to murder the mad Emperor Nicovar in 209 YE.

These spears also find favour in Urizen. They are well-suited to the precise style of battle practised in the citadels and aid the wielder in mastering themselves, encouraging mental clarity and versatility rather than providing brute force. In some spires, the spearheads are made from particularly clear pieces of tempest jade and are known as Stormeye Spears, reminding the wielder to maintain a calm thoughtfulness even in the chaos of battle. During their manufacture, the tempest jade is gently smoothed into shape using water from the purest mountain springs and after using their spears in battle, sentinels are encouraged to cleanse the spears with water from the same spring, removing all traces of blood and filth, to maintain both the blade's quality and their own mental purity. Naturally Cavul, the Rune of Purity, is worked into many of these spears.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of a one-handed spear.
- Requirement: You must have the weapon master skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: You gain one additional hero point.
- Materials: Crafting an Ironbrand Thorn requires ten ingots of green iron and four ingots of tempest jade. It takes one month to make one of these items.

"This spear was made for you by the smiths of the striding. It cost time, sweat, and precious resources. Properly wielded, it will make someone into a hero, and a hero into a legend. It is fitting that the first blood it tastes should be yours, so that you shall know the marks of its thorns all your days."

Irira Harah

Eternal of Spring

Sobriquets

Irira Harah is known as the Prince with a thousand foes. He is generally referred to with the masculine pronoun, but like all Spring Eternals actually lacks strong concepts of gender.

Several scholars believe that the Eternal itself has never actually made an appearance, and that he always speaks through a Herald. In parts of Varushka Irira Harah is called Papa Otec, and those who wish to protect their children from the dangers of the Varushkan wilderness may seek his favour. He is also known as Guard of the Young, and some Imperial Orcs call him as Thorn of the Ancestors and Shackle Smasher. He is associated with an idolatrous cult who call him The Golden Hare and wear icons of that animal as a badge of membership.

The Sumaah Republic and Commonwealth alike proscribe contact with this Eternal. In the Asavean Archipelago he is known as il Odioso which means the Hateful One - he is associated with various slave revolts and allegedly supports nations subject to Asavean rule against their masters. In the Sarcophan Delves they call him the Prince of Beggars and his heralds are known to occasionally assist both the dregs of Sarcophan society and those tribes the beggar-kings seek to exploit.

Appearance

Irira Harah is invariably young, and takes the form of a humanoid with strong briar lineage. He is usually dressed in leather armour, and carries a one-handed spear and a shield. Any equipment he bears is woven from briars, vines, branches and leaves - occasionally it will include elements such as stone or polished flint but it rarely includes any metal. On occasion he appears in a less martial aspect, in which case he wears clothing appropriate to that of a slave, outsider or oppressed people.

The Prince with a Thousand Foes appears in a number of very ancient stories told to children. In such tales, he appears as a child, rabbit or sparrow, and usually encounters a creature clearly based on the Eternal Arhallogen which wishes to eat him. Through cunning, deception and Courage Irira Harah escapes or in rare circumstances defeats Arhallogen. It is believed that this enmity is reflected in reality - given Arhallogen is the epitome of the strong predator and Irira Harah epitomizes the weak and preyed upon, this is unsurprising.

Scholars are uncertain what Irira Harah's "true" form may look like - it is speculated that it is a wild expanse of bramble-choked, wild woodland in the same way that Yaw'nagrah is a mighty forest or Llofir is a region of fungus.

Concerns

Irira Harah is extremely sophisticated - for a Spring Eternal. It is concerned with the oppressed, the silenced and the powerless. Early tales suggest that Irira Harah's interest in the weak and the conquered has grown throughout history and that initially its concerns revolved mostly around survival by any means. Even today, Irira Harah will tend to suggest that the truly weak flee rather than offer armed resistance to overwhelming force. When the weak must fight, he encourages them to use any weapon at their disposal, and win by any means necessary to secure their safety.

He has neither interest in nor time for the strong, mighty and powerful; they can look after themselves. His primary concern is with the physically weak who must use tools other than personal strength to survive in a hostile world. As his concerns have matured, he has increasingly encouraged the downtrodden to stand up for themselves and question their lot in life. Some are encouraged to leave dangerous situations - there are a few minor anecdotes that suggest one of the Landskeepers involved in the Marcher exodus from Dawn spent time communicating with Irira Harah. Others are encouraged to take up arms against tyrants or rulers who deny them freedoms they themselves take for granted. It appears to not entirely understand the concept of peaceful resistance, but approves of the use of activism, rhetoric and social change by those who are lucky enough to live in civilised nations where such things are possible.

He is not concerned about fighting people's battles for them, but it concerned with giving people the ability to stand up for themselves. He will rarely help those in power or with status, but will often help those who are fighting to survive struggling. Irira Harah is also concerned about defending children and providing for them, and his vengeance about those who abuse or undervalue children is legendary. He is interested in the Empire, however, and was happy to help the Imperial Orcs when they were fighting to be accepted.

The Prince with a Thousand Foes strongly encourages the protection of the next generation and the preservation of the young. Irra Harah believes strongly that children should be protected at all times; everyone should ensure that children are preserved from physical dangers and raised with the cleverness and cunning to ensure they survive to have children of their own. Anyone who cannot have, or chooses not to have, children should spend time protecting and strengthening their pack, tribe, clan or family.

During the Orc revolt, several slave-magicians were able to meet with Heralds of Irra Harah and gain boons that helped them support their allies, destroy slaver stockades and the like - one common boon was a cudgel that smashed chains apart. During the Orc revolt, Irra Harah was placed under Declaration of enmity by the Imperial Conclave; the declaration persisted through the events of the Freedom Heresy - the Eternal made no attempt to hide its support for the briars and by extension the atrocities they committed in the name of their personal freedom. This decision of the Conclave apparently made no interest to the Eternal at all, who continued to use whatever power it could to interfere in the Empire.

The declaration was overturned in 368YE; the Heralds of Irra Harah offered valuable assistance to several communities besieged by barbarians - they helped citizens in Reikos, Spiral, Liathaven and the Mournwold to escape orc attackers, and several Navarr steadings in Liathaven are still receiving sporadic aid.

Boons

This Eternal wishes those who are fighting to better themselves and to improve themselves. He generally only helps when the chips are down and people have nowhere else to go. Gifts from Irra Harah tend to be straightforward; the most common take the form of simple items made of natural materials that contain properties that heal, empower or protect. Weapons are less common boons, and they generally have properties that smash enemy defences or weapons or cripple enemy combatants.

Irra Harah is also known to grant boons that smash structures designed to contain or imprison people, or that enhance rituals with similar effects. Likewise, he encourages mortals to fight back by whatever means they can against powerful opponents - poison, venom and vicious curses are all appropriate weapons to use to free or protect oneself and one's family.

On occasion, Irra Harah also offers boons that will help an underdog take the first steps towards prosperity or at least prevent starvation or disaster. There are sporadic tales of sudden bursts of fertility for otherwise barren farms that allow a bumper harvest, or a sequence of inexplicable multiple-births in the herd of domestic or hunted animals that allow a group on the verge of starvation to not only survive the winter but sell their surplus to improve their position

The curses of Irra Harah are varied and unobtrusive; those who harm children, in particular, will discover their own flesh sloughing from their bones and eventually face a gruesome death.

If you cannot hide, run.

If you cannot run, yield.

If you will not yield, kill.

Irremais

The Blade, Rune of Wisdom

Contents

Affiliated with the Winter Realm

Irremais is the Blade, the knife that flenses away foolishness and self-deception until what remains can truly be called wise. Irremais is a hard tutor and its lessons are comfortless - the rune teaches us to learn from our mistakes, to see the world around us as it truly is, and to cast all comforting falsehoods and illusions to one side. Although it shares some superficial similarities to Sular, rune of Discovery, Irrimais represents the wisdom that comes from life's hard experience, not the process of searching for an academic or absolute truth.

- 1 The Blade, Rune of Wisdom
 - 1.1 Using Irremais in magic
 - 1.2 Crafting with Irremais
 - 1.3 For Machine Embroidery

As wisdom increases, so too is innocence lost, and Irremais also represents the hard transition from childhood (both literal and figurative) into adulthood and from adulthood into old age. The road to wisdom is a hard one, and the price to travel it is high; but for those who are willing to stay the course, the reward is a deep and fulfilling understanding of the reality of the universe.

Irremais is sometimes called the Rune of Sacrifice – by stripping away or abandoning what is unnecessary, the individual becomes wiser. It is also occasionally called the Rune of Punishment – it represents the idea that by sparing the rod, the child is spoiled. The best punishments teach or rehabilitate the wrongdoer, and where they inflict suffering they do so for their own good.

Suaq legend relates that Irremais was the first daughter of Sermerssuaq, who walks among the tribes of her brothers and sisters to pass on the wisdom she took from her mother's womb. Cautionary tales tell that those who listen grow strong and prosper; those who do not starve, freeze and perish on the ice. She shares her names with the Irremais root, a famously bitter tasting herb used as a purgative.

Using Irremais in magic

Irremais is invoked in the attempt to augment or search for wisdom, such as the detect magic spell, as well as in rituals designed to punish or rehabilitate a criminal or transgressor. It is popular with savants and scholars, as well as with magistrates and others involved in the even-handed enforcement of law.

Crafting with Irremais

In Urizen, some magi wear it between their brows on a headband or circlet to absorb its power although those who do so, rather than using one of the Day runes, are sometimes considered a little reckless. As a rune that signifies “putting away childish things” it is often inscribed on a gift for a son or daughter on successfully completing their test of adulthood.

Irrepressible Monkey Spirit

Rules

Spring Magnitude 17

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets a character, who must be present throughout.

This spell is an enchantment. A target may only be under one enchantment effect at a time.

Effects

Twice each day the target can use their choice of unstoppable or relentless as if they know them and without spending any hero points. They can choose each time they use this ability which skill to employ.

In addition the target experiences a roleplaying effect: you feel exuberant, energetic and enthusiastic; you become bored easily, and frustrated by any period of inaction or extended concentration. You may choose to respond to any roleplaying effect that would cause you to become weary, despondent or sad by instead becoming exceptionally energetic and immediately doing something as exuberantly as possible.

The effect lasts until the start of the next Profound Decisions Empire event.

Additional Targets

This ritual can affect additional characters from the same banner. Each additional character increases the magnitude by 13. Additional characters must be present throughout.

Description

This ritual was first recorded by the Freeborn magician Sagai i Tobera i Guerra, who spent much of his earlier life as a member of a kohan band, and his middle years as a corsair. In later life he extended his studies to embrace ritual magic, and eventually rose to prominence as the Spring Archmage of the conclave. He helped codify this ritual shortly before his death at the tragically young age of eight-nine.

This ritual draws on two themes; the spirit and vitality of youth, and the energy and vitality of Spring. It allows a warrior to heal themselves on the battlefield without the assistance of a physick, chirurgion or magician, extending their ability to be self-reliant.

Some magicians dislike the comparison between the warriors of the Empire and the frivolous monkey, despite Sagai's assertion that it is a fine totem for a ritual that grants its targets boundless enthusiasm and reserves of energy as well as the ability to bounce-back from serious injury. Some magicians prefer to refer to it as Unfailing Resilience of the Kudzu and it is referred to as such in many tomes, especially those used by the vates. In Wintermark there is a virtually identical ritual called The Inevitable Thaw while the dignified Highborn magisters employ a version they call The Unceasing Ocean.

Regardless, the ritual is popular with covens of Spring magicians looking for a versatile, if somewhat expensive, benefit to give an allied warrior that they see as being as useful as any Summer enchantment.

Common Elements

This ritual is often performed with exuberant and energetic music, incantations and dance in a style reminiscent of the traditional Guerra style, even if the coven is not made up of Freeborn ritualists. Invocations include drawing on the inevitable power of spring to breed life from dead or barren Winter soil, the mysterious power that surrounds the birth of new living beings, and in many cases the naming of energetic totem creatures such as monkeys. Even calm Urizen and restrained Highborn covens find it difficult not to invest this ritual with energy and exuberance.

Common elements include the rune of fertility; the evocation of The Fountain or The Stallion; a comedic or action-oriented scene with plenty of physical business; and images of horses, monkeys, and especially winged beasts.

Isaella

Virtue

In 213 YE, Isaella was declared an exemplar of the Virtue of Courage - despite some extremely vocal opposition from the Assembly of Loyalty.

Biography

Isaella was a Navarr thorn who served as the captain of Emperor Nicovar's personal guard. She is best known as the person who executed the mad Emperor at the height of his destructive rampage against the libraries of the Empire.

While she is most famous for that defining moment and its aftermath, her life leading up to that point is hardly uneventful. She spent most of her formative years in the western and south-western Empire, walking the trods with her parents through much of the Brass Coast and the southern Marches. She grew up an honest, forthright woman whose no-nonsense approach won her many admirers. She left her parents' striding at 17 to dedicate herself to fighting the enemies of the Empire, and over the next five years was involved in most of the major conflicts of the time both as a commander of thorns, and a true hero of the Empire.

Never particularly political, she often questioned the decisions of the Imperial Senate and Imperial Synod. She was several times approached about serving as General of the Black Thorns, but never showed any interest in high office preferring to fight her enemies face-to-face with shield and spear. There was never a shortage of volunteers to fight in her warband - her courage, and uncompromising nature inspired all those who fought alongside her.

In 205YE, Emperor Nicovar asked her to become the captain of his personal bodyguard and to the surprise of many, she accepted. She is believed to have thwarted at least one assassination attempt aimed at the Throne in 207YE, although official details are sketchy at best. Finally, in 209YE when Nicovar finally snapped, it was Isaella who struck him down during the siege of the School of Epistemology in Tassato. According to witnesses, she tried to reason with him first - asking him to turn aside what he was doing. When he refused, she is said to have killed him in the next breath. With a single blow of her spear, the Emperor fell. He made no effort to defend himself - taken completely by surprise. He was dead within moments.

Isaella then instructed the men and women of the Emperor's guard - her own soldiers - to arrest her and deliver her to a magistrate. The Imperial Synod attempted to plead Clemency on her behalf but she refused. According to one version of the story, she is said to have shamed the Synod by pointing out that they could have stopped Nicovar at any point but chose to allow him to continue his rampage in service to their own political goals - and she would not take their "mercy" because they had shown none to Nicovar, or to the Empire. She was duly found guilty of treason and executed.

The official account records that when her body was laid out to await an honour guard of Navarr to take it to the corpse glades of her people, it vanished along with her enchanted shield and the spear with which she struck down the Emperor. The shroud beneath which she rested is said to have gained a powerful spontaneous aura that urged all who held it to do what they knew to be right regardless of consequences - to this day the hallowing previously known as the Hallow of True Conviction is known as the Hallowing of Isaella's Resolve in her honour.

Her path to exemplarhood was not smooth - the Assembly of Loyalty in particular opposed her Recognition due to her obvious betrayal of the Throne she was sworn to protect. Her supporters argued that she was never disloyal - but that her loyalty was to the Empire, rather than to the one who sat on its Throne. To this day there are a few members of the Loyalty assembly who despise her name; but they are greatly outnumbered by those who praise her, and recognise her loyalty for what it was.

Signs

The Assembly of Courage cited the following signs of Isaella's exemplarhood:

- By putting an end to the madness of Emperor Nicovar when all others were paralysed by indecision and self-interest, Isaella demonstrated her Benevolence. Without her, it is likely Nicovar would not have stopped until the entire Empire was in flames.
- Isaella was a figure who truly inspired others. She had many students and companions in life, and since her death her bold action has inspired countless others to take a stand against corruption regardless of the cost.

Contents

- 1 Virtue
- 2 Biography
- 3 Signs
 - 3.1 Contentious Signs

- The disappearance of her body, and the spontaneous auras that remained in its wake, have been recognised as proof that she ascended after her death, proving that she achieved Liberation from the cycle of reincarnation.
- As both a Navarr and a member of Emperor Nicovar's entourage, Isaella made several Pilgrimages to the White City.

Contentious Signs

- Several Navarr priests spoke fervently about the Sacrifice that Isaella made - she stood by her actions in the face of certain conviction as a traitor. While the priests who spoke on her behalf were passionate, the Synod repeatedly reminded them that "sacrifice" is not a true sign of the paragon or exemplar. Despite that, their explanation that Isaella sacrificed herself to demonstrate her true loyalty - to the Empire as a whole rather than to the Emperor - went some way toward mollifying the outrage of the Assembly of Loyalty and is repeatedly referenced in historical works recounting the stories of the exemplars.
- Two other contentious signs have been debated with regard to Isaella. Her rejection of the Synod's offer of clemency, and her commitment to taking the consequences of her action, are often quoted as inspiring magistrates and members of the militia, and reinforcing the importance of the rule of law in the Empire - actions which are sometimes described as reflecting Salvation. Other supporters of Isaella claim that killing the Emperor with a single powerful blow, her bodily ascension, and the shroud she left behind are all Miracles. They also point to various incidents in her life as a warrior and claim that several of her escapes and victories were likewise miracles. The Synod has not upheld either of these claims - cynics suggest it is due to the long memories of the priests she allegedly denounced as cowards before her trial, and their disinclination to see her named a paragon.

Isenbrad

Virtue

Isenbrad was recognised as a paragon of Wisdom.

Biography

Isenbrad of the Steinr was a smith known for excellent judgement and good counsel. He quested with Godric against a terrible troll kingdom.

Upon loss of their weapons, he turned his legendary skills to shaping weapons of ice and carved the secrets of his art upon the walls of the cave using runes.

Signs

The assembly of Wisdom cited the following signs as demonstration of Isenbrad's paragonhood.

- His Legacy is the magic of the runes used throughout the Empire.
- He Inspires adventurers, artisans, and magicians to this day. When in a tight spot, many followers of the Way ask themselves "what would Isenbrad have done?"
- His tireless fight against the enemies of the people of Wintermark, his wise counsel, and his relentless commitment to the unity of the three people, are a demonstration of his Benevolence.
- His practicality, and his refusal to bow to tradition when innovation was required, lead to new ways of thinking among his people, setting them on a path to enlightenment. This is a clear sign of Salvation.
- The miraculous circumstances surrounding his death are a sign of Liberation.
- Among several other feats of magical prowess, Isenbrad is known for the Miracle of forging weapons from ice. This story demonstrates the power of using the tools at hand in a practical and unexpected way.

Isenbrad in Play

Controversies and Later History

- The miracle of forging weapons from ice is often contested by pragmatic secularists and virtuous histograms who argue that it is most likely a metaphor. Critics often quote the work of Hengist of Kalpaheim who argued that there are several locations in Wintermark where actual metal weapons are entombed in ice, and that this element of Isenbrad's story could well be a misinterpretation or misrepresentation of the paragon freeing such weapons from the ice where they were preserved.
- Isenbrad is credited with being the first runesmith, and bringing knowledge of the runes to the people of Wintermark. The true provenance of the runes, however, is a subject for some debate among theologians, runesmiths, and historians. There are questions about how the Jotun and Thule came to employ them - the accepted argument is that they learned them from the Winterfolk, but both barbarian tribes refute this explanation. Objects have been found from time to time that appear to date from before the time of Isenbrad yet bear obvious rune markings and are clearly the work of humans from the north-western Empire.
- As with several older paragons, scholars associated with the virtuous histogram school of thought point to the many stories of Isenbrad's innovation and suggest that this is a clear example of the inspirational actions of several real figures being ascribed to a paragon who may or may not have been a real person.

Ivory Aketon

Description

This padded jacket takes its name from its pale colour, rather than from any use of ivory in its construction. While the outer layers are thick cotton, it is padded inside with multiple layers of delicate silk. When the wearer is seriously injured, the silk serves to staunch the flow of blood, helped preserve life - at least for a time.

In the Brass Coast this armour is more commonly called an Ashwine Aketon, in honour of Gilda Ashwine, an exemplar of Courage whose unyielding determination to see justice served they see reflected in the dogged refusal of the wearer to let death take them. It is worth noting, however, that an Ashwine Aketon is usually dyed a pale golden-yellow colour as part of the creation process, for few people wealthy enough to afford one are inclined to wear white armour.

In the League certain troupes use these aketons while performing a dangerous stunt in the most famous, or infamous, scene in "The Fallen Herald." The scene traditionally lasts for over five minutes and involves the eponymous herald lying dying in the arms of their cicisbeo for the entire scene. For this reason it both the scene and the Aketon are known as The Cicisbeo's Embrace. The most ambitious and courageous performers use live weapons to inflict real injuries. There is somewhat of a competition between different troupes over who can endure longest death scene. Of course it would be shameful to have a performer die or be permanently injured during a performance, so there is always a Physick on hand. It is often supplemented with Tinctures of the Open Sky to make the performance last even longer.

Rules

- Form: Armour. Takes the form of a suit of light armour.
- Requirement: Any character can bond to this item.
- Effect: You gain three additional ranks in the fortitude skill.
- Materials: Crafting an Ivory Aketon requires ten measures of ambergelt, five ingots of weltsilver and three measures of beggar's lye. It takes one month to make one of these items.

Esmerelda's memories came back in a rush. The foreigners' captain was making a show of himself, supremely confident, bearing his chest to the Freeborn corsairs. He believed his archers would keep them suppressed. For the most part, he was right.

She waited for the third volley to strike, and leapt with feline grace into the rigging. She unstrung an arrow, nocked it, and aimed. The enemy's captain met her eye, and his laughing grin faltered. She loosed. It was the best shot she'd ever made.

Then she was here, and it was now, and apparently she should have drowned. "What happened? What in Ashwine's name happened?"

"Careful now, those Highborn we're ferrying get very upset when they hear swearing." So much so, in fact, that the captain had forbidden the use of swear-words among his crew for the voyage - and yet somehow, the missionaries only seemed to get more annoyed when they heard the names of the Paragons taken blithely in vain.

"You fell," the Hakima said, "After you leapt onto the rigging in defiance of volley after volley of arrow-fire. Your captain tried to stop you, but you seemed determined to make a pincushion of yourself, and so you did. We thought you'd gone overboard and were lost."

"We'd finished the fight by the time Iago i Jameel spotted you," the captain said, "Hanging off the side of the ship, head-down, leg broken, caught in the mainsail-rigging they cut with those blasted crescent-arrows. We were sure you must have drowned or bled out down there. It was all of ten minutes after you were shot."

"It's the armour," she croaked, and the captain nodded.

"Oh yes, the armour of Ashwine. The Aketon, they called it, and here I was thinking it was a gambeson. We're all very glad for it giving you the confidence to perform such a valiant act of heroism. The Sutannir was preparing a eulogy when we pulled you from the water, you know?" He smiled a smile of genuine relief, and squeezed Esmerelda's shoulder warmly. "Well, anyway, I'm glad you did buy it. All that silk seems to have done the trick. As soon as you're out of here, mind, I think the Sutannir has a parable waiting for you – something about the candle that burns brightest? – and I know for a fact those Highborn missionaries we're carrying would just love to sit you down for a long, earnest and really boring sermon about the Virtue of Wisdom..."

Jack and the Giant

A traditional pre-imperial children's story from the Marches. The "Giant" in the tale would appear to be a mountain-troll from the description, many of whom do migrate down to the lowlands after a harsh winter, or as advancing age render them unable to take game for themselves. The reference to Jack and the axe of gold before the formation of Jack the egregore is most intriguing.

- Eurontis Marele, "Folklore in the Empire", Vol 4

Jack and the Giant

A long time ago, back in the days before the Empire, a great gory she-giant came thundering down from the mountains. Her vasty swag-belly had turned to slack skin, for winter had been hard and the hill-sheep seemed to get more nimble with each passing year. Down through the hills she came, cursing and groaning. Down through the fens she came, creeping and weeping. Down to the Marches she came, down to find the flesh of children to fill her empty belly.

But as she crossed the bawns of the Marches, who should she come upon but a young beater by the name of Jack, who was sitting down to eat his lunch upon a tree he had just felled with his axe. "Tell me, oh son of the sod, which way to the nearest village?" She rumbled (for giants have the gift of speech, even if they use it but seldom), "Quickly now, lest I crack your bones and milk their marrow for my gruel!"

Jack set his head to the side, just so, and looked up at her as if she was a tree for the felling. He saw her terrible tearing talons, like a brace of skinning knives on the end of her bony fingers. He saw her fearsome fangs, sharp and black like the beaks of a nest of crows. And he saw her great lantern eyes, rheumy and milk-stained with age.

"Ma'am, I'd be most happy to oblige you, but a favour for a favour seems fair – won't you please help me move this log first? Then I'd be most obliged and tell you the directions you want."

"Why should I do aught for you? I could pop off your head as easy as spitting, see if I don't!"

"True, but then you wouldn't have you directions, and it's many a mile to the nearest village."

Her stomach growled so loudly that a nearby owl fell stunned from her perch and Jack had to clap his hands to his ears to keep from being deafened. At last she sighed, "Where is this log? Be quick about it, woodsman." Full well she intended to kill him for his impertinence, even though his bones were too tough for her old teeth to grind.

"Why, just in front of you, ma'am, if you'll but reach for it."

Blindly she groped her great hands across the ground.

"Where? I feel nothing."

She reached down further, sniffing at the ground like a dog.

"You'll just need to reach a little lower, a little lower..." and so saying, Jack grabbed his axe and struck her wicked head from her shoulders with a single blow. The thunder of her fall was so great it knocked down trees for a mile around and blew Jack clean out of his boots.

And that is the story of how Jack the beater slew the giant. He was rewarded with an axe of gold, which was not much use for cutting wood, but he wore it nonetheless, as a reminder that "There's ne'er a tree so big it can't be felled." He carries it still, just ask him if you don't believe me...

Jack in the Green

Tune and lyrics by Martin Graebe. Good version on youtube here

Free mp3 of Daisy singing Jack in the Green with Glasgow Madrigals.

Sheet music can be found here and a harmony version here

"This song has always been very popular with the Ramsbruck family of Bregasland, to whom Robert of Ramsbruck belonged before he became our ol' Jack. It was sung so often that it barely got a reaction - unless the singers venture one of the less-well-known raunchy verses, which sometimes caused a raised eyebrow, or a quiet "Now then" before Jack went back to doing whatever he was doing before."

Now Winter is over I'm happy to say
And we're all met again on the first day of May
And we're all met again for to dance and to sing
And to go about dancing with Jack- in - the- Green

*Jack- in - the- Green, Jack- in - the- Green
And we'll dance every Springtime with Jack- in - the- Green*

Now Jack- in - the- Green is a vey strange man
Though he dies every Autumn he is born every Spring
And each year on his birthday we dance through the streets
And in return Jack he will ripen the wheat

With his mantle he'll cover the trees that are bare
And our gardens he'll trim with his jacket so fair
And the fields he will sow with the hair of his head
And the corn it will ripen til old Jack is dead

Now the sun is half up and it tokens the hour
When the children arrive with their garlands of flowers
So now let the music and dancing begin
And toast the good heart of young Jack- in- the- Green

Jack of Irons

Description

This useful armour is most often crafted in the form of a heavy arming jacket, usually with reinforced steel jack chains on the arms. It is popular with officers and sergeants in Marches and the League. A variant form of the Jack of Irons called the Bloodiron Hauberk is crafted in Wintermark, mixing weltsilver and mithril to provide a long leather jacket that covers the arms and upper legs and is worn over mithril chain.

In the the Marches it is also called a Jack of Chains; both names come from a legendary giant called variously Jack-in-chains, Jack-of-Irons and Bloody Jack. Wrapped in heavy chains and wielding a terrible spiked club, the massive creature is said to be twice the size of a person and impossible to kill. According to stories the creature recovers almost immediately from even mortal wounds, and limbs hacked off continue fighting. Popular tales suggest that the demonic horror was defeated by a girl variously known as Clever Jill and Wise Mary who tricks the beast into falling down a well from which it is unable to escape. The legend insists that the giant is still buried under the earth somewhere near the modern town of Wayford.

Interestingly, some scholars believe the creature spoken of in Suag and Kallavesi legends that they call the skinned king may be the same creature, although in the stories of Wintermark the giant beast has no skin and is ultimately defeated by a clever hunter who creates a human-shaped mannikin of fresh deer meat studded with spiked hooks, and then taunts the giant into grappling the mannikin. Trapped by the hooks, the giant cannot escape and is rolled down a steep incline into the waters of Westmere where it is assumed to have drowned.

Rules

- Form: Armour. Takes the form of a suit of light armour.
- Requirement: Any character can bond to this item.
- Effect: Once per day you may use the relentless skill as if you know it without spending any hero points.
- Materials: Crafting a Jack of Irons requires five measures of ambergelt, three ingots of weltsilver, and three measures of iridescent gloaming. It takes one month to make one of these items.

"Why would I, Rhondira Havarri, the greatest thief in all of Sarvos, choose such a martial piece of armour? Rhondira Havarri who stole the signet ring from the Prince of Tassato! Rhondira Havarri who seduced the Bishop of Vigilance and made off with his coinbox! Rhondirra Havarri who forged the signature of the head of the civil service and proclaimed a day's holiday throughout the League! Why would I choose armour? Why, precisely so that I could pull my hand through such cruelly tight handcuffs as you have used, my friend. It mends broken bones quite splendidly quickly. Ah, you have notice that your blade is in my hands now? Yes, and the coin-purse as well, if you please. You will not be collecting the sizeable bounty on my head this day, but you're a comely lad, so Rhondira Havarri will leave you with a kiss for your troubles..."

Jade Custodian

Overview

The Jade Custodian is an Imperial title that has custodianship of the Wellspring of Jade. This idyllic pool is set among light woodlands in eastern Foracci, at the source of one of a minor tributary of the Gancio. It was announced by the then-Civilian Commissioner of the League in Winter 380YE. Work was completed shortly before the Spring Equinox 381YE. The title represents a sinecure, requiring minimal responsibility but offering a regular income of crystal mana. Likewise, if any opportunity relating to the wellspring presented itself, they would make any decisions needed to take advantage of it.

Contents

- 1 Overview
- 2 Responsibilities

- 5 The Wellspring of Jade

Responsibilities

The Jade Custodian has no particular responsibilities; they simply receive a bounty of crystal mana from the Wellspring. If the Wellspring were to be threatened in any way, it would be the responsibility of the Jade Custodian to deal with those threats.

Powers

Bounty of Mana

The Jade Custodian gains custodianship of a sinecure. The Jade Custodian receives an income of 12 crystal mana each season from the Wellspring of Jade.

Appointment

The Jade Custodian is appointed by unanimous decision of the senators of the League. If a unanimous decision cannot be reached, the title may be appointed by the Imperial Senate instead.

The title can be held by a citizen of the League. The Custodian has tenure, and serves until they die or step down. They can be revoked by the General Assembly, the League National Assembly, and by the Assembly of the Nine.

The Wellspring of Jade

The Wellspring is found at the source of a minor tributary of the Gancio, near the hamlet of Aversa in Foracci. The spring from which the tributary rises is part of an idyllic glade where natural flows of mana pool. The spring now rises into a beautiful circular pool, the green marble basin of which is inlaid with plates of mithril, and in whose depths crystals of mana form. It is a simple matter to pluck the formed crystals from the cool, fresh water. On clear days, sunlight causes motes of gold and jade light to dance across the surface of the pool; under the light of the moon, the waters ripple with a gentle silver glow.

During the construction it was discovered that the pooling mana had infused the idyllic spot with a natural aura, which has been enhanced by the careful construction work. Anyone who rests beside the pool during the day finds it easy to relax, and their minds naturally turn to pondering philosophical questions or artistic endeavors. By night, travelers camping along the road between Sarvos and Casinea have reported vivid, inspirational dreams from which they awaken greatly refreshed. Merchants traveling between the eastern Empire and the Jewelled City who know of the Wellspring and its relaxing properties have started favouring the route through Aversa, leading to an unexpected burst of prosperity for the sleepy hamlet.

The Wellspring is truly beautiful - during the day, motes of sunlight form and dance across the surface of the waters, reflected from the mithril plates set into the bottom of the pond.

Far from the bustling streets of Sarvos, the tiny hamlet of Aversa is better known for its strong red wines and cheeses than anything to do with the city. Situated deep within the woodlands of eastern Foracci along a lazy, meandering tributary of the river Gancio; Aversa has long been associated with the Corvinoscuri; a well-to-do family of merchants who endorse the hamlet as a retreat to escape the burning pressure of city-life.

In his youth a Corvino named Giacomo used to lie for hours near a brook, watching as the sun dappled through the leaves of the woodland canopy. In high summer he noticed that as the light struck the water the shadows that the leaves left used to leap across the water as if alive. Dancing into flitting shapes that chimed with the trickle of flowing water. The enchantment left him with a long-held appreciation for magic, but his life took a bad turn and he lost himself to the wantonness of living as a bravo in the city, thoughts of summer dreams long forgotten.

It took the death of a dear friend to shake him out of his abyss, but eventually he became a prominent businessman within the city, serving at various times at the proprietor of the Signori d'Argento Dueling School and Spry Spriggan Cisisbeo House; Signeur of the Compagnia di Rossi and Chairmen of Red Raven Holdings; Officer of the League Trading Company and Bourse Holder of the Damation Cliffs and Brilliant Star.

His interest in magic though was undiminished and throughout all this he bought texts and studied under private tutors to better understand the summer realm that reminded him of his youth so much. During his studies he became convinced that his childhood memories were not fantasy but that Aversa was near a powerful nexus of pure mana.

With the help of the the Civilian Commissioner of the League, Lorenzo La Volpe (and fellow Officer of the League Trading Company) and also the newly appointed Senator, Magdeliana de Sarvos, Giacomo worked with the civil service to investigate the nexus. It was indeed found to be a source of natural mana, but that work needed to be done to collect and crystallise it as the waters just previously collected the fragments and washed them away down towards the river Gancio. Some of the architects involved in the project argued that the mana originated from the sun-dappled canopy, whilst others hypothesized that it was the waters themselves that were magical, but no matter, the mana was real.

The brook was expanded and turned into a large, round pool with pure Mithril laid into the basin, such that the light from the woodland canopy intensified and scattered dancing will-o-the-wisps skating across the waters. Crystalline Mana began to form naturally in the depths of the pool and could be collected by wading knee deep inside.

In time the Wellspring has turned into something of a tranquil landmark for travellers between Sarvos and Casinea, a chance to escape the wearisome road. Along one side of the Wellspring a marble bench has been laid to rest tired feet and across the waters are three statues of a Stallion, Stag and Raven. By Giacomo's express instructions the following has been engraved in Old Asavean upon the base of the statues: "Equus dormit / Tempus ea quae olim prava erant recta reddit / Cervus esurit / Veteribus oculis viae novae cerni possunt / Corvus spectat / Patientia nostra aeterna est" Personal account of Giacomo Corvino

Jade Hammers

Description

A set of Jade Hammers are often a one-handed mace or warhammer and a sturdy rod, both inlaid with decorative tempest jade. By weaving the two items together, a warrior-magician can unleash a burst of powerful magic that sends an opponent sprawling. Many wielders make a point of striking their target with both the weapon and the implement simultaneously, but this is not actually required for their magic to function.

Attempts to create this "thundering blow" through traditional spellcasting have so far been unsuccessful. It seems that the complex crystalline structure of the tempest jade used in their creation harnesses the magic energy of the wielders in a way either too complex for a mortal to duplicate, or amplifies it in a way that cannot be duplicated by a human magician. Indeed, to date, nobody has succeeded at creating a rod that can achieve this task alone - the closest anyone has come is the Witches' Hammer which releases magical energy in a barely contained burst, and even then is only useful to someone who has already mastered the repel spell - though it is worth noting that the rod in question also uses a large amount of tempest jade in its construction.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. A pair consisting of a one-handed weapon and either a rod or a wand. You must be wielding both the weapon and the implement to use the set's magical properties.
- Requirement: You must have both the ambidexterity and magician skills to bond to these items.
- Effect: When wielding these arcane weapons, you may spend 1 mana to call STRIKEDOWN. This ability follows all the rules for casting an offensive spell with the exception that the call can be made with either the weapon or the implement.
- Materials: Crafting a pair of Jade Hammers requires five measures of dragonbone, five ingots of tempest jade and five measures of iridescent gloaming. It takes one month to make a pair of these items.

Janon

Eternal of Night

Sobriquets

Janon is most commonly known as the Shadowed Fire. This epithet refers to the strong symbolic connection between the eternal and the rune Zorech, but also to the idea of a fire that warms the body, but provides only a limited amount of light. Some stories credit Janon with the ability to peer out fires that burn low in the presence of lovers, for example, while poets often claim that the shadowed fire is a metaphor for the mortal spirit, whence comes all passion.

Like many Night eternals, Janon collects names to itself. Some artists call it the Muse of Fire and claim the inspiration it brings can come at the price of health or sanity. It is variously called Firebrand and Torchbearer - it encourages anyone with strong philosophical, political or social stances to express their causes without fear of censure.

The Faraden call it the Night Sword and claim that it sometimes offers boons to those who give up everything in the name of vengeance (indeed, there is said to be a ritual specifically designed to sever a Faraden vengeance-seeker for their past that involves burning symbols and mementos of the life they leave behind in pursuit of justice).

Appearance

Janon appears proud of the fact that it is a wyrm (that is, its true form is that of a wingless lizard as distinct from the serpent-form Night eternals who possess feathered wings such as Sung). As with other wyrms, this tends to mean that the Shadowed Fire is more earthy and concerned with practical matters than the more cerebral and philosophical serpents such as Soghter. Janon is rarely encountered in anything approaching its 'true form' however - as with most Night eternals it loves to change its shape. Old stories suggest its true form is that of a ruby-red lizard with patches of golden scales, who glows like the embers of a banked fire.

The Shadowed Fire puts on bodies in the way a human might put on a suit of clothes. It is known to claim that a body, like a sword or a harp, is nothing more than a tool. It should be honed, of course, but the body is not the person - the person is the burning spirit shaped by passion, that hides inside. Since the Imperial Orcs became part of the Empire, Janon has increasingly been seen adopting the form of an orc.

The heralds of Janon usually refer to themselves as members of its band - as its companions. The only constant among them is that they tend to be easy-going, open with their emotions and passions, and capable of reckless action at the drop of a hat.

Concerns

Janon burns with passion, and encourages others to be like it is. Inevitably, this passion sometimes takes the form of carnal pursuits - Janon is known to be prone to regular infatuations with mortals from all walks of life. However, it would be foolish - perhaps even dangerous - to assume that Janon is a dissolute rake. It encourages all passions equally - it is as likely to help someone take vengeance on a hated enemy as to help a general rouse her shattered troops before a battle, or encourage an uncertain senator to make a landmark speech about a contentious topic.

It is known to have a love-hate relationship with followers of Way. It encourages mortals to embrace their passions, and several times it has worked through allies in the Sevenfold Path Conclave order to give support and inspiration to the priests of Ambition, Courage, Loyalty and Pride. Unfortunately, it has also offered succour to cults of Anarchy and Vengeance. At various points, its involvement with such blasphemous or heretical cults has led to a (usually short-lived) Declaration of Enmity.

Worse, Janon is known to offer its aid to the Jotun barbarians on occasion. It makes little effort to conceal this fact, but as near as agents of the Shattered Lantern can tell, its aid is limited to evocation in a few rituals - the Jotun favour more direct magics in their battles against the Empire.

Even when it is not patronizing heretical cults or barbarian enemies of the Empire, Janon is unequivocal in its belief that passion must be followed despite the constraints of society. Laws that exist to censor, or restrict freedom of expression, are anathema to it. It is said to work occasionally with Lashonar to encourage mortals to rebel against repressive tyrannies. Its support of individual freedoms is not unilateral - on rare occasions where someone has used the defence of their own freedom as a way to take it away from others, Janon has been known to whip itself into a devastating fury with unfortunate consequences.

Janon enjoys the company of artists, but also warriors such as the Freeborn kohan, political individuals committed to a cause, and anyone with an interesting obsession.

Boons

Janon encourages people to follow their passions. It is said to have the capacity to recognise people with reserves of inner strength; it is known to be able to revitalise those reserves, stoke their power and even occasionally give boons that let mortals use their heroic passions in different or more effective ways in pursuit of their driving ambitions. Consequently, it is often evoked during rituals such as Embrace the Living Flame or Still Waters, Running Deep.

The touch of the eternal is known to create powerful enchantments similar to Freedom of the Soul, Secrets of the Empty Heart or Unfettered Anarchy as it deems appropriate. It also has some ability to free individuals from the imposition of unwanted passions or obsessions, especially those that come from curses.

Janon apparently loves tempest jade and orichalcum, and those seeking its aid sometimes offer gifts crafted from these materials.

Principalities of Jarm (Redirected from Jarm)

The information presented here is designed to give a feel for the foreign nation, and is by no means exhaustive. The focus of the Empire campaign is on the Empire and its citizens, and while this information can be used to create backgrounds or inform role-playing on the field; it is not intended that players portray characters from this foreign nation without discussion with Profound Decisions.

Overview

The Principalities of Jarm are an old, confident nation that lies many weeks sailing to the east of the Empire. It is a little larger than the Empire, but regularly riven by internecine bickering between the various factions that rule there. It is often engaged in conflicts with the smaller nations that border it, occasionally engaging in wholesale wars of conquest against those neighbours for resources.

Of particular interest to Imperial citizens are the Jarmish ports which are open to trade with the Empire.

Terrain

The Principalities are divided into three broad areas. They spread along a wide swathe of coastline with several major rivers; most of the Southern and Northern Principalities have at least one settlement with access to the sea, and many of the Eastern Principalities have a ship-navigable port along one of these waterways. The climate tends to be temperate, a little warmer than the southern Empire in Summer and a little cooler in Winter.

The Southern Principalities are the oldest, and the land there is widely settled and agrarian. The Northern Principalities are cooler, with more hills and bounded on two sides by high mountain peaks. Much of the Eastern Principalities is covered in forest, and many of the people here are the descendants of conquered peoples; the eastern borders are prone to regular raids from nearby nations and at least one tribe of orcs.

People

The Jarmish people are human. All lineages are known, but there are strong lines of changeling and naga - scions of these lines rule several Principalities. Orcs are known in several parts of Jarm, especially in the Eastern Principalities, but they are exclusively of low station. Those orcs who are not labourers serve in the military and have a reputation as ignorant savages, surly bandits and primitive barbarians incapable of appreciating the various fruits of Jarmish life.

The rulers of Jarm are all magicians; only someone with the ability to cast spells can hold any position of authority. Those who cannot master magic are consigned to the ministerial class or even the landfolk - non-magicians are allowed to own property and wealth but they cannot hold public office.

The people are roughly divided into four classes, and there is comparatively little social mobility. The Magician-Princes are of the Noble class, and their families control most of the wealth, land and magical power in Jarm. The Ministerial class serves the Principalities as educators, scribes, merchants, translators, diplomats and judges and form an educated middle-class under the Magician-Princes. The Landfolk are labourers and shopkeepers, and their standard of living is generally much lower than that of the equivalent Imperial citizen. The lowest class are the Slaves who are considered property, and live short lives of hopeless drudgery. Slightly outside this class-system are doctors and surgeons, who have a status somewhere between slaves and landfolk, and are generally considered to be bad luck by more sophisticated Jarmish citizens.

Each Principality maintains its own military forces, and it is only among the soldiery that any semblance of meritocracy is encountered; the Jarmish people are oddly practical when it comes to matters of protecting their nation, and it is entirely possible (if extremely difficult) for one of the Landfolk or even the Slave-class to rise to a position of authority within the army of a Principality.

Jarm is made up of a number of self-contained Principalities, each ruled over by a Magician-Prince. The principalities tend to be around the same size geographically as an Imperial territory. Most Principalities have a single small city at their heart which is the site of the Prince's palace and where the governance of the Principality takes place. While individual Principalities choose their ruling Prince in various different ways, the power rarely moves beyond the control of three or four long-established families; it is rare for a single family to completely dominate a Principality. The Noble class sets the law within their domain, and while they are rarely subject to it they are constantly aware of the need to maintain the respect of their peers within the Principality and in neighbouring domains.

Each Prince also holds a seat in the House of Princes in the city of Jarm (a central Principality whose Magician-Prince is appointed by the House of Princes directly and serves as an administrative hub for the nation). There they conspire with and intrigue against each other for position and control of their nation's resources. There is traditionally a good-deal of cut-throat maneuvering between the Northern and Southern Principalities who both seek to exploit the resources of the Eastern Principalities.

While the nation appears chaotic, it is governed by a small body of shared laws. For example, no Jarmish may shed the blood of another Jarmish citizen. This law extends from to the Noble class all the way down to the Slave class. A Magician-Prince who ignores this law will face the censure of her peers, and several Princes have been toppled by their neighbours for ignoring it. This law is suspended during a formally declared state of inter-Principality war, which is known by a number of names in various languages (zemsta, kättemaks or pomsta) all of which roughly translate to 'revenge' or 'vendetta'.

A peculiar side-effect of this universal Law has been the creation of a low-status class of doctors and surgeons; because they often have to shed the blood of their patients for their own good, they are both disdained and valuable to the Jarmish people. Still, given a choice, any Jarmish citizen would prefer to seek out magical healing over mundane healing.

Interestingly, it is also illegal for anyone outside of the Noble class to own a bow, and crossbows are completely unknown. Principalities rarely field units of archers, preferring to use soldiers trained in the use of thrown weapons such as javelins. Some Principalities maintain elite units of archers made up of troops that have proven their loyalty to the Magician-Prince, but even these soldiers are not considered to own their bows. When a military archer is not on campaign, her bow remains the property of the Magician-Prince. This can leave them at a serious disadvantage; many Jarmish armies include soldiers trained in the use of large shields specifically to protect their fellows against enemy archers. The use of archers during internal conflicts is heavily frowned upon, and many Magician-Princes are cautious about deploying bow-wielding troops during the regular inter-Principality tussles. This restriction is believed to be a consequence of the extensive use of mage armour among the Nobles of Jarm - they ensure that a weapon as devastating as the bow is carefully controlled.

Magic

For the most part, only the Magician-Princes and their retainers are allowed to practice ritual magic in Jarm, although many of the citizens know an incantation or two. Jarmish ritual magic tends to be a combination of Astronomy and Music of the spheres. Only members of the Noble class are allowed to form or participate in covens, and members of other classes found to be practicing ritual magic as part of a group are dealt with very harshly.

Magical items and potions are rarer in Jarm than they are in the Empire, and the majority of Jarmish artisans focus on crafting robes, implements and ritual paraphernalia for the Magician-Princes.

Religion

Jarm has no dominant religion; rather the Principalities embrace religious freedom. With the exception of a few theologically minded Principalities, spiritual beliefs are seen as relevant only to the individual. While many Jarmite citizens cultivate an attitude of amused indifference to religious matters, many more wholeheartedly embrace the tenets of one creed or another.

Consequently adherents of the Way rub shoulders with members of the Gemeinwesen sects; spiritualists and necromancers loudly debate with materialists and ancestor worshippers; and temples of various gods and powers compete for congregations with the shrines of Eternal cults.

The closest Jarm gets to an established priesthood are the astrologers of the Ministerial class. These magicians combine minor rituals from the Realms of Day and Night with the study of the heavens to offer advice to their fellows. Many Jarmish will consult an astrologer before embarking on any major endeavour. While the people often consult these diviners for advice, they do not necessarily follow it - the astrologer fills a cultural role, but few Jarmish place their advice above common sense or their own desires.

Recent developments in northern Jarm have seen a surge of interest in the tenets of the Way of Virtue. Magician-Prince Hillar of Limitu has given permission for a "significant" temple to be constructed in his principality. With the assistance of the Imperial Synod, the temple is now spreading the tenets of virtue to Jarmish converts throughout the principality - and potentially the whole of northern Jarm.

Look and Feel

Jarmish costume is strongly influenced by Indian, Southern Asian and Malaysian styles. As befits such a cosmopolitan nation, a very wide range of materials, colours, degrees of ornamentation and styles are found here. Men and women alike enjoy loose fitting, flowing clothing made of loose, wide strips of clothing wrapped around the body and often accompanied by a shirt or blouse. Other popular styles include a long coat cut to just above the knee worn with tight-fitting trousers similar to the sherwani; the kurta or kurta pyjama (a knee-length shirt usually made from cotton or linen); the salwar kameez; the choli and the lengha.

Jewelry is extremely common among the Jarmish, made from a variety of precious and semi-precious materials. Delicate chains are especially common, and the Jarmish love pendants and intricate head-pieces. Wrist and ankle bracelets are much more common than rings - ornate rings are often seen as a mark of indolence as they imply that the wearer does not work with their hands. Likewise, the head is rarely covered by anyone other than the Landfolk; a hat often suggests that one works outside exposed to the rain and so individuals of the Ministerial and Noble class avoid them, preferring jewelry instead.

Languages

The principalities are polyglot, with languages from all over the world spoken in various Principalities. The Jarmish are the descendants of a wide mix of forerunner kingdoms, immigrants and the children of subject peoples; there is no dominant language, and many Jarmish are multi-lingual as a consequence. The languages most commonly spoken in Jarm are shared with many of the surrounding nations, and can be represented by any language belonging to the [\[Slavic language group\]](#).

The Principalities in Play

The Empire has traded with the Principalities of Jarm for several centuries, and both nations have benefited from that trade. It is important to remember that the Principalities are much more loosely connected than the nations of the Empire, and that they treat intrigue almost like a popular sport; a good relationship with one Principality might automatically result in a bad relationship with another. The same applies to characters with roots in the Principalities; they may have links to a family in one Principality, but this gives them absolutely no standing with any other Principality. Each Principality keeps itself a little apart from the others, so it is relatively easy to include a Jarmish character or incident in a background; a character who is known by people from one Principalities is likely to be entirely unknown, or even receive a hostile relationship, from the others. It is also easy to play a character who has come from the Principalities to settle in the Empire, or whose parents or grandparents did the same, but how convincing this role may be may depend on your ability to speak one of the Jarmish languages.

Language is also likely to be confusing to Imperial citizens - there is no dominant language, and people from different parts of Jarm may well have problems communicating with each other. This situation is exacerbated for Imperial Citizens who don't speak any of the languages common in the area. An entire class of translator-diplomats exists to smooth over relations between the Principalities, and these are likely to be the sort of characters that Imperial citizens deal with regularly when they are in Jarm.

Slavery is a reality in Jarm, and one many Imperial citizens (especially the Freeborn and the Imperial Orcs are very uncomfortable with. Orcs in general are not welcome in Jarm, and an orc will always be assumed to be of the Slave class. An orc that does not belong to someone is 'up for grabs' and may end up being enslaved. Most Jarmish have no more information about the Empire that the Empire has about them, and many are entirely unaware (and unconcerned) that the Imperial orcs exist.

Perhaps the biggest difference from the Empire is the role of magic; people who are not magicians have very little standing in Jarmish society. A Jarmish magician might make an Imperial citizen their fascinating exotic lover, but if they are incapable of performing magic they will soon tire of them. Likewise, visitors to Jarm must be careful not to engage in ritual magic without the permission of a Prince's family; the Jarmish have little concept of diplomatic immunity - a criminal from the Empire will be dealt with summarily by the Magician-Princes exactly as if they were a Jarmish citizen.

Jewellery Guide

by Jamie Hall - Contemporary and Medieval Metalworker

Safety

- Live roleplay involves physical combat. You should take the same precautions you would for a contact sport.
- Jewellery should not have spikes or sharp edges.
- Avoid brittle items, like glass, ceramics and some plastics.

Safety comes before any other consideration when wearing jewellery; most jewellery is safe to wear, but injury to yourself and others can happen if you wear inappropriate items. Live roleplay is a physical hobby, so you may wish to take that into consideration when wearing body piercings, long necklaces and fragile items. If you are producing jewellery for sale, make sure you comply with legal regulations which cover metals such as lead, nickel and cadmium.

As with armour and other clothing, jewellery should not have spikes or sharp edges, particularly when worn as a ring.. Claw-set stones should not protrude too high above the finger, and the claws should be burnished down to prevent them from catching. Try rubbing them on your lips – if they feel sharp, they could cause damage to fabric, latex or skin.

Glass was used in some periods to make rings, bangles and tableware. Some modern glass will be strong enough, but you are best to avoid brittle items. Anything that can shatter on impact can harm the wearer or other players. Likewise, hollow or fragile items are more likely to get damaged during a fight.

Historical “Authenticity”

- The purpose of this guide is to help you choose jewellery which evokes a medieval fantasy setting.
- Empire LRP is set in a fictitious world, which draws on many sources, including real world history. These historical sources make ideal inspiration for costume and characters, but they do not need to be followed for the sake of “authenticity”.
- We can make use of the look of medieval jewellery – modern methods give a shine that can look gaudy next to “medieval-ish” costume.

Because the world of Empire has some real world sources, it's possible to make use of art history when choosing or making jewellery. However, we are not bound by the real world - a brief description of medieval art history terms is included for those who are interested, but it is not essential reading; film, television and computer games provide a range of excellent “medieval-ish” jewellery to draw inspiration from.

There is no requirement to use styles and methods from the past. Where they are particularly useful is the “finish” of the item – that's the way the surface looks when the item is completed. Electric polishing motors are commonly used in today's jewellery workshop, and they provide a fast way of creating a highly polished, mirrored surface. This can look conspicuously modern in a fantasy setting, and it can actually be easier and cheaper to use archaic methods such as scratch-brushing and burnishing. These can often be applied to modern jewellery to improve its appearance.

Some nations, particularly Dawn and Urizen, may suit a highly polished finish. Nations including Urizen and Highguard, are harder to assign to a historical period, and the best inspiration may be found in the media, or even 20th Century styles.

General Notes

- Men's and women's jewellery – be aware that Empire LRP has no gender discrimination.
- Medieval jewellery was intended to be seen in sunlight or firelight – what looks bad under an electric bulb may look fabulous in the field.
- Items with lots of contrast and detail will usually have the best look.

Aside from hair pins, hair nets and tiara's, there are few types of jewellery that men didn't wear during the middle ages. There is no gender discrimination in Empire LRP, so you should wear anything that is appropriate to your costume.

Before the introduction of gas and electric lighting, jewellery would only be seen in sunlight or firelight. Sparkle is important, but the whole object does not need to be bright; ancient artisans didn't have access to high-speed polishing motors, so while they could achieve a highly polished surface, it was a slow and laborious process. Modern items may actually need dulling down a little, which you can do with simple tools.

Historical designs tended towards the complex; even when simple geometric patterns were used, they tended to be in combinations, to create more elaborate items. Detail is better than plain surfaces – texture, engraving, filigree and gemstones were all used to break up the surface. The high points of the metal could then be cut or rubbed to make them sparkle, while the lower surfaces retain their matte finish. Multiple copies of objects, like coins or badges, don't need to look exactly the same – small variations in colour and finish actually improve the look of groups of objects.

What size?

- Jewellery should be comfortable to wear – you should make sure that it fits you.
- Necklaces and bracelets are easy to measure, but rings are more of a challenge.

This can be a difficult question. Some items, like brooches and pendants, can be worn regardless of your size, but rings and chains, in particular, come in a wide range of sizes, and if you don't normally wear jewellery, it can be daunting. You'll find metric and imperial measurements alongside arbitrary lettering – that's how it is in the trade, and I won't make an apology for it here. If you can't try the item on, adjustable jewellery is one option – chains that can be fastened at different lengths, and rings and bangles that can be bent to fit the wearer.

Chains are the simplest – a very short necklace would be 16” - any smaller than that would be a very tight fit for most adults. Women wear most necklaces as 16”, 18” or 20”, with anything above 24” being extremely long. Men usually add a couple of inches to those lengths, but tend not to wear longer necklaces. Chains above 30” are generally meant to be worn doubled, but there are some safety issues for the neck if you do this. Bracelets are much shorter than necklaces – they are usually around 7.5” for women, and 8.5” for men. To work out what size you want, use a piece of string around your neck, or a tape measure.

Rings are the other thing that you are likely to need a measurement for, as you need to measure your finger. A jeweller will have equipment for measuring these sizes, so if you are able to, it may be a good idea to visit a jeweller to get your fingers measured (many jewellers will only provide this service if you are a customer). UK ring size is measured in letters, but you can try measuring the diameter or circumference of your finger or knuckle (whichever is thickest), and use the table on this page. Be aware that you'll only have an approximate idea from that table, and the only way to be certain about the fit of a ring is to try it on!

Bangles are much like rings, but they fit the wrist. They can be measured like a bracelet, but people have differently shaped wrists, and there are several types of bangle, including open torc, continuous push-on bangle, or hinged.

You might also need a measurement for a belt or a crown, but a tape measure will usually be adequate for that.

Metals

- Gold and silver are the best known metals for jewellery, but bronze and pewter are good alternatives.
- Steel and titanium were not used for jewellery in the past, but if they can be made to look appropriate with the right design and finish.
- Processes like electro-plating can be used to make items look more precious.

Gold and silver have been the metals of choice for thousands of years. Ductile and malleable, they are perfect for making small items like jewellery. Gold will usually be outside the budget of the larper, silver will sometimes be affordable. Copper and its alloys – (bronze and brass) have been used for thousands of years for jewellery and tools. Bronze and brass can make good "synthetic" gold if they are treated right, and can be plated to look like gold or silver. One particular alloy is called Pinchbeck – it's a brass alloy that looks a lot like gold. Pewter and other tin alloys were, and are, used for casting objects like badges and brooches, but less common for rings and chains due to softness of the metal. Leaded pewters are best avoided due to their toxicity, particularly old items with obvious lead oxide corrosion.

Steel was not worn as jewellery until much later in history, but is perfectly acceptable so long as the finish isn't too modern. It can be hard to take the polished shine off steel, because it is so hard. Modern metals like titanium are also fine, so long as the design and finish are appropriate to the setting. As with steel, these metals are primarily for industrial use, and are hard to work with.

Electro-plating can be used on copper and other base metal items, to make them look like silver or gold. This is a great way of reducing the cost of jewellery, Very thin plating will wear through fast, particularly for jewellery that might rub up against metal armour. It also makes it harder to physically or chemically improve the appearance of the item, because there is a risk of wearing through the plating. You should use the services of a professional plater, as many of these processes are toxic. In the past silver and other metals were sometimes "gilded" with gold and mercury to improve their appearance. Modern electro-plating does not give quite the same appearance, but it can be rubbed with a brass brush, for a more appropriate lustre. High-carat electro-plating is best, as it is a good colour match for the pure gold gilding done in the past.

Gemstones

Gemstones have always been valued for their colour and physical properties. Modern gemstones are usually cut with facets – these reflect the light, and in the case of diamonds, the facets are calibrated to the refractive properties of diamond, ensuring maximum reflectivity. This was not the case in the past – stones were cut using hand-held tools, and the facets were large, simple shapes. Modern synthetic and simulation stones can also look "too perfect" - a bit of imperfection will improve the appearance of the stone.

Normally, the live roleplayer won't be looking at precious stones like diamond and emerald, but many of the semi-precious stones are more eye-catching, they have a wider range of colours, and their low cost makes them affordable. Synthetic and simulation stones are also available, and there are glass and plastic alternatives.

There are a few stones that are good to look out for:

- Pearls are very medieval – if they are irregular pearls, they will look more interesting than the spherical pearls that you see in modern jewellery.
- Cabochon stones are smooth rounded shapes that were very common in the past, as they were easier to polish than faceted stones.
- Intaglios are designs cut into the stone in counter-relief, for example many seal rings are made this way. Cameos are the opposite, cut in relief so that the design rises out of the stone.
- Simple faceted stones – many Victorian cuts are appropriate for a medieval-ish setting. Rose, simple and swiss cuts, for example.
- Enamelling provides a lot of colour for very little cost. Some of the brightest colours are best avoided.
- Beads have been used throughout history, and are appropriate for any of the Imperial nations – an Urizen magi and his necklace of spheres, or a Navarri collecting the bones of barbarian Orcs. You can make your own beads easily enough.

Chains

- Thin and hollow chains should be avoided, as they are fragile, and don't hang well.
- Anyone equipped to make chain maille can produce chain jewellery.
- Pendants can be worn to enhance the chain.

Very thin chains can only be made by machines, so they have a factory-made look, which is less than ideal. They can be fragile and unsuitable for a vigorous activity like larp. Likewise, hollow chains are best avoided. They also ride up around the neck due to their light weight.

Pendants that hang loose on a chain are good, because they will stay in position if the chain is moved. The pendants and chains can then be swapped around for different characters. To do that, the fittings on the chain need to be smaller than the pendant loop, so that the pendant can be taken off the chain. As an alternative to chains, pendants could be worn around the neck on fabric or leather thong.

With a pair of pliers and a bag of "jump rings" (split rings), a wide range of chain patterns can be produced. Precious metal jump rings are available from bullion dealers like Cookson. Base metal rings are available from other suppliers. If you are equipped to make chain maille, you are equipped for making jewellery chains. Two pairs of smooth-jawed "parallel" pliers are the best tools for this task, as the rings don't slip around when you are gripping them. Aluminium is probably best avoided, as the surface won't "age" in a way that looks natural for precious metals, and it is a very light-weight material, so it won't hang well.

Making Jewellery

- Manufacturing jewellery can be expensive and difficult to learn.
- There are various methods which are more accessible, including chain-making and working with beads.

Jewellery manufacturing is an ancient craft, first done with primitive tools. As a rule, the simpler the tools, the more skill required to use them, while modern equipment can be prohibitively expensive for the non-professional. For example, heating metals like silver and bronze requires high temperature torches or furnaces. Pewter can be worked at much lower temperatures, achievable in the home, but you still need safety equipment. This limits the range of techniques that can be used by the amateur.

There are a number of alternative ways of making jewellery, which do not require high temperatures and expensive equipment. Bracelets and necklaces can be done by anyone who can make chain-maille. More ambitious projects could use techniques called Loop-in-Loop and Trichinopoly. Beading and wire-wrapping tutorials can be found online – some of the designs can look conspicuously modern, so think carefully before undertaking a project using beading and wire-wrapping, but simple bead necklaces and bracelets can be ideal jewellery for live roleplay. In that case, the choice of beads will usually be more important than the method used.

Non-metal jewellery is another option – a leather pendant could be marked with a Rune, and hung on a fabric necklace, for example. Nations like the Navarr are well-suited to these kind of items.

Reconditioning Jewellery

- If jewellery has a modern finish, it may be possible to alter it using an abrasive and a tool called a burnisher. A very soft abrasive like a brass brush or "scratch brush" is ideal; courser abrasives can damage your jewellery.
- Tarnish, oxidation, enamel or niello in recessed areas improves contrast, and can make the piece look older.

You may already own items of jewellery – if they have a high sentimental or financial value, you may not want to use them for live roleplay, but many items of costume jewellery are ideal. Don't worry if they don't look new; modern jewellery can look too new for a medieval fantasy setting, so a bit of tarnish or oxidation may enhance the item.

If they are particularly tarnished, it's ideal if you can keep the tarnish in the recessed areas, and brighten up the highlights. Two tools are particularly useful for this – a brass brush (or scratch brush), and a burnisher. The brass brush is used as a gentle abrasive; it's harder than the non-ferrous metals used for most jewellery, but only just, and while it easily removes the oxidation layer, it won't do much damage to the metal itself. You can get similar brushes in steel, but this will be too hard, and can remove detail from the design of the item.

It's usually best to avoid completely removing oxidation – the high points on the metal should be fully cleaned, leaving the recessed areas darker. This enhances the appearance of "relief" or depth on a ring. This doesn't work with a plain object like a wedding ring, but most other designs will benefit from it.

The type of brass brush you are looking for will have very thin bristles about 3cm long, with smooth ends. A stiffer or sharper brush will make the item look too "scratched". Aim to brush the item in one direction, and spend a minute or so working on a small piece like a ring. The style of brush used in industry is a long rectangular wooden handle, with bristles along half the length; other styles exist, but this type lets you use long strokes of the brush.

If you have a bench grinder or Dremel-style rotary tool, you can get brass brush attachments to fit them – take care to hold the item safely and securely, and avoid using the device at high speeds. The process will work well even at a lower speed. Take particular care with electro-plated items, because powered brushes can rip the plating off surprisingly quickly.

Once you have a surface you like, the final step is to burnish the item. The purpose here is to polish the highest details on the design, using a polished tool called a burnisher. This is a very ancient method, and it's so simple that you can use the back of a stainless steel kitchen knife. Using some pressure, you need to drag the burnisher across the surface of the metal. This will naturally pick out the very highest parts, and you are not aiming to burnish the recessed areas. Using this method gives a sparkling effect that will be particularly obvious in sunlight, and gives you historically authentic “bling”.

With a newer item, there may be no oxidation, and you may wish to apply a chemical agent to oxidise the surface. This can be done with products like “liver of sulphur”, but please take care when using any chemical agent. The item must then be scratch-brushed and burnished to bring out the colour. Another option is to use painting techniques to improve the contrast of the item, but this should be done carefully, ideally using a matte rather than gloss finish. If you have very deep recessed areas, you can mix a colourant with epoxy resin, fill the area, and then grind the resin flat – the effect can look like enamel or, in black, like a technique called niello.

Art History & Archaeology

There is an untapped wealth of information about the jewellery and metalwork of the past. Although re-enactment websites are a great place to start, they often don't give a very broad view of the material culture of the past. On the other hand, art historians and archaeologists don't aim their work at the costume maker, so it can take a bit of practice to use the excellent resources that are available on the internet.

The first thing is to familiarise yourself with some of the terminology – this will help you understand books on the subject, and it also is very useful when using search engines on the internet. Here are a few terms:

- Metalwork – For reasons that escape me, if you search for “jewellery” or “jewelry” (the US spelling) you don't get a lot of search results. This is because technical studies are more focused on the process than they are on the form – jewellery is just one way to use the metal.
- Non-Ferrous – although gold and silver are most commonly associated with jewellery, the skills required are similar for precious metals, for copper and its alloys, and for tin and pewter. For this reason, a lot of archaeological finds will specify tools as being for non-ferrous metalwork, as it isn't always clear precisely which metal they were used for. Non-ferrous means “without iron”.
- Material Culture – This basically means “stuff people had”. It's a very distinct archaeological approach, but it tends to put objects before people, so it's perfect for finding out about historical jewellery. It's also useful for other media, like ceramics and textiles.
- Liturgical – throughout history, religions have been a major patron of decorative and fine art. Liturgical metalwork is a great source for ideas, but remember that a lot of the religious imagery won't be appropriate for Empire LRP, or other fantasy games.
- Secular – a rather broad term, this is everything that isn't religious in nature. A lot of tableware is included in this category, and many items of jewellery, although it's common to find pagan and Christian symbolism hidden in the designs of apparently secular jewellery.
- Fine Art – usually refers to single exceptional pieces of work, often made to the precise requirements of a patron. This is not quite the same as the definition used in modern universities.
- Decorative Art – often made to a very high artistic standard, the decorative arts are those which are produced in larger numbers, or using repetitive methods – manufacturing pottery is decorative, as are stone carvings like gargoyles, and most pieces of jewellery fall into this category.

It may also be useful to familiarise yourself with some of the names for different periods in Art History. These often, but don't always, match with the periods of social history. It's worth noting that there can often be significant overlap of art historical periods. Here are just a few of the styles:

- Migration Period (Europe, 300-900) – This is a very broad term, used to describe the movement of various Germanic tribes, as the Roman Empire was beginning to decline. It reflects a Europe that is turning its back on the Roman Empire, and it subverts the norms of Roman styles. It developed into various other, local styles, which include Insular and Viking. There are, broadly speaking, three styles, defined by a researcher called Salin. These are:
 - Style I – Sometimes called Tiersalat or Animal Salad, this style consists of stylised animals which are chopped up into different parts and used to fill spaces in objects which somehow manage to subvert and echo the norms of Roman art. In theory, it is quite a brutal style, but the pieces themselves are often very beautiful.

- Style II – this is best known in Insular art, and it consists of animals which are still stylised, but are now smooth and sinuous, and often connecting in repeating patterns using interlace (sometimes called knotwork). Christianity is a strong influence on the later forms of this style,
- Style III – the art of the Vikings and other northern European cultures, this emerges later, and contains many of the sinuous and interlaced features of Style II, but with a complex and more terrifying appearance. Dragons and sea creatures are more common, perhaps befitting the sea-faring nature of the Vikings. Unlike the British Isles, Scandinavia was slow to embrace Christianity, and this is reflected in the pagan symbolism of their art
- Insular (Britain, 400-1000) – This is a broad term for the styles used in the British Isles in the post-Roman period, until the Norman conquest of England. It has its origins in pre-Roman Celtic styles, and also the "barbarian" art of Migration-era Europe. There are stylistic links with Viking art. Probably the best known examples of this style, in metal, are the Sutton Hoo and Staffordshire Hoard finds. The Book of Kells and the Lindisfarne Gospels are fantastic examples on paper. Styles I and II are very prominent in Insular art, but it also has a strong Celtic influence; for example, the Hunterson Brooch has Celtic imagery hidden within it. The style is a British continuation of the Migration Period art brought by the Germanic tribes that settled from the 5th Century onwards.
- Byzantine (Eastern Mediterranean, 400-1450) – This is a true continuation of Roman art, but much evolved by differences in population between the Eastern and Western empire when they split. They maintained many of Rome's Classical styles, including the primacy of the human figure in images, but the Greek-speaking population had their own artistic traditions. Through trade, their metalwork was known across Europe, and Byzantine art was a major influence on the Romanesque style, which is a key visual style in Medieval Europe.
- Romanesque (Europe, 1100-1300) – Although it does not stem directly from Roman art, the Romanesque style was part of a move back towards Roman civilisation, which eventually culminated in the Renaissance. As well as drawing on Europe's own past, it was strongly influenced by the Byzantine art of the Near East, but seen through the lens of the "barbarian" styles that dominated after the fall of the Roman Empire. The first Crusade was probably a factor in the Byzantine link, but be aware that there were many trade and artistic links before that time; Carolingian and Ottonian art laid the ground work for Romanesque, and already had a strong Byzantine influence. Repeating patterns of acanthus leaves are characteristic of this style, and there is a move towards figurative naturalism that is rarely seen in earlier post-Roman Europe. The Romanesque style remained a key part of European art for several centuries, eventually being replaced by Gothic art, and having a strong influence upon it.
- Gothic (Europe, 1200-1500) – Stemming from the Romanesque style in France, Gothic sees a return to the primacy of the human form. Geometric forms and animals move to the background, and the level of figurative naturalism is very high; it can be hard to tell if some of these pieces are Gothic or Renaissance, and the former is a major influence on the latter. Starting slightly later, International Gothic is the term is for the pan-European adoption of this style.
- Renaissance (Europe, 1400-1600) – In the popular imagination, the Renaissance is 15th - 16th century Italy. In practice, the style is pan-European, beginning in northern Europe. There are strong elements of the Classical art of Greece and particularly Rome, which fitted well with ideas of an innovative post-Medieval society. The Catholic church had always played up its links to Imperial Rome, and wealthy collectors sought out Classical artefacts for their collections, just as collectors do in the modern day. However, their awareness of history was more limited than our own – it was common for High Medieval works to be attributed to more ancient artisans, and the figurative naturalism that we associate with the Renaissance can often be seen in the Gothic and even Romanesque styles that preceded it. That's not to say that the Renaissance was not an important period – studies of the human body and other natural forms did leap forward in this period. A look at the sketches of Leonardo Da Vinci reveals a style that can seem strikingly modern. Be aware that the end of the Renaissance is explicitly outside the brief for Empire LRP.

John Barleycorn

Martin Carthy's youtube version

There was three men came out of the west, Their fortunes for to try, And these three men made a solemn vow, John Barleycorn should die. They ploughed, they sowed, they harrowed him in, Threwed clods upon his head, And these three man made a solemn vow, John Barleycorn was dead.

Then they let him lie for a very long time Till the rain from heaven did fall, Then little Lord John sprung up his head, And soon amazed them all. They let him stand till midsummer Till he looked both pale and wan, And little Lord John he growed a long, long beard And so became a man.

They hired men with the scythes so sharp To cut him off at the knee, They rolled him and tied him by the waist, And served him most barbarously. They hired men with the sharp pitchforks Who pricked him to the heart, And the loader he served him worse than that, For he bound him to the cart.

They wheeled him round and round the field Till they came unto a barn, And there they made a solemn mow of poor John Barleycorn. They hired men with the crab-tree sticks To cut him skin from bone, And the miller he served him worse than that, For he ground him between two stones.

Here's little Lord John in a nut-brown bowl, And brandy in a glass; And little Lord John in the nut-brown bowl Proved the stronger man at last. And the huntsman he can't hunt the fox, Nor so loudly blow his horn, And the tinker he can't mend kettles nor pots Without a little of Barleycorn.

Jonah Gold

Stories of Jonah Gold are told throughout the Marches, and in parts of Hahnmark, Tassato, and Kahraman. The most popular tale dates from the time of the Cousins' War, and is referenced in a well-known song that is particularly popular in the Mournwold - there is evidence that Jonah was born and grew up in the Ore Hills long before the Mourn was fully conquered by the Marchers.

Jonah was said to be a miner who quarried out metal of such quality that his weapons turned the tide of war for his household. His jealous friend betrayed him to the enemy, and for a heavy purse of coin staged a mining accident that trapped him behind a rockfall where he presumably perished. Superstitious miners say that to see Jonah Gold presages disaster - whether his appearance causes catastrophe or simply warns against it varies from legend to legend.

His name has also been given to a variety of apple commonly grown in the Mournwold. Heavy, green and sweet, with a sharp bite, the "Jonah Gold" variety is used extensively in cooking sweet pies and apple sauce, and traditionally is buried with miners from the Mourn, particularly those who quarry green iron.

Jonah Gold Traditional, Mournwold (OOC: Lyrics by Jude Reid, Music and arrangement by Kathryn Wheeler)

A recording can be found here

Take your pick, push your cart
Make your way to the Mournwold's heart
Fire the rock, watch it break
All its fortune is yours to take
Pick and pan, sweat and toil
Carving wealth out of Mournworld's soil

As you work, miners bold
Beware of Jonah Gold

Times of war, long ago
Cousins fought then as mortal foes
Jonah Gold, Marcher brave
Mined the iron for his Household's blades
Found a seam, green iron ore
Held an edge like no blade before

As you work, miners bold
Beware of Jonah Gold

Jonah Gold, took the field
Armed his household with sword and shield
Won the day, claimed the land
Gainst his weapons no foe could stand
Turned the war for his kin
With his steel they were sure to win

As you work, miners bold
Beware of Jonah Gold

Jonah Gold, none his peer
Sent his weapons both far and near
Jealous eyes saw his skill
Envied him as weak souls will
Rosie Smith, once his friend
Swore that Jonah's life she'd end

As you work, miners bold
Beware of Jonah Gold

One cold day, down the pit
Shovels carried and lanterns lit
Jonah followed a call for aid
Learned too late that he was betrayed
Heard the blast's fearful sound
Rockfall trapped him beneath the ground

As you work, miners bold
Beware of Jonah Gold.

Rosie Smith, name be cursed
Killed her friend for a traitor's purse
Spent her life, stiff with fright
Saw his face in her dreams each night
Lost her will, lost her wits
Never ventured back in the pit

As you work, miners bold
Beware of Jonah Gold

Jonah Gold wanders still
Haunts the mine beneath Mournwold's hill
In the mines, dark and deep
Rotting husk that can never sleep
Face like coal, eyes that burn
Waits for the traitor to return

As you work, miners bold
Beware of Jonah Gold

Some say he comes to warn
Jonah means no true miner harm
See him there, turn and run
Death will strike ere the shift is done
Mournwold's mines claim their due
Marcher blood keeps the iron true

As you work, miners bold
Beware of Jonah Gold

The Crimson Rune, the thunderhead mark and the crossed blades; Jotra has many titles. It is the Rune of Conflict, Struggle and Strife and also the Rune of Challenges. It is the spark that sets the fields afire, the tempest that uproots the mighty tree, the floodwater that tears at its own riverbank. It is the red cant woven from discord and strife - the oldest song in creation. It is the struggle at its most raw; the simple urge to overwhelm.

Jotra fans the embers of opposition and draws them into a raging inferno that consumes all before it. It revels in conflict, heedless of cost or even victory, savoring only the struggle itself. It is the challenge, the pitting of the self against another or against the world, that Jotra exemplifies. It is often the counterpart of Tykonus, the Rune of Victory, but does not itself presuppose that one will overcome rather than being defeated.

While many magicians see only the physical nature of Jotra's power, it is also a rune that represents strife and conflict of a more cerebral nature. An Urizen politician might proudly bear the rune on their staff, indicating to everyone that they are prepared to fight with words and wits. A doctor from Holberg might have the rune inscribed on their instruments, to remind themselves that they contend against death itself.

Along with Feresh, Tykonus and Verys to represent Glory by many Dawnish magicians and crafters; here it represents Glory through challenges, and through contending against worthy foes or difficult situations.

Jotra is sometimes associated with the Imperial Virtue of Courage.

Using Jotra in magic

Jotra encourages and empowers conflict, and is commonly invoked in battle magic or in any scenario where the magicians must contend against either another force or another group of magicians. It tends to cause opposing runes to increase their friction, drawing out their power to destruction in a mighty conflagration.

Crafting with Jotra

The rune of battle is the rune most commonly inscribed on weapons by Winterfolk weaponsmiths, especially on weapons such as an Apprentice's Blade or a Biting Blade. It is less commonly found on shields, but as a rune that represents the clash of forces it is sometimes used in the hope that a shield will 'fight' any sword blow that strikes it.

Jotun

Overview

The Jotun are orcs who dominate the lands to the west and north-west of the Empire. Historically they have been especial threats to Wintermark, the Marches and the Navarr territory of Liathaven. They are barbaric by Imperial standards, but they are neither savage nor primitive. They enshrine the warrior-ideal, and seem to fight the Empire as much for the joy of battle as for any desire for territory or hate for the humans.

The Tribe

Much of what the Empire knows about the Jotun has come from interviews with slaves, both orc slaves and human slaves taken by the Jotun who later escaped. They are a warlike tribe that values strength-in-arms and fighting-spirit as their highest virtues; to become more like their ancestors, they seek out challenges against which to test their might and their nerve. While they may view climbing a mountain, wrestling a mandowla or swimming across the Gullet to be renown-worthy acts, they seek true glory and renown in war.

The Jotun are literally defined by war, only those who are prepared to take up arms to fight against the tribe's enemies are considered to be people, everyone else is either an enemy or a thrall. War is seen as the greatest endeavour, the only proving ground where the tribe can truly demonstrate their worth, for the Jotun believe that only those who die in battle are able to cross the Howling Abyss. In battle they are joined with their ancestors, whose words carry them to greatness and who wait ready to take the farthest shore if they fall. A battle is about the tribe against their enemies - it is never about the individual. Small groups of warriors may pick fights with individuals, but they regard that as a fight - not a battle. A battle is the moment when the the Jotun come together as a people to overcome their enemies. Victory is predicated not on individual heroics but rather on the ability of the tribe to fight together.

Although the Jotun love war, they are a disciplined law-abiding people who have no time for gratuitous violence. War is seen as a worthy endeavour, a courageous and bold action that strengthens the Jotun people by giving them the chance to defeat their enemy. Internal feuding and confrontation by comparison is viewed as indulgent and greedy; those who start mindless fights or seek victory in fights or battles that do not enrich their clan are treated as criminals, or traitors if their action weakens their clan. Punishment is swift and severe.

Of all the great tribes of the orcs, the Jotun are without doubt the most pious. Most clans will decorate shields and armour with symbols of their favoured ancestor. In battle their ranks are accompanied by ghodi, fighting priests who invoke the blessings of the ancestors, bringing healing and great strength to those the ancestors deem worthy. Ghodi, even weak ones, are treated with great respect by the Jotun, but this pious attitude extends to others they deal with. The Jotun have scant regard for the tenets of the Imperial Way, regarding reincarnation as a naive myth but despite this they have been known to give special treatment to Imperial priests on occasion.

This tribe tends to act in a fashion identified by their Imperial neighbours as "honourable." They almost never use poison or venom, for example, preferring to win their battles by strength of arms. They may use complex tactics, but rarely employ ambush or other guerilla tactics unless they are greatly outnumbered. They will usually accept a surrender unless they have reason to believe they are being tricked in some manner, and often allow injured opponents to retreat. They have also been known to allow opponents who have fought bravely to gather their dead or injured, or retreat from the battlefield - while ruthlessly crushing those who they believe have behaved in a treacherous manner. However, they are known to greatly respect those who fight unarmoured or against impossible odds ... and express that respect by giving such opponents a glorious and honourable death in battle.

Those they defeat in battle are given a simple choice - to join the Jotun and fight for them - or to become a thrall - the property of the jarl who captured them. Most thralls live as serfs, confined to land claimed by their jarl they labour to provide food for the jarl's clan. In return the jarl's clan provides the thrall and their family with protection and sufficient food to survive. In effect the thrall is a slave but with one vital distinction - they may cease to be a thrall and become Jotun at any time - simply by agreeing to take up arms and fight for the clan. Most thralls are condemned to a miserable life of hardship, but those few with valuable skills live a better life, serving the clan as traders, crafters or sailors on the Jotun vessels.

- Born to war - when the Jotun are not engaged in war, then they are preparing for one
- Fiercely honourable - the Jotun strive to follow a simple code of honour - and despise those who break their oaths
- Conquerors by nature - those they defeat must join the Jotun armies or serve the tribe as thralls
- Revere their ancestors - the Jotun are the most devout of all the orc tribes and treat their ancestors like gods
- Seek death in battle - the Jotun believe that their ancestors return to aid those who die in battle

What the Jotun are not

- They are neither barbaric nor cruel - The Jotun revel in war, but they do not slaughter for the sake of it and see no honour in killing the helpless.
- They are not slavers - Thralls have no real rights and may be treated as property by the Jotun, but they can cease to be a thrall at any time - simply by taking up arms and fighting for the Jotun.

Warriors of the Jotun

The bulk of most Jotun armies are bands of warriors drawn from the many minor tribes ruled over by the Jotun. Although these are orcs who have opted to fight for the Jotun after they being conquered, their loyalty to their Jotun masters is strong. From the Imperial perspective there is little to distinguish these forces from the countless minor tribes that are incorporated into the armies of the Thule, Druj or the Grendel. Most own little more than a sword and a breastplate usually worn over a plain tunic or similar. In battle they form up and fight in mobs along tribal divisions. What does make them distinct is the command and leadership of the Jotun commanders - there is none of the brutal savagery of the Druj, nor the caution of the Thule. Jotun commanders glory in war - a chance to prove yourself to the ancestors in battle - they revel in it. Those that follow their example - even non-Jotun - gain status, wealth, and power by impressing their Jotun masters with their ferocity and aggression.

The elite troops in the Jotun's arsenal are the Kirkja, the pious warriors whose lives are pledged to emulate the triumphs of the greatest of the Jotun ancestors. These soldiers are well trained and zealous - eager to engage with the Empire to get the chance to prove themselves. There are three major groups of Kirkja - each devoted to a powerful Jotun ancestor - drawn from the temples spread across the Jotun lands. They are the best equipped Jotun on the battlefield and their ranks usually include several ghodi - mysterious priests who are able to invoke the power of the ancestors to heal wounds and repair shattered limbs.

Magic

Like all other intelligent beings the Jotun employ magic, but they do not seem to consider it a particularly appropriate weapon for the battlefield. The majority of Jotun magicians appear to focus on healing and restoring the limbs, armaments or general health of the warriors. There are few battle-magicians among them, and even those tend to focus on swift casting the heal and purify incantations, or on empowering warriors rather than the more aggressive spells.

History

The Jotun tribe is geographically divided but culturally united. The northern Jotun control the area dubbed Kalsea by the Winterfolk. They tend to be a little more cautious and more traditional than their southern cousins, and have a great deal of experience fighting the forces of Wintermark - they have been raiding into Sermersuaq and north-western Kallavesa since before the arrival of the Steirn. There are known to be a number of human settlements scattered across Kalsea, whose inhabitants offer tribute and fealty to their orc masters. These humans often fight alongside the Jotun, and seem to have little love for the Empire; while they are clearly not the equal of their inhuman overlords, they seem to have a social position below that of a minor orc tribe but above that of slaves or thralls. In 371 YE the Empress Britta dealt the northern Jotun a crushing defeat, driving them back into Kalsea and while they have made a few raids into Wintermark since then, they have not launched a significant attack against the Empire.

The southern Jotun occupy the area the Winterfolk call Narkyst. In pre-Imperial times they occupied much of western Bregasland and accompanied their northern cousins in raiding Kallavesa. With the arrival of the Marcher army from the east, they were eventually driven out of the marshes. Their numbers were swelled by the lesser tribes driven westward from what is now the Marches; according to historians, they engaged in a brutal war of dominance with the lesser tribes, conquering them and requiring them to offer fealty. Today the southern Jotun are much more aggressive than the northern branch of the tribe; in 347YE they began a campaign of conquest against the Mournwold, sweeping through Liathaven and driving out both the Navarr and the Marchers. They still occupy these territories to this day and make regular raids into Kahraman, Mitwold, Bregasland and even as far east as Tassato.

At various points in their history, the Jotun have entered into pacts with the humans of the Empire, most notably during the reign of Emperor Guntherm. These treaties reflect earlier conventions between the Jotun and the Winterfolk in the years prior to the formation of the Empire. Such pacts and treaties take the form of ceasefires, and rarely last more than two years although in some cases they have been renewed. Some thanes living on the borders, and even a few Marcher stewards have engaged in smaller-scale pacts with individual clans of Jotun in a similar way.

Jotun look and feel

Overview

The Jotun value courage, strength and martial prowess above other attributes. They do not throw their lives away, nor use their subject tribes as disposable troops, but they are invariably looking for a way to increase their honour, with an eye towards becoming ancestors when they die. The only true dishonour, most Jotun recognise is showing fear in the face of the enemy, or striking a worthy opponent down by treacherous means.

In battle, the Empire will usually encounter a mix of elite Jotun warriors and less skilled warriors drawn from the subject clans that are ruled by the Jotun. Where possible, we will try to field groups of Jotun warriors together, especially if they have similar costume, and then inter-space the line with bands of regular barbarians.

As with any barbarian role, PD will provide simple costume that you can use when monsterring the Jotun. The following page provide an overview of how you can improve upon the basic barbarian breastplate and soft kit available.

Colour

Red is the traditional tribal colour of the Jotun, and warriors will try to wear at least one item that is red whenever possible, so that other Jotun recognize and respect them. The ideal shades are dark or blood red, but brighter reds work well for highlights, accessories or wraps.

Breakdown

Base Layers

The perfect Jotun garment is a thigh-length woollen tunic worn over trousers. These are worn by both male and female Jotun and are usually in a dark base colour such as grey, dark green or brown or in a dark shade of red. In practice any dark coloured base garments are better than nothing as a starting point if you are volunteering to play a Jotun.

Armour

Jotun consider mail superior to plate armour. Most Jotun warriors will have a simple mail shirt, or a full length hauberk. This can be supplemented with plate on the forearms and lower limbs and sometimes around the shoulders. Plate does not form the majority of an elite Jotun warrior's armour in battle, instead it adds extra protection to vital areas and serves to add to the visual theme of heavily armoured warriors.

A light breastplate, such as the one represented by the PD injection moulded armour is considered inferior by Jotun warriors. This armour is still common in Jotun armies - but is usually worn by members of the Jotun subject clans rather than by elite Jotun warriors.

Weapons

The axe is the favourite Jotun weapon, they consider it a more versatile weapon than a sword and believe it allows a stronger more skilled warrior to dominate his opponent. Most Jotun will wield a war axe with a shield, but many opt to wield a long handled axe with two hands. The Jotun also use other heavy hefted weapons like hammers and maces, where an axe is not available, and will employ swords as a last resort where no other weapon is available.

The Jotun avoid long spears and pikes, but younger Jotun warriors who are unable to afford the best armour will often favour a spear and shield in battle, taking advantage of their speed to make swift darting jabs at enemies foolish enough to leave themselves open to attack.

When it comes to ranged combat the Jotun prefer thrown axes or javelins. They do not tolerate crossbows on the battlefield, regarding them as dishonourable weapons that require neither skill or strength to use. They also tend to shy away from bows, However Jotun subject clans that do make use of bows as weapons of war are tolerated in the line.

Shields

Many Jotun carry shields into battle, paired with either an axe or short spear. They favour rounded shields, the style similar to those carried by the Steirn in Wintermark. These shields are mainly used to parry and block enemy blows with, allowing the warrior to fight aggressively. Rarely do they use them to form a strong wall of interlocking shields.

We will try to make sure we have enough red shield covers for round shields, so if you have a round shield it is worth bringing it with you even if it is highly distinct as we will hopefully be able to give you a cover for it.

Accessories

Red is often seen on their banners of war or incorporated into their costume in a totemic way. Even a small amount of red can make a big impact: a tabard or sash, scarf (to hide your human neck!), material belt or strips of cloth used as arm wraps or decoration on armour.

Fur trim, pelts and tokens made from teeth or bone are additional items that can be added to represent glorious kills a Jotun warrior has made whilst hunting. They consider powerful creatures such as dire lions, dire bears, dire boars and mandowla to be potent symbols of strength and might; many Jotun standards are topped with skulls of such animals.

Volunteering

Everyone who is volunteering to monster should turn-up wearing base costume and carrying a simple weapon if remotely possible. However if you are able to bring costume, weapons, and armour that are suitable for Jotun roles when monsterring for a Jotun fight, then this is an enormous help in making the battle look as good as possible. In particular, we will try to assign volunteers to groups based on the kit they bring with them; players who have good Jotun kit will be assigned Jotun roles, those without will be assigned to play barbarian orcs from a Jotun subject clan.

Any of the following kit is ideal when volunteering for a skirmish or battle involving the Jotun.

- Axe, hammer, or one-handed spear
- Round shield
- Mail shirt or hauberk over padding as appropriate
- Any greaves and vambraces
- Dark coloured tunic or red if available
- Dark trousers
- Leather warskirt

If you are playing Empire, then some of your personal kit may be extremely useful whenever you are volunteering to monster. Imperial kit that is especially useful when volunteering for Jotun battles is covered below.

Wintermark & Varushka

Mail is the obvious useful item, but parts of the soft kit for either of these nations could be invaluable when volunteering. Leather and fur trimmings and accessories work well for an elite Jotun warrior. Vambraces and greaves of any kind are also prized by the Jotun, but lamellar armour is rarely seen amongst the Jotun and is best left in camp.

Navarr

The leather and well worn look of the Navarr works well for younger Jotun warriors, especially if combined with the traditional Navarr shield and spear. Units of lightly armoured Jotun warriors are highly mobile and daring on the battlefield, launching swift attacks against exposed enemy formations to sow discord and panic.

Highguard & Dawn

The lightly armoured look of the younger Jotun warrior might also suit players with Highguard Unconquered or Dawnish Yeomanry kit. In particular any leather or fur trimmings can easily be incorporated into a Jotun costume. As noted, mail is favoured by Jotun over plate but if you have plate then a good approach would be to focus using the items that cover the neck and arms, perhaps worn over a gambeson and combined with items of red fabric.

Imperial Orcs

If you are playing an Imperial Orc then most of your costume is likely to be useful when volunteering. If you have layers of armour over chain, then consider just bringing your mail - this can be an opportunity to wear a bit less in battle! Imperial Orc kit is very distinctive, so if you are able to replace or supplement any elements with red fabric then this will help.

Brass Coast & Urizen

The Jotun have recently conquered the Lasambrians, a major clan of orcs located on the borders of the Brass Coast and bands of Lasambrian troops could appear on any Jotun battlefield. This means that Freeborn costume is surprisingly useful when volunteering for a large Jotun battle - as it will mean you can play a Lasambrian auxiliarie on the field. Whilst the Lasambrians are not seaborne corsairs, the desert and raiding themes of the Freeborn fit well here. Unlike the Jotun, the Lasambrian orcs also have a large number of battle mages who use their magics directly against the enemy. Both soft kit base layers and Brass Coast armour would work well combined with orange tunics and sashes that PD can help provide.

The Jotun field very few magicians on the battlefield, but the Lasambrian forces include witches who are skilled at using magic in combat. Urizen base costume will work well for a Lasambrian when combined with PD costume, but we are always short of wands, rods and staves. If you are playing a Freeborn or Urizen character and are own a suitable mage implement, then it is helpful if you can bring it with you when volunteering so we can cast you as a Lasambrian magician.

Judgement

Overview

Judgements are the way that the various assemblies of the Imperial Synod carry out their business. There are a number of different judgements, each of which has precise legal implications. By passing an appropriate judgement, an assembly may appoint a cardinal, veto a Senate motion, change doctrine, or revoke a general. All the main powers of the Synod rely on a judgement being raised and passed when directly employed by the Synod.

The only alternative to a judgement is if the Senate creates an Imperial title which has the legal authority to use one or more Synod powers. These powers can then be executed directly by the title holder without the need to submit a judgement for the approval of an assembly.

Proposal

Each member of the Imperial Synod, may propose a single judgement per summit. The judgement must be submitted to an appropriate civil servant (normally found in the Hub) at Anvil and must be submitted for the approval of a single appropriate assembly. To raise a judgement the priest needs to identify:

- Which Synod power they wish to utilise
- The target of the judgment if any
- Which assembly they are looking to place it before

The power and target of the judgement may determine which assembly is legally allowed to consider it. For example, only the General Assembly may excommunicate a citizen. A national assembly may revoke one of their own, but the Marcher National Assembly cannot consider a judgement to revoke a Navarr senator. The civil servants with expertise in Synod matters will be able to help advise inexperienced priests how best to use their judgement to achieve their goal.

The civil servant will record the judgment and display it prominently in the Hub so that it can undergo scrutiny by the members of the assembly who will vote on it. Every member of an assembly has the right to vote on every judgement raised with that assembly.

E.g. Marrok of Dawn wishes to raise a judgment of inquisition against members of a League coven believed to be consorting with Wendigo. Marrok seeks out an appropriate civil servant and indicates that he wishes to do this through the Assembly of Vigilance, of which he is a member.

Some Imperial titles grant the title holder the power to propose one or more judgements. If the title holder is already a member of the Synod then they may raise these judgements in addition to the single judgement every Synod member is entitled to.

A judgement must normally be allowed to continue until the voting has concluded. The Tribune may use their judgement to withdraw a judgement if the priest who raises it requests them to do so if it is very clear that that would serve the best interests of the Synod.

Voting

Weeds need no sowing.

The civil service do not arrange any formal meetings for the members of the Synod. When a judgement is raised, a physical copy of the judgement is pinned to the walls of the hub so that it may be scrutinized by any citizen. Eligible members of the Synod may then vote for (or against) the judgement at any point until voting closes.

Marcher Proverb

The votes of Synod priests in determining a majority are not equal. A priest's judgment is measured in influence, and their influence is weighted by the size, or importance, of their congregation. Voting is conducted in public and any citizen may view the records to see how many votes a judgement has gathered and who has supported or opposed it. A priest may change their vote at any point up until the judgement is passed or defeated.

At each summit there are five fixed deadlines when voting ends. A priest must choose which deadline to use for their judgement when they raise it. At any point up to the deadline, priests of the appropriate assembly can register their votes either for, or against, the judgement. They do this by seeking out an appropriate civil servant, usually at the Hub. The priest may change their vote at any time before voting concludes.

This system makes supporting the Synod easier for the civil service and easier for priests to know when voting on important judgements ends. At each deadline, the office of the Tribune of the Synod will close voting and then count the votes for every Synod judgement due to end then. These deadlines are currently set at 10pm on Friday, then 2pm, 6pm and 10pm on Saturday and finally 2pm on Sunday.

Majority

Truth is the judgement that endures.

For a judgment to be successfully made, it needs to achieve a majority. There are two kinds of majority: Highborn Saying

- A lesser majority is one where the votes in support of the judgment exceed those made against it
- A greater majority is one where the votes in support of the judgment exceed one half of the assembly's voting strength

If a judgment has achieved a greater majority before the voting deadline, then the priest who submitted the judgement may request that the civil service use their discretion to end the voting early and announce the decision. The civil service will usually acquiesce to the request, provided there are reasonable grounds to believe that the judgement has reached the greater majority, and that they are not already committed to other activities. If the Tribune confirms that the greater majority has been achieved in response to a request, then no more votes may be cast, nor existing votes changed.

The voting strength of an assembly can change as priests travel to and from Anvil. The Tribune will recalculate the assembly's voting strength after each voting deadline has closed - after the votes have been counted.

Scrutiny

Members of an assembly must be given sufficient time to weigh the issues and vote on a judgement. The period of time when a judgement is open for consideration and voting is called scrutiny.

A priest may raise a judgement at any time and may request any one of the remaining deadlines for their judgement. However their choice must ensure that members of their assembly have at least three hours to consider and vote on it, and once selected the deadline cannot be changed. The civil service will refuse any request for a judgement with less than three hours before the deadline, unless it has primacy or requires a greater majority. This means that a priest raising a normal judgement less than three hours before the impending scrutiny deadline must choose a later deadline - or delay their judgement to the next summit.

E.g. Priest Tacitus submits a statement of principle for scrutiny at 8pm on the Friday night of the summit. The next scrutiny closure is at 10pm, only 2 hours away. Therefore, the earliest the statement of principle can close is 2pm Saturday. Tacitus could also opt to close the judgement at 6pm or 10pm on Saturday, or even 2pm on Sunday.

In practice the office of the Tribune use some discretion when accepting a judgement, seeking to avoid unduly penalizing a priest for a few minutes delay.

Avoiding Scrutiny

Primacy

If a priest has gathered sufficient support of their Assembly that they have a greater majority present on the spot then they are permitted to raise a judgement and have it counted immediately. This is called primacy. In effect, the normal rules requiring three hours scrutiny are waved because primacy provides demonstrable proof that enough members of the Synod have already given the issue sufficient consideration.

Members of the synod who are present may choose to cast their votes for or against the judgement. Any group claiming primacy must wait until sufficient votes are recorded to achieve a greater majority. If there are insufficient votes to claim a greater majority then the Tribune will either fail the motion, or if there is sufficient time left at the summit to allow for scrutiny, post the Judgement as normal on the Synod board.

On the final day of the summit, a judgement must be raised before 11am to allow sufficient scrutiny before the voting deadline at 2pm. Synod Tribunes will usually advise any priest seeking to raise a judgement to bring primacy of their assembly if there is insufficient time for scrutiny to take place.

Greater Majority

Any judgement that requires a greater majority - veto, excommunication, recognition, or change of doctrine - may be raised without the need for three hours of scrutiny if a priest wishes. Since these judgements require a greater majority to pass they cannot come into force unless sufficient members of the Synod are aware of them and have approved them.

The Throne has the power to change a Synod judgement to require a greater majority. This power may be used to submit a normal judgement for voting without scrutiny.

Failure

If a judgement that requires a lesser majority has already been failed, then any subsequent judgement submitted to the same assembly in the same summit that has the same legal outcome will automatically require a greater majority to pass.

Withdrawal

A member of the Synod who has submitted a judgement may ask the Tribune of the Synod to use their legal powers to withdraw it. The Tribune will usually allow a judgement to be withdrawn, provided that they are satisfied that this is in the interests of the Synod. Withdrawing a motion has the same legal outcome as if it had failed; the Synod member may not submit a replacement.

If a judgement has attracted a significant number of votes already and it is clearly in the benefits of the Synod for the judgement to continue then the Tribune will not permit a judgement to be withdrawn. For example, if a judgement of veto were withdrawn at the last minute, when it was becoming clear that it would pass - then the Tribune will not allow that judgement to be withdrawn.

A citizen who is a candidate for a judgement of appointment may withdraw their candidature at any time. If they are the only candidate on the ballot, then the entire judgement will be withdrawn.

Kaela

Eternal of Winter

Contents

Sobriquets

Most commonly, Kaela is called the Lady of the Grim Host after the army of undying warriors she commands.

She is also known as the Sorrowful One, sometimes as End-of-Strength, sometimes as The Lady of Oblivion. among the Icewalkers of Wintermark she is called the Cold-Hearted; the Urizen stargazers refer to her as Dark-Between-The-Stars and say she despises and fears the Net of the Heavens; the Navarr call her Queen of Silence and say that she despises music and dance; and in The Marches she is called The Black Dog.

Her influence is strong in Axos and, to a lesser degree, the Sarcophan Delves. The Axou call her Queen Esk and seek her favour; there are several covens of magicians who serve as her agents selecting the best and brightest to convey to her presence so she may add them to her Grim Legion. In the Sumaah Republic she is shunned; magicians who deal with her are likely to face charges of blasphemy, heresy, idolatry or all three. In the Asavean Archipelago she is worshipped as a goddess - she is referred to as la Reine qui siège sur le Trône Noir (the Queen on the Black Throne) and it is customary for wealthy Asaveans, especially those of advanced age, to offer a sacrifice of food, wine and blood to her at the Winter Solstice.

Appearance

This Winter eternal appears either as a pale-skinned woman dressed in black armour, usually with a helmet crowned with the antlers of an elk and bearing a greataxe, or as an ancient crone dressed in dark-green and black with jewelry made from finger-bones. Traditionally she has appeared dressed as a Varushkan wise-one or boyar, but in recent decades she has taken to attire reminiscent of The Brass Coast or The League.

Kaela is never encountered alone; she is always accompanied by the warriors of her grim legion and by her undying attendants.

Concerns

Kaela exemplifies weakness, despair, old-age, senility and desperation. She takes no joy in these things, but presents them as simple, unquestionable facts. Everything fails. Everything dies. Everything falls apart. In the end, entropy wins.

It is not a matter of whether things will collapse, merely a matter of when. She respects those who strive to hold back the end ... as long as they accept that the end is inevitable, that there is no hope. Likewise she appreciates those who work to open the eyes of others to the essential futility of existence ... as long as they accept that their own actions are largely meaningless as well, in the long term. Optimists and priests alike tend to incur her cold wrath.

Despite her concern with ending and death, she is not especially interested in the undead. Husks, wights, ghosts and the like are said to bore her. At the point where a being becomes undead, they have already died - already lost - and undead creatures are pitiful shadows of living beings. In some cases, according to scholars, she has referred to them literally as shadows - cast-off by the mortal who created them. Like many Winter eternal her pragmatic nature does not balk at the use of the undead as tools, but she does not consider them people. Her grim legionnaires are sometimes mistakenly referred to as undead, but she prefers to call them "unliving" - they are neither alive, nor dead, and have never actually stopped living.

Unlike beings such as Llofir however, Kaela does not despise the undead - for the most part she simply ignores them. She rarely, if ever, offers boons that destroy them, and never offers boons that allow them to be created except in the most short-lived circumstances (such as by enhancing the ability of Quickening Cold Meat to call forth Winter spirits to temporarily ride empty corpses).

Many priests despise Kaela; they fear that she is trapping human souls, removing them from the cycle of reincarnation. The Imperial Synod has prevailed on the Imperial Conclave several times to declare her an enemy of the Empire. Some theologians speculate that the undying legions do not have souls at all; that the human dies, and their soul moves on to

- 1 Eternal of Winter
 - 1.1 Sobriquets
 - 1.2 Appearance
 - 1.3 Concerns
 - 1.4 Boons

the Labyrinth, and that the grim warriors are merely memories of themselves, little more than husks animated by a particularly strong animus. Speculation is likely to continue, as Kaela herself has no interest in answering questions about souls; she is generally dismissive when challenged.

In Wintermark she is strongly associated with the runes Kyrop and Yoorn.

Boons

Kaela's gifts are sorrow, despair and weakness; very few people want them for themselves. She can also offer wisdom, but always at a price - usually blindness or crippling infirmity. Some scholars say this is proof that she is connected to The Thrice-cursed Court; others point out that what she offers is wisdom, not power and that while the two appear similar, in the Winter Realm they are poles apart.

Her greatest boon, and the one she is most often approached to provide, is release from the fear of death (for at least as long as Creation endures). She can take someone who is not dead, even if they hover on the very brink of death, and bring them to her hopeless Realm to live on for eternity as one of her undying warriors. Sometimes she allows magicians to invoke her grim legion to fight alongside living warriors, but this return to the mortal Realm is always short-lived, and is a cruel reminder of the light, life, colour and joy that can never be experienced in the domain of Kaela.

Kaela prefers to take warriors over civilians, but anyone who has fought and striven in life who wishes to avoid death at any cost may find a place in her sorrowful court. Very rarely, she will bring forth a specific member of her legions to speak to mortals, provided they can be invoked by name and is among the legion. It is entirely at her whim if she chooses to do so. She can even be prevailed upon to allow one of her legion to die, but she will certainly charge a high price for this 'gift'.

Some seek out her ability to grant a painless death - she is said to be able to end anything that exists. She can kill a willing individual with a gentle caress, and it is said that even an apparently immortal creature such as a Volodny can be obliterated by her kiss. However, she is not a murderer and has no interest in forcing extinction on anyone. Only those who embrace death willingly will receive the painless death she offers. Her ability to kill is not limited to living beings - she is often evoked when performing Words of Ending, Black Iron Blade or by those attempting to unravel a permanent curse or enchantment.

Very rarely, Kaela offers a boon to an artist who has attracted her attention. She is known to appreciate well-crafted lays of lament, tragic poems, sad songs and theatrical events that end in despair, sorrow and bittersweet loss. A musician, playwright or poet who seeks to win her approval must be careful however, as she is known to dismiss those who fail to please her with a curse or a crippling malediction.

"By all means enjoy your life,

"But never forget that it is fleeting.

"Even if you manage to avoid violence, accident, pestilence ... even then you will age; you will decline; you will grow weak and infirm; your vision will dim, you will begin to forget; and then you will die. So will everyone you know and so will all your children down through all the ages until Creation itself gutters ... and goes out like a candle.

"So by all means, return to your home and raise your family, and strive to build a better world, and fight terrible wars for what you know is right and true; it gives one real hope for the whole future of Creation ... except, of course, we both know it has none."

OOO Note : The Grim Legion

It is entirely possible for a PC to join the Grim Legion in play, usually though an audience with the eternal. The PC must still be alive when they reach her chamber, and is usually Terminal. A character who is accepted into the Legion feels their infirmity drop away, and is restored to full health but they can never leave Kaela's realm without her permission. The player may have time for a final farewell to loved ones, but at the end of the audience the character is considered to have died or retired and cannot be played any further.

Requests to speak to specific player characters who have joined the Grim Legion are invariably refused. Joining the Grim Legion exists as a dramatic in-character way for a Terminal character to 'die' and once the role-playing is complete, there will be no further chances to play that PC just as there are none when a PC dies by any other means.

Individuals who have joined the Grim Legion are also considered dead by the Egregore ability to sense if someone is alive.

Kahraman

This is a placeholder page for content that PD are actively working on.

Overview

The mountains of Kahraman rise from the great grasslands of Soroche to the south and the Mournwold to the north, presenting a treacherous land of broken rock and barren mountainside. Fast-flowing streams spill down deep jagged-edged valleys. There is precious little in the way of vegetation, only scrub that clings to the slopes. However, there are riches in the mountains: here, the Freeborn find precious metals and minerals, often as sediment lying in the streambeds. Scattered settlements shelter in the valleys, with the remains of stone fortresses and watchtowers decaying on the heights above, remnants from the days before the Empire when the Freeborn warred with the Marches.

To the south of the mountains of Kahraman lie sweeping grass plains, a seemingly desolate landscape dotted with strange rock formations shaped by the wind. Here the Freeborn graze the bulk of their herds of goats and sheep. The wind from the west, the Delés, is constant and biting cold at night. As a result, for shelter, Freeborn communities settle in bowl-shaped depressions cut from the earth, their tents sunk below the plains' surface.

The families of Kahraman have a somewhat undeserved reputation for being quarrelsome; as a response, the Freeborn established the post of Dhomiro of the Cinnabar Hills to help mediate their disputes and to encourage trade between the sometimes quite isolated settlements here. The Dhomiro is an Imperial title that is appointed each Autumn by Freeborn citizens who control fleet personal resources.

Recent History

Since Liathaven and the Mournwold fell into the hands of the Jotun barbarians, there has been an increase in raids by orcs from the north. The Freeborn maintained vital trade routes and communications with the Navarr holdouts in Beacon Point, until the Jotun orcs forced the Navarr into Kahraman in late 379YE. By the spring of the new year, the Jotun had pushed deep into Kahraman, eventually making it all the way to the Great Mine of Briante until they were repelled by Imperial armies. After several months of fighting, the barbarians were chased back into the forests of Liathaven and by the Winter Solstice 380YE was Kahraman was free from barbarian occupation. However, the Jotun left a warning on the walls of Damata, saying that they had come once and would come again.

Major Features

The Gilded Peak

The mountain that separates the valley of Briante and the ancient stronghold of Fort Braydon bears a most peculiar summit, which at sunset or dawn gleams as if the rock is made of gold. The mountain is treacherous, and no-one has yet achieved it, although many have tried. "Climbing the Gilded Peak" has passed into local parlance as a phrase meaning "a fool's dream".

The Northern Peaks

The mountains along the northern borders of Kahraman are the home of several vicious clans of orc barbarians. Descended from mine working slaves who revolted during the orc rebellion, they refused all overtures from the Empire and expressed no interest in becoming Imperial orcs. Rather they created out-of-the-way strongholds for themselves and proceeded to prey on travellers and poorly defended caravans. Most of their spite was reserved for traders trying to cross the mountains to Liathaven, but in the years since they went rogue they have launched more than one concerted attack on a mining camp or northern village. The Empire would very much like to deal with them permanently, but they are like weeds - when one group is put down, another springs up a few years later to claim its territory.

The Great Mine of Briante

The Great Mine of Briante is a Bourse resource located in Briante. Custodianship of the Great Mine is an Imperial Title that brings with it a Seat on the Imperial Bourse. It produces 22 Imperial wains of mithril every season. Control is allocated to any Imperial citizen by open auction during the Autumn Equinox.

The Damation Cliffs

The Damatian Cliffs are a Bourse resource located in Damata. Custodianship of the Cliffs is an Imperial Title that brings with it a Seat on the Imperial Bourse. It produces 27 Imperial wains of white granite every season. Control is allocated to any Imperial citizen by open auction during the Summer Solstice.

Regions

Braydon's Jasse

The valleys of Braydon's Jasse are home to many small mining villages and the isolated homes of Freeborn families who value their privacy. The most famous feature of the Jasse is Fort Braydon, an old fortress dating from the days before the Marchers, when the Brass Coast kept watch against the barbarians and the Feni. The recent barbarian incursions have led to the rebuilding of its walls and strengthening of its defences. (OOO Note: Fort Braydon is a rank I fortification).

Gambit

Wide, arid plains characterise Gambit - named because every venture begun there is said to run a little extra risk but offer a little extra profit. Sunk into a natural depression in the rock-slopes that mark the southern limits of the Kahraman mountains is Rojota. Surrounded by goat-farming land, it is a hard place to scratch a living. Its fame is for a peculiar method of foretelling the future. Precious - for the Brass Coast - scraps of wood are left to weather in dust blown by the Delés and interpreted by sutannir skilled in such matters.

Jade Range

The Jade Range takes its names both from the rich deposits of tempest jade in the hills and from the dark, rich colouration of its grassy plains, kept lush by great underground aquifers. The grazing here is good, nearly a match for that of the Great Grasses in Madruga or the Sobral Grasses of Segura. The plains are spotted with settlements, the largest of which is probably Nestor's Bounty, named for a scrivener who made a vast fortune writing contracts for the sale of rich claims found in the hills. As with Briante, this town is well-known for its mines, particularly precious stones and tempest jade.

Serra Briante

This hilly region is named for the Briante valley and the town that shares the same name. Surrounded by rich open-cast mines, Briante is now home for a number of displaced Navarr steadings, pushed out of Liathaven by the Jotun incursions. The town still maintains the Navarr beacons that once allowed the inhabitants of southern Liathaven to maintain simple communication with their northern neighbours - as well as provide early warnings of potential attacks from western lands outside the Empire. The Great Mine of Briante - one of the great wonders of the Empire and perhaps even the world - lies at the heart of the valley.

Serra Damata

The Damation Cliffs, a valuable Imperial Bourse seat, are found near Damata.

One of the most important settlements in the Serra Damata is the town from which the region took its name - Damata. For centuries a trading centre for the surrounding peaks, where rich deposits of orichalcum are still found, Damata was famed for its walls, every metre of which is covered in finely calligraphed script, recording stories that have been told amongst the Freeborn for generations. One day, they say, there will be no more room for writing, and then the town will perish, its life written. Until the Jotun invaded, Dawnish troubadours and Winterfolk scops alike travelled for some distance to learn the stories on the walls of Damata.

In Winter 379YE, an army of barbarian orcs swept down out of Liathaven, conquered Damata, and then moved on to secure the Damation Cliffs. After the region was reclaimed by Imperial armies at the end of 380YE it was found that the town had weathered its occupation without the walls sustaining any damage. The Jotun had in fact added to the walls, carving an ominous warning that said "We came. We shall come again".

Kala

Virtue

Kala was recognised as an exemplar of Wisdom by the Imperial Synod in 28YE.

Biography

Despite the fact she lived and died nearly 200 years before the foundation of the Empire, the life of Kala is surprisingly well documented. A pre-Imperial Urizen born in Ravion in Morrow, Kala's parents were founder members of Windward Spire along the banks of the Couros river. According to her biographer Legimens of Windward, from an early age she drove the adults in her life mad with a constant stream of questions about why things were the way they were. To the surprise of nobody, she grew up to be an avid natural philosopher, fascinated by the world around her. She penned her first scholarly treatise at the tender age of 8, comparing the various methods of locomotion of the insects around her home. The original document, complete with beautiful water colour paintings of the crickets, water boatmen, bees, beetles, and spiders, still survives today having been smuggled out of the library of Ankarien hours ahead of the flames of Emperor Nicovar.

Kala was at best an indifferent magician. As she grew older, she contentiously argued that the pursuit of excellence was not the same as the pursuit of magic. A student of Day magic, she preferred to rely on her mundane skills in her investigations of the world; she spent a small fortune on carefully shaped lenses rather than crystal mana. She is occasionally credited as having invented the spyglass (although there is little evidence for this), and alongside everything else her studies lead to dramatic improvements in the crafting of spectacles.

Her inquiring spirit - her drive to know why things were the way they were - was matched only by her drive to share what she knew with others, and to learn from them in turn. She helped refine and spread practices of rational debate that were embraced beyond Urizen - she is referenced in early League and Highborn texts dealing with formal logic, debate, and oratory for example.

It was her drive to share that led to the invention for which she is most remembered - she devised a series of measurements that are still in use today across the entire Empire. Frustrated by using similes when she craved precision, Legimens describes how she gathered together all the systems of measurement she could find in the world and "weighted them each in turn, taking from each only those measurements she found useful." She published her findings in a scroll entitled "Weighing the World" and over the course of the next century they were adopted by scholars in Urizen and beyond.

She died peacefully at the age of 72, halfway through a treatise on mathematics that was never completed. Indeed, she passed away in the middle of writing out a complex equation that to this day has never been solved because a significant part of it existed only in Kala's mind.

As a well respected scholar, her story might have ended there. However, in the early years after the foundation of the Empire, Emperor Giovanni convinced the Urizen to become the ninth nation. He also charged them with instituting a system of education among the other nations, one many of them took to with gusto. As part of that education, they spread Kala's system of measurements to the other nations. To help encourage the adoption of that system - something that was of great value to builders and engineers in particular as it would make it much easier for them to cooperate across national lines - the Urizen assembly sponsored Kala as an exemplar of Wisdom. There was almost no opposition - her achievements spoke for themselves and her name was already well-known by educated people across the southern and eastern Empire. It did not hurt, of course, that their plan had the backing of the Emperor.

Kala is closely associated with her fellow exemplar Avigliana di Sarvos, who is believed to be a reincarnation of this erudite woman who strove constantly not only to conquer her own ignorance, but that of her fellow humans throughout the world.

Signs

- Kala's many, many writings form the basis of a great deal of Imperial scholarship and are a sign of her Benevolence. Not only did she strive to expand her understanding, she applied what she learned in practical ways, encouraged others to do so, and was never too proud to learn by talking to others.
- As a natural philosopher and practical scholar, Kala has inspired generations to follow in her footsteps. They look at the world, learn how it works, and find ways to employ their learning to make that world a better place.

- Her excellent example has led to the salvation of countless Imperial citizens. Leaving aside the number of lives her studies saved, or the way they improved the quality of life for thousands, she also demonstrated that by embracing Wisdom, by sharing and learning lore, and by exercising a keen judgement, one can change the world.
- She left behind a lasting legacy not only in the shape of her system of measurements, but in the countless books and scrolls she authored and co-authored, and in the systems of rationality she helped refine and promote. Also, spectacles. Her calculations also laid the groundwork for the Imperial standardization of how much ore goes into an ingot, a measure, or a dose of special materials and herbs.
- She almost certainly undertook a pilgrimage to Highguard during her life. Whether she actually visited Bastion or not is a matter for debate, but it is believed she visited the Urizen's neighbours to the west several times to consult with their scholars - both to share her discoveries and to learn from them in her turn.
- A theory put forward by one of the Highborn priests of Wisdom that her keen intellect was miraculous in nature caused loud disagreement. In the end the suggestion was withdrawn. While Kala was undeniably very clever, there was no suggestion that she was possessed of supernatural powers. Her achievements were inspiring because they were the kind of achievements anyone could aspire to.

Kallavesa

Overview

This is the ancestral home of the Kallavesi, a land of cold stagnant bogs. The land changes through the seasons, but always has a feeling of brooding stillness. In the warmer months it is a boggy marsh cut through with streams and fjords. In the winter the waterways freeze over and the whole land is covered with frost and snow. The marsh serves as the national graveyard and this is a place of ancient secrets and mysticism.

It is a mournful land, but a beautiful one. Thanes' halls are traditionally constructed entirely from wood here and those built in marshy areas are raised up on stilts. Many halls in Kallavesa are built around sacred places or places with a magical reputation. There are not believed to be any troll ruins in Kallavesa; while stories occasionally speak of shattered halls buried beneath the Rundhal Marsh, these tales are considered largely fanciful or allegorical.

Parts of Kallavesa, especially the West Marsh have a reputation for being haunted. Not only are the marshes where the honoured dead of Wintermark are interred, they have also seen regular battles through the ages. Several vicious battlefields lie drowned beneath the boggy marshes; the Jotun have raided across the narrow sea from Kalsea since time-out-of-mind; in pre-Imperial centuries there were irregular border skirmishes across the southern borders - first with with the the orcs who dwelt where Bregasland and Mitwold lie today, later with Marchers who displaced them. Orc and human dead alike lie in the deep pools of the western and southern marshes, and they do not always lie still.

Kallavesa is rich to many fine herb gardens. Perhaps as a consequence of the many battlefields buried beneath the marshes, the territory is known for the quality of the bladeroot that grows here. The Kallavesi themselves are acknowledged experts in the use of herbs - the Infusions of Feathers were first developed here in the Wittal Groves and later shared with apothecaries from across the Empire.

The Senator for Kallavesa is appointed by the Kallavesi during the Winter Solstice, and is almost invariably of Kallavesi stock.

Recent History

In the Winter of 370YE the Jotun invaded in force, taking West Marsh and pushing into Skymark. Before they could consolidate their hold, however a joint campaign by Wintermark and Marcher armies drove them out under the leadership of a young Skarsind general named Britta. Without her excellent leadership and inspirational presence it is widely believed that both Sermersuaq and Kallavesa would have been lost to the orcs. Further attempts at invasion were stymied by the re-vitalised and re-equipped armies left behind to guard against another attack.

The marshes of Kallavesa are the final resting place of the great heroes and heroines of Wintermark. Alone of all previous Emperors and Empresses, Empress Britta was interred in the marshes rather than resting at Necropolis. The Highborn have built a shrine and appointed a Guardian of Britta's Shrine, but the body itself (or as much of it as was recovered from the Thule) rests beneath the waters of Kallavesa.

Major Features

Rundhal

Once the capital of Kallavesa, in Rundhal where mystics sent dreams to the Steinr, and where the wise met to choose the monarch of Wintermark before the Empire. It is still a place of utmost importance to those who follow the Kallavesi traditions, and is where many of the oldest traditions are passed on. Scops come to the round hall to learn the stories and songs that tell their nation who they are and inspire heroes across all of Empire.

The weed-choked waters at the heart of Kallavesa, boundaries and waterways shifting and reform all the time, as small islands of floating reeds drift on unpredictable currents. Attempts to build permanent structures here are stymied by chaotic nature of the floating islands and the presence of several large colonies of marshwalkers who will not tolerate the disruption of their boggy territory.

The Pilgrim's Trail

Following the internment of Empress Britta in the Sovevann, an opportunity to help pilgrims visit the sacred waters of Kallavesa to honour the heroes of Wintermark. Senator Olle Markusson commissioned the Pilgrim's Trails during the Winter Solstice 379YE, and they were completed shortly before the Summer Solstice 380YE. The Trail consists of many roads and bridges built to connect the major religious sites across Kallavesa to each other, and to the rest of the Empire

The Senate decision to construct the Trails was enthusiastically supported by many of the Winterfolk. Wry comments were made concerning how people who thought the "Anvil mud" would react to what the people of Kallavesa call "dry land". The completion of the project became a point of pride, and donations came in from across Wintermark.

Surveyors planned an optimal route through the marshes, intended to minimise the number of bridges required while at the same time ensuring the trails passed through as many communities, and past as many shrines and resting places as possible. At the Spring Equinox 380YE, word came that an egregore had fallen valiantly in battle, and that an agreement with the Jotun meant that his body would be returning home - along with the bodies of many heroes who had fallen fighting the orcs. The builders were determined that the trails would be completed in time that the body of Guthwulf would be the first to pass along them. The last blocks for the last bridge were placed as the funeral procession was mere paces away. As the procession was crossing, in a flash of inspiration a builder who had not yet put their tools away carved into the side of the bridge the name of the egregore, Guthwulf of the Red Embrace.

The name was soon joined by that of the other fallen heroes of Wintermark who travelled across it, and in other parts of the Pilgrim's Trail mourners have begun carving the names of the dead into the fabric of the last bridge they cross on their way to their final resting place in the waters of Kallavesa.

Regions

Kallavesa Marsh

Sandwiched between the Westmere and the Sovevann, this is the place most outsiders think of when they imagine Kallavesa. Boggy marsh, dotted with lone huts on stilts where pale herons stalk and burbling frogs maintain an eerie chorus at dawn and dusk. These are the haunted marshes where the heroes of Wintermark rest, and the few scattered halls here are generally given over to the study of The Way or serve as hostelries for visiting pilgrims come to honour the dead.

The largest settlement in this region is Masi home to the dead and those who guard them. Funerals are usually held here. On the rare occasions that a Feni or Jotun raid is not turned back at the borders, it is the warriors of Masi who force them back.

Keywords: Marsh; the presence of so many dead heroes gives the entire region the haunted keyword; there are more ghosts here than anywhere else in the Empire with the possible exception of the Necropolis in Highguard.

Rundhal Marsh

Site of Rundhal, the largest permanent settlement in Kallavesa. It is a place dedicated to wisdom and the mystic learning of the Kallavesi. While Rundhal Marsh is boggy and damp, the western stretches towards Hahnmark are somewhat elevated and drier - here are found many copses of beggarwood and other softwoods, carefully tended by stewards who ensure their health and that the availability of wood for building the unique stilted buildings of the marshes.

Keywords: Marsh

Skymark

The northernmost of the Kallavesa regions is chilled by northern winds for much of the year, but is also home to rich farms and sprawling holds. Small fishing fleets are common here, and several of the villages here maintain ties with their cousins in Sermersuaq via the Rikkivesi and the Atkonartoq. In southern Skymark is Ishal, across the cold waters of Sovevann from Rundhal and Masi, furthest of the three settlements round the lake at the heart of Kallavesa. This is where the wise go to read the future in the flight of birds and the night skies, as the scops learn at Rundhal and the dead heroes rest in the marshes near Masi. It's a place for the old, for learning and for clear thought. "Threes, and threes and threes," the seers say, those who foretold the coming of the Steirn.

West Marsh

On the shores of the Westmere stands Westerhal, home to the small fleet of Kallavesi boats that keep the coast safe from Jotun raiders. Its importance has slowly dwindled, in part due to the rise of Meade in the Marches which has much better access to wood and stores, but the patrol ships of the Marches are uncommon this far north. Once it was the second settlement of Kallavesa, and there are residents who would like to see it take its place again as a centre of trade and defence of Wintermark - perhaps with a new fortification.

Keywords: Marsh, Coastal

Wittal Grove

At the heart of the grove stands Wittal, a place of learning and the study of herbs and plants. Many grimmir have spent a season or more studying here, as have healers from further afield, even a few from far Urizen. Some never return from foraging expeditions into the deep-woods; the Feni are usually blamed. The inhabitants of Wittal also maintain the Tree of Swords, a lone elm tree in a glade hung with the swords of dead Wintermark warriors that is also the heart of a strong Winter regio. Weapons are hung there of warriors who died with their quests uncompleted. It's said that if the tree ever flowers, the warriors will return.

Where the trees join the marshes, on the shores of the Westmere, stands the small port of Fisk. Before there was an Empire, Fisk was an armed camp watching the orcs of what is now Mitwold (and later, the Marchers who displaced them). After the formation of the Empire, the warriors largely left Fisk and the traders moved in. Today, Fisk is a small but prosperous port allowing adventurous ship owners to trade with Meade and the Marchers and even with foreigners across the sea as far as the Asavean Archipelago and the Sumaah Republic.

OOOC Notes

- All the regions of Kallavesa are under Imperial control
- Attempting to build a permanent fortification in one of the regions with the march quality is likely to encounter additional difficulties.
- The Pilgrim's Trail is a great work that provides an additional 50 votes in the Imperial Synod and 25 liao divided among the congregations of Kallavesa. They were built as the result of an opportunity (detailed here) - under normal circumstances a great work cannot provide liao and votes.
- Some of the prominent halls of Kallavesa are detailed here.

The Plants of Kallavesa

The Kallavesa swamps are home to many rare and unique forms of flora and fauna that are below our abstraction layer in the sense that they are important to the Kallavesi mystics, but not important enough to be one of the five herbs. While many of these herbs have useful properties (such as groveblossom or bitterweed), they are very much along the lines of headache treatments or gentle sleeping draughts, rather than purification of an envenomed wound or repairing a crippled limb. Other examples might include tobacco, for example, or flavoursome herbs used in cooking, as well as mild narcotics.

It is very common for the folk of Kallavesa (of all traditions) to reference odd herbs or animal extracts - but it is important not to let other players get the impression that these plants are a big deal, as this will cause confusion, or disappointment.

One possible opportunity these herbs present is for a character who wants an unusual or distinctive farm or business. Like the herders you could define your business as trading in medicinal herbs, or your farm as growing minor medicinal plants - indeed it is easy and appropriate to diversify a farm to include some of the potent herbs produced by a herb garden.

Kallavesi

The value of a life is weighed in the choices that have been made - and those that have not been made.

Tekupala

Overview

The Kallavesi are one of the three traditions of Wintermark. According to the scops, they were born from the feathers of a flock of crows scattered on the marshes of Kallavesa. Regardless of the truth of this claim, they and their Suaq cousins have lived in the north-west since before written records, perhaps predating even the Terunael empire. They joined with the Suaq and the Steinr to defeat the trolls, and continue to claim the fog-shrouded marsh territory of Kallavesa as their ancestral home.

The stereotypical Kallavesi is mystic, peculiar, and wise. They wear homespun wool, fur, and leather clothing and love to decorate themselves with feathers and semi-precious stones. Their colours are the colours of the marsh - earthen greys and browns, smoke-grey, moss green, and the occasional bright flash of colour. Bedecked with totems and fetishes whose meaning is often deeply personal, they often cover their heads and hide their faces with peculiar masks evoking the power of a favoured animal spirit. They are always watching, considering, weighing, dreaming. They are the last to speak, but their words echo with insight and wisdom.

Kallavesi Heroes

The Winterfolk admire heroism and believe that it speeds a spirit's passage through the Labyrinth of Ages. When people remember the legendary figures of Wintermark history they often think of the of the otherworldly Kallevesi, bedecked in feathers, dispensing vital wisdom to those they guide. The Kallevesi believe that heroism comes from the exploration of the skein - from the choices a person makes as they travel through life. Once is a decision is made, one cannot go back and make the choice again, one can only move forward to the next choice. The iconic Kallavesi hero is Tekupala, the Kallevesi shaman that guided Empress Mariika to greatness.

The Kallavesi live in dreams. Dreams are the gateway to understanding that reveal truths about the world of which the waking mind is ignorant. They trust their intuition, and listen to their instincts. They are masters of divination, seeking truths that are yet to come to pass or hidden in the past. They do not rely solely on magic, which is just one tool among many. They make use of common tools, casting runestones or drawing cards to unlock their inner eyes to see what is hidden to others. The wisest among them are masters of herbal arts that awaken the mind and allow it to see - the Infusions of Feathers are based on recipes that have been used by the Kallavesi for centuries.

More than any other, this tradition looks to the future. Of all the three people they are the ones most interested in shaping their destiny and the destiny of others. They plan for the long term, seeking meaning from the past and the present to help them to see the wider picture. They are strategists, diplomats, and counsellors - identifying the threads that will fork the skein for weal or woe for a person - or a nation.

They are wise, but they are also passionate. They may take their time deciding on a course of action, but when they have made up their minds they commit themselves to act without reservation. The archetypal Kallavesi warrior may meditate before entering a battle, but once the fight begins they throw themselves into the fray wrapped only in the skin of a bear or wolf, committing themselves fully to the fight. There can be no half-measures for the warrior in battle - but for the Kallevesi hero there are no half-measures in anything - once the path is chosen they do not look back.

More stormcrows and mystics are drawn from the Kallevesi tradition than either Suaq or Steinr. Wintermarkers do not always follow the advice that such heroes given them - but they know that it is always worth listening to. As guides, both spiritual and practical, Kallevesi drive those who hear them to confront new ideas and consider new perspectives on how they can solve their problems. The best are able to inspire their peers from the other nations to do the same.

It is rare for an individual to personify all these traits, but striving is more important than success. The Kallavesi vision of themselves is of a far-sighted people for whom heroism is born in equal parts of wisdom and passion. They value the wisdom that comes from within, but they also value decisive action that twists the skein towards newer, better paths.

The Kallevesi are a deeply religious people, believing fundamentally in the power of faith and the spirit. While most of them embrace the Way, they are often at odds with more orthodox priests. The virtues provide power, it is true, but they are not the only spiritual forces that the Kallavesi honour. There have been repeated accusations that in private the Kallavesi talk about the inspirational power of the ancestors of the Winterfolk, more than they do the recognised paragons and exemplars. They are said to commune with the spirits of the dead in a manner more suited to orcs than Imperial citizens, and to make use of dream quests, trance-like meditation, and drugged inspiration to receive inspirations that have little to do with the doctrine of the faithful.

Wisdom is the pre-eminent virtue of the Kallavesi, and many dedicate their lives to seeking it. Unlike some Imperial citizens, they are more likely to look for wisdom internally through meditation than externally in books or the counsel of others. They also seek to share their wisdom and understanding - Tekupala, who served as an advisor to Empress Mariika (and, if stories are believed, a great many other Wintermark heroes through the centuries), is an inspiration to many Kallavesi people.

The Kallavesi are also Vigilant, keeping their eyes peeled for threats to themselves and their people. The Kallavesi urge the vigilant to listen to their instincts, and heed their intuition - if one has a bad feeling or a nightmare about someone or something, they often argue, it is a sign that there is something to be worried about.

Courage is greatly valued among the Kallavesi. They believe that once a decision is made you should commit yourself utterly to that path and hold nothing back. It may take them time to decide what needs to be done, but once that decision is made they strive to act with the irresistible force of an avalanche. The skein teaches that once a choice has been made, it cannot be undone, and must make the best of it.

Loyalty is especially prized by many Kallevesi - especially those who take up roles as counsellors or guides. They understand that true heroism requires many sacrifices - a hall can only have one thane, but they must be supported by many if they are to rule wisely and well. The Kallevesi welcome the chance to work through others, content to put aside the glory of leading for a chance to guide a great leader's skein.

Kallavesi Mysticism

Regardless of their calling, the followers of this tradition have a preoccupation with spiritual matters. The magical practices of the mystics are well known, but are only one example of the way the Kallavesi weave mysticism into every walk of life. Warriors, thanes, diplomats, artisans, and scops alike draw on the deep well of Kallavesi esoteric understanding to guide their path.

The Wintermark customs surrounding birds and feathers are well known, but they are even more pronounced with the Kallavesi. According to mystic lore, a bird's wisdom is contained in its feathers. Kallavesi often make a point of collecting and wearing any feathers they find, seeking to gain mystical insight by absorbing the discarded thoughts of the bird that shed them.

Like their Suaq cousins, some Kallavesi warriors choose certain beasts as personal totems, often wearing a beast skull or leather and bone mask as a helmet. The meaning a beast has may be quite subjective drawing on personal symbolism and idealised imagery. One Kallavesi warrior might wear a wolf helmet to draw on the fierce Loyalty of the wolf pack, while another might favour a wolf-skin cloak as a reminder of the bold ferocity the wolf shows against threats.

A few Kallavesi also keep the traditions of ancestor reverence alive among the Winterfolk. Before the Way, the three peoples honoured their ancestors as exemplars of heroism and the right way to live. Since joining the Empire, some Kallavesi have continued to quietly teach the stories of honoured ancestors with the same weight as the stories of exemplars and paragons. There has always been a great deal of interest in having these ancestors recognised as paragons and exemplars by the Imperial Synod.

Karov

Overview

The rich heartland of the nation, and the wealthiest territory in terms of timber and amber, this is where most outsiders think of when Varushka is mentioned. The vales here exist among rich forests, where they have not been cleared to make way for small farms. Karov has the largest towns in Varushka, and the majority of its boyars come from this relatively civilised territory. A great deal of trade happens in Karov, with wagon trains and river barges carrying raw materials south to Temeschwar or Weirwater and north to more isolated valleys who are in need.

Despite its settled nature, it would be a mistake to think the land is entirely tamed and great tracts of wilderness still remain, often home to particularly malignant – if quiescent – sovereigns. These creatures awaken or emerge from time to time with often tragic consequences - so the wise ones take care to ensure each generation remembers the warning stories about creatures whose last depredations may have been in the times of their grandparents or great-grandparents.

Karov was one of the first places settled by the Vard during their early conflict with the Ushka. They ruthlessly cleared areas of forests to build their settlements and some of the oldest towns show clear influence of their shared heritage with the Steinr of Wintermark, especially in the west. Indeed, there are several old battlefields in western Karov where Vard and Steinr, and later Varushkan and Wintermark, clashed in the distant past long before the foundation of the Empire. A number of very old tales from Karov include two siblings who romance a stranger; the former represent Vard and Steinr, the latter the Ushka. Invariably the elder sibling wins the affection of the stranger, and the younger angrily retreats to the west. This is a highly stylised and historically dubious version of the founding of Varushka, but it is popular nonetheless.

On the whole, the folk of Karov enjoy many of the finer things in life - good food, good drink and regular festivals. Many towns and villages in Karov employ Stzena, local musicians who perform at local civic events and celebrations; there are several vales here dedicated specifically to the training of Stzena, and recording and preserving the music and songs of the Varushkan people.-

Recent History

Karov is perhaps the most peaceful of the Varushkan territories. Until Karsk fell to the Thule, they had enjoyed three and a half centuries of peace. In 372YE the Thule attempted to push through Malimorzi and briefly occupied the settlement of Korotny, but they were driven back within a season by the combined forces of the Northern Eagle and Golden Axe. Raiding parties still creep across the border from time to time, but for the most part Karov has been unmolested.

Major Features

Delev

The oldest and proudest of the vales that guard the road from the Semmerlak to Seren and the south, Delev is a hub for the many smaller vales dotted around southern Varushka. It has a complex rivalry with Temeschwar, which outgrew its parent and then left the family to join the League. Delev is again the foremost trading town in Karov, which suits it well. Despite the intervening centuries, there is still some bad blood between the citizens of Delev and those of Varushkan descent in Temeschwar. A particular bone of contention are the Eternal Shafts of Time, which the Temeschwari attempted to "take with them" when they seceded. Several Karov families at least keep alive tales of treachery, ingratitude and attempted theft.

In early 377YE a sequence of fortified watchtowers and walled camp sites was erected around Delev, and in various strategic points along the road to Seren, serving as secure bases of operation for bounty-hunters and wardens concerned with both bandit and wolves alike. Overseen by Henry Ward (senator for Upwold) as part of a larger Senate initiative to provide protection to towns throughout the Empire, the defences are not sufficient to qualify Delev as a fortification but have already helped reduce casual outlawry throughout the territory. They have also prompted some discussion about further work, and the value of building a complete system of forts and castles in the vicinity of this vital trade hub.

Shortly before the Autumn equinox 380YE, work was completed on the offices of the Overseer of the Westward Road, a ministry dedicated to coordinating trade between western Varushka and the orcs of Skarsind. It forms the eastern arm of the Northern trade network.

The Weeping Stone

This is a great standing stone atop a mound in Kamienczka near the border with Wintermark. The stone appears melted, like the wax of a candle, as if it once stood in a limestone cave. No grass will grow on the mound, and there are several stories of unnatural disappearances in the vicinity. According to legend, roads built in the vicinity of the Weeping Stone fall into ruin with preternatural speed, and any building that can be seen from the stone is likewise doomed to fall apart. The tales say that within three years no two stones will still lie side by side, and there are enough stories of collapsed bridges, unexpected raids and disastrous fires to support this belief.

In legends this locale is sometimes associated with the Sovereign known as the Tallowman, although this connection might simply be based on the way the "melted" appearance of the stone.

The Eternal Shafts of Time

The Eternal Shafts of Time are a Bourse resource located in Vorota. Custodianship of the Shafts is an Imperial Title that brings with it a Seat on the Imperial Bourse. It produces 27 Imperial wains of mithril every season. The seat is allocated during the Autumn Equinox, to whichever Varushkan candidate receives the most support from Varushkan owners of mine resources.

Regions

Duzekani

This lightly wooded region is where Delev - one of the major Varushkan trade hubs - can be found. Duzekani is well-known for the fine quality of its bees, as well as for some of the best forests for finding iridescent gloaming in Varushka (the land is often too cold for the butterflies that produce the rare material to truly prosper). For the most part, however, the woods of Duzekani have been cleared or tamed - this is the civilised heart of the most civilised territory of Varushka.

Kamienczka

The least settled region of Karov, Kamienczka has a reputation for being an unfortunate place to be born. Most of the blame is aimed squarely at the Weeping Stone which stands in the foothills to the west. The only vale of any great size is Olvanshka, home to several Warden fellowships standing guard on the Sovereigns believed to sleep in the hills to its north and west - and who keep a watch over the Weeping Stone for good measure.

Malimorzi

The easternmost of the regions of Karov, and the one most in danger of invasion when Karsk was in the hands of the Thule. A great deal of trade comes through Malimorzi from other settlements along the shore of the Semmerlak. Much of that trade comes through the bustling port of Korotny, built on the north-western shores of the great freshwater lake that allows trade with Dawn and, at one time, Holberg. It is also known for one of the largest fishing fleets in Varushka.

Some of the more entrepreneurial minded inhabitants of Korotny dream of how their fortunes might rise if the Barrens was brought into the Empire and their vessels could trade the length of the southern rivers to Therunin. From time to time, exploratory expeditions set forth to the eastern shore, scouting lands believed to be under the thrall of the Druj or perhaps exotic foreigners. Some return with goods, tales, and a measure of pride. Most do not.

Skoremujac

Forested Skoremujac is a centre for fur-trapping and the production of both ambergelt and dragonbone. Much of this industry revolves around Kolvy. The locals know well that wealth attracts wolves and the hunting is done subject to great care, attempting to leave as little disturbance to any slumbering horrors as can be. Today, Kolvy is primarily known outside of Karov as the site of the "last" major engagement between the Varushkan armies and the ex-slave orc forces during the Orc Rebellion, and is said to be where the agitator who started the revolt lost his life

Keywords: Wooded.

Wieliczka

The people of Wieliczka have the closest ties of any Varushkan to the people of the League. The fortified settlement of Vorota was once a vital guard against the people of the south, and its folk consider themselves the last vale of true Varushka on the road south. It is home to some who chose to leave Temeschwar rather than leave Varushka, and many don't have the warmest of feelings towards the prodigal city. Indeed, when the Temeschwari ejected their criminals during the notorious Night of a Thousand Torches some of the most organised made it as far as Vorota and laid siege to the town. The settlement has been fortified of late due to the Jotun incursions in Wintermark, and the guards are even more suspicious of travellers than usual.

Karsk

Overview

This has always been a war-torn land. The scene of many vicious battles against the barbarians since before Varushka joined the Empire, it is scattered with fortresses, battlefields and ruins. It has an accursed reputation, and many stories refer to the "bloated crows of Karsk, grown fat from human flesh and suffering." At one time this territory was home to numerous merchant boyars who became rich capturing and enslaving orcs to work in the mines of Volodmartz. When the Imperial orcs joined the Empire and it became illegal to keep orcish slaves, the senator for Karsk was brutally murdered during a meeting with a dozen now-ruined Karsk boyars including the last scion of the Zeleny mining family.

Recent History

After a period of escalating raids, barbarian orcs invaded Karsk from the north in 368YE. In a series of surprise attacks they overwhelmed the border fortresses and pushed deep into the heart of the territory. The ferocity and sheer numbers involved in the assault took the Varushkans by surprise, and before the Empire could organize an effective counter-attack, Karsk had fallen.

The campaign against the orcs stretched on for several decades. A few vales held out against the barbarians, backed up by some Imperial forces, a cabal or two and a few fellowships of wardens. Scattered reports revealed that the initial strong invasion quickly stalled. It soon became clear that the invading orcs were fighting among themselves, and with some of the few remaining indigenous orcish bandit tribes.

Following major offensives in Moresvah and Nitrost a strike team assaulted the town of Isemer in Lestasny during the Spring Equinox 378YE. A focal point for traitors aiding the Thule, victory resulted in the destruction of the town and drove Thule forces back into the eastern regions. Karsk was once again in Imperial hands - but the campaign was far from over. The Thule forces showed no sign of abandoning the territory. As the year lengthened, the barbarians regrouped and in Autumn launched a counter-offensive. During the Autumn Equinox, Nitrost was lost following a concerted Thule offensive, and with it Imperial control of the territory.

Within three months, however, the tide of war had turned back the other way. A major campaign by Varushkan, Navarr and Urizen forces aided by powerful ritual magic forced the Thule back out of Nitrost, returning the territory to Imperial hands. During the Winter Solstice 378YE, Karsk was once again made part of Varushka - but this time there was a good deal more discussion in the Imperial Senate, and some talk of granting it to the Imperial Orcs as their first territory.

Major Features

Aleksandra's Watch

Commissioned by the Senate in Spring 381YE, and designed by Almodin Oktístis, this fortification was completed with magical assistance shortly before the Winter Solstice 381YE.

The white granite used in the construction came exclusively from Veltsgorsk, and the walls bear distinctive bands of red, orange and pink quartz which have caused some travelers to give the fortification fanciful names such as "the Castle of Sunset". Where possible the Asavean architect has arranged the bands in swirling arabesques which, while attractive, are somewhat at odds with the dark hills of Lestasny. Indeed, the entire fortification is subtly "off" to Varushkan eyes. While the architect has followed the traditional lines of a Varushkan fortress - a solid gatehouse, keep, and wall surmounted by circular towers with high sloped roofs - the structure is informed by Asavean sensibilities. There are few straight lines in the place; walls and passages tend to curve and bend; rooms are usually circular or oval. The layout is much more open and relaxed than is traditional in Varushka, and more than one visitor has remarked that at times it is a little like being inside a giant seashell.

It is also more brightly decorated than is usual for Varushka. The floor of the great hall, for example, bears a beautiful circular mosaic depicting a great octopus surrounded by marine creatures. Made from polished Veltsgorsk quartz and chips of locally-sourced tempest jade. The gatehouse is surmounted by two statues of grim-faced schlacta with the heads of bulls, each armed with a large circular shield and a one-handed trident. It is certainly beautiful but it seems much more appropriate to a villa on the shores of the Bay of Catazar than a castle in our Karsk.

Built above the vale of Iversgard, the castle is named for the late Aleksandra Irinova Prochnost, a revered wise one. Her preserved remains are interred in the highest tower of the keep, overlooking the vale; there is a saying among the people of Iversgard, "Remember, Grandmother is always watching you". In catacombs beneath the keep lies the vale's ossuary filled with the bones of those who fell during the Thule invasion. Here the influence of the Asavean architect is just as pronounced - the ossuary passages form a series of interlocking spirals with statues and mosaics of leaping dolphins at regular intervals.

The Roads of Karsk

In Autumn 379YE, a major public work's project was commissioned to restore the devastated roads of Karsk. As a consequence, the roads are in excellent repair and almost every major settlement in Karsk is now connected to them, and through them to the rest of the Empire. A great deal of white granite was invested in the project, and every seventh stone was carefully prepared to reinforce the warding hearth magic. This great work not only increases the prosperity of every mine and forest in Karsk, but also speeded the recovery of the war-torn land. As a consequence, the Varushkan nation was able to begin restoring the Iron Helms army - and to support a third army, much earlier than might otherwise have been possible.

Iversgard

Once a prosperous settlement on the shores of the Semmerlak, in the centuries before the orc revolt the vale grew rich from the profits of its slave labor fueled mines and forests. After the rebellion, the vale closed its mines, forests, and timber yards and developed a new economy based on foreign trade with ships constructed with the last output of its slave-based industry.

When the Thule barbarians invaded, Iversgard fell before their armies. The Boyar and his Schlacta stayed behind allowing a small group of survivors to escape across the Semmerlak. The lucky ones who managed to flee founded a new home, near Karotny, establishing the outpost of Ugleyzastava on the eastern shores of the lake. Those less fortunate were taken by the Thule and, in a cruel twist of irony, forced into the re-opened mines and lumber yards by their new orc overlords. While the slaves were freed when Lestazny was liberated, the ruins of Iversgard remained uninhabited save by squatters and borderland bandits for some time. One of the first to return was the late Aleksandra Irinova Prochnost. The preserved remains of the revered wise one have been placed with great reverence in a simple bier in what will one day be the central square of the settlement.

Shortly after the Spring Equinox 380YE, Senator Maarit commissioned a project to rebuild the vale of Iversgard. White granite and weirwood were provided, as well as money to cover labour costs, but the materials and funds were supplemented by volunteer labour. A number of displaced citizens of Karsk had taken refuge in the forests here and, following discussions with the exiled Boyar of Iversgard, agreed to help rebuild the vale in return for a place within its walls. A call has gone out for survivors of the fall of Iversgard to return and lend their strength to restoring the prosperity of the reborn vale.

Iversgard is connected to the roads of Karsk, and protected both by a sturdy wall and by the brooding presence of Aleksandra's Watch. A basic quay has been laid in, as well as a number of buildings - including an armory. While many of the structures inside the walls are currently tents, they are supplemented by more permanent structures as the prosperity of the area continues to grow..

Kosti

A high-walled fortified town still holding for the Empire, in hope that one day Karsk will build a better reputation back in Empire control. Well-shielded wagon-trains barrel down the road from Triosk with supplies.

Oloy

Once a great centre for the making of defensive talismans. Wise Volhov, natural amber and the silence of isolation combined to make great magics. It fell so fast, few survived and those who did tell of great magical treasures hurriedly hidden. The Thule magicians rapaciously stripped the area of resources, and one of the few to survive their attentions was the Proritsatel Oloy. Much depleted, it nonetheless will provide a bounty of crystal mana to a volhov brave enough to seek it out.

Veresk

The front of the barbarian advance, and a focus of Imperial scouting activity. Wardens watching the area reported incidents of orcs fighting orcs within the barbarian encampments there. Many of the permanent buildings of Veresk have been torn down, but the Vereski Stzena still tend to the spiritual needs of the huddled survivors, too stubborn to leave their homes. A recent addition to Veresk is the famous Empress of all Goats Theatre, build by the Eternal Barien for Hubert Annanovich Gremani as a reward for completing a Challenge from the Iron Duke.

Broken Barrow

A scattered set of stone structures atop a mound. A great stone slab lies in two pieces on top of the central structures. Legend says that its a barrow, but it's not clear who lay there - it appears empty. Others believe it might have been a settlement. It is not a place where Varushkans will linger after dark. Interestingly, scouts report that it appears to have been left alone by the barbarian invaders.

The Ruins of Isemer

Grew rich off the back of orc slaves, hacking prime timber out of the rich forests overseen by hard-eyed schlacta. When the slaves were freed, and the mercenary spearmen left, the wolves in the forest grew bolder. Isemer was in decline long before the orcs came, known as a violent place where anyone could carve out a new living for themselves, with no questions asked as to their background. Evidence came to light that many of the town's inhabitants may have made bargains with the invaders, and that exiles and outlaws from across the Empire were coming here to fight under the Thule banners. In Spring 378YE a decisive battle was fought here, and the town of Isemer largely ruined in what was a turning point in the war with the Thule. The people of Karsk show little interest in rebuilding it.

One of the few structures still standing is the poorly-named Sovereigns Heart, a hostelry that saw excellent business during the liberation of Karsk, primarily serving Imperial troops raiding the Thule. It proved especially popular with Imperial Orcs and Wintermark raiders alike. The precarious nature of the inn - right on the edge of Thule-claimed territory - added a certain dark desperation to the drinking and fighting that were a regular feature of a night spent here. It remains to be seen what effect a lasting peace with the Thule will have on business here.

Regions

Branoc

Hilly Branoc is the site of the sinister broken barrow. The entire region has a bad reputation, as do several of the vales established here. During the war to liberate Karsk from the Thule, the introverted Varushkan folk of these vales fought under a single banner - and not always on the side of the Empire.

Keywords: Hilly

Crowslook

A desolate hilly region, the site of many mines ... and the site of vicious fighting with the Imperial orcs during the orc rebellion. This is the site of a powerful Winter regio raised by the Thule during the Winter of 376YE, and of the cursed Moye Mucheniye.

Keyword: Hilly

Kopevnost

Site of Kosti, a well built town with low walls in a defensible position. It was never captured by the Thule. The region has a long, gentle coast and has served in the past as a valuable place for food and supplies to be delivered to the defenders of Karsk. A recent murder here brought to light the presence of a mora in the heart of Kosti, and the Travy Mudrostri is the remnant of her tragic tale. The citizens of Kosti asked that the herb garden be added to the spoils of war, no doubt concerned that any curse she may have left might fall on one of their families.

Krevsaty

The rolling hills of Krevsaty is the site of the remains of the settlement of Oloy. The Thule are believed to have a large camp there, extracting as much ambergelt as possible from the surrounding areas. Some scouts suggest they have enslaved a number of talismancers captured when Krevsaty fell to the barbarians. The region is the base of operations of a powerful Thule warlock practitioner of Spring ritual magic. Along the northern border with neighbouring Volodmartz lies the Krevsaty Yelta, one of the richest ambergelt forests in Karsk - and one that has managed to remain largely untouched by the barbarians. With Krevsaty in Thule hands it is difficult to reach overland, but the long route through Volodmartz still allows the bounty of ambergelt to be claimed by those brave enough to pass through trackless hills and forests.

Keyword: Hilly

Lestazny

In the south of Lestazny stands the rebuilt vale of Ivarsgard - a newly restored haven for settlers in Karsk, along the northern shores of the Semmerlak. The vale is watched over by Aleksandra's Watch, a brooding castle that houses the remains of a revered wise one. Outside of the fortress itself, several smaller watchtowers and outposts protect the roads throughout Lestazny.

Previously this forested region was the location of the town of Isember; a wretched hive of scum and villainy. A great distance to the east of the ruins of Isember lie the Mir Mozga - a barren stretch of pines, surprisingly rich in dragonbone. The forest has been ignored by the Thule, for some reason; scouts speak of being watched, but with no sign of any living creatures larger than a squirrel.

Keyword: Forested

Moresvah

Reasonably hilly and has a long, rocky coast; it was one of the last regions to be taken by the Thule. For many years defenders from the three largest mining families - the Malinov, the Sloev and the Pravin - held out and fought the Thule using the isolated mines and networks of tunnels to avoid capture. Following their liberation by Imperial forces in Winter 377YE the three families broke into their reserves of equipment and materials to offer valuable resources to the armies fighting the Thule here.

Not every mine in Moresvah was so lucky - the Zeleny Zheleza for example was thoroughly plundered by the barbarians during the occupation. This did not stop the Sloev family attempting to take control of the mine in Spring 378YE, but they abruptly withdrew their petition and the mine ultimately fell under the jurisdiction of the military council as a spoil of war.

Keywords: Hilly

Nitrost

A hilly region, where the ruins of Veresk stand – those buildings that have not been torn down by the invaders have been damaged during the internecine fighting between orc bands. With the region returned to Imperial hands, the slow business of rebuilding can begin. Not everyone wishes to remain in Nitrost, however. The schlacta known as Slava's Schlacta saw their vale overrun by Thule and lost their boyar in the recent war of liberation. With their homes gone, most are looking for a new captain to lead them against the enemies of Varushka.

OOO Notes

- As of the beginning of Autumn 379YE, Imperial forces control the regions of Kopevnost, Moresvah, Lestazny, Nitrost, Crowslook, and Branoc. The Thule still control Krevsaty. The territory is under Imperial control.
- Aleksandra's Watch is a rank I fortification.
- A list of the spoils of war, allocated by the Military Council at the Summer Solstice 378YE can be found here.

Karsk spoils of war (Redirected from Karsk Spoils of War)

Following the liberation of Karsk by Imperial troops in Spring 378YE, these resources were presented to the Military council for assignment as spoils of war during the Summer Solstice, 378YE.

Vereski Stzena

Congregation / Rank 3

When their curse-ridden vale was overrun with barbarians, the musicians of Veresk found their Way. With a repertoire of songs and morality tales based on the adventures of the Varushkan virtuous animals, they have been silently travelling the paths of Karsk by day and singing around campfires at night, instilling virtue where they could in the Imperial citizens that remained there. Now with Karsk back in Imperial hands, the Stzena need someone to cater to their spiritual needs on their grim journeys around the harsh territory.

Proritsatel Oloy

Mana Site / Rank 2

It is perhaps ironic that Oloy, renowned as a centre for making defensive talismans, fell so quickly to the barbarian invasion. The mana site of one of the former Volhov working in Oloy, Proritsatel is a circle of ancient tree stumps surrounding a natural crater that remains as a testament to the skill and power of those brave Volhov who died in its defence.

Moye Mucheniye

WELTSILVER MINE / Rank 4

This Crowslook mine is tainted with the history of slavery and oppression and was the scene of several bloody battles at the start of the orc rebellion. Collapsed shafts still resonate with what sounds like the death-rattles of former workers and slaves caught in one of the frequent cave-ins. Despite this reputation, there is still plenty of weltsilver in the depths of the hills here for those who care not for its history, only its produce.

Krevsaty Yelta

Ambergelt / Rank 3

The Thule presence in the Krevatsy region has severely depleted the natural supplies of ambergelt. The Krevsaty Yelta is perhaps the largest single source of ambergelt in Karsk that has remained untouched by Thule hands. Perhaps the mere presence of the frightful faces warding the trees were enough to dissuade them, or maybe their extraction plans were thwarted by warding magic that has now faded.

The Sovereigns Heart

Business / Rank 2

This Iseember based hostelry has had some rough and ready customers, but an owner can turn quite a profit if they don't mind where the money comes from. Iseember has mostly been deserted and ruined, but the Sovereign's Heart still stands, waiting patiently to see if the town will be rebuilt and making its coin on what might become an Imperial outpost or a booming frontier town. Either way, its owner stands to make some coin.

Travy Mudrosti

Herb Garden / Rank 3

Woe betide he who unwittingly takes a Mora as a spouse and then mistreats her. When Karsk was lost to the barbarians, Grezny Mudrosti of Kopevnost turned to drink and began cursing his wife for their misfortune, little knowing that his wife's tongue held more powerful curses than he could imagine. The neighbours found his body one morning, flayed alive with a bloated crow feasting on his severed tongue. Of his Mora wife Nastasya there was no sign, though her excellently tended and well stocked herb garden remains as the place of refuge she sought from her husband's shouts and fists, all the while waiting patiently for the revenge she craved.

Production - 6 doses of True Vervain, 2 doses of Cerulean Mazzarine, 4 doses of Bladeroot, 2 doses of Imperial Roseweald and 4 doses of Marrowort.

Mir Mozga

Dragonbone Forest / Rank 4

Fine deposits of Dragonbone sit silently amongst the roots in the great forest of Lestasy. The Mir Mozga area is particularly rich in this material which seems to have gone unnoticed and untouched by the recent barbarian incursions. The original owner is unknown, most likely a casualty of war or an Isembrite traitor.

The Goats of Karsk

Military Unit / Rank 3

Boyar Slava Milijovic and his professional soldiery defended their vale in the hills of Nitrost against barbarian incursions for ten long years, but Slava himself fell in battle when the Empire routed the barbarians from his beloved homeland. Once known as Slava's Schlacta, the band have been renamed the Goats of Karsk in 379YE by Hubert Gremani after he took over the leadership.

Zeleny Zheleza

Green Iron Mine / Rank 5

The last actual Zeleny was executed in 325YE for her part in the death of the Senator of Karsk, and the mine has passed through a chain of hands since then. While the three largest mining families - the Malinov, the Sloev and the Pravin - dominate much of the mining activity in Moresvah, the grand mine of Zeleny Zheleza has always been held in Vard rather than Ushkan hands. Local folklore suggests that the mine is cursed, and that the owner will invariably meet a grim end. Despite a long history of conflict with the three dominant families, and despite being thoroughly plundered by the barbarians during the occupation, Zeleny Zheleza remains the most prominent and lucrative single mine in Karsk.

The mana site of one of the former Volhov working in Oloy, Proritsatel is a circle of ancient tree stumps surrounding a natural crater that remains as a testament to the skill and power of those brave Volhov who died in its defence.

Moye Mucheniye

WELTSILVER MINE / Rank 4

This Crowslook mine is tainted with the history of slavery and oppression and was the scene of several bloody battles at the start of the orc rebellion. Collapsed shafts still resonate with what sounds like the death-rattles of former workers and slaves caught in one of the frequent cave-ins. Despite this reputation, there is still plenty of weltsilver in the depths of the hills here for those who care not for its history, only its produce.

Krevsaty Yelta

AMBERGELT / Rank 3

The Thule presence in the Krevsaty region has severely depleted the natural supplies of ambergelt. The Krevsaty Yelta is perhaps the largest single source of ambergelt in Karsk that has remained untouched by Thule hands. Perhaps the mere presence of the frightful faces warding the trees were enough to dissuade them, or maybe their extraction plans were thwarted by warding magic that has now faded.

The Sovereigns Heart

BUSINESS / Rank 2

This Isemer based hostelry has had some rough and ready customers, but an owner can turn quite a profit if they don't mind where the money comes from. Isemer has mostly been deserted and ruined, but the Sovereign's Heart still stands, waiting patiently to see if the town will be rebuilt and making its coin on what might become an Imperial outpost or a booming frontier town. Either way, its owner stands to make some coin.

Travy Mudrosti

HERB GARDEN / Rank 3

Woe betide he who unwittingly takes a Mora as a spouse and then mistreats her. When Karsk was lost to the barbarians, Grezny Mudrosti of Kopevnost turned to drink and began cursing his wife for their misfortune, little knowing that his wife's tongue held more powerful curses than he could imagine. The neighbours found his body one morning, flayed alive with a bloated crow feasting on his severed tongue. Of his Mora wife Nastasya there was no sign, though her excellently tended and well stocked herb garden remains as the place of refuge she sought from her husband's shouts and fists, all the while waiting patiently for the revenge she craved.

Mir Mozga

Dragonbone Forest / Rank 4

Fine deposits of Dragonbone sit silently amongst the roots in the great forest of Lestasy. The Mir Mozga area is particularly rich in this material which seems to have gone unnoticed and untouched by the recent barbarian incursions. The original owner is unknown, most likely a casualty of war or an Isembrite traitor.

The Goats of Karsk

Military Unit / Rank 3

Boyar Slava Milijovic and his professional soldiery defended their vale in the hills of Nitrost against barbarian incursions for ten long years, but Slava himself fell in battle when the Empire routed the barbarians from his beloved homeland. Once known as Slava's Schlacta, the band have been renamed the Goats of Karsk in 379YE by Hubert Gremani after he took over the leadership.

Zeleny Zheleza

Green Iron Mine / Rank 5

The last actual Zeleny was executed in 325YE for her part in the death of the Senator of Karsk, and the mine has passed through a chain of hands since then. While the three largest mining families - the Malinov, the Sloev and the Pravin - dominate much of the mining activity in Moresvah, the grand mine of Zeleny Zheleza has always been held in Vard rather than Ushkan hands. Local folklore suggests that the mine is cursed, and that the owner will invariably meet a grim end. Despite a long history of conflict with the three dominant families, and despite being thoroughly plundered by the barbarians during the occupation, Zeleny Zheleza remains the most prominent and lucrative single mine in Karsk.

Keep the Fires Burning

by Tansy Pye and Anna Clifford-Tait

Recording here: Keep The Fires Burning

The Wolves in the wood cry lonely tears Their hearts are cold with fear They cannot feel the hearths' bright warmth 'Tis hunger draws them near

Chorus: Keep the fires burning high Keep your voices loud Keep the cold from out your bones Wychlova, sing proud

Snow falls deep and snow falls fast 'twill bury the tents and the gear It spins and dances in the night The drifts are piling near

Chorus

The winds howl cold and biting teeth It tears at our cloaks and the furs It pulls and drags at the screaming trees And flings their branches far

Chorus

On a moonless night the clouds draw in The stars are hidden from sight Beyond the fire's warming glow Wychlova, carry your light

Chorus

Deep in the trees comes a warning growl And eyes aglow in the dark The monsters prowling all around 'Tis song that holds them back

Chorus

Out in the dark night a hunter's horn The tearing of flesh and of bone A clash of steel and a splash of blood Hunters, we're calling you home

Chorus

As dawn's light comes, the blizzard ends The camp is safe and calm All the children fast asleep Our song is nearly done

Last Chorus: Let the embers warm our bread Let our voices calm The night has passed and the wolves are gone Wychlova, safe from harm.

Keeper's Habit

Description

Modelled after the habits favoured by the monks and friars of The Marches, the Keeper's Habit most often takes the form of a wide-sleeved, hooded robe. Generally simple in design, they are nonetheless woven from delicate lambs' wool and beautifully decorated with orichalcum, green iron and ambergelt. These decorations often take the form of symbols associated with the virtues of Loyalty, Pride, and Prosperity.

The vestment empowers the priest who wears it to strengthen their allies, inspiring them to keep fighting regardless of the odds against them. The healing power it provides relies on the ability of a properly trained priest to briefly connect their own spirit to the spirit of their injured companion.

As with many items intended for use by a priest, these vestments are often hallowed. Common choices include Hallowing of the Cicisbeo, Hallowing of the Little Mother, or the Hallowing of the Steward.

Rules

- Form: Armour. Takes the form of a robe.
- Requirement: You must have the dedication skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: Three times per day while wearing this robe, you may use get it together as if you know it without spending any hero points.
- Materials: Crafting a Keeper's Habit requires seven ingots of orichalcum, four ingots of green iron, five measures of ambergelt, seven measures of dragonbone, four measures of beggar's lye, and four measures of iridescent gloaming. It takes one month to make one of these items.

Keeper of Aurelie's Garden

Overview

The Keeper of Aurelie's Garden is an Imperial title commissioned by the Imperial Senate in Spring 380YE. The position of keeper is a sinecure, requiring minimal responsibility but offering a regular income of valuable herbs. The garden is in the region of Grovesyard, Astolat, near the hospital Aurelie's Rest.

Responsibilities

The Keeper has no particular responsibilities; they simply receive a bounty of herbs from the Aurelie's Garden. If the Garden were to be threatened in any way, it would be the responsibility of the Keeper to deal with those threats.

Powers

Bounty of Herbs

The Keeper gains custodianship of a sinecure. Each season they receive 10 doses of Imperial Roseweald, and 2 doses each of Cerulean Mazzarine, True Vervain, Marwort, and Bladeroot.

Appointment

The method of appointing this sinecure deviates dramatically from the well worn path for such appointments. Each Autumn Equinox, the title is contested each between representatives of Dawn and Navarr. The title can be held by any Navarr or Dawnish citizen, and the title is appointed annually. The Keeper can be revoked by the General assembly, both the Dawnish and Navarr National Assembly, and the Assembly of the Nine.

The Contest

The rules of the contest are extremely straightforward:

- ten Navaar face ten Dawnish
- All skills
- The contest lasts until one person remains standing, they take the title
- Any additional rules may be determined by mutual agreement on a contest by contest basis

Responsibilities

The Keeper of Berislav's Rest has no particular responsibilities; they simply receive a stipend of rings from the Vale of Berislav's Rest in Volodmartz. If the Vale were to be threatened in any way, it would be the responsibility of the Keeper to deal with those threats.

Powers

Stipend

The Keeper gains custodianship of a sinecure. They receive 1 throne, 2 crowns, and 16 rings each season from the vale.

Appointment

The title is selected by unanimous decision of the Varushkan senators. If a unanimous decision cannot be reached, the title may be appointed by the Imperial Senate instead.

The title can be held by any Varushkan citizen. The Keeper has tenure, and serves until they die or step down. They can be revoked by the General Assembly, the Varushkan National Assembly, and by the Assembly of the Nine.

Keeper of the Crystal Vale

Overview

The Keeper of the Crystal Vale is a Wintermark Imperial title created following an announcement in Winter 380YE by the Civilian Commissioner. The Vale was completed shortly before the 381YE Spring Equinox. The position of Keeper is a sinecure, requiring minimal responsibility but offering a regular income of crystal mana.

Responsibilities

The Keeper has no particular responsibilities; they simply receive a bounty of crystal mana from the Vale's Might in Hahnmark. If the vale were to be threatened in any way, it would be the responsibility of the Keeper to deal with those threats.

Powers

Bounty of Mana

The Keeper of the Crystal Vale gains custodianship of a sinecure. They receive an income of 10 crystal mana each season.

Appointment

The Keeper of the Crystal Vale is appointed by unanimous decision of the Wintermark senators. If a unanimous decision cannot be reached, the title may be appointed by the Imperial Senate instead.

The title can be held by a Wintermark citizen. The Keeper has tenure, and serves until they die or step down. They can be revoked by the General Assembly, the Wintermark National Assembly, and by the Assembly of the Nine.

Vale's Might

The great stone pillared entrance to Vales Might is flanked by two large stone and metal braziers, each with the rune of Wealth carved upon it. These are lit during the winter months to guide hunters, traders and other lost folk back to a place of warmth and safety. Vale's Might stands near its sister sinecure the Valley of Pride. It is located in the foot of the nearby cliffs and high hills that stand just outside the village of Woodhall.

The Wintermark hall of Hendle Hearth can be seen from the entrance to Vales Might and is a mere few minutes' walk away. Southridge and Wood Heath lie less than a days travel away in opposite directions from the impressive entrance to this sinecure. To gain access here you must first pass the huge doors that are designed to hold fast against all save the worst of winter storms, or all but the most ferocious and determined of attackers.

Once inside, a visitor must follow the twists and turns of the passage that snakes its way down level by level, deeper and deeper into the depths. At the bottom of the passage is a final mighty door, above which is engraved the message "The ebb and flow of magic will forever match the ebb and flow of the Empire. Long live the Empire."

The door opens into a large cavern whose walls are studded with crystals. A pool of silvery water is spread thinly across the bottom of the cavern, and all of the crystals can be seen to have grown over the decades from the water.

Keeper of the Dour Fens

Overview

The Keeper of the Dour Fens is an Imperial Title created by a commission announced by the Marcher Civilian Commissioner in Summer 380YE. The position is a sinecure, requiring minimal responsibility but offering a regular income of crystal mana.

The official name given to the site by the commissioner is a nod to the work done by the Circle of Endless Night - a coven of powerful magicians well versed in Night magic responsible for protecting the marshes during the war with the Jotun.

Responsibilities

The Keeper of the Dour Fens has no particular responsibilities, but there is some expectation that the mana gathered from Graven Rock will be used to help the war effort - or at least employed in the protection of Bregasland. The Keeper receives a seasonal bounty of crystal mana gathered from the caves under Graven Rock, and if the Rock were to be threatened in any way, it would be the responsibility of the Keeper of the Dour Fens to deal with those threats.

Powers

The Keeper of the Dour Fens is an Imperial title that grants custodianship of a sinecure.

Bounty of Mana

The Keeper of the Dour Fens receives an income of 10 crystal mana each season from the caves beneath Graven Rock.

Selection

The Keeper is a Marcher national position appointed by the Senate. Under normal circumstances it will be appointed by unanimous vote of the Marcher senators.

Because this is a national position, the title can only be held by a Marcher citizen.

Removal

The Keeper has tenure and serves until they die, step down or are revoked.

The Keeper can be revoked by the Marcher national assembly, the the General assembly or the Assembly of Nine.

History

The sinecure was completed shortly before the Spring Equinox 381YE.

Beneath Graven Rock

The Keeper of the Dour Fens is a source of some humour to the local inhabitants - since the actual sinecure is located miles from the fens in "the only dry spot in Bregasland". In fact, the site is a reclaimed section of one of the old mine-workings that riddle Graven Rock. This vast stone plinth, four miles to a side, stands in Gravenmarch in Bregasland, not far from the town of Graven itself. The sinecure that the Keeper of the Dour Fens oversees is not an easy matter to locate without a guide who knows the way, or a good map as several of the passages that seem to lead to it have been collapsed, or veer away at the last moment.

The rock contains several unconnected mine workings. This one, which was abandoned in 329YE, had a bad reputation. Workers would talk about hearing odd echoes and seeing peculiar lights - but the weltsilver ore here was rich and so these concerns were largely ignored. In the years since, this part of Graven Rock has continued to have a reputation for rum doings, given a wide berth, and said to be haunted. The landskeepers of Bregasland know differently of course - the reason this part of the rock has an odd reputation is that flows of mana from the western marshes meet those from the forest to the south and the hills to the east, and create peculiar eddies. These eddies have been harnessed before, and several local landskeepers maintain their own sources of mana in the vicinity.

Taking advantage of these flows, the Graven Rock sinecure consists of several carefully positioned mithril mirrors, and three stone dolmen, all situated in a large, dark cave far beneath the surface. The dolmen are inlaid with carefully carved totems: a leaping salmon in the west, a broad oak tree in the south, and a proud ram in the west symbolising the marshes, the forests, and the hills. The walls of the cave are polished, and several dozen iron lanterns holding lightstones ensure that the cave is never swallowed in darkness.

Visitors to the cave still report odd phenomenon - lantern lights bobbing in the dark passages, the sound of picks and shovels, the coarse voices of miners, and the occasional rumble as of stones falling. Echoes of the time when the mines beneath Graven Rock were still being worked - yet without any suggestion of ghosts per se, as if the magically infused rock itself simply remembers a time when human beings (and orc slaves) used to occupy the now-empty galleries.

Margaret held the completed sign up to the light - the paint was dry now and she was pleased with how neat the lettering was. "What do you think Will?" she asked her husband.

Will looked at the sign for a moment. "Nicely done. Still a daft name though" he commented before returning to his bow-lathe.

"I just paint the signs love - if this Merrick fella wants to call a rock a fen - he can. It's the one who plants the seeds who chooses the apples."

"Hmmpf - apples is right. Typical bloody Upwolder - fella's probably never even seen a fen. And what's dour 'bout it anyway?"

"Bregasland is called the Dour Fens love. Just because we live in the nice bit, you can't say that ain't true. Your cousin Jenny Dyer - her farm is barely two days west of here but more than half of it floods every time the skies open".

"Ring to a crown we'll end up with someone who ain't from Graven running it. Probably won't even be a Bregaslander. Well I'll give them bloody dour if they come round 'ere."

"Perhaps they named it for my husband's famously surly temper?" Margaret teased him as she playfully boxed his ears. "Now finish up what you're doing - you need to get the fire on and start supper. I've two more of these to paint before we lose the light."

Keeper of the Glorious Fountain

Overview

The Keeper of the Glorious Fountain is an Imperial title established by the Imperial Senate during Winter 378YE. The title is a sinecure, requiring minimal responsibility but offering a regular income of crystal mana.

The sinecure involves custodianship of the Glorious Fountain of Dawn and Dusk, based around a series of geysers and hot springs in Morrow - a site that is ripe for further development. While the day-to-day operation of the marvellous fountain is overseen by a small professional staff, the Keeper might still be called upon to deal with any problems that are outside their area of expertise.

During the Spring Equinox 380YE, a plague of crystal-eating vermin saw the Seante commission white granite wards to help protect the Fountain, which had the unexpected outcome of adding additional production to the sinecure.

Responsibilities

The Keeper has no particular responsibilities; they simply receive a bounty of crystal mana from the Glorious Fountain of Dawn and Dusk. If the Fountain, or the hot pools from which it rises, were to be threatened in any way then it would be the responsibility of the Keeper to deal with those threats. The Keeper may also be called on to deal with any threats to the small staff who maintain the fountain; there is some risk of problems with the vallorn or Therunin to the north.

Powers

Bounty of Mana

The Keeper of the Glorious Fountain gains custodianship of a sinecure. They receive an income of 9 crystal mana each season.

Appointment

The Keeper of the Glorious Fountain is appointed by unanimous decision of the Urizen senators. If a unanimous decision cannot be reached, the title may be appointed by the Imperial Senate instead.

The title can be held by an Urizen citizen. The Keeper has tenure, and serves until they die or step down. They can be revoked by the General Assembly, the Wintermark National Assembly, and by the Assembly of the Nine.

The Glorious Fountain of Dawn and Dusk

In western Peregro are found a series of geysers and hot springs, beneath which lies a nexus of powerful subterranean magic. The magic occasionally bubbles to the surface through the hot springs - on occasions when this happens, the waterspouts are transformed into pure superheated steam, rich with arcane potential. Harnessing the magic of the springs has proved especially challenging.

Recently, a talented Architect named Camilla Sunspire proposed a unique way of harnessing the magic without damaging the magic - or risking an accidental explosion. Following her plan, an intricate arrangement of mithril-lined pipes would channel the flow of water from the largest spring into a specially constructed fountain. Designed with intricate pipes and valves, the fountain would rise to a crescendo at both dawn and dusk (rather than every four hours, twenty-seven minutes, as the natural geyser does). In addition to harnessing the magic of the pools, the mithril pipes caused an accretion of crystalline mana to form around the edges of the wide heat-resistant basin which could be harvested without risk.

When Senator Cato proposed in Winter 378 that a sinecure be constructed, the work of Camilla Sunspire was brought to the Civil Service's attention and the delighted architect was invited to assist with the building project which was completed shortly before the start of the Summer Solstice 379YE.

The fountain itself is maintained by a small staff, assisted by a cadre of ushabti designed specifically to work in the dangerous heat of the hot springs. In addition to collecting the crystal mana, cleaning the fountain's workings, and performing minor calibrations to the valves based on the average rainfall, the staff are kept busy extracting coins, debris and other mementos thrown into the fountain by travellers who do not understand its purpose - or the danger of one of these trinkets blocking one of the main pipes...

Keeper of the Golden Fields

Overview

The Keeper of the Golden Fields is an Imperial Title created by a commission announced by the Marcher Civilian Commissioner in Autumn 380YE. The position is a sinecure, requiring minimal responsibility but offering a regular income of crystal mana.

Responsibilities

The Keeper of the Golden Fields has no particular responsibilities, but there is some expectation that the mana gathered from the Silent Giant will be used to help the war effort - or at least employed in the protection of Mitwold. The Keeper receives a seasonal bounty of crystal mana gathered from the area around the standing stone, and if the Silent Giant were to be threatened in any way, it would be the responsibility of the Keeper to deal with those threats.

Powers

The Keeper of the Golden Fields is an Imperial title that grants custodianship of a sinecure.

Bounty of Mana

The Keeper of the Golden Fields receives an income of 9 crystal mana each season from the basins set around the Silent Giant.

Selection

The Keeper is a Marcher national position appointed by the Senate. Under normal circumstances it will be appointed by unanimous vote of the Marcher senators.

Because this is a national position, the title can only be held by a Marcher citizen.

Removal

The Keeper has tenure and serves until they die, step down or are revoked.

The Keeper can be revoked by the Marcher national assembly, the the General assembly or the Assembly of Nine.

History

The sinecure was completed shortly before the Summer Solstice 381YE.

The Silent Giant

There are many old standing stones and dolmen in the Marches. The Silent Giant is one of the most famous, and one of the largest - a huge solitary monolith on the Golden Downs not far from the town of Hay. The old stone itself surmounts a low hill, stark against the skyline, and watches over the golden fields of barley, wheat and corn tended by Marcher farmers below.

There are several stories about its origin. One claims it was rolled up the hill and placed there by Bolstering Bill and their mates as part of a cunning ruse to trick some bandits (or orcs, depending who is telling the story) into thinking that Marchers were giants. Another says it was actually placed by shepherds in the first days of the Marches, to watch over their flocks; these shepherds eventually moved south to the Mournwold, and their pastures were turned into fields of golden grain by the settlers at Hay. Another says it is an honest-to-goodness ogre, or perhaps a giant, turned to stone after losing a contest of riddles with a Marcher landskeeper and smith called Ironfoot Sean. A more prosaic tale says it was placed to mark a site of strong mana flows that served as a meeting place for the first landskeepers of Mitwold. Whatever the truth, the stone is known at least by name across the Marches - the popular song Silent Giants is said to refer specifically to the monolith above Hay.

Since the Senate commission, the standing stone is now surrounded by five wide, shallow basins of black rock lined with mithril. The basins focus the mana flows, which crystalise in their depths. There was some talk of building a fence or low wall around the stone to deter thieves, but the local landskeepers put their feet down very firmly in this regard. Anything that separated the stone from Mitwold, even symbolically, would be a Bad Thing - and anyone who was foolish enough to try and steal from the Silent Giant and the people of Mitwold would find any number of Bad Things happening to them in pretty short order.

Keeper of the Imperial Menagerie

Overview

The position of Keeper of the Imperial Menagerie is an Imperial title created by the Senate to oversee the running of the Imperial menagerie and the well-being of its inhabitants.

The Menagerie was constructed to house an exotic rakshasa, received by Imperatrix Lisabetta as a coronation gift from the Principalities of Jarm. Concerns were immediately raised by the Civil Service about the care and tending of the rakshasa after its arrival; as a rare and magical creature of significant value and unusual needs, it required an appropriately secure and comfortable location for its housing. Suggestions were soon mooted that the rakshasa be put on show in an enclosure in one of the cities of the League, so that the public citizenry might have a chance to see the oddity (and their coin might help pay for its needs); the greatest volume of such requests came from Holberg. In Winter 380YE the Senator of Morrow, Ariadne of the Auric Horizon, proposed not just a simple holding structure but a far grander menagerie that would greatly increase the production of tears by 'Flocki', as well as including space for other creatures to be put on show. Construction proceeded apace, funded by the Empress's own House of Seven Mirrors, and was completed in Spring 381YE when the menagerie opened to the public.

Responsibilities

The Keeper of the Imperial Menagerie oversees the harvest of magical substances from the rakshasa - which provides both a slow but steady stream of Winter vis and a supernatural drug known as Tears of the Rakshasa. The Keeper is responsible for the ongoing wellbeing of the rakshasa - dubbed 'Flocki', by the children of Holberg - and if something were to happen to the exotic beast, it would fall on the shoulders of the Keeper to deal with the problem. Were Flocki to perish, the flow of arcane substances would abruptly cease.

Theoretically, were the Menagerie extended and other strange beasts housed within it, the Keeper's duties would also extend to looking after those creatures as well.

Powers

Tears of the Rakshasa

The Keeper gains custodianship of a sinecure. They receive three measures of Winter vis and four doses of Tears of the Rakshasa, collected by the Menagerie staff from the rakshasa's ocular exudate.

Appointment

This title is an Imperial position appointed by The Throne. The Keeper serves until they die or step down. Any Imperial citizen is eligible to hold this title. They can be revoked by a lesser majority of the General Assembly, and by the Assembly of the Nine.

If you'll excuse the frankness, in short, somewhere needs to be provided for the drake to live, and it has specialist needs. It requires a sturdy structure that will protect it and prevent it from escaping, basic arcane elements to help stimulate the production of its tears, a steady diet of meat and the provision of particular alchemical products to sustain its well-being. We are currently housing it in a sturdy cattle-pen. This is obviously not suitable.

Grigor van Temeschwar, Civil Servant, shortly after the arrival of the rakshasa

Imperial Menagerie

When the eastern Principalities of Jarm presented the newly-crowned Imperatrix Lisabetta with a rare and valuable gift - a trained adult rakshasa - the question of where to keep the beast arose. The decision was taken to house the rakshasa in a new Imperial menagerie, built as part of the grand park being constructed in Holmauer. The menagerie was the first piece of the park to be completed and opened to the public.

There is no doubt the rakshasa is the main attraction - the structure includes a very sturdy enclosure, with a viewing gallery from which Imperial citizens can indulge their curiosity and see the strange beast with their own eyes. It also includes secure internal chambers for the arcane procedures involved in harvesting the creature's tears.

A number of additional pens house a number of more mundane beasts, including a muster of peacocks, a single Urizen tiger, a pair of forest lions from Weirwater, a breeding colony of dodo birds imported from Feroz, and several ornery goats of Marcher stock whose antics are deemed highly comical by the local visitors.

The sturdy construction of the menagerie certainly echoes the solid craftwork and architecture for which Holberg is famous. This is just as well - given the dangerous nature of some of the inhabitants. Yet at the same time, the rising arches and peaks of the buildings call to mind the spires of Urizen - an odd fusion of two very distinct architectural styles most likely inspired by the influence of Ariadne, Senator for Morrow, who commissioned and oversaw construction of the menagerie.

As well as the rakshasa itself, several other animals are housed in the menagerie, much to the delight of the folk of Holberg. However, ambitious plans to expand the collection even further have, thus far, fallen foul of unforeseen difficulties. A lone dire penguin was captured by Suag hunters and conveyed across the Empire to Holberg, but sadly perished due to a lack of something unknown in its diet that the keepers were unfortunately unable to puzzle out. The greatly diminished numbers of the famous Gancio dire cranes after the Grendel raid on Sarvos has left the menagerie unable to acquire even a single of the glorious white birds, especially due to concerns by scholars of the rebuilding Dora University that the crane population remains too fragile to remove even a single breeding adult. One scheme to build a magically-warded collection of boggarts was halted early on due to what civil servants summarised as 'a wide raft of problems indeed, not least the consumption of the plans by a loose harpy boggart'.

Keeper of the Memorial Gardens of Treji

Overview

The Keeper of the Memorial Gardens of Treji is an Imperial title created by the Imperial Senate in Autumn 378YE. The position of keeper is a sinecure, requiring minimal responsibility but offering a regular income of valuable herbs.

The gardens contain a thousand flapping pieces of cloth, each piece from a fallen hero from the battle to retake Treji, both Navarr and Summer Storm alike. Beneath each flag is a small herb garden of Bladeroot and scented flowers. The Bladeroot represents the early deaths of those who fought and the scented flowers chosen to remind those that smell them of summer. At the centre of the garden stands a monument to the fallen crafted from weirwood and enchanted ice. Atop the monument is a statue of a Navarr warrior sanding back to back with an Imperial orc from the Summer Storm legion, their bodies covered like tattoos with the names of the dead. Beneath it reads a plaque.

*May we never forget the sacrifice of the Summer Storm and the Navari who fought with them to retake Treji.
Let them find their way through the Labyrinth.
Let them find their way over the Abyss to the far shores.
May we never forget we are stronger as a united Empire,
Let those who read this have the virtue to live up to the example set by those liberators.*

The appointment of the sinecure is regarded as unconstitutional because a sinecure of this type would be expected to follow the normal rules for a national appointment. The motion was not struck down by magistrates at the time, however, and so the title stands.

Responsibilities

The Keeper oversees the gardens that memorialize the Navarr and Imperial orc heroes who died to retake Treji.

Powers

Gardener's Bounty

The Keeper of the Memorial Gardens of Treji gains custodianship of a sinecure. They receive 6 Bladeroot, 6 True Vervain, 2 Cerulean Mazzarine, 2 Imperial Roseweald, and 2 doses of Marrowort each season.

Appointment

The Keeper of the Memorial Gardens of Treji is appointed by the senator for Hercynia. If the senator cannot reach a decision, the title may be appointed by the Imperial Senate instead. Under normal circumstances, it would have been appointed by unanimous decision of the Navarr senators. The current appointment method is considered problematic by the Constitutional Court.

The title can be held by a Navarr citizen. The Keeper has tenure, and serves until they die or step down. They can be revoked by the General Assembly, the Navarr National Assembly, and by the Assembly of the Nine.

Keeper of the Sapphire Stair

Overview

The Keeper of the Sapphire Stair is an Imperial title awarded to a League citizen. It is a National position, appointed by unanimous decision of the League senators.

Associated with the Sapphire Stair in Tassato, the keeper is paid a portion of each toll paid for use of the lock. The majority of the monies raised goes to the maintenance and operation of the marvellous locks, but the keeper is assigned enough to ensure a comfortable lifestyle. Perhaps more importantly, this sinecure also brings with it a certain amount of influence in the politics of the city itself due to the influence it grants the holder over trade along the Vassa. As such, control of the sinecure is hotly contested by guilds on both sides of the river and on the irregular occasions when the sinecure must be re-appointed, competition to influence the League senators is extremely fierce.

The Keeper is almost always from Tassato. While there have been incidents where League citizens from other cities have been appointed to the position they have rarely found their tenure to be very satisfying. They either moved to Tassato and became involved in the politics of the city, or they found themselves shunned, villified, harassed and on one very unfortunate occasion during the reign of Empress Brannan, murdered for their temerity in involving themselves directly in a Tassatan matter.

The previous Keeper of the Sapphire Stair was Rebeca Porteiro di Tassato, a naga member of the Gilt Moth camorra - a wealthy guild from northern Madeiras known for, among other things, trade in fine cloth, dark ale and Navarr goods. Exiled from the city proper nearly two centuries ago following some scandal or other, the guild stays neutral in political affairs. Rebeca herself is known to be a rake, a bravo, and a hellraiser, and has a reputation for daring amorous adventures and remarkable skill with the sword. Rumour suggests that she was appointed to the position in 366YE following the successful seduction of all three League senators.

During Winter 379YE, Rebecca Porteiro di Tassato suffered a fatal injury, and the title passed to Domitila Sanguineo Rezia di Tassato (after some unfortunate misunderstandings around which of the two beautiful Rezia sisters had been appointed to the position). Following this new appointment there has been an increase in argument and political maneuvering between those associated with the 'Stair - including some calls for increased political representation of the lockworkers' guilds.

Responsibilities

The title holder is expected to ensure that the Sapphire Stair remains open and in a state of good repair. The actual job of operating the lock falls to civil servants and local labourers, mostly domiciled in the fortified village of Cevia. While the title comes with a comfortable house on the banks of the Vassa, few Keepers actually spend much time there preferring the entertainments of the city of Tassato.

Powers

Comfortable Income

As a sinecure, the Keeper of the Sapphire Stair provides an income drawn from the tolls paid by merchants using the lock.

The holder of the sinecure receives 20 Crowns in income each season.

Appointment

The Keeper of the Sapphire Stair is appointed by unanimous decision of the senators of the League. If a unanimous decision cannot be reached, the title may be appointed by the Imperial Senate instead.

Keeper of the Spice Gardens

Overview

The Keeper of the Spice-Gardens is an Imperial title connected to the Spice Gardens of Feroz. The position of Keeper is a sinecure, requiring minimal responsibility but offering a portion of the finest cerulean mazzarine grown on the Brass Coast. Additional luxury spices are sold to ensure the upkeep of the Gardens and a comfortable salary for the various farmers, horticulturalists and merchants who work as agents of the Spice Gardens, although production has tailed off a little in recent tumultuous decades.

Spices from the Gardens are sold throughout the Brass Coast, and before the fall of Segura were exported, first to the Faraden and then even farther afield. Regular caravan trains cross the Spider's Dream to Sarvos, and from there travel throughout the Empire being especially sought after in the markets of Varushka and Urizen. While the money from this business is not available to the Keeper, it can often help bring a certain level of prestige to the holder of the title among those who consider themselves gourmands.

The title of Keeper has a prestigious legacy. It was created in 213 YE during the reign of Empress Mariika, and many scholars believe it was part of an agreed price paid to gain the support of the Freeborn senators for the sweeping financial changes she instituted. The title changes hands with much less regularity than many other Imperial sinecures - the holders tend to be long-lived, and understand the value of maintaining a level of popularity among their peers that makes revocation a very rare occurrence; only one holder has been revoked (in 296 YE Inigo i Tamari i Erigo was stripped of the title when he was found guilty of using his position to cover trades in illegal substances with a Sarcophan beggar-prince. The Erigo tribe have not held the title since, and several families in Feroz are known to be desperate for the opportunity to claim the title once more).

Responsibilities

The title holder is expected to ensure that the Gardens remain fertile and continue to produce a wide variety of valuable luxury goods and valuable herbs for use by physicians and apothecaries throughout the Brass Coast and beyond. How the Keeper disposes of the herbs they receive is entirely their own business; while there is often pressure placed on them to donate their bounty to various causes the majority choose to either sell them or have them made into potions for sale or personal use.

While any Freeborn citizen might try to claim the position, the families of Feroz have worked hard over the last several centuries to ensure that it remains in their hands rather than being claimed by someone resident in another territory. While the title is clearly a sinecure, the Keeper often uses their position to gain additional prestige. Some citizens of Feroz would rather informally approach the Keeper for help with problems relating to their farm, herb garden or forest than the Senator of their territory.

Powers

The Spice of Feroz

The Keeper gains custodianship of a sinecure. Each season they receive 12 doses of Cerulean Mazzarine, and 2 doses each of Imperial Roseweald and True Vervain. The Keeper also receives a small portion of the finest spices for their own table. While this has no game effect, the Keeper often cultivates a reputation for gourmet feasting.

Appointment

The Keeper of the Spice Gardens is appointed by unanimous decision of the senators of the Brass Coast. If a unanimous decision cannot be reached, the title may be appointed by the Imperial Senate instead.

The title can be held by a Freeborn citizen. The Keeper has tenure, and serves until they die or step down. They can be revoked by the General Assembly, the Freeborn National Assembly, and by the Assembly of the Nine.

Keeper of the Tower of the Fall

This title lost its bounty of mana when the Druj destroyed the Tower of the

Overview

The Keeper of the Tower of the Fall was an Urizen Imperial title created following an announcement in Autumn 378YE by the Crystal Architect of the Spires. The position of Custodian was a sinecure, requiring minimal responsibility but offering a regular income of crystal mana.

During the Spring Equinox 380YE, a plague of crystal-eating vermin saw the Senate commission white granite wards to help protect the Tower, which had the unexpected outcome of adding additional production to the sinecure.

During the 381YE Druj invasion of Zenith, the Tower of the Fall was destroyed by orc invaders.

Responsibilities

The Custodian was technically responsible for maintaining the Tower of the Fall; in practice though the day-to-day running and repair of the waterfall and pool lay in the hands of the civil service. The Keeper simply received a bounty of crystal mana from the Tower of the Fall in Zenith.

Powers

Bounty of Mana

The Keeper gained custodianship of a sinecure. They received an income of 10 crystal mana each season.

Appointment

The Keeper of the Tower of the Fall was appointed by unanimous decision of the Urizen senators.

The title could be held by an Urizen citizen. The Keeper had tenure, and served until they died or stepped down. They could be revoked by the General Assembly, the Urizen National Assembly, and by the Assembly of the Nine.

After the flood

Currently the Tower of the Fall is in ruins, and so the holder of this title has no powers and receives no production from the sinecure. If the Tower were rebuilt, (assuming the Druj are driven out of Zenith), the current holder would resume their post if they have not stepped down or died in the interim.

The Tower of the Fall

Set high on the slopes of a snow-capped mountain, this lonely tower stood on the cliff-edge of a cliff next to one of the tallest waterfalls in Urizen. It was almost certainly built as a place for meditative Illuminates to ponder the relationship between the body, the spirit, and magical talent - but that was before the discovery of the magical bounty of the pools below. The icy waterfall cascades down the mountain into a plunge pool far below, creating a churning vortex of swirling water. Incongruously, at the centre of the vortex it was just possible to make out crystal formations - the kind of formation associated with the natural formation of crystal mana.

There had been several attempts in the past to harvest these crystals, but each had met with failure. The exposed crystal formation was dangerously close to a fast moving wall of freezing water that strikes anyone nearby with the force of a dozen charging oxen. More than one tragic tale tells of would-be mana harvesters swept away and battered to death on the rocks below the plunge pool while trying to collect the crystals. The stories have grown with the telling, and the Pool of the Fall is often used as a metaphor for how courage in the pursuit of prosperity is sometimes not enough, and dangerous if not tempered with a little wisdom. The nature of the pool was also seen as having a strong resonance with Summer magic; at least once the eternal Barien has challenged an Urizen petitioner to recover crystals from the depths of the lake.

Over the years several plans had been suggested as to a safe and effective solution to collecting crystals, but it was only relatively recently that a practical solution was found. Realising that a solution that involved stopping the water flow would simply lead to flooding the crystal formation and probably damaging them in the process (assuming that the falling water was not integral to their formation in the first place), an innovative solution was proposed - a series of vanes and baffles down the length of the fall that rather than stopping the water flow, serve primarily to accelerate the vortex - both increasing its rate of magical convergence, and creating enough space at the middle to allow safer access to the crystals.

A mithril structure raised across the pool and delving into the centre proved to be sufficient to allow harvesting when most normal materials have been insufficient to survive being occasionally caught by the vortex. The workers at the Tower of the Fall ensured that the tower was maintained (and available as a residence for the Keeper should they wish to visit the site), as well as being charged with adjusting the vanes and baffles to maintain the flow rate and vortex velocity through the year. The actual task of harvesting crystals was still dangerous, but not as lethally so as it was when brave (or foolhardy) men and women attempted to simply swim through the churning water to claim their prize.

When the Druj came, they stole the mana and then burnt the tower, sending its ruins tumbling down the cliff into the pools below, shattering the crystal formation. They tore the mithril structure apart, leaving only twisted wreckage around the broken mana site.

Kethry

This is the way it was done, and the way it will be done until the final sun sets on the land. We are Kesh, and we are Proud.

Virtue

Kethry is the oldest recorded Paragon of Pride, dating from before the birth of the Empire.

Biography

It is not recorded in which lands Kethry and the Kesh tribe dwelt, though elements in most of the stories about her suggest they likely lived in the east of Wintermark or the west of Varushka, in a "thickly wooded vale in the shadow of great cold mountains". This would suggest her birthplace was either in Skarsind or Miekarova.

Many years before the Empire, local tribes made war on one another both to compete for resources and as a show of strength. The tribe which Kethry led, the Kesh, were conquered by an enemy tribe led by Chieftain Makin the Red, who were larger and more aggressive. It was the custom at the time for the conquered tribe to capitulate territory, possessions and their tribal identity, essentially becoming assimilated into the tribe of their conquerors. In some cases, their new status was as thralls and in some they lived as equals among their conquerors, learning their customs and traditions.

Whilst there are many variants on the tale of Kethry, the version below contains all of the common elements, in particular the phrasing of the conversations between Kethry and Makin - which are often taken up by the audience when the tale is told out loud - and its reversal at the end of the story.

When Kethry's tribe was defeated, Makin the Red took possession of Kethry's lodge, said to be the finest and largest in the village. The wooden beams and pillars were intricately carved with the likenesses of the birds and beasts of the wood. Makin the Red liked it so much he decided to make the lodge his base for a year and a day, while he led raids on other neighbouring tribes. Kethry moved into a reed-woven hut on the outskirts of the village, whistling and smiling as she wove the thatch for the roof herself and daubed the walls. Many of her people had taken to the ways of the conqueror, but in her heart Kethry kept alive the customs and traditions of her people.

When Makin returned, the lodge was empty. Everyone was sitting around a fire outside Kethry's simple hut, singing and sharing food. Makin was furious; there had been no feast in his honor to welcome him home from the raid, as was the custom of his people. Instead, his scouts sat round the fire drinking broth from wooden bowls into which they dipped crusts of bread. He said to them "This is not the way of our people! This food you eat is the food of the conquered, not the conqueror! We do not sit round a fire sharing soup and bread, we dine at tables in lodges of pine!"

It was Kethry who replied. "You speak of your people, but they are many. All the tribes you have conquered are numbered here, with rich traditions of their own. Why do you not sit with us as your scouts do and enjoy the broth of the Kesh? It is flavoured with the finest herbs and served with bread fresh from our ovens." Makin refused and ate alone in his lodge while his scouts remained with Kethry. Before he did so, he spoke to her thus: "Your ways are now our ways, your customs lost to our strength. Why do you continue with this meal?" Kethry replied. "This is the way it was done, and the way it will be done until the final sun sets on the land. We are Kesh, and we are Proud.

Makin went away to raid again for a year and a day, as was tradition. When Makin next returned, the village was bathed in the light of a hundred torches. There was no procession for his return, as was custom, but instead the people danced with one another in a great circle, weaving in and out of the torches. He was furious to see his runners there dancing, those who he had sent ahead to ensure the village prepared for his return.

Kethry came forward and spoke with him. "This is the dance of the Kesh, which we have been performing on this day since the time of my grandmother's grandmother. Will you dance with us, Makin the Red? Will you make merry with your runners and the Kesh?" Makin refused and spoke back. "Your ways are now our ways, your customs lost to our strength. Why do you continue with this dance?" Kethry replied. "This is the way it was done, and the way it will be done until the final sun sets on the land. We are Kesh, and we are Proud. Makin sat alone in his pine lodge whilst the merriment continued all around the village until the last torch was burned out, as was custom.

When Makin returned from his third raid, he hardly recognised anyone. All of the guards he had left here to keep an eye on the village were dressed in the manner of the Kesh and their spears were decorated with white feathers, not black. Furious, he asked his guards what had happened, but it was Kethry who spoke.

"Welcome, Makin the Red. Would you like a white feather for your spear? The omens are auspicious, if you tie a white feather to your spear it will bring you speed on the hunt." As usual, Makin replied "Your ways are now our ways, your customs lost to our strength. Why do you continue with this belief?" Kethry replied. "This is the way it was done, and the way it will be done until the final sun sets on the land. We are Kesh, and we are Proud.

Three times Makin had been raiding now and three times he had returned. Each time more of the Kesh had returned to their traditions and each time his own tribe had joined in. He spoke to Kethry one more time:

"I am the one who has been conquered, not the Kesh. Sing me your songs, Kethry, and bake me your bread. Dance your dance with me and give me a white feather. From this day forward, my tribe will have no name of their own. I am Kesh now, and I am proud.

Kethry and Makin were eventually wed, and the feast which accompanied their celebration lasted a year and a day, as was custom.

Signs

Pilgrimage By exemplifying the pride of her own tribe's traditions and refusing to adopt those of her conqueror, Kethry is said to have undertaken a spiritual journey to the heart of Pride.

Benevolence The deeds of Kethry brought prosperity to her whole tribe and not just herself. In keeping alive the old traditions and not capitulating to her conquerors, both tribes eventually lived as Kesh.

Salvation Kethry converted an entire warlike, conquering tribe through sheer will by showing them the pride in her tribal customs and bringing them into a life of virtue. In doing so, she also saved the Kesh and their customs from being lost to history.

Legacy The most commonly suggested Legacy of Kethry is that of hearth magic - those themes and images which combine to breath culture, life and identity into a nation. Whilst none claim that Kethry delivered hearth magic to the world as Tian did with fire, there are sufficient elements in her story which have led people to claim that Kethry's success lay in the use of that magic, whether she knew it or not.

Inspiration Kethry's refusal to give up on the traditions of her people was such an inspiration that she managed to turn the hearts of the tribe who had conquered them, including that of their leader. Her story was told so many times that it lasted the generations until the birth of the Empire and the Synod. All of the Kesh and the conquering tribe are thus her followers and imitators.

Liberation To date, no visions have been recorded of her life from her own eyes. Consequently, the sign of liberation holds. In some thematic variants of the Kethry story, she lives to a ripe old age and sees many more people adopt the customs of the Kesh, She speaks to them as an assembly and then returns to her lodge to die, but her body is never found, indicating an ascension.

Revelation There is nothing in any of the stories of Kethry or any surviving tales that might be an indication of her past lives, so the sign of revelation is impossible to confirm or refute.

Kethry in Play

- As with several Paragons, there are some scholars who suggest the story of Kethry might in fact be much older than is commonly believed, perhaps originating far beyond the borders of the lands that today are the Empire. One branch of Varushkan historians claim that the first stories of Kethry came down out of the mountains with the forbears of the Ushkan people, although they can provide little evidence to support their claim.
- There is a glade in Astolat which is said to be the place where Makin first courted Kethry. If it has any truthful claim to being a location from this tale, Kethry and Makin surely travelled a great distance from their supposed homes in Miekarova or Skarsind to plight their troths.

Keywords

Overview

Imperial armies possess qualities that give them advantages in certain situations. These keywords reflect the flavour of the army and the nation to which it belongs. A military unit assigned to assist a campaign army does not gain the benefit of these keywords. Likewise, the additional strength granted by an enchantment such as Knights of Glory or Quickening Cold Meat is not counted for purposes of determining the effect of a keyword.

Applying Keywords

Some keywords are applied automatically, some like magician and mercenary require the general to provide payment. This payment should be handed into GOD in the general's hand-in baggy - and then an email sent to PD after the event.

Some keywords are applied only if the campaign involves a specific terrain. For instance an army with the Forester keyword may gain a bonus when fighting in a territory with a region with the Forest keyword. These keywords are activated under two conditions:

- Your side controls the region with the keyword
- Your side attacks the region with the keyword

Gaining new keywords

Existing Imperial armies already have one or more keywords representing their traditional roles. An existing keyword can be removed without cost. Adding or removing a keyword requires a motion by the Imperial Senate. An Imperial army can gain additional keywords, but the cost to add each new keyword is progressively more expensive. The first keyword added to an army requires 50 wains, the second 100 wains, the third 200 wains and so on.

Applying keywords to a large army costs 75 wains, 150 wains, 300 wains and so on. These additional costs need to be paid regardless of whether the keyword is being applied to an existing large army, or if a standard army with keywords is turned into a large army.

List of Keywords

Logistics

An army with good logistics has excellent access to supplies and the organisation to make sure they get to where they are needed. They may also be adept at making use of materials scavenged while on campaign, or carry additional supplies with them when they are at war.

Effect: This army can resupply naturally at the rate of 750 strength each season rather than the normal 500 (a large army would resupply at 1,125 troops each season rather than 750). They must still obey the normal requirement for natural resupply. Other ways of resupplying an army are not changed.

Aggressive

An aggressive army focuses on inflicting casualties on the enemies. The soldiers are trained and equipped to gather and exploit information about the lay of the land.

Effect: An aggressive army has the number of casualties it inflicts increased by 10% if it has been in this territory since start of the last season. If it has been in this territory for two full seasons, the extra casualties increase to 20%, and once the army has been in the territory for three full seasons, the additional casualties reach the maximum 30%.

Resilient

A resilient army might be equipped to produce makeshift fortifications, or it might simply possess a stubborn spirit coupled with training in defensive formations.

Effect: A resilient army has the number of casualties it takes reduced by 10% if it has been in this territory since start of the last season. If it has been in this territory for two full seasons, the reduction increases to 20%, and once the army has been in the territory for three full seasons, the reduction reaches the maximum 30%.

Siege

An army trained in siege warfare is adept at attacking fortifications. usually this means the army has the expertise to quickly construct catapults, trebuchets and siege towers as well as some expertise in rationing resources and countering enemy engineers. It may also reflect an army with experience fighting in the cramped conditions of a city or castle.

Effect: When attacking a fortification, any damage inflicted on that fortification is increased by 20%. When defending a fortification, the damage inflicted on that fortification by enemies is reduced by 20%.

Note: To gain these advantages, the narrative of the campaign has to involve an actual attack on the fortification - fortifications only inflict or take casualties during attempts to capture or destroy them.

Marsh Fighter

An army experienced in fighting in a marsh gains significant advantages over less experienced armies. They tend to be more comfortable operating in smaller units, may favour ranged weapons, and have the support of magicians or surgeons trained to deal with insect bites, poisonous vermin and disease. They also tend to have a bit of specialist equipment, such as waterproof cloaks.

Effect: The army has it's strength increased by 20% for determining the campaign outcome when the campaign includes a region with the marsh keyword.

Rugged

Fighting in hills and mountains is a risky business. Armies with this keyword tend to have especially skilled scouts and cartographers who track passes, valleys and the like and are always ready to suggest ways to make the best use of the broken terrain. They also tend to have equipment or supplies to help them deal with cold, altitude or difficult terrain.

Effect: The army has it's strength increased by 20% for determining the campaign outcome when the campaign includes a region with the hilly keyword.

Forester

Fighting in a forest is a frustrating undertaking. Trees make it difficult for armies to form up, and so an army with experience fighting in this kind of terrain often split up into several smaller units capable of operating for several days without supervision. Their ability to operate in diffuse formations gives them a significant advantage over armies less versed in guerilla warfare.

Effect: The army has it's strength increased by 20% for determining the campaign outcome when the campaign includes a region with the forested keyword.

Coastal

A coastal army often includes mariners among its soldiers, and is usually supported by boats or even ships. This is the closest the Empire currently has to a naval force. The army is experienced at dealing with sailors and fishermen, travelling by boat and ship, dealing with the realities of amphibious assaults, and making beachhead landings. It is most common among Freeborn armies.

Effect: The army has it's strength increased by 20% for determining the campaign outcome when the campaign includes a region with the coastal keyword. The coastal keyword applies to many areas adjacent to the sea (although not all - the wide beaches of the Brass Coast represent entirely different terrain to the cliffy bluffs of Urizen), and also to some regions around major rivers or other large bodies of water.

Scouting

A scouting army is often broken down into smaller units that can operate semi-autonomously, spreading out over the countryside when it moves. The army is accompanied by trained observers, often equipped with telescopes and signalling mirrors, and often has access to cartographers and detailed maps - and the knowledge to make good use of them.

Effect: When this army is committed to a campaign, it provides reports on the campaign armies in the territory, including the allegiance of the armies, an estimation of their strength and other information such as keywords, local fortifications, significant or noteworthy military units and other potentially useful strategic and tactical information. This information is supplied to the general who commands the army at the beginning of an event.

Disciplined

A disciplined army has well organised chain of command, and every soldier knows what to do if separated from a superior officer. The army is often supported by priests or spiritual advisors - within the Empire they may make use of ceremonies of the Way to provide additional guidance. Armies from Highguard and the Iron Confederacy are most likely to have this keyword.

Effect: This army is disbanded when it takes casualties that reduce it's strength below 250 rather than below 1,000. In addition, a disciplined army is more effective at fighting fearsome enemies. When this army engages fearsome enemies, the benefits of the fearsome keyword are neutralised and the disciplined army inflicts an additional 20% casualties against those armies.

Fast

The soldiers of a fast army are trained to move quickly for long periods of time, carrying their gear. Overland, they can outpace most other armies of similar size. The logistics of the army are often focused towards helping soldiers move, and recovering from forced march.

Effect: The army can move five territories each season, rather than the usual three. It must still stop moving when it enters a hostile territory.

Magic

A magic army contains many more magicians, and soldiers trained to fight alongside magicians, than a standard army. Such armies integrate magical and martial tactics to harry their opponents and achieve difficult goals. Armies from Urizen, Thule and Axos are most likely to have this keyword.

Effect: If the general of this army supplies 35 mana crystals, the army gains a 1,000 point force bonus to fighting capabilities for the next season. This is a flat bonus that is not multiplied by any other keyword.

Mercenary

A mercenary army is not necessarily one that fights for payment, but rather one that has experience working with and integrating independently minded military units who do fight for payment. Armies from the Brass Coast and League are most likely to have this keyword.

Effect: If the general of this army supplies 5 thrones, the army gains a 1,000 point force bonus to fighting capabilities for the next season. This is a flat bonus that is not multiplied by any other keyword.

Glorious

A glorious army lives to fight. Individual soldiers strive to excel, taking joy in fighting stronger opponents and seeking opportunities to defeat their enemies and win their battles. It is most common in Dawnish, Wintermark and Jotun armies.

Effect: The army has it's strength increased by 20% for determining the campaign outcome, but all casualties it takes are increased by 10%.

Barbarian orc keywords

These keywords are associated with barbarian orc armies, especially the Thule and the Druj. They are not normally available to Imperial armies. Unlike the keywords used by the Imperial armies, these keywords are designed to be more circumstantial and to be countered by clever tactics and by direct player action at an event.

Fearsome

A fearsome army uses magic, powerful creatures and terror-tactics to unnerve their enemies and damage their morale. It is most common in Thule and Druj armies.

Effect: The army inflicts an additional 20% casualties on it's enemies, and victory points used to claim regions are 20% more effective. If a fearsome army faces a disciplined army, this bonus is lost and the fearsome army takes additional casualties.

Poisonous

A poisonous army uses herbs, magic and monstrous creatures to inflict sickness and weakness on their opponents. It is most common in Druj armies.

Effect: The army inflicts an additional 20% casualties on it's enemies except when it is facing armies that have been protected from poison and infection (for example, when in an area under the effect of a Rivers of Life ritual).

Savage

A savage army fights better the more desperate it becomes. It is most common among the orcs of the Broken Shore and the Lasambrian Hills.

Effect: When this army has been reduced below half strength, it inflicts an additional 50% casualties.

Merciless

A merciless army specifically targets weakened opponents, seeking to destroy enemy armies rather than simply drive them off. It is most common among Grendel and Druj armies.

Effect: This army inflicts an additional 20% casualties, spread among all opposing armies whose fighting strength has dropped to 2,500 or less.

Keywords and large armies

Being large is not a keyword. A large army simply has a maximum strength of 7,500. Some keywords may work slightly differently when assigned to a large army

Kimus

Eternal of Day

Sobriquets

The most common name for Kimus is the Unblinking Eye, a name of which the eternal apparently approves.

As with many eternal, especially those of the Realm of Day, Kimus has no true gender. It is often referred to as female, but concepts such as this seem to have minimal relevance for this being. It is sometimes called The Celestial Eye, She Who Watches, the Thousand Eyes of the Sun and Moon, the Glass of the Heavens, and the Seer Clad in Veils of Light

In Asavea, it is often called "del sátrapa de la aurora", or 'the satrap of dawn.' Some texts refer to Kimus as the High Mandarin, the First Minister or the Grand Vizier and suggest that it is a subject or agent of Sinokenon. These texts usually reference a very old Asavean scroll called "A chave e o portão" which claims to detail secrets of the eternal of the Realm of Day. There is little evidence for the claim that Kimus is in any way subservient to Sinokenon, and modern scholars largely discount these claims - although all such claims are made in texts that reference A chave e o portão - no copies of the original scroll are known to exist outside the archipelago. .

Appearance

Kimus is usually perceived as a statuesque figure wrapped in white and lemon-yellow veils. It is invariably blindfolded, or its face concealed by a featureless mask. Rather than being blind, Kimus sees through its thousand eyes - globes of glass, crystal or fire that burn with an unquenchable light and can move independently of their mistress. Whenever it is encountered, it is always surrounded by an aura of piercing white light that can damage the eyes of the unwary, or those who look directly at it.

Kimus rarely moves; the Dawnish Enchanter Rasiyon de Tiron suggested that it may simply be a construct or image created by the floating eyes that are the true form of Kimus. Its voice is described as calm, clear and piercing. The only emotions it seems to manifest are anger and curiosity - magicians who have interacted with it claim that it tends to speak in statements, as if describing how the world was, is or will be if the one it is speaking to does as it is instructed.

As with many of the eternal of the Realm of Day, Kimus has a number of heralds and attendants who are usually referred to as viziers. When they visit the mortal realm they are invariably accompanied by a scrying device through which Kimus can observe their surroundings. When encountered in the Realm of Day, audiences with these Viziers will invariably be observed by one or more eyes of Kimus.

Concerns

Kimus proposes a two-fold philosophy. First, only those things which are directly observed can be proven to have occurred, but that the act of observation changes both the events observed and the observer itself. Second, it claims that that only the existence of the self (in this case, Kimus) is sure - the existence of all other things is unsure. It does not attempt to conceal this philosophy, and encourages mortals to think about, explore and challenge the implications of its belief.

The thousand eyes (the exact number is unknown) allow Kimus to observe multiple events simultaneously, and from multiple viewpoints. It has an insatiable desire to observe events, especially events of significance (although how Kimus defines significance has yet to be determined), but it also sees value in 'experiencing' individuals who have perceived such events - through audiences and discussions. Second-hand information is much less interesting to Kimus; only personal, first-hand accounts truly interest this powerful eternal.

According to the stargazer Ilitan of Mirrorfalls, Kimus repeatedly demonstrates the ability to perceive events before they happen - in his treatise The Moving Moment he claimed that Kimus does not see existence the same way other beings do, and simultaneously perceives a short distance into both the past and the present. She tried to explain this perception in more detail, but her treatise is considered entirely incomprehensible apart from some references to the idea that it is easier to observe something when one is apart from it, rather than within it. Other scholars suggest Kimus' uncanny ability to predict important events stems more from its ability to perform thousands of calculations simultaneously, extrapolating potential future scenarios from present conditions with superhuman capacity.

- 2 Viziers

Of further interest to Kimus is the way that individuals (which may or may not be extensions of Kimus' own mind) are changed by or react to the events they observe - or do not observe. An individual who sees a loved one killed and hunts down the killers fascinates Kimus, but so does one who does not directly witness the events and acts on second-hand knowledge.

This eternal is also fascinated by the idea of understanding. By observing, studying, experimenting with and thinking about something, an individual can understand that thing - and gain power over it. An individual that understands the whole of creation can set itself ultimately apart from and above creation, assuming a new order of being. Kimus claims that the first step to understanding is perception - that an individual can only ever hope to gain true understanding of (and thus wield true power over) something they can perceive clearly.

Both the Empire and the Commonwealth are of special interest to Kimus because they actively aspire to understand the truths of creation. Older nations, such as Asavea or the Principalities of Jarm tend to try and find shortcuts to true understanding - they seek power for its own sake, or accept received wisdom, rather than striving for true understanding.

Ultimately, Kimus' deep concern with ideas of perception and understanding, and fostering them in others, means that it often serves as a patron of magicians, especially the more restrained members of the Unfettered Mind order. It is known to have little patience for the Shuttered Lantern order; in the past it has expressed frustration at their tendency to pursue 'knowledge rather than understanding' and 'power rather than clarity'.

Unlike many eternals, Kimus has an interest in practitioners of the Way, especially those who meditate on the virtues of Wisdom and Vigilance. Rasiyon de Tion suggested that ultimately Kimus wishes to understand the nature of the soul as much as any pilgrim of the way, and that it forms a key piece in this eternal's wider scheme to understand and encompass the whole of existence.

Boons

Kimus is a powerful diviner. It can perform potent acts of scrying, observing distant events as they are happening. It often has first-hand knowledge of significant events from all over the world. It has little interest in the future or the past, except as they are extensions of the present. It can provide boons that empower divination; most commonly in the form of a sphere or ball of glass or crystal which focus the mind and allow the performance of rituals such as Eyes of the Sun and Moon or The Eye of the High Places. Boons from Kimus can also enhance understanding - rituals such as Clear Lens of the Eternal River and Bright Lantern of Ophis allow magicians to observe and gain information using senses normally denied to mortals and Kimus may occasionally grant boons associated with them or with similar powers.

Divination is not the only concern of Kimus however; it is closely tied to concepts of light and force, and claims to have great understanding of the physical forces that make up creation. As a consequence, it is capable of directing large amounts of focused magical energy to harm or protect. It can cause blindness, for example, as well as removing that condition. It can repel or paralyse mortals - indeed, the ritual Kimus' Glaring Eye makes good use of this ability, and its name is sometimes evoked when casting Revelatory Light of the Empyrean Spheres. The ability to focus the revelatory light has also been used several times to perform an extremely potent version of Piercing Light of Revelation - Kimus is said to despise glammers, obfuscation and illusion, burning them away with the irresistible light of its gaze.

The crystalline spheres that Kimus lends to magicians might actually be a form of its thousand eyes. On the few occasions when one of the spheres was broken or shattered there was often an explosion of magical energy that threw those nearby to the ground, stunned them or blinded them.

Very occasionally Kimus will grant a crystalline rod or staff to one of its agents that grants mastery of violent energy such as that used in the repel incantation. Such implements are considered powerful boons and are often given only in return for a significant gift of weltsilver, a substance which Kimus appears to value very highly.

Rasiyon de Tiron recorded in his journals the experience of 'focusing' the light of Kimus during a battle against the Druj in the Mallum. In his account, Kimus agreed to help remove a shroud of madness and nightmares woven by the monstrous Ghulai Tithuman but required Rasiyon to serve as an "anchor" for its power. At a key moment, the Dawnish enchanter evoked Kimus' name through a rune carved into his forehead, and a shaft of blinding light struck the magician and every living thing nearby, blinding them and tearing asunder the potent ritual Ghulai Tithuman had created. According to Rasiyon, he lost consciousness and did not recover for three weeks during which time he apparently suffered inexpressible visions of alien vistas. His Druj opponent was apparently likewise stricken, even though he was half a mile from the battlefield. The stargazer Ilitan of Mirrorfalls made a study of the area fifty years later and discovered lingering (though slowly fading) effects that would make it exceptionally difficult for any magician to work certain forms of Night magic in the area for decades to come.

Viziers

There is a strict hierarchy among the viziers of Kimus. The most powerful are minor eternal in their own right, and do not leave the Realm of Day. The least powerful are actually heralds, and these are the entities that serve as Kimus' eyes and ears - and hands - in the material world.

Viziers often appear with many of the trappings of the merrow, although their skin colouration tends to be paler - often bone white, ivory or lemon-yellow. They are almost always dressed in sumptuous pale-coloured robes, and invariably carry a crystal sphere, orb, staff or rod. Most are competent magicians, and often possess magical abilities related to scrying, detection and the release of crushing force. They are always marked in some fashion with a symbol associated with Kimus - the rune Ophis, the unblinking eye or the constellation of the key are most common.

Both Rasiyon de Timon and Ilitan of Mirrorfalls agreed that Kimus is aware of everything that its Viziers are aware of, although they disagreed on the specifics. Rasiyon claimed that Kimus knew only generally what was going on with her viziers, while Ilitan claimed the eternal had complete understanding of everything the Vizier perceived or experienced.

"O, man of Dawn, how I admire you.

"You perceive barely one fraction of one fraction of what happens in a limited arc to the front of your head. Your hound knows more of the world than you do; its nose is keener; its ears keener; every moment it senses a hundred things you cannot imagine; it knows the world around it in a way that would utterly overwhelm you, leave you crying, begging for it to stop.

"The birds that soar in your skies sense the currents of the wind; they can see a mouse creep through the grass from where they hang amid the clouds; they encompass the invisible threads of your world so profoundly that you do not have the language to understand even if I were capable of expressing it.

"The spider ... the tree ... the fish ... you are surpassed in every sense by creatures you consider barely aware ... and yet you aspire to master the lore of the heavens, strive to enfold yourself with true understanding of the nature of your existence.

"O, man of Dawn, you are truly a wonder of creation."

Kimus' Glaring Eye

Rules

Day Magnitude 19

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 2 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets a character, who must be present throughout. The target character must have the magician skill.

During the ritual the target must be marked on one hand with a depiction of the rune Sular, the rune Ophis, or an open eye.

This spell is an enchantment. A target may only be under one enchantment effect at a time.

Effects

During the ritual, one of the target's palms must be painted, marked or tattooed with the Sular rune, the rune Ophis, or a direct depiction of an open eye.

Whenever the target casts the repel spell, they may use it on two targets instead of one. They have only 10 seconds to deliver the second call of REPEL. They can only make this call if the hand marked with the eye is free and open and the symbol is visible; it cannot be in a pocket, gloved or otherwise concealed; nor can it be in use holding anything (including a buckler or shield) or wielding another weapon or implement. The only exception is that a character with the battle mage skill can use this ability when wielding a staff.

If at any point the image on the palm is disrupted (such as by being washed away in rain), the effects of the ritual immediately end.

The effect lasts until the start of the next Profound Decisions Empire event.

Additional Targets

This ritual can affect additional characters from the same coven. Each additional character increases the magnitude by 15. Additional characters must be present throughout.

Option

Any caster who has mastered the ritual may choose to substitute Tempest Jade for crystal mana when contributing to it. Every 2 tempest jade of Tempest Jade spent counts as 1 crystal mana when contributing to the ritual.

Description

This ritual allows the target to channel mystic force, provided they are prepared to honour a pact with the Day eternal Kimus to bear its sigil, and present it when they invoke the power to drive their opponents away. This ritual is not massively popular - the ability it provides comes at the cost of some versatility - but for the scholars of Day it can sometimes provide much-needed battlefield effectiveness at minimal cost.

The enchantment does not care how the magician performs the repel spell, only that they do. They might wield it through personal knowledge of the spell, or make use of a magic item such as a Storm Sceptre, Stormweaver, or Pugilist's Shillelagh. As soon as the spell is cast, it brings with it an echo, or resonance, that allows the magician to unleash a second identical effect on a second target within reach of their implement. The resonance fades quickly - there are only a few seconds to unleash the second spell - but for a battle mage in the thick of combat it can prove a great adjunct to their martial prowess.

The ritual is sometimes cast with the use of tempest jade as well as, or instead of, crystal mana. Such materials not only resonate with magical force (they are a major component of many weapons related to driving foes away, shattering items, or knocking opponents down), but the tempest jade also has a resonance for divination and detection making it doubly valuable, and appealing, to Kimus.

Common Elements

In addition to the mark on the hand, the rune Ophis is often marked on the rod or staff of the target.

Kirtle

The kirtle is the basic pull on, t-shaped gown which was worn throughout northern Europe from the dark ages onwards. kirtles Later kirtles became more fitted and either button or lace up the front. These are often called cotehardies.

Kirtles are usually worn over a lightweight underdress called a shift which can be made by simply adding some panels to a t-tunic to allow for movement. All three of these dresses are straightforward to make either from patterns or from pattern diagrams and are easy to buy from both reenactment and LARP suppliers. Generally these dresses are made from wool, but heavier weights of linen or cotton are also suitable.

These dresses can also be worn with the skirt tucked into the belt at the front to display the shift underneath, or show off a fancy lining.

Knight-errant

Overview

Those who are actively seeking to pass a Test of Mettle are called knights-errant. Formally they are not noble, but some, especially those who are noble-born often assume some of the rank and privilege of nobility. With their quest for glory and status, knights-errant are commonly regarded as romantic figures in Dawn.

Technically, anyone in Dawn who has not passed a Test of Mettle is a yeoman, whether they are a farmer, a merchant or the daughter of an earl. The Dawnish are sticklers for the proper nomenclature, and insist that knight is the correct term to describe a noble who is an experienced and capable warrior, but even the Dawnish will often group knight-errants in with the knights when counting the fighting strength of a noble house.

A knight-errant need not be a warrior. You might be a bard and story-teller who is seeking to pass your test to become a troubadour. You might be a craftsman or a magician who wishes to become a witch. A knight-errant is anyone who is trying to publicly pass the Test of Mettle.

Knights-errant often travel the land together, helping each other to triumph in their tests. Such bands travel the land to wherever they are most needed, seeking out opportunities for heroism. Groups of noble-born knights-errant are often accompanied by loyal yeomen; faithful house retainers or childhood friends. The yeomen handle everyday responsibilities allowing the would-be knights to concentrate on less worldly matters. It is not unusual for yeomen to declare themselves knights-errant but they often prefer to adventure by themselves or with others from similar humble upbringings.

The easiest way to pass a Test of Mettle is to petition the noble house you were raised in and pass the challenges they set you. It is a much more challenging to petition another noble house, particularly one with which you have little existing connections. The most ambitious knight-errants, however, seek the ultimate prize – achievements so glorious that they have to be recognized by all the noble houses – hoping for a prestigious noble house to approach them and offer a Test of Mettle. Such achievements are rare, but a knight-errant who is invited into a house rather than petitioning one is seen as being worthy indeed.

The travails of a knight-errant are not just difficult, they can also be expensive. Most Dawn nobles have a fairly cursory disdain for money, it tends to get in the way of a glorious ambition, but no-one can completely ignore the realities of mundane life. To facilitate their quests, many knights-errant or groups of knights, take a patron, a wealthy noble who can financially support their heroic lifestyle. Patrons can be useful, but often come with strings attached, even if just a requirement to serve the patron when called.

Some knights-errant enjoy the life of questing for glory so much that they continue to adventure even after passing their Test of Mettle. Such individuals become questing knights and sometimes form knightly orders of their own.

Creating a Knight-Errant

If you create a knight-errant character then you are playing a character that is not formally a noble but is striving to become one. Your character may be noble-born or yeoman-born depending on what suits your character. Individual knights-errant are seeking glory for the sake of passing their Test of Mettle, or in some cases, for the sake of attracting the attention of the best noble houses to join, so you may define as little or as much family history as you wish in creating your character.

The imagery of warriors in a harness of plate can be an intimidating costume prospect for anyone wanting to play in Dawn if you don't already own expensive armour. Knights-errant, even noble-born ones, are often short of money so it can be a great choice for players who want to play a Dawnish character but don't feel confident that their costume conveys the image of a rich and powerful noble. It is also a great way to introduce a lone character who is looking to join a noble house in-character. It is also worth considering playing a knight-errant if you are interested in playing in Dawn but want to avoid some of the more political aspects of playing a noble.

If you intend to play a knight-errant, it is important to appreciate the large scale of the PD Empire events. You will have epic opportunities for battles as part of a great army fighting the orcs, but you won't be going off on a lone quest to slay a monster. It isn't possible to create that kind of experience for characters at an event where hundreds of players are attending.

Contents

- 1 Overview
- 2 Creating a Knight-Errant
- 3 The Test of Mettle
- 4 Playing a Knight-errant
- 5 Groups of Knights-errant

Some knights-errant have a patron - usually an Earl or other powerful Dawnish political figure - who provides them with financial backing. Having a patron can create an interesting additional dimension to your character - you shouldn't expect them to give you actual money you can use in the game (although some might) - but you can roleplay that your character's armour, weapons and wealth are from your patron. A useful patron might be able to help you politically at events, or they might place demands on your character forcing you to do tasks for them. A patron may be able to give you some real in-character advantages but ultimately the relationship exists to create interesting roleplaying around.

The Test of Mettle

The Test of Mettle is an important part of your character, so think carefully about your options here. You can create a minor noble house that has set you a Test - doing this means that you can create your own Test and ensure it is suitably challenging and heroic. Avoid having a Test that is too easy to complete, people won't be impressed by a noble who visibly completes an easy Test. If you don't want the challenge of trying to achieve glory in play then it is much easier to create a character who is already noble. The alternatives are to seek out an existing Dawnish noble house and demand a Test of Mettle from them, or to try and be so glorious that the noble houses come to you and try to offer you a Test.

In theory you have the right to demand a Test of Mettle from any existing noble house - in practice it is better to seek out a noble house that is receptive to offering you a Test of Mettle. Otherwise you are likely to be set a Test of Mettle that is inordinately difficult. Beware of any noble house that sets too easy a Test of Mettle however - the point of playing a knight-errant is to roleplay through trying to become a noble by passing your Test. You can only pass one Test, most players will get far more out of a difficult and exciting Test.

If an Earl does set an easy Test of Mettle, something that simply won't be glorious to attempt or complete - consider rejecting them. Knights-errant want the glory of passing a difficult test - but they also want the glory of joining a powerful house filled with similar glorious individuals. If a noble house sets you an easy Test it demonstrates that they are beneath you - you should seek out a more glorious house better suited to your noble nature!

Playing a Knight-errant

If you strive to play your character in as glorious a way as possible, then you can risk assuming some of the status of a noble, but it is wise to be careful. The point of playing a knight-errant is that your character is not yet noble - if you want to play a noble character who is questing for glory then consider playing a questing knight instead.

A knight-errant should not have their own heraldry. If you have a heraldic shield, consider covering it with black cloth. Knights-errant can wear the colours of Dawn, a dark blue field with a yellow sun on it, either as a flag or as their heraldry. Doing this indicates your status as a knight-errant and not a noble - but remember that the first Empress wore these colours when she first came to Dawn - they should be carried and worn with pride!

If you manage to complete your Test of Mettle while playing your character then you have a few choices. If the Test of Mettle has been set by an Earl in play, then technically you are now part of that Earl's noble house. You may wish to join their group, roleplay that you have nothing more than a loose association with the house or else set up a noble house of your own. If you wrote your own Test of Mettle as part of your background, then you can reinvent your character as a noble in charge of the noble house that set your Test.

If you don't want to play a noble in a noble household, the alternative is to become a questing knight.

Groups of Knights-errant

It is common for groups of knights-errant to travel together in quest for glory. Creating a group of knights-errant is an alternative to playing a Dawnish noble house, but is likely to be less political and more focused on adventure and battle. All the advice presented above for creating and playing a knight-errant still applies, but it is also possible to play yeomen in the group.

The yeomen with a group of knights-errant, may be men-at-arms accompanying the knights or squires acting as loyal companions and servants. Although not likely to be armed and armoured as well as the knights-errant, men-at-arms should be able hold their own in a battle and squires may or may not fight as they choose. Remember that playing a servant in Empire isn't the same as in other games - most squires should be pragmatic and unashamed about their role in Dawnish society.

Money is not considered glorious so most nobles and knights-errant avoid having anything to do with it if they can. If you have a yeoman in the group it is well worth seeing if they want to handle the group finances. A prosperous noble house may have a yeoman serving as a seneschal so it's perfectly appropriate to have a character in a similar role in your group of knights-errant.

A knight-errant group is often be willing to accept new members if their deeds are sufficiently glorious, so before you create your own, check to see if other groups of knights-errant in the system will have you first. You may well have more fun as part of an existing group of knights-errant than by yourself. Of course, you might rather be in competition with them for the most glorious deeds, so you don't have to join an existing group.

Knighly Redoubt

Description

Crafted of orichalcum-steel with weltsilver fastenings and decoration, this armour offers powerful protection on the battlefield. It is variously known as Burnished Steel or Orichalcum Harness, and is worn by serious warriors throughout the Empire. The iconic image of a Dawnish knight is a proud warrior encased in this armour, impenetrable to the brutal blows of barbarians. Such is the reputation of the Knighly Redoubt in Dawn that only those who are confident that they have attained great glory will dare wear it. yeomen or knights errant who wear it are often seen as foolish upstarts.

It is therefore slightly aggravating to the artisans of Dawn that one of the things that the Marchers took with them during their rebellion was the design of this armour. It has become a favourite of Marcher generals, though Marcher-made suits tend to consist of several vital pieces, rather than impractically elaborate construction of a complete suit of plate, and are generally less gaudy than the Dawnish equivalents. General Agnes Carver, a key figure in the conquest of Semmerholm, would tease her Dawnish allies by referring to her armour as Nighly Doubt, alluding to her troops' feelings on fighting alongside the Dawnish armies. Occasionally the name is still used but is seen as a slur against Dawn and a sign of disloyalty to the Empire as a whole. More polite Marchers refer to it as Mournwold Mail, for prior to the loss of that territory, the mines of Mournwold produced many of the raw materials used in its production.

The armour is also very popular with the Highborn cataphracts, who care little for the rivalry between Dawnish and Marcher. Often beautifully laquered and decorated and almost invariably with a distinctive winged helmet, the armour is sometimes called the Final Redoubt or the Armour of Pride. It is widely considered the pinnacle of the armoursmith's art, and suits of armour are passed down within a chapter, being carefully reforged each year. A rare few of these suits ended up being given as gifts to the Imperial Orcs, who consider them items of great worth.

Rules

- Form: Armour. Takes the form of a suit of heavy armour.
- Requirement: Any character can bond to this item.
- Effect: You gain two additional ranks of the endurance skill.
- Materials: Crafting a suit of knighly redoubt requires eleven ingots of orichalcum and five ingots of weltsilver. It takes one month to make one of these items.

One earl was a warrior, her nose crooked from an old break; one robed and wearing the circlet of his house, an enchanter. They spoke together quietly by lamplight as outside the night brightened into morning. Shortly before the sun created the trees, the two earls nodded, agreement reached.

"Come in, please" called the enchanter.

A young man entered the tent. His demeanour was stern, the face of one who had been tested in battle many times, despite his short years. His gambeson was stained with sweat, blood and the circular marks of mail links. The warrior earl inclined her head, approvingly.

"All discoloured from your hauberk, I see. You are born to glory, Sir Alsalom."

Her companion touched Sir Alsalom lightly on the arm, and in a quiet voice told him "Sir Remy died during the night. Poison, I think. But we need him on the field tomorrow, and we have chosen you from amongst our Houses to be him."

If the young noble felt any pain, he did not show it before the two earls. The hawk-nosed warrior continued.

"There are two reasons we have chosen you. First, we doubt not your virtue. Your courage will be tested as never before, but your loyalty and pride will see you through, of that we have no doubt.

"Secondly, you'll fit his harness, and we need the orcs to see him. They will fear you as they feared him, and you will be twice the man you are with your own armour. I will arm you myself. Take that off please."

Sir Alsalom shrugged off the thick padding that would have sat under his mail, and the battered warrior nodded.

"This may not be a ritual, not as the war-witches would know it, but it has power nonetheless. You have the heads of two noble Houses of Dawn helping you gird yourself for war, Sir."

The dead man's armour was laid out in the pavillion, a thing of beauty and deep woven magic. Burnished and bright it lay, its quality clear to those who knew their craft, marked in silver and gold with the rampant chimera of Sir Remy.

"Arming doublet first. Good. Belt. Cuisses and greaves hang off the belt. Buckle them up tight. Check you can move? Good. Now the standard. Tight round your neck, please. Now arms. Knotted off those points. Rerebraces, vambraces. Back and breast, faulds and tassets next. Now the pauldrons for your shoulders. Last: gauntlets, bascinet, sword."

The enchanter stepped forward. His wand moved in complex dance, weaving runes and magic together. Mighty Verys. Victorious Tykonus. He spoke in a sing-song voice as he worked, his face intent.

"Heart and soul, and song and honour. Blood and pride, and mind and thought." The spell cast, the enchanter sighed. "That armour is yours now, as much as your own skin."

Sir Alsalom felt a presence then, aware of the armour as never before ... and perhaps for a moment aware of Sir Remy, as if he were standing behind his shoulder, laughing and alive again. The young knight closed his eyes for a moment, and when he opened them his jaw was set and he was ready.

"Now;" he said quietly. "To war."

Knight-errant (Redirected from Knights-errant)

Overview

Technically, anyone in Dawn who has not passed a Test of Mettle is a yeoman, whether they are a farmer, a merchant or the daughter of an earl. Those who are actively seeking to pass a Test of Mettle are called knights-errant. Formally they are not noble, but some, especially those who are noble-born often assume some of the rank and privilege of nobility. With their quest for glory and status, knights-errant are commonly regarded as romantic figures in Dawn.

Knight is a common term for a noble who is an experienced and capable warrior (nobles who study battle-magic are called witches), but a knight-errant can be anyone. You might be a bard and storyteller who is seeking to pass your test to become a troubadour. You might be a craftsman or a magician who wishes to become a witch. A knight-errant is anyone who is trying to publicly pass the Test of Mettle.

Knights-errant often travel the land together, helping each other to triumph in their tests. Such bands travel the land to wherever they are most needed, seeking out opportunities for heroism. Groups of noble-born knights-errant are often accompanied by loyal yeomen; faithful house retainers or childhood friends. The yeomen handle everyday responsibilities allowing the would-be knights to concentrate on less worldly matters. It is not unusual for yeomen to declare themselves knights-errant but they often prefer to adventure by themselves or with others from similar humble upbringings.

The easiest way to pass a Test of Mettle is to petition the noble house you were raised in and pass the challenges they set you. It is a much more challenging to petition another noble house, particularly one with which you have little existing connections. The most ambitious knight-errants, however, seek the ultimate prize – achievements so glorious that they have to be recognized by all the noble houses – hoping for a prestigious noble house to approach them and offer a Test of Mettle. Such achievements are rare, but a knight-errant who is invited into a house rather than petitioning one is seen as being worthy indeed.

The travails of a knight-errant are not just difficult, they can also be expensive. Most Dawn nobles have a fairly cursory disdain for money, it tends to get in the way of a glorious ambition, but no-one can completely ignore the realities of mundane life. To facilitate their quests, many knights-errant or groups of knights, take a patron, a wealthy noble who can financially support their heroic lifestyle. Patrons can be useful, but often come with strings attached, even if just a requirement to serve the patron when called.

Some knights-errant enjoy the life of questing for glory so much that they continue to adventure even after passing their Test of Mettle. Such individuals become questing knights and sometimes form knightly orders of their own.

Creating a Knight-Errant

If you create a knight-errant character then you are playing a character that is not formally a noble but is striving to become one. Your character may be noble-born or yeoman-born depending on what suits your character. Individual knights-errant are seeking glory for the sake of passing their Test of Mettle, or in some cases, for the sake of attracting the attention of the best noble houses to join, so you may define as little or as much family history as you wish in creating your character.

The imagery of warriors in a harness of plate can be an intimidating costume prospect for anyone wanting to play in Dawn if you don't already own expensive armour. Knights-errant, even noble-born ones, are often short of money so it can be a great choice for players who want to play a Dawnish character but don't feel confident that their costume conveys the image of a rich and powerful noble. It is also a great way to introduce a lone character who is looking to join a noble house in-character. It is also worth considering playing a knight-errant if you are interested in playing in Dawn but want to avoid some of the more political aspects of playing a noble.

If you intend to play a knight-errant, it is important to appreciate the large scale of the PD Empire events. You will have epic opportunities for battles as part of a great army fighting the orcs, but you won't be going off on a lone quest to slay a monster. It isn't possible to create that kind of experience for characters at an event where hundreds of players are attending.

Some knights-errant have a patron - usually an Earl or other powerful Dawnish political figure - who provides them with financial backing. Having a patron can create an interesting additional dimension to your character - you shouldn't expect them to give you actual money you can use in the game (although some might) - but you can roleplay that your character's armour, weapons and wealth are from your patron. A useful patron might be able to help you politically at events, or they might place demands on your character forcing you to do tasks for them. A patron may be able to give you some real in-character advantages but ultimately the relationship exists to create interesting roleplaying around.

The Test of Mettle

The Test of Mettle is an important part of your character, so think carefully about your options here. You can create a minor noble house that has set you a Test - doing this means that you can create your own Test and ensure it is suitably challenging and heroic. Avoid having a Test that is too easy to complete, people won't be impressed by a noble who visibly completes an easy Test. If you don't want the challenge of trying to achieve glory in play then it is much easier to create a character who is already noble. The alternatives are to seek out an existing Dawnish noble house and demand a Test of Mettle from them, or to try and be so glorious that the noble houses come to you and try to offer you a Test.

In theory you have the right to demand a Test of Mettle from any existing noble house - in practice it is better to seek out a noble house that is receptive to offering you a Test of Mettle. Otherwise you are likely to be set a Test of Mettle that is inordinately difficult. Beware of any noble house that sets too easy a Test of Mettle however - the point of playing a knight-errant is to roleplay through trying to become a noble by passing your Test. You can only pass one Test, most players will get far more out of a difficult and exciting Test.

If an Earl does set an easy Test of Mettle, something that simply won't be glorious to attempt or complete - consider rejecting them. Knights-errant want the glory of passing a difficult test - but they also want the glory of joining a powerful house filled with similar glorious individuals. If a noble house sets you an easy Test it demonstrates that they are beneath you - you should seek out a more glorious house better suited to your noble nature!

Playing a Knight-errant

If you strive to play your character in as glorious a way as possible, then you can risk assuming some of the status of a noble, but it is wise to be careful. The point of playing a knight-errant is that your character is not yet noble - if you want to play a noble character who is questing for glory then consider playing a questing knight instead.

A knight-errant should not have their own heraldry. If you have a heraldic shield, consider covering it with black cloth. Knights-errant can wear the colours of Dawn, a dark blue field with a yellow sun on it, either as a flag or as their heraldry. Doing this indicates your status as a knight-errant and not a noble - but remember that the first Empress wore these colours when she first came to Dawn - they should be carried and worn with pride!

If you manage to complete your Test of Mettle while playing your character then you have a few choices. If the Test of Mettle has been set by an Earl in play, then technically you are now part of that Earl's noble house. You may wish to join their group, roleplay that you have nothing more than a loose association with the house or else set up a noble house of your own. If you wrote your own Test of Mettle as part of your background, then you can reinvent your character as a noble in charge of the noble house that set your Test.

If you don't want to play a noble in a noble household, the alternative is to become a questing knight.

Groups of Knights-errant

It is common for groups of knights-errant to travel together in quest for glory. Creating a group of knights-errant is an alternative to playing a Dawnish noble house, but is likely to be less political and more focussed on adventure and battle. All the advice presented above for creating and playing a knight-errant still applies, but it is also possible to play yeomen in the group.

The yeomen with a group of knights-errant, may be men-at-arms accompanying the knights or squires acting as loyal companions and servants. Although not likely to be armed and armoured as well as the knights-errant, men-at-arms should be able hold their own in a battle and squires may or may not fight as they choose. Remember that playing a servant in Empire isn't the same as in other games - most squires should be pragmatic and unashamed about their role in Dawnish society.

Money is not considered glorious so most nobles and knights-errant avoid having anything to do with it if they can. If you have a yeoman in the group it is well worth seeing if they want to handle the group finances. A prosperous noble house may have a yeoman serving as a seneschal so it's perfectly appropriate to have a character in a similar role in your group of knights-errant.

A knight-errant group is often be willing to accept new members if their deeds are sufficiently glorious, so before you create your own, check to see if other groups of knights-errant in the system will have you first. You may well have more fun as part of an existing group of knights-errant than by yourself. Of course, you might rather be in competition with them for the most glorious deeds, so you don't have to join an existing group.

Knights of Glory

Rules

Summer Magnitude 120

Performing the Ritual

Performing this ritual takes at least 10 minutes of roleplaying. This ritual targets an Imperial army. The general responsible for the army must be present throughout.

During the ritual the casters must be in a strong Summer regio.

This spell is an enchantment. A target may only be under one enchantment effect at a time.

Effects

This ritual summons a number of warriors from the Summer Realm to support a campaign army. The presence of these supernatural warriors will raise the strength of the campaign army by the equivalent of 3,000 additional soldiers. The additional army strength granted by this enchantment is affected by the orders given to the army. While the effect is expressed as being equivalent to additional soldiers, this enchantment never reduces casualties suffered by the army.

The effect lasts until the start of the next Profound Decisions Empire event.

Options

Any caster who has mastered the ritual may choose to substitute orichalcum for crystal mana when contributing to it. Every 2 ingots of orichalcum spent counts as 1 crystal mana when contributing to the ritual.

Description

This ritual draws on pacts with Eleonaris the Eternal Queen of the Fields of Glory in the Summer Realm. The ritual calls one of her hosts to join an established campaign army and fight alongside the troops for a season. These troops are a mix of lesser Eternals, Heralds and embodied spirits. They are usually attired in gold-and-crimson surcotes and fight under the lion banner of their mistress, although some of their heralds will also fly pennants appropriate to the main army if they are asked to do so. They are almost invariably attired in heavy armour, often of burnished bronze, sungold or (in the case of champions) orichalcum-steel. They will die as easily as mortal troops, but they seem to treat death as a minor inconvenience or even a surprise - it is as if they consider themselves immortal. If challenged, they are likely to shrug and comment enigmatically that their slain comrades will "Return to the fields of glory, by and by."

The summoned Eternals fight with the appearance of great bravery and civility; they are cordial to mortal soldiers, although a little distant. They engage mercilessly, with great ferocity, and seem to take an almost unholy joy in challenging and defeating any enemies. They will happily engage in tourneys or honour duels with mortal champions, but they lack a sense of consequences - duels often end in death, or maiming, unless their opponents are very clear on the rules. The Eternal forces are also disinclined to stealth, ambush or other guerrilla tactics preferring to face their opponents head-on. They love to fight other Eternal forces - they will single out groups of shadow warriors, crystal warriors or especially grim legionnaires unless explicitly ordered otherwise, and even then they chafe under such restrictions.

Knights summoned with this ritual are unable to pass through the Sentinel Gate. As with creatures such as the shadow warriors bound by the Conclave of Trees and Shadow or the prismatic soldiers raised by Carve the Crystal Guardian it seems that the magic of the gate cannot transport them; attempts to do so simply seem to result in the knights returning to the Summer Realm prematurely.

When the enchantment ends, the knights travel to the nearest Summer regio and depart the mortal Realm. They carry with them any of their number who have fallen in battle, and the arms and armour of any soldier left behind tends to disappear at around this time - never overtly, but when unobserved the items vanish.

Eleonaris receives a full report from her troops when they return to her, and if they are mistreated, betrayed or misused in some fashion she is likely to swear vengeance against the perpetrators. On the few occasions in the past when this has happened, she has called a truce with both her perennial rival Jaheris and her more occasional sparring partner Hayaak the gryphon-king and enlisted both of them in seeking revenge on those who have dared to betray her trust.

Some enchanters have claimed that Jaheris, the consort-rival of Eleonaris, has been known to offer gifts that allow the summoning of troops loyal to his silver-and-blue Unicorn standard when this ritual is performed. Similar gifts have been offered in the past by Hayaak the Lord of Wrath to summon his hosts of vengeance; by Cathan Canae to call forth her cold-hearted giant warriors; and occasionally by Barien, the arbiter of worth, as a reward for those who have bested one of his challenges

(OOO Note: Under most circumstances any knights created during Profound Decisions events will unfortunately have to remain primarily as a downtime or plot resource rather than something that can be used on the field. At player events, this might not be the case; but we cannot commit to phys-repping eternal warriors at short notice nor can they be used in uptime battles due to their inability to pass the portal.)

Enmity and Neutrality

At the Winter Solstice 379YE the eternal was given Enmity by the Imperial Conclave. It was thus a crime to perform this ritual. At the Spring Equinox 380YE Conclave voted to return Eleonaris to the state of Neutrality, which among other things made this ritual once again legal to perform.

Common Elements

It is exceptionally common to include a flag, pennant, banner or standard as part of this ritual, especially one that bears the device of Eleonaris - a golden lion on the red field. Other common elements include the invocation of brave warriors who have fought for the Empire in the past, and symbols of Pride and Courage. Other elements include girding the military leader, the sound of martial horns or drums, and the presence of warriors from the same nation as the target as witnesses.

The rune of victory, Tykonus, is favoured for this ritual both for its association with banners and flags and for its connection to the Eternal Lady of the Crimson Host.

Korl

Virtue

Korl is held to be a paragon of Courage, one of the very first recognised by the Highborn Assembly of the Virtuous, and ratified by the first general assembly of the Synod.

Biography

Korl's legend was transcribed by the Highborn in the early days of their settlement in the lands that would become the Empire from oral histories passed down from the arrival of the Vard and Steirn.

The boyhood of Korl is not heavily explored in these tales; most begin with his arriving with the Vard/Steirn.

From there, the commonalities in the tales begin to pick up; he performs a few standard exploits like wrestling mountain lions and making a great spear from the tusk of a dire boar.

There were deep and dark places beneath the world in those times, and the tales suggested that the secrets of metal might be best discovered deep within them. However, few were bold enough to delve beneath the earth in the lightless cold. Those who attempted the deep places came fleeing back empty-handed - or did not return at all.

By the time Korl considered the deep places, it was thought of as foolishness to dare them. Elders and companions - even his own father and sisters - told Korl that he was simply throwing his life away, but he knew that to succeed and thrive in this new world, they would need sharper and harder weapons.

Even once his mind was made up, his path was not easy. His first few delves led only to him stumbling back to the surface, exhausted and battered, having found nothing but dead ends. But he believed passionately in the old tales of metal veins and glowing stone on which the substance could be worked into tools and weapons, and would not listen to anyone who tried to tell him that they did not exist in this new land.

So he scoured the lands that his people were migrating into, for the sharp and shining rock that also figured in the tales. Having found a promising area of jagged basalt and obsidian, deep in the woods to the east of their landing-place, he descended once again.

In contrast to his preliminary battles on the surface, the tales of his subterranean endeavours are unusually lacking in great conflicts with underground creatures. There is one great struggle with a huge, blind worm that occurs in some versions, but in general the challenges detailed are icy, dark pools leading to underwater channels, the gradual dwindling of provisions, and the all-consuming, smothering darkness which no other had been capable of enduring.

Finally, the darkness began to lift, and deep beneath the earth Korl found the glowing stone which he had sought - and unloads the heavy burden of metal he had doggedly carried through all dangers to bring the two together.

There in the fume-choked, red-lit cavern he forged the first axe-head to be made in this land, and carried back not only the axe-head itself, but the seeds of understanding that would lead to the triumph of the great smiths and their charcoal forges.

Once he returned to the surface, any ordinary man - or even any great Exemplar - might reasonably have delivered the hard-won spoils of his quest and gone back to ordinary endeavour. But the very notion of rest was alien to Korl. On hearing that there was trouble in the forest which his people were attempting to occupy, he marched boldly out with the soldiers the very day that he returned from the world beneath, mounting the axe-head on a wooden shaft and naming it Irontooth.

With the axe he had forged, he destroyed legions of the strange creatures that occupied the woodlands - twisted parodies of natural animals, merged together by the foul magics leaking from the Vallorn.

While he was content with hewing their many heads from their bodies indefinitely, one of the shy, shrewd human inhabitants of the forest - those who were not Vard, but Uskha - approached him with an idea. At first he was suspicious, as the Uskha had already begun to gain a reputation for attempting to trap the Vard into bargains that would disadvantage them.

But it was clear that both Vard and Uskha would benefit from the demise of the Chimerae, so he was persuaded to listen.

Contents

- 1 Virtue
- 2 Biography
- 3 Signs
- 4 Korl in Play

He had always relied on the strength of his mighty arms and indomitable will, but to convince his fellow Vard to go along with the plan, he had to learn the art of persuasion. But having to change his battleground had never daunted him, and his sheer conviction - combined with the obvious benefits of the steel that was beginning to be made to his pattern, the fruits of the last strange endeavour he had insisted upon - supported his cause.

Instead of simply destroying the chimerae as they found them, he persuaded the Vard to herd them into particular areas - which the Uskha quickly sealed off from the wider world with their strange magics, and left signs along the perimeter to warn any from breaching them.

The death of Korl is also a topic on which the recorded tales diverge. Some say that he fell in his prime, confronting a particularly puissant chimera which refused to be lured into the designated places; others, that he had many sons and turned his hand to many battles, but then faced his dotage with the same courage as he had displayed through all his life, becoming an accomplished tutor and storyteller as his strength and vision faded, until one day he simply did not wake.

Signs

The assembly of Courage recognised the following signs as indicating that Korl was a paragon

- As an ancient paragon of Courage, a handful of people throughout history have had the hubris to claim to be Korl's reincarnation. To date, no visions have been recorded of his life from his own eyes. Most claims of this nature have come from young Winterfolk or Varushkans who ultimately disproved their claim by failing to live up to their claimed legend. Consequently, the sign of Liberation holds.
- Korl freely shared his hard-won secrets of metal-working with all people, as well as demonstrating courage in defence of his people. There is no real doubt about his Benevolence.
- Korl is held up as an Inspiration to metal workers and smiths, although the craft has advanced significantly since his time.
- The supreme feats of endurance that his journey required, and the ability to intuit the working of steel while deep within the earth, are attributed as Miracles to Korl, as is the act of cutting down an entire forest with a single axe, though this is disputed in recent times..
- While there was no organised religion in Korl's time, his tale still contains a great journey - to the depths of the earth - which has been cast by some as a Pilgrimage of Courage.
- The legendary axe Irontooth, which is said to convey great feats of supernaturally quickened recovery on its wearer in response to Korl's tireless courage while taking it to battle the chimerae, is a classic example of a Paragon's Legacy. Although it has been argued that all things forged of steel are Korl's greater legacy.
- The very early point in history that Korl's exploits took place in means that nothing is recorded that might be an indication of his past lives, so the sign of Recognition is impossible to confirm or refute.
- Korl's achievement of the sign of Salvation is debated. His endeavours led to the military success and safety of his people, rather than the improvement of their souls and assistance in the Labyrinth. The claim that steel-working enables a more civilised state of being and thereby provides more opportunities to pursue Virtue has been made - but it has had dangerous offshoots, the more extreme of which have been declared heretical from time to time, in those who would call skill with artisanry an expression of Virtue in and of itself.

Korl in Play

- The stories of Korl are often cited as proof that the judgement of recognition is not fit for purpose by pragmatic secularists and virtuous histograms.

Kyrop

The Fish, Rune of Weakness

Contents

Affiliated with the Realm of Winter

Kyrop, the waning moon, is the thorn in the foot, the rot at the root, the flaw in the heart that leads to downfall. Kyrop bids us remember the maggot within the apple; the tarnish on the reverse of the coin; more than this it urges us to turn over the rock and see what scurries away from the light.

Kyrop is also called the Fish, especially when it represents the idea of circumstantial weakness. The fish is strong in the water, but on land it simply flops about, incapable of action, and slowly dies. In the same way, Kyrop reminds us that something that grants an advantage in one situation may become a disadvantage when that situation changes, and vice versa.

In some ancient rune sets, Kyrop and Verys Rune of Might are represented by a single runestone, with the direction in which it is drawn and laid determining which meaning it takes.

Sometimes called the Slave's rune, Kyrop exemplifies the underdog and reminds us that even the greatest can be brought low if the critical point of weakness can be identified and the correct pressure applied. When used alongside Pallas, Rune of Wealth, it magnifies that rune's self-corrosive qualities and invokes over-indulgence, complacency and hubris.

Kyrop is the bane of material goods. Saboteurs among the Navarr or the Unconquered of Highguard often sketch the rune on a structure they plan to destroy; when used to break or speed the decay of an object or structure it is often called the Weakest Link.

Using Kyrop in magic

Kyrop is evoked as the foundation of most curses. It is classically used in combination with the Realm runes to direct and shape any magic intended to harm or weaken an enemy. It is also evoked in the use of magic that destroys or harms the integrity of an individual or object. It has more positive uses; for example, it may be combined with Sular, Rune of Discovery, in an attempt to uncover the weakness of an enemy. Unsurprisingly, many magicians evoke Kyrop when performing the weakness incantation.

Crafting with Kyrop

It is rarely used by crafters and is commonly said to speed the decay of anything it is inscribed upon, causing metal to rust more quickly, food and drink to spoil, stone to crumble and wood to rot. The exception lies with crafted items intended to break things, such as a Shieldbreaker, but even then most crafters would use Mawrig or Verys before they would use Kyrop.

Labyrinth's Gate

Description

The Gate of the Labyrinth is a euphemistic name for this savage weapon that exists solely to end the life of defeated opponents. Whether formed as a poll-axe, a massive hammer or a razor-sharp hafted blade, the weapon is commonly used by skilled warriors who first send their enemy sprawling, then deliver an irresistible blow that cripples all but the most heavily armoured of foes. The enemy being knocked down can provide a vital moment to pick the best spot to strike to ensure a suitably devastating blow. The reach provided by a polearm often means that the wielder of a Labyrinth's Gate can strategically cripple an opponent, or impale them on their blade with surgical precision.

According to historical records, the Highborn cataphracts made great use of these weapons in their early wars against the orcs, riding them down on their mighty war steeds, then spearing them while they were on the ground. They were especially popular with the cataphracts of the Thundering Tide. They are also weapons favoured by brutal warriors, from the Marches to Wintermark, valued for their ability to strike terror into opponents and dispatch powerful foes.

Some of these weapons bear the rune Yoorn, and in Wintermark they are sometimes called Reaper's Shears. Among the Navarr they are often decorated with intricate labyrinthine designs, and there is an unspoken taboo in some stridings against using them against human opponents. In Urizen some sentinels favour this weapon in the form of a razor-sharp yari, simple and unadorned, and say that it is unseemly that a weapon intended to deliver such devastating blows should appear beautiful.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of a polearm. You must be wielding this weapon to use its magical properties.
- Requirement: You must have the weapon master skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: You may spend a hero point point to call IMPALE with this polearm.
- Materials: Crafting a Labyrinth's Gate requires seventeen ingots of tempest jade, eleven ingots of green iron, and four measures of Orichalcum. It takes one month to make one of these items.

The scouts entered stopped. They were uncertain. Only one Navarr was visible. They raised their shields, and split up, tried to surround her. They had learnt caution in today's engagement.

The brand moved slowly, withdrawing a pace at a time to keep the three scouts in view. As soon as one had her blindsided, they would all attack. She spoke quietly to them, matter-of-fact, to keep them off balance.

"We are few." She said, "Our armies are not like those of the Marchers, or the Dawnish. We are like the unconquered Highborn, I think. No battlefields unless we must, but the silent kill, the melt-and-fade. We are perhaps most like the Urizen, of all people. Few, so our power must be directed precisely and with most impact. They wield magic, intelligence, precise bladecraft. We do not. We wield fear like a sword. It must be thus. Our stridings are small, and travel light. Our steadings rarely fortified, save in secrecy.

"See my war-marks? The painted face I wear? These are not my tattoos, because they are not me. I am not I when I wear them, I am a creature of carnage, a killer born. They make me Other.

"That is what this blade-staff is. See it is marked as I am? With my skill, it is death, so I become Fear. In my hands, it is carnage, so it makes me Terror. Its effect is more than one corpse, its effect is in the minds of others. It is not the short spear, nor the long pike. It is not to keep enemies from me, but to welcome them on. Into the ground's embrace."

She moved suddenly. Stepped to one side, reversed the blade, and slashed down and across, exhaling hard, snarling like a beast:

"Now you are on the floor."

She drew the weapon up, high above her head. She drove the point down into the orc's belly and scooped up through the heart. The orc spluttered, red foam at his mouth.

"Now, you are dead."

She retook her watching, vigilant stance, the weapon's point down and to the right, and stared at the other two.

"Now, you run."

The orcs looked at her, turned and fled. There was a snapping noise, as if a taut cord had broken, and two screams, rapidly cut short.

"And now you die, too..."

Labyrinthine Vestments

Description

A labyrinthine vestment is a sturdy robe or tunic, often with a hood, that allows a priest to use significantly greater amounts of liao when performing a spiritual ceremony. Through use of one of these robes, a lone priest can greatly increase the strength of their ceremonies, either to create a powerful and durable aura, a lasting excommunication or testimony, or to overcome or exorcise a potent malignant spiritual aura or curse.

Quite apart from the spiritual power it grants, a Labyrinthine Vestment also represents the investment of dozens of ingots and measures. A set of Labyrinthine Vestments are significantly more expensive than a Wayfarer's Robe, and thus more likely to be worn by a powerful and influential priest of the Imperial Synod than a mendicant adventurer.

The traditional design for one of these garments is a simple robe of a single colour covered with intricate weltsilver- and orichalcum embroidery in the form of swirling or angular maze. This design is by no means universal however. In the League it is commonly called a cardinal's robe or bishop's robe - and rather than subtle embroidery the artisans who weave them often go out of their way to stress how valuable the robe is and how prestigious the wearer is. Some priests of Prosperity and Pride see ownership of one of these glorious garments as a sign of their virtue, taking inspiration from the item itself; others view it as a powerful adjunct to their ceremonial abilities. Both schools of thought can appreciate the beautiful dyes, sumptuous fabrics and precious metals that augment and ornament the splendid vestment.

As with many magic items that are of use to a priest, a set of Labyrinthine Vestments is often hallowed. Common hallows include Hallowing of the Masquerade or Aldones, the Hallowing of the Throne, or the Hallowing of Brass.

Rules

- Form: Armour. Takes the form of a robe.
- Requirement: You must have the dedication skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: When you perform or cooperate in the performance of a religious skill, you may spend up to three additional doses of liao to increase the strength of the ceremony by the same amount.
- Roleplaying Effect: While wearing this robe bodily discomforts like hunger, thirst, or exhaustion feel muted and distant
- Materials: Crafting a labyrinthine vestment requires five ingots of Weltsilver, five ingots of orichalcum, eleven measures of beggar's lye, nine measures of Iridescent gloaming, and fourteen measures of dragonbone. It takes one month to make one of these items.

Lambent Essences

Mastery of these recipes allows an apothecary to brew preparations valuable to ritual magicians versed in the lore of Day. With one of these potions a ritualist can wield the magic of the Day realm more effectively, but they also become more susceptible to the influence of that realm. Like the Magnum Opus, preparation of these recipes involves a slightly more alchemical than herbal approach. Herbs are carefully measured out with mithril, silver and copper spoons, sublimed in weltsilver crucibles and distilled and condensed to draw out their essential natures.

Prior to the liberation of Reikos in 379YE, Imperial apothecaries who had mastered the Lambent Essences knew how to prepare both Effulgent Primessence and Lucent Quintessence. During the rout of the Druj orcs of the Stone Toad from the Highborn territory, many doocuments detailing the techniques of the Buruk Tepel fell into the hands of scouts, soldiers, and adventurers alike. Some of these notes originated not with the barbrians, but with Highborn scholars of the herbal arts - and the details of Radiant Transcendence found in those notes clearly originated with a so-far unnamed apothecary from High Chalcis. The potion was clearly built on principles familiar to practitioners of the Lambent Essences, and appeared to possess only minor interest for the savage Buruk Tepel. Knowledge of how to brew this potent (if expensive) new elixir quickly spread through the Empire - partially due to the work of certain Navarr stridings with an interest in magic of the Day realm.

Effulgent Primessence

This delicate, clear liquid often glows slightly in shadowed areas. It rapidly sublimates when exposed to air, becoming a fine vapour that is inhaled by a ritual magician to enhance their perception of the magic of Day. By helping the ritualist to focus their thoughts, they can achieve a synergy with the concepts and themes embodied by that realm.

Overuse of effulgent primessence can lead to increasing lassitude. It becomes increasingly hard to care about physical things, and there are some rare cases where magicians have starved to death, lacking the inclination to move from their couches to satisfy their hunger or thirst. Users remain coherent, intelligent and capable of rational discourse, which can often hide the signs of effulgent primessence abuse.

- Form: Infusion.
- Description: This clear liquid glows slightly with an inner radiance even in shadow. The liquid bubbles and beings to evaporate when exposed to the air. A tiny droplet on your tongue has a delicate, delicious flavour that you cannot quite place.
- Roleplaying Effects: You become calm and cerebral, fascinated by thoughts, ideas and knowledge. You are disinclined to physical action where mental action might be sufficient. Your movements and thoughts become precise and ordered
- Mechanical Effects: If you possess the Day Lore skill then you gain one additional effective rank to the next day ritual that you perform within ten minutes, subject to the normal rules for effective skill. This is a tonic; the effect of any other tonic you have drunk immediately ends..
- Recipe: Two drams of marrowort and one dram each of true vervain, cerulean mazzarine and bladeroot, and one crystallized mana.

Lucent Quintessence

This translucent liquid appears to have a slightly different shade from different angles. It is often diluted with fresh water before it is consumed as it has an almost overwhelming flavour of aniseed that some people find unpleasant. It is brewed from the distilled essences of four different herbs which combine with the essence of the drink and allow them to align their thoughts strongly with the realm of Day. Complex ideas and strange geometries become easier to comprehend, allowing the drinker to more readily manipulate Day magic with mortal consciousness.

- Form: Liquid.
- Description: This clear liquid seems to have a slightly different colour from different angles. It smells strongly of aniseed, and a tiny droplet on your tongue reveals it to have an almost overwhelming flavour of aniseed as well.
- Roleplaying Effects: You become highly focused, pursuing things that interest you with stubborn doggedness. You find it difficult to show interest in things that do not engage your intellect, no matter how important it might be to others.
- Mechanical Effects: If you possess the Day Lore skill then you can use up to 3 personal mana as if it were crystal mana on the next day ritual that you perform within ten minutes.
- Recipe: Three drams of marrowort, two drams each of true vervain and bladeroot and one dram of cerulean mazzarine.

Radiant Transcendence

Radiant Transcendence is a thin salve that is applied to the hands and face. It is kept in sealed containers because once exposed to air the salve begins to heat up and will eventually consume itself in a flash of heat, leaving only a strong scent of salt water and marrowort blossom. The process of creating the salve in the first place is quite fraught - the herbs and other components must be carefully prepared and once the salve is near completion it must be sealed in an airtight container or the apothecary will lose all the ingredients and have nothing to show for it.

The salve is refreshing, but it also encourages magicians who use it to impose their will on their surroundings to make their world more orderly, more efficient, and neater. It is all-too-easy for a group relying on radiant transcendence to fall into argument about how best to arrange their ritual that lasts for so long that by the time the ritual is attempted, any benefits from using the salve has been lost.

- Form: Salve.
- Description: There are thousands of tiny grains suspended in this translucent, oily substance. When exposed to air, the grains begin to glow faintly as the substance becomes warmer. A droplet on your tongue has a refreshing flavour.
- Roleplaying Effects: This salve cleans your skin as it is absorbed. You become increasingly offended by anything you see as disordered, random, or inefficient. You feel an urge to impose order on your surroundings, and on the people around you.
- Mechanical Effects: If you possess the Day Lore skill then you gain three additional ranks to the next Day ritual that you perform within ten minutes, subject to the normal rules for effective skill. This is a tonic; the effect of any other tonic you have drunk immediately ends.
- Recipe: Three drams of marrowort, two drams of true vervain, one dram each of cerulean mazzarine and bladeroot, one crystallized mana, and one ring of ilium.

Lament for Skarsind

Skarsind lay chilled in the cold of the winter
Huddled for heat every human and beast
Hoarfrost was hard on the walls and the towers
When the orc armies came like a storm in the east

Swift were the soldiers and keen was their courage
Ceaseless the struggle and fierce was the fight
But for every Orc slain
there were six standing ready
And Skarsind's walls fell to the inhuman blight

Survivors brought tidings of terror to Hahnmark
Though frost took their fingers and hard fell the snow
As heavy as lead were their hearts as they told us:
'Skarsgard is fallen and fast comes the foe.'

'Our walls still stand strong and the soldiers stand ready,
And each citizen will bear arms to defend
But our numbers are few and we never will hold them
For they come in their hundreds and seem without end.'

Then up came the voice of Inge Suvvisdottir
Her brow bound with gold, and her words cold and clear
'Wintermark lives by the strength of three peoples,
And now we have need of each of of them here.'

'Send word to the Suaq and to Kallivesa
Command them to come without any delay
Then give me nine warriors sworn to my banner
To harry the horde and to hold them at bay.'

The swiftest of messengers bore forth the orders
While Inge strode out to the eye of the storm
And nine nights and days in the mountains she fought them
Till at last she was slain and the foemen marched on

There at the borderlands army met army
Great deeds were done and they won great renown
Long nights they fought, and the orc tribes were vanquished
But gone was brave Inge and lost was the crown

A tear for the Skarsind, lost land and lost people
A tear for the hero in battle laid low
A tear for the shame, till at last we take vengeance
With steel in our hands, and their blood on the snow.

Lament for Spiral

Tune based on parts of "Dead Boy's Poem" by Nightwish. Words by Claire Sheridan. Recording

A song written by Nicassia of Phoenix Reach at the start of the interregnum.

Lament for Spiral

So much silence, silence and darkness, Towering spires, empty and gone, So much to live for, So much to die for, To take back my heart's only home. Exiled in Morrow, dream of tomorrow, Destined to drown in your sorrow alone, Winds blow through Spiral, Reach for her Wisdom, Fail, finding nobody.

Every tear that's silently shed, Only strengthens our resolve, Ankarien and sister spires, Will again be ours to hold.

Seek out the strongholds, seek out the armies, Scry for truth deep into the night, So much to live for, So much to die for, But we will not give up the fight. Learn all you can learn, strength lies in Wisdom, Destined to march to my heart's only home, Winds blow through Spiral, Reach for her children, Call, we will soon return.

Every tear that's silently shed, Only strengthens our resolve, Ankarien and sister spires, Will again be ours to hold.

Lamia's Whisper

Description

A Lamia's Whisper is usually a slim, smooth staff of black wood, elegant and refined and often decorated with gold, jade or ivory. In more rural environments, this implement is often called an Adder's Tongue and unsurprisingly tends to be decorated with images of serpents or occasionally wyrms.

These implements are popular with magicians who belong to the Reckoner guilds of the League. In pre-Imperial times, the naga families of Sarvos were known to carry poisonous staffs and this is likely the source of their popular name. In particular, because even non-magician members of the families carried staves it made it hard for their enemies to deduce which naga were magicians - and it dissuaded casual harassment of the naga because ruffians could never be sure if the naga they were abusing could respond with a deadly, venomous sting. While the fashion is not widespread, it is still maintained by some of the modern Guilds of Reckoners.

The legality of the Lamia's Whisper has been contested occasionally, citing the historical legal status of the Scorpion's Sting. The problem lies in the fact that the Empire does not consider knowledge of the venom spell itself to be a criminal offence, so it makes little sense that an implement that merely provides that knowledge should be proscribed.

The best examples of these implements are said to be those made by naga artisans, although this rumour is most commonly spread by naga artisans and so is a little suspect.

CARITA (raising her staff): We don't need to equip everyone with one of these little beauties. We just need to make sure there's enough of them to make you wonder whether your luck's run out today.
The Fallen Herald, Act 2, Scene 2'

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of a staff. You must be wielding this implement to use its magical properties.
- Requirement: You must have both the magician and battle mage skills to bond to this item.
- Effect: You may cast the venom spell as if you know it.
- Materials: Crafting a Lamia's Whisper requires no special materials. It takes two months to make one of these items.

*He comes to you with silken scales
And silken tales of sorrows told
But oh, behold
Beware the sorrows held
There's venom there, it's told
These tales and scales of black and gold

Land fit for heroes

Loyalty is a fire that spreads quickly - provided the wood is dry.

Overview

In Spring 379YE, the senators of Wintermark presented the momentous decision of their nation to relinquish Skarsind. Liberated from the Thule orcs in late 377YE, Skarsind was the fourth territory of Wintermark, but the people wanted to offer it to the Imperial Orcs as a homeland in recognition of the friendship between the two nations, and of heroic deeds done on behalf of the threefold people by the orcs - including the orcs' role in the return of the Crown of Three Tears and the ending of the Bane of Tradition that had assailed them.

After scrutiny by the constitutional court, certain additional requirements were met but one remained outstanding - the requirement for a throne to ratify the decision. At the Autumn Equinox 379YE, the Imperial Favour of Empress Britta was used to allow the ratification of this motion in the absence of a Throne. The senate then chose to assign Skarsind to the Imperial Orcs.

The move has not proved universally popular, with naysayers in both Wintermark and among the orcs themselves. Yet with the decisive action of the Senate it seems that the orcs finally have a homeland, the right to elect a Senator to represent them, and the ability to finally participate fully in the business of the Empire.

The Veto

There is one small element that is unresolved. The assignment of Skarsind took place during the final senate session of the Autumn Equinox, and so the Imperial Synod have a window of opportunity to employ their veto should they wish to do so. But there are some provisos.

The General Assembly has until the start of the first senate session on the Friday night of the Winter Solstice to secure the majority required to wield the veto. The conscience of the Senate would then be responsible for announcing that veto at the session. The opportunity to veto the relinquishment of Skarsind has passed, however, and ratification is not subject to the veto. They would only be able to veto the assignment of the territory to the Imperial Orcs. If they did so, the Senate would be able to raise a motion of assignment again during the Winter Solstice, but there would be no requirement for them to name the Imperial Orcs as the recipient of the territory. Indeed, they could assign it to any other Imperial nation.

Because the motion took place during the Autumn Equinox, this would count as the use of the veto from Autumn, not the use of the Winter Solstice veto. This is significant because the Synod can only veto one motion that is not constitutional each season - and while the relinquishment was constitutional, the assignment is not. However, if the Senate raised the assignment again this season following a successful use of the veto, the Synod would again be able to seek the veto using the ability to do so for this season.

No member of the Synod informed the civil service of their intention to seek the veto during the Autumn Equinox so their assumption is that the motion should proceed without complication. As such, the last three months have seen large numbers of Imperial Orcs moving to Skarsind to begin their new lives. If the motion is vetoed, then further efforts to help the orcs claim the territory will cease until the Senate and Synod are able to reach an accord once more.

Significance

The Imperial Orcs now have a territory of their own and are able to lay down roots. This means a number of significant changes to their nation.

Life is Precious

Following the ratification, a great exodus of orcs across the Empire begins. The civil service have spent the last three months helping every Imperial Orc transfer their holdings to Skarsind. Funds carefully collected and hoarded by bonesetters against the day when the orcs had a homeland are brought into play.

 - 2.1 Life is Precious
 - 2.2 War is in our soul
 - 2.3 Loyal to the core
 - 2.4 We are citizens
 - 2.5 We are building a nation

OOO Explanation

We have moved the personal resource of every Imperial Orc character to Skarsind. There is no charge for this to happen, and the Imperial Orcs have not suffered any loss of upgrade. The cost to do so is below the abstraction layer, assumed to have been covered by funds collected over the last fifty years to allow the orcs to claim their homeland. Individual players are welcome to roleplay that they have relocated their resource (even though this would normally not be possible), or had the assistance of the civil service or from claiming a new resource in Skarsind with the same characteristics of their old resource.

If any Imperial Orc player does not want to move their resource to Skarsind, they should e-mail empire.plot@profounddecisions.co.uk to let us know. They will need to name a specific Imperial territory where they want their resource to be from this point onwards. They will suffer the usual penalties for having a personal resource in another nation's territory, and will not be eligible to vote in any senatorial elections.

The Summer Storm and the Winter Sun still play a significant role in the identity of the nation, and as before every Imperial Orc is expected to belong to one or the other of the armies. The main change we have made is during character creation the choice of which army to belong to is now a background question, rather than taking the place of the territory decision and have combined two existing question together. From the point of view of the setting, this is at least as significant a choice as a Wintermark player's choice of which tradition their character belongs to.

War is in our soul

The Imperial Orcs can now elect a senator to represent them in the Imperial Senate. After consultation with the Imperial Orc egregore, the civil service have determined a constitutionally valid process whereby to elect a senator. The outcome is as follows.

Any Imperial Orc citizen can stand for election as senator. Any Imperial Orc soldier who lives in the territory that is to be appointed can participate in the election. The egregore's decision to restrict the ability to vote to soldiers reflects the fact that the tens of thousands of Imperial Orcs are at heart a militaristic people. Their natural instinct is to fight, and it is something that they feel defines their essential nature.

In this case, the civil service recognises as a soldier any Imperial Orc who has the will to face the enemies of the Empire. If any orc wishes to question the right of another to claim the title of soldier, the egregore will arrange for them to show their will to fight in the fighting pit against an opponent of the egregores choosing. Once mettle has been proven, no further challenges will be accepted that summit.

Once the candidates have made themselves known, each in turn is invited to present an item of worth and explain its significance to the candidate or the nation. The egregore has recommended this method because the Orcs need to be represented by someone who can hold their own in an arena where debate and the ability to express oneself are key.

After each candidate has spoken, those orcs eligible to vote can place a weapon in front of the speaker they support. Once every orc has had their chance, the number of weapons is counted and the orc that has received the most becomes the new senator.

OOO explanation

- Anyone can stand as senator
 - Only people who are from the territory can vote
 - voting is "any soldier of the Imperial Orcs" - if in doubt the egregore will arrange a pit fight
 - They make a speech about an item of worth
 - The voters place a weapon before their chosen candidate.
 - Majority support takes the seat

Loyal to the core

Prior to the ratification, the Imperial Orcs had no senator to appoint their generals. The Imperial Constitution says that "The Senate will appoint a general for each army, but only where the will of the nation in this matter is not clear". With all other nations, the will of the nation was interpreted as the unanimous decision of the senators. Without any senators, a stop-gap method was used to present that will. Now that the Imperial Orcs have the ability to elect a senator, the constitutional court views the temporary resolution whereby the orcs fought for the right to be general is at an end.

From this point forward, all Imperial Orcs generals will be appointed by unanimous decision of the senators of the nation.

For the last five decades, the appointment of the Imperial Orc generals was determined by competition between warbands. Tradition is a powerful force, and it may be that the Imperial Orc nation wishes to continue the practice of fighting in the pit to identify who the best candidates for the title of general may be. However, it is important to realize that there is no legal requirement for the senator to accept this mechanism if they do not wish to do so. It is also possible for the senator to appoint a general who is not a member of the appropriate army (that is, a Summer Storm soldier could be general of the Winter Sun), though such an action might cause morale issues for the army.

The general of the Summer Storm will serve until their term ends (in Summer), they step down, die, or are revoked. The Winter Sun general is the same but is appointed annually at the Winter Solstice.

OOC explanation

As with several things about the Imperial Orcs, the previous situation was an artifact of the unique position of possessing no territory of their own. Now that the orcs have a senator, this situation has obviously changed. We discussed extensively the idea that the senator would be appointed by the generals, but in the end we discarded the idea as unsatisfying. It would perpetuate a special situation for the Imperial Orcs, meaning they would continue to be an unconstitutional mess. A single senator appointing two generals may be peculiar, but it is entirely supported by other parts of the game and setting.

We are citizens

During Winter 376YE, the Imperial senate created the imperial title of Advisor on orc affairs. As a national Senate title, the responsibility for naming the advisor falls to unanimous decision of the Imperial Orcs senators.

While the title is obviously a little less relevant with an actual senator, it represents significant additional presence in the Senate for the Imperial Orcs. The ability to serve as a member of the senate and the right of address are in no way altered by the existence of an Imperial Orc senator. They still have the responsibility to advise the senate on matters relating to orcs - both Imperial and barbarian (although at present the Senate have not given the advisor the authority to negotiate with orc foreigners and barbarians on their behalf).

As with the generals, the current advisor on orc affairs will continue to serve until they step down, die, are revoked, or their tenure expires (at the Spring Equinox 380YE). From this time the new method of appointment will apply.

OOC explanation

As with the generals, the situation where the generals were appointing the advisor on orc affairs was an aberration. With the ability to appoint a senator, the appointment of the advisor defaults to that senator.

We are building a nation

When Skarsind was liberated from the Thule, the Brilliant Shore was allocated as a national resource. This status has not been changed by the decision to relinquish and re-allocate Skarsind. The Brilliant Shore is now an Imperial Orc national seat on the Imperial Bourse. However, the steinr Joakim was assigned the resource in Summer 379YE. The civil service intends to raise an administrative motion with the Senate to determine whether they wish the Brilliant Shore to default to the Imperial Orcs immediately, or whether the Wintermark incumbent should continue to control the seat until it would next be assigned in Summer 380YE (or if they die or step down).

Once the seat is available for appointment again, whenever that takes place, the decision about who controls the Brilliant Shore will be made by the Imperial Orc captains of military units.

The offices of the Steel Fist have been relocated from Crown's Quay to Torfast in Southpine but the bourse seat is otherwise unaffected. It will continue to be assigned by the captains of military units who support the Imperial armies, as before. The Sarcophan Delves merchants responsible for delivering the bounty of ilium the seat receives have not taken the news that they will now be required to trek across the entire Empire to the "bevroren strontgat van niets" particularly well but have no alternative unless they wish to break or renegotiate their deal with the Empire.

Landskeeper's Oath (Redirected from Landkeeper's Oath)

Description

These useful staves help to augment the abilities of the ritual-minded Landskeepers. The wood used to craft these staves traditionally is taken from the Marcher territory where the Landskeeper who will wield it was born or raised; this tradition even extends to staves made for non-Marcher magicians. The wood is carefully selected while it is still growing and the tree is watered and tended with care. The living bark is carved with runes, marks, patterns and oaths that the Landskeeper has made. The wood is sometimes trained around a chalk carving or a stone with a hole in that is known to be lucky.

A Landskeeper's Oath often has the rune Hirmok carved into the surface, which occasionally leads to them being called Scythes of Office even though they are not actually scythes, and many Landskeeper's do not rely on them.

In The Brass Coast, where wood is a valuable commodity and long periods of time can be spent at sea, some artisans craft these staves from an old piece of an existing ship as it lives and works, slowly carving the grain and letting the sea weather the wood. Only when the part made of the wood needs replacing is the staff ready, so that nothing is wasted. The item is then named for the part of the ship from which it came such as Gunwale or Capstan.

Landskeeper

Overview

A landskeeper is anyone who uses magic to support the nation as a whole and Marcher traditions in particular. Landskeepers can use a variety of methods, besides hearth magics and rituals, to do this. Some landskeepers technically lack any real magical ability at all, using traditional rites and offering good advice and aid to the Marcher folk. Someone who advises on the effective order to rotate your crops, what herbs to use to bring a pregnant pig to term, or where to place a bushel of wheat to keep out evil spirits, can be a landskeeper, whether or not they also employ magic.

Magic

The landskeepers support the Marcher armies in wartime, providing magical enchancements to protect and empower the soldiers of the Marches, as well as healing the injured. Landskeepers act as they will in the service of what they perceive as the greater good, and they have a great deal of freedom to take unpopular action.

Many landskeepers use curses to deliver appropriate punishments to those who they think have transgressed against Marcher traditions. Even the Stewards are not above the judgement of the Landskeepers in this regard, and a few powerful households have been brought low by Landskeeper curses after they adopted airs and graces or other foreign ways.

Finally, landskeepers deal with the Eternals. Most have a deep suspicion of these creatures, which have complex and inscrutable agendas of their own. Most prefer to deal with the Heralds, the human-like servants of the Eternals with whom it is easier to reach a compromise or mutually beneficial accommodation. Places where Heralds appear are often marked with standing stones.

Politics

The vast majority of Landskeepers keep a certain amount of distance from other Marcher folk. They view the Marches as their charge, and their ultimate responsibility is to the Marcher people and traditions rather than to any individual or Marcher household. When landskeepers do associate with households or market towns directly it is always in pursuit of their own agenda. Many real landskeepers have little time for hedgie wizards, magicians at the beck and call of a steward.

At a few points in Marcher history, there have been so many landskeepers that they have formed three or four distinct circles, with each coven taking responsibility for a single territory. More usually landskeepers come together to form a single coven, the better to ensure that their voice is heard through the Marches. Part of their strength, and their ability to operate as they see fit, comes from their control of the magical dolmens that stand throughout the territories. In addition to strengthening the landskeepers, these great stones anchor powerful enchantments that enhance the fertility of Marcher soil. Households who oppose the landskeeper circle risk losing their magical support and even their very prosperity.

Sadly many landskeepers lost their lives in the catastrophic battle that saw the death of Empress Britta in 376YE. Much of the lore concerning the Marcher dolmans was lost with them and the prestige of the landskeepers has waned accordingly. It remains to be seen if a new generation of landskeepers will be able to restore their power and influence.

The landskeepers do not look well on the new fashion for market towns, a departure from the old ways that the majority have opposed at every turn. The aldermen of the market towns tend to have little appreciation for the work of the landskeepers, and their politically protected status makes them hard to influence. In the past, some landskeeper circles have reached an accommodation with the market towns, but these are usually cautious and shaky associations.

Creating a Landskeeper

The Landskeepers are intended to allow players to play Marcher ritualists who also have a significant role in the politics of the Marcher nation, if they wish. Landskeepers are great characters for anyone who is considering attending the event by themselves or as part of a small group. It is perfectly acceptable to play a Landskeeper who isn't a ritualist or even a magician. A landskeeper might be a physick or skilled with potions and herbs, or you could consider playing a blacksmith who is a capable artisan. Being an effective landskeeper is about your characterisation as much as your skills.

Landskeepers are usually born into a Marcher household, so you can still define your Marcher family as part of your background. If you want to be from an existing household, one played by current players, then it's worth contacting the group just to check they are happy with you doing that. Otherwise your character can be from almost anywhere in the Marches.

It is possible to play a Landskeeper who is part of a Marcher household group. Most landskeepers would not regard themselves as a true member of a household, but individuals sometimes associate with a favoured household to achieve some long term goals. In practice the power of the role derives from the landskeepers working together; a landskeeper who is a dutiful member of his household is unlikely to have the same influence or voice as one who makes the landskeeper circle their first loyalty.

If you are creating a landskeeper ritualist, then it is worth considering leaving your choice of rituals open until you have had a chance to meet and talk with other landskeepers. A degree of cooperation is useful when choosing rituals to allow the characters to perform the rituals together effectively.

Playing a Landskeeper

Anyone playing a landskeeper is well advised to seek out the other landskeepers once they enter play. Whether they have chosen to organize themselves into one circle or many, the power of the landskeepers derives from the degree to which they can work together. This is especially true when performing rituals, but their political unity is as important as their magical cooperation.

While they often claim to disdain politics, most landskeepers support the status quo and take the long view of events. In turn landskeepers who completely disrespect the households are striking against the fabric of Marcher society that they are generally assumed to be protecting. Part of their status derives from the way they place the good of the nation above all else, so the more unbiased you can be, the more power you are likely to wield.

The magic rituals that the landskeeper circle can offer are vital to other groups, so don't be afraid to use that to get what you want, but the more subtle you can be about it, the better. If you try to throw your weight around and expect other players to do what you say because "the brief says the Marchers respect the landskeepers" you are going to get nowhere. The landskeepers are supposed to be conservative but fair in their dealings with the households; you have to play that part of the Marcher brief to get other players to play theirs!

The landskeepers are written with a degree of hostility towards those ritualists and spell casters who are not landskeepers but have remained part of a Marcher household group. These characters undermine the power and influence of the landskeepers by offering the households a way to perform rituals without outside assistance. The landskeepers consider them to be hedge wizards, which for a group who view themselves as the guardians of Marcher tradition is meant to convey a degree of scorn and contempt for these dabblers. A good landskeeper character will rarely pass up an opportunity to demonstrate how much more effective at magic they are than a household wizard.

Ultimately though the respect the Marchers are supposed to have for the landskeepers is based on the fact that they put the Marcher traditions and the Marcher nation first. You can't expect other players to treat you as a landskeeper if you are very obviously just a ritualist who is part of an Marcher household group. If you want to play a ritualist who is part of a household group, it may be better to play that idea to the hilt, perhaps even a character who has rejected the role of the landskeeper in favour of remaining loyal to their household.

It is also worth noting that the landskeepers consider the welfare of the Marches more important than that of the other nations that make up the Empire. In a dispute between a Marcher household - or even a Marcher market town - and the Imperial Synod, for example they will almost certainly be staunch supporters of their fellow Marches regardless of what outsiders might decide is "good for the Empire." This can be a great excuse to be stubborn, and help other Marcher players resist the temptation to compromise with outsiders.

Inspiration

These magical Marchers draw on a number of sources for inspiration. They are as much inspired by the cunning folk of European history as the obvious fantastic characters such as Pratchett's witches.

Landsknecht's Zweihänder (Redirected from Landsknecht's Zweihander)

Description

A Landsknecht's zweihänder is a famous two-handed sword, popular among the mercenaries of Tassato and Temeschwar. There is occasional debate on whether its power is magical in nature or simply down to the weight of the large quantities of tempest jade and orichalcum which go into their production.

The Unconquered of Highguard also employ these swords as part of their guerilla tactics, depriving their foes of weapons, often targeting the enchanted blades and magical implements of the most powerful enemy combatants. Merab of Tobias' Patrol was famed from her skill in deploying her sword and was responsible for the destruction of enchanted staves of every orc shaman in the Great Forest of Peytaht. There have been mutterings than Merab may have been an Exemplar of Vigilance, but insufficient evidence has been presented to the Synod on the matter.

Rules

- Form: Weapon. Takes the form of a two-handed weapon.
- Requirement: You must have the Weapon Master skill to bond to this item.
- Effect: Twice per day you may call SHATTER when you strike with this weapon.
- Materials: Crafting a landsknecht's zweihänder requires thirteen ingots of tempest jade, three ingots of orichalcum and three measures of beggar's lye. It takes one month to make one of these items.

The tent was strewn with maps, ledgers, and scraps of paper with jottings, and scratched out sums. Two glasses of wine sat on a tray between two seated figures wearing the finest doublets, heavily embroidered and trimmed with exquisite furs. Rudolph had the contract laid out in front of him, and was carefully reading through it while Denna helped herself to the glazed cherries.

"That out of their pay, a pikeman should supply themselves with a sturdy pike, the whole of which to be between seven and nine feet in length, and such armour as would render their bodies protected against the piercing swords of the common orcs,"

Donna shrugged. "Well, that's satisfactory, isn't it?"

Rudolph nodded. "Yes, business as usual, almost, although there's a fair few spearmen who won't have a pike - but then this! 'That out of their pay, each member of a flank company shall provide such protection of fine steel to render the arrows of the enemy impotent against them.'

"Hmm..." Donna looked into the middle distance for a moment, chewing reflectively, then spat the cherry pit with pinpoint accuracy across the tent. It pinged off a metal plate of the armour on its stand making Rudolph wince slightly "Yes, that is going to be difficult. Some of them will, but many just won't have that sort of protection. They're not expecting uniforms, too are they?"

Rudolph shook his head.

"No, but listen to this! ...'each to be equipped with a zweihänder, between three-and-one-half and five-feet in length, crafted by an artisan skilled in such things, for the discomforting of the enemy's pikes and the staffs of their magicians.' They can't seriously be asking every single soldier in a flank company to have a Landsknecht's zweihänder!"

The short man was clearly warming to his subject now. He began ticking points off on his fingers as he spoke.

"There's what, eighty in a general strength in a company?" He asked rhetorically. "That's eleven hundred and twenty ingots of tempest jade, five hundred and sixty ingots of orichalcum and five hundred and sixty measures of beggar's lye each! Why, you could build a house out of the beggarwood alone! Have they no idea of the value of such things! Let alone the fact that it's six and a half years of a swordsmith's time, even if they lasted that long! We'd need seven artisans on staff the entire war, doing nothing but making these things, and they'd need to have started last Summer!"

Donna laughed at Rudolph's agitation. She picked up another cherry and bit into it, savouring the tartness as she considered.

"Well, tell them 'No', not without a bill through the Imperial Senate." She was serious for a moment. "We'll equip any forlorn hope with them, as usual, but they can't seriously expect any more than that. What they are asking for is quite ridiculous. I wonder sometimes if these people have the slightest idea of how much things cost!"

Language

Overview

Empire is deliberately a gender-neutral setting by design. There are no roles, character types, jobs or positions in the setting that are restricted by gender or are stereotyped as belonging to any particular gender. For example; soldiers, healers, generals, senators and empresses are all equally as likely to be women as they are men. We are not interested in exploring themes of real world gender discrimination, and we want our games to be welcoming to players of all genders.

To support this goal, we ask participants to be mindful of their use of language when addressing others. For example, addressing a crowd of Imperial citizens about to take the battlefield as "men", "lads" or "boys" will make some players feel excluded and does not make sense in a universe where half the warriors are not male. We appreciate that the use of gendered language is habitual and everyone makes the odd mistake; but a concerted effort to use appropriate in-character language that fits the setting will improve the game for everyone.

Respect the Setting

- Women look after themselves in the Empire setting

Half of the most famous martial heroes in the Empire's history have been women. The Empire's armies have roughly equal numbers of soldiers of all genders. Phrases that are common in modern parlance, like "protect the women", imply that women are helpless and need protecting which literally makes no sense in Empire.

These sort of phrases jar badly with many players, disrupting their immersion and reminding everyone that this is a game. An individual man or woman might need protecting, but the idea that "women need looking after" is inappropriate in the game in exactly the same way that talking about Star Wars is. Most live roleplayers can well understand how important it is to avoid modern references during time-in. We ask all players to appreciate that verbal references to protecting women violate the setting in the same way - and to make the same effort to avoid them.

Respect Other Participants

- Gendered language like "men", "lads", "guys", or "boys" makes some participants feel excluded
- You must use a participant's preferred pronoun

Many participants are accustomed to using gendered nouns like "men", "guys", "lads", or "boys" as familiar terms to describe groups of people, particularly warriors or soldiers. Martial groups might traditionally be expected to be male, but in Empire martial groups are populated by characters of all genders. This means that a general who refers to her soldiers as her "men" is using language that does not fit with the setting.

It is also common in modern speech to use these words as a shorthand when referring to a group that include people of all genders. In the vast majority of cases, the speaker intends their words to refer to men and women collectively. That isn't what is communicated however - it may sound to some listeners as if the speaker meant to address the group as if the women were not present or were irrelevant. Out of respect for other participants, we ask players to be mindful of their language and try to avoid using male collective nouns when referring to mixed groups of individuals. It is absolutely fine to refer to groups of men in gendered terms since there is no confusion over what was meant.

You must respect other participants and try to use the pronouns they ask you to use when referring to them. We understand that it is easy to make honest mistakes in this regard, but refusing to acknowledge a correction or deliberately misgendering another player is not acceptable at our events.

Non-Consensual Sex

- References to non-consensual sexual activity are explicitly against the setting

The themes that exist within Empire include mind-influencing magic, drugs and addiction, slavery, human sacrifice, racism and prejudice, prostitution, violence, robbery, torture and murder. They do not include non-consensual sex or sex with minors - these concepts simply do not exist in the Empire setting. All players must make every possible effort to avoid overt references to any form of non-consensual sex while roleplaying their character.

We have made these design decisions for our setting because we want to deliver a game where players who have had traumatic real life experiences can be confident of what themes they will and what themes they won't encounter in the game. It is not possible to know what real life experiences other players have suffered, so you must avoid in-character references to either of these two subjects in play to ensure that you are complying with our rules and that your character's words fit the setting.

If a player makes reference to non-consensual sex while roleplaying their character, it is appropriate to appraise them of the rules prohibiting this at the first available opportunity, even if this disrupts ongoing roleplaying.

Songs

- Participants who are filking or writing songs for Empire should use appropriate language that fits the setting
- Songs that celebrate non-consensual sex may not be performed at our events

Songs and music can add a great deal to the in-character atmosphere of the event - provided that the lyrics fit the Empire setting. We encourage creative participants to write their own songs, or to filk existing material, provided that they ensure that the lyrics follow the guidelines for language use.
